during which said Force Majeure Event shall cause such delay, but such deferral of the Scheduled Delivery Date shall in no event be deferred by a Force Majeure Event for more than 45 days. Landlord and Tenant agree that the foregoing sum is their best estimate of the daily damages, including but not limited to lost sales that Tenant will incur as a result of Landlord's failure to deliver the Premises. [If Landlord fails to pay such liquidated damages by the Rent Commencement Date, Tenant shall be entitled to offset such sums against Minimum Rent and, at its option, Additional Rent until fully recouped.]⁴ If the Commencement Date does not occur within 90 days after the Scheduled Delivery Date for any reason whatsoever, Tenant, at its option, may terminate this Lease upon written notice to Landlord. Such termination date shall not be subject to extensions for any reason whatsoever. If Tenant elects to terminate this Lease, the Lease shall be deemed null and void and of no further force or effect, Landlord shall within 10 business days refund Tenant's Security Deposit (or return and consent to the cancellation of any letter of credit) and any unearned prepaid rent, Landlord shall return to Tenant any guaranty of the Lease or any Lease obligations marked "cancelled" and otherwise confirm the termination of any such guaranty, and neither party shall have any further rights or obligations under the Lease, except those which expressly survive its expiration or termination (all of those events, collectively, a "Lease Termination"), and [in addition to liquidated damages due for the period of delay,⁵] Landlord shall reimburse Tenant for all of Tenant's expenses incurred in connection with this Lease, including, Tenant's leasing costs, Tenant's store development costs incurred in connection with the Premises, attorneys' fees, design fees, consultant fees (whether the foregoing fees are incurred by outside or in-house personnel), permitting fees, site selection costs, and construction costs, plus all other costs and expenses incurred by Tenant in connection with this Lease and the Premises (collectively, the "Costs").⁶ Landlord shall also return all monies previously deposited by Tenant upon execution of this Lease, if any.

4 Delete this sentence if no liquidated damages.

5 Delete bracketed clause if no liquidated damages.

6 Landlord will push back on reimbursing Tenant for its Costs (throughout this Rider) and that's why this provision should be highlighted and outlined in the negotiation of the Letter of Intent (LOI). Resist capping the Costs- Landlord is making representations that it can deliver the Premises by a certain date and Tenant is expending huge amounts of money to get the Premises built on time.

4. Permitted Use. The “Permitted Use” means use of the Premises for these uses: _____.⁷ Tenant may not use the Premises for any other purpose except the Permitted Use.
5. Exclusivity. Tenant shall have the exclusive right to operate a _____ in the Project⁸ as the Site Plan delineates the Project (the “Exclusive”). Landlord shall cause every future lease and every existing lease that is later amended in any way (including pursuant to Landlord’s discretionary consent to an assignment or subletting) in the Project to prohibit the tenant under that lease from violating the Exclusive. If any other tenant in the Project violates the Exclusive, then without limiting Tenant’s other rights and remedies, so long as that violation continues Tenant shall pay from time to time, in place of Minimum Rent under Landlord’s Lease, an amount equal to [50% of Minimum Rent] [Percentage Rent with a breakpoint of $0]⁹ (“Substitute Rent”). Payment of Substitute Rent shall start as of the first date the Exclusive has been violated and shall continue for a period (the “Substitute Rent Period”) that ends on the earlier of: (a) [24] months after it begins; or (b) the date when the violation of Tenant’s Exclusive has been terminated in such a manner that it is not likely to recur (the “Exclusive Violation Cure Date”). If the violation continues beyond the Substitute Rent Period, Tenant may terminate the Lease by notice to Landlord (a “Termination Notice”). Tenant must give a Termination Notice, if at all, within 90 days after the end of the Substitute Rent Period. If, in that 90-day period, an Exclusive Violation Cure Date occurs, then the Termination Notice shall be ineffective. If Tenant does not elect to terminate the Lease within that 90-day period, then Tenant shall: (a) resume payment of Minimum Rent as Landlord’s Lease requires; and (b) be deemed to have waived its right to terminate the Lease based on that violation of its Exclusive. That does not limit Tenant’s rights or remedies if a later violation of the Exclusive occurs. If Tenant gives a Termination Notice and no timely

7 Be very clear on Tenant’s Permitted Use. Make sure that it is broad enough to cover any future changes in Tenant’s industry (such as “any retail use”) and include incidental uses, such a storage and general office and administrative purposes. Try to avoid any restrictions or requirements on Tenant’s trade name and if there are any requirements, be sure to allow a change in trade name upon assignment or subletting.

8 Adjust all defined terms in this Rider as appropriate. Make sure Lease defines all defined terms not defined in this Rider. Drill down on the meaning of “Project.” Does it include everything we want it to include? If there is a residential portion and office portion of the Project, should the Exclusive apply to those portions of the Project as well?

9 Definition of Percentage Rent will vary with circumstances and definitions in Landlord’s Lease. Adjust as appropriate.

Exclusive Violation Cure Date occurs, then: (a) a Lease Termination shall occur; and (b) Landlord shall within 10 business days reimburse Tenant for the unamortized cost of Tenant's Work based on a 20-year straight line amortization schedule (the "Unamortized Costs").

6. Co-Tenancy Provisions.

A. Required Co-Tenants. The "Required Co-Tenants" means (excluding Tenant and the Premises): (a) tenants that (would) occupy at least ___% of the Project's gross leasable area (the "GLA"); and (b) [all Anchor Tenants of the Project] [at least 2/3 of Anchor Tenants, rounded up to a whole number].¹⁰ "Anchor Tenant" means [_____ and _____, their successors or assigns, or their substantial equivalents reasonably approved by Tenant] [any tenant that occupies or would occupy at least [20,000] square feet of GLA].

B. Lease-up Contingency.¹¹

1. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, if, as of _____¹² (the "Lease-Up Deadline"), signed leases do not yet exist between Landlord and the Required Co-Tenants (the "Lease-Up Contingency"), then Tenant may terminate the Lease by giving notice (the "Lease-Up Termination Notice") to Landlord within 30 days after the Lease-Up Deadline (that 30-day period, the "Lease-Up Termination Option Period") (but if Landlord satisfies the Lease-up Contingency in the Lease-Up Termination Option Period, then the Lease-Up Termination Notice shall be null and void and of no further force or effect); or (b) if Landlord's Work has been Substantially Completed and Premises are ready to be delivered to Tenant, reject Landlord's tender of possession of the Premises and delay starting Tenant's Work until Landlord has satisfied the Lease-Up Contingency. If Tenant fails to deliver a Lease-Up Termination Notice, then the Lease-Up Termination Notice shall be null and void and of no further force or effect.

10 If the Project has three or more Anchor Tenants use this test. Landlords may want either (a) or (b) but not both. This will be negotiated during the LOI period.

11 Lease-up Contingencies typically apply to new developments only.

12 The Lease-Up Deadline should occur shortly after lease execution so that Tenant doesn't expend too much money on initial development costs.

nation Notice in the Lease-Up Termination Option Period, or if Tenant takes possession of the Premises and starts Tenant's Work at the Premises, then Tenant shall be deemed to have waived its right to reject Landlord's tender of possession and/or give a Lease-Up Termination Notice. If Tenant gives a timely Lease-Up Termination Notice, then: (a) a Lease Termination shall occur; and (b) Landlord shall within 10 business days reimburse Tenant for its Costs, as evidenced by paid receipts therefor.

2. If Tenant accepts Landlord's tender of possession of the Premises on or before the Lease-Up Deadline and thereafter promptly starts Tenant's Work at the Premises, then if the Lease-Up Contingency remains unsatisfied as of the Commencement Date, and Tenant is open and operating its business in the Premises for the Permitted Use, then Tenant shall pay Substitute Rent after the Commencement Date until Landlord satisfies the Lease-Up Contingency. Notwithstanding the previous sentence, in no event shall Tenant be required to open the Premises for the conduct of its business until Landlord satisfies the Lease-Up Contingency.

C. Opening Condition.¹³ Notwithstanding anything in the Lease to the contrary and so long as Tenant has not committed an uncured default beyond notice and grace period, Tenant shall not be required to open for business unless and until the Required Co-Tenants are open for business and operating at the Project [the construction of all Common Areas, including (without limitation) all parking areas are substantially complete, all construction equipment and debris have been removed and Landlord has obtained a Certificate of Occupancy for the entire [Building/Shopping Center]¹⁴ (the "Opening Condition"). If Landlord has not satisfied the 13 Some landlords will try to carve out certain reasons for the failure to satisfy the Opening Condition, like force majeure, casualty, condemnation or the making of repairs or restorations following any casualty or condemnation event. These are usually not acceptable, especially for the initial Opening Condition, and Landlord should bear that risk.

14 If this is new construction, Tenant may want to include this bracketed language as well as part of the "Opening Condition."

Opening Condition as of the Commencement Date,¹⁵ Tenant may: (a) delay opening until Landlord satisfies the Opening Condition; or (b) open for business at the Premises. If Tenant opens for business before Landlord satisfies the Opening Condition, Tenant shall pay Substitute Rent until Landlord satisfies the Opening Condition. If the Opening Condition is not met within __ months after [the date that would have been the Commencement Date had there been no Opening Condition] (the “Opening Co-Tenancy Election Date”), then Tenant shall have the option to either: (x) terminate the Lease by giving Landlord notice (the “Opening Co-Tenancy Termination Notice”) within 30 days after the Opening Co-Tenancy Election Date (such termination being Tenant’s sole remedy);¹⁶ or (y) if Tenant has not opened for business, Tenant shall immediately open for business. If Tenant elects to give an Opening Co-Tenancy Termination Notice, then: (i) the parties shall have the same rights and obligations as if Tenant had given a valid Lease-Up Termination Notice; and (ii) Landlord shall, without duplication, reimburse Tenant’s Unamortized Costs.

- D. Post-Opening Condition. After the Opening Condition has been satisfied, if at any later time (and only for so long as) the Opening Condition is no longer satisfied, Tenant may: (a) pay Substitute Rent;¹⁷ and (b) notify Landlord that Tenant may terminate the Lease if the Opening Condition remains unsatisfied for one year after Tenant’s notice (a “Termination Warning Notice”). If Tenant gives a Termination Warning Notice and the Opening Condition is not satisfied within one year thereafter, then Tenant may give a “Post-Opening Termination Notice.” A Post-Opening Termination Notice shall have the same consequences as an Opening Co-Tenancy Termination Notice. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Section, if after Tenant issues a Termination Warning Notice, Landlord satisfies the Opening Condition within one year, then the Termination Warning Notice shall be null and void and of no further force or effect.

15 This defined term will vary depending on the terms of LOI, but the Opening Condition should be tied to the date when Tenant is ready to open for business (and/or start paying rent).

16 Tenants may sometimes agree to give a one-year termination warning notice instead of terminating. Landlord would then have one year to satisfy the Opening Condition. In those cases, edit accordingly.

17 Some landlords may require that tenant show a reduction in sales from the previous year as a result of the Opening Condition no longer being satisfied.

- E. No Other Co-Tenancy Terminations. If Tenant does not (when entitled to do so) timely give a Lease-Up Termination Notice, an Opening Co-Tenancy Termination Notice, or a Post-Opening Termination Notice, Tenant shall have no other right to terminate the Lease based on absence of any Required Co-Tenants.
7. Initial Improvements. Subject to compliance with Laws, Tenant, at Tenant's cost, may install such fixtures and finishes and other initial tenant improvements in the Premises as Tenant deems necessary or desirable for the conduct of Tenant's business in the Premises (the "Initial Improvements"). Tenant shall submit the plans and specifications (the "Plans") for the Initial Improvements to Landlord for Landlord's review and approval of the structural elements, such approval not to be unreasonably withheld or delayed. Landlord shall have a period of 14 days (the "Review Period") to review the Plans. Landlord shall not unreasonably withhold, condition or delay its approval of the Plans.¹⁸ If Landlord shall not respond to such request for its approval within such 14-day period, then Landlord shall be deemed to have approved the Plans as presented unless, on or before the last day of the Review Period, Landlord has delivered to Tenant a written description of the specific structural items in the Plans that are not acceptable and a description of the specific changes that must be made to the Plans to secure Landlord's approval. Tenant shall either (a) submit modified plans for approval; or (b) terminate this Lease if Landlord's requested revisions are not acceptable to Tenant in its sole discretion, in which event a Lease Termination shall have occurred and Landlord shall reimburse Tenant for its Costs. The review and approval process described above shall continue until such time as Landlord has approved the Plans in writing or until this Lease is terminated. Notwithstanding any other provision of this lease, in no event shall Tenant be liable for construction or utility charges or other chargebacks, including (without limitation) charges related to review of Tenant's Plans, architectural fees or similar items.
8. Subsequent Improvements. After the installation of the Initial Improvements, Tenant may make such interior non-structural alterations, improvements and additions to the Premises including, without limitation, changing color schemes, installing new countertops, flooring, wall-covering and modifying the layout of the tenant fixtures, as Tenant deems necessary or desirable without obtaining Landlord's consent. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Tenant shall not make any alterations, improvements, additions or repairs in, on, or about the Premises which affect the structure or the mechanical systems of the [Building/Shopping Center] without Landlord's prior written consent, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, conditioned or delayed.¹⁹ Landlord shall be deemed to have approved any subsequent improvement proposed by Tenant unless Landlord disapproves of Tenant's proposal in writing within 14 days of receiving Tenant's proposal and request for consent.

9. Signage.

- A. Permitted Signage. Tenant may install Signage in accordance with all Laws on: (a) all exterior walls abutting the Premises; and (b) all Project monument, pylon, or common signs, as indicated on the site plan attached to the Lease as Exhibit __. "Signage" includes all signs, designs, monuments, logos, banners, projected images, pennants, decals, advertisements, pictures, notices, lettering, numerals, graphics or decoration that Tenant determines to install or display, including Tenant's or its affiliates' standard national or regional signage requirements as in effect from time to time (the "Signage Program"). Landlord expressly approves Tenant's Signage shown on Exhibit __.²⁰ Provided that Tenant's Signage Program complies with Law and with Landlord's signage criteria for the Project ("Signage Criteria"), notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, neither (x) Tenant's Signage Program on Tenant's storefront, façade and exterior, nor (y) the graphic content, color or graphic design of any signs on Tenant's storefront that show Tenant's trade name or logo, will require Landlord's approval. Landlord shall obtain approval from the [Village of _____] for Tenant's Signage shown on Exhibit __ and all building elevations within 12 months after the Effective Date. Landlord's failure to do so shall give Tenant the right to terminate this Lease as provided under the Section of this Lease entitled "Permit Contingency". Tenant may from time to time, without Landlord's consent, replace any Signage. Landlord shall not vary or change the location, size or position of Tenant's signage, including but not limited to the position of Tenant's signage on any pylon or monument signs. [OPTIONAL DEPENDING ON LOI: To the extent Landlord's consent is required, Tenant shall submit plans and specifications for its exterior Signage to Landlord for approval, not to be unreasonably withheld or delayed, prior to submitting the plans and specifications to the local authorities for permitting. Landlord shall be deemed to have consented to such proposed exterior Signage unless Landlord notifies Tenant in writing of its specific objections within 14 days of receiving such proposal.] Landlord shall not allow any signage other than Tenant's to be erected on the exterior walls of the Premises or on the face of the Project or on the roof above the Premises.

¹⁹ Landlord will want sole consent over structural alterations.

²⁰ Recommend to Tenant to provide the drawings of its Signage while negotiating the Lease and have them approved prior to Lease execution.

- B. Pylon/Monument Signage. To the extent that any other tenant installs or has installed any signage on any pylon or monument sign structure, Tenant shall have the right to install equally prominent signage of equal size.
- C. Coming Soon. At any time after the parties sign the Lease, Tenant may install "Coming Soon" banners and signage in accordance with Law. If they conform to Tenant's Signage Program, then they do not require Landlord's approval.
- D. Directories. All Project directories and way-finding or directional signage within the Project shall identify Tenant and the Premises at least as prominently as any other tenant.
- E. Interior Signage. Tenant may, without Landlord's consent, affix window appliques and signs, interior signs and other interior treatments consistent with Tenant's and its affiliates' other stores, provided they are professionally made²¹ and comply with Law. In no event shall any other signage in the Project advertise any _____²² (other than Tenant's).
- F. OPTIONAL: IF TENANT IS REQUIRED TO COMPLY WITH LANDLORD'S SIGNAGE CRITERIA: If Landlord changes Landlord's Signage Criteria after Tenant executes this Lease (whether or not the changes are being required by a governing authority), then Landlord shall submit Landlord's new sign criteria ("New Sign Criteria") for Tenant's review and approval (in Tenant's sole and absolute discretion). Tenant shall approve or disapprove Landlord's New Sign Criteria or request modifications to Landlord's New Sign Criteria. Landlord shall reimburse Tenant for the actual cost for Tenant to remove the old signage and manufacture and install its new signage ("New Sign Costs") to correspond with Landlord's New Sign Criteria. If Tenant does not approve Landlord's New Sign Criteria or if Landlord and Tenant fail to agree on acceptable revisions to Landlord's New Sign Criteria, Tenant may terminate this Lease by giving written Notice to Landlord. If Tenant does not terminate the Lease and Landlord has not paid Tenant its New Sign Costs within thirty (30) days after Tenant installs its new signage, then in addition to any other remedies Tenant has, Tenant may offset the unpaid amount against Minimum Rent and all other charges (at Tenant's discretion) until the New Sign Costs are fully offset.

10. Repair and Maintenance. Landlord, at Landlord's sole cost and expense, [with no direct or indirect contribution from Tenant],²³ shall maintain, repair and make replacements to all elements of the Building²⁴ and the Center (including the Common Areas but excluding the Premises), in a clean, safe and first class manner and in compliance with all Laws, including, without limitation, to the structure, roof, roof membrane, foundation, interior and exterior of windows, mullions and electrical, mechanical systems (to points of connection within the Premises), egress stairs, sewer and water mains outside the Premises (to points of connection within the Premises), fire sprinklers, and fire alarm and exterior. Such repairs, replacements and maintenance shall include (without limitation) (a) the upkeep of all structural components of the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] and the Common Areas; (b) the maintenance and repair of all parking areas, sidewalks, landscaping and drainage systems on the Property and all utility systems (including mechanical, electrical, and HVAC systems) and plumbing systems which serve the [Building/Shopping Center] as a whole and not a particular tenant's premises; (c) removing all snow and ice from the Common Areas, including all parking areas, roads and sidewalks, and provide security service to the [Building/Shopping Center]; and (d) daily removal of trash and rubbish located in the Common Areas, as well as washing of containers at intervals to maintain them in a reasonably clean condition.. Landlord may allocate the cost of such maintenance and repairs equitably among all tenants, if and to the extent provided in this Lease. [Delete previous sentence if premises is in a single tenant building]. Tenant shall have no liability for structural or capital repairs as described above to the Premises or the Building except to the extent caused by Tenant's gross negligence or willful misconduct and not covered by insurance. Landlord shall not be required to maintain the interior surface of exterior walls, windows, doors or plate glass and store fronts within the Premises (except where maintenance of the same is caused by Landlord's negligence or failure to perform its obligations under this Section). Landlord shall make all repairs under this Section promptly after Landlord learns of the need for such repairs but in any event within 30 days after Tenant notifies Landlord of the need for such repairs. If Landlord fails to make such repairs within 30 days after Tenant's written notice to Landlord (except when the repairs require more than 30 days for performance and Landlord commences the repair within 30 days and diligently pursues the repair to completion), Tenant may, at its option, undertake such repairs and deduct the cost thereof from the installments of Minimum Rent next falling due. Notwithstanding the foregoing, in the event of an emergency, Tenant may give Landlord such shorter notice as is practicable under the circumstances, and if Landlord fails to make such repairs immediately after being notified by Tenant, Tenant may immediately undertake such repairs and deduct the cost thereof from the installments of Minimum Rent and all other charges next falling due. Notwithstanding any provision of this Lease to the contrary, any leaks or damage to any water or sanitary drain line located in the plenum of the Premises shall be deemed an emergency which Tenant shall have the right to repair without notifying Landlord, and Tenant shall be reimbursed by Landlord in accordance with the provisions of this Section. In addition, Landlord shall be responsible for the following: (i) any repair or improvement to the Premises necessitated by the negligence or willful misconduct of Landlord, its agents, employees or servants or caused by Landlord's failure to perform its obligations hereunder; or (ii) any seismic or structural upgrades, repairs, improvements or alterations to the Premises or the [Building/Shopping Center] (collectively, "Structural Repairs"); provided that Tenant, at its cost and expense, shall be responsible for the making of Structural Repairs relating to or resulting from alterations or additions made by Tenant.

11. Compliance with Laws.

- A. During the Term, except with respect to Landlord's Work, Tenant, at its expense, shall comply promptly with all Laws pertaining to (a) the physical condition of any improvements constructed by Tenant in the Premises; and/or (b) Tenant's specific business operations in the Premises; provided, however, that, Tenant shall not be required to make any Structural Repairs in order to comply with the Laws unless the necessity for the making of such compliance is attributable to (i) the specific manner in which Tenant uses and occupies the Premises;²⁵ (ii) the negligence or wrongful acts of Tenant, its employees, agents, contractors, customers or other occupants of the Premises, or (iii) if such required Structural Repairs relate to or are attributable to any installations or alterations made by Tenant. Unless same are the responsibility of Tenant pursuant to the preceding sentence, Landlord, at its sole cost and expense, shall comply with all other Laws affecting the Premises, areas adjacent to the Premises, the Common Areas, the [Building/Shopping Center] and/or the Property including, without limitation, all ADA requirements. The foregoing or anything else in this Lease to the contrary notwithstanding, Tenant may, at its sole cost and expense, contest the validity or applicability of any present or future Laws. So long as Tenant diligently pursues the contest, compliance with such Laws may be deferred, during the pendency of such contest, provided that (i) Landlord shall not be subject to any criminal proceeding, or any fine, penalty, loss or damage (unless Tenant agrees to indemnify and defend Landlord from and against any such fine, penalty, loss or damage) and (ii) the certificate of occupancy for the [Building/Shopping Center] shall not be suspended or threatened to be suspended, by reason of non-compliance or by reason of such contest. Landlord will, at the request of Tenant, cooperate in such contest, provided that Landlord is not required to incur any expense in connection with any such contest.
- B. If the existence of any violation of any Legal Requirement affecting the Premises, the Building, or the Property for which Landlord is responsible pursuant to this Lease prevents or delays Tenant in obtaining a building permit or any required certificates, approval or sign-offs from any governmental authorities that are required to be obtained by Tenant pursuant to applicable Laws, in connection with the Initial Improvements and any other alterations, installations or improvements, Tenant shall be entitled to an additional abatement of all Rent on a per diem basis, equal to the number of days of such delay.

²⁵ If the lease is for a stand-alone building, Tenant may be responsible for additional legal compliance and may not make the "use" vs. "manner of use" argument. If that is the case, attempt to limit any repair or replacement costs in the last 2 years of the term to no more than $20,000.

12. Minimize Interference. Landlord shall minimize interference with: (i) access to or visibility of the Premises from the Common Areas, (ii) Tenant's conducting of its business in the Premises, and (iii) visibility of Tenant's signage or storefront. If Landlord's activities in the Common Areas interfere with Tenant's business or access to the Premises to the extent Tenant reasonably determines that it cannot feasibly operate its business in the Premises for three consecutive days,²⁶ then Tenant's sole and exclusive remedy shall be an abatement of all monthly Rent during the period commencing on the expiration of such three day period and ending on the date Tenant reasonably determines it can feasibly resume conducting its business in the Premises. If such interference continues for 3 months, Tenant shall have the right to elect that a Lease Termination has occurred by written notice at any time thereafter and Landlord shall reimburse Tenants for the Unamortized Costs. If Tenant is prevented or materially and adversely restricted from using Common Areas, Tenant shall notify Landlord. Landlord will promptly begin (to the extent reasonably practicable) and diligently continue to endeavor to restore Tenant's ability to use the Common Areas.
13. Protected Areas. Exhibit __ identifies certain "Protected Areas" outside the Premises. Any change to or reconfiguration of a Protected Area shall require Tenant's prior written consent, which may be withheld in Tenant's sole²⁷ discretion. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, at all times in the Term, Landlord shall not cause or permit: (i) any change to any Protected Area that impairs access to or visibility of the Premises or Tenant's Signage, or ability of Tenant's customers to queue or congregate while waiting for film showings; (ii) place anything in any Protected Area that would in any way diminish or interfere with access to the Premises, unless caused 26 Most Landlords will require that Tenant actually stop working in the Premises in order to get the rent abatement, but Tenant should push back to get some rent abatement if its signage or visibility is blocked or if 50% of more of the Premises is unusable.

27 Landlords will want Tenant to be reasonable here. But the whole point of a "Protected Area" is that it is to be protected and not changed, unless a change is required by law.

by casualty, condemnation or Laws; (iii) construct or place, or allow others to construct or place, any kiosk, pushcart or retail merchandise cart (RMU), planting, seating, sculpture, artwork, easel, directory, escalator or other amenity or object of any kind, whether temporary or permanent, in the Protected Area; (iv) place any signage or advertising in the Protected Area, except Tenant's; or (v) sell or distribute, or permit sale or distribution, of any _____²⁸ within ___ feet from the main entrance of the Premises. If Landlord violates this paragraph in any manner and does not remedy that violation within three days after notice from Tenant (except that no such notice shall apply if Tenant previously gave such a notice for substantially the same violation in the preceding 90 days), then so long as Landlord has not cured its violation: (a) Tenant shall be entitled to remove any violating items at Landlord's sole cost and expense; or (b) Tenant shall be entitled an abatement of all Rent until the violation is cured.

14. Operating Hours/Access. Tenant shall have access to the Premises, and related Common Areas, through all retail entrance(s) and the right to operate its business 24 hours a day, seven days a week, at no additional cost, to the extent Law allows. Tenant may operate beyond Project standard hours at no additional cost to Tenant . Landlord shall keep the Common Areas or portions thereof, as reasonably necessary, open, lighted, heated and/or cooled for as long after such standard hours as Tenant requests at no additional cost to Tenant.²⁹ Subject to Permitted Closures (as hereinafter defined), Tenant shall continuously use, occupy the whole of the Premises for the Permitted Use for a minimum of ___ hours per week in the aggregate; provided that at provided, that at least ninety percent (90%) of the retail tenants in the [Building/Shopping Center] are open and operating during Tenant's normal operating hours. For purposes hereof, Tenant shall have the right to close the Premises (each, a "Permitted Closure") as follows: (i) for not more than five (5) days on two (2) occasions a year for purposes of taking inventory; (ii) for purposes of performing repairs, cleaning or decorating of the Premises; (iii) for purposes of remodeling or refurbishment, not more frequently than one (1) occasion

28 Tenant will want to prevent the sale of any items that are Tenant's primary business within a certain number of feet from the entrance of the Premises.

29 Anchor tenants should not be obligated to comply with an operating covenant, or a "required hours of operation" clause or an obligation to continuously operate. In fact, many anchor tenants will agree that it only has to open for one day at the commencement of the lease term. However, if the tenant agrees to an operating covenant, it should be conditioned on 90% of the remaining gross leasable area being open for business and should allow tenant the right to certain permitted closures.

during any Lease Year, with each closure, not to exceed ninety days and only after not less than ten (10) days' prior written notice to Landlord; (iv) following a casualty which results in damage to or destruction of the Premises; (v) after an event of condemnation; (vi) because of Force Majeure; (vii) as a result of any acts or omissions of Landlord, its employees, agents or contractors; (viii) as a result of any environmental condition, or (ix) any other permitted cessation due to any other express provision of this Lease.]³⁰

15. Parking: Landlord shall provide, at no additional cost to Tenant,³¹ areas as designated on Exhibit __ (“Tenant Parking Area”) where Tenant and its concessionaires, officers, employees,³² contractors, agents, customers and invitees may park their vehicles. The Tenant Parking Area shall comply with applicable Law [and Landlord shall apply for and obtain all variances in connection therewith]. Landlord shall not vary or permit to be varied the existing means of ingress and egress to the [Building/Shopping Center] and the Property. [Landlord shall not modify, change or move Tenant Parking Area.] [No modifications made to Tenant Parking Area shall reduce the number of parking spaces below the number of parking spaces Law requires or realign the parking spaces in the Tenant Parking Area in a manner that makes them substantially less accessible to the Premises. If Landlord eliminates more than __% of the Tenant Parking Area, Landlord shall add a number of parking spaces equal to the amount of eliminated parking spaces in an area comparable to the Tenant Parking Area to serve as a reasonable replacement.]³³

16. Roof Equipment and Generator. Tenant may, at no additional cost to Tenant, plan, design, construct, install, repair, replace, upgrade, supervise and maintain upon the roof and/or exterior of the Building or elsewhere at the Project (and connect to the Premises): (a) any air-conditioning and electrical equipment, alarm bells and equipment, antennas, satellite dishes, other communications devices and similar facilities (including connections, cables, wiring and conduits, 30 Note that some Landlords will try to have a separate default and maybe even a penalty for Tenant's failure to continuously operate. The answer is that Landlord has its remedies for a non-monetary default and there does not need to be a separate one inserted here.

31 If a parking fee exists, require Tenant to receive the lowest rate offered to any other tenant's patrons. Define the current fee and try to limit increases.

32 Some leases will provide for off-site parking for tenant employees. This depends on the shopping center.

33 Use if Landlord insists on right to change/eliminate parking spaces.

“Tenant’s Equipment”), in areas shown on Exhibit __; and (b) Tenant’s own dedicated emergency generator (“Tenant’s Generator”) (including so-called “automatic transfer switch (ATS) or multiple ATS’s” and all other associated emergency power elements), and fuel tank (“Tenant’s Fuel Tank”) in areas shown on Exhibit __. Tenant shall have all necessary keys and access codes so that Tenant may access Tenant’s Equipment, Tenant’s Generator and Tenant’s Fuel Tank (the “Off-Premises Installations”) at all times without needing to notify, obtain access through or be accompanied by Landlord or Landlord’s agents or employees. Off-Premises Installations shall: (i) comply with applicable Laws; (ii) comply with insurance requirements under the Lease; and (iii) once installed, unless removed by Tenant, be maintained by Tenant at Tenant’s cost and expense. If Tenant removes any Off-Premises Installation, then notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, Tenant shall repair any resulting damage to the Building.

17. Utilities. Landlord shall provide, at Landlord’s expense, connection points within the Premises to all utilities and separate meters for utilities serving the Premises, if not already installed.³⁴ Landlord shall pay all utility connection fees (including without limitation all water and sewer connection fees), traffic impact fees and any other extraordinary fees that are associated with the construction of Tenant’s Initial Improvements or use of the Premises or Landlord’s Work as set forth in Exhibit __. Tenant shall pay for: (a) connection of utilities to connection points provided by Landlord; and (b) Tenant’s usage of utilities, directly to each Utility Company,³⁵ with no administrative fee, premium, add-on, meter reading fee, or surcharge of any kind to Landlord. Tenant shall have the right to sufficient utilities and ventilation to support its intended use of the Premises. Without limiting the foregoing, Landlord either (a) represents and warrants that the [Building/Shopping Center] has sufficient electrical capacity to allow Tenant to draw ___ amps of service to the Premises without adverse impact on other occupants or the need for an upgrade in utility service; or (b) covenants to upgrade the electrical capacity of the 34 The Lease requirements on Landlord’s Work should also address utilities. Their installation should be a condition to occurrence of the Commencement Date.

35 If utilities are submetered, Tenant may require Landlord to change to direct metering, if possible. If not, any access by Landlord to read the submeter should be subject to the other “Access” provisions in the Rider, and Landlord may not charge Tenant a rate for any utility in excess of the lesser of the rate Landlord pays the supplier of the service or the rate at which Tenant could purchase the services directly through an available supplier, nor may Landlord charge Tenant any administrative fee or charge for reading the meters.

Building prior to the Commencement Date, at Landlord's sole cost and expense, to allow Tenant to draw ___ amps of service to the Premises without adverse impact on other occupants.

18. Cleaning. Tenant may, at Tenant's cost, arrange and pay for janitorial service to clean the Premises, using a janitorial service contractor of Tenant's choice.
19. Trash Removal. [IF TENANT IS TO PROVIDE THEIR OWN CONTAINERS, USE THE FOLLOWING:] Tenant shall arrange for its trash and recycling services and shall pay any costs directly to the company providing such service. Landlord shall provide Tenant with a lawful location on the Property (as shown on Exhibit___) to store a trash container and a recycling container adequate for Tenant's needs. Such storage location shall be (a) exclusively for Tenant's use, (b) at least _____ feet long and _____ feet wide, (c) enclosed if required by code or by the terms of Exhibit __³⁶ and (d) convenient to the Premises.

[IF THE LANDLORD WILL BE PROVIDING CONTAINERS, USE THE FOLLOWING:] Landlord shall arrange with a waste management company to provide adequate trash and recycling services to the tenants of the [Building/Shopping Center]. If Tenant is required to share trash removal or recycling containers with other tenants, such shared containers shall be adequately sized and serviced to handle Tenant's trash and recycling requirements. Landlord shall pay the costs of such trash removal and recycling services (including usage of such containers) directly to the company providing such service.³⁷

20. Assignment and Subletting.

- A. Assignment and Subletting. Tenant shall not assign this Lease sublet the whole or any portion of the Premises, or permit any third party to use, or occupy any portion thereof without the written consent of Landlord, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, conditioned, or delayed. If Landlord's consent is required for an assignment or sublease, then Landlord's consent shall be deemed to have been given unless Landlord notifies Tenant in writing of the reasons for Landlord's disapproval within fourteen (14) days of receipt of the request. For the purpose of this Lease, any sale or transfer of Tenant's capital stock, redemption or issuance of additional stock of any class shall not be deemed an assignment, subletting or any other transfer of this Lease or the Premises.³⁸ Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in the Lease, Landlord shall not have any right to recapture the premises.

36 This refers to the Landlords Work exhibit. Tenant may require that Landlord enclose the storage location.

37 If Tenant is required to pay its pro rata share of trash removal, then it should be at a commercially competitive rate and no administrative charges added on.

- B. Permitted Transfers. Tenant may, without Landlord's consent and without sharing profits with Landlord, assign the Lease or sublease all or part of the Premises (a "Permitted Transfer") to [if there is any restriction on tradename elsewhere in this Lease, add here: "without restriction as to tradename"]: (i) an entity directly or indirectly controlled by or under common control with Tenant (a "Tenant Affiliate") (the term "control" means (a) ownership of 50% or more of all voting stock of a corporation or 50% or more of all legal and equitable interest in any other business entity; or (b) the ability to direct the major business decisions of such entity without prior approval of Tenant's shareholders, partners or other equity holders); (ii)) a successor entity related to Tenant by merger, consolidation, reorganization or government action; or (iii) a transferee having operating experience and reputation at least similar to Tenant's in _____, [with a net worth equal to or greater than Tenant's at the time of the transfer (an "Equivalent Operator"). Transferees under clause (i), (ii) or (iii) are "Permitted Transferees." If Tenant assigns the Lease to a Permitted Transferee that, with its guarantor, has a net worth of at least [$10,000,000], Landlord shall release the former Tenant [and Guarantor] from all obligations and liability under the Lease.
- C. Assignment or Sublease Profit. [Landlord shall not be entitled to any consideration in connection with any assignment or sublet.]³⁹ OR [If Tenant assigns, sublets or transfers (a "Transfer") the Lease and that Transfer is not a Permitted Transfer, then Tenant shall pay Landlord, as Additional Rent, 50% of any Assignment Profit or Sublease Profit:

38 In no event should Tenant agree to any increase in rent or security upon transfer.

39 Most anchor or major tenants will not agree to split profits. In any event, there should be no profit splitting in connection with a Permitted Transfer nor if the lease is a ground lease.

1. Sublease Profit. “Sublease Profit” means in any year of the term of the Lease (“Lease Year”): (a) any rents, additional charges or other consideration payable under the sublease to Tenant by the subtenant that exceeds all Minimum Rent, Percentage Rent and Additional Rent, accruing in that Lease Year for the subleased space (at the rate per square foot payable by Tenant under the Lease) under the Lease; and (b) all sums paid for the sale or rental of Tenant’s fixtures, leasehold improvements, equipment, furniture or other personal property, less, in the case of a sale, the then net unamortized or undepreciated portion (based on Tenant’s federal income tax returns)⁴⁰ of the amount, if any, by which the original cost thereof exceeded any amounts paid for or contributed by Landlord that the Lease required Tenant to apply against that cost), which net unamortized amount shall be deducted from the sums paid in connection with such sale in equal monthly installments over the balance of the term of the sublease (each such monthly deduction to equal the quotient of the net unamortized amount, divided by the number of months remaining in the term of the Lease); after deducting Tenant’s Costs.

2. Assignment Profit. “Assignment Profit” means an amount equal to all sums and other consideration paid to Tenant by the assignee for or by reason of the assignment (including sums paid for sale or rental of Tenant’s fixtures, leasehold improvements, equipment, furniture, furnishings or other personal property, less, in the case of a sale, the then net unamortized or undepreciated portion (based on Tenant’s federal income tax returns) of the amount, if any, by which original cost exceeded any amounts paid for or contributed by Landlord that the Lease required Tenant to apply against that cost), after deducting Tenant’s Costs.

40 Consider whether to use some other measure as opposed to Tenant’s tax returns. If Tenant uses accelerated depreciation, unamortized cost may be quite low. The same issue arises in Assignment Profit.

3. Tenant's Costs. Tenant's Costs shall be deducted from the first available amounts paid to Landlord under this Section, until fully recovered, before Tenant shall be deemed to have recovered any Assignment Profit or Sublease Profit. "Tenant's Costs" means reasonable expenses Tenant actually incurred for the assignment or subletting in question for transfer taxes, brokerage commissions, advertising and marketing expenses, attorneys' fees, any commercially reasonable rent credit or concession or work allowance and any alterations Tenant performs, based on bills, receipts or other evidence of such costs reasonably satisfactory to Landlord.]

- D. Other Transactions. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, Tenant may, at any time, grant licenses or subleases of departments or concessions for sale of merchandise and services, without Landlord's consent or profit participation.

21. Leasehold Mortgages.

- A. Notwithstanding anything in the Lease to the contrary, Tenant may, without Landlord's consent, mortgage Tenant's interest in the Lease, Tenant's interest in the Building and improvements on the Premises, or any part thereof or property therein, and any sublease, under one or more leasehold mortgage(s) and to assign the Lease and any sublease as collateral security for such mortgages, upon the condition that all rights acquired under such mortgages shall be subject to each and all of the covenants, conditions and restrictions in the Lease, and to all rights and interests of Landlord, none of which covenants, conditions or restrictions is or shall be waived by Landlord by reason of the right given to so mortgage such interest in the Lease, except as this Rider expressly states.
- B. If Tenant mortgages its leasehold, and if the holder(s) of any such mortgage(s) give Landlord a true copy thereof, with written notice specifying the name and address of the mortgagee(s) and (if available at the time) the pertinent recording data for such mortgage(s), Landlord agrees that so long as any such leasehold mortgage(s) shall remain unsatisfied, these provisions shall apply:
 1. There shall be no cancellation, surrender or modification of the Lease by joint action of Landlord and Tenant without prior written consent of all leasehold mortgagee(s).

2. Landlord shall, upon serving Tenant with any notice of default, simultaneously serve a copy of that notice upon the leasehold mortgagee(s). The leasehold mortgagee(s) shall thereupon have the same period, after service of such notice upon it, as is allowed to Tenant, plus 30 days (plus such further or additional time as the leasehold mortgagee(s) reasonably require for a nonmonetary default), to remedy or cause to be remedied the defaults complained of, and Landlord shall accept such performance by or at the instigation of the leasehold mortgagee(s) in response to any such notice of default as if the same had been performed by Tenant.
3. Notwithstanding anything in the Lease to the contrary, while such leasehold mortgage(s) remains unsatisfied, or until written notice of satisfaction is given by the holder(s) thereof to Landlord or such leasehold mortgage is terminated of record, if any default shall occur, that, pursuant to any provision of the Lease, entitles Landlord to terminate the Lease, and if before the expiration of 30 days from the date of service of notice of termination upon such leasehold mortgagee(s), such leasehold mortgagee(s) notify Landlord of its desire to nullify such notice and pay Landlord all Rent and other payments herein provided for and then in default, and comply or commence the work of complying with all other requirements of the Lease, if any are then in default, and prosecute the same to completion with reasonable diligence, then in such event Landlord shall not be entitled to terminate the Lease as a result of such default and any notice of termination theretofore given as a result of such default shall be void and of no effect.
4. Landlord agrees that the name of the leasehold mortgagee(s) may be added to the "Loss Payable Endorsement" of any and all insurance policies the Lease requires Tenant to carry, on condition that the insurance proceeds are applied as the Lease specifies, and the leasehold mortgage(s) or collateral documents shall so provide.

5. Landlord agrees that in the event of termination of the Lease by reason of any default by Tenant or any other cause, or if Tenant rejects the Lease in bankruptcy or similar proceedings, Landlord shall enter into a new Lease of the Premises with the leasehold mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) for the remainder of the term of the Lease effective as of the date of such termination, at the Rent and upon the same terms, provisions, covenants and agreements as contained in the Lease and subject only to the same conditions of title as the Lease is subject to on the date of its execution and any exceptions to title created by or at the behest or with the consent of Tenant, and to the rights, if any, of the parties then in possession of any part of the Premises, provided:
 - a. said leasehold mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) makes written request upon Landlord for such new lease within 30 days after the date of such termination and such written request is accompanied by payment to Landlord of all sums due to Landlord under the Lease;
 - b. said leasehold mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) pays to Landlord at the time of the execution and delivery of such new lease, any and all sums that would at the time of the execution and delivery thereof be due pursuant to the Lease but for such termination, and in addition thereto, any expenses, including reasonable attorneys' fees, Landlord incurred by reason of that default;
 - c. said mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) shall perform and observe all covenants herein contained on Tenant's part to be performed and shall further remedy any other condition which Tenant under the terminated Lease was obligated to perform under the terms of the Lease; and upon execution and delivery of such new lease, any subleases which may have theretofore been assigned and transferred by Tenant to Landlord, as security under the Lease, shall thereupon be deemed to be held by Landlord as security for the performance of all of the obligations of the tenant under the new lease;

- d. Landlord shall not warrant possession of the Premises to the tenant under the new lease;
 - e. such new lease shall be expressly made subject to the rights, if any, of Tenant under the terminated lease;
 - f. the tenant under such new lease shall have the right, title and interest in and to the buildings and improvements on the Premises as Tenant had under the terminated lease; and
 - g. said leasehold mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) shall bear the cost of recording such new lease or short form thereof if it or Landlord desires recordation thereof.
6. Nothing in the Lease requires any leasehold mortgagee(s) or its nominee(s) or assignee(s) to cure any default of Tenant under the Lease unless such leasehold mortgagee chooses to do so under subparagraph (2) above or chooses to nullify any notice of termination from Landlord under subparagraph (3), or if such leasehold mortgagee(s) elects that Landlord enter into a new lease for the Premises under subparagraph (5) above.
 7. The proceeds from any insurance policies relating to the Premises or arising from a condemnation of the Premises are to be held by any leasehold mortgagee(s) and distributed in accordance with the Lease.
 8. Landlord shall, on request, execute, acknowledge and deliver to each leasehold mortgagee, an agreement prepared at the sole cost and expense of Tenant, in form reasonably satisfactory to such leasehold mortgagee(s) and Landlord, among Landlord, Tenant and leasehold mortgagee(s), confirming all provisions of the Lease on leasehold mortgagees. The term “mortgage,” when used in this Section, includes whatever security instruments are used in the locale of the Premises, such as, without limitation, mortgages, deeds of trust, security deeds and conditional deeds, as well as financing statements, security agreements and other Uniform Commercial Code documents, and also any documents for a sale and leaseback (or an assignment of lease and sublease) transaction.

22. Subordination and Nondisturbance. It shall be a condition to subordination of the Lease to any mortgage or lease affecting the [Building/Shopping Center] that Landlord obtain on behalf of Tenant (subject to the qualifications in this Section) from any mortgagee or lessor, a subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreement (an “SNDA”); provided that, in the case of any SNDA, it is reasonably acceptable to Tenant and states that Tenant’s use or possession of the Premises shall not be disturbed, nor shall its obligations be enlarged or its rights be abridged hereunder by reason of any mortgage or lease affecting the [Building/Shopping Center]. Landlord shall pay the fees associated with obtaining an SNDA for Tenant, except that Tenant shall pay to Landlord all reasonable costs of the mortgagee’s or lessor’s counsel to negotiate the SNDA if Tenant desires changes from such party’s standard form. Those fees, to the extent not paid directly by Tenant to the mortgagee or lessor before issuance of the SNDA, shall be paid by Tenant to Landlord, as Additional Rent under the Lease, within 30 days after Tenant’s receipt of an invoice therefor, in which case Landlord shall, at its election, either prepay (subject to reimbursement by Tenant if not previously paid to Landlord by Tenant) or forward the amount so paid to the party to whom it is due and owing (with Landlord’s contribution thereto, as provided herein if not previously paid by Landlord). The Lease shall be conditioned upon receipt of an SNDA from Landlord’s existing mortgagee and ground lessor, if any.⁴¹
23. Furniture, Fixtures & Equipment (FF&E) Liens. If at any time or from time to time Tenant desires to enter into or grant any security interest, financing lease, personal property lien, conditional sales agreement, chattel mortgage, security agreement, title retention arrangement or similar arrangement (including any related financing statement) for Tenant's acquisition or leasing of any FF&E (hereinafter defined) used in the Premises that is leased, purchased under conditional sale or installment sale arrangements, encumbered by a security interest, or used under a license (a "FF&E Lien") that otherwise complies with this Lease, then on Tenant's request Landlord shall enter into a Lien Subordination Agreement in a form reasonably acceptable to Landlord and the holder of any FF&E Lien for that FF&E that is subject to an FF&E Lien (such FF&E, "Financed FF&E"). If Tenant enters into any FF&E Lien, then Tenant shall: (i) not file (or cause or permit to be filed) that FF&E Lien as a lien against the Premises or any part of the Premises (except the Financed FF&E). "FF&E" means all movable furniture, furnishings, equipment, and Tenant's personal property that may be removed without material damage to the Premises and includes items such as factory equipment, furniture, movable equipment, movable telephone and telecommunications equipment, point of sale equipment, televisions, radios, network racks, and computer systems and peripherals.

24. Environmental Liability.

- A. Environmental Law. The term "Environmental Law" means all present and future federal, state and local laws, statutes, rules, ordinances and regulations relating to pollution or protecting human health or the environment including, without limitation, laws, statutes, rules, ordinances and regulations relating to emissions, discharges, releases of hazardous substances, or otherwise relating to the manufacture, processing, distribution, use, treatment, storage, disposal, transport or handling of Hazardous Substances including, without limitation, the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act of 1980, 42 U.S.C. §§ 9601 et seq. (CERCLA or "Superfund"); the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act of 1976, 42 U.S.C. §§ 6901 et seq. (RCRA); the Toxic Substances Control Act, 15 U.S.C. §§ 2601 et seq. (TSCA); the Clean Water Act, 33 U.S.C. § 1251 et seq. (CWA); the Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. § 7401 et seq. (CAA); the Hazardous Materials Transportation Act, 49 U.S.C. § 5101 et seq. (HMTA); the Safe Drinking Water Act, 42 U.S.C. § 300f et seq. (SDWA); the National Environmental Policy Act of 1969, 42 U.S.C. § 4321 et seq. (NEPA); the Superfund Amendments and Reauthorization Act of 1986, codified in scattered Sections of 10 U.S.C., 29 U.S.C., 33 U.S.C. and 42 U.S.C.; and Title III of the Superfund Amendment and Reauthorization Act, 42 U.S.C. § 11001 et seq. (SARA), as the same may be hereafter amended or modified.

- B. Hazardous Materials. The term “Hazardous Material” means any substance which is (a) included within the definition of “hazardous substances”, “hazardous materials”, “toxic substances”, or “solid waste” in or pursuant to any Environmental Law or subject to regulation under any Environmental Law; (b) listed in the United States Department of Transportation Optional Hazardous Materials Table, 49 C.F.R. Section 172.101 enacted as of the date hereof or hereafter amended, or the United States Environmental Protection Agency List of Hazardous Substances and Reportable Quantities, 40 C.F.R. Part 302 et seq. enacted as of the date hereof or as hereinafter amended; or (c) a flammable substance, explosive, radioactive, asbestos, asbestos-containing material, polychlorinated biphenyl, chemical known to cause cancer or reproductive toxicity, pollutant, contaminant, hazardous waste, medical waste, toxic substance or related material, explosive, oil or petroleum product.
- C. Landlord’s Environmental Covenants. Landlord represents and covenants to Tenant that: (a) the Premises and the [Building/Shopping Center] comply with Environmental Law; (b) to Landlord’s actual knowledge, the Premises and the Project contain no Hazardous Materials no Hazardous Materials have been released, discharged or disposed of on, under or about the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property (or off-site of the Property which might affect the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property) by any entity or person, or from any source whatsoever; (c) Landlord’s Work: (i) does not and shall not contain Hazardous Materials; and (ii) shall comply with Environmental Law; (d) there are no underground storage tanks on the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property; and (e) no underground storage tanks have been removed from the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property. Without limiting the foregoing, Landlord represents that the following constitutes all information in Landlord’s possession or control concerning any release of Hazardous Substances on, under or about the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property (or off-site of the Premises that might affect the Premises, or off-site of the Property that might affect the Premises or the [Building/ Shopping Center]) including, without limitation, sampling data, environmental studies or reports, environmental site assessments, building surveys, and historical use reviews (collectively, “Environmental Reports.”), all of which have been provided to Tenant: [PLEASE PROVIDE ENVIRONMENTAL REPORTS FOR THE PROPERTY AS SOON AS POSSIBLE]

- D. Removal. Landlord, at Landlord’s sole cost and expense, shall remove, abate, encapsulate or remediate any Hazardous Materials or threatened Release or disposal of a Hazardous Material existing on the Premises or the Project as of the Commencement Date. If any Hazardous Materials are discovered in the Premises during Tenant’s inspection of the Premises, construction of its Initial Improvements or any subsequent tenant improvements or at any other time during the Term, then Landlord shall promptly remove or encapsulate the same, at Landlord’s sole cost and expense, and if the foregoing delays the construction or installation of Tenant’s Initial Improvements then the Rent Commencement Date shall be extended for one (1) day for each day of delay. Landlord indemnifies and saves Tenant harmless from all claims, liens, losses, damages and expenses, including without limitation reasonable attorneys’ fees and expenses, arising out of: (x) Landlord’s breach of this paragraph; or (y) any Hazardous Materials existing now or discovered later in or on the Premises or the Project, unless Tenant brought them to the Premises or the Project. If it is determined that there are Hazardous Materials on, upon or within the Premises and/or the Project that violate any Environmental Laws or result in action by either local, state or federal environmental agencies, then, Landlord, at Landlord’s expense, shall promptly and diligently, to the extent required by any Laws, including (without limitation) any Environmental Laws, and in compliance with such Laws, remove, abate, encapsulate or remediate such Hazardous Materials. Landlord shall use its best efforts to minimize direct and indirect impact on Tenant, including its operations in the Premises and effective use of the Common Areas, if any, during all activities related to remediation. If in Tenant’s reasonable opinion such violation and/or action materially impairs Tenant’s ability to conduct business upon the Premises and Tenant ceases to operate from the Premises as a direct result, all Rent and charges payable by Tenant under the Lease shall abate during such period as long as Tenant’s ability to so operate is materially impaired and Tenant is not so operating. If such condition continues for in excess of 6 months, Tenant shall have the right to elect that a Lease Termination shall occur by notice at any time when that condition continues to materially impair Tenant's ability to conduct business upon the Premises and Tenant in fact ceases operations from the Premises as a direct result.

E. Tenant's Use Of Any Hazardous Substance. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Tenant may use cleaning solutions and other substances that are customarily used in Tenant's business. Tenant will manage such use in accordance with the Environmental Laws.

F. Notices. Landlord and Tenant shall give prompt written Notice to the other of: (a) any proceeding or inquiry by any governmental authority with respect to the presence of any Hazardous Material on the Premises or the [Building/Shopping Center] (or off-site of the Premises that might affect the Premises) or related to any loss or injury that might result from any Hazardous Material; (b) all claims made or threatened by any third party against Landlord or the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property relating to any loss or injury resulting from any Hazardous Material; and (c) the discovery of any occurrence or condition on the Premises, the [Building/Shopping Center] or the Property (or off-site of the Premises that might affect the Premises) that could cause the Premises or the Common Areas, if any, or any part of either, to be subject to any restriction on occupancy or use of the Premises under any Environmental Law.

G. Survival. The provisions under this Section shall survive the expiration or earlier termination of the Lease.

25. End of Term. On expiration or earlier termination of the Lease, Tenant shall: (a) have the right, but not the obligation, to remove any of its alterations, improvements, fixtures, floor coverings, personal property or equipment installed during the term of the Lease; (b) have no obligation to repair any damage caused by that removal; and (c) have no obligation to restore or repair the Premises or the Building in any way.

26. Holding Over. This Lease and the tenancy created by this Lease shall expire and terminate at the expiration of the Term, without the necessity of any additional notice from Landlord to Tenant or from Tenant to Landlord. If Tenant remains in possession of the Premises after the expiration of the Term without the written consent of Landlord, the Term will not be extended and Tenant will be occupying the Premises under a tenancy at will, under all the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease, except that Rent for the holdover period will be calculated on a per diem basis, at a rate equal to (x) for the first two months of holdover, one hundred twenty-five percent (125%),⁴² and (y) thereafter, one hundred fifty percent (150%); and (z) thereafter, two hundred percent (200%), of the Minimum Rent due for the last month of the Term, and shall be due and payable to Landlord on the first (1st) of each month, as during the Term. All other charges shall be at the rate payable during the last month of the Term. This holdover arrangement shall continue until such tenancy is terminated by Landlord or Tenant giving the other at least thirty (30) days' prior written notice of its intention to do so. This provision shall not be interpreted to give Tenant any right to continue occupancy following the expiration or earlier termination of this Lease, except with the prior written consent of Landlord.

27. Permit Contingency. Tenant's obligations under this Lease are conditioned on Tenant's obtaining,⁴³ within the later of _____ (____) days of the mutual execution and delivery of this Lease [or one hundred twenty (120) days after the date Landlord delivers to Tenant final plans for the [Building/Shopping Center] in an industry standard electronic or digital format that have been approved by all applicable governmental entities],⁴⁴ any permits and/or licenses (including but not limited to conditional use permits, building permits, variances and other governmental approvals) (collectively, "Government Approvals") that are required by applicable laws to enable Tenant legally (a) to construct Tenant's improvements to the Premises in accordance with the Plans; (b) to install Tenant's signage on the Premises; and (c) to conduct its business from the Premises. Each Government Approval shall not be subject to any ban, bar, memorandum or unexpired appeal period. Tenant shall, at Tenant's expense, initiate and diligently pursue each Government Approval. Landlord shall execute any applications and shall provide Tenant with 42 Holdover rates should be negotiated down as much as possible. Also try not to agree to indemnify Landlord for any consequential damages for at least the first month of holdover.

43 The Lease may also be conditioned on Landlord obtaining certain permits to construct the Shopping Center if it is a new development. Landlord should use best efforts to obtain those permits.

44 Depends on whether Project is a new development or not.

such further assistance and cooperation as Tenant may require in connection with applications for such Government Approvals. If Tenant does not obtain such Government Approvals on terms satisfactory to Tenant within such period or if any Government Approvals are not renewed or are revoked during the Term of this Lease due to Landlord's conduct, Tenant shall have the right to terminate this Lease.⁴⁵ If Tenant gives a timely termination Notice, then a Lease Termination shall occur and Landlord shall reimburse Tenant for all its Costs within 30 days thereafter. If the Lease Termination is based on Landlord conduct, Tenant shall be entitled to pursue such other rights and remedies as may be available at law or in equity.

28. Measurement of Building.⁴⁶ At any time during the first 6 months of the Term, Tenant may engage an independent certified architect or surveyor to measure the GLA of the Premises. If the architect's or surveyor's measurement of the GLA of the Premises is more than the GLA of the Premises set forth in Section __ above, Minimum Rent and Tenant's Proportionate Share (as defined below) shall be proportionally reduced; provided, however, that in no event shall the Minimum Rent and Tenant's Proportionate Share increase by more than three percent. For purposes of this Lease, "GLA" means the number of gross square feet of leasable floor area (regardless of whether such area is occupied or enclosed) intended primarily for the exclusive use by an occupant for any length of time, including without limitation garden centers used for the sale and display of merchandise and storage space within or immediately adjacent to an occupant's premises, but excluding any [Building/Shopping Center] management office, Common Area maintenance storage areas, and Common Area community room. The GLA of any premises (including the Premises) shall be measured from the exterior face of exterior walls and the exterior face of service corridor walls, the line along the front of the such premises where it abuts the sidewalk or other Common Area (which line is commonly known as the "lease line"), and the center line of any wall that such premises shares with other leasable areas of the [Building/Shopping Center.]

45 Sometimes, Landlord will want the right to pursue the permits on Tenant's behalf after Tenant has tried and failed. This is acceptable as long as the period of time is limited to no more than 60 days after Tenant's notice of termination. Then, if Landlord cannot obtain the permits within such time, a Lease Termination shall occur.

46 If Tenant is paying rent on a $/Sq.Ft. basis or its pro rata share of any expenses or taxes, Tenant will want the right to remeasure the Building and confirm the calculations. If so, insert this section.

29. Landlord Defaults And Remedies. The occurrence of any one or more of the following events shall constitute a default and breach of this Lease by Landlord: (a) Landlord's failure to do, observe, keep and perform any of the terms, covenants, conditions, agreements or provisions of this Lease required to be done, observed, kept or performed by Landlord, within 30 days after written notice by Tenant to Landlord of said failure (except when the nature of Landlord's obligation is such that more than 30 days are required for its performance, then Landlord shall not be deemed in default if it commences performance within the 30 day period and thereafter diligently pursues the cure to completion) or with no notice (other than oral) in the event of an emergency; or (b) the failure of any representation or warranty to be true when deemed given hereunder. In the event of a default by Landlord, Tenant, at its option, without further notice or demand, shall have the right to any one or more of the following remedies in addition to all other rights and remedies provided at law or in equity or elsewhere herein: (w) to remedy such default or breach and invoice Landlord the reasonable out-of-pocket costs thereof (including attorneys' fees), including a 5% administrative fee, plus interest thereon at the Default Rate, or deduct such sum from the installments of Rent if not paid within 30 days after sending Landlord an invoice therefor and such failure continues following Landlord's receipt of a second invoice from Tenant for such costs which are not paid within 10 days following Landlord's receipt of the same; (x) to pursue the remedy of specific performance; or (y) to seek money damages for loss arising from Landlord's failure to discharge its obligations under this Lease. Nothing herein contained shall relieve Landlord from its obligations hereunder, nor shall this Section be construed to obligate Tenant to perform Landlord's repair obligations.
30. Force Majeure.⁴⁷ In the event that either party shall be delayed or hindered in or prevented from the performance of any covenant, agreement, work, service, or other act required under this Lease to be performed by such party (a "Required Act"), and such delay or hindrance is due to causes entirely beyond its control such as riots, insurrections, martial law, civil commotion, war, fire, flood, earthquake, or other casualty or acts of God (a "Force Majeure Event"), then the performance of such Required Act shall be excused for the period of delay, and the time period for performance of the Required Act shall be extended by the same number of days in the period of delay. For purposes of this Lease, the financial inability of Landlord or Tenant to perform any Required Act, including (without limitation) failure to pay Rent and/or to obtain adequate or other financing, shall not be deemed to constitute a Force Majeure Event. A Force Majeure Event shall not be deemed to commence until the party who asserts some right, defense or remedy arising from or based upon such Force Majeure Event gives written notice thereof to the other party hereto. If abnormal adverse weather conditions are the basis for a claim for an extension of time due to a Force Majeure Event, the written notice shall be accompanied by data substantiating (i) that the weather conditions were abnormal for the time and could not have been reasonably anticipated and (ii) that the weather conditions complained of had a significant adverse effect on the performance of a Required Act. To establish the extent of any delay to the performance of a Required Act due to abnormal adverse weather, a comparison will be made of the weather for the time of performance of the Required Act with the average of the preceding 10 years climatic range based on the National Weather Service statistics for the nearest weather reporting station to the Premises. No extension of time for or excuse for a delay in the performance of a Required Act will be granted for rain, snow, wind, cold temperatures, flood or other natural phenomena of normal intensity for the locality where the Premises are located.

31. Confidentiality Of Lease.⁴⁸ From and after the date lease negotiations were entered into and throughout the Term of this Lease, the parties shall not disclose any of the terms, covenants, conditions or agreements set forth in the letters of intent or in this Lease or any amendments hereto, nor provide such correspondence, this Lease, any amendments hereto or any copies of the same, nor any other information (oral, written or electronic) which is communicated by or on behalf of Tenant or on behalf of Landlord relating to Tenant's proposed development of the Premises (including, without limitation, architectural plans, specifications, site plans and drawings) or Tenant's business, to any person including, without limitation, any brokers, any other tenants in the [Building/Shopping Center] or any affiliates, agents or employees of such tenants or brokers except as set forth herein, without Tenant's written consent or except as ordered by a court with appropriate authority provided Landlord seeks available protective orders. Landlord hereby acknowledges that the disclosure of the foregoing to any third party would cause material damage to

Tenant, and Landlord agrees to indemnify, save and hold Tenant harmless from and against any and all damages suffered by Tenant which are attributable to any disclosure by Landlord in violation of the terms of this provision. Notwithstanding the foregoing, Landlord may disclose the terms of this Lease to those of its partners, employees, consultants, attorneys, accountants, current or potential mortgagees, lenders or purchasers of the Property who agree to be bound by the terms of this Section and Tenant may disclose the terms of this Lease to those of its partners, employees, consultants, attorneys, accountants and current or potential lenders, assigns or subtenants who agree to be so bound.

- (a) If any Superior Mortgagee or Master Landlord shall require any modifications(s) of this Lease, Tenant shall, at Landlord's request, promptly execute and deliver to Landlord such instruments effecting such modification(s) as Landlord shall require, provided that such modification(s) do not, in any respect, adversely affect any of Tenant's rights under this Lease or increase Tenant's obligations.. Landlord shall reimburse Tenant, on demand, for any out-of-pocket costs incurred by Tenant in connection with any such modifications.
- (b) Anything in this Lease to the contrary notwithstanding, in no event shall either party have any liability to the other for consequential or punitive damages for breach of any provision of this Lease.
- (c) In the event that Landlord or Tenant shall bring an action to recover any sum due hereunder or for any breach hereunder and shall obtain a judgment in its favor, or in the event that Landlord or Tenant retains an attorney for the purpose of collecting any sum due hereunder or construing or enforcing any of the terms or conditions hereof or protecting their interest in any bankruptcy, receivership, or insolvency proceeding or otherwise against the other, the prevailing party shall be entitled to recover all reasonable costs and expenses incurred, including reasonable attorneys' and legal assistants' fees prior to trial, at trial, and on appeal and for post-judgment proceedings. Further, either party shall be entitled to its reasonable attorneys' fees and costs incurred in connection with pursuing and/or collecting any past due sums due from the other party hereunder regardless of whether or not a lawsuit is filed.

- (d) Notwithstanding the foregoing, with respect to any remedy exercised by Landlord, Landlord shall have an affirmative obligation to obtain another tenant for the Premises promptly, at a fair market rental, and to otherwise mitigate its damages.⁵⁰

50 Some Landlords may limit this only if required by applicable laws. Strike that limitation for any anchor tenant-applicable law is subject to change and tenant wants the certainty of an contractual covenant for mitigation. That being said, Landlord should not be required to accept a tenant for the Premises that does fit the “mix” of the Shopping Center. Changing the affirmative obligation to “commercially reasonable efforts” is also acceptable.

TELECOMMUNICATIONS LEASES AND LICENSE AGREEMENTS

[26.0] I. FOUND MONEY: NEW OPPORTUNITIES IN TELECOMMUNICATIONS AGREEMENTS¹

Editor's Note: Telecommunications firms invest an enormous amount of capital in their technology and equipment. That investment will not pay off until this equipment (such as antennas, wiring and related transmission facilities) is installed and functioning. Equipment placement is critical, and many existing but unused commercial spaces present prime locations. Practitioners involved with such leasing transactions need to be aware of the issues that accompany these situations.

The title of the first article that I wrote on telecommunications leasing in 1998, from which this chapter is adapted, was “Found Money,” and it is still very true. If someone came to you and offered you anywhere from $10,000 to $200,000 to add to your property’s bottom line every year, with zero investment expected on your part, you might be skeptical. The truth is, that exact opportunity exists as a result of new and evolving telecommunications technology—it is possible to rent out previously unusable rooftop, building setback, and other interior space, and receive income for allowing telecommunications companies access to your building and your tenants. To appreciate the value these spaces can bring to your business, it is important to understand the types of new telecommunications technologies that are out there, their uses, their space needs, and the legal and business issues they raise.

[26.1] A. Background

The Information and Technology Age created a new type of real estate lease—the telecommunications lease or license agreement. Previously, cellular phones, smart phones, portable laptop computers, tablets and other electronic devices essentially did not exist in the workplace. Today they are commonplace and vital tools that have become both personal and business necessities. Similarly, wireless and mobile technologies allow for wireless use of laptops and other portable electronic devices not only at the office and at home, but also at hotspots including hotels, pools, retail stores and eateries, and even in a car, train or airplane. The transmission facilities required by these technologies can be placed in existing otherwise unusable space in all types of properties and thereby create a new source of income for the property. For example, a typical office building in an urban area may be able to add one to 10 small rooftop or in-building antennas. At an average monthly rental rate in Manhattan of $2,000 to $2,500 for a typical set of three cellular antenna arrays facing in different directions on the roof or side of a building and related equipment (or $500 and up per month in other urban markets), and with other levels of market-rate prices for other types of antennas such as Wi-Fi, Wi-MAX, pagers and fixed wireless antennas in a well-situated building, with knowledgeable and proactive leasing and management or appropriate consultants, these facilities could generate income of $25,000 to $300,000 per year.

If it is a cell site, the telecommunications tenant pays all the installation expenses for its facilities, plus the cost of the utilities it uses, and the only costs to the property owner are the transaction costs of the lease. For most other telecom tenants, such as fiber optic carriers and microwave antennas, the tenant generally pays the majority or all of the installation expenses plus utilities. Accordingly, the income from most of these leases translates almost directly into increased net operating income and, hence, into increased sale or financing proceeds. The biggest exception to this is Distributed Antenna or In Building Wireless Systems as discussed below.

Most important, these technologies have become ubiquitous; buildings without both wired and wireless high-speed data service and good cellular telephone reception can be at a distinct disadvantage when marketing to potential tenants or occupants. While location, rent space, layout and similar factors remain the principal determinative factors for tenants, it has now become common for the telecommunication infrastructure of a property to be a major distinguishing factor among the short list of locations that receive final consideration, particularly for financial service firms, law firms and other larger space users. Many owners of larger properties are at a disadvantage because they are not proactively bringing multiple redundant high speed data providers, wireless data providers, cellular carriers and other new technologies into their properties to maintain a competitive edge. As part of the WiredNYC initiative, New York City, through the Wired Score program, certifies the level of connectivity of commercial office buildings in an effort to encourage increasing levels of connectivity and give tenants a way to compare the connectivity of different properties.²

[26.2] B. Types of Telecommunications Facilities

Cellular and Other Small Rooftop Antennas. In urban areas, the transmission systems for cellular telephones and many developing new technologies are small rooftop antennas, usually 5 to 10 feet or less in height and diameter. These small rooftop antennas service various types of technologies, including PCS (personal communications services) equipment, Wi-Fi, and Wi-MAX services (wireless high speed data services), specialized mobile radio, fixed wireless services, and paging services.

Larger Rooftop Antennas. Satellite and microwave reception and transmission antenna dishes, which can be as small as twelve inches in diameter but are more commonly 3 to 6 feet or more in diameter, can also be installed on rooftops. These networks are generally installed for tenants on the roof of the building where they occupy space. Their uses range from data transmission for financial services to video conferencing.

Broadcast Antenna Towers. Tall antenna towers broadcast radio and television signals throughout the country and cellular and PCS signals in non-urban areas. These towers are located on top of the tallest buildings in urban areas or on a 50- to 150-foot-tall tower outside urban areas. Co-location allows multiple antennas for different technologies to be located on a single tower so that one tower could include one or more TV or radio station transmitters, serve as both a cellular and a PCS antenna location, and also have several satellite and microwave repeater antennas pointed in different directions.

Distributed Antenna or In-Building Wireless Systems. Cellular telephone networks were originally designed to provide cell phone service to people at street level, either driving in cars or walking on the streets. As technology has evolved over the last ten years, cell phones and cellular data networks are also heavily used inside buildings for iPhones, iPads, other tablets and laptops. This increased indoor traffic, plus the difficulty in providing service inside buildings constructed with lots of concrete and steel, results in poor or no reception in buildings, particularly in or near the elevator lobbies in the core on each floor, in stairwells and inside the elevators. The need for better reception inside buildings and the strain that these added high volume data users put on the network have led to the development of Distributed Antenna Systems also known as In Building Wireless Systems or DAS Systems. These are small cellular antennas installed throughout the building with one or more on every floor and a single master transmitter which combines the signals of multiple carriers such as Verizon Wireless, AT&T Wireless, Sprint/Nextel and T-Mobile and transmits all of those signals out over this network of small antennas throughout the building. We will discuss these systems in more detail later in this Chapter.

Communications Closets. Many telecommunications companies—wireless, Internet-access providers or competitive local exchange companies (CLECs)—need a small amount of space, either in a stand-alone equipment cabinet or a communications closet in buildings which they serve or as connection or retransmission points along their networks. Like rooftops, this is space that is not ordinarily rentable except possibly as storage space at a much lower rental rate.

Wiring Smart Buildings. New technologies require the ability to transmit more and more information at faster and faster speeds. Ordinary copper telephone lines are no longer sufficient for many businesses and even for individuals who don't want to wait for Internet Web pages, documents or videos to be downloaded to their computers. For higher-speed service, several types of technologies are available, such as numerous levels of fiber optic and copper wiring, WiFi and Wi-MAX service, point to multi-point data transmission service, DSL or Integrated Services Digital Network service (ISDN) (which are all-digital, high-speed phone lines), or even faster T-1 or T-3 phone lines. In order for property owners to retain existing tenants with increasing technology and information transmission needs and to attract new high-tech or technology-conscious tenants to their properties, they must have these capabilities along with greater electrical capacity (eight to twelve watts or more per square foot, instead of three to five watts per square foot), air-conditioning capacity to cool all of this equipment, and risers and equipment rooms available for tomorrow's new technology.

Wiring an existing office or residential building, particularly an occupied building, is very expensive. Although costs depend on the specific configuration of the building, the type of cabling or wireless infrastructure and the number of "drops" to separate tenants, wiring a typical office building with fiber or wireless infrastructure and equipment for Internet access can cost several hundred thousand dollars or more. As an alternative, during the past few years private companies would often wire a building at little or no cost to the owner, lease access to the infrastructure to the tenants and share the income or profits with the owner or pay a flat rental-type fee; however, with the economic upheaval and price competition in the telecommunications industry during the past ten years and with carriers viewing their services as a required building service rather than an option amenity, the opportunity to wire a building at no cost to the owner varies depending on the telecommunications infrastructure existing in the building, the size of the building and the number, types and sizes of the occupants of the building.

[26.3] C. Making the Most of This Opportunity

With proper planning, telecommunications “tenants” of an office building can generate anywhere from $300 to $2,500 per month per deal—income that really adds up—particularly because it is almost always triple net income direct to the bottom line without any additional expenses.

Along with opportunity comes the need to take a cautious approach to choosing which telecommunications service providers to “invite” into your building. The onus is on the building owner or property manager to carefully manage the procedures and standards for access to their real estate and to be certain that they utilize the best service providers available and have the right types and diversity of providers in the building.

The first step in the process is generally educational—new clients, both property owners and tenants, want to hear how this type of agreement affects their rental space, which service providers have the most to offer their property, what the business and legal issues are, and what type of deal should be negotiated. Many landlords and property managers don’t realize the potential income telecommunications agreements can generate and marketing benefits they provide. Because they are unfamiliar with this type of deal, they often think the lease is like a revocable license for removing their garbage—rather than understanding that, like a long-term lease, it requires greater protection for the owner and, if properly handled, creates a quantifiable asset upon sale or financing.

The average real estate owner initially doesn’t fully understand the impact that telecommunications tenants will have on his or her business, as well as the legal issues that are ever-present. Issues like rental rates, alteration rights, maximizing the use of riser space, interference, lease term and renewal options, the tenant’s creditworthiness, scope of installation, permits and approvals needed and status of assignment and subletting rights must all be taken into consideration.

Real estate is a highly competitive business—any landlord can tell you that. Any edge you have on the competition can make a difference. Using telecommunication agreements to your advantage is an edge that a smart landlord just can’t afford to ignore.

[26.4] II. THE LEGAL INS AND OUTS OF TELECOMMUNICATION LEASES³

True or false: All real estate leases are created equal.

If you guessed true, you might want to think again. Although most real estate leases are cut from the same cloth, telecommunication agreements are another matter altogether. Telecommunications agreements—which dictate the terms for leasing or licensing space to accommodate rooftop antennas, antenna towers, inside-building wiring and communication closet leases—demand a different perspective than that applied to the run-of-the-mill real estate lease. This equipment is vital to today’s technology services including cellular, wireless and paging services and high-speed data transmission. Although a landlord might be anxious to mine this windfall of financial potential—telecommunication agreements often utilize previously unused and unprofitable space—it is wise to proceed with caution. Here are some key legal issues that must be considered before a long-term commitment is made.

Lease vs. License Agreement: With the exception of broadcast antenna towers and large antenna tower leases, most landlords prefer to call the agreement permitting the installation of a rooftop antenna, communications closet or the wiring of a smart building, a license agreement rather than a lease. Generally, a license agreement vests less rights in the licensee than a lease vests in the tenant, making it faster and easier for the building owner to terminate the agreement and remove the occupant from the property in the event of a default. While such a general legal difference exists, the fact is, telecommunications license agreements fail many, if not all, of the tests that differentiate leases from license agreements. Therefore, the building owner should be aware that, while utilizing the term “licensing agreement” may offer psychological comfort, legally, it will be treated much like a lease.⁴

Scope of Installation: The document should clearly detail the scope of the equipment to be installed. This very specific reference should include an itemization of all equipment and/or a plan showing not only the space leased but also the specific equipment to be installed, and its location.

3 Reprinted with permission (and with updates, substantial revisions and format changes) from February 15, 1999, issue of Mortgage & Real Estate Executives Report, published by West Group.

4 The only reported case on this topic held a cell site license agreement to be a lease. Nextel of N.Y. v. Time Mgmt. Corp., 297 A.D.2d 282, 746 N.Y.S.2d 169 (2d Dep’t 2002).

Such a definitive listing can avoid any disputes and maximize the remaining space available to the property owner for other telecommunications agreements or other uses. The agreement should also spell out the proposed physical improvements to be made by the telecommunications provider.

Permits and Approvals: The Telecommunications Act of 1996 preempted local regulations, particularly zoning regulations, which prohibit small telecommunications antennas of one meter or less in diameter, subject to exceptions where reasonable health or safety regulations are involved. Nonetheless, in many cases, special zoning variances, building permits, FCC licenses or other governmental approvals are required for the installation and operation of a telecommunications antenna⁵ and specific requirements apply to properties containing telecommunications antennas.⁶ The tenant will want to have its obligations, particularly the obligation to pay rent under the lease or licensee agreement, conditional and effective only upon the tenant obtaining the necessary approvals. While a reasonable period of time must be allowed for this process, the property owner must be protected by setting a definite deadline by which (1) the tenant can exercise its right to terminate, or (2) the tenant must begin to pay rent, approvals or no approvals. While setting a deadline might not result in rent actually being paid on time, at the very least the existence of the date can institute a dialogue between the landlord and the tenant about the status of the approval process and the project in general.

Assignment and Subletting: Unlike a traditional real estate lease, it is appropriate to restrict the assignment and subletting rights under a telecommunication lease, particularly one that does not involve a large antenna tower. It is usually advisable to require the owner's approval for any transfer of the lease, except in the case of the transfer of the tenant's FCC license to operate its PCS, cellular or other communications system, 5 See N.Y.C., N.Y., Technical Policy and Procedure Notice #5/98 (July 1, 1998), <https://www1.nyc.gov/assets/buildings/ppn/tppn598.pdf>, which indicates that an alteration permit is not required to install an antenna if the building has a use independent of the antenna, if the antenna does not extend more than 6 above the height of the roof or parapet on the roof, or 6' above any penthouse or bulkhead (if mounted on such), if the antenna does not have a footprint greater than 8.45 square feet (or 1 meter in diameter), and if the equipment does not occupy more than 5% of the floor area of the lot (or 400 square feet, whichever is smaller).

the transfer of all of its assets in the market in which the antenna site is located, a merger or an affiliate transfer. The telecom tenant will of course push back and seek little or no approval rights or an agreement that the landlord will be reasonable in granting all approvals.

Representations: Because of the detailed technical requirements associated with telecommunications agreements, an extensive investigation of the state of the physical property, its suitability and the availability of utility services may be necessary on the part of the tenant. The owner is customarily not involved in this procedure, and should require the tenant to acknowledge that any necessary investigations were carried out solely by the tenant to its full satisfaction.

Alterations: In a typical real estate lease, alterations are greatly restricted. These same alterations are vital to a telecommunications agreement, especially as they relate to electrical power and ability to upgrade their equipment. A property owner should expect to allow a tenant to make necessary alterations without regard to the usual distinction between structural and non-structural alterations, although subject to a reasonable plan approval right. Restrictions can also be placed on alterations, repairs and replacements which augment tenants' facilities and uses more space than the original equipment. It is fairly standard for the tenant to have the right to install (and pay for) additional utility lines, provided they do not in any way hamper service to existing tenants.

Access: In most cases, building owners restrict access to the roof, mechanical floors and some areas of the basement. Obviously, the telecom tenant needs around-the-clock access to its equipment, but the owner should require appropriate advance notice except in the event of an emergency. The owner may want a representative to accompany the tenant to assure that no other equipment is adversely impacted by any actions taken. Also, if a building does not have 24-hour staff, the owner may be able to restrict the telecom tenant's access to the building's business hours as long as emergency access can be provided after hours.

Relocation Rights: With respect to rooftop antennas, it is critically important for the property owner to have the right to relocate the antenna, wires, cabling or other equipment. It is impossible to plan in advance for every potential use for a property, so flexibility is important. These provisions are generally critical points of negotiation—issues like paying for the cost of relocation, how much notice should be given, whether the relocation will only be permitted on a temporary basis or may also be a permanent relocation, when the relocation will occur and how the relocation will affect existing service must be worked out in advance.

Subordination and Other Financing Provisions: Telecommunications tenants often insist on using their very simple standard form of lease that may not have provisions standard to a real estate lease—provisions that may affect that lease’s financeability. In particular, the tenant’s form is likely to omit any subordination provision, leaving the lease superior to all future mortgages and ground leases. If a subordination provision is added, as it should be, the tenant may request nondisturbance protection, something that would be very unusual for the owner to request for a small telecommunications agreement and very difficult for the owner to obtain. Similarly, an attornment provision should be added, providing that the tenant will attorn to any new owner of the property after a foreclosure, and that the tenant will provide estoppel certificates and minor lease amendments where necessary to satisfy a lender.

Hazardous Materials and Environmental Concerns: In addition to the standard environment and hazardous material provisions, a telecommunications agreement should also contain a provision allowing the landlord to terminate the lease if it can be reasonably shown that the equipment poses a health hazard. This is wise in the face of ongoing controversy over the impact of electrical and magnetic radiation fields upon the human body.

Termination Options: It is rare that a telecom tenant will agree to give a property owner a termination option such as a demolition clause allowing the lease to be terminated if the building is going to be demolished because of the cost and effort required to relocate a telecom antenna, particularly a cell site or a broadcast antenna tower.

In light of these issues, it is clear that not only are all leases not created equal, but telecommunication leases demand extra attention before signing on the dotted line.

[26.5] III. HOW TO MANAGE THE BUSINESS OF TELECOMMUNICATIONS AGREEMENTS⁷

It sounds too good to be true: previously unused interior and rooftop space can generate a sizable rental income. But as any savvy business person knows, if something seems too good to be true, there is need to exercise caution. When it comes to negotiating and managing telecommunications agreements, the property owner should beware. Here are a few key business issues to take into consideration before signing on the dotted line. As in every other area of business, the more information you have at your disposal, the better your position.

Rental Issues: Although rental rates can vary greatly, even within the same market, standardization has occurred, particularly with respect to small rooftop antennas. For example, the going rate for cell sites in Manhattan is about $2,000 to $2,500 per month per property with the installation, including a set of three arrays of antennas (each array containing 3-4 antennas facing in one direction), an equipment room or space to install an equipment shed on the roof of the building or in a yard and related equipment and wiring. A carrier bringing fiber optic connectivity into a building will pay anywhere from several hundred to several thousand dollars per month depending on the size and tenant demographics of the building. The rental rates for other types of small rooftop antennas such as pager and fixed wireless antennas, larger rooftop antennas and building wiring tend to be very negotiable, depending upon the bargaining power of the tenant, the location of the property and the volume of available space in other nearby buildings suitable for the specific use. Negotiating points would include the right to add future antennas or other equipment, which would in turn affect the rate the property owner could charge.

In the case of wiring to create smart buildings, there are three basic solutions, depending upon the needs of the building. The owners can either arrange at their own expense to install the necessary wiring, hire a single preferred building service provider to perform the installation at no charge and then lease usage of that communications equipment to existing tenants with profits shared between both parties, or bring multiple separate service providers in to wire the building. Types of DAS System solutions are discussed below.

Data centers, telecom carrier switch facilities and large broadcast antennas rent for a substantially higher rate than rooftop space, depending on where they are located. Understanding the market rate for the particular use is important in negotiating the best deal.

Lease Term and Options: When deciding on the term of an agreement, it may be in the owner's best interest to give the tenant the shortest possible term, so that the property will not be tied up for an extended length of time. Renewal options are always in the service provider's favor, so the property owner will generally want to avoid giving options altogether. You will most likely be looking at a five-year lease for a small rooftop antenna, with the service provider seeking several five-year renewal options or a total potential term of 15–20 years or more, with longer terms frequently in effect for broadcast antenna towers, data centers and switch facilities because they require a substantial capital investment to build and maintain.

Creditworthiness of the Tenant: Although some large telecommunications companies interested in leasing space are well-known and well-capitalized, there are new players emerging every day and mergers as well as bankruptcies of existing players abound. It behooves the landlord or property manager and also the lender to carefully analyze and investigate the creditworthiness of the tenant, its track record, and chances of future stability before making a commitment.

Desirability of Use: Early on in the process of leasing space to telecommunications tenants, the landlord must seriously consider the big picture. The average office building owner is used to dealing with tenants that have little, if any, effect on the building outside of their particular space. In this case, you must think about the effect a rooftop tenant will have on your building and your core business of renting space in the building. Look beyond the dollars and cents, as tempting as the bottom line might be. For example, adding rooftop antennas that are visible from the street to a shopping center may have a negative impact on the marketability of the property to future image-conscious tenants.

Environmental Concerns: Objections from existing space tenants, particularly in residential buildings, are common when the issue of telecommunication antennas is raised. With the exception of large antenna towers, all of the technologies operate at very low power, generally 10 to 100 watts. This is not believed to have any significant adverse health or environmental impact, although the psychological impact can occasionally have a negative effect on your building's marketability. Larger antenna towers, such as those used by radio and television stations, however, can pose serious health and environmental risks at close range if not properly operated, which is why their placement, operation and proximity to people is subject to substantial regulation by the Federal Communications Commission, the Occupational Health and Safety Administration and other governmental agencies and any telecom tenant should be required to comply with all of those governmental regulations.

Electricity and Other Utilities: Be sure there is sufficient access to electricity and other utilities to cover present and future telecommunications usage. Generally, telecommunications companies hire their own experts to evaluate a property under consideration early in the site selection process. A landlord must be sure that the incoming telecom tenant doesn't impede or detract from existing utilities available to present or future tenants, and is prepared to pay for all costs associated with its own usage. A telecom tenant will generally install any additional electrical capacity that it requires at its own expense.

Physical Constraints: The property owner must be aware of the building's physical constraints—can the roof bear additional weight or will structural supports be required? Other issues that require investigation include how the new equipment will affect the roof warranty, how much space is already taken up by existing equipment, if the new equipment will cause interference with the old, and if sufficient riser space is available for the wiring that connects the roof to utility and other building systems.

Exclusivity: When the world of telecommunication leases first opened up, it was common for tenants to try to get exclusive control of an entire rooftop, without telling the landlord that they, in turn, were going to sublet space. The landlord would end up giving away the entire roof for the price of one antenna. Similarly, some carriers providing services to tenants in a building would ask for exclusive or preferred marketing rights although as discussed below some of these exclusives have been prohibited by the Federal Communications Commission.

Rooftop Managers: Specialized companies now act as rooftop managers for the landlord. These companies typically provide three types of services: (1) they act as the leasing agent or landlord's broker locating and negotiating with telecommunications providers based upon the extensive specialized relationships that they have with, or data bases of available locations that they provide to, the telecom providers and, more importantly, the engineers at the providers who usually determine the location of these facilities; (2) they serve as the property manager for these facilities, billing and collecting rent or access fees, obtaining and reviewing insurance evidence and providing customary property management services; and (3) they provided specialized engineering services in reviewing the plans for these facilities and in supervising the installation of wiring, equipment and antennas. As long as the landlord is aware of his or her options, each situation can be fairly evaluated.

Attracting Cell Sites—The Need for a Rooftop Manger: It should be noted that a landlord cannot call up a cellular company and get them to look at a particular property as a potential cell site location. Cell site location decisions are engineering decisions made not based on an available location but based on gaps in existing cellular networks. Remember back to Venn Diagrams from High School (overlapping concentric circles) or a beehive layout, a new cell site goes in the gaps between the circles or between the transmission patterns of existing nearby cell sites resulting from changes in usage patterns, such as the construction of a new building blocking service to an area or similar facts. Carriers first decide where they need to add a cell site and then look for available locations in that area. This is done by the carrier establishing a “search ring” or small area where they need an additional location by latitude and longitude, and then they typically hire a site selection company which acts as a specialized brokerage firm that locates and generally then also gets all the necessary permits and approvals for a new cell site. That site selection company then usually first checks the data bases provided by rooftop managers for available locations and then goes to the site and looks at nearby properties listed on those data bases that fit the necessary specifications and that they know are interested in having cell sites because they are listed on the data bases. Those are typically the first properties that they will look at and they will typically only look at other properties if none of those properties are in the right location or otherwise don’t fit the search ring specifications.

Looking to the Future: It is impossible to predict where technology will go. Be cautious as to whom you take on as a tenant, since many technology companies won’t survive. Even an experienced building owner used to dealing with all kinds of tenants can be blindsided by this industry, which measures time in milliseconds.

One Fact is a Certainty: The telecommunications industry is here to stay. It’s up to you to proceed boldly, but with caution and with appropriate expert assistance, in order to effectively make this industry work for you and your property.

[26.6] IV. TELECOMMUNICATIONS: THE FCC ACTS ON BUILDING ACCESS⁸

In November 2000, the Federal Communications Commission (FCC) issued regulations implementing measures to ensure that building owners do not unreasonably deny competing telecommunications service providers access to customers in commercial buildings or other multiple-tenant environments (MTEs).⁹ The FCC took the following actions:

1. The FCC forbade telecommunications carriers from entering into exclusive contracts, preferred provider agreements and similar arrangements that effectively prohibit property owners of commercial buildings from permitting other providers to access their property. This did not invalidate agreements previously executed.
2. The FCC established procedures to facilitate moving the demarcation point (the end of the network and wiring operated by the incumbent local exchange carrier, the local Bell company—also known as the ILEC) to the minimum point of entry (MPOE) just inside the building at the building owner's request in order to reduce the competitive carriers' dependence on the ILEC to gain access to wiring inside the building. Under current law, the demarcation point may be located at either the MPOE just inside the building or further inside the building. If the demarcation point is moved to the MPOE, then the property owner or the tenant must maintain the wiring from the MPOE to the tenant's space.
3. The FCC determined that the Telecom Act of 1996 required that ILECs must afford telecommunications carriers and cable service providers reasonable and nondiscriminatory access to conduits and rights-of-way located in MTEs, to the extent such conduits and rights-of-way are owned or controlled by the ILEC.
4. The FCC prohibited restrictions that impair the installation, maintenance or use of certain video antennas on property within the exclusive use or control of the antenna user.

9 15 F.C.C.R. 22983.

The FCC continues to monitor this area, and in March 2008, the FCC issued a Report and Order which was incorporated in a final order in 2010 prohibiting future exclusivity contracts between telecommunication providers and customers in multiple-tenant residential and commercial environments and invalidated any existing exclusivity agreements in multiple-tenant residential environments. This extension reflected the FCC recognition of the burgeoning market for bundled services, which include telecommunication, video and broadband under one bill for customers.¹⁰ Several states have also established legislation or regulations regarding telecommunication providers' access to buildings (e.g., Texas, Massachusetts and Connecticut), however, the impact of their efforts have been minimal.

[26.7] V. DATA CENTERS, SWITCH HOTELS, AND TECHNOLOGY BUILDINGS: DEVELOPMENT, FINANCING AND BUSINESS ISSUES¹¹

The continuing growth of technology and telecommunications has spawned a new set of companies with a specialized set of physical space requirements. Real estate owners and developers looking to serve this growing category of telecommunications tenants have focused on their specific needs in designing, constructing and renovating properties for their use. Traditional real estate leases have by necessity been modified to meet these requirements. In addition, telecom tenants and the brokers and consultants representing them, together with those representing their landlords, have by necessity redefined their approaches and strategies for leasing space for these uses. Also, developers and owners seeking financing for properties designed for telecommunications tenants have learned to deal with a changing set of lenders' requirements, and in some locales are learning how to take advantage of incentives and special financing programs offered to builders, owners, developers and users of telecommunications facilities.

There is no single name for the facilities occupied by telecommunications tenants—they can be called data centers, switch hotels, telecom buildings, carrier hotels, co-location facilities, intelligent buildings, high-tech buildings, technology centers or new media buildings.

[26.8] A. Types of Facilities

Regardless of the name used, these facilities fall into one or more of three basic categories:

[26.9] 1. Switch Facilities

A true telecommunications switch facility holds switching equipment used to operate a telecommunications network or to allow interconnection of multiple networks. Originally, these buildings were the local, regional and main central offices of AT&T Corp. and its subsidiaries prior to the breakup of the Bell System and the advent of deregulation. Now such facilities may be operated by the ILEC (one of the descendants of the Baby Bells, such as Verizon), a cellular phone operator such as T-Mobile, fiber-based data carriers such as Level 3 or a CLEC providing competitive telecom services switching facility. These facilities may also serve as a co-location facility, as discussed below, where equipment and wiring of other telecom providers is located, allowing interconnection of the networks between the party operating the switching equipment and the other party.

[26.10] 2. Data Centers

A data center or web-hosting facility generally has the same special needs as a switching facility, but instead of containing switching equipment operating a telecom network, it is used by parties operating computer network servers and transmitting high volumes of data requiring specialized and highly controlled computer equipment environments and efficient and cost-effective connections to telecom networks. Multiple redundant telecom providers will have interconnection points in these facilities allowing such data transmission on the highest available transmission speeds. Users of these facilities include web-hosting companies, banks and financial service firms, Internet information and digital service providers such as Google and eBay, and Internet retailers such as Amazon.com and Alibaba.com, Internet service providers such as Time Warner Cable, Cablevision and Comcast, as well as data center and co-location facility operators such as Digital Realty, Level 3 and iO. In addition, a myriad of other users will find the special facilities of these buildings, particularly the redundant systems allowing uninterrupted operations, enticing—such as telephone call centers, credit card operators, check-clearing facilities and disaster recovery facilities. Data center space is now commonly rented based upon the quantity of electricity made available to the space, rather than on a per square foot basis.

[26.11] 3. Co-location Companies

A co-location company may operate an entire data center building or lease a portion of such a building and provide services on a retail rather than a wholesale basis to smaller users. Fully built-out data center space with raised flooring, fire suppression, power distribution equipment, specialized cooling and temperature control systems, etc. installed by the operator or the facility owner and with space typically provided on a per cabinet basis. Typically, co-location companies also provide other services, known as managed services, to a customer, such as providing data network connectivity and specialized engineering labor known as “remote hands.”

[26.12] 4. New Media or Wired Buildings

New media or wired buildings and technology centers generally have some of the attributes of a true data center or switch facility but have evolved into what is known as smart office buildings with more sophisticated technology and more telecommunications providers providing service in the building and with more bandwidth (fatter pipes for transmitting data) available in the building than in traditional office buildings. Having these amenities available in the building makes these buildings more attractive to new-media and other tech savvy companies (which today is almost every large company) and allows specialized marketing campaigns focusing on these industries.

Typical office space leases or leases in new-media buildings are gross leases subject to traditional office lease escalations including services such as air conditioning, electricity and cleaning. In these leases, extensive documentation is devoted to the description and allocation of financial responsibility for “tenant improvements,” including the extent and quality of tenant finishes such as wall coverings, carpeting and millwork. The scope of a tenant’s installation cost is $50 to $200 per square foot; and the alterations performed by or for the tenant are within the tenant’s demised premises and generally are non-structural in nature.

Data center or switch facility leases can be gross leases including all operating expenses and real estate taxes or net leases with the tenants paying their pro-rata share of all expenses of operating the property. The property owner arranges for special services to be available, often incurring the expense of bringing services such as additional electrical capacity and fiber optic connections to the property. In a wholesale data center lease the space is raw with the services brought to the space and the tenants' installations includes their own HVAC and electrical systems, as well as other work such as the installation of generators and antennas requiring structural alterations and including significant work outside the tenant's own demised premises. In a turnkey data center lease the space is generally fully built out by the owner or operator so that the tenant or customer just installs its server racks and servers. The aggregate investment of the party building out the space (be it the property owner or the tenant), including equipment, costs between $500 and $1,000 per square foot. These costs may be passed onto the tenant as a factor built into annual rent or as tenant's initial alterations or configuration work or may be paid by the tenant.

[26.13] B. Property Criteria

The following are the most common criteria for a data center or switch facility and each of these areas should be carefully examined when acquiring a facility or underwriting a loan on such a facility:

- Ceiling Height: The height of switching and computer control equipment, together with the need for 18- to 36-inch-high raised flooring below the equipment and ladder systems to hang wiring above the equipment, as well as ducts for supplemental high-capacity air conditioning to cool the equipment, necessitates high ceiling height. Clear ceiling heights, free of pipes, beams and other obstructions, of a minimum of 12 to 14 feet are generally required, while 14 to 16 feet of clear ceiling height is strongly preferable.
- Floor Load: The weight of the computer servers and switching equipment requires sturdy floors with a minimum load capacity of 150 pounds per square foot and preferably 200 to 300 pounds per square foot. Portions of these facilities, generally those containing backup battery power units, will require floor loads of 300 pounds or more per square foot and may, therefore, require reinforcing or will need to be located on slab or at grade level.
- Electrical Power: The intensive use of computer servers and switching and computer equipment in these facilities requires very extensive electrical power capacity, with multiple levels of redundancy at all critical failure points throughout the network. While a typical office utilizes 4 to 6 watts per square foot, these facilities require 100-200 or more watts per square foot. Telecom switch facilities principally utilize direct current (DC) power, whereas data centers principally utilize alternating current (AC) power. Today, availability of power is more critical than availability of space because of the difficulties in obtaining more power in most areas. Diverse sources of power from separate power plants or substations are desirable, although not generally an absolute requirement.

- Fiber Optic Access: Having multiple—or at least initially 2–4,—fiber optic service providers at the property with diverse routes to the property and diverse entry points into the property (or at least two separate services utilizing diverse routes and entry points) makes a property more desirable. Alternatively, fiber optic cables should be near the property; however, bringing fiber optics to the property may create a delay and an expense for the property owner or the tenant if excess conduit space is not available in the streets, since tearing up streets to install new cables can be time-consuming and expensive.
- Freight Elevators: Availability of at least one—and preferably several—oversized, heavy-duty freight elevators capable of holding equipment the size of small trucks facilitates the installation of large, heavy equipment, without having to install the equipment in pieces or remove windows and use exterior hoists or cranes.
- Roof Space: Rooftop space for antennas and supplemental air conditioning equipment is required. Particular locations on a roof may be necessary for line-of-sight microwave and similar antennas.
- Riser Space: Telecommunications tenants require significant riser space connecting the demised premises to the basement, fiber optic access points, electrical transformers, rooftop antennas, air conditioning equipment and other points at the property in multiple, diverse locations to bring additional and redundant electrical capacity, telecommunications wiring and supplemental air conditioning to the premises. Depending upon the size and type of tenant, the riser space can be several square inches, several square feet or more. Property owners may need to be creative to find additional riser space, such as by decommissioning extra elevators that are no longer required because these tenants have much lower occupancy levels (machines don't require as many elevators as people).

- Column Spacing: Column-free spaces are preferable; however, the combination of free spaces with the desired floor loads and ceiling heights is not common in multi-floor buildings. Minimum spacing between columns should be 20 feet (preferably 25 to 30 feet) to maximize equipment layout efficiency and allow for oversized equipment.
- Backup Electrical Power: Data center and switch-hotel tenants generally install their own sources of backup electrical power, battery backup for instantaneous protection against power outages and coverage until a generator starts up, diesel generators for longer outages, and an outside plug for a mobile generator for redundant backup if the generator fails. In facilities serving smaller tenants, the owner may install these backup electrical facilities and charge the tenants for the shared or allocated capacity thereof.
- Generator and Equipment Space: Additional space outside the demised premises is generally also necessary for the installation of backup generators, diesel fuel tanks (unless they are located in the base of a modular generator unit), electrical transformers and similar equipment. Since these tenants use many fewer parking spaces, excess parking spaces, subject to zoning requirements, can often be used for generators, tanks, and equipment rooms. Alternatively, equipment can be placed in excess loading docks, on rooftops or roof setbacks (subject to weight limitations), in garages, or in basements.
- Access and Security: Telecommunications tenants require 24/7 access to these spaces. High-level security systems, including key card entry systems, or even better, biometric (fingerprint, retina or hand measurement) systems, covering not only tenant spaces, but the entire property, are desirable.
- Reliability and Experience of Ownership: In light of the specialized nature of these properties and the requirement to move at “Internet speed,” telecommunications tenants strongly prefer to deal with well-established, financially solvent ownership having established track records with similar spaces, uses and tenants. Many of these tenants have had bad experiences with inexperienced ownership, and the need to meet or exceed timetables requires dealing with experienced owners.

[26.14] C. Data Center and Switch-Hotel Leasing Issues

The special needs of telecommunications tenants and the requirements of data center and switch-hotel landlords impact the negotiation and structure of a number of lease provisions. Outlined below are some of the key leasing issues that distinguish data center and switch-hotel leases from more traditional space leases.

[26.15] 1. Installation

In a data center or a switch hotel the tenant provides substantially all of its own equipment and depending on whether it is a “turnkey” lease or a “wholesale” lease, will determine if the landlord or the tenant does the installation of raised floors, supplemental air-conditioning, generators, and fiber optic cable installation requiring major structural alterations within and outside the demised premises. If the tenant is doing this work then the landlord will require covenants from the tenant that the tenant will perform its work in accordance with typical alteration requirements. Since these alterations are critical to the tenant’s ability to operate its space, these tenants will ask for, and are entitled to receive, greater alteration rights than typical office tenants.

[26.16] 2. Co-Location

The business models for many tenants of these facilities include providing space for their customers’ telecommunications and/or computer equipment in the tenants’ space. It is therefore essential for data center and switch-hotel tenants to be able to enter into “co-location agreements,” similar to license agreements but with the tenant/licensor providing services to the licensee/co-location customer. Consequently typical subletting restrictions must be modified to accommodate this need and provide co-location rights to the tenants, subject to appropriate restrictions, without eliminating the landlord’s typical rights to approve all subleases and control the use and occupancy of its space.

[26.17] 3. Nondisturbance Agreements

Due to the extent and expense of their installations, data center and switch-hotel tenants generally insist on nondisturbance agreements from any lenders and superior lessors. Typically, lenders restrict the provision of nondisturbance agreements to tenants of a minimum size. Consequently tenants will want to ascertain upfront if the landlord has enough flexibility with its lender to provide the required nondisturbance protection.

[26.18] 4. Security Deposit

Despite a tenant expending large sums on its installation, it may not have a traditional credit or earnings track record to support its rent obligation and its net worth may be an illiquid investment in equipment and facilities, or it may currently have cash from investors, but in a short time that cash will be invested in equipment and facilities, rendering it illiquid. It is not unusual for a landlord to insist on a large security deposit, sometimes as much as one or two years' rent. On the other hand, if an old building is being converted to a data center or switch facility then the tenant may be making a valuable investment in electrical, HVAC and other facilities, which add value to the building.

[26.19] 5. Financial Credibility of Landlord

Likewise, given the investment in their space, tenants will look for credible and creditworthy landlords who can meet both their space delivery time requirements and also ongoing operational requirements of their tenants as well.

[26.20] D. Data Center and Switch-Hotel Financing Issues

When the bubble burst for dot-coms in the spring of 2000, telecom companies and other users of data center and switch facilities were also severely affected. Developers seeking debt financing for new, to-be-developed data center and switch facilities need to provide greater equity or guaranties from financially strong entities. In addition, lenders are more likely to require executed leases in hand for at least part of the property and, obviously, the scope of the pre-leasing requirement will be tied to the scope of equity the developer is investing. A major problem was the "chicken or egg" issue: tenants looking at these facilities needed immediately available space to achieve their goals of speed to market and therefore would not pre-lease space, and without pre-leasing, many developers could not close acquisition or construction loans.

With regard to equity financing, private sources such as the real-estate arms of money management and asset management firms have partnered with owners and development groups in the funding of telecom facility development. Because timing is a critical issue with respect to the development and leasing of telecommunications facilities, a developer may need an equity partner to fund the early phases of construction prior to the developer securing leases that can then be used to secure more traditional debt financing. One option in this regard is for the equity partner to provide financial guarantees to the lender with the understanding that once a certain percentage of approved signed leases are in place, the guarantee requirement will be lifted.

As a result of the continuing shakeout in the start-up world and in the telecommunications industry, lenders will look carefully at the financials of the tenants. Lender due diligence will include a review of the companies' key investors and strategic partners, as well as a review of each company's financials and trade record, particularly where nondisturbance protection is required. At the same time, as mentioned above, developers will need to pay careful attention to subordination and nondisturbance provisions of loan documents in order to preserve the necessary flexibility for dealing with their tenants and accommodating their needs with respect to critical and costly installations.

Bottom line—because of the competitive and volatile nature of the telecommunications industry, lenders and investors need to proceed cautiously with regard to the financing of telecommunications facilities. They will look for developers and owners with strong track records and with strong tenants, or, at a minimum, tenants with strong financial backing and a good business plan, before committing to these projects. Even economic development agencies and local governments providing incentives will look to financially strong, experienced developers to qualify for the benefits and programs offered.

[26.21] E. Conclusion

As the growth of wireless communications continues and new telecommunications applications are developed, the demand for data center and switch hotels to accommodate carriers and related telecommunications equipment users will continue to expand. Because of the evolving nature of the telecommunications business, as in any evolving industry, some companies will succeed while others will fail. Only time will determine the Darwinian survivors—and therefore owners, developers and lenders need to structure and document leases, loans and other financial documents to take into account, and provide protections and solutions for, potential issues arising as a result of the evolving nature of the telecommunications industry.

[26.22] VI. DISTRIBUTED ANTENNA OR IN BUILDING WIRELESS SYSTEMS

Cellular telephone systems were originally designed primarily to provide service to customers walking on the sidewalks or driving in cars on the streets not at their desks or homes. Since the “traffic” on those networks was at street level—in consumers’ hands or cars—the original antennas were principally designed to cover as much geography as possible and were pointed down towards the streets or nearby highways or transportation centers where there was substantial pedestrian or vehicular traffic to utilize the cellular network.

The use of cell phones together with smart phones, iPads, laptop computers and other connected devices has grown exponentially in recent years and has moved from street level into buildings. Cell phones have become just another device for transmitting voice and data services. Now, the traffic for cellular networks is not only at street level but also inside buildings.

However, the quality of a cellular signal can deteriorate when inside a building, particularly in the core or in elevators or stairwells. The degree of that deterioration varies dramatically based on numerous factors including the size of the building, the distance to the nearest cellular antennas, the number of obstructions such as other buildings, the amount of interference from other telecom and cellular transmitters, and the amount of steel or concrete used in the construction of the building. As one gets closer to the center of a building, the quality of the cellular signal can deteriorate from multiple bars on the cell phone, tablet or other device, to one or even zero bars as a result of those obstructions. As a result, both the device and the cellular network need to work harder to keep a signal connected. The battery on the device is also used up much more quickly and the amount of data traffic and the number of calls that may be transmitted simultaneously from an individual cell site goes down because both sides of the network have to work harder to keep that signal connected.

Therefore, locations with high data and cellular phone traffic such as transportation centers, casinos, sports venues, hotels, airports, hospitals, convention centers and hotels have, over the last ten years, begun to install small cellular systems within the buildings. These systems are known as distributed antenna systems (DAS) or in-building wireless systems. These systems can be built separately for each carrier within the building or can operate as a single consolidated neutral host system and support multiple carriers over one set of equipment. A well engineered and operated combined neutral host network is much more efficient, less costly for the carriers and simpler for the property owner to manage.

A neutral host or combined multi-carrier system typically consists of two or more fiber optic connections to the street, an equipment room where base station signals are combined, converted to fiber optics, and transmitted throughout the building to remote antennas installed by the system operator. Each of the separate carriers desiring to utilize the system then install their own base station transmitters within that room and connect to the combiner system, thereby connecting to the wiring and infrastructure covering the entire building and the many separate small cellular antennas which distribute and transmit the signal. These systems can also support communications systems for building maintenance and other employees and for building and equipment management systems. Having a single system for all carriers minimizes the space and construction headaches for a property owner.

Depending on, among other things, local building codes, a DAS system may also be capable of supporting an emergency communication system or first responder system (FRS) for police, fire and other first responders and public safety workers, allowing them to communicate effectively inside a building during an emergency. In fact, where permitted by law, combining a well engineered and constructed DAS with an FRS may produce a better result with less interference for all users. In some areas, however, that system needs to be separate from a commercial system. Also, a first responder communication system requires a higher level of redundancy and resilience (e.g., waterproof installation, redundant pathways for fiber and battery or generator backup) and typically covers the entire building; including non-public service areas, whereas a DAS may only cover public areas of a building. Nonetheless, there can be economies of scale installing both systems at the same time.

In an office building, a DAS system may use one or two or as many as eight or ten separate antennas. These antennas can be the size of a smoke detector or a dinner plate and can be located on each floor of the building or only one or two antennas may be installed to cover two floors depending on the construction and the volume of traffic in that building. These antennas may be able to be located in common areas or above hung ceilings or can be mounted on the hung ceilings. In a transportation facility or sports arena there may 50, 100 or even more antennas throughout the facility to provide good coverage in the arena and in all of the restaurants, hallways, lobbies and ancillary spaces as well as much higher capacity at peak utilization.

DAS transactions can generally be structured in three different ways, each with its own separate issues: (1) the property owner can (usually with assistance from a specialized consultant) design, purchase, install and operate the system and then contract directly with carriers for the carriers to connect to the system—however, such a system requires technical expertise that a property owner generally does not have and may not want to obtain and requires large capital expenditures; (2) the property owner can hire a third party company (not a carrier) to design, purchase, install and operate the system at the third party's expense allowing that third party to contract with carriers to connect to the system—however, this option is not necessarily favored by the carriers; or (3) a carrier can design, purchase, install and operate the system at its expense both for its own use and for other carriers to connect to the system—although concerns exist about whether one carrier installing a system will truly build a neutral host system and allow other competing carriers equal access to that system. The major distinguishing factors between these models are the party who pays for the DAS, who profits from the DAS and who controls the operations of the DAS.

While today, these systems are generally limited to locations with high volumes of users such as transportation or sports facilities or large office buildings, typically one million square feet or larger, the need of the carriers to manage the transmission spectrum available to them favors installing more small cell systems within various types of properties. Consequently, DAS systems will increasingly become part of carrier networks and more prevalent in facilities of all sizes in the future.

The legal issues in DAS agreements are similar to those that arise in cellular antenna leases, building wiring agreements and data center agreements.

GLOSSARY OF COMMON TELECOMMUNICATIONS TERMS

Bandwidth—A term used to describe the capacity of wiring to carry communications. Voice transmission requires 3,000 cycles per second. Video transmission requires 4.5 million cycles per second. A typical data transmission would involve many thousands or millions of bits per second.

Broadband—A communications channel having a bandwidth greater than a voice-grade channel, characterized by data transmission speed of 10 to 500 kilobytes per second or faster.

Bundled Services—The combination of several services, such as local telephone, long distance, Internet access and video, with a single bill to the customer.

Cable System—A multichannel video programming distribution facility consisting of a set of closed transmission paths and associated signal generation, reception and control equipment, designed to provide cable service (including video programming) to multiple subscribers within a community unless such system does not use any public rights-of-way.

Cell Site—The location of a cellular radio antenna typically consisting of three arrays of three antennas each pointed in different directions and covering all 360 degrees, together with a base station or equipment space where the transmission equipment is housed, one or two GPS antennas and wiring leading from the antennas to the base station and on to the street.

Central Office—Telephone company facility where customers' lines are joined to switching equipment for connecting other customers to each other, locally and for long distance.

CLEC (Competitive Local Exchange Carrier)—Usually refers to a facilities-based carrier as opposed to a reseller. A CLEC competes with the local exchange carrier and may provide services such as local telephone, long distance, Internet access and other services.

Coaxial Cable—A cable consisting of an outer conductor concentric to an inner conductor, separated from each other by insulating material. It can carry a much higher bandwidth than a copper twisted pair.

Copper (shorthand for copper wire)—Two insulated copper wires twisted around each other are called a twisted pair, which is the predominant type of telephone wire. Typical copper wiring is category 3, and that with a tighter twist is category 5. Category 5 copper has greater bandwidth and may be preferable for data transmission.

Demarcation Point (Demarc)—The point at which the service provider's network ends, which is usually, but not always, near the edge of the customer's premises.

Direct Broadcast Satellite (DBS)—A satellite transmitting TV programs which can be received by small and somewhat inexpensive dish antennas often installed in backyards or on the roofs of houses.

Fiber Optic Cable (Fiber)—The filaments of glass or other transparent materials sheathed in an insulator through which a light beam may be transmitted for long distances. Fiber is used to transmit digital information.

House and Riser—The wiring distribution system that leads from the basement to the upper floors of a building.

Inside Wiring—That wiring located within a subscriber's premises or building. Inside wiring starts at the service provider's demarcation point and extends to the individual phone extensions.

Internet Service Provider (ISP)—A company which provides an interface between the customer and the World Wide Web. By deploying special electronic equipment in a building, an ISP can offer tenants high-speed Internet access.

Kbps—Kilobytes per second.

LEC (Local Exchange Company)—The local phone company—which can be either a regional bell operating company (e.g., NYNEX, later Bell Atlantic and now merged with GTE to form Verizon) or an independent (e.g., GTE)—which provides local transmission services. Prior to divestiture, the LECs were called telephone companies or telcos.

Local Area Network (LAN)—A data communications network over a limited area, such as a building or corporate campus.

Mbps—Megabytes per second.

Personal Communications Services (PCS)—A digital wireless technology similar to cellular telephone services. Allows for personal phone numbers that can directly access phones, fax machines, beepers and computers. Requires many microcell sites, or radio relay stations with antennas.

Regional Bell Operating Company (RBOC)—The acronym used for local telephone companies created in 1984 as part of the breakup of AT&T. The three remaining RBOCs are Qwest, AT&T and Verizon.

Reseller—A company that buys services from a carrier at bulk rates and resells and bills customers under its own brand name.

Riser—The path between floors of a building through which telephone, cable and other utility cables run.

Satellite Master Antennas Television (SMATV)—SMATV systems are primarily rooftop satellite reception facilities that serve multi-dwelling establishments, such as apartment complexes, hotels and similar multi-unit buildings. SMATV service uses wire or cable to deliver signals received on the satellite antenna through the building.

Wi-Fi—Wireless data transmission for mobile devices at 1 to 100 mbps through wireless local area networks (WLAN) based on the IEEE 802.11 transmission standard.

Wi-MAX—Method of wireless data transmission for mobile devices similar to Wi-Fi but operating over longer distances (miles rather than feet) and with less interruption based on the IEEE 802.16 standard.

Wireless Cable System—A multichannel video distributor using microwave television transmission technology.

[27.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter surveys the law on assignment and subletting restrictions in leases. The author notes that for good reason, these clauses often require significant attention during lease negotiation. This chapter discusses some issues that practitioners should consider in drafting or negotiating these clauses for their clients. It also addresses issues of interpretation for tenants trying to understand how to escape from a lease they no longer want.

When landlords and tenants negotiate space leases,¹ those space leases will often prohibit² assignment, subletting, and potentially other similar transactions. Typically a landlord's first draft will allow almost no transactions of these types. A well-advised tenant will try to allow as much as possible without any need to go back to the landlord for consent. These negotiations often become a major focus of discussions.

Later, if a tenant finds its space lease no longer makes business sense, the tenant often will wish it had negotiated harder on these issues. A restriction that seemed to make sense when the parties negotiated their lease may no longer make sense, may give the landlord a revenue opportunity, and may create a corresponding burden for the tenant.

When an operating company enters into many leases for many locations, it may not want to devote the effort to negotiate each lease carefully, or it may focus more on operational issues than on unlikely future transactions.

Eventually, that operating company may become a target company in a corporate merger, acquisition, or other change in ownership. When that

1 A "space lease" usually means a lease of space the tenant uses for actual business operations, when the tenant is not in the development or real estate investment business. Space leases typically include office leases, with an original term of five to fifteen years, and retail leases, which can go much longer (at least for large spaces) after taking into account multiple extension options. The longer the lease term and the more limited the landlord's responsibilities, the closer the transaction comes to a "ground lease," in which the tenant regards its leasehold as a real estate investment. A ground lease typically will allow the tenant much more flexibility than a space lease, with few of the burdensome restrictions analyzed in this chapter at least after the tenant finishes any required initial construction.

2 This chapter treats a requirement to obtain the landlord's consent as equivalent to a prohibition because one should assume both roads will usually lead to the same place: the tenant's checkbook. In some states, however, a consent requirement may imply a "reasonableness" qualification, whereas an outright prohibition will not. These distinctions are, however, quite subtle, fact-specific, unpredictable, and unreliable. This chapter discusses all these issues below.

happens, the Assignment and Subletting Restrictions³ in the target company's leases may create issues for, and impede, a corporate transaction. In extreme cases, the leases may prevent a transaction from closing or increase the transaction's cost. Whether any of these problems arise will depend primarily on the exact words of the leases and what those words mean.

Therefore, if a target company holds important leases,⁴ the Assignment Restrictions in those leases may require substantial and very focused early attention in due diligence and contract negotiations. And any participant in a corporate transaction of this type, or any tenant under a major space lease that it no longer wants, will care very much about the answers to the following questions:⁵

- What should counsel look for when reviewing Assignment Restrictions in space leases?
- What do the more common Assignment Restrictions mean?
- How do Assignment Restrictions interact with mergers, equity transfers, or other particular types of corporate transactions?
- Do similar principles apply to restrictions on subletting?⁶
- Does a proposed transaction require the landlord's consent?

3 Part II.B, infra, defines the terms "Assignment," "Transfer," and "Subletting Restrictions."

4 If the company has only a few leases, has generic space requirements (so it could easily replace any lost leases), or has mostly at- or above-market rent under its leases, the parties may make a business decision not to worry about leases at all. As a practical matter, the likelihood of trouble under these circumstances seems fairly low, especially if the company has good relations with its landlords and those landlords are widely dispersed. On the other hand, if the company's value lies in its leases and their below-market rents (as a traditional example, a typical supermarket chain, although this may be less true now than it was in 2007), or if a single landlord owns many of the tenant's locations, the risk of claims by opportunistic landlords may turn these legal issues into the most important business issues in the deal. Exactly how to approach all these issues represents a strategic decision to be discussed with the client early in the transaction and confirmed in writing.

5 Similar issues arise for valuable contracts. No reason exists to think the answers would be dramatically different.

6 When faced with strict prohibitions on assignment, the parties, depending on the larger deal structure, instead sometimes can create a sublease to give the subtenant nearly the functional equivalent of an assignment. The question then becomes whether the lease prohibits, or requires the landlord's consent to, subleasing of this type. And when does a sublease amount to an assignment? This chapter does not consider that last question.

- If a transaction does require consent of the landlord, must the landlord be “reasonable” about granting or withholding consent?
- If so, what does “reasonable” mean?

This chapter tries to answer these questions to help landlords, tenants, and their counsel understand the issues in this area, both in drafting and negotiating leases and in structuring transfers of individual leases as well as corporate transactions that involve multiple leases.

Exit strategy issues like these have taken on particular urgency given the level of stress and uncertainty in American business since the financial crisis of 2007. These pressures have forced many institutions and companies—often on an urgent basis—to rethink their space requirements and how their restructuring, merger, sale, downsizing, or bankruptcy⁷ will affect their lease obligations. Thus, the issues this chapter addresses have become more timely and important than ever.

After summarizing the basic legal principles that govern Transfer Restrictions in leases, this chapter identifies some important categories of transfers, then analyzes how courts treat certain Transfer Restrictions that commonly appear in space leases.

This chapter also examines whether a tenant must obtain landlord consent to an assignment or subletting if the lease says nothing, and if so, whether a landlord must be reasonable regarding that consent. Also, when the lease or governing law requires a landlord to be “reasonable,” what does that mean?

This chapter considers both New York law and general American common law principles. It ultimately reconfirms the importance of precision in drafting and the need to thoughtfully consider, in the drafting stage, the parties’ intentions and expectations, along with how a court will respond to Transfer Restrictions, or the lack thereof, in a lease. This chapter concludes with lessons and practical advice for both landlords and tenants.

⁷ The federal bankruptcy law allows a debtor or its trustee to assume or reject unexpired leases. See 11 U.S.C. § 365. These provisions often override whatever the lease says, as well as some state law. Bankruptcy treatment of lease assignments lies outside the scope of this chapter. As in so many other areas of transactional law, however, bankruptcy provides the ultimate test (and the ultimate escape hatch) for any business document or transaction. Thus, every transactional lawyer must to some degree be a bankruptcy lawyer, or at least bankruptcy literate.

Understanding what Transfer Restrictions in leases mean and how the law treats these provisions represents the first step toward avoiding future roadblocks and headaches in this area for all parties involved.

[27.1] II. OVERVIEW AND SOME DEFINITIONS

[27.2] A. General Common Law Definitions

These general common law principles form the basic foundation and starting point for the present discussion:

- “Restrains on Alienation.” Restrictions against assignment and subletting are regarded as restraints on alienation, which the courts generally disfavor. The courts therefore construe these restrictions strictly, in favor of free alienability.⁸
- “Forms of Alienation.” A covenant against one form of alienation does not prohibit another form.⁹ For example, a covenant against assigning does not preclude subletting, pledging, or mortgaging.¹⁰

[27.3] B. Terms Used in This Chapter

Starting from those general principles, these defined terms will apply throughout the discussion:

- “Basic Assignment Restriction” refers to an ordinary, generic provision in a lease that generally prohibits a lease assignment or requires landlord consent for such an assignment. Any such restriction does not single out particular types of assignments or specify other types of transfers that are prohibited; it merely says the tenant may not assign the lease.

¹⁰ See id. If, however, the mortgagee or pledgee exercises its rights and remedies to bring about an absolute transfer, then the transaction usually will, and should, be deemed an assignment or transfer. In most cases, therefore, the safe harbor for a mortgage or pledge usually will not give a lender much comfort, because the lender usually will want to know it can safely realize on its collateral. On the other hand, if the lender merely wanted to achieve secured status for bankruptcy purposes, the lender might not care about this problem. In that case, counsel should consider the risks of imperfect memory on the part of clients.

- “Advanced Assignment Restriction” refers to a provision in a lease that prohibits particular types of assignments. For example, a restriction on the transfer of control of a corporation or assignment by “operation of law”¹¹ would constitute an Advanced Assignment Restriction.
- “Assignment Restriction” refers to Basic Assignment Restrictions and Advanced Assignment Restrictions together.
- “Subletting Restriction” refers to an ordinary, generic provision that generally prohibits any subletting of all or part of the leased property without landlord consent.
- “Transfer Restriction” refers to Assignment Restrictions and Subletting Restrictions together.

[27.4] C. Overview of Issues Addressed in This Chapter

This chapter addresses the following five issues of law and reaches the conclusions summarized below.¹² For any individual transaction, of course, the conclusions in this chapter will need to be confirmed, taking into account the specific facts, circumstances, leasing documents, and governing law at issue.

1. Stock Transfers

Q: Do Basic Assignment Restrictions prohibit stock transfers of a corporate tenant?

A: No, unless the lease contains an Advanced Assignment Restriction that specifically prohibits such transfers.¹³

2. Assignments by Operation of Law

Q: Do Basic Assignment Restrictions prohibit assignments by “operation of law”?

11 This chapter examines what operation of law means. See infra Part IV.

12 The discussion generally refers only to corporate tenants. Limited liability company (LLC) tenants and partnership tenants likely would be treated the same as corporations for this purpose, but this likelihood has not been tested or researched for the present discussion. For reasons this chapter will make amply clear, landlords should address these points in their leases expressly if the tenant is, or could become, some type of entity.

13 See infra Part III.

A: No. An assignment by operation of law will not violate the lease unless the lease contains an Advanced Assignment Restriction that specifically prohibits an assignment by operation of law.¹⁴

3. Mergers

Q: Do Basic Assignment Restrictions prohibit mergers of a corporate tenant?

A: No. A corporate merger will not violate the lease unless the lease contains an Advanced Assignment Restriction specifically prohibiting mergers—either explicitly or as assignments or transfers by operation of law.¹⁵

4. Requirement for Consent If Lease Is Silent

Q: If a lease contains no Transfer Restriction, must the tenant obtain the landlord's consent before assigning or subletting?

A: Most jurisdictions favor free transferability and do not require a tenant to obtain a landlord's consent if the lease does not require it. A minority of jurisdictions require landlord consent before a tenant can assign or sublet even if the lease says nothing.¹⁶

5. Reasonableness in Denying Consent

Q: If a Transfer Restriction sets no standard for the landlord's consent, must the landlord act reasonably in refusing consent? If so, what standard of "reasonableness" must the landlord meet?

A: Only a minority of jurisdictions require landlords to be reasonable. Even where the courts require it, no single standard defines "reasonableness." Numerous cases offer some clues, which this chapter will discuss.¹⁷

Although the above answers represent majority views on these issues, plenty of exceptions and minority views—some of which amount to emerging trends—exist for some of these issues. Moreover, any individual judge usually can find some basis to decide any particular case in whatever way the judge sees fit. Any potential participant in a transaction therefore should consult current case law in each applicable jurisdiction. Finally, in negotiating leases and corporate transactional documents, the parties should not leave these issues for a court to decide. They should carefully consider, negotiate, and address all these issues in their documents, and very likely even at the term sheet stage before they start to draft or negotiate documents.

[27.5] III. STOCK TRANSFERS

Under general legal principles, the sale or transfer of a corporate tenant's stock does not violate a Basic Assignment Restriction¹⁸ because a corporation exists separately from its stockholders, and courts generally have found a landlord who enters into a lease with a corporate tenant should be deemed to know about such separate existence.¹⁹ A corporation's separate legal existence is hardly a deep, dark secret that tenants conceal from innocent and naïve landlords. Thus, while owners of a corporation may transfer the company's stock, this transaction does not 18 See In re Ames Dep't Stores, Inc., 127 B.R. 744, 748 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1991) ("In Illinois, it is settled that the transfer of all of the stock issued by a tenant corporation does not effect an assignment of the tenant's lease unless the lease so provides."); Ser-Bye Corp. v. C. P. & G. Markets, Inc., 179 P.2d 342, 345 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1947) ("The inhibitions against assignment run as to the lease itself and not to the stock in the lessee corporation by one or more stockholders. When, therefore, it was covenanted that the lessee should not 'assign the leasehold estate' the lease as an entirety was meant, and not merely shares of stock in the lessee corporation.") App. Ct. 1975) ("When a [shareholder] transfers all of [a corporation's] stock, the control of the corporation is also transferred, but the legal entity of the corporate lessee remains the same."); see also U.S. Cellular Inv. Co. v. GTE Mobilnet, Inc., 281 F.3d 929, 934–36 (9th Cir. 2002) (limited partnership agreement restriction on a corporation's sale of its general partnership interest does not restrict sale of stock by stockholders of that corporate partner); Richardson v. La Rancherita La Jolla, Inc., 159 Cal. Rptr. 285, 289 (Ct. App. 1979) (sale of all shares of stock in lessee corporation does not violate antiassignment clause); Burrows Motor Co. v. Davis, 76 A.2d 163, 165 (D.C. 1950) (transfer of majority of stock in lessee corporation producing change in control does not violate antiassignment clause); Posner v. Air Brakes & Equip. Corp., 62 A.2d 711, 713 (N.J. Super. Ct. Ch. Div. 1948) (a tenant corporation's becoming wholly owned by or a subsidiary of another corporation "does not under the circumstances of this case constitute an assignment of the lease or an underletting of the premises by the lessee").

change the actual tenant under the lease, which was, is, and remains exactly the same corporation.²⁰

Courts apply this rule even when a landlord previously disapproves a proposed lease assignment, and the rejected assignee then proceeds to purchase the stock of the corporate tenant²¹—a transparent and brazen attempt to get around the assignment prohibition.²² In the few New York cases on point, the courts have generally followed the precedent of other jurisdictions.²³

A landlord, if it wants, may try to prohibit a de facto assignment of the lease through a stock transfer. To do this, the landlord must draft an Advanced Assignment Restriction specifically forbidding transfer of control of the tenant corporation.²⁴ Although such provisions have been 20 See Branmar Theatre Co. v. Branmar, Inc., 264 A.2d 526, 529 (Del. Ch. 1970) (“[T]he rule that precludes a person from doing indirectly what he cannot do directly has no application to the present case. The attempted assignment was . . . by plaintiff corporation, the sale of stock by its stockholders.”). Although courts refuse to treat a stock sale as an implied lease assignment, the New York State and New York City tax rules take a different approach. By statute, New York treats the transfer of a “controlling interest” in an entity that owns real estate as an implied transfer of the real estate. N.Y. Tax Law § 1401(b), (e); New York City Admin. Code §§ 11-2101(6)–(9), 11-2102(a). A 2008 New York decision extends the transfer of a controlling interest to include a change of voting control even if ownership percentages do not change. See CBS Corp. v. Tax Appeals Trib. of State of N.Y., 56 A.D.3d 908, 867 N.Y.S.2d 270 (3d Dep’t 2008). The New York tax collectors will look all the way up the chain of entities, even if (for example) a great-great-grandparent entity is an offshore entity that does not operate in New York. They may then assess any unpaid transfer tax against the entity that owns New York real estate.

21 See In re Ames Dep’t Stores, 127 B.R. at 749; see also Burrows Motor Co., 76 A.2d at 164.

22 The court in Alabama Vermiculite Corp. v. Patterson, 124 F. Supp. 441 (D.S.C. 1954), responded to the argument that tenants should not be able to use corporate stock transfers to “get around” assignment restrictions. The court saw no reason to deny stockholders the right to transfer stock solely because the result was an indirect transfer of the lease, which the lease would have prohibited if the tenant were an individual. See id. at 445.

23 See Rubinstein Bros., 101 Misc. 2d at 568 (“[T]he rule [of the cases previously cited] makes sense. A landlord entering a lease with a corporate tenant should be presumed to know that it is an artificial entity with a life distinct from the individuals who may from time to time be its owners.”); see also Gasparre v. 88-36 Elmhurst Ave. Realty Corp., 464 N.Y.S.2d 106 (Sup. Ct., Queens Co. 1983) (extending Rubinstein to hold that transfer of stock of corporate property owner does not constitute sale of property under due-on-sale clause).

24 See U.S. Cellular, 281 F.3d at 936 (“Had the partners intended that the sale of stock of a corporate partner be restricted, such intent could easily have been stated.”). For an example of such a lease provision, see Brentsun Realty Corp. v. D’Urso Supermarkets, 182 A.D.2d 604, 582 N.Y.S.2d 216 (2d Dep’t 1992) (lease drafted by landlord stated that transfer or sale of 50% or more of corporate tenant’s stock would constitute an assignment and require landlord’s consent).

For example, a clause that prohibits the transfer of existing stock in a corporation may be held to allow the creation and sale of new stock, even though the issuance of that new stock will change control of the corporation.²⁷

Although New York courts have not considered Advanced Assignment Restrictions specifically prohibiting the transfer of a corporate tenant's stock, cases suggest such clauses would be enforceable under New York law.²⁸ That proposition may not apply, though, for a corporation with many shareholders. For example, a court disregarded such restrictions in a case where, when the parties signed their lease, more than a dozen shareholders owned 40% or more of the corporation's stock.²⁹ Rather than rely on the next court to reach a similar result, well-represented tenants will often ask landlords to carve out from Advanced Assignment Restrictions any limit on initial public offerings or transfers of publicly held stock.

27 See Friedman, supra note 9, § 7:3.3[C][1]. To avoid ambiguity when trying to prevent changes in corporate control, Friedman recommends landlords draft nonassignment clauses in the following form (which may require updating or modification in particular cases or for "Plain English" comprehensibility):

An assignment, forbidden within the meaning of this [section], shall be deemed to include one or more sales or transfers, by operation of law or otherwise, or creation of new stock, by which an aggregate of more than 50% of Tenant's stock shall be vested in a party or parties who are nonstockholders as of the date hereof. This paragraph shall not apply if Tenant's stock is listed on a recognized security exchange. For the purpose of this paragraph, stock ownership shall be determined in accordance with the principles set forth in Section 544 of the Internal Revenue Code of 1954 as the same existed on August 16, 1954.

29 See Friedman, supra note 9, § 7:3.3(C)(1).

If the tenant is an LLC, and the lease prohibits stock transfers or partnership transfers but says nothing about transfers of LLC membership interests, the courts might allow a transfer of the LLC interests. Courts dislike Assignment Restrictions and will construe them strictly. Therefore, courts probably would hold that if the landlord wanted to prohibit transfer of LLC interests, the landlord should have said so in the lease. If that is true, it places quite a burden on any landlord whose lease was drafted before Wyoming introduced America to the LLC.

[27.6] IV. ASSIGNMENTS BY OPERATION OF LAW

Many commercial leases prohibit assignments by “operation of law.” To understand these restrictions, one first must define an assignment by operation of law. The Sixth Edition of Black’s Law Dictionary defines operation of law as “the manner in which rights, and sometimes liabilities, devolve upon a person by the mere application to the particular transaction of the established rules of law, without the act or cooperation of the party himself.”³⁰ The Eighth Edition of Black’s Law Dictionary defines operation of law as “the means by which a right or a liability is created for a party regardless of the party’s actual intent.”³¹

“Operation of law” thus refers to the transfer of rights or liabilities by court order, statute, or the like—as opposed to a voluntary and express transfer made by a party. Assignments by operation of law would include the transition of a tenant’s lease rights to the executor of the estate of a deceased tenant,³² to a legatee,³³ to a tenant’s trustee in bankruptcy³⁴ or receiver,³⁵ or through a judicial sale.³⁶ The passage of a corporate tenant’s lease to a successor tenant through a merger of the corporate tenant also is regarded as being by operation of law.³⁷

Like transfers of all the stock of a corporate tenant, assignments by operation of law do not violate Basic Assignment Restrictions.³⁸ Basic Assignment Restrictions are said to bar only affirmative voluntary acts by the tenant.³⁹ Because assignments by operation of law are not the assignors' voluntary acts, Basic Assignment Restrictions do not prohibit them.⁴⁰ As one possible exception to this rule, courts might not allow assignments by operation of law that were demonstrably arranged specifically to circumvent a Basic Assignment Restriction.⁴¹ Even then, courts would not necessarily interfere, because courts often are quite willing to endorse transactions that brazenly seek to "get around" Basic Assignment Restrictions, as discussed above.⁴²

As with other types of assignments, a landlord can prohibit assignments by operation of law by using Advanced Assignment Restrictions.⁴³ Again, such restrictions must be drafted with extreme specificity and clarity because most courts disfavor them and will construe them strictly against the landlord.⁴⁴

Absent an Advanced Assignment Restriction that specifically refers to transfers by operation of law, tenants generally can take comfort that such transfers should not run afoul of Basic Assignment Restrictions in their lease.

[27.7] V. MERGERS

Few courts have considered whether the merger of a corporate tenant violates a Basic Assignment Restriction.⁴⁵ The courts that have considered the question typically have treated these transactions as constituting transfers by operation of law, not voluntary assignments.⁴⁶ As a result, such transfers do not violate Basic Assignment Restrictions.⁴⁷ One New York court reasoned:

[T]he merger of the subsidiary corporation into its parent corporation did not constitute an assignment for purposes of violating the nonassignment covenant in the lease. The merger did not change the beneficial ownership, possession, or control of [the subsidiary's] property or leasehold estate. Only [the subsidiary's] corporate form was affected, not the corporate property. Therefore, no assignment or similar transfer of the lease occurred.⁴⁸

Although most jurisdictions agree that Basic Assignment Restrictions do not prohibit mergers of corporate tenants, courts disagree over whether to classify the change of ownership of a leasehold estate through a merger as an actual assignment of the lease, or as a mere transfer by operation of law. The wording of the restriction in any particular lease (in the context of a particular state's law) can become quite important. The wording of the merger closing documents also may play a role.

45 See Friedman, supra note 9, § 7:3.3(E)(2).

46 See Middendorf v. Fuqua Indus., Inc., 623 F.2d 13, 16 (6th Cir. 1980) (“[T]he effect under Ohio law of the merger of [two corporations] was to transfer the leasehold by operation of law and not by assignment.”).

St. Louis Nat'l Baseball Club*, 238 S.W.2d 321, 325 (Mo. 1951) (“The merged corporation having succeeded to the rights of the original lessee by operation of law, it follows that there was no assignment within the prohibition of the covenant in question”); Segal v. Greater Valley Terminal Corp., 199 A.2d 48, 50 (N.J. Super. Ct. App. Div. 1964) (“In authorizing a corporate merger, the Legislature provided that the rights, privileges, powers, franchises ‘and all and every other interest’ of each component corporation shall vest in the successor corporation. R.S. 14:12-5, N.J.S.A. The passage of such interests under the statute, whether labeled an assignment, sublease, or transfer, is by operation of law, and it will not operate as a breach of a covenant barring assignment.”).

Under a strict construction of Basic Assignment Restrictions, courts would prohibit mergers only if mergers pass rights through assignments rather than through mere transfers by operation of law. This question of construction becomes quite important given that most modern Assignment Restrictions specifically prohibit assignments by operation of law. Most courts that have considered this question of construction answer it by saying that a prohibition on assignments by operation of law does prohibit mergers.⁴⁹ For example, an Oregon court stated:

Although there is “meager authority” addressing the effect on a nonassignment clause of mergers by corporate tenants, where such clauses prohibit transfers “by operation of law,” such mergers are a breach of the nonassignment clause “if the effect is to transfer the lease to an entity other than that of the original tenant” even though no interest in property is impaired by the merger.⁵⁰

Other courts, however, have held that mergers, although “transfers” by operation of law, are not “assignments” of any kind and therefore such clauses do not reach them.⁵¹ Given the hostility of most courts toward restraints on alienation, it is unclear whether courts will continue to follow the majority rule or adopt the second, more tenant-friendly view.

Landlords that wish to prohibit mergers of their corporate tenants therefore should do so specifically, prohibiting both mergers in particular and all transfers, subleases, or assignments made by operation of law in general, in order to prohibit mergers under either reading. And a tenant 49 See Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Barlow Corp., 456 A.2d 1283, 1289 (Md. 1983) (“The nonassignment clause used . . . in the lease of the subject premises may be characterized as of the strict type. Its inclusion of assignments by operation of law embraces transfers by merger.”).

51 See Albermarle, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 357 S.E.2d 887, 888 (Ga. Ct. App. 1987) (surviving corporation after merger more accurately described as successor than assignee); Standard Operations Inc. v. Montague, 758 S.W.2d 442, 443 (Mo. 1988) (“The present lease makes use of the phrase, ‘operation of law,’ which was used in the Dodier opinion to describe the transaction we found not to be covered, but continues to use the term, ‘assignment,’ which we there found to be an inappropriate description of the effect of a merger.”); Sante Fe Energy Res., Inc. v. Manners, 635 A.2d 648, 649 (Pa. Super. Ct. 1993) (characterizing a transfer of rights of action and property pursuant to a merger properly as succession, not assignment). The Standard Operations court justifies this conclusion under the theory that forfeitures must be viewed with disfavor and therefore the governing documents must be interpreted as strictly as possible.

should try equally hard to assure that any lease with Assignment Restrictions expressly permits mergers.

Given the cases just discussed, a corporate tenant planning a merger might not want to execute a document entitled “Assignment Agreement” or in any other way suggest in the merger documentation that anyone ever assigned any lease. The tenant later may wish to assert that the transaction merely amounted to a change in the identity of the tenant but in no way an assignment of the lease or a violation of a prohibition against assignments by operation of law. Making this argument might be difficult if the parties executed an Assignment Agreement. Therefore, the parties may want to name the document “Merger Implementation Agreement” or “Succession of Lease,” or to let the merger speak for itself—a reasonable position if, in fact, the parties believe the lease was never transferred and the merger did whatever it did without an assignment of the lease.

A careful purchaser of a corporate tenant should, however, consider the possibility that any merger might be deemed a prohibited assignment by operation of law—even if the closing documents try to portray the transaction as something else—and should proceed accordingly.

[27.8] VI. REQUIREMENT FOR CONSENT IF LEASE IS SILENT

Unless a lease expressly restricts the tenant’s right to assign its leasehold interest, most jurisdictions hold that the tenant may freely assign.⁵² Many state legislatures have codified this result.⁵³ A handful of states adopt the opposite view, providing by statute that a tenant cannot transfer its leasehold estate without the landlord’s consent even if the lease says nothing on the issue.⁵⁴

52 See Joseph Bros. Co. v. F.W. Woolworth Co., 641 F. Supp. 822 (N.D. Ohio 1985), modified, 844 F.2d 369, 374 (6th Cir. 1988) (tenant did not need landlord’s consent to sublease absent restriction in lease); Jenkins v. Eckerd Corp., 913 So.2d 43, 50 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 2005); Cole v. Ignatius, 448 N.E.2d 538, 541 (Ill. App. Ct. 1983); Dress Shirt Sales, Inc. v. Hotel Martinique Assocs., 12 N.Y.2d 339, 239 N.Y.S.2d 660 (1963); International Chefs Inc. v. Corporate Prop. Investors, 240 A.D.2d 369, 658 N.Y.S.2d 108 (2d Dep’t 1997); see also Restatement (Second) of Prop: Landlord & Tenant § 15.1 (1977).

53 See, e.g., Del. Code Ann. tit. 25, § 5512(a) (1989 & Supp. 2008); La. Civ. Code Ann. art. 2713 (2005). Other statutes set tenant-friendly rules for residential leases, but those lie beyond this discussion.

54 See, e.g., Alaska Stat. § 34.03.060 (2008); Ga. Code Ann. § 44-7-1 (1991); S.C. Code Ann. § 27-35-60 (2007); Texas Prop. Code Ann. § 91.005 (Vernon 2007) (tenant may not assign without landlord’s consent); Wis. Stat. Ann. § 704.09(1) (West 2001).

Courts generally disfavor restrictions on alienability and typically will refuse to find any implied restrictions.⁵⁵ In practice, therefore, leases are rarely entirely silent on the issue of transferability. Leases almost always seek to restrict the tenant's power to transfer his or her leasehold interest. Few commercial landlords or their counsel will tolerate silence on assignment restrictions in a lease.

[27.9] VII. REASONABLENESS IN DENYING CONSENT

[27.10] A. Whether Required

In most states, including New York, the rule remains that if a lease prohibits assignment or subletting without the landlord's consent, the landlord may refuse consent arbitrarily and for any or no reason at all—and may even extract payment as a condition for consent⁵⁶—unless the lease specifically requires any refusal of consent to be reasonable.⁵⁷ Under the 55 See Mann Theatres Corp. v. Mid-Island Shopping Plaza Co., 94 A.D.2d 466, 464 N.Y.S.2d 793 (2d Dep't 1983). For two rare examples of courts inferring restrictions on transferability, see Stacy v. Midstates Oil Corp., 36 So. 2d 714, 720 (La. 1947) (lease allowed removal of minerals, and court concluded that an increase in the number of persons extracting minerals would impose a burden on landlord's estate); Nassau Hotel Co. v. Barnett & Barse Corp., 162 A.D. 381, 147 N.Y.S. 283 (1st Dep't 1914) (tenant was experienced hotel operator paying percentage rent).

56 See Alwen v. Tramontin, 228 P. 851, 852 (Wash. 1924) (enforcing a lease provision requiring tenant to pay a fee for landlord's consent to assignment in a jurisdiction that does not require a landlord to act reasonably in withholding consent). But see Banc of Am. Secs. LLC v. Solow Bldg. Co. II, L.L.C., 47 A.D.3d 239, 847 N.Y.S.2d 49 (1st Dep't 2007) (landlord's demand for a large payment as a condition to consenting to tenant's alterations treated as quasi-tortious monetary harm absent lease provision requiring fee; holding based less on the words of the lease than on a tort-like analysis of landlord's acts).

57 Courts (although not necessarily all courts) in these jurisdictions have adopted this majority rule: Colorado, Connecticut, Delaware, Georgia, Indiana, Kentucky, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Michigan, Minnesota, Nebraska, New Hampshire, New Jersey, New York, North Dakota, Ohio, Pennsylvania, South Carolina, Texas, Vermont, and Washington. Because of the frequency with which this issue arises and the likelihood of changes in the law, the preceding list (which was based on limited research) should not be relied upon. For a description of cases in some of these jurisdictions, see James C. McLoughlin, Annotation, When Lessor May Withhold Consent Under Unqualified Provision in Lease Prohibiting Assignment or Subletting of Leased Premises Without Lessor's Consent, 21 A.L.R.4th 188, § 3 (2004).

traditional majority rule, a landlord bears no obligation to act “reasonably” or “in good faith” in considering a request for such consent.⁵⁸

A small but growing minority of jurisdictions hold, however, that a landlord must act reasonably in withholding consent even if the lease does not require reasonableness. One commentator suggested the following basis for this trend:

The reasoning behind the rule allowing nearly total landlord control over tenant transfers, in the absence of a lease provision to the contrary, no longer holds sway with many judges, lawmakers, and commentators. Relationships between landlord and tenant have become more impersonal These changes and concerns have had a profound impact on courts and legislatures [M]odern courts have almost universally adopted the view that restrictions on the tenant’s right to transfer are to be strictly construed.⁵⁹

58 In New York, at least, the courts apply similar principles in interpreting and applying any contract that requires the other party’s consent but does not expressly require the other party to act reasonably. See, e.g., State St. Bank & Trust Co. v Inversiones Errazuriz Limitada, 374 F.3d 158 (2d Cir. 2004); Teachers Ins. & Annuity Ass’n of Am. v. Wometco Enters., Inc., 833 F. Supp. 344 (S.D.N.Y. 1993). These cases teach that New York courts will not infer a reasonableness requirement from some kind of implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. In State Street Bank, the party withholding consent demanded payment in exchange for consent, and the court specifically allowed that. See 374 F.3d at 169. Texas also has refused to infer a general duty of good faith and fair dealing in real property contracts. See Trinity Prof’l Plaza Assocs. v. Metrocrest Hosp. Auth., 987 S.W.2d 621, 625–26 (Tex. App. 1999).

Florida and Illinois, among other states,⁶⁰ have adopted this position. California codified a presumption of reasonableness for purposes of ascertaining whether a landlord's consent was reasonable, and placed the burden of proof on the tenant to determine otherwise.⁶¹ The California statute allows the parties to contract around this presumption by setting express standards in the lease.⁶²

A 2005 California federal court case⁶³ restated this rule by holding that when the contract unambiguously grants one party an unqualified right, "in its sole discretion, to terminate the negotiations with any prospective [s]ubtenant or assignee at any time and to refuse to enter into any sublease or with any prospective subtenant,"⁶⁴ that party can not only refuse to 60 Courts, though not necessarily all courts, in these jurisdictions have adopted this minority rule: Alabama, Alaska, Arizona, Arkansas, California, Colorado, Connecticut, District of Columbia, Florida, Georgia, Idaho, Illinois, Louisiana, Maryland, Massachusetts, Nebraska, New Mexico, North Carolina, Ohio, Oregon, and Tennessee. Because of the frequency with which this issue arises and the likelihood of changes in the law, the preceding list (based on limited research) should not be relied upon. For a description of cases in some of these jurisdictions, see James C. McLoughlin, Annotation, When Lessor May Withhold Consent Under Unqualified Provision in Lease Prohibiting Assignment or Subletting of Leased Premises Without Lessor's Consent, 21 A.L.R.4th 188, § 3 (2004). See also Pacific First Bank v. New Morgan Park Corp., 876 P.2d 761, 762 (Or. 1994) (applying contractual duty of good faith to lease agreements, which requires adherence to reasonable expectations of parties—a standard that may in practice leave it all up to the judge, potentially many years after the fact); Cafeteria Operators, L.P. v. AMCAP/ Denver Ltd. P'ship, 972 P.2d 276, 278 (Colo. Ct. App. 1998) ("[W]ithout a freely negotiated provision in the lease giving the landlord an absolute right to withhold consent, a landlord's decision to withhold must be reasonable."); Restatement (Second) of Prop.: Landlord & Tenant § 15.2(2) (1977) (lease may prohibit lessee's assignment without lessor's consent, but lessor may not withhold consent unreasonably unless a freely negotiated provision confers absolute discretion on lessor).

61 See Cal. Civ. Code §§ 1995.010–1995.340. Other states also have enacted statutes providing that a landlord cannot unreasonably withhold consent to a transfer by the tenant. See Alaska Stat. § 34.03.060 (commercial and residential leases); Del. Code. Ann. tit. 25, § 5508(c) (residential leases). In New York, a landlord cannot unreasonably refuse consent to assignment of a residential lease but may withhold consent arbitrarily for commercial leases. See N.Y. Real Prop. Law § 226-b.

62 Well-represented landlords presumably will do so. Hence, each lease now may contain yet another state-specific paragraph, probably in all capital letters and requiring the parties to add their initials to prove they were awake. And leases will grow a little bit longer yet again.

63 See Turkus v. Egreetings Network, Inc., 2005 WL 2333834 (N.D. Cal. Sept. 19, 2005). The court also restated the rule that "where a discretionary right in a contract i[s] unambiguous, a party may not invoke the implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing." Id. at *4 n.3. This case involved a real-estate-related consent right other than the typical landlord's right to consent to a sublease, but the same principles should apply.

enter into any sublease proposals but also can refuse even to consider any and all proposed sublease agreements.⁶⁵

As in so many other areas, New York diverges from California and follows the majority rule, tending to prefer private negotiations over judicial improvement (and often rewriting) of privately negotiated agreements. If a New York lease contains a Transfer Restriction, the landlord need not be reasonable in refusing consent unless the lease language specifically so requires.⁶⁶ Absent an agreement otherwise, a New York landlord may impose conditions, including payment, as a prerequisite to consent.⁶⁷ (One court, however, held such conditions may amount to economic duress,⁶⁸ demonstrating yet again how these outcomes can depend on the particular judge rather than the consistent application of predictable legal principles, even in New York.) Like other restrictions on alienation of property, though, Transfer Restrictions are disfavored. Therefore, courts will construe such clauses strictly against any restrictions on alienation.⁶⁹

[27.11] B. What Constitutes Reasonableness

Even if a Transfer Restriction or governing law requires a landlord to act “reasonably” or not “unreasonably” in withholding consent, it is not at all clear what “reasonable” means. Although landlords cannot seize on absolutely any creative excuse to withhold consent, no single rule or set of rules for defining reasonableness exists.

The question of “reasonableness” therefore generally remains an issue for the trier of fact to decide,⁷⁰ with the result that consistent legal principles—or predictable results—are quite hard to find in this area. Friedman wrote: “What is ‘reasonable’ at one time may not be at another.”⁷¹ This standard requires the factfinder to consider whether a reasonably prudent person in the landlord’s position would have withheld consent.⁷² Considerations of mere personal taste and convenience—personal idiosyncrasies of the landlord—probably are not reasonable.⁷³ The test of reasonableness is an objective one, based on the standard of a reasonable prudent person without considering the particular circumstances or agenda of the landlord.⁷⁴

Despite the nebulous nature of the reasonableness standard, the court in *American Book Co. v. Yeshiva University Development Foundation, Inc.*⁷⁵ set forth a nonexhaustive list of objective standards for determining reasonableness. Other courts have followed them.⁷⁶ These standards:

are readily measurable criteria of a proposed subtenant's or assignee's acceptability, from the point of view of any landlord:

- (a) financial responsibility [of the proposed subtenant]⁷⁷
- (b) the “identity” or “business character” of the subtenant—i.e. his suitability for the particular building

74 Tenet v. Jefferson Parish Med. Ctr., 426 F.3d 738, 743 (5th Cir. 2005). In this well-reasoned Fifth Circuit case, a real estate investor leased space to a tenant for a medical use. The lease said the landlord would not unreasonably withhold consent to an assignment. The original landlord sold the property to a hospital. The original tenant proposed to assign to a different type of medical use, one the lease would allow but that would compete with the hospital in ways the previous tenant would not have. The hospital, as the new landlord, withheld consent based on concern about competition. See id. at 740. The hospital argued that: (a) reasonableness depends in part on the identity and circumstances of the landlord at the moment the tenant requests the landlord's consent and (b) if the current landlord wants to protect itself from competition, that constitutes a reasonable basis to withhold consent. See id. at 742–44. The court disagreed, stating: “In determining whether a landlord's refusal to consent was reasonable in a commercial context, only factors that relate to the landlord's interest in preserving the leased property or in having the terms of [the] prime lease performed should be considered.” Id. at 743. The court also reasoned that a future landlord's ability to tighten the scope of permitted assignments based on circumstances peculiar to that landlord would amount to an expansion of the landlord's rights under the lease without the tenant's consent. See id. at 744. (Of course, this court also would not have allowed the original landlord to assert its own personal circumstances, see id. at 744, so the argument carries little additional weight.) See also Logan & Logan, Inc. v. Audrey Lane Laufer, LLC, 34 A.D.3d 539, 539, 824 N.Y.S.2d 650 (2d Dep't 2006) (if a landlord has agreed not to unreasonably withhold consent, the landlord may consider only “objective factors such as the financial responsibility of the [proposed assignee], the [proposed assignee's] suitability for the particular building, the legality of the proposed use and the nature of occupancy”); *Sayed v. 77 This item is perhaps more important than ever in an era when creditworthy financial institutions commonly vanish over a weekend.

- (c) the legality of the proposed use⁷⁸
- (d) the nature of the occupancy—i.e. office, factory, clinic, or whatever.⁷⁹

Starting with the first criterion suggested above, a landlord probably acts reasonably in refusing consent unless the tenant gives the landlord reasonable evidence that the proposed assignee is ready, willing, and able to perform under the lease.⁸⁰ A reasonable belief (supported by reasonable evidence) that a proposed assignee cannot pay the rent should almost always give a landlord reasonable grounds to deny consent.⁸¹ A landlord also almost always should be deemed reasonable in refusing consent if the proposed assignee does not deliver adequate financial information in a timely manner so that the landlord can ascertain whether the proposed assignee is financially responsible.⁸²

Other considerations can, however, sometimes outweigh financial responsibility. For example, a landlord's refusal to allow financially 78 If the proposed assignee or subtenant would or might use the premises in violation of the lease (whether the use clause, an obligation to comply with law, or any other lease terms), why shouldn't the landlord be relegated to its rights and remedies if and when a violation actually occurs? Why should this discussion be a component of reasonableness at all? The answer may be that the courts cannot be relied upon to enforce the landlord's rights and remedies for a nonmonetary breach, and therefore the landlord should be able to point to the likelihood of such a breach as a reason to withhold consent. And an ordinary, objectively motivated landlord would have precisely that concern, so it fits into the template of reasonableness.

80 See Golf Mgmt. Co. v. Evening Tides Waterbeds, Inc., 572 N.E.2d 1000 (Ill. App. Ct. 1991). One can determine what makes an assignee ready, willing, and able from, for example, Vranas & Assocs., Inc. v. Family Pride Finer Foods, Inc., 498 N.E.2d 333 (Ill. App. Ct. 1986) (a buyer is ready, willing, and able, for purposes of a purchase and sale contract, if the buyer has sufficient resources on hand or can command necessary funds within the required time).

81 But see Ring v. Mpath Interactive, 302 F. Supp. 2d 301, 306 (S.D.N.Y. 2004) (landlord's unsubstantiated assertion that some unspecified documents showed subtenant to be a financial risk constitutes an unreasonable refusal of consent); see also Friedman, supra note 9, § 7:3.4[D][3]. Friedman points out "[i]nasmuch as neither assignment nor subletting releases the original tenant from his lease obligations, it may be argued that the landlord has all he bargained for regardless of the wealth or skill of the assignee or subtenant." Id. Friedman notes, however, that the little relevant authority on the issue has held that the landlord is entitled to a responsible assignee. See id. In practice, landlords prefer a financially responsible assignee or subtenant to minimize the likelihood of default and litigation against the tenant, even though the tenant will remain liable on the lease. That preference generally is accepted and taken seriously in the real estate industry.

82 See 200 Eighth Ave. Rest. Corp. v. Daytona Holding Corp., 293 A.D.2d 353, 740 N.Y.S.2d 330 (1st Dep't 2002) (noting financial information later submitted by proposed assignee showed proposed assignee was not financially capable of assuming lease obligations).

responsible parties as multiple subtenants was upheld when subdivision of the leased space would have been undesirable in a “prestige building.”⁸³

Although the second factor listed above, the “identity” or “business character” of the subtenant/assignee, may be used as a reasonable basis for a landlord to reject an assignment, landlords asserting this argument bear a heavy burden of proof.⁸⁴

One New York case involved an Assignment Restriction that required the landlord to be reasonable, but stated that the landlord could consider the “business reputation of the proposed assignee or subtenant,” as well as “the effect that the proposed assignee or subtenant’s occupancy or use of the demised premises would have upon the operation and maintenance of the building and the landlord’s investment therein.”⁸⁵ Although the court in that case began by analyzing the factors listed above, it rejected the landlord’s substantial evidence that assignment to a financially responsible bank with an alleged “bad business reputation” would lower the value of the property.⁸⁶ This case reflects judicial skepticism of landlords who turn down assignments based on allegedly bad characteristics of the assignee.

Courts have, however, held that a landlord reasonably may deny consent under these circumstances:

83 Time, Inc. v. Tager, 46 Misc. 2d 658, 260 N.Y.S.2d 413 (Civ. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1965). Here, the tenant sought the landlord’s consent to sublet part of the leased space to a subtenant. The court found the landlord’s decision to withhold consent reasonable, even though after terminating the lease with the tenant, the landlord proceeded to rent the space to the same proposed subtenant. See id.

84 See Ernst Home Ctr. v. John Y. Sato, 910 P.2d 486, 493 (Wash. Ct. App. 1996) (while tone and image are valid considerations, landlord must be able not only to express (concoct?) appropriate concerns but also to “produce evidence that a trier of fact could examine objectively”). But see Mowatt v. 1540 Lake Shore Drive Corp., 385 F.2d 135, 137–38 (7th Cir. 1967) (landlord was reasonable in withholding consent based on criteria such as insolvency, association with disreputable people, and noisiness, which would be undesirable characteristics of cotenants). The lease in Mowatt was residential, but the court’s reasoning does demonstrate criteria to assess a landlord’s reasonableness. See id.

86 Id. Chase Manhattan wanted to assign its lease to Bank Leumi. The landlord rejected the assignment, saying Bank Leumi had a “bad business reputation,” was plagued by “image problems,” and was “simply not a Chase Manhattan.” As evidence, the landlord introduced (among other things) news articles on indictments of several of the bank’s low-level officers and economic problems and stock scandals in Israel, Bank Leumi’s home country. The landlord also presented affidavits by real estate attorneys and appraisers that a Bank Leumi tenancy would lower the value of the building. Presumably the tenant offered competing affidavits from other attorneys and appraisers.

- A landlord is unaware of the assignee's proposed use;⁸⁷
- A proposed subtenant would compete with other businesses in the same shopping center, prejudicing the landlord's relationship with other tenants;⁸⁸
- Gross sales, and thus percentage rents, would drop (in the case of a percentage lease);⁸⁹ and

The mix of tenants is critical to the success of the landlord, such as in a shopping center.⁹⁰

Unreasonable grounds for denial, as found by courts, include:

- A proposed subtenant would compete with the landlord's business;⁹¹

88 See Kenney v. Eddygate Park Assocs., 34 A.D.3d 1017, 825 N.Y.S.2d 297 (3d Dep't 2006). In this New York case, a tenant had wanted to assign its lease to a Korean restaurant in 1999. The landlord rejected the assignment because the complex already had a Chinese restaurant, and the landlord had said it did not want to see competition it considered inappropriate. See id. at 1018. Several years later, the plaintiff moved out. In 2003, the landlord leased the exact same space to a Korean restaurant. The first tenant sued, claiming the landlord unreasonably had withheld its consent to the proposed 1999 assignment. The court ruled the landlord reasonably had based its first decision on objective factors because in 1999 the first tenant did not offer to indemnify the landlord against claims from the Chinese restaurant, something the new tenant did agree to do. See id. at 1018–19. In addition, the marketplace had changed enough from 1999 to 2003 to justify the landlord's later decision that an increasing demand for Asian food would support both a Chinese restaurant and Korean restaurant. See id. This case demonstrates how a reasonableness standard, though objective, might change over time depending on both particular facts and overall market conditions. See also Norville v. Carr-Gottstein Foods Co., 84 P.3d 996, 1002 (Alaska 2004) (recognizing that concerns about competition with a primary tenant were plausible).

Merchants Nat'l Bank*, 612 S.W.2d 733, 735 (Ark. 1981) (upholding landlord's refusal to consent to assignment from bank to savings and loan, where savings and loan would draw neither the same nor as many customers as bank); see also *Ramco-Gershenson Props. - A landlord dislikes a particular business or method of doing business;⁹⁴
- The prospective assignee is already an existing tenant;⁹⁵ and
- A landlord attempts to "extract a financial concession or to improve its financial position."⁹⁶

The above hardly represents a complete list of all factors that courts have considered in determining reasonableness. Potential assignors and assignees should consult case law regarding reasonableness in each applicable jurisdiction and should remember that courts may rule differently on the same grounds for rejection, depending on the facts of the particular case, and, perhaps, on what the judge had for breakfast. Landlords, in turn, should plan carefully and consult counsel before taking any action or

Although New York law allows a landlord to demand payment as a condition to granting consent if the lease is silent, the lease in Giordano specified that the landlord could not withhold its consent unreasonably, and the lease did not allow such a fee. Hence, the court regarded the landlord's fee request as unreasonable.

imposing any condition on a tenant that could create an appearance of acting in an idiosyncratic, unreasonable, or indefensible manner. Landlords and their counsel should be careful about creating a paper (or email) trail that suggests anything but pure, objective, and reasonable motivations.

[27.12] C. Withholding Consent Versus Refusing Consent

One Colorado case purported to distinguish between a landlord’s “withholding” and “refusing” consent to a proposed assignment.⁹⁷ In Parr, the lease allowed the tenant to assign with the landlord’s prior consent, and also said the landlord could not unreasonably “withhold” that consent.⁹⁸

The tenant told the landlord it wanted to assign the lease, and the landlord asked for certain information. The tenant provided all the information and the landlord did nothing.⁹⁹ The landlord deferred making any decision at all, even though the tenant told the landlord that timing was crucial. The tenant turned out to be right, and “lost the deal.”¹⁰⁰

The court concluded that the provision stating the landlord could not “withhold” consent meant the landlord could not silently let an unreasonable amount of time go by without a response.¹⁰¹ The court suggested that if the lease had said the landlord could not “refuse” consent, then the landlord might violate the lease only if the landlord took some affirmative action to refuse consent, or made some affirmative statement of rejection; mere inaction, however, might be just fine.¹⁰² Because the lease prohibited unreasonable withholding of consent (not “refusal” of consent), the landlord’s failure to respond amounted to a withholding of consent.¹⁰³ In contrast, if the lease had said the landlord could not “unreasonably refuse” consent, then mere silence might have been acceptable.

No court in any other case reviewed for this chapter drew any similar distinction between a landlord’s “withholding” or “refusing” consent. Nevertheless, if this distinction actually exists, then landlords’ counsel might want any lease to say the landlord will not “unreasonably refuse” consent. Correspondingly, tenants’ counsel might want to use the words “unreasonably withhold” consent. In any event, the case is hardly persuasive. Most lease provisions on this issue do tend to use the words “unreasonably withhold” rather than “unreasonably refuse” consent.

[27.13] VIII. LESSONS FOR A LANDLORD

A landlord should consider these suggestions when writing or reviewing Transfer Restrictions in leases:

- Uphill Battle. Courts dislike restrictions on alienation and will strictly construe them. When landlord’s counsel drafts such a restriction, counsel should draft both broadly and precisely, and think also about every likely or possible future transaction.
- Prohibit Equity Transfers. Include specific language that prohibits the transfer of control of a corporate or other entity tenant. This language also should prohibit the creation and sale of new stock or other equity interests. The language should be broad enough to refer to all present and future entity types and equity types, including any not yet created.
- Change of Control. Prohibitions against the transfer of control seem appropriate only when dealing with corporations that have a small number of shareholders. If the landlord really cares about these restrictions, the lease or a separate document should memorialize who actually holds the tenant’s stock on the date of lease signing.
- Operation of Law. Include language prohibiting transfers, subleases, or assignments by operation of law.
- Murkiness on Mergers. A landlord should specifically prohibit mergers or, more generally, prohibit a whole laundry list of possible transactions—“all (a) assignments, subleases, mergers, and consolidations, and (b) transfers of any kind occurring by operation of law.”
- Consent Standards. Explicit standards regarding consent tend to prevail over any presumed reasonableness standard, so it is better to state what the parties consider “reasonable.” Without a specific standard, the outcome is unpredictable, which may concern a tenant more than a landlord. If the parties intend to allow the landlord to be unreasonable, then the drafter should, just to prevent possible issues, state that the landlord can withhold consent in its sole and absolute discretion, can impose a fee for consent, and need not even consider the tenant's request for consent.

- Idiosyncratic Tastes. If the landlord wants the right to withhold consent for reasons specific to that particular landlord—religious beliefs, personal tastes, the landlord's own activities—the lease should say so expressly or, better yet, give the landlord an absolute discretionary right to withhold consent.
- Liability for Unreasonableness. If a landlord agrees to be reasonable, the landlord should disclaim any liability for failing to be reasonable. The lease should say that the tenant's only remedy in that case would be to obtain equitable relief deeming the landlord's consent granted.

[27.14] IX. LESSONS FOR A TENANT

A tenant should consider these suggestions to mitigate the risks of Transfer Restrictions:

- Cut Them Back. Try to limit Transfer Restrictions as much as possible. If feasible, avoid Advanced Assignment Restrictions entirely. If avoiding these restrictions is not possible, at least try to obtain the landlord's preapproval of certain likely corporate transactions that obviously would not constitute devices to evade the Assignment Restrictions (for example, any bona fide corporate transaction, or transactions affecting the tenant's entire business or at least multiple tenant sites, such as at least 50% of the tenant's locations in California). State that the landlord will not unreasonably "withhold" consent as opposed to unreasonably "refuse" consent. Consider adding a statement that any transaction not expressly banned shall be deemed permitted, though the courts typically will reach this conclusion anyway, as noted above.¹⁰⁴
- Define Reasonableness Favorably. Consider any issues particularly likely to arise if the tenant ever tries to assign. Does a particular type of alternative use of the space seem particularly likely? If so, perhaps ask the landlord to preapprove that particular use (and charge of permitted uses, if necessary) to prevent arguments that a reasonable landlord would never allow it. Or, if the tenant might want to assign to a range of possible business categories, the lease might list all of them, with a sample brand name for each category to define a standard of operation that will be deemed automatically reasonable; for example, “an office supply store similar to or better than Staples®.”

- Early Attention. Particularly for a real-estate-intensive tenant with high-value leases, consider the effect of Assignment Restrictions in the earliest stages of structuring the transaction. Treat them as fundamental business issues.
- Identify and Use Leverage. If the landlord ever requests any accommodation or amendment related to an existing lease, try to use it as an opportunity to trim back any Transfer Restrictions in the lease.

[27.15] X. CONCLUSION

Transfer Restrictions can create unpleasant surprises for both landlords and tenants. As the first step toward preventing those surprises, parties to commercial leases initially need to understand what the various Transfer Restrictions mean, and then confirm that those restrictions reflect the parties' expectations. This chapter offers that starting point.

ASSIGNMENT AND ASSUMPTION OF LEASES

[28.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Assignments of leases of commercial space are a topic of critical interest even outside the real estate profession. In entering into a lease for commercial space, a business creates an asset, and shoulders liability, which can exist for decades. The long life of a lease makes it unusual within the universe of contractual obligations, presenting the landlord and the tenant, at various times during the lease term, with an ebb and flow of risks and opportunities. Crafting a lease document which addresses the uncertainty, and harnesses the opportunity, of events many years in the future can be like peering into a crystal ball. The issues and uncertainties involved are vividly illustrated in the provisions of the lease governing assignment and subletting.

The freedom of a tenant to transfer its rights and obligations under a lease to a new tenant can be a major factor in the success, stagnation or collapse of the tenant's business. If rental rates rise after the commencement of the lease term, the tenant's ability to transfer the lease determines whether, and subject to what conditions, the tenant can capitalize on the increased rental value of the leased space. If a tenant no longer needs leased space due to contraction or expansion of its business requirements, the tenant's ability to have a successor assume its liability under the lease, and in some cases to secure release from the burden of the lease altogether, may be the deciding factor as to whether the tenant's business will continue, grow or close.

Moreover, many leases treat a change in control of the tenant as an assignment of the lease. In fact, some leases even treat any transfer of a direct or indirect interest in the tenant as an assignment of the lease. Such provisions can make "assignment" provisions applicable to ownership transfers even where the tenant entity and the management of the tenant remain the same entity. Such provisions may serve legitimate landlord interests by restricting de facto assignment of a lease through transfer of the ownership of the tenant entity. Often, however, such provisions inadvertently complicate and delay entity-level ownership transactions by introducing potential landlord notice and consent, recapture and profit share rights in the context of mergers, the admission of new investors or providing ownership interests to employees.

For a landlord, the tenant's freedom to transfer its rights and obligations under a lease to a new tenant directly determines whether the landlord can control the identity and activities of the persons occupying its property. Restrictions on transfer of the tenant's interest may allow the landlord to recover any increased costs arising from a transfer and to share in the financial benefit of an increase in market rental rates even after the lease is signed. The landlord also needs freedom to transfer its own interest under the lease in order to sell or finance its investment in response to cycles in the real estate market, even though such freedom may present the tenant with the risk of having to look to an unknown party, or even to a series of unknown parties, to perform the landlord's obligations under the lease.

This chapter discusses the assignment and assumption of leases of commercial space. The chapter reviews typical provisions in a lease of commercial space which restrict the assignment of the tenant's interest under the lease to a new tenant. Since such provisions also typically restrict subletting by the tenant of its interest under the lease, often without distinction between these two different types of transfers, this chapter discusses how such provisions may overlook significant differences between the effect of an assignment of a lease and the effect of a sublease under a lease. Some leases also contain conditions or restrictions which apply to assignment or subletting by the landlord of its interest under the lease; the discussion below addresses assignment of a lease not only by the tenant but also by the landlord.¹

[28.1] II. WHAT IS AN ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE?

[28.2] A. Transfer of Entire Interest

An assignment of a lease is a transfer by one party to the lease (the “assignor”) to another person (the “assignee”) of the assignor's entire interest in the lease. What elements comprise the “entire interest” in the lease, and must be transferred, in order to effect an assignment of the lease? The tenant's interest in a lease is defined by the duration of the interest (the “lease term”), the space subject to the lease (the “demised premises”), and the nature of the rights granted (the “permitted use”). There also may be other rights, such as renewal or expansion options,

1 The discussion below does not address collateral assignment of a lease, which is a method of securing financing by a pledge of the leasehold interest itself. Leasehold financing may be available to a tenant if the lease is drafted to allow, or not to prohibit, collateral assignment of the lease, and is available to a landlord in most cases. A discussion of collateral assignment of leases, however, is beyond the scope of this chapter. In addition, the discussion below is focused primarily on typical commercial space leases. Certain parts of the following discussion may not apply in part, or at all, to ground leases or to long-term net leases of buildings. A typical ground lease or net lease permits relatively free assignment and financing in order to create an alienable and financeable asset which the marketplace treats as comparable to a fee interest except to the extent of the leasehold asset's limited duration.

rights to extract natural resources or the right to construct improvements. The retention by the purported assignor of a lease of any material reversionary rights (other than a few exceptions such as rights exercisable upon default) defeats the attempt to assign a lease and instead makes the purported assignment a sublease.² A sublease is distinguished from an assignment of a lease by the sublessor's retention of some part of the tenant's interest in the lease.

[28.3] B. Privity of Contract and Privity of Estate

The rights and obligations of the parties to a lease are created both by the terms of the lease itself and by common law applicable to persons having an interest in the same parcel of real property. The lease is a contract which creates “privity of contract” between landlord and tenant; the lease contains express contractual terms which bind each party. The parties to the lease also share rights in a parcel of (or space in) the leased premises; this relationship creates “privity of estate” between landlord and tenant under common law.³

Once privity of contract is created between landlord and tenant, the reciprocal rights and duties under the lease agreement do not terminate except by agreement of the parties (including, of course, upon expiration of the term of the lease as agreed by the parties). Thus assignment of a lease, whether by landlord or by tenant, does not relieve the assignor of its contractual duties under the lease except to the extent that the lease so provides or the parties otherwise agree. Assignment of a lease, together with surrender by the assignor of occupancy of the demised premises, does, however, terminate the privity of estate between the assignor and the other party to the lease. At the same time that privity of estate terminates in connection with an assignment of the lease, the assignment of the lease creates a new privity of estate between the assignee and the other party to the lease.

The assignment of a lease does not, by itself, make the assignee liable for the performance of all of the obligations of the assignor under the lease. The creation of privity of estate between the assignee and the other party to the lease makes the assignee liable to perform only those obligations which under common law are considered to “run with the land.”⁴ Such liabilities are those which “touch and concern the property,” meaning those which relate primarily to the right to use the leasehold interest transferred. Other liabilities of the assignor, which are not considered to run with the land, are personal obligations of the assignor and do not transfer to the assignee automatically by virtue of privity of estate. The obligation to pay rent, the obligation to maintain and repair improvements, and the obligation to vacate the demised premises at the expiration of the term of the lease are examples of liabilities of a tenant which run with the land. A covenant of quiet enjoyment is an example of a liability of a landlord which runs with the land.

2 Milton R. Friedman, Friedman on Leases § 7.401, at 362–63 (4th ed. 1997) (hereinafter “Friedman”).

3 While statutes, in recent years, have created a third source of rights of the parties to a lease, such statutory rights apply primarily to residential leases. This orientation reflects the perception that a residential tenant needs protection from the landlord's unequal bargaining power and greater familiarity with leasing practices. Caveat emptor (“let the buyer beware”) remains the governing principle for most aspects of commercial lease negotiations.

Since privity of contract between the assignor and the other party to the lease survives an assignment of the lease unless the terms of the lease expressly release the assignor from its contractual obligations, the assignor remains contractually bound to the other party to perform the lease notwithstanding an assignment of the lease.⁵ Thus a tenant seeks to assign its interest under a lease will want assurance that the assignee of the lease can and will perform the lease in all respects, unless the assignor has a right (which would be unusual) to be released upon assignment of the lease. In contrast, a landlord typically requires that the lease provide that the landlord is released upon assignment of its interest under a lease, and that the sole recourse of the tenant after assignment of the landlord's interest under a lease is to the successor landlord.⁶

[28.4] III. WHAT IS AN ASSUMPTION OF THE LEASE?

In order for an assignee of a lease to become contractually liable to perform all the obligations of the assignor under the lease, the assignee must assume the assignor's obligations by signing an assumption of the lease. While an assignment of a party's interest under a lease, coupled with the

4 Of course, the rights of the assignee also are subject to, and thus limited by, the terms of the lease.

5 Since there is no incentive for a landlord to release a tenant upon the tenant's assignment of the lease, a tenant, when negotiating the lease, may seek the right to be released from the lease upon its assignment of the lease to a new tenant. If a landlord were to consider agreeing to release a tenant upon assignment of the lease to a new tenant, any such release certainly would be subject to various conditions, discussed below, to ensure that the landlord would have recourse to a creditworthy assignee or otherwise would be adequately secured for the future performance of the lease.

6 As discussed below, even the liability of the successor landlord typically is limited by the terms of the lease to the successor landlord's interest in the leased property.

assignee's acceptance of the interest, is effective to transfer the leasehold interest (and create privity of estate) even without an assumption by the assignee, only an assumption by the assignee creates privity of contract between the assignee and the other party to the lease.⁷ Privity of contract encompasses all of the liabilities of the assignor under the lease, not only those liabilities which run with the land. An assignee of a lease who also unconditionally assumes the lease steps into the shoes of the assignor with respect to all of the rights and all of the obligations of the assignor.⁸

When a party to a lease assigns its interest, the other party to the lease always wants the assignee to assume the obligations of the assignor under the lease so that the other party can enforce its contractual rights against the assignee in addition to retaining its recourse to the assignor. The assignee, however, understandably may resist assuming all of the obligations of the assignor since the assignor's obligations include obligations from periods of time prior to the date of the assignment. An assignee may insist that it will assume only those liabilities which arise under the lease from and after the date of the assignment.⁹

7 Commercial leases may expressly provide that there shall not be even an implication of an assumption by a successor landlord upon assignment of the lease by the original landlord, with language such as the following:

If Landlord assigns its interest under this Lease, Tenant agrees that the execution of such assignment by Landlord and the acceptance of such assignment by the assignee shall not be deemed an assumption by such assignee of any of the obligations of the Landlord under this Lease unless such assignee shall specifically agree otherwise in writing.

This provision is intended in part to protect a lender to which the lease may be collaterally assigned: if a landlord default occurs and the lender must enforce the collateral assignment and actually take title to the lease, the lender will rely on such a provision to limit its liability to the tenant. The tenant will try to negotiate for a provision requiring, conversely, that the assignee assume the lease.

- 8 The assignee does not, of course, acquire any rights of the assignor to recover from the assignee any losses incurred by the assignor due to the failure of the assignee to perform its obligations arising from the assignment.
- 9 When drafting, note that the "date of the assignment" may differ from the "effective date of the assignment." Since leases often require that both a tenant assigning a lease and the assignee must sign an instrument of assignment and then submit the executed assignment to the landlord for the landlord's consent, lease assignments often provide that they are not effective until the landlord's consent has been given. The landlord may not give its consent until days or weeks following the date of execution of the assignment of lease. Care should be taken to refer to the intended effective date. The assignment itself can provide that, regardless of the date stated on the instrument or the date of execution by each party, the assignment is deemed dated, and is effective for all purposes, only on and as of the date the landlord's consent is received.

In many cases the assignee may have little negotiating leverage if landlord objects to allowing a successor tenant to assume the lease only with respect to those liabilities arising after the effective date of the assignment. A landlord may object to such a limitation of the assignee's liability because the landlord later might find it necessary to chase down the original tenant (who might be in a distant forum or may no longer be in business) for any liability arising which pre-dates the effective date of the assignment.¹⁰ If an assumption is limited only to liabilities arising under the lease after the effective date of the assignment, the non-assigning party can look to the assignee only for performance of obligations that arise after the assignment or which run with the land; for obligations arising prior to the date of the assignment, the non-assigning party to the lease can look only to the assignor.

Even if an assumption by the assignee creates recourse to the assignee in addition to the surviving recourse to the assignor, the assignee may be a reluctant, even hostile party when confronted with a demand to cure a condition pre-dating the assignment. The assignor and assignee may dispute, or it may be unclear, whether the liability arose before or after the date of the assignment.¹¹ It even is possible that the assignee, although prepared and able to meet the prospective obligations under the lease, is not prepared or able, financially or otherwise, to cure conditions which pre-date the assignment and of which the assignee may not have been aware.

10 Of course, since a landlord has the right to declare a default under the lease for non-performance of any obligation even if the obligation not performed was not assumed by the assignee, a successor tenant may have no choice but to perform even obligations arising before the effective date of the assignment in order to preserve the leasehold. The successor tenant then can seek reimbursement from the assignor in a separate action. Declaring a default may not be a satisfactory remedy for the landlord, however, and can sour what otherwise may be a satisfactory landlord-tenant relationship.

11 It can be difficult to determine whether the liability arose before or after the date of the assignment. Suppose, for instance, that a tenant performed initial improvements to the demised premises which were not in accordance with an applicable building code. Some time after completion of the improvements, the tenant assigned its interest under the lease to a new tenant. At a still later date, a building department official issued a violation notice concerning an element of the improvements. If the assignee of the lease assumed only the obligations of tenant arising under the lease from and after the date of the assignment, it is not clear whether the violative condition, and thus the responsibility to correct the condition and to pay any fine resulting from the violation notice, should be considered a liability which arose before or after the date of the assignment. As a drafting matter, an assignee which assumes "only those liabilities arising after the [effective] date of the assignment" should not be held responsible for liabilities which "arise" (only in the sense of first being asserted) after the date of the assignment but which concern conditions or events the existence or occurrence of which pre-dates the date of the assignment. Clearly, language referring to "a condition or event first arising after the effective date of the assignment" creates a brighter line.

To avoid this situation, the non-assigning party to a lease should seek to have the assignee assume all of the obligations of the assignor under the lease, regardless of the date they arise, recognizing, however, that many assignees may refuse to do so. If the assignee assumes all of the obligations of the assignor under the lease, the assignee should seek representations and warranties from the assignor regarding the absence of preexisting liabilities and an indemnity from the assignor covering any preexisting liabilities.¹² If the lease provides that the assignor is entitled to receive an estoppel certificate from the non-assigning party, the assignee should ask for an estoppel certificate to verify that there are no preexisting liabilities (or at least no known preexisting liabilities).¹³

[28.5] IV. ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE BY A TENANT

[28.6] A. Form of an Assignment of Lease

When a tenant wishes to transfer all of its interest under a lease to a successor tenant, the intent to effect an assignment, rather than a sublease, is clear. The instrument of assignment can be fairly simple: Appendix A is a basic form of an assignment of a lease, with language to effect an assumption in brackets. Often, however, assignment of a tenant's interests under a lease is subject to conditions and limitations set forth in the lease which must be addressed in the assignment. The assignment of the lease also may need to address deal-specific issues between the assignor and the assignee, such as apportioning costs or allocating liabilities. Appendix B is a sample of a more expansive form of an assignment of a lease which addresses some of these issues.

[28.7] B. Recourse after an Assignment of Lease

Except to the extent that an assigning tenant has the right to a release from liability upon assignment, the landlord will have recourse after the assignment of the lease, as discussed above, to both the assignor and the assignee. If the lease is assigned without an assumption by the assignee, 12 Of course such provisions compromise the assignor's goal of putting the lease, and the liabilities associated with the lease, behind.

13 A tenant's right to obtain an estoppel certificate from the landlord is important to a tenant's ability to assign its leasehold in interest, since an assignee will want, among other things, assurance from the landlord that the lease is in full force and effect and that the rent is current. See discussion of estoppel certificates in Section VI(B.) of this chapter. The landlord's right to obtain estoppel certificates from its tenants is equally important, since a purchaser of the property will want to confirm that the tenants shown in the rent roll are in occupancy and paying rent and that there are no undisclosed liabilities to, or claims by, the tenants. But cf. note 33 infra.

the assignee becomes (under privity of estate) liable for the tenant's obligations under the lease which run with the land, and the assignor nevertheless remains (under privity of contract) liable for all of the tenant's obligations under the lease. After an assignment of the lease and assumption of the lease by the assignee, typically both the assignee (under privity of contract and privity of estate) and the assignor (under privity of contract) will be liable for all of the tenant's obligations under the lease.

A commercial lease typically provides that upon assignment of the lease by the tenant, the assignee, as successor tenant, is required to assume the lease in writing and is deemed to have assumed the lease even if the assignee does not actually execute an express assumption.¹⁴ The privity of contract created by an assumption of the lease gives the landlord a direct contractual relationship with the new tenant. Privity of contract does not exist between the landlord and a subtenant; this is an important difference between an assignment and a sublease which an attorney should discuss with the client when considering these alternatives.

In contrast to the privity of contract which assignment of a lease, and assumption of the lease by the assignee, creates between landlord and assignee, a sublease does not create a direct relationship between landlord and subtenant. The absence of a direct relationship with the landlord presents the sublessee with greater risk than an assignment of the lease because, without any direct agreement with the landlord, the subtenant has no direct control over, or direct knowledge of, whether the obligations to the landlord under the lease are being performed. When the subtenant pays its subrent or its share of real estate taxes to the sublandlord, for instance, the subtenant relies on the sublandlord's promise to use those funds to pay the rent or taxes due the landlord under the principal lease. The subtenant may not have a right to receive copies of any notices of default from the landlord, and, since the subleasehold estate is entirely dependent on the continuity of the term of the overlease, the subtenant has limited ability to prevent the exercise of remedies, including eviction, from terminating the subleasehold estate.

14 Such a provision may be difficult to enforce against the assignee, since without the signature of the assignee the basis for enforcement is not clear and, among other issues, may not comply with the Statute of Frauds. Since even liberal transfer provisions require delivery to the landlord of a copy of the assignment, however, the lease can require that any instrument of assignment of the lease include an express assumption of the lease even if the landlord's consent is not required to assign the lease.

A sublease also is more burdensome to administer than an assignment of a lease. For instance, while a landlord will accept rent payments directly from an assignee of the tenant's interest under a lease, the landlord may refuse to accept rent checks directly from a subtenant. The sublandlord must continue to make each monthly payment of rent to the landlord and to collect each monthly payment of subrent from the subtenant. This two-step process may frustrate the sublandlord's desire to extricate itself, for practical purposes, from managing unneeded space, in addition to leaving the subtenant at risk that a default in payment of rent to the landlord may occur even though the subtenant has timely paid all the subrent due.

A sublease also can be operationally burdensome if the landlord refuses to act on direct requests by a subtenant for building services, or to respond to a subtenant's other requests, unless the request is made in each instance by the sublandlord. In this case, obtaining building services becomes more difficult and, in this and other respects, the sublandlord is continually involved in facilitating the subtenant's use of the leased premises. An assignee, in contrast, is an actual, direct tenant of the landlord, having privity of contract in addition to privity of estate. As such, the assignee directly enjoys the rights, and directly shoulders the obligations, of its predecessor as tenant which run with the land, and the assignee also directly enjoys any and all other rights and, if the assignee also assumes the lease, shoulders any and all other obligations as well.

For the landlord, an assignment creates the advantage of direct recourse to an assignee under the contractual terms of the lease. With respect to a sublessee, the landlord is, at best, a third party beneficiary of the covenants made by the sublessee (although privity of estate with a subtenant does allow the landlord to exercise some remedies, primarily those in equity such as eviction, directly against the subtenant). Leases often contain remedy provisions that establish jurisdiction, damages and other rights upon default that are advantageous to a landlord; these provisions generally are applicable only in an action against persons with whom the landlord has privity of contract, such as the original tenant and an assignee of the tenant which has assumed the lease, but generally are not applicable in an action involving a subtenant or an assignee which has not assumed the lease.

A sublessor can transfer use of less than the entire premises or less than the entire remaining term of the overlease, while an assignment can only be made of the entire premises for the entire remainder of the term of the lease.¹⁵ A sublandlord also has the advantage, relative to an assignor of a lease, of retaining title to (and thus any value of) the leasehold estate. Following a subtenant default, a sublandlord typically can terminate the sublease and thereby automatically recover the leasehold to cure defaults and relet the premises if desired. As discussed below, the remedies of an assignor upon default by the assignee often are less clear and may be considerably more difficult to exercise.

[28.9] D. Continuing Liability of an Assignor

An assignor of a lease remains liable under the lease after the assignment, absent provision in the lease to the contrary. Even if the assignee assumes fully all the obligations of the tenant under the lease, the assignor retains considerable risk due to its continuing liability under the lease. The assignor remains liable for defaults by the assignee under the lease, and for charges incurred by the assignee as tenant under the lease, yet the assignor has no right to recover the lease from the assignee or to exercise remedies against the assignee for non-performance.¹⁶ The assignor's sole recourse is to sue the assignee for money damages. While an assignor of a lease often is described as retaining the surviving liability of a surety with respect to the lease, in fact the assignor remains a primary obligor under the lease, with only such rights as are provided in the assignment to recover from the assignee any costs incurred under the lease by the assignor.¹⁷

Even though the assignor's liability continues after assignment of the lease as a primary obligor, certain concepts of suretyship do apply to the landlord-assignor relationship. Following an assignment of the lease, action by the assignee, whether independently or by agreement with the 15 Friedman, supra note 2, §7.402, at 363–64, however, discusses the possibility of an assignment of part of a demised premises for the entire balance of the lease term. Such assignments, called assignments pro tanto, are found primarily (although not exclusively) in the bankruptcy context and, in the opinion of the author, derive more from the extraordinary power of the Bankruptcy Court than from consistent application of the legal principles distinguishing an assignment from a sublease. See, e.g., In re Brentano's, Inc., 29 B.R. 881 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1983), in which the court, relying on a precedent from 1935, rejected the landlord's contention that pro tanto assignments are recognized only for a landlord's benefit or protection. Id. at 882, 884.

16 While a tenant can negotiate for the right to recover the leasehold if, following an assignment of the lease, the assignee defaults under the lease, this position is not commonly pursued by counsel and the author has not seen an assigning tenant succeed in negotiating such a position. Even if the landlord were willing to agree to such a provision, the assignee, and not the landlord, still would control the tenant's interest under the lease. Considerable thought would be required to create a viable process to effect such a right of recovery.

landlord, which results in an increase in the tenant's liability under the lease or an impairment or surrender of the landlord's rights to recover under the lease, can extinguish the landlord's recourse to the assignor.¹⁸ Recourse will not be extinguished, however, if the assignor has waived its right to consent to acts which may increase the liability of the tenant under the lease. For this reason the form of consent to assignment used by landlords typically provides, and in any event the lease itself typically provides, that the assignor waives any such release from liability due to an increase or change in the tenant's liability under the lease, at least to the extent of the tenant's liabilities prior to the increase or change (and including any increase or change arising from the assignee's exercise of options or rights expressly provided under the lease).

An assignee's ordinary exercise of the rights of the tenant in accordance with the terms of the lease can increase the exposure of the assignor significantly. Consider the exposure which the assignor will face if the assignee performs improvements in the demised premises which the lease requires that the tenant remove at the end of the term, or if the assignee files bankruptcy or exercises a renewal or expansion option under the lease. An assignor also is at risk that the landlord and an assignee may enter into amendments of the lease on terms which were not contemplated by the terms of the lease at the time of the assignment. Such an amendment could extend the term, add more space, or increase the rent. A landlord is unlikely to release an assignor of the lease from increased liability arising from the exercise by an assignee of the lease of rights of the tenant under the lease which existed at the time of the assignment, such as a renewal option. A landlord's position may be the same regarding acts of the tenant which require the landlord's consent but where the landlord has agreed not to withhold, condition or delay its consent unreasonably. A tenant may secure from some landlords, however, relief from any additional liability arising from modifications of the lease made after the assignment by the landlord and the assignee and in the discretion of each rather than pursuant to exercise of a contractual right.¹⁹

18 See Friedman, supra note 2, § 7.502 at 397–401.

19 In some cases a tenant with a strong negotiating position may be able to negotiate in its lease that, following an assignment, the landlord will not hold the assignor liable for the additional liability arising from the exercise by an assignee of an expansion or renewal options in the lease.

[28.10] V. ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE BY A LANDLORD

Assignment of a lease by a landlord can arise in several circumstances, the most common of which is a landlord's sale of a rental property to a new owner. Typically, the new owner wants the seller to deliver the property with the seller's interest in the leases at the property intact since the leases are a source of cash flow. For financing purposes, a landlord also may wish to adopt an alternative approach, in which a landlord may enter into a ground lease or a net lease of a rental property or into a "sandwich," or intervening, leasehold, following which the seller retains the fee estate in the property but assigns the space leases at the property to the other party to such transaction.²⁰

As would be expected, a property owner rarely allows a tenant to impose restrictions on the property owner's ability to sell the property to a new owner. Consequently, leases typically do not restrict the freedom of a landlord to transfer the landlord's interest under leases to a new owner. The selling owner still considers the same issues as discussed above in assigning its leasehold interest: as an assignor, the seller has contractual liability to the tenants under the leases which will survive the sale and will continue to bind the seller unless provision is made for release. In this case, it is the tenants who will have no incentive to release the landlord once the leases have been executed and delivered, so a landlord typically requires that the lease provide for the landlord's liability under the lease to terminate upon sale (or other transfer) of the landlord's interest under the lease.

[28.11] A. Recourse Limited to the Property

The following, a typical provision in leases (with language sought by tenants indicated in brackets), limits the landlord's liability under the lease to the landlord's interest in the property itself:

Tenant shall look solely to the estate and interest of Landlord in the Property [including any insurance proceeds (to the extent provided in [the Article of the lease concerning casualty]), condemnation awards (to the extent provided in [the Article of the lease concerning condemnation]) and rentals accruing from and after the date of any judgment], only for such time as Landlord holds such estate and interest, for the collection or satisfaction of any judgment recovered against Landlord [based upon the breach by Landlord of any of the terms, conditions or covenants of this Lease on the part of Landlord to be performed], and no other property or assets of Landlord shall be subject to levy, execution or other enforcement for the satisfaction of Tenant's remedies under or with respect to either this Lease, the relationship of Landlord and Tenant hereunder, or Tenant's use and occupancy of the Demised Premises.

Obviously this provision is broader than is needed to release the landlord upon sale of the property alone, in that it limits the tenant's recourse to the landlord's interest in the property even if no sale of the property to a new owner has occurred.²¹ The provision effectively is a release upon sale of the property, because, after a sale of the property, the landlord will have no remaining interest in the property.²² The provision is not effective to release the landlord following a master lease or "sandwich" lease of the property. The following provision accomplishes this further objective (with the language to be sought by tenants indicated in brackets):

The obligations of Landlord under this Lease shall no longer be binding upon Landlord named herein [for events first arising] after the sale, assignment or transfer by Landlord named herein (or upon any subsequent Landlord after the sale, assignment or transfer by such subsequent Landlord) of its interest in the Property as owner or lessee[, and in the event of any such sale, assignment or transfer, such obligations [for events first arising after any such sale, assignment or transfer] shall 21 The limitation on recourse also is among the provisions a mortgagee typically requires so that it can foreclose title to the property and take over the leases while insulating the mortgagee's other assets from liability to the tenants.

22 Since the argument can be made that the interest of the landlord in the property includes "proceeds and profits" of that interest, the landlord may seek to exclude expressly any recourse to the "proceeds and profits" of the landlord's interest in the property, primarily sales proceeds. The tenant may seek to modify the language expressly to include proceeds and profits, at least to the extent of any pre-sale defaults by, or claims against, the landlord. The landlord's intent is to provide that the landlord will have no further liability once the property is sold thus may be frustrated by a tenant's insistence on recourse for any pre-sale defaults or claims. See, e.g., Won's Cards, Inc. v. Samsondale/Haverstraw Equities, Ltd., 165 A.D.2d 157, 566 N.Y.S.2d 412 (3d Dep't 1991), for a case where the court found that a provision limiting recourse to a party's "equity in the property" allows recourse to the sales proceeds realized by a landlord.

thereafter be binding upon the grantee, assignee or other transferee of such interest, and any such grantee, assignee or transferee, by accepting such interest, shall be deemed to have assumed such obligations]. A lease of the entire Property shall be deemed a transfer within the meaning of the foregoing sentence.

While such a provision may seem overreaching, the practical effect is relatively limited, since individual commercial real properties commonly are owned by single purpose entities. The property typically is the sole asset of such an entity, and the form of organization of the entity and the entity's organizational documents effectively prevent recourse beyond the owning entity's assets.²³ Thus, for practical purposes, the typical provisions set forth above have become customary in that they are not perceived to constitute a significant concession by tenants. In any event, institutional owners of real estate and real estate lenders commonly require such limitations as a condition to providing equity and debt financing, both to insulate the owning and lending institutions from liability arising from the property after sale and to isolate the exposure to ownership risk, not only during but also after the term of ownership, to the owned asset alone.²⁴

[28.12] B. Recourse to the Security Deposit

An assigning landlord will want to assign any tenants' security deposits to the new landlord with the leases, and then be relieved of liability to the tenants for return of the deposit. The following sample provision so provides:

In the event of sale, assignment or transfer of the Property, Landlord shall transfer any Letter(s) of Credit and/or any remaining Cash Security then held by Landlord as security for the performance of Tenant's obligations under this Lease to the transferee, and Landlord shall 23 While there is the technical possibility of a tenant reaching other assets through such arguments as ultra vires, piercing the corporate veil, inadequate capitalization, preference, fraudulent conveyance, tracing distributions made without creating adequate reserves for liabilities or substantive consolidation, these are difficult arguments with which to succeed, and often are not likely to warrant the expense especially if there is any equity in the property to which recourse remains.

24 One exception to the limited recourse to the landlord is the payment of tenant improvement allowances and similar up-front cash inducements, for which a tenant often will require, and secure, recourse to a creditworthy entity, to a funding commitment from a mortgage lender, or to another form of credit enhancement or security for payment.

thereupon be released from all liability for the return of such security. Tenant agrees to look solely to the transferee for the return of any such security and it is agreed that the provisions of this sentence shall apply to every sale, assignment or transfer of the Property. A lease of the entire Property shall be deemed a transfer within the meaning of the foregoing sentence.

Such a provision may also provide that the assignee is responsible for the security deposit only to the extent that the assignee actually receives the deposit from the assignor. Because this limitation is appropriate only to insulate a mortgagee to whom the lease may be assigned in connection with foreclosure of a mortgage, the tenant should ask that any such limitation be so qualified.²⁵

[28.13] C. Attornment by the Tenant

Purchasers of leased real property require that the leases be assigned by the seller at closing. In furtherance of such assignment, each lease should provide that upon sale of the property to a new owner, the tenant agrees to accept the new owner as its successor landlord. Each tenant's acceptance of assignment of its lease to a successor landlord is demonstrated by the tenant's agreement to be bound to perform the obligations of the tenant under the lease for the successor landlord in the same manner as the tenant was bound to perform those obligations for the predecessor landlord. The tenant's agreement to perform those obligations is called attornment and typically is set forth in the lease. Appendix C is a sample provision for attornment by the tenant to a mortgagee which becomes a successor landlord. Note that in Appendix C, a mortgagee is protected from any liabilities of the landlord arising prior to the mortgagee's succes-

²⁵ As between the seller and the purchaser, ordinarily upon sale of a rental building the seller provides the purchaser with an accounting of the security deposits. The seller then transfers to the purchaser any cash security (by check or by credit against the purchase price) deposited by the tenants and any letters of credit which the tenants have delivered as security. Note that an endorsement or amendment of the letter of credit by the issuing bank to the new beneficiary, or re-issuance of the letter of credit in the name of the new beneficiary, is necessary to reflect the successor landlord as the beneficiary. The landlord should try to provide in the lease that the expense of re-issuance or amendment of the letter of credit is borne by the tenant, as the price for the privilege of posting a letter of credit; the tenant takes the opposite position.

sion to title, while other successor landlords take title subject to any pre-existing liabilities of the landlord.²⁶

[28.14] VI. RESTRICTIONS APPLICABLE TO ASSIGNMENT OF LEASE

A lease which is silent regarding the right of a party to assign the lease may be assigned without the need for any consent by, or notice to, the landlord and without regard to any other conditions or restrictions.²⁷ Among other things, restrictions on assignment of a lease are considered to be restraints on alienation of an interest in real property, and public policy does not favor restraints on alienation of interests in real property. For the same reason, restrictions on assignment of a lease will be construed strictly by the courts; lawyers seeking to draft restrictions on assignment must state expressly and with specificity each type of transaction which the parties intend to restrict. The following discussion assumes that, following an assignment of a lease by a tenant, the assignee expressly assumed the lease, and that, following a sale of the leased property, the successor landlord assumed the landlord's obligations under the lease.

One peculiarity of common law that applies to assignments of leases derives from the disfavored status of restraints on alienation of real property. Under long-standing law, the consent by a landlord to a tenant's assignment of a lease automatically terminates the continued force of any provision restricting future assignment by the tenant of the lease, unless the landlord's consent, when given, expressly provides that the restriction shall continue to apply to future assignments.²⁸ For this reason, a com-

26 This is not a uniform approach; some leases provide that any successor is relieved from a number of specified liabilities arising prior to such successor's succession to title, while other leases may adopt the date that control of the property is obtained (such as through a receiver or court order) as the date that a successor's liability commences, even though the actual acquisition of title happens at a later date.

27 Even if assignment of a lease is technically permissible under the article of the lease which specifically addresses assignment, other provisions of the lease may determine whether, for practical purposes, a tenant can use the leased space. For instance, a permitted use clause may limit the types of uses which can be made of the demised premises or the trade name under which business can be conducted in the demised premises. The alterations clause may restrict the tenant's ability to alter or improve the demised premises for the intended use. Provisions in a lease governing signage, telecommunications, or access to utilities or parking can affect critical rights of a prospective new tenant. For these reasons, to assess whether a lease can be assigned the lawyer often must review the entire lease in light of the assignee's particular intended use of the demised premises.

28 See Dumpor's Case, 4 Coke 119b, 76 Eng. Rep. 1110 (1603); Friedman, supra note 2, § 7.304e at 359-61.

mercial lease typically contains the following provision, which is drafted to apply to any type of transfer of rights under the lease even though the common law principle applies only to an assignment of a lease:

The consent by Landlord to any assignment, subletting, occupancy or use shall not relieve Tenant from the obligation to obtain the express written consent of Landlord to any further assignment, subletting, occupancy or use, nor shall such consent waive or terminate the condition set forth in this Section that any further assignment, subletting, occupancy or use shall require the express written consent of Landlord.

The separate document in which the landlord consents to any transfer also should contain similar non-waiver language.

[28.15] A. Why a Landlord Restricts Assignment of the Lease

One of the negotiating positions typically taken most strongly by owners of commercial property is that a lease should restrict assignment without the landlord's consent.²⁹ In real estate markets characterized by strong tenant demand and a limited supply of space, few tenants have the negotiating leverage to challenge this golden rule. Nevertheless, tenants question why a lease should restrict or condition assignment of the lease. From the tenant's perspective, so long as the tenant remains liable for performance of the lease, and performs the lease, for the balance of the term, the landlord will receive the benefit of the landlord's bargain. Assumption of the lease by the assignee following an assignment of the lease creates an additional obligor on the lease, a benefit for the landlord rather than a disadvantage. The tenant reasons that assignment of the lease should be subject only to restrictions which are reasonably, necessarily and directly related to ensuring the continued performance of the tenant's obligations under the lease. The tenant views other landlord restrictions on assignment of a lease as no more than the means for the landlord to condition its consent on changes to the lease, including increases in rent, which would represent, for the landlord, a windfall above and beyond the benefit of the bargain embodied in the original lease. The requirement for landlord consent to an assignment of the lease allows the landlord to leverage the requirement for its consent to secure an increase in rent if market rents have risen, while the tenant has no corresponding opportunity for rent relief if market rents have fallen.

Landlords historically have successfully defeated these arguments. Landlord responses include a variety of reasons for restraints on assignment of a lease. Some of these reasons bear directly on securing continued performance of the lease: to ensure that the assignee, as the actual occupant of the space, is of a certain quality and is creditworthy even if the assignor remains liable under the lease; to ensure that the assignee will use the space in a manner permitted under the lease and consistent with any exclusive commitments made to other tenants in the building; and to recover any increase in operating costs which may result from the assignee's use. Moreover, a tenant's assignment of a lease may signal that the tenant is experiencing financial difficulties; the landlord must consider that at a later date it may have no meaningful recourse to the assignor and thus then may have only recourse to a less-appealing assignee. Still, the fact that an assignment does not release the original tenant from its liability under the lease undermines the force of the landlord's concerns with creditworthiness of the assignee. Because the market reputation of certain buildings is unique, subjective and subject to change, however, a landlord wants the right to enforce standards for the creditworthiness and the character of its tenants without the risk of having its subjective judgment second-guessed.

Other reasons highlight legitimate concerns of a landlord even if not related to continued performance of the lease: to allow the landlord to manage the marketing and leasing of all available space in its building without being in competition with its own tenants; to control the mix of tenancies in its building in a manner which preserves the prestige and appeal of the building; and to restrict repeated division of floors, burdening of building systems and traffic levels. Landlords probably are just as concerned with having the greatest flexibility to pursue business opportunities which may arise during the lengthy term of a lease. For instance, a landlord may want to have the opportunity to recover excess space from one tenant to retain another tenant who wants to expand in the building or to obtain a new tenant who needs the space. To the extent that a tenant has less flexibility regarding the assignment of its leased premises, the landlord has more flexibility to recover the space in order to capitalize on a new opportunities which arise during the term.

Such other reasons are broader in scope and thus seem suspect to tenants. The common theme underlying such restrictions is the contention that the owner, and not the tenant, is in the real estate business. As tenants in a building offer their leased premises for assignment, the landlord's concern is valid; without provisions restricting the tenant's marketing of such space and assignment of the lease itself, the landlord would be forced to market vacant space in the building in competition with its own tenants marketing unneeded space for assignment. Because such tenants seek the greatest relief they can obtain from their lease obligations as quickly as possible, and thus are not necessarily motivated to maximize their profit from the assignment, such tenants may offer space in the landlord's building for assignment or sublease at lower rents or with greater inducements than the landlord can offer. Even a small amount of space offered at low rents can affect marketing of all space in a building and create discontent among tenants whose contract rents are higher. The tenant's objectives do not necessarily coincide with realizing the highest and best use of space or preserving a particular quality or character of tenancies in a building.³⁰

In contrast with the concerns of the landlord, many tenants, and particularly retail tenants, believe that when they enter into a lease, they actually create an asset which may appreciate in value as market rents rise during the lease term even if the tenant's business itself does not fare well. The value of a tenant's leasehold also may appreciate due to the tenant investing considerable amounts to improve the leased premises. For a retail business which relies on establishing and retaining a clientele, the location often is intimately associated with the success of the business itself, and the tenant's ability to transfer the leasehold may be essential to realizing the value of the business itself upon sale.

Tenants also object to restrictions on assignment because the process of obtaining the landlord's consent is too slow, too uncertain, and in some cases too subjective. These concerns are magnified by the tenant not knowing who will be the landlord at the time in the future that the landlord's consent is needed. In addition, as discussed below, landlords typically require that the tenant pay to, or share with, the landlord either all or a percentage of any proceeds which the tenant realizes by assignment of the lease. While a tenant often regards any share claimed by the landlord as a windfall to the landlord, in fact any increase attributable to—rather than to improvement of the leased premises or establishment of retail traffic—is a windfall to both parties to a lease. For this reason, the most common lease provision allocates the proceeds from assignment of a lease, after the tenant recovers its costs of effecting the assignment (and, sometimes, certain other costs), between landlord and tenant. Many tenants still contend, however, that since the tenant, in entering into the lease, assumed the risk of a long term financial obligation, the tenant should enjoy all profit which can be derived from the lease. Tenants reiterate that this approach is fair especially since the landlord would not share in any loss if market rental rates had moved in the other direction.

30 In addition, a landlord considers tenants in a building to be an asset of the landlord; thus, even if a lease permits assignment of the lease, the lease typically and will prohibit any assignment or subleasing to existing tenants in the building, and will restrict general advertising of rents which are lower than the landlord's then-current asking rental rate for space in the building. This is to avoid creating dissension among tenants in the building whose rents may be higher.

[28.16] B. Providing for an Estoppel Certificate

As a practical matter, in order to assign a lease, the assignor will need to confirm to the satisfaction of the assignee that the copy of the lease provided by the assignor is true, correct and complete, and that there are no outstanding defaults under the lease. While the assignor may be willing to provide representations and warranties concerning these and other matters, an estoppel certificate made by the non-assigning party to the lease provides not only an independent verification of the response to these concerns but also strengthens the hand of the assignee if the party which delivered the estoppel certificate later tries to assert that the facts or circumstances were not as certified in the estoppel certificate. A typical provision for delivery of an estoppel certificate:

From time to time (but no more often than once in any twelve month period) during the Term, within ten (10) days following written request therefor, either party shall deliver to the requesting party a written certificate executed and acknowledged by an [authorized officer] of the certifying party, (i) that the copy of the lease attached to the certificate is a true, correct and complete copy of the Lease, (ii) that the Lease is then in full force and effect and has not been amended or modified (or if amended or modified, setting forth the specific nature of each amendment or modification), (iii) setting forth the date to which the Fixed Rent and all other rentals have been paid, and (iv) stating whether or not, [to the actual knowledge of the certifying party,] [the requesting party is in default under this Lease][any state of facts exists which with the giving of notice or the passage of time or both would constitute a default under the Lease][any notice of default has been given or received by either party to the Lease which remains uncured], and, if the requesting party is in default, setting forth the specific nature of all such defaults and notices thereof given, [(v) stating that Tenant has accepted and occupies the Demised Premises and that all improvements required to be made by Landlord pursuant to the provisions of this Lease have been made, or if such is not the case then setting forth the specific respects in which such is not the case,] and [(vi) such other matters as the requesting party shall reasonably request]. Tenant acknowledges that any certificate delivered pursuant to this Section may be relied upon by any owner of the Property, by the holder of any Mortgage, by any assignee of an interest under the Lease, or by any lessor under any Superior Lease.

Generally, practitioners regard an estoppel certificate as enforceable to estop the certifying party from asserting facts contrary to the statements in the certificate.³¹ An express provision to this effect in the lease may help ensure this result.

[28.17] C. Assignment by Tenant

During the term of a lease, the tenant may need or want to assign the lease for any number of reasons. The tenant may be unable to use or afford the leased premises due to such reasons as business setbacks, death of the tenant or of a principal of the tenant, merger resulting in overlapping facilities, growth creating a need for larger premises, or other reasons unrelated to suitability of the leased premises for occupancy. Changes in the tenant's organizational form, investors or financing, death or divorce of a business principal, or sale of the tenant's business, may make a formal transfer of the lease necessary. Tenant's counsel must be attentive, in negotiating the lease, to pursue rights as broad as possible for the tenant to assign the lease in such circumstances, to secure the landlord's consent if necessary on acceptable terms and within an acceptable time frame, and to benefit from any increase in the market rental value of the leased premises.

31 At least one case suggests, however, that an estoppel certificate alone may not be sufficient to effect a waiver, or a de facto amendment, of the provisions of a lease. See Won's Cards, Inc. v. Samsondale/Haverstraw Equities Ltd., 165 A.D.2d 157, 566 N.Y.S.2d 412 (3d Dep't 1991).

[28.18] 1. Prohibition of Assignment Without Landlord's Consent

Commercial leases often provide that the tenant may not assign the lease without the landlord's prior written consent. This provision means that the landlord can grant or withhold its consent for any reason or for no reason and at its sole discretion.³² The Real Estate Board of New York includes the following provision in its published Standard Form of Office Lease (1999 edition):

Tenant, for itself, its heirs, distributees, executors, administrators, legal representative, successors and assigns, expressly covenants that it shall not assign, mortgage or encumber this agreement, nor underlet, or suffer or permit the demised premises or any part thereof to be used by others, without the prior written consent of Owner in each instance. Transfer of the majority of the stock of a corporate Tenant or the majority partnership interest of a partnership Tenant shall be deemed an assignment.

A tenant under a lease with this provision cannot assign the lease unless the landlord gives its consent. The landlord can withhold its consent for any reason, including to derive the benefit of an increase in the rental value of the premises, to lease the premises to someone else, or simply because the landlord doesn't like the tenant.³³

For most commercial leases of any significant value, the tenant will seek to negotiate some relief from the rigidity of the preceding provision. Where a landlord is willing to allow the tenant to assign the lease on more flexible terms, the landlord should do so through carefully drafted and limited exceptions to a comprehensive restriction on assignment. The following provision is typical of a comprehensive restriction which would precede limited negotiated exceptions:

32 Some leases will provide explicitly that unless the lease itself states that the landlord's withholding of consent must be reasonable, consent may be given or withheld "in the landlord's sole and absolute discretion."

33 Notwithstanding such language, a landlord could not withhold consent for unlawful reasons such as discrimination which is prohibited by law, and a bankruptcy court could override or disregard such language and assign, or allow the assignment of, the lease if assignment would be in the best interest of the bankrupt's estate and otherwise in accordance with the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code.

Except as otherwise set forth in this Section, Tenant, for itself, its heirs, distributees, executors, administrators, legal representative, successor and assigns, covenants that, without the prior consent of Owner in each instance, it shall not (i) assign, whether voluntarily, involuntarily or by operation of law, by merger, consolidation or otherwise, mortgage or encumber, directly or indirectly including by transfer of any direct or indirect legal or beneficial interest in Tenant, its interest in or rights under this Lease, in whole or in part, or (ii) sublet, or permit the subletting of, the Demised Premises or any part thereof, or (iii) permit the Demised Premises or any part thereof to be occupied, or licensed, or used for desk space, mailing privileges or otherwise, by any person other than Tenant. The sale, pledge, transfer or other alienation of (a) [a controlling] [any] interest in the issued and outstanding capital stock of any corporate Tenant (other than trades of such stock which are publicly traded on a recognized security exchange or over-the-counter market by stockholders who are not “insiders” as such term is defined in the Securities Exchange Act of 1934) or (b) a controlling interest in any partnership, limited liability company or joint venture or other business entity comprising Tenant, however accomplished, and whether in a single transaction or in a series of related and/or unrelated transactions, and whether through a transfer of direct interests or indirect interests, shall be deemed for the purposes of this Section to be an assignment of this Lease which shall require the prior consent of Owner in each instance.

The above language is typical of language in commercial leases which defines a broad range of transactions as an “assignment” even though such transactions do not involve a transfer of all of the direct or indirect interests of the tenant under the lease. A lease can provide, of course, that if a tenant allows another person to use desk space in the tenant's leased premises, for instance, such a transaction is subject to the transfer restrictions in the lease; if so restricted, however, such a transaction should be considered a sublease rather than an assignment. This distinction is significant since, as discussed later, a lease may accord the landlord different rights (such as recapture, leaseback or profit participations) in the case of an assignment than it does in the case of a sublease. Note also the inconsistency that a merger in which the tenant is not the surviving company is subject to the above restriction, while a merger in which the tenant is the surviving company is not subject to the above restriction, even though the landlord has the same concerns in either case with the creditworthiness of the surviving entity.

[28.19] 2. Reasonableness of Landlord's Consent³⁴

In the majority of jurisdictions, including New York, when a lease prohibits assignment or subletting without the lessor's consent, the lessor may refuse consent arbitrarily and for any or no reason at all, unless the lease specifically requires refusal of consent to be reasonable. Therefore, under New York law a landlord may impose conditions, including requiring the payment of additional rent or other consideration, on the grant of its consent.³⁵

However, there are compelling reasons why New York courts may soon adopt the minority position. First, because courts disfavor restrictions on alienation, New York courts may opt to strictly construe assignment clauses to dilute the restriction on assignment.³⁶ Second, because leases ultimately are just contracts, New York courts may opt to subject them to the principle of good faith and fair dealing and imply a reasonableness standard into an otherwise silent lease. Indeed, many state legislatures have already enacted legislation that imposes a reasonableness standard into silent leases,³⁷ thereby resolving this conflict between traditional real estate law and modern commercial law in favor of the tenant.

The simplest way for a tenant to qualify a strict prohibition on assignment is to secure the landlord's agreement in the lease that its consent will not be unreasonably withheld, delayed or conditioned. Where the tenant has secured the landlord's agreement to provide some flexibility to assign 34 The following discussion of the reasonableness of a landlord's consent was prepared by Joshua Stein, Dan Ross and Tiffany Barzal of Latham & Watkins and is gratefully acknowledged. Hence the landlord was at liberty to impose such conditions as he deemed proper as a prerequisite to his consent to the assignment."). See also *Herlou Card Shop, Inc. v. Prudential Ins. the lease, the right to assign may be subject to specific and detailed negotiated limitations. More commonly, however, assignment of a commercial lease is “subject to the prior written consent of the landlord, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, delayed or conditioned.”³⁸ The standard of reasonableness in granting consent to an assignment (or sublease) or a lease may be among the most disputed issues in law.

Even in cases where a lease requires a landlord's refusal of consent to be “reasonable” or “not unreasonable,” it is far from clear what “reasonable” means. Although a lessor cannot seize upon absolutely any creative excuse for withholding consent, no single standard or set of rules for determining “reasonableness” exists. To some, reasonableness means that the landlord, in making its decision, must have a subjectively reasonable basis for the decision. The prevailing view is that reasonableness is an objective standard. The question is therefore generally left to the trier of fact to decide.³⁹ Generally speaking, this standard requires the court to consider whether a reasonably prudent person in the landlord's position would have withheld consent. Courts have held that considerations of a landlord's personal taste and convenience are not reasonable, but courts have not dismissed all subjective considerations when they are perceived to have a legitimate basis.

Despite the nebulous nature of the reasonableness standard, the court in American Book Co. v. Yeshiva University Development Foundation, Inc. set forth a list of “objective” standards for determining reasonableness, and these standards have been followed by other courts.⁴⁰ These standards, which “are readily measurable criteria of a proposed subtenant's or assignee's acceptability, from the point of view of any landlord,” are:

38 As this language is drafted, it is a condition to the granting of consent that consent not be unreasonably withheld, delayed or conditioned. A tenant should prefer that the landlord make a covenant not to unreasonably withhold, delay or condition its consent, because improper withholding of consent where landlord covenants to give its consent is a breach and may more readily be actionable for damages (absent specific restrictions on tenant's recourse to money damages in such circumstance) than improper withholding of consent where landlord's reasonableness in granting consent is a condition. Failure to satisfy a condition may give rise only to an injunctive remedy that consent is deemed granted and not give rise to an action for damages. See Friedman, supra note 2, § 7.304b at 335–38.

39 See Am. Book Co. v. Yeshiva Univ. Dev. Found., Inc., 59 Misc. 2d 31, 33, 297 N.Y.S.2d 156 (1969) (“The standards of reasonableness have not heretofore been clearly delineated by any single New York case, but are left to the trial court to determine in accordance with the particular factual patterns before it, and the conceptual boundaries may be only faintly discerned in the few reported cases.”).

40 Id.

- (a) financial responsibility
- (b) the “identity” or “business character” of the subtenant—i.e. [the tenant's] suitability for the particular building
- (c) the legality of the proposed use
- (d) the nature of the occupancy—i.e. office, factory, clinic, or whatever.⁴¹

At a minimum, a landlord probably is reasonable in refusing consent unless the assigning tenant gives the landlord evidence that the proposed assignee is ready, willing, and able to perform the lease agreement.⁴² Therefore, a reasonable belief (supported by evidence) that a proposed assignee is unable to pay is almost always reasonable grounds for denying consent.⁴³ Other factors can, however, outweigh financial responsibility in certain cases. For example, a landlord's refusal to allow financially responsible parties as multiple subtenants was upheld where subdivision of the leased space would have been undesirable in a “prestige building.”⁴⁴

Although the second factor listed above, the “identity” or “business character” of the subtenant/assignee, may be used as a reasonable basis for a landlord to reject an assignment, landlords using this argument bear a heavy burden of proof.⁴⁵ One New York case involved a restriction on assignment that required the landlord to be reasonable but stated that the landlord could consider the “business reputation of the proposed assignee or subtenant,” as well as “the effect that the proposed assignee or subtenant's occupancy or use of the demised premises would have upon the operation and maintenance of the building and the landlord's investment

43 But see Friedman, supra note 2, § 7.304c. Friedman points out that “inasmuch as neither assignment nor subletting releases the original tenant from his lease obligations, it may be argued that landlord has all he bargained for regardless of the wealth or skill of the assignee or subtenant.” However, he notes that the little relevant authority on the issue has held that the landlord is entitled to a responsible assignee. Furthermore, in practice, landlords prefer a financially responsible assignee in order to avoid litigation against the tenant should a default occur.

App. 1996) (holding that while “tone” and “image” are valid considerations, the landlord must be able not only to articulate appropriate concerns, but also to produce evidence that a trier of fact could examine objectively).

therein.” Although the court in that case honored this list of factors for consideration, it rejected the landlord's substantial evidence that assignment to a financially responsible bank with an alleged “bad business reputation” would lower the value of the landlord's property.⁴⁶ The lesson of this case seems to be that courts will strongly disfavor rejections that are allegedly based on bad identity or character.

Courts have held that a landlord may “reasonably” deny consent if a proposed subtenant would compete with the landlord's business⁴⁷ or if a landlord is unaware of the assignee's proposed use.⁴⁸ Furthermore, it is reasonable to deny consent where the mix of tenants is critical to the success of the landlord, such as in a shopping center.⁴⁹

“Unreasonable” grounds for denial have included the fact that a tenant would make a profit from the assignment or sublease,⁵⁰ a landlord's philosophical objections to the proposed tenant's business,⁵¹ a landlord's dislike of a particular business or method of doing business⁵² or the mere fact that

In that case, the landlord rejected assignment by tenant Chase Manhattan Bank on grounds that the proposed assignee, Bank Leumi, had a “bad business reputation” was plagued by “image problems,” and was “simply not a Chase Manhattan.” The landlord's evidence included news articles discussing indictment of several of the bank's low-level officers and discussing economic problems and stock scandals in Israel (Bank Leumi's country of origin). The landlord also presented affidavits by real estate attorneys and appraisers that a change of tenant to Bank Leumi would lower the value of the building.

the prospective assignee is already an existing tenant.⁵³ Most courts hold that it is unreasonable for a landlord to withhold consent merely to extract an economic concession or improve its financial position.⁵⁴ In other words, a landlord cannot reasonably require a tenant to agree to rent increases as a condition to the landlord's consent. In the same vein, a landlord cannot simply demand a standalone fee as a condition to the landlord's consent either. In a case where the assignment clause did not contain a reasonableness standard, however, the Supreme Court of New York notably granted the landlord's motion to dismiss the tenant's claim for failure to state a cause of action even though the landlord admittedly withheld consent because the tenant refused to pay a $50,000 fee.⁵⁵

The above is by no means a complete list of factors that courts will consider. For example, as the complexity of leveraged real estate transactions increases, courts will also need to consider the issue of consent from the landlord's lender, particularly where the lender refuses to consent to an assignment. In this scenario, courts would need to decide whether the landlord can reasonably cite the lender's refusal as the basis for withholding its own consent—even where the assignment provision is silent on this matter.

Potential assignors and assignees should consult case law regarding “reasonableness” in each applicable jurisdiction and should be aware that courts may rule differently on the same grounds for rejection depending on the facts of the particular case. Landlords, in turn, should plan carefully and consult counsel before taking any actions or imposing any conditions upon a tenant that could create an appearance of substantive unfairness or economic duress.

Given the lack of specific guidance afforded by a “reasonableness” standard, it is important for a tenant that its lease provide for a step-by-step process, with specific time periods within which each party must respond, for the tenant to request, and the landlord to provide, any required landlord consent to assignment of the lease. In the absence of an express process, a tenant that has submitted a request for the landlord's consent would have to wait an indeterminate "reasonable period of time" for the landlord to act on that request. The unpredictability of the timing for the landlord's response would deter prospective assignees and leave the status of the lease in limbo. The following provision is typical of provisions which establish a procedure for the tenant to request the landlord's consent:

If Tenant shall desire to assign this lease or to sublet the demised premises [in a transaction for which Landlord's consent is required hereunder],⁵⁶ Tenant shall submit to Landlord, no less than thirty (30) days prior to the proposed effective date of the assignment or sublease, a written request for Landlord's consent to such assignment or subletting, which request shall contain or be accompanied by the following information: (i) the name and address of the proposed assignee or subtenant; (ii) a detailed summary of the financial and material terms of the proposed transaction and a copy of the proposed sublease or assignment of lease; (iii) the nature and character of the business of the proposed assignee or subtenant and its proposed use of the demised premises; and (iv) banking, financial and other credit information with respect to the proposed assignee or subtenant reasonably sufficient to enable Landlord to evaluate the financial responsibility of the proposed assignee or subtenant. Landlord shall grant or withhold its consent to the proposed assignment of sublease in accordance with the standards set forth in this Article ___ within thirty (30) days following the date that Landlord has received all of such information from Tenant. Tenant agrees to provide Landlord promptly with such additional information concerning the proposed assignee or subtenant as Landlord shall reasonably request. The failure of Landlord to grant or withhold its consent to the proposed assignment of sublease in writing within thirty (30) days following the date that Landlord has received all of such information from Tenant shall mean that Landlord has [granted] [withheld] its consent.

56 The bracketed language is intended to exclude from these provisions certain assignments of leases which are permitted without landlord's consent, discussed infra.

The lack of clarity concerning the standards which constitute a reasonable basis for a landlord to withhold consent to an assignment or sublease has led to lease provisions, such as the following, which set forth a list of specific threshold factors which the tenant must satisfy in order to obtain the landlord's consent. As a drafting matter, the threshold factors typically are stated as conditions which must be satisfied absolutely; a reasonableness standard, if applicable, applies only to criteria considered by the landlord in addition to the specific threshold factors, which themselves are not subject to the reasonableness standard. A typical provision:

Landlord agrees that it shall not unreasonably withhold, delay or condition its consent to a proposed assignment of this lease or subletting of all or a portion of the demised premises for which such consent is required hereunder, provided that Tenant is not in default under this lease (beyond the expiration of applicable notice and cure periods provided hereunder) on either the date of that the request for Landlord's consent is made or on the date that the assignment is proposed to take effect, and further provided that each of the following further conditions shall be satisfied:

a. The subletting or assignment shall be to a tenant whose occupancy will be in keeping with the dignity and character of the then use and occupancy of the building and will not be more hazardous than that of Tenant herein or impose any additional operating burden which is material in nature upon Landlord in the operation of the building;⁵⁷

b. The subletting or assignment shall be to a tenant whose financial responsibility is [at least as creditworthy as the financial responsibility of the assigning tenant] [in keeping with the then financial standards of the building] and whose business has been operating for at least three full calendar years, and during the three most recent cal-

57 Note that in the case of a retail tenant which has agreed to pay percentage rent based on the tenant's gross sales, the Landlord will have a valid concern that the proposed assignee's use will generate at least as much gross sales revenue as the assigning tenant would have generated. For the landlord's benefit, the percentage rent clause should provide for adjustment of the percentage rent calculation to offset any projected resulting diminution of percentage rent upon assignment or subletting. For the tenant, an assignee whose use will generate considerably higher gross sales revenue may require a reduction of the percentage at which percentage rent is payable.

endar years of its operation, the prospective sublessee or assignee has generated a net operating profit not less than ___ times the annual rental obligations under the lease;⁵⁸

c. No space shall be advertised or openly promoted to the general public other than through licensed real estate brokers, and no space shall be advertised or offered through any medium at a lower rental rate than the rental rate being charged by Landlord at the time of the assignment for similar space in the building or referring in any manner to Landlord or to the building other than by the street address of the building;

d. The proposed sublessee or assignee shall not be a tenant, subtenant, occupant or assignee of any premises in the building, or a party who then is actively negotiating, or who, during the six (6) months immediately preceding Tenant's request for Landlord's consent, had actively negotiated, with Landlord or Landlord's agent (directly or through a broker) with respect to space in the building, if comparable space elsewhere in the building is available for leasing on, or is expected to become available for leasing no later than ninety (90) days following, the effective date of the proposed sublease or assignment[, as to which circumstance Landlord agrees to inform Tenant upon Tenant's request (and which information shall apply on to a sublease or assignment proposed to be first effective more than six (6) months following the delivery of such information to Tenant);

e. Tenant shall pay on demand the reasonable costs that may be incurred by Landlord or any mortgagee of Landlord in connection with any assignment or sublease, including, without limitation, the reasonable costs of making investigations as to the acceptability of the proposed assignee or subtenant, and legal costs incurred in connection with the preparation of any requested consent;

58 Landlord may improve the prospects for a court to respect its judgment regarding a prospective tenant's "financial condition," and a tenant may take comfort from greater clarity in landlord's evaluation of a prospective tenant's "financial condition," if the lease sets forth more specific standards for net worth, liquidity, capitalization, net cash flow from operations, net operating income, ratio of debt and contingent liabilities to equity or other criteria for which accounting standards may provide guidance.

f. Tenant shall have delivered to Landlord a duplicate original of the fully executed assignment.

g. [Provisions which restrict excess subdivision of floors, additional alterations, the number of tenants in occupancy of the premises, violation of any restrictive use covenants applicable to the building under other leases, etc.]

In addition, landlords have responded to the lack of clarity regarding reasons which would constitute reasonable bases to withhold consent to an assignment by limiting the recourse of the tenant in the event that the landlord is determined by a court to have withheld its consent improperly. The following provision limits the tenant in such circumstance to remedies of injunctive or declaratory relief to secure specific performance of the landlord's obligation to be reasonable in providing its consent:

Tenant hereby waives any claim against Landlord which Tenant may have based upon any assertion that Landlord has unreasonably withheld or unreasonably delayed or conditioned any consent or approval requested by Tenant, and Tenant agrees that its sole remedy in such circumstance shall be an action or proceeding to enforce any related provision or for specific performance, injunction or declaratory judgment. In the event of a determination that such consent or approval has been unreasonably withheld, delayed or conditioned, the requested consent or approval shall be deemed to have been granted; however, Landlord shall have no liability to Tenant for its refusal or failure to give, or conditioning of, such consent or approval[, unless a court determines that any such action by Landlord was in bad faith.] Tenant's exclusive remedy for Landlord's unreasonable withholding, delaying or conditioning of consent or approval shall be as provided in this Section.

This limitation insulates the landlord from liability to a tenant for money damages for the landlord unreasonably withholding its consent unless the landlord has acted in bad faith. Appendix D provides sample conditions to reasonableness of consent.

To the extent the above provisions shed light on the meaning of "reasonableness," they provide clear benefit to a tenant. However, a tenant should be wary of such provisions where the underlying lease may later become part of a merger or acquisition. In these scenarios, the disclosure requirements of the above provisions may prove problematic given the confidentiality requirement of most mergers and acquisitions. Incorporating language into both the securities purchase agreement and the lease that provides for ex-post facto landlord consent can mitigate this concern.

[28.21] 4. Ambiguities in the Definition of an Assignment

Although commercial leases may contain specific provisions defining “assignment,” often leases do not define “assignment” or rely on catch phrases or other terms which create ambiguity regarding the scope of the restrictions. Courts have focused their interpretation on those ambiguities which arise when the lease generally restricts assignment without further explanation or when the lease merely prohibits assignment “by operation of law.”

[28.22] a. General Assignment Restrictions

General assignment restrictions are those provisions that prohibit the tenant from “assigning the lease” without more detail or require the tenant to obtain landlord consent before “assigning” the lease. Since, as noted above, courts generally disfavor restraints on alienation, general assignment restrictions are often construed quite narrowly.⁵⁹ Thus, general assignment clauses may restrict only a limited range of transactions, and may give rise to uncertainty as to whether particular transaction structures require the landlord’s consent.

Although the case law in this area is lacking in uniformity, the majority of holdings indicate that the less a transaction seems like a formal assignment, the more likely it will be considered outside the purview of a general restriction on assignments. This trend is best illustrated by courts’ treatment of two types of transactions: transfers of interest in a tenant and the restructuring of a tenant.

The majority view is that transfers of interest in a tenant, such as stock transfers in a corporation or transfers of membership interests in a partnership or limited liability company, are not prohibited by general restrictions on assignment of a lease.⁶⁰ This is true even if the transfer is of a majority interest in the entity which is the tenant,⁶¹ or if the transfer is done for the purpose of evading the assignment restriction.⁶² These transactions are dissimilar to formal assignments in that the tenant involved is not transferring any of its leasehold obligations and is legally distinct from the transferring parties. Therefore, courts commonly have been unwilling to find such transactions restricted by general non-assignment clauses.⁶³

The issue of stock transfers (or transfer of ownership interests in other entities such as limited liability companies or partnership, which are all encompassed, for purposes of this discussion, within the discussion of “stock” transfers) in the context of assignment clauses becomes more complicated, however, where the assignment provision explicitly covers stock transfers. An “Advanced Assignment Restriction,” for instance, proscribes tenant corporations from transferring corporate control.⁶⁴ Some provisions even prohibit transfer of any direct or indirect beneficial interest in the tenant; imagine in such a case the dilemma presented by the death of an owner of the tenant after which the decedent’s stock transfers first to the decedent’s estate and then to his or her heirs, or by public transfers of stock if the tenant becomes, or is acquired by, a public company. While such provisions are presumably enforceable under New York

60 See In re Ames Dep’t Store, 127 B.R. 744, 748–49 (Bankr. S.D.N.Y. 1991) (“In Illinois, it is settled that the transfer of all of the stock issued by a tenant corporation does not effect an assignment of the tenant’s lease unless the lease so provides.”); Ser-Bye Corp. v. C. P. & G. Markets, 179 P.2d 342, 345 (Cal. Dist. Ct. App. 1947) (finding that a corporate lessee’s covenant not to assign a leasehold ran only against the lessee itself, and not against its stock or stockholders). See also Stein, supra note 34, at 8 (“Under general legal principles, the sale or transfer of a corporate tenant’s stock does not violate a Basic Assignment Restriction.”).

61 See Burrows Motor Co. v. Davis, 76 A.2d 163, 165 (D.C. 1950) (holding that the transfer of the majority of stock in a corporation did not constitute an assignment).

62 See Ames Dep’t Store, 127 B.R. at 749 (“[T]he rule [that a sale of all of the stock of a corporate tenant does not constitute an assignment of the tenant’s lease] applies even where an assignment of the lease was rejected by the landlord and the rejected assignee then proceeded to purchase the stock of the corporate tenant.”).

63 See Stein, supra note 34, at 8 (stating that a transfer of corporate stock does not violate a general assignment restriction because “a corporation exists separately from its stockholders”). See also U.S. Cellular Inv. Co. v. GTE Mobilnet, Inc., 281 F.3d 929, 935 (9th Cir. 2002) (“[W]hen a party enters into an agreement with a corporation, it is presumed to do so with an understanding of the nature of the corporate form. In effectuating the reasonable expectation of the parties, the law presumes that if the parties intend to limit the corporation’s ability to engage in a legitimate and normal corporate transaction, such a limitation will be specified.”).

Law,⁶⁵ one commentator suggests that New York courts will nonetheless narrowly construe such provisions.⁶⁶ For example, courts might distinguish between the transfer of existing stock and the sale of new stock.⁶⁷ Courts may also overlook such provisions where stock ownership of a corporate tenant is spread across over a dozen shareholders.⁶⁸ Further, courts should, and do, apply similar principles of narrow construction no matter what the business form. Therefore, if a lease only restricts transfers of stock and partnership interests, but the tenant is an LLC, a court may find that the restriction does not apply and allow the assignment of LLC interests.⁶⁹ Landlords and landlords' counsel that choose to include these provisions must carefully craft the restrictions. Conversely, tenants and tenants' counsel should urge landlords to exclude from assignment restrictions certain transactions, such as transmissions of publicly held stock or initial public offerings, legitimate estate planning and affiliate transfers, and transfers consistent with a mutually contemplated business plan, at a minimum.⁷⁰

Courts seem similarly unwilling to find the restructuring of a tenant to be restricted by general non-assignment clauses. Of the few courts that have considered the issue, most consider a tenant restructuring, such as a merger, to be a transfer by operation of law, and not an assignment.⁷¹ Therefore, so long as no restriction on transfer by operation of law is appended to the general assignment restriction, the tenant usually can engage in restructuring without the need for the landlord's consent. One rationale that courts have set forth for this result is that mergers which do not change the ownership or control of a tenant are not comparable to formal assignments as they merely change the tenant's form.⁷² However, if a tenant's restructuring will result in a change of the direct ownership or control of the tenant, courts may be more willing to apply a general assignment restriction. For this reason, it is important to ensure that the lease specifically narrows the definition of an assignment, as discussed below.

[28.23] b. Restrictions on Assignments “By Operation of Law”

While courts often are hesitant to read general non-assignment restrictions broadly, they may be willing to restrict a broader range of transactions when the lease prohibits assignments by operation of law. As described by one commentator in the context of lease assignments, “by operation of law ... refers to the transfer of rights or liabilities by court order, statute or the like—as opposed to a voluntary and express transfer made by a party.”⁷³ In particular, many courts have found that statute-forced mergers result in assignments by operation of law and are thus prohibited under leases restricting such assignments.⁷⁴ Like other assignments by operation of law, such as those resulting from bankruptcy and execution, statute-forced mergers result in the transfer of leasehold interests without any voluntary actions by tenants. Because of this similarity, courts have reasoned that such mergers also should fall within the scope of lease prohibitions on assignments by operation of law.⁷⁵ However, decisions regarding assignments by operation of law are varied, especially in the context of mergers. For example, some courts have found that mergers are not assignments at all, but instead are transfers that do not violate restrictions on assignment, by operation of law or otherwise, even where the assignment provision explicitly prohibits assignment by operation of law.⁷⁶ Therefore, landlords should specify any merger restrictions in the lease, and conversely tenants should make certain that the lease contains appropriate exclusions, as discussed below. As one commentator notes, corporate tenants should also be wary of titling agreements “Assignment Agreement” or otherwise creating the impression in the merger agreement that an assignment has taken place, rather than a mere “change in the identity of the tenant.”⁷⁷ In doing so, a tenant will have a better chance of success in arguing that only a transfer—rather than an assignment—has occurred.

D'Urso Supermarkets, Inc.*, 182 A.D.2d 604, 582 N.Y.S.2d 216, (2d Dep't 1992) (“Under the facts of this case, the merger of the subsidiary corporation into its parent corporation did not constitute an assignment for purposes of violating the nonassignment covenant in the lease . . . 74 See Citizens Bank & Trust Co. v. Barlow Corp., 456 A.2d 1283, 1283 (Md. 1983) (finding that the statute-forced merger of a tenant into another corporation constituted an assignment by operation of law, thus it violated a non-assignment clause prohibiting assignments by operation of law).

75 See Citizens Bank & Trust Co., 456 A.2d at 1289 (“The process of strict construction ordinarily does not accommodate treating transfers by merger differently than other transfers by operation of law, for example, involuntary bankruptcy or execution. To do so would cloud the effect of ‘operation of law’ language and raise doubts as to whether it has any vitality at all.”).

[28.24] c. Totality of the Circumstances

Regardless of whether the assignment provision explicitly mentions assignment by operation of law or stock transfers, there also is some indication in the cases that courts will look towards the totality of the circumstances to determine whether an assignment in violation of a lease has occurred. Specifically, a court may also consider additional facts or circumstances outside of the assignment provision “for the purpose of preventing fraud, deception, evasion, or injustice” in its determination of whether an assignment has occurred.⁷⁸

Landlord's counsel seeks to make the restriction of assignment of a tenant's interests under a lease as comprehensive as possible by defining “assignment” as broadly as possible. In response, the tenant seeks to counter the all-inclusive drafting by landlord's counsel with specific exclusions for transactions which—although involving a transfer of legal or beneficial rights in the lease—are, for practical purposes, consistent with continuity of the tenant's interest under the lease. As discussed above, the general rule disfavoring restrictions on alienation of real property means that a restriction on assignment of a lease does not restrict a transaction which involves a transfer of an interest in stock but which is not technically an assignment. For this reason, a restriction on assignment 76 See Stein, supra note 34, at 14 (“Other courts, however, have held that mergers, although ‘transfers’ by operation of law, are not ‘assignments’ of any kind, and are therefore not covered by such clauses.”); Albermarle, Inc. v. Eaton Corp., 357 S.E.2d 887, 888 (Ga. Ct. of the lease does not, without more, restrict a sublease, or restrict the temporary use of leased space by others (even without compensation), each of which must be separately restricted. The following discussion addresses several categories of specific exclusions sought by tenants; each exclusion seeks to narrow the landlord's broad definition of an assignment.

In the ordinary course of a tenant's business, new ideas, strategic goals or reasons to segregate assets or liabilities will arise which may require, or be addressed by, the creation or purchase of a separate company. The separate company may be entirely or mostly owned by the tenant (a subsidiary), may be created by the shareholders of the tenant but have no direct legal relationship to the tenant (a sister company), or may involve different degrees of common ownership with the tenant (an affiliate). The businesses of large corporate tenants often involve dozens—and may involve hundreds—of such related entities, and the corporate tenant's family of related entities often is continually changing, with spin-offs, new acquisitions and closures. A tenant needs to operate its business without having its ability to pursue business opportunities and make strategic decisions impaired or delayed by the need to obtain the landlord's consent to assignment of the lease. Exceptions from the restrictions on assignment in the lease may be essential to achieve this goal.

In addition to the range of related entity transactions described above, even individual tenants in smaller leases have similar needs: a father wishing to transfer the lease for a family-owned business to his son or daughter or to a family trust; or the executor of the estate of a deceased business owner who needs to transfer a lease to the estate and then to the decedent's heirs; or a business owner taking on a partner who needs to transfer the lease to a partnership or limited liability company as a new form of operation of the business—all can run afoul of transfer restrictions. The concern expressed here that the tenant have the ability to accomplish these transactions without the requirement for the landlord's consent may seem excessive if the lease provides that the landlord cannot withhold its consent unreasonably. Keep in mind, however, not only that there is no such reasonableness standard in many commercial leases, but also that the concept of “reasonableness” itself is rife with ambiguity: if the son or daughter does not have the same depth of business experience as the father, would the landlord be reasonable in withholding its consent to assignment of the lease to the son or daughter? In addition, the time to obtain even a reasonable consent can delay, and possibly jeopardize, completion of a transaction.

The following is a sample provision which provides an exclusion for related person transactions involving business entities:

Tenant, without Landlord's consent but upon prior written notice to Landlord as described below, shall have the right to allow any corporation or other entity which controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with Tenant (herein referred to as a "related corporation") to sublet all or part of the demised premises, or take an assignment of [and assume] Tenant's interest in this lease, in either event, for any of the purposes permitted to Tenant, subject however to compliance with all of Tenant's obligations under this lease, provided that (i) Tenant shall not be in default in the performance of any of its obligations under this lease, beyond the expiration of applicable notice and cure periods provided herein, on the effective date of such sublease or assignment, (ii) not less than ten (10) days prior to such subletting or assignment Tenant shall notify Landlord of the name of any such related subtenant or assignee and shall provide Landlord with an [officer's certification of] [opinion of legal counsel to] Tenant, and such other evidence as Landlord may reasonably request, that such subtenant or assignee is related to Tenant in such manner, and (iii) from time to time during the term hereof Tenant shall provide Landlord with an [officer's certification of] [opinion of legal counsel to] Tenant, and such other evidence as Landlord may reasonably request, that such subtenant or assignee continues to remain related to Tenant in such manner. Tenant, upon request by Landlord, shall provide to Landlord at any reasonable time and from time to time, but not more frequently than twice in any twelve (12) month period, evidence reasonably sufficient to establish that such subtenant or assignee continues to control, be controlled by, or be under common control with, Tenant. No such subletting or assignment shall relieve, release, impair or discharge any of Tenant's obligations, or Tenant, hereunder. For the purposes hereof, "control" shall be deemed to mean commonality of interests having the power to direct the management and policy of such corporation or other business entity and commonality of ownership of not less than fifty (50%) percent of all of the voting stock of such corporation or not less than fifty (50%) percent of all the legal and equitable interests in any other business entity.

This provision permits an assignment among related entities without the landlord's consent only so long as the parties to the assignment remain related entities. Without such a limitation, the tenant would be permitted to assign the lease to a related entity without the Landlord's consent, and then to transfer all the interests in the related entity to a third party, and thereby evade the restrictions elsewhere in the lease on assignment of the lease to unrelated persons. The lease provides that it is a default if the commonality of interests terminates between the parties to the assignment without the parties obtaining the consent of the landlord in the same manner that the tenant must obtain such consent under the lease to an assignment between unrelated persons. While it is evident that a default should result, the default section of the lease should expressly provide for the default, and default should not require prior notice from the landlord or be subject to a cure right.⁷⁹ In addition, the lease should expressly state that if the commonality of interests which permitted an assignment among related persons without landlord's consent no longer exists, the assignment itself is either void from the date such commonality no longer exists, or is voidable by the landlord in its sole discretion. Although, if the assignment is voidable, the landlord can decide at such time whether it is better off with or without recourse to, and occupancy by, the assignee which formerly was a related entity of the original tenant, an assignment which is merely "voidable," rather than "void," implicitly is valid unless the landlord actually elects to void the lease.

A tenant can achieve the same economic and practical effects of a direct assignment of its interests under a lease by the transfer of direct or indirect interests in the tenant itself. For this reason, the initial draft prepared by a landlord or landlord's counsel of an assignment restriction, as illustrated above, often also restricts a transfer of direct or indirect interests in the tenant which, individually or in a series of transactions, constitutes 50% or more of the interests in tenant.⁸⁰ The determination of when a transfer of 50% or more of the interests in the tenant is relatively simple when applied to the transfer of shares in a corporation with a single class of common stock. Complexity is presented, however, by multiple classes of stock, the issuance of new stock with dilutive effect, the issuance of warrants, options, convertible debt, and other transactions affecting the equity structure of a corporation, or by distinctions among such attributes of partnership or limited liability company interests as management of the entity, rights to preferences, and general versus limited liability.

⁷⁹ Tenant's counsel may contend that there should be a right to notice and a cure period, since the termination of the commonality of interests may be inadvertent. It is hard to see how this could be the case, and even if such a case should arise, a right to notice and cure would eviscerate the force of the restriction.

As noted above, a change in the membership of a partnership or a limited liability company generally is not held to violate a restriction on assignment absent express language to the contrary. Nevertheless, good drafting practice on a tenant's behalf would be to so provide expressly in the lease. On the landlord's behalf, a lease restriction, as illustrated above, should apply expressly to the transfer of direct or indirect beneficial interests in the tenant, at least if the interests transferred aggregate 50% or more of the total equity interests in the tenant.⁸¹ Such a provision prevents the tenant from effecting, through transfer of the interests in the tenant in a manner which does not require the consent of the landlord, an assignment of the lease which the tenant could not effect directly without first obtaining the consent of the landlord.

One effect of a restriction on transfer of greater than 50% of the interests in the tenant without the landlord's consent is to make the consent of the landlord a condition to sale of the tenant's business. The landlord's insistence on a right to consent is perceived by the tenant to be overreaching, particularly if the sale will not affect the financial standing of the tenant and the business will continue to operate in the leased premises as it operated before the sale of the business. Moreover, a tenant has a legitimate concern that, in the event of a profitable sale of a business operating in leased premises, the landlord will seek to attribute part of the profit to the increased value of the leasehold, and will condition its consent on the tenant sharing part of the profit from the sale with the landlord. For this reason a tenant may seek a specific exclusion for a sale of its business or a merger of its business with another firm, as follows:

80 See Modern Commc'n Serv. Inc. v. NEP Image Group, LLC, 19 Misc. 3d 1134(A), 864 N.Y.S.2d 93 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 2008) (finding that a merger involving a tenant limited liability company's parents could trigger a lease provision that considered the transfer of more than a 50 percent beneficial interest in the tenant "an assignment").

81 See id. at *4 ("[The lease provides] that an assignment includes a 50% or more transfer of the 'beneficial interest in the lessee . . . whether of stock, partnership interest, company share or otherwise by any party in interest.' This language clearly states that the parties meant for the term 'beneficial interest' to encompass the partnership interest in . . . the lessee.").

Tenant, without Landlord's consent but upon prior written notice to Landlord as set forth below, shall have the right to assign its entire interest in this lease and the leasehold estate hereby created to a Successor Entity (as hereinafter defined) to Tenant; provided, however, that (i) Tenant shall not be in default in the performance of any of its obligations under this lease, beyond the expiration of applicable notice and cure periods provided herein, on the effective date of such assignment, (ii) not less than ten (10) days prior to such effective date Tenant shall have notified Landlord of the name of the proposed assignee and provided Landlord with an [officer's certification of] [opinion of legal counsel to] Tenant, and such other evidence as Landlord may reasonably request, that such assignee is a Successor Entity to Tenant, and (iii) the proposed occupancy shall not increase in any material respect the burden of Tenant's occupancy upon the building equipment or building services. A "Successor Entity," as used in this paragraph shall mean (a) a corporation or other business entity into which or with which Tenant is merged or consolidated, in accordance with applicable statutory provisions, provided that by operation of law or by effective provisions contained in the instruments of merger or consolidation, the liabilities of the entities participating in such merger or consolidation are assumed by the entity surviving such merger or consolidation, and (b) a corporation or other business entity which acquires, together with this lease and all the interests of Tenant hereunder, all the goodwill of Tenant and all or [substantially all] [a substantial portion of] the other property and assets of Tenant,⁸² and which assumes all of the obligations and liabilities of Tenant under this lease and all or [substantially all] [a substantial portion of] of the other obligations and liabilities of Tenant,⁸³ and (c) any successor to a Successor Entity by either of the methods described in subdivisions (a) and (b) above. (continued below)

The expansion since the early 2000s of public stock issuance even by start-up companies has made the inclusion of language such as the following clause (d) more common:

and (d) a corporation (including, but not limited to, Tenant on the date hereof) or other business entity which engages in an initial public offering or follow-on offering of shares of stock or other ownership interest or debt[, whether by public offering or private placement of stock, other ownership interest or debt of Tenant, or in connection with a venture capital or other equity investment in Tenant,] [on recognized public stock exchange in the United States].

Any transaction described in clause (a), (b), (c) or (d) above shall be subject to the condition that such merger

82 This provision would not allow the sale of an operating division alone without the landlord's consent unless the division alone constitutes substantially all of the assets of the tenant. Since this often is not the case, a tenant with many divisions and which regularly buys and sells companies should seek a further exclusion which allows sale without consent of all the assets pertaining to a specific operating division. Such an exclusion is particularly common in the case of a tenant which owns several separate restaurant chains, or several separate retail store brands, or several separate manufacturing divisions, and wants to preserve the ability to sell any of them separately without being required to obtain the landlord's consent. In fact, in such circumstances the tenant may negotiate for the right to a secure a release of the assignor from liability under the lease following assumption of the lease by the transferee. The landlord often will agree to provide such a release since the obligations under any one restaurant or retail lease typically are small relative to the financial standing of the entire chain.

83 While this provision in leases often requires that the successor not only acquire all or substantially all of the assets of the tenant but also assume all or substantially all of the liabilities of the tenant in order to reinforce the concept that the successor as tenant is the successor to all aspects of the tenant's business, the tenant's financial standing obviously would be better if it acquired all or substantially all of the assets of the tenant and assumed less than all the liabilities of the tenant. This argument often persuades Landlord's counsel to remove the clause of this lease provision requiring the successor also to assume all or substantially all of the tenant's liabilities other than the lease.

or consolidation, or such acquisition and assumption, or such sale or investment, as the case may be, is for a valid, independent business purpose and is not principally for the purpose of transferring the leasehold estate created hereby. In addition, in each such transaction immediately after giving effect to any such merger or consolidation, or such acquisition and assumption or such sale or investment, as the case may be, the entity surviving such merger or acquisition or created by such consolidation or acquiring such assets and assuming such liabilities, or surviving such sale or investment, as the case may be, shall have assets, capitalization and a net worth, as determined in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles as established by reasonable evidence delivered to Landlord with the aforesaid notice to Landlord, [reasonably sufficient as of the date of such transaction to satisfy the obligations of Tenant under this lease during the term of this lease as they become due] [not less than the assets, capitalization and net worth of Tenant immediately prior to such transaction] [not less than the lesser of (x) the assets, capitalization and net worth of Tenant immediately prior to such transaction and (y) the assets, capitalization and net worth of Tenant on the date of this Lease].⁸⁴

During the explosion of internet companies in the late 1990s, the founders or venture capital funders of many start-up companies raised money by successive public offerings or private placements of shares. Such offerings or placements almost always eventually reduced the percentage of equity held by the original shareholders well below 50 percent. A tenant which regularly receives venture capital equity investment presents a particular challenge for the tenant's counsel, since over time a change in the ownership of 50 percent or more of the equity is likely to occur through the combined effect of purchases of shares or interests by new shareholders, members or partners, issuances of additional shares which dilute the existing shareholders, and exercises of options, warrants and other rights. One approach to providing flexibility for tenants while addressing the landlords' concerns is to focus on the continuity of existing management (qualified for ordinary employee turnover) and the maintenance of a minimum level of equity ownership associated with existing management. The sample provision below is only a starting point, since each business has its own unique needs and each landlord has its own tolerances. One way to draft so that the tenant has flexibility with regard to both outright transfers and related person transactions, is to define "control" more narrowly than a 50% interest:

84 The differences between the bracketed choices may be critical. The first standard, the tenant's ability to meet its obligations under the lease as they arise, is the most beneficial to a tenant, being essentially a standard of mere solvency. The second standard would allow the tenant to engage in a transaction which does not have an adverse impact on the tenant's financial standing, but is problematic for a tenant which—since the lease was signed—has greatly increased its financial standing or has been acquired by a much larger company which assumed the lease at the time of the acquisition. The third standard adopts two alternative tests to achieve a blended standard: the transaction cannot have an adverse impact on the tenant's financial standing which would cause it be less than the financial standing which the landlord underwrote when the tenant originally signed the lease. The third standard is most equitable, but many landlords reject this standard in favor of the second standard on the basis that part of what the landlord bargained for in accepting the tenant originally was the improvement of the tenant's credit standing over time.

For purposes hereof "control" shall mean (i) commonality of interests having the power to direct the management and policy of such corporation or other business entity after giving effect to such transaction with the holders of such interests before such transaction and (ii) not less than ten percent (10%) of the voting stock or legal and equitable interests in such corporation or other business entity after giving effect to such transaction is held by persons or firms who in the aggregate held at least ten percent (10%) of the voting stock or legal and equitable interests in such corporation or other entity before such transaction.

In today's financial climate, it is more important than ever that leasing counsel discuss with a prospective tenant the tenant's capital structure and business model and the prospective tenant's plans for raising capital and for strategic business transactions during term of the lease.

One further drafting issue regarding lease restrictions which extend to transfers of control: while such restrictions often define a transfer of a certain percentage of interests in, or of a "controlling" interest in, the tenant as an "assignment," the requirements applicable to an assignment often fail to distinguish such a "deemed" assignment from an actual assignment. For instance, leases often provide that an assignee of the tenant's interest under the lease must assume the lease in writing. This requirement, if applied to the transfer of a 50% ownership interest in a tenant, would require the new shareholder of a corporate tenant or the new member of an LLC tenant to assume directly the leasehold obligations of the tenant, thereby wiping out the protection which the form of entity used provides the investors in such entities. Conversely, a provision that an assignee of the tenant's interest under a lease must have a specified minimum financial standing will not achieve the landlord's goal of ensuring adequate recourse for performance of the lease if, following a change of control which is deemed to be an assignment of lease, the test is applied to the new shareholder or member even though it is the tenant, rather than the new shareholder or member, that is liable for the obligations under the lease. Such results are not intended, and counsel should review the treatment of a deemed assignment of lease with care to distinguish it from an actual assignment of lease where appropriate.

[28.28] c. Other Transfers of Rights in the Lease

The increased integration of the operations of many businesses have made it more common to find persons working in a tenant's space who are not employees of the tenant, and equipment located in a tenant's space which does not belong to the tenant. The space leased by a tenant for a securities trading operation, a real estate brokerage or a travel agency, may be full of desks and computer terminals at which the tenant's clients or independent contractors come to work every day and seem to all outward appearances to operate their own businesses within the tenant's space. A tenant which is a Web hosting or telecommunications switching business may fill its leased space with equipment and employees of the tenant's clients. Such "users" of space, whose occupancies typically are not evidenced by actual subleases or assignments, concern landlords as an end run around transfer restrictions in the lease, and concern tenants as a possible technical default under the lease arising from the tenant simply operating its business in the ordinary course.

Such uses are referred to generically as "desk space," reflecting the history of professional firms leasing out the use of individual offices, fitted out with desks, to other professionals in the same or related fields. Often the leasing of desk space arises from the tenant initially leasing more space than the tenant needs for its own business on the date of the lease so that the tenant will have future expansion space. The following provision allows such uses:

Notwithstanding anything contained to the contrary in this Article, Tenant shall have the right, without Landlord's consent, to share the use of portions of the demised premises [constituting not more than twenty percent (20%) of the total rentable area of the demised premises] with persons who are, or who are performing tasks for, clients or customers of Tenant or vendors to Tenant in connection with Tenant's ordinary business operations, without being in violation of this Article, provided that each such occupant (a) shall not violate any term or condition of this Lease and shall not be employed by or agents of any other tenant in the building, (b) shall specifically be the responsibility of Tenant and shall be covered under the insurance policies which Tenant is required by this Lease to maintain or by insurance policies otherwise meeting the requirements of this Lease and reasonably acceptable to Landlord, under which Tenant, Landlord, any mortgagee of the building and any other party entitled to be so named on Tenant's insurance hereunder, are named as additional insureds, and Tenant shall have delivered to Landlord original certificates of insurance evidencing such coverage prior to the commencement of any such occupancy, and (c) at all times shall provide services primarily to customers and clients of Tenant or using Tenant's devices, infrastructure, intellectual property or business relationships, shall utilize Tenant's entrance to the demised premises, reception area and other facilities, and shall give the physical appearance that the demised premises is being occupied solely by one (1) entity for the purpose of Tenant's primary business operations.

Although a discussion of collateral assignment of leases in connection with leasehold financing is outside the scope of this chapter, it is worth noting that a lease also may be collaterally assigned as part of a general financing of all of the assets of a tenant. A blanket pledge of assets by a tenant would violate an unqualified restriction in a commercial lease prohibiting assignment of the lease, since the grant of the collateral assignment itself is, technically, a prohibited assignment. The following is an example of a provision which will avoid this technical default:

Notwithstanding the provisions of this Article, Tenant shall have the right, without Landlord's prior consent but upon ten (10) days' prior notice to Landlord, to pledge (subject to all of the terms, covenants, and conditions of this Lease) its entire interest in this Lease to any lender in connection with a borrowing by Tenant which is secured by all or substantially all of the [tangible] assets of Tenant. The exercise by any such lender of its rights under any such pledge to acquire Tenant's interest in this Lease shall be deemed an assignment of this Lease and shall be subject to the terms of the other provisions of this Article.

[28.29] d. Obtaining Consent

In the face of uncertainty regarding the assignment provisions of a lease, a tenant may proceed in several ways.

First, a tenant can explicitly solicit the landlord's consent. A tenant may opt to do so even without reference to the specific lease provisions. For example, a tenant can request that the landlord agree to the following language:

Pursuant to the Lease, Tenant may be required to obtain your written consent to the Transaction. By countersigning this letter below, you acknowledge receipt of this notice, consent to the Transaction, acknowledge that Tenant has complied with the Lease, agree that you will have no right to terminate the Lease as a result of the Transaction and otherwise waive the applicability of any provisions of the Lease that might be triggered by the Transaction or otherwise by this letter. If, however, the Transaction is not consummated for any reason, you acknowledge that the Lease, as currently constituted and in effect, will remain effective and that this consent will not be construed to modify, waive, impair or affect any of the terms of the Lease as currently in effect or any rights or obligations thereunder. This letter is being provided for Landlord's benefit only and shall not be construed to create any obligation on behalf of Tenant to obtain Landlord's consent to the Transaction or any future transaction.

In the event the landlord rejects the request, a tenant could solicit a reasonably specific explanation, particularly where the lease requires reasonable consent.

Second, similar to the above, a tenant can solicit the landlord's consent, but instead state that, under the lease, the landlord's consent is not needed. Under this approach, a tenant can benefit under theories of reliance or laches should the landlord fail to respond to the notice, but later object. A tenant can similarly argue that landlord's actions subsequent to the notice (e.g., failure to respond) constitute deemed consent.

Given the theory of deemed consent, the landlord must keep in mind that communication with a proposed assignee, or other conduct by the landlord with respect to a proposed assignee which creates an inference that the landlord has consented to assignment to the assignee, can be construed as a deemed consent by the landlord, especially if the landlord also accepts rent from the proposed assignee or otherwise deals with the proposed assignee. A lease can contain the following provision to a protect against a deemed consent:

All references to the consent or approval of, or similar action by, Landlord in this Lease shall be deemed to mean only the written consent or approval of Landlord in accordance with the terms and conditions of this Lease, and no consent or approval shall be effective for any purpose, nor shall any consent be deemed to exist based on any theory including estoppel, laches, course of dealing, verbal understanding or other basis, unless fully set forth in a writing delivered to Tenant.

A landlord and its counsel should be scrupulous to avoid dealing with any person other than the actual tenant in matters affecting the tenancy until consent to an assignment actually has been given by the landlord.

Finally, particularly where the lease does not appear to cover the assignment, a tenant can opt to proceed without notice to the landlord. While this option may prove harmless to a tenant if a court finds the assignment to be immaterial, which in itself may be unlikely, it also may impair the tenant's ability to argue that the landlord's subsequent objection was unreasonable: according to several cases, the less information that a tenant provides to the landlord regarding an assignment, the more likely that the landlord's refusal to consent will be held to be reasonable.⁸⁵

[28.30] e. Form of Consent

The landlord can grant its consent in any manner, and verbally or in writing. A written consent is preferable to establish clearly that consent was obtained and to set forth any conditions applicable to the consent. In some cases, a landlord simply will countersign a letter from the tenant requesting the landlord's consent, with little to add other than the non-waiver language discussed above. For an assignment of a larger lease or of any lease for which more thorough documentation is needed, the landlord may require a separate instrument of consent. Appendix E to this chapter is a sample of a landlord's consent to assignment of a lease.

[28.31] D. Assignment by Landlord

As discussed above, a landlord rarely agrees to restrict its ability to assign the landlord's interest under the lease. The tenant may ask, rightfully, however, to whom it has recourse for performance of the landlord's obligations under the lease if the landlord sells the property and assigns the tenant's lease to the landlord's successor in connection with the sale.

The New York Real Estate Board form of office lease includes the following general provision that the lease is binding on successors and assigns of each party:

The covenants, conditions and agreements contained in this lease shall bind and inure to the benefit of Owner and Tenant and their respective heirs, distributees, executors, administrators, successors, and except as otherwise provided in this lease, their assigns.

Many leases include a similar provision. However, unless the buyer of the property, as assignee of the lease, affirmatively assumes the lease, such a provision is unlikely to support enforcement against the assignee of any provisions of the lease other than those which run with the land and thus are enforceable by virtue of the privity of estate between the tenant and the new owner. A tenant seeks a provision which requires that the new owner, as successor landlord, assume the tenant's lease. Since the landlord, when selling the property, has an interest in obligating the buyer of the property to perform the leases, the seller, as landlord, may agree to secure an assumption of the lease from any buyer of the property to whom the landlord's interest under the lease is assigned. The landlord may also agree to a tenant's reasonable request that the lease obligate the tenant to attorn to a successor landlord only if the successor landlord assumes the lease.

In the absence of an assumption of the lease by the buyer, the buyer takes title to the property purchased "subject to" all leases. Taking title "subject to" the leases obligates the buyer to perform those obligations relating to the tenancy which run with the land under the buyer's privity of estate with the tenant. The buyer is not obligated, however, to perform any other terms of the lease which do not run with the land. Failure of the buyer to perform any terms of the lease which do not run with the land ordinarily would allow the tenant to exercise its contractual remedies against the seller of the property, but the exercise of any such remedies may be of little value since the lease provides that the recourse of the tenant to the seller is limited to the seller's interest in the property. The tenant also may elect to declare a default under the lease and exercise its remedies which may include termination of the lease; however, termination may be of no practical appeal to a tenant which has installed expensive improvements in leased premises, or to a retail tenant whose consumer traffic depends on association of its business with the leased location, or if the market rent is greater than the lease rent and the tenant's proposed assignment was intended to capitalize on the increased market value of the leasehold.

The distinction between the buyer merely taking the property subject to the lease, and actually assuming the lease, can be significant for the tenant. Suppose, for example, that the tenant has a lease at below-market rent. The new owner of the property may want the tenant to leave the demised premises in order to re-rent the space at the higher market rent. The new owner may not want to assume the lease and may rely on not having assumed the lease, and a narrow definition of which covenants run with the land, to withhold material services and rights to encourage the tenant to vacate the premises. The tenant then must decide whether to exercise any self-help remedies under the lease or to incur the expense of bringing suit against a recalcitrant landlord. Preserving the right of a buyer as successor landlord to pursue this course of action is one reason that a landlord may refuse to provide in the lease that a successor landlord must assume the tenant's lease.⁸⁶

Typically a buyer of leased property will require an estoppel certificate from each tenant, or from a substantial percentage of the tenants, at the property. The request for an estoppel certificate notifies each tenant of an impending sale or mortgage of the property. The tenant then has the opportunity to identify in the certificate any claims which the tenant has against the landlord (other than for prospective performance by the landlord under the lease). Even if the lease provides that the tenant has no recourse to the landlord after the sale of the property, the buyer is not likely to accept title to the property when claims have been raised by a tenant unless the seller provides adequate assurance, such as an indemnity, to the buyer—protecting the buyer from liability for the asserted claims. In this manner the seller often is subject to surviving liability despite the limitation on liability in the lease. The owner of rental property will be better served by an express provision in the lease which sets forth what the liability will be of any successor landlord and what the recourse of tenants will be to any such successor.

[28.32] VII. ALLOCATION OF PROFITS FROM ASSIGNMENT

Restrictions on assignment of a lease exist to protect a number of legitimate interests of the landlord, as discussed above, concerning the use of its property. Clearly, however, one of the reasons for such restrictions is the desire to prevent or make more difficult a tenant assignment of its interest under its lease for a profit. A basic tenant of the real estate business for landlords is that the landlord, and not the tenant, is in the real estate business. While a landlord may allow its tenant to relieve itself of liability under the lease by assigning or subletting the lease, the landlord will try its utmost to capture any appreciation of the leasehold.

[28.33] A. Sharing Profits from an Assignment of Lease

As discussed above, many tenants, particularly creditworthy tenants who will remain liable under a lease notwithstanding an assignment, dispute that the landlord has any legitimate interest in restricting assignment of the lease. To the tenant, any profit which the landlord derives from an assignment of the lease by the tenant is a windfall for the landlord, above and beyond the contract rent for which the landlord negotiated. Moreover, the tenant will remain liable under the lease notwithstanding the assignment, and tenants believe that they are entitled to retain any appreciation of the leasehold as a return for the risk the tenant bore by agreeing to be liable under the lease for an extended term. In fact, any profit from assignment of the lease may reflect, at least in part, an increase in the rental value of the premises from the tenant's improvements to the space.

Where a tenant has secured the right (even with some limitations) to assign the lease, landlords nevertheless often do allow the tenant to retain part of any profit from an assignment of the lease. Landlords recognize that only by giving the tenant a participation in any profit from an assignment of the lease will the landlord ensure that the tenant has an incentive to maximize the profit from an assignment of the lease.

The term “profit,” outside the context of assignment of a lease, generally is understood to mean a positive net financial return over the time period in question. This general understanding does not control in commercial leases, where “profit” instead typically refers to the mathematical amount by which the aggregate payments (of rent and any other amounts) by an assignee exceed the aggregate payment obligations of the assignor to the landlord under the lease. The definition of “profit” in the lease determines the extent to which an assigning tenant can recover any of the costs incurred by it in making the assignment before having to pay, or share, the remaining proceeds from the assignment. The following is a sample provision for sharing of profits from an assignment:

If Landlord shall consent to an assignment of this Lease and Tenant shall either receive any consideration from its assignee (other than from a Related Entity) in connection with the assignment of this lease, Tenant shall pay to Landlord, as additional rent, fifty percent (50%) of so much, if any, of such consideration (including any sums paid by the assignee for the purchase of Tenant's property in and improvements made by Tenant to the Premises[, less the then net unamortized or undepreciated cost of such property and improvements determined on the basis of Tenant's federal income tax returns or, if Tenant does not file such tax returns, on the same basis as carried on Tenant's books]) as shall exceed the Permitted Expenses (hereinafter defined) in connection therewith. All sums payable to Landlord pursuant to this Section shall be paid to Landlord within ten (10) days following the date that the assignee makes such payments to Tenant. For purposes of this Section, “Permitted Expenses” shall mean the aggregate amount of (a) brokerage commissions, (b) reasonable out-of-pocket legal fees and disbursements and closing costs, (c) reasonable advertising expenses, (d) the reasonable out-of-pocket costs, if any, incurred by Tenant in preparing the subject space for occupancy or providing a contribution to such preparation, and (e) the monetary equivalent of reasonable and customary rent concessions.⁸⁷

87 Note that the definition of Permitted Expenses in this sample is favorable to the tenant in that it includes a breadth of categories of possible tenant expenses which may exceed what many landlords are prepared to provide. A tenant might seek, in addition, to recover any vacancy expense incurred by it before the assignment is effective or, following a default by an assignee, until another rent-paying tenancy is in place.

The tenant can be obligated to pay the landlord the amount of all such excess payments made by the assignee even if the tenant, in fact, will not realize a “profit,” in the commonly understood economic sense, because the tenant does not actually recover all the expenses it incurs. To illustrate this point, assume that four years remain of a lease term which originally was ten years,⁸⁸ and that the assignee makes a lump sum payment to the assignor for assignment of the lease.⁸⁹ Even though the assignor will not know if the assignee's initial payment represents a profit until the end of the lease term, when the assignee has fully performed all the terms of the lease, the lease typically will require that the assignor treat the entire lump sum payment as profit and pay the landlord any portion due the landlord at the time the assignment becomes effective. If, at a later date, the assignee defaults under the lease, the assignor, still liable under the lease, can be pursued by the landlord to resume paying the full rent under the lease for the balance of the term and to cure any other defaults under the lease.

While the revival of the obligations under the lease obviously diminishes the extent to which the initial payment from the assignee represents a true economic profit for the assignor, leases rarely allow the tenant to account for any expenses it incurs after the assignment in determining how much profit must be paid to the landlord. Profit sharing provisions in some leases refer to “excess rents” rather than “profits” so as to remove the implication that the parties intended the tenant to realize an actual economic profit before being required to pay, or share, the proceeds of the assignment with the landlord. In fact, since the landlord is paid in full when the assignment becomes effective, any credit to the tenant for costs incurred in the future would require the landlord to pay money back to the tenant or to allow the tenant to offset any amount which should be credited to the tenant against future rents coming due under the lease. It will come as no surprise that such a provision would be unusual (although not unprecedented) and difficult, but not impossible, for a tenant to secure. An example of such a provision, which still takes effect only upon satisfaction of conditions which favor the landlord, follows:

88 For this discussion, which addresses only an assignment of the lease, the period in question is always the entire balance of the lease term since an assignment of a lease transfers all the remaining interest of the assignor under the lease. The period in question for a sublease may be less than the entire balance of the lease term.

89 When the market rental rate for leased space has risen above the contract rent under the lease (because, for instance, rental rates have risen generally, or space was rented unfinished and has been improved), the leasehold has value and an assignee often will pay the assignor for an assignment of the lease, in addition to agreeing to assume all the liabilities of the assignor under the lease. A lump sum payment is the most common form of payment for an assignment of lease. While it is possible for an assignee to agree to make payments to the assignor monthly during the balance of the lease term or periodically over time, this is rarely done; the assignor, having assigned the leasehold, would find it difficult to recover the leasehold in the event the assignee failed to make the future payments coming due after the date of the assignment.

The parties intend that Landlord shall be entitled to retain payments under this Section (“Landlord’s Net Profits”) in connection with an assignment of the Lease only to the extent that such payments represent the agreed Landlord's Percentage of a true economic profit to Tenant from the assignment of the Lease, after taking into account any expenses incurred by Tenant arising from the assignment of the Lease or under the Lease during the balance of the Term of the Lease following the assignment. If Landlord shall have received any payments under this Section (“Landlord’s Net Profits”) in connection with an assignment of the Lease by Tenant, and at any time after the Landlord's receipt of such payments (u) any assignee of the Lease shall default under its agreement with Tenant, (v) Tenant shall have pursued its legal remedies in a commercially reasonable and diligent manner, (w) a final unappealable judicial determination has been issued against Tenant in the event a legal action or proceeding is instituted, (x) all amounts payable by the assignee under the Lease or in connection with or under the assignment of the Lease have not been paid (to the extent not paid, hereinafter a “Shortfall”), (y) Tenant shall have used its commercially reasonable and diligent efforts to recover the Premises and to assign the Premises to a new assignee or to sublet the Premises, and (z) Tenant shall have applied its share of the Net Profits received by Tenant in accordance with this Section (after recovery therefrom of the Permitted Expenses described above) to reduce the Shortfall, Tenant then shall have the right, commencing fifteen (15) Business Days following written notice to Landlord (a “Profits Offset Notice”), to offset the amount of Landlord's Net Profits actually received by Landlord, to the extent of the Shortfall remaining after the reduction described in clause (z) above, against the unpaid rent obligations of Tenant under this Lease. [Landlord shall have the right, within ten (10) Business Days following receipt of a Profits Offset Notice, by written notice to Tenant in accordance with the terms of Section ____, to [exercise any recapture right under the Lease] [recapture the Premises] and thereby preclude any such offset by Tenant.] If Landlord shall fail to exercise such recapture right in a timely manner, then, provided Tenant is not then in default under this Lease (beyond the expiration of applicable notice and cure periods herein provided), Landlord agrees to allow Tenant to credit against the Fixed Rent due hereunder the amount of the Landlord's Net Profits actually received by Landlord in respect of the assignment of lease, less the amounts, if any, thereafter recovered by Tenant from the defaulted assignee, until such date as the Premises shall have been sublet or shall have been re-assigned by Tenant.

Many variations on or additions to the above provision could be made. For instance, a landlord could require that any offset be amortized over the remaining term of the lease rather than applied immediately. Because such an offset right would be unusual, there is no market standard approach. Such an offset right would be consistent with the perspective that the landlord and tenant have negotiated to share “profits” rather than periodic excess cash flow. Perhaps the offset right discussed here may become more common when the pendulum of negotiating leverage again swings to tenants.

[28.34] B. Recovery of the Premises and Mitigation of Damages

The preceding provision contemplates that following an assignment of the lease, the original tenant which assigned the lease has the right to recover its leasehold interest from the assignee following a default by the assignee.⁹⁰ Recovery of the leasehold to assign the leased premises again or to sublet the leased premises can be an important means for the tenant to mitigate its damages in the event of a default by its assignee. In fact, however, many lawyers fail to provide for a right of recovery following an assignment. Even where the lease (or the landlord's consent to assignment, where applicable) provides for a right of recovery, the attorney should try to provide that any required landlord's consent is deemed given for reversion of the leasehold to the original tenant, that a recovering assignee has an additional period to cure any uncured default by the assignee, and that a mechanism exists to resolve the practical difficulty of obtaining an actual assignment of the lease from an often recalcitrant assignee, without (if possible) releasing the assignee from its liabilities under the lease.

Unlike the case of a sublease, where the right to occupancy of the premises reverts to the sublessor automatically upon termination of the sublease following a default by the sublessee, an assignee of a lease becomes the owner of the leasehold for all purposes. The assignee remains the lawful tenant in the leased premises following a default, until termination of the leasehold itself by the landlord ends the assignee's right to occupy the space. The landlord will have the right not only to pursue both the assignee and the assignor for money damages, but also, without regard to any such recovery of damages, if the landlord terminates the lease, to re-lease the premises to a third party and collect and retain the rent from that lease. Since the lease may have significant value due to a below-market rental rate or valuable improvements the assignor will want the ability to prevent termination of a valuable leasehold due to the assignee's default, particularly if the landlord is likely to pursue damages from the assignor as a result of such termination. Even if the lease has no significant market value, the assignor still often will want the right to mitigate damages.

Tenant's counsel may be able to limit the damages to which the assignor would be exposed by negotiating for a credit in the amount by which the landlord is able to mitigate its damages. If the landlord elects to mitigate damages, a court may require that the damages recoverable by the landlord be reduced by the amount of any such mitigation.⁹¹ Although under New York common law a landlord is not obligated to mitigate its damages from default under a commercial lease,⁹² tenant's counsel can negotiate for a contractual agreement by the landlord to use its commercially reasonable efforts to mitigate damages and/or at a minimum to credit against any damages recoverable from the assignor the net proceeds actually realized by the landlord from any mitigation the landlord actually effects. Tenant's counsel also should try to secure for the tenant the opportunity to mitigate damages either by a right to recover the leasehold from the defaulted assignee or by a right to obtain from the landlord a new lease for the balance of the term of the lease following termination of the original lease term due to default by the assignee.

Many landlords insist on a lease provision that a request by a tenant for the landlord's consent to assign the lease constitutes an offer by the tenant to allow the landlord to recapture the leased premises and to terminate the lease or, at the option of the landlord, to sublease the leased premises from the tenant for the balance of the term. A recapture right is a means for the landlord to secure for itself the benefit of an increase in the market rental value of the demised premises—an alternative to sharing of profits with the tenant. The landlord also derives the added benefit of recovering control over the tenancy of its property. The following is a sample recapture provision:

Within thirty (30) days following the date of that Tenant gives Landlord notice of a proposed assignment of the Lease by Tenant, Landlord shall have the right, at Landlord's option, to give to Tenant written notice that one of the following shall apply:

(a) this Lease shall terminate on a date (the "Early Termination Date") not earlier than, and not more than sixty (60) days following, the proposed effective date of the proposed assignment as set forth in the notice of the proposed assignment of lease. In the event such termination notice is given, the term of this Lease shall expire on the Early Termination Date with the same effect as if such date were the Expiration Date, the Fixed Rent and additional rent shall be apportioned as of said Early Termination Date, Landlord shall refund to Tenant any prepaid portion of Fixed Rent and additional rent for any period after said Early Termination Date, and Tenant shall surrender the demised premises to Landlord on or before said Early Termination Date.

92 In Holy Props., 87 N.Y.2d at 133–34, the New York Court of Appeals recently reconsidered and re-affirmed this doctrine on the basis that a lease, as a present transfer of an estate in real property, should not be governed by legal principles generally applicable to executory contracts. In so holding, the Court failed to accept the invitation to require landlords to mitigate damages, which is found in a number of lower court cases, including Grays v. Brooks, 148 Misc. 2d 646, 561 N.Y.S.2d 515 (N.Y. Civ. Ct., Queens Co. 1990) and Rubin v. Dondysh, 146 Misc. 2d 37, 549 N.Y.S.2d 579 (N.Y. Civ. Ct., Queens Co. 1989), rev'd on other grounds, 153 Misc. 2d 657, 588 N.Y.S.2d 504 (Sup. Ct., App. Term, 2d Dep't 1991). See Forty Exch. Co. v. Cohen, 125 Misc. 2d 475, 486–91, 479 N.Y.S.2d 628 (N.Y. Civ. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1984) for an interesting review of cases addressing this issue.

(b) Tenant shall assign this Lease to Landlord, without merger of Landlord's estates, effective as of the proposed effective date of the proposed assignment as set forth in the notice of the proposed assignment of lease. In the event such notice of assignment is given, Tenant shall assign this Lease to Landlord, Landlord shall accept the assignment thereof and shall assume the performance, from and after the effective date of such assignment, of Tenant's obligations under all third party subleases of the demised premises then in effect to which Landlord shall have consented in writing pursuant to this Article, Landlord shall defend and hold harmless Tenant from any claim, loss or damage arising from Landlord's failure to perform such obligations, and Tenant shall be released from all liability for the performance of Tenant's obligations under this Lease [accruing from and after the effective date of such assignment].

Regardless of whether Landlord exercises either option set forth above, Landlord shall be free to, and shall have no liability to Tenant or to any broker claiming through Tenant, lease the demised premises to Tenant's prospective assignee or subtenant.

If the landlord recaptures the space, many lawyers for tenants contend that the tenant should be released from all remaining liability under the lease. The intent of recapture of the space by the landlord is to secure for the landlord, and deprive the tenant of, the benefit of any increase in the market value of the leased premises. If the landlord elects to sublease the space from the tenant (a further recapture option not set forth above), the landlord typically would do so with the intention to further sub-lease the space to a new occupant. The tenant should ensure that the lease provides that it will have no liability for acts of the landlord, as subtenant, or for acts of the landlord's sublessees. Because the leaseback typically will be at the lesser of (x) the rent under the lease, (y) the rent under the transaction proposed by the tenant that triggered the recapture and (z) the then fair market rental value of the space, any increase in the market value of the space will accrue to the landlord even though the tenant remains liable under the lease. Tenants often object, successfully, to facing surviving liability without enjoying the appreciation of the lease, resulting in recapture provisions similar to the example above, under which the landlord must release the tenant in order to recover control of the leased space.

While a full discussion of the treatment of leases in bankruptcy is outside the scope of this chapter, the general treatment of a lease whose landlord or tenant becomes subject to a bankruptcy proceeding should be familiar to any real estate lawyer. The extended duration of a typical lease presents unique issues when seeking to establish rules that treat fairly the landlord, the bankrupt tenant, and other creditors of the tenant. Often a lease is the tenant's contractual obligation of the longest duration. The damages for breach of a contract of extended duration can dwarf the claims of many other creditors. In addition, during the term of the lease the movement of market rents, and changes in the supply of and demand for lease space, can cause the lease to swing between being a net asset and a net liability, yet the lease itself remains an illiquid asset which on its face is subject to many contractual restrictions on assignment.

[28.37] A. Tenant Bankruptcy

All the generally applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, such as the automatic stay, apply to the relationship between landlord and tenant in the event of the tenant's bankruptcy. In addition, the Bankruptcy Code contains a number of provisions which specifically address the bankrupt tenant's obligations under leases of space. The trustee of the tenant's estate in bankruptcy must assume or reject any lease for nonresidential space within 60 days of the date of filing of a voluntary petition or the lease will be "deemed rejected."⁹³ The 60-day period can be, and often is, extended by the bankruptcy court upon a showing of cause by the trustee to allow further time to evaluate and market the lease. During this decision-making period, the tenant is required to timely perform all of the obligations under the lease.⁹⁴

If the lease is rejected by the bankruptcy trustee for the tenant's estate, the landlord is allowed to file a claim in the bankruptcy proceeding as a creditor for an amount not to exceed the greater of one year's rent remaining under the lease and 15 percent of the total rent remaining under the lease. If fifteen percent of the total rent remaining under the lease is greater, the amount of the claim still cannot exceed three years' rent remaining under the lease. Upon rejection, the lease is breached as of the date of the filing of the bankruptcy petition and the landlord may terminate the lease and recover the space.⁹⁵

The bankruptcy trustee for the tenant's estate has the right to assume the lease instead of rejecting the lease if the bankruptcy trustee (i) "cures, or provides adequate assurance that [it] will promptly cure" all defaults under the lease, (ii) compensates the landlord for actual pecuniary losses resulting from such defaults, and (iii) is able to provide "adequate assurance of future performance" of the lease.⁹⁶ If the lease is assumed by the bankruptcy trustee for the tenant's estate, the bankruptcy trustee has the right to assign the lease for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt tenant. The bankruptcy court has broad powers to override conditions or limitations which restrict the ability to effect an assignment of the lease, and these powers not only extend to provisions which merely procedurally impair assignment of the lease but also can reach provisions which diminish the marketability of the lease.⁹⁷

94 11 U.S.C. § 365(d)(3). See, e.g., Centerpoint Props. v. Montgomery Ward Holding Corp., 268 F.3d 205 (3d Cir. 2001). Because § 365(d)(3) requires a trustee to perform all of the debtor's obligations under a lease, the failure to perform such obligations presumably will result in an administrative claim in favor of the non-debtor party to the lease.

95 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6). There is some disagreement whether "fifteen percent" refers to fifteen percent of the remaining term of the lease (the minority view) rather than to fifteen percent of the rents payable during the balance of the term of the lease (the majority view). See In re New Valley Corporation, Civ. Action No. 98-982, Slip Op. at 32-36 (D.C.N.J. Aug. 31, 2000) (op. of Alfred M. Wolin).

96 11 U.S.C. § 365(b). If there have not been any defaults under the lease, then the trustee may assume the lease without providing adequate assurance of future performance.

97 11 U.S.C. § 365(f)(1). The controlling principle, however, still is that the debtor takes the lease as it is; the Bankruptcy Court generally will not seek to impose substantive revisions which make the lease a more attractive asset, but will sweep aside most impediments other than the shopping center assurances to effect the assignment.

There is a considerable body of law applying these concepts, and those cases make clear that there is little a landlord can provide in the lease which will restrict the discretion of the bankruptcy court to maximize the value of the bankrupt's estate. Nevertheless, leases often include provisions intended to influence the decision of the bankruptcy court as to the intent of the parties to the lease or the entitlement of the landlord to the limited landlord protections which are in the Bankruptcy Code. The following is an example of such a provision (provided here without any representation of the extent, if at all, to which such a provision would be enforceable):

A. If this Lease is assigned to any person or entity pursuant to the provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 101-1330 (the "Bankruptcy Code"), any and all monies or other consideration payable or otherwise to be delivered in connection with such assignment shall be paid or delivered to Owner, shall be and remain the exclusive property of Owner and shall not constitute property of Tenant or of the estate of Tenant in case under the Bankruptcy Code. Any and all monies or other consideration constituting Owner's property under the preceding sentence which is not paid or delivered to Owner shall be held in trust for the benefit of Owner and shall be promptly paid to or turned over to Owner. Any person or entity to which this Lease is assigned by a debtor in possession or a trustee in any case under the Bankruptcy Code shall be deemed without further act or deed to have assumed all of the obligations arising under this Lease on and after the date of such assignment. Any such assignee shall execute and deliver to Owner upon demand an instrument confirming such assumption.

B. If Tenant assumes this Lease in any case under the Bankruptcy Code and proposes to assign the same, pursuant to Section 365 of the Bankruptcy Code, to any person or entity who shall have made a bona fide offer to accept an assignment of this Lease on terms acceptable to the Tenant, then notice of such proposed assignment shall be given to Owner by Tenant no later than twenty (20) days after receipt by Tenant of such offer, but in any event no later than ten (10) days prior to the date that Tenant shall make application to a court of competent jurisdiction for authority and approval to enter into such assignment and assumption. Such notice shall set forth (a) the name and address of such person, (b) all of the terms and conditions of such offer, and (c) adequate assurance of future performance by such person under the Lease, including, without limitation, the assurance referred to in Section 365(b)(3) of the Bankruptcy Code or any provisions in substitution thereof. Owner shall have the prior right and option, to be exercised by notice to Tenant given at any time prior to the effective date of such proposed assignment, to accept an assignment of this Lease upon the same terms and conditions and for the same consideration, if any, as the bona fide offer made by such person, less any brokerage commissions which would otherwise be payable by Tenant out of the consideration to be paid by such person in connection with the assignment of this Lease.

C. The term “adequate assurance of future performance” as used in this Lease shall mean that any proposed assignee shall, among other things, (a) deposit with Owner on the assumption of this Lease the sum of nine (9) months of the then Fixed Rent and all [escalation payments] [monthly additional rent] then payable thereunder as security for the faithful performance and observance by such assignee of the terms and obligations of this Lease, (b) furnish Owner with financial statements of such assignee for the prior three (3) fiscal years, as finally determined after an audit and certified as correct by a certified public accountant, which financial statements shall show a net worth, during each of such three (3) fiscal years, of at least six (6) times the Fixed Rent and all [escalation payments] [monthly additional rent] then payable thereunder, (c) grant to Owner a security interest in such property of the proposed assigned as Owner shall deem necessary to provide adequate assurance of the performance by such assignee of its obligations under the Lease.

In one case, the court held that, contrary to paragraph (A) of the preceding provision, any proceeds derived from assignment of the lease will be treated as property of the bankrupt estate. In this case, the bankruptcy court held that a provision similar to paragraph (A) was unenforceable and that the proceeds of an assignment of a lease containing such a provision are property of the bankrupt tenant's estate. In that case, Boo.com North America, an Internet retailer, filed a petition under Chapter 11 of the Bankruptcy Code on October 31, 2000 seeking to conduct an orderly wind-down and liquidation of its assets.⁹⁸ The debtor sought to assume and assign its office lease pursuant to Sections 363 and 365 of the Bankruptcy Code.⁹⁹ The unexpired lease was the primary asset of the debtor and had significant value.¹⁰⁰

Among other objections, the landlord argued that if the debtor's motion to assign and assume were granted, the landlord, and not the tenant, would be entitled to all profits from the assignment under a "Subleasing Profit Provision" in the lease.¹⁰¹ The debtor responded to this argument that Section 365(f) of the Bankruptcy Code allows the trustee of the debtor's estate to avoid any provision in a lease which restricts or conditions assignment. The debtor contended that since the Subleasing Profit Provision "frustrates" the debtor's right to assign the lease, Section 365 preempts the provision, allowing the debtor to realize all profits to be derived from the assignment.¹⁰²

The court found that Section 365(f) voids the Subleasing Profit Provision and allowed the debtor to realize all the profits from assignment of the unexpired lease term.¹⁰³ The precedent on which the court relied in so ruling stated that Section 365 was designed to prevent anti-alienation or other clauses in leases from defeating the ability of a trustee in bankruptcy

100 The lease was for 9,043 square feet of space at approximately $27.50 per square foot, while the market rent for the space was then currently estimated at close to $50.00 per square foot. In addition, the proposed assignee had paid $350,000 for assignment of the lease and the debtor's telephone system plus $150,000 as reimbursement of the debtor's security deposit. Id. at 2.

101 The lease stated that "[i]n the event the Tenant obtains the consent of the Landlord pursuant to paragraph (f) or (g) above and sublets or assigns all or a portion of the premises, the Tenant shall pay to the Landlord, monthly, as additional rent, one hundred (100%) percent of all Subleasing Profit." Id. at 2.

to realize the full value of the debtor's assets.¹⁰⁴ While the court's order found the conclusion it reached almost inevitable under bankruptcy precedents, the decision warranted sizable newspaper articles.¹⁰⁵ Reports of the decision prompted reactions of surprise, even disbelief, among many real estate leasing lawyers. To many of them, the Bankruptcy Code provisions invalidating restrictions on assignment of leases should not also invalidate a provision in a lease which permitted assignment of the lease, thereby allowing the debtor to secure another obligor for the rental (and other) obligations under the lease, and which then simply allocated among the parties the future appreciation of the leasehold. The "profits" from assignment were seen more as an opportunity than an asset. Among bankruptcy lawyers, however, the decision was, uniformly, no surprise at all.

The Bankruptcy Code protections for the landlord of a shopping center in the event of tenant bankruptcy remain among the most difficult for a debtor in possession or a trustee to override or circumvent.¹⁰⁶ These provisions recognize, at least on their face, that a shopping center is characterized by a unique interdependence of occupancies which the bankruptcy court is required by statute to weigh and preserve, even to the financial detriment of the creditors of the bankrupt's estate, in determining whether to allow assignment of a bankrupt tenant's lease.¹⁰⁷ Some commentators regard these protections more as evidence of the lobbying strength of the shopping center industry than as evidence that shopping center tenancies are more uniquely deserving of special protections than are tenancies at other types of real property. Nevertheless, these provisions are the law, and at properties which may benefit from the protection of these provisions, leases should include detailed operating requirements which correspond to the criteria identified in the Bankruptcy Code, tracking the such interdependent operating aspects of the shopping center as hours of operation, standards for fixturing, signage and merchandising, activities of a merchant's association, and a coordinated center-wide marketing plan. Doing so helps to ensure that any assignment of a bankrupt tenant's lease will be subject to compliance with all the operating requirements, and to prevent the Bankruptcy Court from approving an assignment of the lease which may undermine the regime of operating requirements if they are, in fact, being observed at the property.

The following provision, typical of those found in a number of leases, purports to create by contract a right of the landlord, following the bankruptcy of its tenant, to a new lease with any prior tenant which had previously assigned the lease to the bankrupt tenant:

In the event that, at any time after Tenant may have assigned Tenant's interest in this Lease, this Lease shall be disaffirmed or rejected in any case under the Bankruptcy Code, 11 U.S.C. §§ 101 -1330 (the "Bankruptcy Code") or otherwise shall terminate, Tenant, upon request of Landlord given within thirty (30) days following (i) any such disaffirmance, rejection or termination and (ii) actual notice thereof to Landlord in the event of a disaffirmance or rejection or in the event of termination other than by act of Landlord, (x) shall pay to Landlord all Fixed Rent, additional rent and other charges due and owing by the assignee to Landlord under this Lease to and including the date of such disaffirmance, rejection or termination, and (y) as "tenant" shall enter into a new lease with Landlord of the Demised Premises for a term commencing on the effective date of such disaffirmance, rejection or termination and ending on the Expiration Date unless sooner terminated as in such lease provided, at the same Fixed Rent and on the same terms, covenants and conditions as are contained in this Lease, except that (a) Tenant's rights under the new lease shall be subject to the possessory rights of the assignee under this Lease and the possessory rights of any person claiming through or under such assignee or by virtue of any statute or any order of any court, (b) such new lease shall require all defaults existing under this Lease to be cured by Tenant with due diligence, and (c) such new lease shall require Tenant to pay all increases in the Fixed Rent reserved in this Lease which, had this Lease not been so disaffirmed, rejected or terminated, would have accrued under the provisions of this Lease after the date of such disaffirmance, rejection or termination with respect to any period prior thereto. In the event Tenant shall not enter into said new lease within ten (10) days next following Landlord's request therefor, then, in addition to all other rights and remedies by reason of such default, either at law or in equity, Landlord shall have the same rights and remedies against Tenant as if Tenant had entered into such new lease and such new lease had thereafter been terminated on the commencement date thereof by reason of Tenant's default thereunder.

As discussed above, a tenant should consider negotiating for the right, in the event that an assignee of its interest under the lease defaults following the assignment, to secure re-assignment of the lease or a new lease so that the original tenant can mitigate its damages. The foregoing provision preserves all of the tenant's liability without providing any of the mitigation opportunities; securing those opportunities in addition may justify accepting the risk of a provision like the foregoing.

[28.38] D. Landlord Bankruptcy

All the generally applicable provisions of the Bankruptcy Code, such as the automatic stay, also apply to the relationship between landlord and tenant in the event of the landlord's bankruptcy. In addition, the Bankruptcy Code contains a provision which specifically addresses the rights of the tenants and the bankrupt landlord's obligations under any leases of space by the landlord. Unlike the case of a tenant's bankruptcy, the trustee of the landlord's estate is not required by the Bankruptcy Code to assume or reject any lease for space within 60 days of the date of filing of a voluntary petition.¹⁰⁸ The trustee of the landlord's estate, however, must still make a decision with respect to assumption of the lease during the bankruptcy case. During the decision-making period, the tenant is required to continue to perform its obligations under the lease, and the trustee is required to timely perform the obligations of the debtor under the lease.¹⁰⁹

If the lease is rejected by the bankruptcy trustee, the tenant has the right to treat the lease as terminated or remain in occupancy of the leased premises subject to the terms and conditions of the lease.¹¹⁰ If the tenant elects to retain its rights under the lease, the tenant has no right to pursue any claims for damages or other rights (such as to declare a default) arising solely from the bankruptcy against the landlord's estate. In addition, since the landlord is relieved of its affirmative obligations under the lease following rejection, the tenant cannot pursue damages against the landlord's estate for non-performance of the landlord's obligations under the lease.

108 Section 365(d)(4) of the Bankruptcy Code applies only to leases of nonresidential real property under which the debtor is the lessee. 11 U.S.C. § 365(d)(4).

110 11 U.S.C. § 365(h)(1)(A).

The tenant may exercise self-help remedies, however, by performing itself any of the landlord's obligations and offsetting the reasonable costs incurred by the tenant in doing so against the tenant's rental obligations under the lease as they arise.

The bankruptcy trustee has the right to assume the lease (instead of rejecting the lease) if the bankruptcy trustee (i) cures (or provides adequate assurance that it will promptly cure) all defaults under the lease, (ii) compensates the tenant for actual pecuniary losses resulting from such defaults, and (iii) is able to provide “adequate assurance of future performance” of the lease.¹¹¹ If the lease is assumed by the bankruptcy trustee, the bankruptcy trustee has the right to assign the lease for the benefit of the creditors of the bankrupt landlord; unlike in the case of the bankrupt tenant, however, this right is unremarkable since landlords typically have the unconditional right to assign the lease.¹¹² The bankruptcy court has broad powers to override any conditions or limitations which restrict the ability to effect an assignment of the lease, and these powers not only extend to provisions which merely procedurally impair assignment of the lease but also can reach provisions which diminish the marketability of the lease.

[28.39] IX. EFFECT OF VIOLATION OF TRANSFER RESTRICTION BY TENANT

Who is the tenant under a lease if an existing tenant purports to make an assignment of a lease to a new tenant in violation of the terms of the lease? This question can arise in a number of contexts. The tenant may have requested the landlord's consent to an assignment, and then proceeded with the assignment if the landlord withheld consent for reasons which the tenant believed not to be in accordance with the landlord's rights under the lease. The tenant may have entered into a business transaction such as a merger, acquisition, issuance of shares of stock or other change in control of the tenant without recognizing that the transaction was deemed to be an “assignment” of the lease, even though the same legal entity continued to hold the tenancy after the transaction. A business opportunity may have arisen which did not allow enough time to request a required landlord consent, or a transaction may have been consummated with the expectation or hope that the landlord would not object after the 111 11 U.S.C. § 365(b)(1)(A)–(C).

112 Assumption of the lease should be required by 11 U.S.C. § 365(f)(2), which requires a trustee to assume the lease and to provide adequate assurance of future performance (even if the lease is not in default) in connection with any assignment of a lease.

fact. In a number of other contexts, the tenant may purport to assign the lease in a manner which violates the terms of the lease.

The following provision, typical of those found in commercial leases, sets some initial ground rules following an assignment of the lease, even if the landlord's consent was required and was not obtained:

If Tenant's interest in this Lease is assigned, even if in violation of the provisions of this Article, Owner may collect rent from the assignee. If the Demised Premises or any part thereof are sublet to, or occupied by, or used by, any person other than Tenant, even if in violation of this Article, Owner, after default by Tenant under this Lease, may collect rent from the subtenant, user or occupant. In either case, Owner shall apply the net amount collected to the rents reserved under this Lease, but neither any such assignment, subletting, occupancy or use, even if without Owner's prior consent, nor any such collection or application, shall be deemed a waiver of any term, covenant or condition of this Lease or the acceptance by Owner of such assignee, subtenant, occupant or user as tenant. Neither any assignment of Tenant's interest in this Lease nor any subletting, occupancy or use of the Demised Premises or any part thereof by any person other than Tenant, nor any collection of rent by Owner from any person other than Tenant as provided in this Article, nor any application of any such rent as provided in this Article shall, in any circumstances, relieve Tenant of its obligations fully to observe and perform the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease on Tenant's part to be observed or performed.

Typically, a lease provides that an assignment of a lease without first obtaining a consent which is required to effect the an assignment is a default under the lease. The parties to the lease negotiate whether the default exists immediately or only after the landlord has given any required notice of default and after any applicable cure period has expired.¹¹³ If the landlord prefers to terminate the lease and recover the 113 Typically a lease provides that breach of a non-monetary covenant by a tenant constitutes a default. After the landlord gives a notice of default, if required, and the time period, if any, within which the tenant is allowed to cure a default has expired without cure of the default, the default matures into a event of default, allowing the landlord to exercise remedies. Breach of a covenant not to assign or sublet the lease except on certain terms, however, often results in an immediate event of default without regard to rights to notice or cure.

demised premises, the existence of a default will allow the landlord to exercise its remedies to do so. The question remains whether the assignment is valid: Is the purported assignee the tenant under the lease?

No case provides a clear answer to this question under New York law.¹¹⁴ For this reason, landlord's counsel should consider including in the lease a provision which adopts one of the approaches embodied in the following sentence:

If Tenant's interest in this Lease is assigned, whether or not in violation of the provisions of this Article and whether or not Owner has collected rent from the assignee, [Landlord shall have the right, in its sole discretion, to declare the assignment of the lease void and of no force and effect] [such assignment shall be void and of no force and effect unless accepted in writing, in its sole discretion, by the Landlord] [such assignment shall be void and shall constitute an immediate default under this Lease].

If the default provision of the lease is drafted so that the landlord has the option to declare the assignment void, implicit in such language is the conclusion that the assignment is effective unless and until the landlord exercises its avoidance rights. Moreover, if the landlord does not give the tenant notice of default or take other action within a reasonable time following learning of the assignment, and particularly if the landlord accepts rent from the assignee, the assignment would seem to be ratified as effective, notwithstanding boilerplate provisions in the lease which state that landlord does not waive any rights by failing to act and which bar implication of consent from landlord's conduct to the contrary. For these reasons, as well as the reasoning that an act to which prior consent is required should not be effective unless the consent required in fact is given, the preferred drafting approach is to state that the assignment of the lease is void. It is not inconsistent to treat a purported wrongful assignment of the lease as void while still stating that the landlord can collect rent from the purported assignee. If the restrictions on assignment of the lease are drafted as covenants but not as conditions, however, a court could reach the conclusion that an assignment in breach of the covenant still is valid and the proper landlord's recourse is an action for breach of covenant and declaration of a default under the lease.

114 See generally Friedman, supra, § 7.304d at 354-56.

As discussed above, New York law does not require a landlord to mitigate damages following a default by a tenant which results in termination of the lease and/or repossession by the landlord of the demised premises. A corollary to that doctrine is that New York law also does not require a landlord to treat amounts collected from non-tenant occupants of the demised premises as partial payments of rent by the tenant or to credit such amounts to the tenant's obligations. While the tenant's right to a credit for any rentals actually collected by the landlord against any damages which the tenant owes the landlord would seem sufficiently equitable to be easily derived from basic contract law or principles of equity, a specific provision in the lease for such a credit is the better practice to ensure this result.

[28.40] X. STATUS OF ASSIGNOR AFTER ASSIGNMENT

Upon the execution and delivery of an assignment of lease, and the grant of any necessary consents, the assignment is fully effective and the assignee becomes the "tenant" under the lease. As discussed above, after assigning its interest under a lease the assigning tenant nevertheless remains liable under the lease unless released by the landlord. Does the assignor also remain a "tenant" under the lease? If so, can the landlord, after an assignment of the lease, declare a default under the lease on the basis of actions, or failures to act, or events affecting, the assignor alone and not the assignee as the new tenant? Or is the assignee the exclusive "tenant" for such purposes?

Suppose, for instance, that the landlord consented to assignment of the lease to an assignee of borderline creditworthiness because the original assigning tenant, a financially strong entity, would still be liable for the lease. Later, the assignor unexpectedly files bankruptcy, or its financial condition erodes so that it no longer would satisfy a minimum net worth test under the lease. Can the landlord declare a default under the lease on the basis that the assignor, as tenant, has filed bankruptcy, or that the assignor's financial condition has eroded, even though the assignee has been performing and continues to perform all the obligations of the tenant under the lease as applied to itself? Can the landlord enforce a covenant to provide annual financial statements against the assignor after an assignment of the lease? Can the landlord recover the leasehold and re-rent to a new tenant when the creditworthiness of the original tenant dissipates, or must the landlord wait, hands tied, until the assignee itself fails to perform under the lease? It is common for a landlord not to consider carefully what enforcement rights and remedies it will have against the assignor following an assignment of the lease by the tenant. In fact, since the assignee is not technically the tenant, the landlord may have difficulty enforcing express remedy provisions in the lease against the assignor.

The following is a sample lease provision which defines “Tenant” to clarify the status of the assignor and the assignee under the lease:

“Tenant,” on the date as of which this Lease is made, shall mean [insert name of original tenant]. Thereafter, “Tenant” shall mean each successor as the tenant under this Lease at the time in question; provided, however, that the originally named tenant and any assignor of this Lease shall not be released from liability hereunder in the event of an assignment of this Lease.

This provision insulates a successor tenant from a default declared on the basis of a breach of a covenant by its assignor or another predecessor tenant. A landlord should carefully consider the purpose and benefits of the covenants in the lease, not only with respect to the tenant at each point in time but also as to predecessor tenants who remain liable under the lease. Where the continued liability of an assigning tenant was an important consideration for the landlord in agreeing to allow an assignment of a lease, the landlord may need to retain a right to exercise remedies for reasons relating to the assignor. If so, separate language should provide expressly for such rights and for remedies which survive against the assignor. Since the landlord's consent may not be a condition to an assignment, or since a condition that the landlord's consent be obtained may be subject to a reasonableness standard, a landlord for whom continued recourse to the original tenant is an essential element of its underwriting of the lease should include rights and remedies against even a tenant which has assigned the lease.

The assignor's status as a shadow obligor, without a technical status as “tenant,” can present the assignor with significant disadvantages relative to being a sublandlord. If the assignee defaults, the assignor has no right to recover the leasehold and to re-rent it to another person to mitigate the ensuing damages. The assignor also has no right of eviction, and since other direct remedies typically are not provided in assignment documents, the assignor may have only an action at law for money damages. As discussed above, the assignor may find the landlord willing to include in the lease a provision which addresses these concerns by giving the former tenant certain rights to mitigate damages and to offset against damages due the landlord any proceeds of mitigation by the landlord.¹¹⁵

The assignor also exposes itself to the possibility that its liabilities may increase after the assignment. If the assignee modifies the lease by increasing the rent, adding space, exercising renewal options or extending the term, or if the assignee performs improvements in violation of law or causes damage to the building, the assignor will be liable for the ensuing obligations if the assignee tenant does not, or is not financially able to, satisfy the ensuing obligations, unless the assignor is able to negotiate with the landlord that the assignor's continuing liability under the lease after an assignment will be determined without regard to such changes or actions by the assignee.

[28.41] XI. GOOD GUY GUARANTEE

Landlords increasingly require that prospective tenants deliver a “good guy” guarantee by a principal of the tenant in order to strengthen the incentive for the tenant, following a default which the tenant has not cured, to vacate, and deliver possession of, the leased premises to the landlord. Under a good guy guarantee, an individual which exercises control over the prospective named tenant agrees to be liable personally for payment of rent (and in some cases of any other monetary obligations) accruing under the lease from the date that the tenant in default becomes obligated to vacate the leased premises until the date that possession of 115 An assignor also should consider the status of any personal property in the leased premises which is sold to the assignee at the time the lease is assigned. Having certain personal property in the leased premises may improve the prospects to re-lease the leased premises quickly and at a higher rental, so care should be taken to provide that title to any such personal property transfers only at expiration (but not earlier termination) of the lease term and only if all lease obligations have been performed, or to retain a security interest in any such personal property. The assignor should seek the right, following a default by its assignee, to retain in the premises telephone systems, office furniture and partitions and other similar property, which in the absence of specific provision will become part of a bankrupt assignee's estate and can be removed for sale for the benefit of other creditors of the assignee.

the leased premises, in fact, is delivered to the landlord.¹¹⁶ Landlords believe that good guy guarantees encourage tenants in default, and in particular tenants in bankruptcy, to vacate leased premises quickly, so that the landlord can avoid the expense and delay of an eviction or bankruptcy proceeding in order to re-rent the space quickly. In a market where rents are stable or rising, the landlord often is more concerned with recovering the leased premises quickly in order to re-rent it than it is with suing a tenant for unpaid rent or restoration of the premises.

The existence of any guarantee of the tenant's obligations can complicate assignment of a lease, since the assignor will want the assignee to assume all of its obligations under the lease, which will require that the assignee produce a separate successor as guarantor. If the assignor has negotiated for release of its obligations under the lease following an assignment (provided that the assignee meets certain credit standards or satisfies other conditions), the assignor of a guaranteed lease must also negotiate terms for release of its guarantor. When the guarantee is a good guy guarantee, these negotiations are more complicated since an appropriate successor good guy guarantor is not necessarily creditworthy, and since the landlord really is relying on the good guy guarantee not to recover accrued unpaid rent but instead to recover possession of the premises. To the landlord, it may be more important that the successor good guy guarantor have meaningful control of the tenant's actions than that it be creditworthy, and there may not be an individual principal or employee of the successor tenant (particularly if the tenant is a public company or a large enterprise) who exercises such control or whose employment relationship with or other interest in the tenant justifies assuming personal liability for the tenant's obligations, even to the limited extent provided in a good guy guarantee.

Because an assignor of a lease cedes control of possession of the leased premises to the assignee, assignment of a lease for which a good guy guarantee was delivered to the landlord when the lease originally was made can greatly increase the exposure under the good guy guarantee. If the assignee of the lease files bankruptcy, the trustee of the assignee's estate in bankruptcy will have at least 60 days (possibly several months more with extensions) under the Bankruptcy Code to elect whether to assume or reject the lease. The individual who signed the good guy guarantee may be personally liable for the rent accruing during the pendency of the assignee's bankruptcy proceeding, even if the trustee eventually elects to reject the lease under the Code, because the tenant did not timely vacate the leased premises. If the trustee elects to assume the lease, the good guy guarantor will remain exposed under the guarantee for the balance of the lease term, notwithstanding assignment of the lease through bankruptcy to a further assignee.

116 Some landlords seek to have the amount payable under a good guy guarantee also include (1) the unamortized portion of any amounts previously paid by the landlord to build out the leased premises for the tenant or as a tenant improvement contribution, or to a broker in connection with the lease, (2) the unamortized rental value of any initial free rent period after amortizing such rental value over the entire lease term, (3) any costs to restore the leased premises to the condition in which it was supposed to be delivered to landlord, and (4) the cost to discharge any mechanic's liens affecting the leased premises as a result of work performed by the tenant. While the addition of such amounts increases the force of the incentive provided by the good guy guarantee, tenant's counsel should object to the inclusion of such items of recovery unless the parties have agreed that the good guy guarantee is intended to reach beyond its typical, narrow purpose, which is to assist the landlord in recovering the possession of the demised premises quickly.

Although the good guy guarantor may have considered the potential risk of continuing liability following an assignment of the lease, that risk was in the context of a voluntary assignment by a tenant which the good guy guarantor controlled. The good guy guarantor's exposure, originally limited under such guarantee so long as the guarantor can cause the tenant it controls to vacate the space quickly upon default, involves much more uncertainty once the risk of a successor tenant's bankruptcy and assignment of the lease in bankruptcy is considered. Counsel needs to use great care in considering the exposure which future tenancies can create for a good guy guarantor.

This chapter highlights, for a tenant that has decided to assign a lease of commercial space or sublease leased commercial space, many respects in which an assignment of the tenant's lease has implications materially different from a sublease. Counsel should advise its landlord and tenant clients of these differences in evaluating the options of each. Where possible, counsel should reflect the unique issues arising from an assignment of a lease in drafting the lease, the assignment of lease, brokerage agreements and other relevant documents and in commenting on the form of any landlord's consent required to effect the assignment.

The trajectory of boom and bust in recent years has transformed, and will continue to color, leasing practices in significant ways. The explosive demand for space starting in the mid-1990s among companies with limited creditworthiness under conventional business analysis produced rapidly escalating rental rates that in many cases overtook thoughtful legal practice. The collapse of that boom now has combined with an economic recession which some regard as ensuing and others as inevitable. The September 11 attack surely has accelerated the trajectory of the downturn in most markets, even while creating a startling, but probably temporary, reversal in vacancy rates in New York City due to the loss of a huge portion of the available office space. The legal practices during the boom years now are being tested during one of the most adverse economic climates in decades. New laws regarding lease assignments, and changes in landlord practices, are almost certain to result from this very dynamic period.

LEASE ASSIGNMENT AND ASSUMPTION

This LEASE ASSIGNMENT AND ASSUMPTION (this “Agreement”) is entered into as of [DATE], by and between [NAME OF ASSIGNOR], a [STATE OF FORMATION OF ASSIGNOR] [ORGANIZATIONAL FORM OF ASSIGNOR] having its principal place of business at [ADDRESS OF ASSIGNOR] (“Assignor”), and [NAME OF ASSIGNEE], a [STATE OF FORMATION OF ASSIGNEE] [ORGANIZATIONAL FORM OF ASSIGNEE] having its principal place of business at [ADDRESS OF ASSIGNEE] (“Assignee”).

WHEREAS, pursuant to that certain Lease (the “Lease”) dated as of [DATE OF LEASE] between [NAME OF LANDLORD] (“Landlord”) and Assignor, Landlord heretofore leased to Assignor that certain premises constituting the _____ floor at [ADDRESS OF BUILDING], as more particularly described in the Lease.

WHEREAS, Assignor desires to assign the Lease to Assignee, and Assignee desires to accept such assignment from Assignor and to assume all of the obligations of Assignor as the tenant under the Lease, on the terms and conditions set forth in this Agreement.

NOW, THEREFORE, in consideration of the mutual covenants, representations and provisions contained herein, and for other good and valuable consideration, the receipt and sufficiency of which is hereby acknowledged, the parties hereto hereby agree as follows:

1. Assignment. Assignor hereby sells, assigns, transfers, sets over, delegates and grants to Assignee all of Assignor's right, title, interest, claim and estate in and to the Lease as of the date of this Agreement as set forth above (the “Effective Date”), other than the Security Letter deposited and maintained by Assignor thereunder (the “Security Letter”).¹¹⁷

2. Assumption. Assignee hereby accepts the assignment of all of Assignor's right, title, interest, claim and estate in and to the Lease[, other than the Security Letter,] and assumes and agrees to pay and to perform, fully and in a timely manner, all obligations of the “Tenant” under or with respect to the Lease.

117 If the Assignee does not have sufficient assets to replace the security deposit originally made by the Assignor, the Assignor may need to maintain the security deposit with the Landlord notwithstanding the assignment of the lease.

3. Possession; Rent; Fixed Rent. Assignee shall be entitled to possession of the Premises on the date that the Landlord delivers its consent as described in Section 14 below. Assignee covenants and agrees to pay, from and after the Effective Date, all Fixed Rent, Additional Rent and other fees, charges, costs, expenses and other amounts payable of any kind and nature[, including New York City commercial rent occupancy tax, if applicable,] arising under the Lease or in respect of the Lease or this Agreement.¹¹⁸ Assignee acknowledges and agrees that it shall pay Fixed Rent from the Effective Date regardless of the date of, and any delay in, receipt of Landlord's consent to the assignment contemplated herein, which Fixed Rent shall be payable in accordance with the terms of the Lease.¹¹⁹

4. Late Payment Charge and Manner of Payment. If Assignee shall fail to pay when due any installment or payment of Fixed Rent or Additional Rent for a period of five (5) days after the date on which such installment of payment is due; Assignee shall pay to Assignor a late charge equal to three percent (3%) of the amount of such delinquent payment as compensation for the inconvenience caused by such late payment. Assignor shall have the right, without notice to Assignee and without being obligated to do so, to pay any amount not paid fully and in a timely manner by Assignee, and in the event of any such payment by Assignor, Assignee agrees to pay Assignor upon demand interest on any amount so paid from the date paid by Assignor until the date reimbursed by Assignee at a monthly rate of interest equal to the lesser of (i) one-twelfth (1/12) of the maximum annual rate of interest permitted by law and (ii) one and one-half (1-½%) percent.

5. Additional Rent.

(a) In addition to Fixed Rent to be paid pursuant to Section 3 hereof, and without limitation of Assignee's agreement in Section 3 to pay fully and in a timely manner all Additional Rent (however denominated) and other fees, charges, costs, expenses and other amounts payable of any kind and nature[, including New York City commercial rent occupancy tax, if applicable,] arising under the Lease or in respect of the Lease or this Agreement, Assignee acknowledges and agrees that it shall pay to Landlord from the Effective Date all Taxes, if any, payable by Tenant pursuant to Section ___ of the Lease, Tenant's Share of the Operating Expenses for the Building payable by Tenant pursuant to Section ___ of the Lease, and any Attorney Fees payable by Tenant pursuant to Section ___ of the Lease.¹²⁰

6. Condition of Demised Premises. Assignee acknowledges that it has inspected the Demised Premises and is fully familiar with the physical condition thereof and agrees to take the same "as is." Assignee shall make no alterations, improvements or additions to the Demised Premises whatsoever without the consent of Assignor and without the consent of Landlord in accordance with the terms of the Lease.¹²¹

7. Fixtures. Assignee shall have the right to use all fixtures, furniture and equipment, including without limitation the telephone systems (collectively, the "Fixtures"), presently located at the Demised Premises. [Schedule A hereto sets forth an inventory of all of such property which is accepted by both parties hereto.] All right, title and interest in and to the Fixtures shall remain vested in Assignor. Assignee shall service, repair and maintain the Fixtures, shall keep the Fixtures in the Premises at all times, and shall maintain insurance coverage for the full replacement cost of the Fixtures for all risks including theft, naming Assignor as the owner thereof and as an additional insured in respect thereof with the sole right to settle any claim with respect thereto; provided, however, that so long as Assignee is not in default under the Lease or this Agreement, Assignor shall allow Assignee to settle any claim in respect thereof so long as Assignee applies the proceeds to replace, in the Premises, any Fixtures

120 It is not necessary to spell out each individual section under which rent is payable by the assignee since the assignee has assumed the obligation to pay all such amounts, but doing so ensures that the assignee fully understands its obligations and assists administrative personnel in tracking payment of the regular payment obligations by identifying them in one place.

121 If an assignee wants to make certain alterations to the demised premises, this section is where such alterations would be discussed. An assignee can attach its alteration plans as an Exhibit to the Assignment and may require that the Assignor and the Landlord provide any required consents to the alterations before signing the assignment.

which were the subject of a claim. [At such time as Assignee determines that it no longer desires to use all or any part of the Fixtures, it shall notify Assignor identifying with specificity the Fixtures no longer desired. Such notice shall be given no more often than once in any twelve-month period. Assignor shall have the right, within thirty (30) days from the date of receipt of such notice, to remove, at Assignor's expense, all or any part of the Fixtures identified in the notice. In the case of any such removal, Assignee shall cooperate with and assist Assignor and pay any fees due under the Lease (such as elevator charges). Any part of the Fixtures identified in such a notice and not so removed by Assignor shall become the property of Assignee to use, dispose of or otherwise deal with in its sole discretion.] At the end of the term of the Lease, provided that Assignee shall have performed all of its obligations under the Lease and this Agreement, title to all the Fixtures shall vest in Assignee.¹²²

8. Guaranty. The obligations of Assignee under this Agreement have been guaranteed by [PRINCIPAL OF ASSIGNEE] in accordance with the terms of a separate Guaranty, a copy of which is annexed hereto as Appendix A. Assignee agrees to maintain said Guaranty in force at all times until all amounts payable to Landlord and to Assignor in respect of the Lease or this Agreement have been paid in full. The terms and provisions of this Section 8 expressly shall survive the expiration or sooner termination of the Lease or this Agreement.

9. Insurance. Assignee shall, at Assignee's sole cost and expense, obtain and thereafter maintain, for the benefit of the Landlord [and its mortgagee and ground lessor, if any, from time to time] and, as an additional requirement under this Agreement, for the benefit of Assignor and its successors as additional insured parties, such personal injury and property damage insurance coverage, under a policy of general public liability insurance coverage, and with such coverage limits, as is required under the Lease on the date hereof or in such greater scope or amount of coverage as Landlord shall require in accordance with the terms of the Lease, and such fire and casualty insurance coverage of all Fixtures and all other fixtures, furnishings and equipment and other personal property located in the Premises, for an amount not less than their full replacement value, as is required under the Lease on the date hereof or in such greater scope or amount of coverage as Landlord shall require in accordance with the terms of the Lease.

122 It is common for an assignor and assignee to agree that the assignee will buy all the fixtures, and even office equipment and furniture, since moving them may not warrant the expense. If title to the property is sold at the time of the assignment, however, and the assignee later defaults under the lease or files in bankruptcy, the assignor will not be able to recover the property sold, since such property will be included among the bankrupt's assets. This clause contemplates, instead, that the assignee has the use of the property through the term and acquires ownership of the property only after the assignee has fully performed the lease.

10. Security Deposit. Assignee shall deliver to Assignor on the Effective Date as a security deposit (the "Security Deposit") a letter of credit issued by a banking institution, and in form and substance, reasonably satisfactory to Assignor, which shall not expire sooner than 365 days from the date of issuance and shall be self-renewing unless not less than thirty (30) days prior notice of non-renewal is given to Assignor, in the amount of [six (6)] months Rent (including Fixed Rent and scheduled or determinable Additional Rent), which can be drawn upon in [New York, New York]. On the Effective Date the amount of the security deposit shall be _____ Dollars ($ _____). Not less than thirty (30) days prior to each anniversary of the Effective Date during the term of the Lease, Assignee shall deliver to Assignor a renewal of the letter of credit in an amount which reflects the increased amount of [six (6)] months Rent (including Fixed Rent and scheduled or determinable Additional Rent) which will be due and payable next following such anniversary. Such Security Deposit is to be deposited and maintained with Assignor as security for the faithful performance and observance by Assignee of the terms, provisions and conditions of this Agreement, and in the event that any default occurs under the Lease or this Agreement beyond the applicable notice and grace periods, Assignor may draw on such Security Deposit for the payment of any Fixed Rent, Additional Rent or other amount or for any other sum which Assignor may expend or be required to expend by reason of Assignee's default, including any damages or deficiency which accrues before or after summary proceedings or other judicial action or exercise of other remedies by Assignor. If Assignor shall so use, apply or retain the whole or any part of the Security Deposit, Assignee shall, upon demand by Assignor, immediately restore the amount of the letter of credit by the amount so used, applied or retained, or deposit with Assignor a sum equal to the amount so used, applied or retained, so as to replenish the Security Deposit as aforesaid, failing which Assignor shall have the same rights and remedies against Assignee as Landlord has under the Lease for the non-payment of the Fixed Rent or Additional Rent. [Assignee shall not be responsible to maintain, and Assignor shall maintain (to the extent Landlord shall require the same to be maintained), with Landlord the Security Letter required under Section ___ of the Lease, and any release and/or modification of the obligation of Assignor under the Lease to maintain the Security Letter shall in no way change or diminish the obligations of Assignee in respect of the Lease or under this Agreement.]

11. Brokerage. Assignee represents that in the negotiation of this Agreement it dealt with no broker or brokers other than [NAMES OF BROKERS] for payment of whose fees Assignor shall be responsible in accordance with a separate written agreement. Assignee hereby agrees to indemnify, defend and hold harmless Assignor from and against any and all claims, demands, liabilities, suits, losses, costs and expenses (including reasonable attorneys' fees and disbursements) arising out of any inaccuracy or alleged inaccuracy of the foregoing representation. Assignor shall have no liability for any brokerage commissions arising out of a sub-lease or assignment by Assignee. The provisions of this Section 11 shall survive the expiration or sooner termination of the Lease or this Agreement.

12. Indemnification. Assignee agrees to indemnify, defend and hold harmless Assignor from and against all demands, claims, actions or causes of action, assessments, losses, damages, liabilities, costs and expenses (including without limitation interest, penalties and attorneys' fees and expenses) asserted against, resulting from, imposed upon or incurred by Assignor, directly or indirectly, by reason of, resulting from or arising out of (i) any liabilities of Assignor under or relating to the Lease, (ii) Assignee's use and occupancy of, or the condition of, the Premises or (iii) the failure of Assignee to fully and timely perform its obligations under this Agreement or under the Lease.

13. Incorporation of Lease.

(a) Assignor represents that a true, correct and complete copy of the Lease is attached hereto as Appendix A.

(b) For the purposes of this Agreement, all the terms, covenants, conditions and regulations of the Lease are expressly incorporated herein and made a part hereof with the same force and effect as though set forth at length herein, it being understood that where reference is made with respect to said terms, covenants, conditions and regulations to "Tenant," the same shall be deemed to refer to Assignee, hereunder, and that Assignor shall have the right to exercise as against Assignee all rights and remedies accorded Landlord under the Lease.¹²³

making demands, performance of any act, condition or covenant, or the exercise of any right, remedy or option, are changed for the purposes of this Agreement, as specifically stated elsewhere herein, or if not so stated, shortening for Assignee, such limits by (i) three (3) days with respect to all such periods of more than three (3) days, and (ii) as much notice as reasonably practicable with respect to all periods of less than three (3) days, so that notices may be given, demands made, or any act, condition or covenant performed, or any right, remedy or option hereunder exercised by Assignor, upon any failure by Assignee to perform, within the time limit relating thereto contained in the Lease.

(d) With respect to any actions that Assignee desires to take for which the Lease requires the approval or consent of the Landlord, the approval of Assignor also shall be required with respect to such actions on the same basis and conditions as are applicable to the consent or approval of Landlord.¹²⁴

(e) Assignee shall neither assign the Lease nor sublet all or any portion of the Premises nor permit the use or occupancy of the Premises by any person other than Assignee without the prior written consent of Assignor. The consent of Assignor shall not be unreasonably withheld, delayed or conditioned in the event of a merger, consolidation or other reorganization of Assignee, provided that there shall not be a change in control of 50 percent or more of the direct or indirect beneficial or ownership interests in Assignee (in a single transaction or through a series of transactions),¹²⁵ that the financial condition of the surviving entity shall be at least as strong as the financial condition of Assignee prior to such transaction, and that the transaction shall be permitted under, or shall be approved by the landlord in accordance with, the terms of the Lease.

(f) No representations or warranties made in the Lease by Landlord to Assignor shall be incorporated into this Agreement as having been made by Assignor to Assignee.

123 There may be specific provisions of the Lease, such as an entitlement of the tenant to a landlord contribution to the cost of the tenant's initial improvements, that should be addressed specifically in this section to make clear that there are no remaining rights under such provisions. See, e.g., Section 13(f) of this Agreement.

124 Alternatively, this provisions could provide that Assignor will not unreasonably withhold, delay or condition its consent, or even waives its right to consent, to any matter to which the Landlord has consented.

125 As discussed in detail above, a public company will require that a limitation of this type not include transfers of shares on a public stock exchange by non-insiders.

(g) In the event that Assignee shall default in the full performance of any of the terms, covenants or conditions on its part to be performed under this Agreement, then Assignor shall have the same rights and remedies with respect to such defaults as are given to the Landlord under the Lease with respect to defaults by Assignor under the Lease, all with the same force and effect as though the provisions of the Lease with respect to defaults and the rights and remedies of the Landlord under the Lease in the event thereof were set forth at length in this Agreement. [In addition, in such event Assignor shall have the right, at its election, if such default is not cured, to cause Assignee to re-assign the Lease to Assignor and thereafter to assign the Lease or sublease the Premises to any other person without being obligated to do so or to account to Assignee for, or to offset against the liability of Assignee to Assignor, the proceeds of any such assignment or sublease.]¹²⁶

14. Consent of Landlord. This Agreement shall take effect only upon the Landlord's execution and delivery of its consent to this Agreement and the acceptance of such consent [by each party as satisfactory in form and content] [by Assignor in its sole discretion].

15. Miscellaneous.

(a) Notice. Any notice, consent, payment, demand, or communication required or permitted to be given by any provision of this Agreement shall be in writing and shall be (a) delivered personally to the Person or to an officer of the Person to whom the same is directed, or (b) sent by facsimile with a copy by registered or certified mail, return receipt requested, postage prepaid, or (c) sent by recognized national overnight delivery service for delivery the morning of the next business day, addressed as follows:

If to Assignee:

126 Exercise of this interesting remedy, which essentially is an opportunity for the assignor to mitigate its damages resulting from a default by the assignee, may require the consent of the landlord. Assignor can request that the landlord provide its consent to a prospective exercise of this remedy in the landlord's consent to the assignment itself.

Fax: (212) 123-4567

Assignor shall provide a copy to Assignee of each notice which it gives to Landlord, simultaneously with delivery, or receives from Landlord, as soon as reasonably practicable after receipt. Either party may change the address above by fifteen (15) days prior written notice to the other party. Notice shall be deemed given on the date of receipt (in the case of (a) and (c) above) and on the date of receipt of the facsimile (in the case of (b) above).

(b) Headings and Definitions. The headings contained in this Agreement are for reference purposes only and shall not in any way affect the meaning or interpretation hereof. Each capitalized term not defined herein shall have the meaning given such term in the Lease.

(c) Governing Law. This Agreement shall be construed under and in accordance with the laws of the State of New York applicable to contracts to be fully performed in such State, without regard to conflicts of laws. Exclusive jurisdiction of any dispute between Assignee and Assignor shall lie in the courts located in the [Borough of Manhattan, The City of New York.]

(d) Time of the Essence. Time is of the essence in this Agreement.

(e) Waiver. The waiver by any party of a breach of any provision of this Agreement shall not be deemed a waiver of any subsequent breach whether of the same or another provision of this Agreement.

(f) Counterparts. This Agreement may be executed in any number of counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original, but all of which shall constitute one and the same instrument.

(g) Successors and Assigns. This Agreement shall binding upon, and inure to the benefit of, the parties hereto and their respective heirs, administrators, executors, assigns and successors in interest.

(h) Amendments in Writing. The provisions of this Agreement may not be amended or altered except by a written instrument duly executed by each of the parties hereto.

(i) Further Assurances. Each of the parties shall execute such other and further documents and do such further acts as may be reasonably required to effectuate the intent of the parties and carry out the terms of this Agreement.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, the parties hereto have executed this Agreement as of the day and year first above written.

APPENDIX C

SAMPLE ATTORNMENT PROVISION

If, for any reason (including as a result of a foreclosure of the Mortgage or the granting of a deed in lieu of foreclosure), any Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), or any successor (as owner or as lessor under a superior or subordinate lease) to Landlord named herein, shall come into possession of or title to the Property, Tenant agrees, at the election and upon demand of any such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee) or successor to Landlord, to attorn, from time to time, to any such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee) or successor to Landlord, upon the then terms and conditions of this Lease for the remainder of the Term, provided that such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee) or successor to Landlord, or receiver caused to be appointed by any of the foregoing, as the case may be, shall then be entitled to possession of the Premises; provided further, however, that in the case of any Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), or receiver caused to be appointed by any of the foregoing, as the case may be, shall not be:

(1) liable for any act or omission of any prior landlord (including, without limitation, the then defaulting landlord), [but any successor as Landlord nevertheless shall be obligated to cure defaults of Landlord which arise after the date of such succession or which are obligations of Landlord which continue after the date of such succession,] or

(2) subject to any defense, abatement or offset which Tenant may have against any prior landlord (including, without limitation, the then defaulting landlord), [other than any abatement provided for under the express terms of this Lease to the extent such abatement is applicable to periods after the date of succession as landlord,] or

(3) bound by any payment of Rental which Tenant may have made to any prior landlord (including, without limitation, the then defaulting landlord) more than thirty (30) days in advance of the date upon which such payment was due, or

(4) bound by any obligation to make any payment to or on behalf of Tenant, or

(5) bound by any obligation to perform any work or to make improvements to the Premises, [except for (i) repairs and maintenance

pursuant to the provisions of Article __, the need for which repairs and maintenance first arises after the date upon which such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee) shall be entitled to possession of the Premises, (ii) repairs to the Premises or any part thereof as a result of damage by fire or other casualty pursuant to Article __ hereof, but only to the extent that such repairs can be reasonably made from the net proceeds of any insurance actually made available to such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), and (iii) repairs to the Premises as a result of a partial condemnation pursuant to Article __ hereof, but only to the extent that such repairs can be reasonably made from the net proceeds of any award made available to such [Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee)], or

(6) bound by any surrender, cancellation, termination (which requires Landlord's consent, excluding thereby a termination pursuant to Article __ [casualty] or __ [condemnation] of this Lease), amendment or modification of, or waiver (which requires Landlord's consent) under, this Lease made without the consent of Lender, other than a termination pursuant to the following paragraph of this Lease, or

(7) bound to return Tenant's security deposit, if any, until such deposit has come into its actual possession and Tenant would be entitled to such security deposit pursuant to the terms of this Lease.

As long as the Mortgage shall remain in effect, Tenant shall not seek to terminate this Lease by reason of any act or omission of Landlord (except pursuant to an express right to terminate this Lease under Article __ [casualty] or __ [condemnation] of this Lease) until Tenant shall have given written notice of such act or omission to Lender and, if Lender shall have notified Tenant within ten (10) Business Days following receipt of such notice of its intention to remedy such act or omission, until a reasonable period of time (not to exceed thirty (30) days for monetary defaults and not to exceed ninety (90) days for non-monetary defaults unless, for the non-monetary default, more than ninety (90) days would be required, using commercially reasonable and diligent efforts, to remedy such act or omission, in which case such time period shall be extended for such additional time as shall be required, using commercially reasonable and diligent efforts, to remedy such act or omission) shall have elapsed following the giving of such notice, during which period of time Lender shall have the right, but not the obligation, to remedy such act or omission[; provided, however, that in no event shall such time period be extended to more than one hundred eighty (180) days unless, within the initial ninety

The provisions of this Section shall enure to the benefit of any such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), or any successor (as owner or as lessor under a superior or subordinate lease) to Landlord named herein, shall apply notwithstanding that, as a matter of law, this Lease may terminate upon the termination of any Superior Lease, shall be self-operative upon any such demand, and no further instrument shall be required to give effect to said provisions. Tenant, however, upon demand of any such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), or any successor (as owner or as lessor under a superior or subordinate lease) to Landlord named herein, shall execute, at Tenant's expense, from time to time, instruments, in recordable form, in confirmation of the foregoing provisions of this Section, satisfactory to any such Mortgagee (or any Person claiming by, through or under Mortgagee), or any successor (as owner or as lessor under a superior or subordinate lease) to Landlord named herein, acknowledging such attornment and setting forth the terms and conditions of its tenancy.

¹²⁷ Note that the lease also can provide that in the event of termination of the lease, the tenant is obligated, at the request of a successor landlord, to enter into a new lease with the successor landlord. Such a provision would address the concern following the events of September 11 that a tenant may acquire the right, under a variety of legal arguments, to terminate the lease for inability to access or to use the demised premises due to events that do not involve a breach by the landlord, and/or which it is impossible for the landlord to cure.

SAMPLE CONDITIONS TO REASONABLENESS OF CONSENT

Restrictions on assignment of a leasehold estate, which would bind a leasehold mortgagee seeking to step into the shoes of a tenant which has defaulted, would include the following:

a. The proposed assignee/sublessee shall not be, and shall not use the premises for, a [detail specific uses which are not permitted, such as a school; employment or placement agency; real estate brokerage office; medical offices or other medical uses; foreign government; incarceration facility; etc.].

b. The proposed assignee/sublessee shall not be engaged in a use which is [detail specific character of uses which are not permitted, such as those involving excessive noise, excessive floor load, materially increased pedestrian or vehicular traffic, noxious, hazardous or obscene activities, materially increased demand for building services which would consume any available capacity in the building or disrupt the quality or character of utilities available to occupants of other parts of the building, or present risks of controversy, protests, labor strife or risks to security] or which violates any exclusive use or radius clause binding on owner.

c. Occupancy by the proposed assignee/sublessee shall be in keeping with the dignity and character of the then use of the building and the financial condition of the proposed assignee/sublessee shall be in keeping with the standard of other occupants of the building and superior to the extent the proposed assignee/sublessee is assuming rental obligations for a larger portion of the building. {Note that this language, which is typical, is rather general and we may prefer more specific requirements regarding financial standing, such as minimum net worth as a mathematical function of the rental obligation.}

d. Any space offered for assignment or sublease shall be offered exclusively through the managing agent for the building, and no space shall be [advertised or openly] offered at an effective rental which is lower than the greater of (i) the effective rental at which other [similar] space available in the building then is being offered, (ii) the rental then payable for the space to be offered, (iii) the fair market value of the space, or (iv) the then-prevailing rental rate in the building.

e. The proposed assignee/sublessee shall not be a tenant, subtenant, occupant or assignee of any space in the building, a party which then is, or which within the preceding twelve months was, actively negotiating for space in the building, or a party controlling, controlled by, or under common control with any of the preceding persons.

f. The Trustee shall pay on demand all reasonable costs incurred by the Owner in connection with the assignment or sublease including without limitation the costs of investigating the proposed assignee or sublessee and the legal costs incurred in review of the proposed assignment or sublease documents.

g. All defaults have been cured and the Trustee shall provide adequate assurance reasonably satisfactory to the owner that the Trustee will perform or cause to be performed the obligations of the Tenant under the lease in the event of the failure of the proposed assignee or sublessee to perform the obligations of the Tenant under the lease and will indemnify for the cost of performance of any work so that no liens shall attach to the building.

h. [No subdivided floors; only full-floor occupancies] [No slab penetrations. All work subject to the approval of owner, not to be unreasonably withheld, and subject to owner's approval of the plans and specifications, professionals involved, adequacy of contract provisions, bonding, insurance, etc., compliance with owner's rules for the performance of work and for move-in, {consider a labor harmony clause if required}.]

i. Form of assignment or sublease sublet to owner's approval. Assignee or subtenant to comply with the terms of any underlying documents. Right of owner to require, at its option, attornment upon default by Trustee with customary protections such as no liability for defaults, acts, omissions by prior tenant; for rent paid more than one month in advance; for unpaid contributions or to perform any work; for restoration to the extent cost exceeds insurance proceeds or condemnation award, as applicable; to return security deposit if not actually delivered to it.

j. No further assignment or sublease without satisfaction of the above conditions.

k. No increase in insurance costs

APPENDIX E
SAMPLE FORM OF LANDLORD'S CONSENT TO ASSIGNMENT

CONSENT TO ASSIGNMENT

WHEREAS, _____ (the "Landlord"), entered into a certain lease dated as of _____, 20__ (the "Lease") with _____ (the "Original Tenant"), for the entire _____ (____) floor (the "Premises") in the building known as _____ Street, _____, New York (the "Building");

WHEREAS, pursuant to an Assignment and Assumption of Lease dated as of _____, 20__ ("Assignment"), a copy of which is annexed as Exhibit "A," _____ ("New Tenant") is assuming all of Original Tenant's rights, duties and obligations[, except as may otherwise be agreed to among Original Tenant and New Tenant,] under the Lease, a copy of which is attached hereto as Exhibit "B";

WHEREAS, the Assignment requires Landlord's consent under Article ____ of the Lease and New Tenant;

NOW, THEREFORE, for good and valuable consideration the receipt and sufficiency of which is acknowledged by all the parties hereto, on the terms and subject to the conditions set forth herein, Landlord hereby grants its consent to the Assignment.

1. No Release. This Consent to Assignment shall not release the Original Tenant or New Tenant from any of its covenants, agreements, liabilities and duties under the Lease and/or the Assignment, as the case may be, as the same may be amended from time to time, regardless of any provision to the contrary in the Assignment.

2. Specific Provisions of Lease and Assignment. THIS CONSENT TO ASSIGNMENT SHALL NOT BE CONSTRUED TO AMEND THE LEASE IN ANY RESPECT. ACCORDINGLY, LANDLORD HAS NOT, AND SHALL NOT, REVIEW OR PASS UPON ANY OF THE PROVISIONS OF THE ASSIGNMENT AND SHALL NOT BE (A) BOUND OR ESTOPPED IN ANY WAY BY THE PROVISIONS OF THE ASSIGNMENT OTHER THAN WITH RESPECT TO ITS CONSENT TO THE ASSIGNMENT OR (B) DEEMED TO HAVE WAIVED ANY OF ITS RIGHTS OR LEGAL REMEDIES UNDER THE LEASE. LANDLORD ACKNOWLEDGES, HOWEVER, THAT THE FOREGOING SHALL NOT PRECLUDE RELIANCE UPON

THOSE REPRESENTATIONS OF LANDLORD CONTAINED IN THE ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE EXECUTED SIMULTANEOUSLY HEREWITH BY LANDLORD.

3. Limited Consent. This Consent to Assignment does not and shall not be construed or implied to be a consent to any other matter for which Landlord's consent is required under the Lease.

4. Original Tenant's and New Tenant's Continuing Liability. Each of Original Tenant and New Tenant shall be liable to Landlord for any default under the Lease, whether such default is caused by Original Tenant and/or New Tenant or by anyone claiming by or through Original Tenant and/or New Tenant. In the event of any default by Original Tenant and/or New Tenant in the full performance and observance of any of its obligations hereunder or in the event any representation or warranty of Original Tenant and/or New Tenant made herein shall prove to be false or misleading in any way, such event may, at Landlord's option, be deemed, in accordance with and subject to the terms and conditions of the Lease, a default under the Lease, and subject to the terms and conditions contained in the Lease, Landlord shall have and may pursue all of the rights, powers and remedies provided for in the Lease or at law or in equity or by statute or otherwise with respect to defaults thereunder or hereunder.

5. Acceptance by Original Tenant, New Tenant and Assignee. Original Tenant, New Tenant and Assignee understand and acknowledge that Landlord has agreed to execute this Consent to Assignment based upon Original Tenant's and New Tenant's acknowledgment and acceptance of the terms and conditions hereof.

6. Additional Rent. Original Tenant and New Tenant each acknowledge and agree that each is jointly and severally responsible for the prompt payment to Landlord of any Additional Rent owed to Landlord as required under the Lease, including, without limiting the generality of the foregoing, all of Landlord's reasonable attorney's fees (not to exceed $____.00), incurred in connection with the Assignment and this Consent to Assignment.

7. Insurance. Assignee shall furnish the Landlord with new policies of insurance naming Landlord, Landlord's managing agent, Original Tenant, New Tenant and any mortgagee of Landlord as additional insureds, said policies containing personal injury and property damage insurance, under a policy of general public liability insurance, with such limits as are required under the Lease.

8. Reservation of Rights. This Consent to Assignment shall be deemed limited solely to the Assignment, and Landlord reserves the right to consent or to withhold consent in accordance with the terms of the Lease and all other rights under the Lease with respect to any other matters including, without limitation, any proposed alterations and with respect to any further or additional subleases, assignments or transfers of the Lease or any interest therein or thereto.

9. Counterparts. This Consent may be executed in several counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original but all of which shall constitute one and the same agreement.

10. Exculpation. Neither Landlord, nor the members or partners comprising Landlord, nor the shareholders (nor any of the members or partners comprising same), partners, directors, officers, agents or employees of any of the foregoing (collectively, the "Parties"), shall be personally liable, in any manner, by reason of, or as a consequence of, the execution or delivery of this Consent. Original Tenant and New Tenant shall look solely to Landlord's estate and property in the Building within which the Premises are located and the rents, profits and proceeds derived therefrom and all rights provided to Original Tenant under the Lease in enforcing any of the rights which Original Tenant or New Tenant may have against Landlord hereunder or by reason of any of the foregoing, and shall not seek any damages against any of the Parties, except to the extent recoverable out of Landlord's estate and property in the Building within which the Premises are located and the rents, profits and proceeds derived therefrom.

11. Original Tenant and New Tenant. By executing this Consent to Assignment, Original Tenant and New Tenant each acknowledge and agree to be bound by all of the terms and conditions of this Consent to Assignment.

12. Defined Terms. Any capitalized term used herein without a specific definition stated shall have the meaning set forth in the Lease.

CHAPTER TWENTY-NINE

SUBLEASES: THE SAME THING AS LEASES, ONLY DIFFERENT

* This chapter has been updated for the third edition by Andrew L. Herz, Esq., and Hope K. Plasha, Esq. Reprinted with permission (and with minor updates, revisions and format changes) from the Fall 2000 issue of Real Property, Probate & Trust, Volume 35, Number 3, published by ABA Publishing.

[29.0] I. INTRODUCTION

In this chapter, the authors analyze the unique complexities that distinguish sublease transactions from lease assignments. The authors discuss points for consideration when drafting subleases, such as determining and evaluating the “box of rights” created by the landlord and tenant under the lease and for the subtenant when exercising due diligence in the ensuing sublease transaction. Familiarity with sublease transactions is increasingly important, especially in times of economic uncertainty and retrenchment as tenants of all types frequently find themselves with excess space.

Sublease transactions are structured very differently than direct leases. Under a sublease, a tenant transfers only a partial interest in a lease.¹ For example, the original tenant may retain part of the original demised space, all of the space for some period of time after the sublease term expires, or some of the ancillary rights under the direct lease. These complexities do not exist in a lease assignment, which involves a transfer of the entire lease to another party who steps into the tenant’s shoes and usually assumes all of the responsibilities of the original tenant under the lease.²

When most lawyers think about subleasing, they focus primarily on the provisions in a direct lease which may allow, prohibit, or limit subleasing and assignment. Relatively little has been written on how to negotiate, evaluate, and review a sublease transaction from the subtenant’s perspective.³

built for the tenant to live in. The landlord allows the tenant to occupy specific space and agrees to provide certain services in exchange for the payment of rent. A sublease transaction involves two boxes: first, the one that the landlord has already built with the tenant, and second, one that the tenant and the subtenant must now build together within the confines of the first.⁴ As noted below, unique issues may be raised if the direct lease covers significant blocks of space and the sublease transaction covers a smaller amount of space (therefore the direct lease being a large box and the subtenant requesting a much smaller box).⁵

Usually, the parties to a sublease are unable, or the tenant is unwilling, to change the terms of the direct lease. For that reason, many parties consider subleasing to be easier than entering into a new lease; the landlord and the tenant presumably have already created an adequate set of rights and obligations between themselves.⁶ These rights and obligations are established and, for the most part, already working well. Frequently, the subtenant simply inherits most of these predetermined rights and obligations because the tenant or sublandlord can transfer only those rights that are contained within the box it created with its landlord.⁷ In the case of a large direct lease there may be rights that the tenant may not wish to transfer to a subtenant in a sublease covering only a portion of the premises (such as a right to cure (self help), a renewal right or a right of first offer, to note just a few examples).

The parties to a sublease usually cannot change the box that the landlord and the tenant have created because the landlord generally has no reason to agree to do so. While this resulting inflexibility may create problems, it also creates advantages by simplifying many aspects of the transaction. Many issues that landlords and tenants frequently negotiate in leases receive little or no attention in subleases. In major leases tenants often specifically negotiate for certain subletting and non-disturbance

4 As commercial markets for leased space have changed and as the consolidation and restructuring activities in the financial service and other industries have accelerated, some transactions have been structured as sub-subleases, adding a level of complexity and concern that will be discussed further below.

7 There may be instances in larger sublease transactions where the landlord is entering into a direct lease with the subtenant upon expiration of the sublease. In these circumstances, the parties may have more flexibility in revisiting rights granted under the direct lease.

rights to make their space more desirable to a subtenant subletting substantial space. For example, in most cases, the landlord and tenant will have negotiated major issues in the lease such as construction, permitted alterations, and nondisturbance. Most subleases do not revisit these issues. When considering such issues as construction of the premises or even the building in which the premises are to be located, these issues may be moot for sublease consideration because they may already have happened. Despite these differences, a sublease has all the elements of a traditional lease transaction.⁸ There may also be instances where certain provisions, such as permitted alterations, are more heavily negotiated in the sublease because the sublandlord may actually want to have closer control over the subtenant than the landlord had over the tenant under the direct lease (given that the tenant may have to restore the premises at the end of the lease).

Careful analysis of a sublease raises many additional issues that the practitioner should review, consider, and confirm as appropriate, including a number of due diligence items that do not exist in a straight leasing transaction.⁹ As a result, the effort involved in preparing a sublease may be disproportionately high when compared to a lease transaction. Exhibit A at the end of this chapter provides an extensive due diligence checklist for a subleasing transaction, which goes beyond what parties typically consider in a routine subleasing transaction. However, in some cases these points may be crucial and so the list aims to provide a comprehensive checklist for a subtenant's counsel.¹⁰ It is important that the proposed subtenant client be made aware of the additional complexities and implications of a sublease transaction (as opposed to a direct lease).

Given a subtenant generally enters into a sublease transaction after the lease term has commenced, the direct lease already may have addressed some of the basic concerns of an occupant of the space. Such concerns include determination of the commencement date; delivery of possession (insofar as this is the landlord's obligation); determination of the base amounts for escalation payments; initial construction of the premises by the landlord; and delivery of subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment agreements. For a subtenant, the lease is already a "work in progress," although the financial details of the sublease may differ from those of the underlying lease based on the particulars of a specific transaction. For example, it is possible that a multi-floor direct lease written on a net basis will be subleased on a gross basis with escalations based on more current base years.

[29.1] II. DOES THE DIRECT LEASE “WORK”?

In evaluating a sublease transaction, the potential subtenant needs to decide, as a threshold issue, whether the direct lease “works.” This initial evaluation represents a major departure from a direct lease transaction. If a lease provision effectively prevents the potential subtenant from using the space (e.g., if the lease prohibits the subtenant’s anticipated use of the space), the subtenant must raise the issue with the landlord promptly or be foreclosed from the deal.¹¹

Once the subtenant knows that the direct lease can meet the needs of a sublease, the subtenant’s counsel should review the lease as a whole in order to:

1. determine whether the assignment and subletting provisions of the direct lease will allow the contemplated subleasing transaction;
2. understand the existing package of rights and duties created for the tenant in the direct lease and how the sublease needs to deal with them;
3. evaluate which provisions of the direct lease should govern the relationship between sublandlord and subtenant and which provisions should not apply to the sublease and should be expressly excluded; and
4. identify which matters the sublease should address as independent obligations of the parties.

[29.2] A. Can the Tenant Sublease?

To save time and to decide if the subleasing exercise is pointless, the subtenant’s attorney should, in fact, look first at the subletting provisions of the direct lease to determine whether the provisions permit the contemplated subleasing transaction; whether the sublease requires the landlord’s consent; the time within which the landlord must respond to a request; and whether the landlord can frustrate the transaction by “recapturing” the space (either by terminating the lease as to the space proposed to be sublet or by subleasing it back from tenant).¹² A sophisticated direct lease in a competitive market place generally prohibits subletting without the landlord's consent in virtually all instances except subleases to related and successor entities. It is helpful to the potential subtenant if the direct lease expressly allows the periodic use of the space by auditors, contractors and other persons having a business relationship with tenant, and excludes these types of temporary occupants from the subletting conditions of the direct lease, including the need to obtain the landlord's consent.¹³ The direct lease also may contain provisions that allow the landlord to recapture the space to be sublet by granting the landlord the right either to enter into the sublease as a subtenant, eliminate the sublease space from the leased premises, terminate the lease as to the space the sublease covers, or even terminate the entire lease.

Many leases provide that if the landlord does not exercise the right of recapture, the landlord will not unreasonably withhold or delay consent to the sublease if the potential sublandlord and subtenant meet certain criteria and conditions. If the landlord has a recapture right, the potential subtenant should try to find out as early as possible whether the landlord has any intention of recapturing or if the landlord has previously waived recapture rights. If the subtenant's counsel cannot determine whether the landlord will exercise recapture rights, counsel should advise the subtenant of the risks in proceeding, including the potential time delays that the process may entail. Absent such a warning, the potential subtenant may expect to close the sublease transaction quickly; will spend money on attorneys, architects, and other professionals; and may pass up opportunities to lease alternative premises that do not pose the same risk of losing the transaction. If the landlord does decide to recapture, or otherwise blocks the sublease transaction, the subtenant will lose the advantage of lead time and may experience an emergency situation in trying to find alternate space before its existing lease ends.

12 See generally Friedman, supra note 1, § 6:8, at 6-38 (defining recapture and step-up clauses in leases); Halper, supra note 1, § 10.02[14], at 10-20 to 10-23 (discussing issues regarding subletting provisions); Berkman, supra note 9, at 32-33 (discussing effects of landlord's right to recapture on parties with equal bargaining power); Martin D. Sobel, Negotiating a Sublease or Assignment Clause, 4 Prob. & Prop. 44, 45 (1990) (discussing important aspects of a lease's subletting and assignment provisions and considerations of the parties).

Assuming that recapture rights are not present, that the landlord waives the rights, or that the subtenant assumes the risk of proceeding without certainty, counsel for the subtenant must next review the subletting provisions of the direct lease to determine (1) what information the tenant must furnish to the landlord in connection with the sublease and the potential subtenant and (2) whether the tenant and the subtenant can satisfy with the requisite conditions that obligate the landlord to grant consent.¹⁴

To start the landlord's clock ticking, either to exercise recapture rights or to grant or deny consent to the sublease, the parties to the sublease frequently must furnish certain information to the landlord. Usually, the tenant must submit to the landlord either a proposed or executed sublease or a term sheet outlining the essential terms of the subleasing transaction. The sooner the landlord's recapture time period starts to run, the sooner the parties will know if a sublease will work. Accordingly, if only a term sheet is required, the tenant should submit it promptly to its landlord while the sublease parties proceed with negotiating the sublease.¹⁵

In some instances, the direct lease may give the tenant the right to approach the landlord with an intention of subletting. Subsequently, the landlord must determine whether or not to exercise any recapture right. In this situation, the landlord's right of recapture probably will expire before the parties fully negotiate the proposed sublease transaction. If the right of recapture expires, the tenant should give the subtenant evidence that the recapture right no longer is an impediment.

Many direct leases require the tenant to provide the landlord with financial information about the subtenant, including, frequently, certified financial statements and references. The subtenant's failure to have certified financial statements or the subtenant's unwillingness to release them to the landlord will frustrate the subleasing transaction unless the landlord waives the requirement. Quite often, however, the landlord will enter into a confidentiality agreement with respect to financial information provided by the subtenant in order to alleviate a subtenant's unwillingness to release such financials. If the tenant retains occupancy of most of the leased premises, a waiver would not be an unreasonable request. Sometimes landlords require a meeting with the proposed subtenant. In that case, the subtenant should be aware of the meeting requirement and make the necessary parties available.

15 Alternatively, the parties may elect to wait for the landlord's response before proceeding to the actual sublease document. This may save money, but will cost time.

Even when a landlord cannot unreasonably withhold or delay consent to subletting, the direct lease frequently has conditions that the sublandlord or subtenant must satisfy.¹⁶ Although these conditions may appear reasonable, in practice they often fall into the “gotcha” category; i.e., even though the lease seems to allow subletting in theory, the “fine print” is intended to preclude subletting. Conditions that are subject to landlord’s judgment or even its reasonable satisfaction may create potential roadblocks to a smooth subleasing transition.¹⁷

At the outset of any subleasing transaction, the subtenant’s counsel must read carefully every restriction and condition limiting subleasing in the direct lease. For example, the lease may provide that the sublease rent cannot be less than the rent the landlord is then charging for comparable space in the building. In a depressed commercial real estate market this is an impossible condition to satisfy and even in a more robust market a tenant usually cannot meet such a condition unless the tenant has made substantial and valuable improvements to the premises. As the sublease is a lesser estate¹⁸ and the parties typically cannot customize the “box of rights” created under the lease, sublease rentals usually amount to less than the rentals that a landlord could charge if the landlord leased the space directly for a comparable term to a new tenant.¹⁹ Although the sublease rent may be greater than the rent under the direct lease, this generally reflects either a dramatically improved leasing market or the substantial value of improvements made by the tenant to the space. A tenant, having only a lesser estate, generally can extract payment from a

For a discussion of consent from the prime landlord’s perspective, see Richard S. Rosenstein, Get Safeguards in Sublet Consent, Comm. Lease L. Insider, May 1993, at 1.

17 Subjective concerns about the use, character, or reputation of a subtenant can be particularly problematic. See Van Sloun v. Agans Bros., 778 N.W.2d 174 (Iowa 2010), where a landlord refused to consent to a financially viable food service tenant because, among other reasons, of its fear that the subtenant’s cooking odors could offend other tenants.

19 For these reasons it is preferable that landlord negotiate in the direct lease that tenant not advertise the space as being available at a lesser rental than landlord is charging for comparable space in the building, but that tenant may enter into a sublease at any rental rate.

subtenant only for those rights that the tenant already holds and that are transferable. Thus, some restrictions on subleasing contained in the direct lease which may not appear at first to be intended to prohibit a sublease transaction may nevertheless make the sublease transaction problematic absent a waiver or express consent from the landlord.

[29.3] B. Is the Existing Package of Rights Under the Direct Lease Acceptable to the Subtenant?

Once the subtenant's counsel has determined that the sublease transaction will work, counsel must review the direct lease to make sure that its terms are acceptable.²⁰ Obviously, the terms of the direct lease must be consistent with those of the proposed sublease transaction; i.e., allow the use contemplated under the sublease, cover at least the space proposed to be sublet, and have a term at least as long as the sublease term. All other terms of the direct lease must be tolerable for the subtenant. Common problem areas involve alterations, services, and other landlord covenants. In some cases, counsel may be pleased to find that the tenant's transferable rights exceed the rights that the subtenant reasonably could have negotiated for in a sublease. This can be true if the tenant is extremely creditworthy and has leased a large block of space or if the tenant signed a lease when landlords were hungrier for tenants. Even in such instances the tenant as sublandlord may not want to pass along all of the benefits and rights it has under the direct lease to the subtenant.²¹

If a provision in the direct lease is not acceptable, the parties to a sublease must address the issue in the subleasing transaction. In some situations, the parties can only solve problems by going back to the landlord to modify the landlord's rights and obligations. Often the landlord will seek compensation for changing the rights under the direct lease. These modifications may be for the benefit of the subtenant alone or for the benefit of both the tenant and the subtenant. In the first case, this can be handled in the landlord's consent to sublease, which the tenant must obtain, in which case the sublease should make inclusion of such modifications express 20 See Faucett v. Provident Mut. Life Ins. Co. of Phil., 244 Ala. 308 (Ala. 1943); Pedro v. Potter, 197 Cal. 751 (Cal. 1926); 52 C.J.S. Landlord & Tenant §§ 60, 61 (2008); Friedman, supra note 1, 7:7.1, at 7-123 (noting that "a subtenant has been said to be under a duty to ascertain the terms of the headlease").

conditions of the landlord's consent.²² In the second case, an amendment to the direct lease may best solve the problem. As landlords rarely have any incentive to change the terms of direct leases, the sublease parties must agree fairly quickly whether the tenant or the subtenant bears the responsibility and the costs of gaining concessions from the landlord. A tenant who is remaining in occupancy of some of the demised premises may not want to risk alienating the landlord by demanding changes, however.

Finally, the prospective subtenant's counsel must review all documents that constitute the lease or affect the tenant's rights and obligations. These documents include all lease amendments, all estoppel certificates²³ that the tenant has given to the landlord or anyone else, all commencement date agreements, information regarding any disputes between the landlord and tenant, copies of approvals the landlord has granted, any nondisturbance or recognition agreements the tenant has received, and all relevant material communications that the tenant has received from the landlord. The subtenant should also understand all relevant "non-legal" information about the building such as construction rules; approved contractors and subcontractors; freight elevator hours; charges for heating, ventilating, and air conditioning; and other overtime services and cleaning specifications.

Analysis of the existing lease needs to take into account as well that the sublease may be beginning after the tenant is already "living in the box" and has performed substantial construction work or improvements. For a major tenant, this might include above-standard installations such as supplemental air conditioning, dining facilities, and trading floors. The cost of this work may reach millions of dollars. Therefore, the subtenant may be assuming an obligation to restore any changes upon moving out.²⁴ The subtenant must understand this obligation (or negotiate it out) and must have copies of all documents relating to the tenant's construction. Installations transferred from the tenant to the subtenant may represent a substantial portion of the consideration that the subtenant will pay under the sublease. The subtenant should get the full benefit of all of these improvements, including any warranties and guaranties, because the subtenant assumes responsibility for their continued maintenance and operation.

24 See Robert C. Epstein, Hidden Sublease Restrictions, N.Y.L.J., Oct. 9, 1996, p. 5, col. 2.

From the subtenant's viewpoint, it is vastly preferable that the subtenant only be responsible for restoration with respect to special alterations and improvements made by subtenant, as opposed to these made by the tenant. (The extent of this restoration obligation will be governed by the direct lease as it applies to alterations and improvements by either the tenant or the subtenant.)

[29.4] C. Interplay Between the Direct Lease and the Sublease

The last step in reviewing the direct lease determines the level of interplay between the rights and obligations under the direct lease and the sublease. Practitioners differ on how to draft the sublease document. Most prefer to incorporate the direct lease into the body of the sublease document, with modifications and deletions as appropriate. The next section addresses how this can be done.

[29.5] III. DOES THE SUBLEASE “WORK”?

As with any direct lease, the preparation and negotiation of a sublease must cover a range of areas. Counsel in a sublease transaction will want to make sure that the sublease document does the following:

1. Accurately sets forth the terms of the proposed transaction between the tenant (sublandlord) and the subtenant;
2. Complies with the requirements of the direct lease, which must be addressed in the sublease (it is typical, for example, that specific provisions of the direct lease be included and restated in full (e.g., subordination of sublease provisions) in the form of sublease);
3. Allocates any risks or obligations that the lease sets forth between the tenant and the subtenant in the manner that the parties have agreed upon;
4. Covers matters that are independent of the box of rights created under the direct lease; and
5. Whenever possible, streamlines the sublease document by the appropriate incorporation by reference of provisions of the direct lease to save time, space, and effort, as well as to prevent errors and inconsistencies.

In addition, the sublease generally will need to set forth the conditions for its effectiveness, particularly the need for and conditions of the landlord's consent, which consent should be obtained within a specific number of days after the sublease is executed and delivered.

[29.6] A. Preliminary Inquiries

Before deciding whether the client's subleasing goals are accomplished, the subtenant's counsel must think about some of the same issues that are important in a traditional direct lease.²⁵ Beyond the basic economic terms regarding rent and escalations, the subtenant should determine that the subleased space as described in the sublease will work for the subtenant. A diagram exhibit of the subleased premises early in the process will help confirm the understanding of the parties. The subtenant should seek all of the rights that the direct lease grants to the tenant, including the right to use portions of the lobbies, elevators, and common areas of the building needed for access to, and full use of, the subleased premises, and availability of directory listings, signage and parking (to the extent applicable).

The sublease should describe the condition in which the subleased space must be delivered.²⁶ Must the sublandlord perform any construction work or simply deliver the space in vacant "broom-clean condition"? At a minimum, the space generally must be free and clear of all other occupancies. The subtenant would also like to know that the subleased premises comply with applicable governmental requirements, are free from hazardous materials (unless legally encapsulated or otherwise managed in accordance with applicable law) and that building systems serving the subleased premises are in good working order.²⁷ More complex transactions may contemplate delivery of portions of the space in stages. The subtenant's counsel must consider what happens if the sublandlord cannot deliver the space. Does the sublease terminate? Are there financial or rent penalties for delay? A right of cancellation seems like a major penalty but is rarely practical. The earlier these issues can be raised and resolved, the better for both parties.

27 In physically complex spaces, HVAC may be provided by a combination of the landlord's "base building" systems and "supplementary systems" installed by the tenant. It is important to know where one system leaves off and the other picks up.

Counsel should also determine whether the sublease transaction includes the use or transfer of any personalty, furniture, equipment, telephone systems, and the like. If so, must these items be in working order? If items of personalty, furniture or equipment are being sold to the subtenant there may be sales tax payable on that sale (and, as discussed below, the landlord may want to include the proceeds of such sale in the subleasing profit received by tenant for the purpose of allocating such profit between landlord and tenant). Will the network cabling or telephone systems work correctly for just the subleased space? Are there available or additional risers available for the subtenant's telecommunication and data cabling? In appropriate instances can the subtenant obtain roof space for a microwave dish or antenna? Is the electrical service to the subleased space sufficient for the subtenant's current and anticipated future use? Does the sublandlord have emergency generator capacity available for the subtenant's use? This, in turn, will cause the parties to focus on issues of timing, cost, and coordination.

The sublease often does not cover all of the space demised by the direct lease. In these cases, the subtenant must decide whether to construct new walls to demise the subleased space and whether the sublet premises provide legal means of ingress and egress. The parties also must address issues such as the equitable allocation of charges relating to utilities and shared areas or services. If the subtenant desires overtime air conditioning or other shared services and the facilities cannot separately serve the subleased premises, the parties must allocate the charges. Similar allocation applies to shared electrical consumption when a single meter or submeter serves all of the space.²⁸ Allocation of the charges based upon the respective floor areas of the sublet space and the space that the sublandlord retains might be unfair depending upon how the parties use the two portions of space. To the extent separate submeters can be installed to measure subtenant's usage, that can be very beneficial. The cost of initially installing and maintaining such submeters will be a business issue to be negotiated between the sublandlord and the subtenant.

Although the sublease needs to comply with the requirements of the direct lease, compliance is relatively easy to accomplish. If the sublandlord's counsel has properly reviewed the direct lease, the parties can set forth any necessary provisions to be incorporated from the direct lease in the initial draft of the sublease.

[29.8] C. Allocation of Risks and Costs

In allocating risks between the parties, a sublandlord properly will make clear to the subtenant those obligations that by their nature only the landlord can perform.²⁹ These obligations include providing building services, making repairs to the common areas and the building structure and systems, or otherwise performing landlord- or owner-specific obligations, including restoring the building and building systems after a casualty or condemnation.³⁰ Subleases usually provide that the sublandlord has no responsibility or liability for failing to fulfill these obligations. Except in those instances when the sublandlord's default caused the landlord's failure to perform these obligations, this is an appropriate position for a sublandlord to take because the sublandlord is entitled to receive these services or benefits from the landlord and is not in a position to perform the obligations independently. However, because the subtenant is not in privity with the landlord, the sublandlord should agree to either use reasonable efforts to enforce the landlord's obligations under the direct lease or take such reasonable steps as will enable the subtenant to proceed directly against the landlord if the landlord defaults under the direct lease.³¹ Exhibit B at the end of this chapter provides a model clause requiring the sublandlord to take certain actions against the landlord for the benefit of the subtenant.

The subtenant's counsel should make sure that the sublandlord remains responsible for any of the sublandlord's own acts or omissions (not caused by the subtenant's default) that would allow the landlord to stop performing the landlord's obligations under the direct lease, thus depriving the subtenant of landlord services. To the extent that the sublandlord was able to negotiate self-help rights in the direct lease, the subtenant will want the sublandlord to agree to exercise those rights on behalf of the subtenant. The sublandlord should be agreeable to such an arrangement unless the sublease covers only part of the premises that the direct lease demises and the sublandlord, in good faith, disagrees with, or could incur liability from, granting the subtenant's request. Exhibit C at the end of this chapter provides sample language for dealing with some of these issues.

31 See Wood & DiSciullo, supra note 1, § 30.2[2][i], at 30-30-30-31 (noting that "[t]he Sublessor agrees to cooperate with the Sublessee in an effort to obtain the services or Landlord's performance [but] this should provide little comfort").

Conversely, the sublandlord typically will pass through to the subtenant any obligations under the direct lease that relate to the subtenant's use and occupancy of the sublet space. Such obligations often include a pass-through of an appropriate percentage of the real estate tax and operating cost escalations, with a change in applicable base years for the escalations (if that is part of the business deal). The subtenant also will generally agree to bear an appropriate share of other monetary obligations, such as payment for electrical consumption. It is also appropriate where the landlord bills the sublandlord for services requested by subtenant, such as after hours HVAC or for use of the loading dock, that the subtenant pays 100% of such amounts since these relate to services provided directly to the subtenant. In appropriate instances it may be desirable to attempt to have the landlord accept requests for such overtime services directly from the sublandlord. To the extent that the landlord gives the tenant any documentation about costs, the subtenant should insist on promptly receiving copies.³² The subtenant's obligation to pay these amounts should be within an agreed period of time after receipt of a bill together with reasonable supporting back-up documentation. Counsel for the subtenant should be sure that these periods within which payments are required to be made by subtenant will, in fact, work for the subtenant.

In appropriately sized transactions, the sublease should allow the subtenant to challenge the landlord's operating statements. The subtenant should request that the sublandlord preserve the subtenant's rights through sublandlord under the direct lease to dispute all escalation and other pass-through obligations and also should request that the sublandlord exercise any such dispute rights on the subtenant's behalf. If the dispute proves successful, the subtenant should receive a share of any credit received by the sublandlord upon resolution of the dispute. Given the sublandlord's dispute rights under the direct lease often depend upon the timely delivery of notices and elections, the subtenant may seek some control over these matters. If the direct lease provides for the arbitration of disputes, such as a dispute over the right to terminate the direct lease if there is casualty damage or over proposed new rules and regulations, the subtenant similarly may want to be involved in these matters. In some cases, the subtenant has no right to advise or participate; in other cases, the parties may agree upon reasonable cooperation. As with any negotia-

32 "The sublessee's job is to gather and have the right to gather in the future, adequate data to determine whether or not its share of additional rent is fair and equitable. . . . [I]f the Landlord does not want the Sublessee to see these records, the Sublessee has no right to enforce this provision against the Landlord; those two parties are not in privity of contract and Landlord has no obligation to cooperate." Id. § 30.03[2][e], at 30-27.

When considering issues related to the direct lease, the subtenant must always remember that two separate boxes of rights and obligations exist: the box within which the landlord and tenant live and the smaller box within which the tenant and subtenant live. The subtenant's counsel also should think about the possibility that the sublandlord could lose the direct lease, either because the sublandlord defaults under the direct lease, or because the landlord defaults under a mortgage, which may lead to lease termination in a foreclosure action.³³ The practical importance of such issues depends on the size and term of the subleasing transaction. Typically, the parties do not consider these issues for any sublease that is either less than a full floor or less than three years; however, disregarding these issues is the client's decision rather than the lawyer's. In order that the subtenant does not receive bills for escalations or items of additional rent under the sublease for periods after the expiration thereof, it is desirable that the subtenant negotiate for an outside date after which the sublandlord waives the right to bill such amounts. Although the sublandlord may only agree to pass along whatever similar relief it has under the direct lease, it is reasonable for a subtenant to negotiate for a period (for example, 24 months) after the end of a particular period beyond which sublandlord may not bill for such items. This protects the subtenant from a sublandlord sitting on escalation or other bills for a commercially unreasonable period of time.

If the subtenant is concerned about default by the landlord, the subtenant should determine whether the landlord has sufficient financial strength and whether the tenant is adequately protected against the landlord's default or failure to otherwise perform the obligations of the direct lease. Does the landlord have security for building work obligations? Does the sublandlord, as tenant, have the benefit of a nondisturbance agreement from the mortgagee? Without protections such as these, the subtenant runs the risk of losing its investment because if the tenant's estate terminates, so too does the subtenant's. In this regard, the subtenant also should consider the effect of a bankruptcy of the sublandlord.³⁴

For a major sublease, a subtenant should seek a recognition agreement from the landlord, stating that if the direct lease ever terminates, the landlord will recognize the subtenant as a direct tenant.³⁵ The subtenant would prefer that this recognition relationship incorporate all the terms and conditions of the sublease.³⁶ As a fallback, the subtenant may be willing to be recognized under the terms of the direct lease, as opposed to the sublease, equitably applied to the subleased space. The relationship can become rather tricky and unsatisfactory for the party (landlord or subtenant) that may have to operate under a non-negotiated document. Accordingly, landlords hesitate to provide recognition agreements for subtenants, particularly smaller subtenants. If the tenant had both foresight and leverage during direct lease negotiations, though, the landlord may have no choice but to recognize the subtenant's rights.³⁷ Similarly, in a major direct lease, the major subtenant may be entitled to receive a non-disturbance agreement from the landlord's mortgagee or a ground lessor, if any, and should request one in any event.

Although a subtenant may want to understand the financial strength of the landlord, the inquiry does not end with the landlord's assets. A subtenant also must understand the financial strength of the sublandlord. Just as a landlord may default in failing to perform obligations under the mortgage of the building, so too may a sublandlord, as tenant, default in failing to perform its obligations under the direct lease. A subtenant should insist that the sublandlord expressly agree to perform all of its obligations as tenant under the direct lease, including timely payment of all rent. A sublandlord often will, and probably should, condition these obligations upon the subtenant's not being in default under the sublease. As a matter of convenience, the subtenant often will want the right to request overtime and other extraordinary services directly from the landlord and the right to pay such charges directly to the landlord. If the sublandlord fails to perform, the subtenant will want enough flexibility to have the time and ability to cure defaults under the direct lease.³⁸

[29.9] D. Interplay of Direct Lease and Sublease Provisions and Independent Matters to Address

[29.10] 1. Generally

As a sublease transaction has a double set of rights and obligations, the direct lease by itself cannot adequately cover the interplay between the provisions of the direct lease and those of the sublease. Some provisions of the sublease transaction are independent of the direct lease transaction and cannot be incorporated by reference. The distinction between the independent provisions and interplay provisions can be blurred and hard to understand. And in some instances the direct lease may address many of the independent provisions discussed below. By drafting the independent provisions from scratch, though, counsel avoids creating the complexity, confusion, and possible mistakes that may result from trying to incorporate by reference and then extensively modifying the corresponding provisions from the direct lease.

Provisions from the direct lease that interact with the provisions in the sublease, or require independent provisions in the sublease, usually fall into one of the following five categories:

1. The status of the direct lease and of the sublet premises;
2. The sublandlord's exercise or non-exercise of certain rights under the direct lease as against the subtenant;
3. Recomputation of time periods;
4. Assignment and subletting, construction, restoration, consents, and insurance; and
5. General and separate boilerplate provisions.

[29.11] 2. Status of Direct Lease and Condition of Sublet Premises

Although practitioners often view representations and warranties as an invitation to future disputes and claims, certain representations and warranties about the underlying direct lease documents are essential in a sublease transaction. A subtenant should demand a full set of representations to identify all of the direct lease documents. By making such a demand, a subtenant will know with certainty the “box of rights and obligations” that comes with the sublease. A sublandlord should be willing to represent and warrant, among other things, that (1) the direct lease, together with all other identified amendments and agreements, is the entire agreement between the landlord and the sublandlord; (2) the lease documents are in full force and effect; and (3) no outstanding uncured notices of default or termination exist.³⁹ A subtenant also may want to know whether any notices of default have issued under the direct lease. It is likely that the copy of the direct lease documents provided to the subtenant will have certain business terms redacted. In this event, the subtenant should seek a representation from the landlord that the redacted provisions of the direct lease do not affect the subtenant’s rights or obligations under the sublease.

A subtenant should insist that the sublandlord not modify the direct lease documents in any way that would adversely affect the subtenant without obtaining the subtenant’s consent. If the direct lease already provides for certain future modifications, the sublease parties would need to permit them, and the subtenant would need to understand them as part of due diligence about the direct lease. A sublandlord may want to keep the right to amend the direct lease. As a reasonable resolution of these issues, a sublandlord often will agree not to amend the lease voluntarily if such an amendment would adversely affect the subtenant’s rights under the sublease, increase the subtenant’s obligations under the sublease, decrease the size of the sublet premises, or shorten the term of the sublease.⁴⁰

[29.12] 3. Exercise of Rights

A subtenant’s rights derive entirely from the sublandlord’s rights under the direct lease. Accordingly, the subtenant should request that the sublandlord agree not to exercise rights under the direct lease that could hurt the subtenant or the sublease. Unless the subtenant has obtained a recognition agreement from the landlord, the subtenant must limit the right of the sublandlord to terminate the direct lease voluntarily. The subtenant should not permit the sublandlord to terminate the direct lease without the consent of the subtenant other than in the case of termination due to condemnation or casualty, or (potentially) a specifically negotiated cancellation right. The subtenant may even limit the right of the sublandlord to effect a casualty termination to those situations in which the landlord terminates the direct lease. The subtenant may want the sublandlord to agree to exercise, or in some instances, refrain from exercising, one or more renewal or expansion options. Such an agreement is especially appropriate in transactions in which the subtenant has pre-negotiated a direct lease with the landlord that will commence when the sublease ends. In the instance where the subtenant is subleasing only a small portion of space demised under the major direct lease, however, it is appropriate and important that the sublandlord reserves a broad ability to act with respect to the direct lease without the subtenant's consent so long as the subtenant's rights or obligations are not adversely affected.

Many times during the life of a sublease, the sublandlord is simply a courier who conveys messages between the landlord and the subtenant. The sublandlord needs more time than the direct lease provides when the sublandlord must communicate with the landlord and get the landlord to act under the direct lease. Correspondingly, time periods need to be shorter when the sublandlord must convey a message to the subtenant and get the subtenant to take action. Otherwise, the sublandlord may default under the direct lease. Accordingly, the parties must change almost all time periods in the direct lease when they are incorporated into the sublease. The subtenant's goal is to make sure that the sublandlord is a speedy messenger. The subtenant wants enough time to take any actions that the landlord requires and also wants to make sure that the landlord responds promptly to any requests. Counsel for the sublandlord must be careful that by adjusting any of these time periods it is left with sufficient time to cure or otherwise take action.

[29.14] 5. Generally Independent Provisions

Provisions regarding assignment and subletting, construction, restoration consents, insurance, and general boilerplate are the provisions that the parties most often independently set forth in the sublease. To some degree, the parties also will incorporate these provisions by reference from the direct lease. Use of both methods helps to avoid ambiguity; however, it is important to provide in the sublease that, as between sublandlord and subtenant, any conflicts are resolved in favor of the sublease.

[29.15] a. Assignment and Subletting; Alterations and Consents

Depending on the language of the assignment and subletting provisions of the direct lease, the parties may simply want to incorporate these provisions wholesale from the direct lease.⁴¹ At a minimum, whether as an independent provision in the sublease or as an incorporated provision from the direct lease, the sublease should address whether the sublandlord can “recapture” the subleased premises or participate in any profits from an assignment of the sublease or a further subletting. A landlord usually will try to participate in assignment or subletting “profits” under the theory that the only party who should make any “profits” from the landlord’s building is the landlord. The sublandlord may seek to include in “profits” any amounts paid for furniture, fixtures or leasehold improvements to the extent the subtenant is purchasing those items. This argument does not extend to the treatment of “losses,” of course. The strength of this argument is diminished substantially when the landlord is only a sublandlord. Similarly, because the sublandlord has no long-term residual interest in the building itself, the case for including onerous requirements on construction and insurance in any sublease is not as compelling as it might be in a direct lease.

A critical issue for any subtenant is the need to obtain approval from the sublandlord and landlord for the subtenant’s initial alterations and any possible future assignment or subletting. If the direct lease requires the landlord’s approval, the subtenant normally will want the sublandlord to agree to submit approval requests to the landlord for quick approval. Ideally, the subtenant wants the sublandlord to agree that anything that the landlord approves will be deemed approved by the sublandlord automatically. If the subtenant’s leverage is not strong enough to obtain such a provision, the sublandlord often will still agree to be reasonable about granting approvals. The subtenant should seek to negotiate acceptable time periods within which sublandlord will respond and if the sublandlord fails to respond, its consent will be deemed given. The subtenant also should try to persuade the sublandlord to agree that if the subtenant ever believes the landlord is unreasonably withholding consent, the subland-lord will challenge the landlord's denial of consent to the extent that the direct lease permits a challenge. Of course, the subtenant should pay any costs of a challenge and protect the sublandlord against liability. To the extent the direct lease requires the sublandlord to reimburse the landlord for third party review of the subtenant's alterations, subtenant may seek to limit its exposure to additional third party expenses incurred by sublandlord in reviewing the subtenant's alteration plans and specifications (depending on the particular facts in some transaction, sublandlord may waive or cap those expenses for subtenant's initial alterations).

41 See Boston Props. v. Pirelli Tire Corp., 134 Cal. App. 3d 985 (Cal. Ct. App. 1982); see also Friedman, supra note 1, § 7:7.1, at 7-124 (stating that “[a] restriction against assignment, included in a headlease, does not bar assignment by a subtenant. For this reason landlord may want to include a restriction . . . under a sublease.”). But see Krasner v. Transcon. Equities, Inc., 70 A.D.2d 312, 420 N.Y.S.2d 872 (1st Dep’t 1979).

A subtenant also should focus on any obligation to remove tenant improvements at the end of the sublease. This obligation may be particularly burdensome if the sublandlord already has made substantial improvements that the landlord may require to be removed at the end of the direct lease term. This obligation can impose substantial costs upon a subtenant or tenant if not appropriately addressed.⁴² The most desirable position for the subtenant is to only be responsible for restoration of improvements or alterations performed by the subtenant and which are required to be removed under the direct lease.

A sublease often requires the subtenant to provide insurance for the sublet space.⁴³ Just as a tenant must, a subtenant should confirm with insurance advisers that the subtenant will be able to obtain the required insurance at a reasonable cost. To the extent that the sublease requires more insurance than the subtenant would otherwise provide, any resulting cost is simply another cost of the sublease. The subtenant should also protect itself from the sublandlord increasing the amount of insurance or requiring additional types of insurance unless these changes are consistent with the particular market and comparable transactions.

Most direct leases contain a waiver of subrogation and release of liability clause for the benefit of the tenant. The subtenant's risk management professionals should determine whether the clause protects the subtenant from claims by the landlord or the landlord's insurer. If the direct lease clause does not protect the subtenant, it is an appropriate issue to raise 42 For example, compliance with the 2002 National Electrical Code relating to removal of abandoned wire and cabling may require expensive work.

43 For a discussion of insurance and other issues for consideration, see Halper, supra note 1, at § 12.06; see also Schuman, supra note 29, ¶ 6.11, at 6-9 (discussing need for insurance, indemnities, and waivers in sublease agreement).

when reviewing and negotiating the landlord's form of consent to sublease. Although, in practice this typically does not happen and/or the landlord will not so agree.

[29.17] c. Boilerplate Provisions

A sublease usually includes the typical boilerplate provisions found in most substantial legal documents, as well as a few provisions of unique importance to subleases (described below). These boilerplate provisions may include mutual brokerage representations and indemnities (which may or may not be factually correct with respect to the sublease, if incorporated from the corporate lease clause), separate arbitration clauses, protections for successors and assigns, and assurance against oral modifications and waivers. The sublease can safely incorporate most boilerplate provisions, default provisions, and remedial provisions contained in the direct lease.

[29.18] 6. Incorporation by Reference

After the parties have considered the substantive issues discussed above, they still must decide exactly how much of the direct lease they should incorporate by reference into the sublease.⁴⁴ The terms of any direct lease usually fall into one of the following four categories: (1) terms that require modification before incorporation by reference into the sublease; (2) terms that the sublease normally should incorporate by reference; (3) general terms that the sublease can incorporate without change and (4) terms that almost certainly will not apply to the sublease and should be expressly excluded.

In its simplest form, a sublease provides for incorporation by reference of all terms of the direct lease with a notation that “landlord” refers to “sublandlord” and “tenant” refers to “subtenant.” This approach, however, may be overly simplistic.⁴⁵ Other terms in the direct lease may be incorporated, but with changes to fit the specific business deal. For example, the sublease should provide its own definitions for “premises,” “fixed rent,” “additional rent,” and “commencement date.”

44 See Guido, supra note 5; Schuman, supra note 29, ¶ 6.6, at 6-7.

45 As a practical matter on smaller sublease transactions, clients may limit how they want counsel to proceed and live with a catch-all such as “to the extent applicable and consistent with the sublease transaction.”

One standard lease clause that a subtenant will certainly not want to incorporate by reference is a provision that limits the landlord's liability to the interest in the building or the premises. Given that sublandlords often lose money on subleases (and therefore its value may be zero), a subtenant should know that the general credit of the sublandlord backs the sublandlord's obligation to preserve the direct lease. If the sublandlord's liability is limited to the interest in the building (i.e., the direct lease), the subtenant may have no claim against the sublandlord if the sublandlord decides to abandon its entire position. Non-recourse clauses may make sense in some real estate transactions, but not generally in subleases.

The following list summarizes many terms of a direct lease that a sublease often will incorporate by reference. Following each term is a quick summary, if relevant, of the position a subtenant may take regarding each of the terms and any limitations or modifications that may be desirable when the sublease incorporates a term by reference. These annotations reflect a subtenant's idealized view of the world. The subtenant may ask for these changes, but may not be able to obtain all or any of them.

Issue	Subtenant's Position
Abatements	Pass through to the subtenant.
Alterations and Approvals of Alterations	One review or consent process. If the landlord approves, the sublandlord is deemed to have approved.
Compliance with Law	Especially if the sublandlord has retained space, limit the subtenant's obligation to the subtenant's particular use and alterations of the space.
Defaults	No right to exercise remedies set forth in excluded or redacted provisions.
Dispute Resolution	The sublandlord must exercise the sublandlord's rights under the direct lease, including arbitration rights, for the subtenant's benefit or permit the subtenant to exercise such rights in the sublandlord's name and at the subtenant's expense.

Escalations	If the subtenant agrees to pay escalations, the subtenant should have the right to challenge (or require the sublandlord to challenge) the landlord's calculations and statements pursuant to the mechanisms provided in the direct lease. The counsel to subtenant should confirm that the subtenant's proportionate share for calculation of escalations is correctly computed.
Estoppel Certificates	Mutual obligation.
Holdover	If the sublease covers only a portion of the premises covered by the direct lease, counsel for the subtenant may seek to mitigate consequences of a holdover (this may be very difficult to achieve).
Notices	If the subtenant notifies the sublandlord of any matter, such notification satisfies the subtenant's obligation. The sublandlord should give the subtenant copies of all notices from the landlord regarding sublet space or otherwise affecting the subtenant's obligations under the sublease.
Renewal and Expansion Rights	Very deal-specific. If the subtenant's rights depend on the sublandlord's exercise of renewal options, the subtenant may want a power of attorney or the landlord's agreement that the subtenant can exercise on behalf of the sublandlord. As a practical matter may only arise where the subtenant is leasing the entire premises covered by the direct lease.
Repairs (Building)	Although the landlord repair obligations are usually not assumed by the sublandlord, the sublease must address the need for repairs made necessary by the sublandlord or a third party.
Roof Rights	Pass through to the subtenant. If the sublandlord has moved out, the subtenant can exercise exclusively any roof rights held by the sublandlord.
Surrender at End of Term	Delete any obligation to remove existing or installed alterations. Surrender may depend on whether alterations generally are usable by other office tenants.

Tenant's Property	Very deal-specific. The sublandlord may release its rights and provide a bill of sale. Consider sales tax implications.
Use	Allow the subtenant's contemplated use.
Violations	Expand to protect the subtenant from the sublandlord's acts or omissions.

A subtenant usually will not want to incorporate by reference the following matters covered by the direct lease: (1) payment of rent (if it varies from rent payable under the sublease) and (2) matters that have occurred already, such as the commencement date and initial construction.

In addition to the items listed above, a common-sense approach makes identifying objectionable provisions fairly easy. Analysis depends almost entirely on the level of sophistication of the direct lease. However, if the parties do not delete or address certain "traps" in the economics of the transaction, they can result in significant implications to a subtenant or tenant. These traps include the sublandlord's ability to impose separate rules and regulations; access to the sublet premises; governmental compliance issues, such as the sublandlord's obligation to obtain an amended certificate of occupancy for space already built-out; rent abatement provisions at the beginning of the term; rights to recapture and share profits; limits on further subletting and assignments; responsibility for environmental hazards not caused by the subtenant; insurance for the building; notice provisions; the covenant of quiet enjoyment; and, depending on the agreed-upon business transaction, expansion options, renewal options, and cancellation options.

If the direct lease is a major lease there will likely be a variety of provisions that would not be incorporated by reference in a sublease of a small or even a moderate portion of the premises covered by the major direct lease. There may be provisions granting exterior or lobby signage, monument rights, lobby security desk or even messenger center that are personal to the named tenant. There may be rights to sever the direct lease, options to purchase or other rights that would clearly, on review of the direct lease, not be applicable for the subtenant. Often, in these provisions of the direct lease expressly exclude the benefit of these rights inuring to the benefit of a subtenant.

[29.19] 7. Conditions to Effectiveness of Sublease

The final hurdle for the parties to the sublease is setting forth the conditions that the sublease must satisfy before it will become effective.⁴⁶ The most important condition for the parties to satisfy is obtaining the landlord's consent to the transaction. As described earlier, the direct lease may give the landlord rights that allow the landlord to thwart or delay the sublease transaction. Timing is often a critical issue for the subtenant. As the sublease undoubtedly will be contingent upon obtaining any required consent from the landlord, a subtenant often will want to specify an outside date for obtaining consent. The subtenant should tie the consent deadline to the period in which landlord must grant or deny consent pursuant to the provisions of the direct lease. If the subtenant does not obtain consent by the deadline, the sublease should provide that the subtenant, and possibly the sublandlord, has the right to terminate the sublease and recover any money and letters of credit that the subtenant may have provided when the parties signed the sublease.

The sublease also should deal with other matters directly related to the landlord's consent. The sublandlord should agree promptly, or within a specified time period after execution and delivery of the sublease, to submit the request for consent and any required information to the landlord. The subtenant should agree to cooperate with the sublandlord's effort to obtain the landlord's consent. The sublease should also state which party will bear costs incurred in obtaining the landlord's consent (potentially subject to a cap). If the subtenant has identified problems regarding particular provisions of the lease, the subtenant may want to insist that the landlord's consent contain certain additional consents or assurances. Such consents and assurances may include the landlord's consent to the subtenant's anticipated use of the subleased premises, if different from that permitted by the direct lease; consent to the subtenant's initial alterations; the number of listings for the subtenant on the building directory; and a landlord waiver of subrogation for the benefit of the subtenant and rights similar to those of the tenant regarding future assignments or subletting. This last point may be particularly important because many direct leases do not permit any further assignments or sublettings. If the subtenant wants nondisturbance or recognition protections, the sublease should be conditioned upon delivery of those documents.

[29.20] IV. CONCLUSION

Subleases are deceptive. They seem much easier to negotiate because the landlord and tenant have completed much of the work in negotiating the direct lease. But because the sublease is a hybrid, the subtenant and counsel face many issues that are more complex than they appear at first blush.

A sublease transaction has all of the traditional elements of a direct lease transaction, but it is different because of the two boxes of rights that the parties must evaluate, interconnect, and make work.

EXHIBIT ADUE DILIGENCE FOR THE SUBLEASE TRANSACTION

Unlike the typical leasing transaction in which the landlord and tenant are free to define their relationship, a sublease transaction requires a subtenant to step into a “relationship in progress.” The subtenant and counsel need to ask many important questions about the relationship in progress. Not only must the subtenant decide if the proposed deal is affordable and suitable, but the subtenant must also understand what has already occurred in the existing landlord-tenant relationship and how that history will affect the subtenant.

The following due diligence checklist attempts to cover only issues that are unique to a sublease transaction.

The starting point in all instances is the direct lease and all identified amendments and modifications. These documents ultimately are the starting point for examining the box of rights and obligations between the landlord and the tenant from which the box of rights and obligations between the tenant and the subtenant derives. Obviously, the size of the subleasing transaction affects the appropriate level of scrutiny. It is not unusual for the sublandlord to redact specific economic provisions of the direct lease (such as rent, free rent periods or work allowances, as examples). In larger, more significant subleasing transactions, sensitivity to these due diligence items allows the practitioner to advise the subtenant appropriately about hidden risks, costs, and benefits. Next, the prospective subtenant must examine all communications between the landlord and the tenant under the lease. Finally, the prospective subtenant must examine any actions the tenant has taken already with respect to the leased space.

Underlying Lease

- a. Identify the lease document.
- b. Have the parties amended the lease document?
- c. Do any of the following agreements operate as amendments?
 - i. Estoppel Certificates
 - ii. Consents to Subletting or Assignment

- iii. Commencement Date Agreement
 - iv. Exercise or Waiver of Option, Renewal, or Expansion Rights
 - v. Subordination, Nondisturbance, and Attornment Agreements
 - vi. Recognition Agreements
 - vii. Alteration Agreements
 - viii. Consent to Alterations (With or Without a Waiver of Restoration Obligation)
- d. Do collateral documents exist that bind the tenant or subtenant?
- i. Rules and Regulations (Have they been amended?)
 - ii. Construction Rules
 - iii. Overtime or Supplemental Service Rate Schedules
 - (a) Freight Elevators
 - (b) Building HVAC
 - (c) Supplemental HVAC/Condenser Water
 - (d) Security Services
 - iv. List of Approved Contractors and of Required Insureds
 - v. Approval of Signage
 - vi. Default Notices
 - vii. Miscellaneous Notices
 - viii. Condominium documents if the premises are in a commercial condominium unit.
- e. Have any documents changed the relationship between the landlord and the tenant that might affect the subtenant?
- i. Escalation or Additional Rent Statements

- ii. Taxes
 - (a) Review underlying real estate tax bill.
 - (b) Note changes in actual base year taxes as a result of tax protest proceedings.
 - (c) Confirm whether the building is subject to tax abatements being phased out over time.
- iii. Operating Expenses Statements
- iv. Cleaning Charges
- v. CPI Calculations
- vi. CAM Calculations
- vii. Percentage Rent Calculations
- viii. Electricity: Electrical Surveys or Notices of Rate Increases
- ix. Settlement Agreements Regarding Disputed Items
- x. Other Issues
 - (a) Has the landlord transferred its interest and, if so, has the new landlord assumed the obligations, and has the old landlord been released?
 - (b) Are there pending disputes between the landlord and tenant?
 - (c) Is the landlord bankrupt?
- f. Performance by the Landlord
 - i. Has the landlord completed all required construction?
 - ii. Has the landlord delivered any required evidence relating to removal or abatement of asbestos?
 - iii. Has the landlord delivered all required governmental approvals, e.g., Certificate of Occupancy?

- iv. Confirm financial responsibility for compliance with laws, including those relating to the upgrading of fire protection systems (New York City).

- g. Tenant's Actions
 - i. Construction and Alterations
 - (a) Plans and Specifications for Build-out or Alterations
 - (i) As-builts
 - (ii) Schematics
 - (1) Wiring: Telephone, Fiber Optic, Computer Cable
 - (2) HVAC
 - (3) Uninterruptible Power Supply
 - (4) Chases and Conduits
 - (5) Trading Floor
 - (6) Cafeteria, Dining Room, or Other Special Uses
 - (b) Licenses and Approvals for Build-out, Including Asbestos Abatement and Special Use Permits
 - (c) Architect's Contract for Build-out or Alterations
 - (d) Construction Contracts for Build-out or Alterations
 - (e) Guarantees and Warranties for Improvements and Systems
 - ii. Service Contracts
 - (a) Cleaning Contract
 - (b) Systems Maintenance Contracts
 - (i) Mechanical Equipment
 - (ii) Uninterruptible Power Supply

- (iii) Supplemental HVAC
 - (iv) Telecommunications
 - (1) Fixed Systems
 - (2) Satellite
 - (3) Video Conferencing
 - (4) Cabling from Premises to Rooftop
- iii. Insurance Certificates
- iv. Violation Notices Received by the Tenant
- v. Previous Subleases Entered Into by the Tenant
- vi. Correspondence Between the Tenant and the Landlord
- vii. Liens Caused by the Tenant
- viii. Does the transaction include equipment (e.g., telephones, computers) or furniture? If so, review purchase orders and leasing agreements and prepare schedule of included items.

EXHIBIT BENFORCEMENT OF RIGHTS AGAINST LANDLORD

If Landlord defaults in any obligation to Sublandlord regarding the Subleased Premises, then Sublandlord shall not, except as and to the extent set forth in this paragraph, be obligated to bring any action or proceeding or to take any other steps to enforce Sublandlord's rights against Landlord. Sublandlord shall cooperate, at no cost to Sublandlord, in seeking to obtain Landlord's performance under the Lease. Upon Subtenant's written request, Sublandlord shall make written demand upon Landlord to perform Landlord's obligations regarding the Subleased Premises. If, after Subtenant makes such demand, Landlord's grace period under the Lease expires and Landlord fails to perform Landlord's obligations under the Lease, then Subtenant shall have the right to proceed against Landlord in Subtenant's own name. All rights of Sublandlord under the Lease necessary for that purpose shall be, and hereby are, conferred upon and transferred to Subtenant. Subtenant shall be subrogated to such rights to the extent that they apply to the Subleased Premises. If Subtenant cannot proceed against Landlord in Subtenant's name because of lack of privity, non-assignability, or any other reason, Subtenant shall have the right, at its sole cost and expense, to proceed against Landlord in Sublandlord's name, provided Subtenant is not in default under this Sublease beyond any applicable notice or grace period. Sublandlord shall execute all documents and take all actions that Subtenant reasonably requests in connection therewith. To the extent that the Lease allows Sublandlord to exercise "self-help" rights and a reasonable basis exists for Subtenant to request that Sublandlord exercise such rights with respect to the Subleased Premises, Sublandlord shall exercise such rights for Subtenant's benefit. To the extent that, as a result of Landlord's default under the Lease affecting the Subleased Premises, Sublandlord recovers any sum from Landlord or is entitled to any abatement, credit, set-off, or offset, such recovery, abatement, credit, set-off, or offset, or the benefit thereof, shall belong exclusively to Subtenant.

COOPERATION CLAUSE—GENERAL

Sublandlord shall use reasonable efforts to cooperate with Subtenant in (i) obtaining for Subtenant: (a) additional services requested by Subtenant under the Lease (as incorporated into this Sublease) and this Sublease; (b) any benefit to Sublandlord relating to the Subleased Premises under the Lease that would directly benefit Subtenant, including without limitation any dispute rights regarding operating expenses, real estate taxes, other escalations, or electricity payments as set forth in the Lease; and (c) Landlord's consent to any action for which the Lease (as incorporated into this Sublease) requires Landlord's consent, and (ii) delivering any notice to Landlord as required by any provision of the Lease (as incorporated into this Sublease) including, without limitation, promptly forwarding any request made by Subtenant to Landlord for services, or consent or approval, and providing Landlord with all information required (or that Landlord may reasonably request) regarding any such request. If Landlord consents to any matter that requires Landlord's consent under the Lease, then Sublandlord shall automatically be deemed to have given such consent under this Sublease, except for approvals and consents relating to Alterations (other than items for which neither Landlord's nor Sublandlord's consent shall be required). If Landlord grants any consent requested by Subtenant regarding Approvals, then Sublandlord shall not unreasonably withhold or delay consent or approval with respect thereto.

MODEL OFFICE SUBLEASE

This Model Office Sublease is intended for simple and casual subleases of excess office space, typically in New York City. It is not appropriate for long-term or development-related subleases or subleases that contemplate major improvements. With changes, this Sublease can easily be used for retail or other space. The first version of this Model Office Sublease (much shorter) was prepared in 1992 or 1993. It was the first substantial model document that Joshua Stein ever prepared. It has been updated (and, unfortunately, complexified) over the decades since. It has also been joined by hundreds of other model documents prepared by Joshua Stein.

This Model Office Sublease starts from Sublandlord's perspective, but assumes all parties want to avoid protracted negotiations. Hence the model is partly prenegotiated. It includes protections that a Subtenant would often request, but a Sublandlord could choose to delete, especially in a first draft. Sublandlord's counsel will typically prepare the first draft of any Sublease, but will often propose a reasonable and balanced document because: (i) Sublandlord usually needs Subtenant more than the converse; (ii) every day of negotiations costs Sublandlord lost Subrent, with a dollar value that can exceed the value of whatever issues drive the parties' negotiations (this is also true with direct lease negotiations but to a landlord it's part of the ordinary course of business); (iii) Sublandlord is not in the real estate business and regards the entire exercise as a headache rather than offering any form of opportunity; and (iv) the issues are relatively narrow though not always simple.

In using this Model Office Sublease, consider these points:

1. SUBRENT AND ESCALATIONS

Focus special care on the definition of Subrent and the allocation of escalations, particularly defining the base years and any later adjustments that might affect those years. The provisions in this model reflect only one of many possible business deals. They must be fully thought through and edited for every transaction. Sublandlord may intuitively expect that Subtenant will pay a "fair share" of tax escalations. That would typically not be true, as the Sublease will have a new tax base. Sublandlord's counsel must make sure Sublandlord understands what that means, i.e., the fact that Subtenant won't contribute much to real estate taxes at the beginning.

2. TECHNICAL DETAILS

Read the entire Overlease, including all amendments and any other document that may have modified the Sublease. Add correct Section refferences in the Sublease. Confirm that the Sublease defines all terms it uses (or properly refers to the Overlease for definitions), particularly “Sublandlord’s Rent.”

3. EXCLUDED ISSUES

This Model Office Sublease does not fully consider these issues, except through selective and limited incorporation from the Overlease:

- 3.1. Bankruptcy. Effect of Overlandlord’s bankruptcy, including control over rejection, control of proceedings, allocation of damages, etc.
- 3.2. Delivery. Any delay or failure in delivery of the Subpremises.
- 3.3. Financial Statements. Obligation for either Sublandlord or Subtenant to deliver periodic financial statements. Subtenant is at least as concerned about Sublandlord’s credit as Sublandlord is about Subtenant’s.
- 3.4. Fixturation. Required fixturation by Sublandlord or Subtenant. If the parties plan any fixturation, they must substantially expand the Sublease to deal with, e.g., plan development and construction approvals. Optional language toward the end of the Sublease offers some possibilities.
- 3.5. Nondisturbance. Nondisturbance or recognition agreements from mortgagees or Overlandlord.
- 3.6. Time Limits. Shortening and lengthening of Overlease time limits to preserve Sublandlord flexibility (common but probably more trouble than it’s worth).

4. ADDITIONAL POINTS

Checklist of points to consider:

- 4.1. Use. The “use” clause should permit Subtenant’s use. If any issue or concern exists, the Sublease should: (i) say that notwithstanding anything in the Overlease, as incorporated by reference, Subtenant may conduct its intended use; and (ii) Overlandlord’s Consent must also include a consent to Subtenant’s intended use or a confirmation that it complies with the Overlease.

- 4.2. Partial Premises. If the Subpremises consist of only part of Sublandlord's Premises, consider issues regarding demising of the space. If the Subpremises will be separately demised, who pays for that? Does treating the Subpremises as a separate occupancy raise any code or practical issues (e.g., access, reception arrangements, signage)? If the Subpremises will not be separately demised, confirm this is legally permissible. Also, consider co-existence issues, e.g., no loud construction work in business hours, administration of mail, office services, preservation of confidentiality, general rules. From Sublandlord's viewpoint, perhaps the Sublease can just allow Sublandlord to establish rules and procedures for these matters and Subtenant should agree to comply with them.
- 4.3. Comparison. Review the Overlease to confirm that Sublandlord is not promising Subtenant anything that Sublandlord cannot deliver or greater rights than Sublandlord possesses under the Overlease. The desire to prevent such a disconnect drives the use of a Sublease format that largely incorporates the Overlease by reference, as opposed to a Sublease that is a standalone and independent document. In reviewing the Overlease, also identify any requirements relating to the Sublease or possible issues any Sublease needs to address.
- 4.4. Nonrecourse? This Sublease does not contain language that would: (i) limit Sublandlord's liability to Sublandlord's interest in the Overlease; (ii) terminate the Sublease automatically if the Overlease terminates; or (iii) terminate all liability of Sublandlord if Sublandlord assigns the Overlease and the assignee assumes it. Nonrecourse clauses of this type typically do not make sense in a Sublease, where the value of the Overlease is probably negative. A Subtenant should insist that: (a) Sublandlord commits to preserve the Overlease and hence the Sublease; and (b) Sublandlord's general credit backs that obligation. In addition to rejecting any nonrecourse clauses in the Sublease, a Subtenant should also check the Overlease provisions incorporated by reference into the Sublease. Do they include a nonrecourse clause that would benefit Sublandlord? Conversely, is Sublandlord creditworthy and likely to pay its rent to Overlandlord?

If the parties do intend to give Sublandlord nonrecourse protections, Sublandlord should beware of case law that uses the "implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing" to let Subtenant assert personal liability against Sublandlord.¹

- 4.5. Special Provisions. The last section of this Sublease, before signatures, offers language to cover many special agreements often included in any Sublease, relating to such matters as occupancy, Alterations, FF&E, and other practicalities. Before writing any such provisions, take a look at the language offered here.
- 4.6. End of Term. When the Overlease and Sublease end, who is responsible for complying with any obligations that arise at the end of the Overlease term?
- 4.7. Guaranty. This Sublease contemplates use of a guaranty. The guaranty could cover all Subtenant's obligations or just Subtenant's obligations until Subtenant surrenders possession (a "good-guy guaranty"). In the context of a Sublease, however, a good-guy guaranty may not work that well. All it does is assure that Subtenant will move out if Subtenant defaults, but at that point Sublandlord would still need to find a new Subtenant – which would potentially be quite difficult given the Sublandlord's limited timeline. In contrast, a good-guy guaranty works better for a typical landlord, who can then relet the premises for whatever term makes the most business sense. Sublandlord doesn't have that flexibility. In other words, just because a good-guy guaranty may be industry standard, that doesn't mean it makes sense for a Sublease. Sublandlord should try to do better, though the market may not allow that. Delete all references to a guaranty if none exists.
- 4.8. Other Issues. Subleases raise many issues, both: (i) all the same issues as leases²; and (ii) many issues unique to subleases. As a result, subleases can in some ways be more complex than direct leases, just as a sale of a mortgage loan can be more complicated than a sale of the real property that secures it. Anyone drafting or negotiating a Sublease may wish to consider the full range of these issues, although at a certain point these issues invite overthinking and verge on a discussion of philosophy rather than practical relationships and what really happens in the real world.

1 See Joshua Stein, The Perils of Subtenancy: A Roadmap for Recourse When the Sublandlord Defaults Under the Prime Lease; and Some Lessons for Nonrecourse Financing, 22 ICSC Shopping Center Legal Update, No. 2, at 10 (Summer 2002) (discussing Tapps of Nassau Supermarkets, Inc. v. Linden Boulevard L.P., 704 N.Y.S.2d 27 [Sup. Ct. App. Div. 2000]); The Perils of Subtenancy and a Roadmap for Recourse When the Sublandlord Defaults Under the Prime Lease, Retail Law Strategist, April 2002, at 4 (shorter version of same article).

2 As summarized, for example, in the silent lease issues checklists co-authored by Joshua Stein and S.H. Spencer Compton.

4.9 Holdover. If Subtenant holds over in even a small part of the space, Overlandlord can treat this as Sublandlord's holdover in the entire Sublandlord's Premises under the Overlease, with attendant hold-over rent penalties. Counsel should assure that Sublandlord understands that risk and the resulting need to have a creditworthy and responsible Subtenant. Sublandlord could mitigate that risk by ending the Sublease term more than a day before the end of the Overlease term, or by requiring Subtenant to deliver an extra security deposit, to assure timely departure, a few months before the end of the Sublease term.

4.10. Rights of Overlandlord. Overlandlords have been known to claim they are third-party beneficiaries under Subleases, although they disclaim any liability or obligation. Based on this theory, Overlandlords have been known to assert that if Sublandlord and Subtenant agree to terminate a Sublease, this violates Overlandlord's rights. Overlandlord may express the same concept in any consent to the Sublease. This Sublease contains language by which Sublandlord and Subtenant reserve the right to amend or terminate this Sublease, in an effort to defeat any such Overlandlord theories. Sublandlord and Subtenant should watch for any language in the Overlease or Overlandlord's consent that might be deemed to make Overlandlord a third-party beneficiary, hence having the right to prevent amendment or termination of the Sublease. The parties to the Sublease may want to push back on that. As a reasonable middle ground, the parties might reserve the right to terminate the Sublease but not the right to amend it.

5. OTHER DELIVERIES

For attachments, see the exhibits at the end of this chapter. Revise as necessary. Subtenant will want to see a copy of the Overlease. It is customary to redact economic terms in the Overlease before sending it to Subtenant. That redaction process sounds simple. Once started, though, it must be done perfectly. Hence it incurs significant legal fees as well as delay. Sublandlord may reasonably decide to skip the redaction and let Subtenant see the whole Overlease.

6. SUBLEASE MECHANICS

The most difficult part of negotiating any Sublease will often relate to the various mechanical and logistical steps in transitioning the Subpremises from Sublandlord to Subtenant, as opposed to negotiating the Sub-lease. These steps and issues include: (i) defining the space, typically in the form of a diagram for which no one wants responsibility; (ii) getting a copy of the entire Overlease and (if desired) redacting it to share it with Subtenant's counsel; (iii) defining what personal property goes to Subtenant and what personal property Sublandlord must remove; (iv) getting everything signed and the necessary checks written and delivered to the right place; (v) getting Overlandlord's attention for the required Overlandlord consent; (vi) getting a draft of Overlandlord's consent, which will often be egregious, and then negotiating it on behalf of both Sublandlord and Subtenant³; (vii) delivering the keys to the Subpremises; (viii) making sure Subtenant knows it has received possession and the keys; (viii) giving any required formal notices of delivery; and (ix) making sure Overlandlord's property management personnel realize Subtenant exists.

7. COMMENCEMENT DATE

Logistical concerns continue after signing the Sublease. If the Commencement Date is not the date of signing, what notices must Sublandlord give? Should the parties sign a Commencement Date letter? In practice, written notice of commencement sounds like a great idea and a simple thing to do. When the time actually comes, though, Sublandlord and its counsel – who are not in the property management business, after all – will either not remember, or take too long, to do it. Sublandlord's signer will probably be unavailable. Sublandlord may lose significant subrent as a result. Sublandlord's counsel would be well advised to prepare the Commencement Date notice when the parties sign the Sublease, with a blank for the actual Commencement Date, so Sublandlord will be able to issue the notice immediately when accurate. This also represents another reason to empower counsel to give notices on behalf of the parties they represent.

3 Ideally, Sublandlord will obtain that document early in the process so it can be fully resolved, and attached as an exhibit to the Sublease, during Sublease negotiations. Overlandlord might not cooperate, refusing to deal with the matter until Sublandlord and Subtenant have signed their Sublease.

OFFICE SUBLEASE

THIS OFFICE SUBLEASE (this “Sublease”) is entered into on _____, 201__ (the “Signing Date”) by _____, a _____ (“Sublandlord”); and _____, a _____ (“Subtenant”).⁵

Sublandlord and Subtenant enter into this Sublease based on these facts:

A. Sublandlord is tenant under one or more lease documents, as amended to date, all as described in Exhibit A, by and between _____ (with its predecessors and successors in interest, “Overlandlord”) and Sublandlord or its predecessor in interest (excluding any provisions redacted from the copy given to Subtenant, the “Overlease”).

B. In the Overlease, Overlandlord demised to Sublandlord the premises (“Sublandlord’s Premises”) identified as [part of]the _____ floor(s) of the building known as _____ (the “Building”), substantially as shown in Exhibit B.

C. Sublandlord wants to sublease to Subtenant, and Subtenant wants to sublease from Sublandlord, [part/all] of Sublandlord’s Premises ([that part,]the “Subpremises”), [consisting of _____ square feet on the _____ floor(s)], substantially as shown in Exhibit B.⁶

D. The part of Sublandlord’s Premises, if any, not constituting Subpremises is referred to as the “Reserved Premises.”

E. On the Signing Date, Subtenant is delivering to Sublandlord:

- A check, subject to collection, in the amount of $_____ to be credited against the first Fixed Subrent due after the Abatement Period (the “Prepaid Fixed Subrent”);

5 To help prevent confusion and mistakes, consider replacing Sublandlord, Subtenant, and Overlandlord with short versions of the parties’ names, such as Jones, Smith, and Bialystok.

6 Subtenant may insist on mentioning square footage. If so, insert language like this: “and containing about _____ rentable square feet of Sublandlord’s Premises, which rentable square footage shall not be subject to survey, remeasurement, or adjustment.” Generally, any reference to square footage just invites trouble.

- A check, subject to collection, in the amount of $_____, for Sublandlord to hold and apply as security for Subtenant's performance of its obligations under this Sublease (the "Security"); and
- A guaranty in the form of Exhibit C (the "Guaranty") signed by _____ (the "Guarantor").

F. This Sublease may use terms before defining them. An Index of Defined Terms follows the signatures.

NOW, THEREFORE, Sublandlord and Subtenant agree:

1. DEMISING OF SUBPREMISES; TERM

1.1 Sublease of Subpremises. Sublandlord subleases the Subpremises to Subtenant, and Subtenant subleases the Subpremises from Sublandlord, for the Term.

1.2 Term. The "Term" starts on the date (the "Commencement Date") that is the later of (i) _____, 201__ (the "Expected Commencement Date") and (ii) the date Sublandlord [delivers to Subtenant] [has obtained] Overlandlord's written consent to this Sublease, if Overlandlord or the Overlease requires that consent. Regardless of the Commencement Date, the Term expires on _____ (the "Expiration Date").⁷ Sublandlord shall promptly notify Subtenant of the Commencement Date after it occurs.⁸

1.3 Overlandlord Consent and Effectiveness. This Sublease shall be of no force or effect unless Overlandlord consents by executing either: (i) the "Consent of Overlandlord" at the end of this Sublease; or (ii) Overlandlord's standard sublease consent, if any, but only if it is unconditional (except requirements on Sublandlord or Subtenant signing) and irrevocable and does not (except as this paragraph or the Overlease already contemplates) require anyone to make a payment or assume any obligation (the "Standard Overlandlord Consent"). The Standard Overlandlord Consent may restrict Transfer of this Sublease. Subtenant shall be bound by that restriction. Sublandlord shall promptly submit this fully executed Sublease to Overlandlord for Overlandlord's consent. Sublandlord shall exercise reasonable efforts to obtain that consent but need not make any unreimbursed payments to obtain it, except nominal application fees and processing fees; reasonable attorneys' fees; and any payments that the Overlease expressly requires Sublandlord to make, when and as due. If Sublandlord receives Overlandlord's consent, then Sublandlord shall promptly give Subtenant a copy of it. If Overlandlord does not consent to this Sublease within __ days after the Signing Date, then this Sublease shall automatically be of no force or effect and neither party shall have any more rights or obligations under it. Sublandlord and Subtenant shall each promptly sign the Standard Overlandlord Consent if required by its terms. Notwithstanding anything else in this Sublease, Subtenant shall not enter into possession of the Subpremises, and no Commencement Date shall occur, unless Overlandlord consents to this Sublease. Nothing in this paragraph expands Overlandlord's right to withhold consent to this Sublease beyond Overlandlord's rights under the Overlease.

⁸ Subtenant may seek prior notice of the Commencement Date, or set conditions or documentary requirements for it, e.g., delivery of a copy of Overlandlord's consent. These will just delay the Commencement Date and hence cost Sublandlord money. Often, especially if Subtenant plans to do any Alterations, Subtenant will be "not quite ready" to take the space when Sublandlord delivers it, so Subtenant will happily delay commencement of Subrent. If Sublandlord agrees the Commencement Date will occur only when Sublandlord has given Subtenant a copy of Overlandlord's consent, then delete this sentence to avoid any requirement for double notices.

1.4 Commencement Date Agreement. After the Commencement Date, at either party's request, the parties shall promptly execute, acknowledge, and exchange a document, in substantially the form of Exhibit D, stating the Commencement Date and the Subrent Commencement Date, and updating the Fixed Subrent Schedule if the actual Commencement Date is later than the Expected Commencement Date.

2. SUBRENT

Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord rent under this Sublease (the "Subrent") in these amounts at these times, prorated daily for partial periods:

2.1 Fixed Subrent. Except in any Abatement Period, Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord "Fixed Subrent" for the Subpremises for each period in the Term in the amounts shown on the Fixed Subrent Schedule below. If the Commencement Date occurs later than the Expected Commencement Date, then the parties shall by written agreement update the Fixed Subrent Schedule, so the first "Start Date" for Fixed Subrent matches the actual Commencement Date and all other dates (except the Expiration Date) are extended by the same amount of time. The "Fixed Subrent Schedule" is as follows:

Start Date	End Date	Annual	Monthly

2.2 Fixed Subrent Abatement. The “Abatement Period” means the period from the Commencement Date until the earlier of (i) _____, 201__⁹; and (ii) the date when Sublandlord gives Subtenant an accurate written notice of a monetary or other material default under this Sublease. Fixed Subrent otherwise payable in the Abatement Period shall be entirely abated. The Abatement Period shall have no effect on any other obligation of Subtenant under this Sublease.¹⁰ Beginning on the day after the Abatement Period (the “Subrent Commencement Date”), Fixed Subrent shall begin to accrue and Subtenant shall start to pay Fixed Subrent as this Sublease provides.

2.3 CPI Increases. On _____ of each year, annual Fixed Subrent (before giving effect to any Abatement Period) shall be adjusted as described in Overlease Section _____, using as [the Base Year] calendar year 201__.¹¹ Sublandlord shall calculate that adjustment using Overlandlord’s statements of the [Price Index] under Overlease Section __. Sublandlord shall promptly give Subtenant copies of those statements, deleting dollar figures for Sublandlord’s Rent. If Overlandlord fails to provide those statements in a timely manner satisfactory to Sublandlord, then Sublandlord shall obtain similar information from other reliable sources, and adjusted Fixed Rent accordingly.¹²

9 Sublandlord prefers a fixed date to try to incentivize Subtenant to limit and speed up negotiations. More often the Abatement Period will end a certain number of days or months after the Commencement Date.

10 Consider adding this language, largely of theoretical value only: “If Sublandlord terminates this Sublease or re-enters the Subpremises because of Tenant’s default, then Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord an amount equal to the Fixed Subrent that would have been due but for the Abatement Period, in addition to any other amounts Sublandlord can recover.” In the unlikely event that Subtenant pays all damages due for the Sublease termination, Sublandlord is not really entitled to this payment and should be willing to excuse it.

11 The CPI formula in the Overlease can sound right but be wrong. This happens with some regularity. Scrutinize the formula and confirm it works.

12 This paragraph is optional.

2.4 Timing of Fixed Subrent Payments. Subtenant shall pay Fixed Subrent in advance, subject to any Abatement Period and credit for Pre-paid Fixed Subrent: (i) for the first full calendar month of the Term, on the Signing Date, (ii) for the period from the Subrent Commencement Date to the end of that month, on the Subrent Commencement Date; and (iii) for the second full calendar month of the Term and for each following month of the remaining Term, on the first day of that month. Subtenant shall make those payments without notice, demand, abatement, deduction, counterclaim, or setoff. If the Subrent Commencement Date occurs on a day other than the first day of a calendar month or this Sublease expires or terminates on a day other than the last day of a calendar month, Sublandlord shall prorate Subrent (and any other obligation of Subtenant under this Sublease, including those incorporated by reference) daily.

2.5 Additional Subrent. Subtenant shall pay or reimburse Sublandlord, as “Additional Subrent,” an amount equal to (or, where indicated, part of) the payments described below, prorated for the Term. The parties shall try to have Overlandlord bill Subtenant directly for any Additional Subrent.¹³ If Subtenant’s failure to pay any direct bill from Overlandlord causes Sublandlord any liability or loss, then Subtenant shall indemnify Sublandlord regarding that liability or loss, including payment of reasonable attorneys’ fees. To the extent that Overlandlord does not directly bill for any Additional Subrent, Sublandlord shall deliver to Subtenant an invoice with reasonably detailed supporting documentation, including any available invoices from Overlandlord and the date that Sublandlord’s payment is due to Overlandlord. Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord that Additional Subrent by the later of (i) 10 business days before Sublandlord’s payment is due to Overlandlord; and (ii) 15 days after delivery of that invoice. Sublandlord may require Subtenant to pay Additional Subrent during or after the Term. Sublandlord’s failure to render an invoice for, or collect, Additional Subrent shall not limit Subtenant’s obligations or prejudice Sublandlord’s right to bill later. This Section shall survive the expiration or earlier termination of this Sublease. Subtenant shall pay Additional Subrent to Sublandlord as follows:

2.5.1 Escalations. Subtenant shall pay an amount equal to Subtenant’s Contribution Share times Escalations. “Escalations” means any increases, only above Subtenant’s Base Year, in Sublandlord’s payments required under the Overlease arising from these matters: (i) taxes (Section 13 Overlandlord may prohibit direct communications with Subtenant. If so, edit throughout accordingly. In practice, once the lawyers are no longer involved, those direct communications often happen anyway because they make sense.

_____); (ii) operating expenses (Section _____); (ii) porter's wage increases (Section _____); and (iii) any other passthroughs of Overlandlord's costs or similar escalations provided for under Overlease Section _____.

2.5.2 Base Years and Shares. Subtenant's "Base Year" for measuring each Escalation means the fiscal year(s) under the Overlease (e.g., tax year, operating year, etc.) that includes the [Signing Date] [first] [last] day [of the calendar year in which the Signing Date occurs]. Subtenant's "Contribution Share" means ___%.¹⁴

2.5.3 *Electricity*¹⁵ Subtenant shall pay an amount per annum, in equal monthly installments, equal to the product of (i) Subtenant's Contribution Share times (ii) the Electricity Rent Inclusion Factor ("ERIF") in force from time to time under the Overlease. If Overlandlord converts to submetering, then Sublandlord shall reasonably allocate Landlord's electricity and related charges between the Subpremises and any Reserved Premises. Subtenant shall pay the charges so allocated to the Subpremises. Sublandlord shall pay, without contribution by Subtenant, the charges allocated to the Reserved Premises.

2.5.4 Electricity. Subtenant shall pay the sum of $_____ per annum ("Electricity Reimbursement"), in equal monthly installments. That sum equals the product of (i) _____, the rentable square footage of the Subpremises times (ii) Subtenant's estimated electrical consumption of $_____ per rentable square foot. The Electricity Reimbursement is intended to reimburse Sublandlord for the actual cost of Subtenant's electricity consumption. Either Sublandlord or Subtenant may, at any time, request that a survey of electrical consumption be performed by an electrical consultant, whose fees the parties shall split. Based on that survey, Sublandlord shall reasonably recalculate Subtenant's Electricity Reimbursement. That recalculation shall be effective prospectively and for six months retroactively. The parties shall make appropriate adjusting payments. Notwithstanding anything else in this paragraph, Subtenant may not claim any offset or reduction against Fixed Subrent or Additional Subrent (except later Electricity Reimbursements)

14 This equals the square footage of the Subpremises divided by the square footage of Sublandlord's Premises. One would not want to express that formula in the Sublease. One should just do the math and fill in the percentage.

15 Delete whichever "electricity" clause does not apply. As another alternative, Subtenant could agree to pay the Contribution Share of Sublandlord's electricity bill.

because of any recalculation of Subtenant's Electricity Reimbursement under this paragraph.

2.5.5 Electricity. The parties acknowledge that a properly operating submeter or direct meter serves Sublandlord's Premises. Sublandlord shall [reasonably] allocate [based on Subtenant's Contribution Share] Sublandlord's electricity and related charges between the Subpremises and any Reserved Premises. Subtenant shall pay the charges allocated to the Subpremises. Sublandlord shall pay, without contribution from Subtenant, the charges allocated to the Reserved Premises.

2.5.6 Other Payments. To the extent the Overlease requires any payment for both the Subpremises and any Reserved Premises, Sublandlord shall allocate it[in accordance with Subtenant's Contribution Share or] in an equitable manner as Sublandlord determines, consistently applied]. Sublandlord and Subtenant shall each pay its share accordingly.

2.6 Other Overlease Charges. "Additional Subrent" excludes, and Sublandlord shall pay, all charges of Overlandlord to the extent they arise from: (i) goods or services provided or work performed for Sublandlord's benefit; (ii) Sublandlord's acts or omissions, including the nature of Sublandlord's use of the Reserved Premises and Sublandlord's breach of the Overlease; (iii) entering into this Sublease; and (iv) items payable by Sublandlord under this Sublease. Subtenant shall pay any charges under the Overlease arising from work performed at its request or arising from its acts or omissions, including its breach of this Sublease.

2.7 Payment. Subtenant shall pay Subrent and all other amounts to Sublandlord in lawful money of the United States as Sublandlord instructs from time to time by notice to Subtenant. Sublandlord may require Subtenant to pay Subrent by wire transfer.¹⁶ No payment by Subtenant or receipt by Sublandlord of any lesser amount than the amount this Sublease requires Subtenant to pay shall be deemed other than on account of Subrent and other amounts payable by Subtenant (in the order as Sublandlord determines). No endorsement or statement on any check or letter shall be deemed an accord and satisfaction. Sublandlord may accept any check or payment without prejudice to Sublandlord's right to recover the balance due or to pursue any other remedy. Subtenant shall make all payments without notice, demand, abatement, deduction, counterclaim or setoff.

¹⁶ If Sublandlord intends to do this, it saves trouble and delays later to specify Sublandlord's wire transfer address in the Sublease.

3.1 Incorporation of Overlease. Except where this Sublease states otherwise, or, where the context so requires, otherwise inapplicable or inconsistent to effectuate the parties' intent: (i) this Sublease incorporates by reference all agreements, conditions, covenants, obligations, provisions, remedies, rights, stipulations, and other terms in the Overlease, as if completely repeated in this Sublease (the "Overlease Provisions"); (ii) every Overlease Provision that binds or benefits Overlandlord shall, for this Sublease, bind or benefit Sublandlord; and (iii) every Overlease Provision that binds or benefits Sublandlord (as tenant under the Overlease) shall, for this Sublease, bind or benefit Subtenant. Notwithstanding the previous sentence, the Overlease Provisions shall be subject to these exclusions, exceptions, and additional agreements:

3.1.1 Defined Terms in Overlease. Wherever the Overlease refers to a term in the left column of the following table, this Sublease shall be deemed to refer to the term in the right column of the table. All other defined terms in the Overlease shall be deemed appropriately modified[, as necessary in Sublandlord's reasonable judgment,] to reflect the circumstances of this Sublease. To the extent this Sublease defines any term used in the Overlease Provisions and varies from the Overlease Provisions, that definition replaces the Overlease definition. Capitalized terms used in this Sublease and not otherwise defined in or excluded from this Sublease shall have the same meanings they have in the Overlease, as modified in this Sublease, including these modifications (unless the context indicates that a modification should not be made or a modification would have an illogical effect on the provision modified):

Each Reference to:	Shall be Deemed Replaced by a Reference to:

Base Year	Subtenant's Base Year
Expiration Date	Expiration Date under this Sublease
Lease	This Sublease
Landlord	Sublandlord
Sublandlord's Premises	Subpremises only
Sublandlord's Rent	Subrent

3.1.2 Exclusions. Notwithstanding anything else in this Sublease, this Sublease does not incorporate by reference these Overlease Provisions:¹⁷

3.1.2.1 Definitions. These terms defined in the Overlease, and all references in the Overlease Provisions to these terms: _____, _____, _____ and _____.

3.1.2.2 Certain Items. These Articles, Sections, and Exhibits of the Overlease: _____; _____; _____; and _____.

3.1.2.1 Additional Matters. All references in the Overlease Provisions to these matters. (These are just examples. Tailor as appropriate).

Section	Subject
Throughout	Addresses of parties
	Brokerage
	Conditions to effectiveness of Overlease
	Limitation of Overlandlord’s liability
	Memorandum of Lease
	Nondisturbance by holders of senior estates
	Overlandlord’s and Sublandlord’s initial fixturation, including development of plans and specifications, and any payments by Overlandlord or Sublandlord for that work (but the general Overlease Provisions on alterations are incorporated by reference)

17 One can identify specific terms, or depending on circumstances refer generically to, e.g.: “any provisions on rights of renewal and extension, expansion, contraction, termination and partial termination, first refusal and first offer, security deposits, signage, rights to any name or intellectual property of Overlandlord or Sublandlord, rights to restrict Overlandlord from naming or leasing space in any structure, rights to place exterior antennas, parking rights, rights to lease storage space, dumbwaiter rights, roof rights, generator rights, interconnecting stairwell rights, tenant improvement or other allowances, obligation of Overlandlord or Sublandlord to construct improvements, rent abatements or “free rent periods,” rights to arbitrate rent, to audit or review Operating Costs, to apply for or to demand filing of tax abatements, or to exercise self-help remedies.”

	Overlandlord's consent to any assignment, subletting, or other transfer of the Overlease or any interest in it
	Overlease Term
	Rentable square footage of Sublandlord's Premises
	Representation or warranties by Overlandlord
	Sublandlord's free rent or rent abatement
	Sublandlord's options, if any, including options to extend or cancel the Overlease or expand Sublandlord's Premises
	Sublandlord's rent
	Sublandlord's security deposit or letter of credit, if any, delivered to Overlandlord, unless this Sublease expressly requires a similar delivery by Subtenant, in which case this Sublease shall govern the amount and the Overlease Provisions shall govern administration
	Sublandlord's repair and maintenance obligations, including any obligation to maintain and repair structural and nonstructural parts of the Building and common areas

3.1.2.2 Other. This Sublease does not incorporate by reference any other terms of the Overlease that, by their nature or purpose, are [in Sublandlord's reasonable judgment] inapplicable or inappropriate to the subleasing of the Subpremises.

3.1.3 Interaction of Sublease and Overlease. Wherever this Sublease conflicts with an incorporated Overlease Provision, this Sublease governs. Wherever reasonably possible, those conflicts shall be resolved by treating Subtenant's obligations as cumulative. Any reference in this Sublease to a section in the Overlease refers to that section in the oldest document listed in Exhibit A containing such a section, as modified by later documents listed in Exhibit A.

3.2 Compliance with Overlease. Subtenant agrees, solely for Sublandlord, to be bound by, and to fully comply with all obligations of Sublandlord under the Overlease (to the extent incorporated by reference into this Sublease), except those obligations this Sublease requires Subland-lord to perform, such as payment of Sublandlord's Rent. Subtenant shall do nothing that violates the Overlease.

3.3 Abatement Rights. Subtenant may not assert against Sublandlord any right to abate rent under the Overlease. If, however, any such right becomes relevant for the Subpremises, then Sublandlord shall use reasonable efforts to pursue it. Subtenant shall be entitled to an abatement against Subrent equal to the lesser of (i) the dollar amount of abatement that Sublandlord actually obtains to the extent fairly allocable to the Subpremises, based on the circumstances or (ii) Subtenant's Subrent for the affected Subpremises for the abatement period.

3.4 Payment of Sublandlord's Rent. If Subtenant complies with its payment obligations (including payment of all Subrent when and as due) and material nonmonetary obligations under this Sublease, Sublandlord shall pay Overlandlord all rent the Overlease requires ("Sublandlord's Rent") within cure periods. This does not limit any express obligation of Subtenant to pay any amount.

3.5 Rights and Benefits Under Overlease. To the extent they apply to the Subpremises, Subtenant shall have all rights, privileges, and benefits of Sublandlord under the Overlease Provisions, to the extent Subtenant's exercise of those rights, privileges, and benefits does not violate the Overlease.

3.6 Overlandlord's Performance. Wherever the Overlease Provisions require delivery of any benefit or service that Overlandlord provides or require Overlandlord to perform any obligation, or to the extent Overlandlord agrees to provide Subtenant with any services beyond those this Sublease requires (all, collectively, "Overlandlord Services"), Subtenant shall receive Overlandlord Services directly from Overlandlord. Overlandlord Services could include additional cleaning; after-hours heating, ventilation, and air-conditioning; freight car service; and loading dock security services. Sublandlord shall have no liability to Subtenant, and Subtenant's obligations under this Sublease shall not be reduced, restricted, diminished, or deferred, if Sublandlord fails to provide any Overlandlord Service, unless both: (i) Subtenant is not in default under this Sublease; and (ii) Sublandlord's failure results from Sublandlord's default under the Overlease. Subtenant shall have no direct recourse against Overlandlord. Sublandlord shall, for Subtenant's benefit, on Subtenant's written request, diligently endeavor to enforce Overlandlord's obligations to provide Overlandlord Services. Subtenant shall indemnify Sublandlord for any costs associated with Subtenant's obtaining Overlandlord Services. If Overlandlord refuses to deal directly with Subtenant for Overlandlord Services, then Sublandlord shall have no liability to Subtenant but shall without charge act as an intermediary in those communications. Subtenant shall reimburse all reasonable costs and expenses Sublandlord incurs in enforcing or attempting to enforce Overlandlord's obligation to provide Overlandlord Services, subject to equitable proration to the extent the claim also relates to Reserved Premises. Subtenant may not require Sublandlord to perform any obligation of Overlandlord under the Overlease or otherwise. Sublandlord shall have no responsibility for Overlandlord's failure to provide Overlandlord Services except as this Sublease expressly states.

3.7 Preservation of Overlease. So long as Subtenant is not in default beyond notice and cure periods, Sublandlord shall: (i) preserve the Overlease and keep it in full force and effect as it relates to the Subpremises; (ii) not agree to any Overlease amendment that would materially adversely affect Subtenant; (iii) not, without Subtenant's written consent, exercise any right to terminate the Overlease (including any right to treat it as terminated in any bankruptcy or insolvency proceeding of Overlandlord), except for casualty or condemnation; (iv) exercise any renewal options under the Overlease before the deadline, if the renewal term would include any part of the Term; and (v) perform all its obligations under the Overlease, except any contested in good faith. If Sublandlord enters into any Overlease amendment, then Sublandlord shall promptly give Subtenant a copy with terms that do not affect Subtenant deleted. The definition of "Overlease" shall be deemed modified accordingly. Sublandlord shall have the sole right to exercise any rights, privileges, and remedies under the Overlease.

3.8 Sublandlord's Consent to Certain Matters. Notwithstanding anything else in this Sublease or the Overlease, Subtenant must obtain Sublandlord's consent for each of these matters:

3.8.1 Transfers. Sublandlord's prior written consent shall be required, and Sublandlord may withhold its consent for any reason or no reason (or require payment as a condition to its consent),¹⁸ if Subtenant desires to subsublet any or all of the Subpremises, assign this Sublease, otherwise transfer or convey its estate in whole or in part, or allow anyone except Subtenant to use or occupy any or all Subpremises (any of those, a “Transfer”). The term “Transfer” also includes any transaction (including a transfer of more than 50% of the direct or indirect ownership interests in Subtenant) that is in substance in whole or in part a transfer of this Sublease or would (if it involved Tenant rather than Subtenant) be deemed an assignment of the Lease (or require Overlandlord’s consent), under the Overlease. Any Transfer also requires Overlandlord’s approval to the extent the Overlease (or Overlandlord’s consent to this Sublease) requires. This paragraph supersedes any Overlease Provisions by which Overlandlord consents to any Transfer. Any Subtenant’s Transfer that violates this paragraph shall constitute a default and shall be void, conferring no rights on anyone. Subtenant shall pay Overlandlord any amounts the Overlease requires because of Subtenant’s Transfer.

3.8.2 Alterations. Subtenant shall make no material alteration, improvement, decoration, or other physical change (an “Alteration”) to the Subpremises without both: (a) Sublandlord’s written consent, not to be unreasonably withheld; and (b) Overlandlord’s approval to the extent the Overlease provides. Sublandlord may withhold its consent for any reason or no reason to: (i) any Alteration located in or visible from public areas on any floor that includes any Reserved Premises, except Subtenant’s reasonable business sign and logo, if it complies with the Overlease and is performed in a manner reasonably satisfactory to Sublandlord; or (ii) any Alteration that the Overlease would require Sublandlord to remove at the end of the Overlease unless Subtenant agrees in writing to remove it at the end of the Term (or earlier termination of this Sublease) and provides assurances of removal as Sublandlord reasonably requests.

3.9 Overlandlord Consent. Wherever the Overlease requires Overlandlord’s consent to anything (except Alterations, which are addressed separately), including any consent the Overlease Provisions would require if the matter arose under the Overlease, Subtenant shall obtain both Sublandlord’s and Overlandlord’s consent. [If Overlandlord consents to anything that needs Overlandlord’s consent but this Sublease does not otherwise mention, then Sublandlord shall not unreasonably withhold consent.]

3.10 Expenses for Consent. Whenever this Sublease requires Subtenant to obtain Sublandlord’s or Overlandlord’s consent, Subtenant shall promptly reimburse their reasonable expenses in reviewing that matter and granting or withholding consent, including reasonable fees of attorneys and other advisers.

3.11 Overlandlord Notices. Each party shall immediately give the other a copy of any notice from, or any other written communication with, Overlandlord, to the extent it both affects the other party and relates to any requested approval or consent, calculation of Subrent, an alleged default, or exercise of Overlandlord's remedies. [If the Overlease entitles Sublandlord to do so, then at Subtenant's request Sublandlord shall ask Overlandlord to simultaneously give Subtenant a copy of any notice to Sublandlord under the Overlease.]¹⁹

3.12 Representations and Warranties. Sublandlord represents and warrants: (i) Sublandlord has given Subtenant a full and correct copy of the Overlease, except any redacted provisions; (ii) the Overlease is the entire agreement between Overlandlord and Sublandlord on Sublandlord's Premises and is in full force and effect; (iii) neither Sublandlord nor Overlandlord is in default under the Overlease beyond applicable cure periods, and to Sublandlord's knowledge nothing has occurred that, with notice or passage of time, would constitute such a default; (iv) Sublandlord has completed and paid for any Alterations to the Subpremises for which Subtenant started on-site work; (v) no pending dispute or claim has been asserted in writing between Sublandlord and Overlandlord[, Sublandlord does not now intend to assert any such claim, and Sublandlord knows of no basis to do so]; and (vi) Sublandlord has not received written notice that any Alteration Sublandlord performed does not comply with the Overlease, law, or code. To the extent the Overlease Provisions include any representations and warranties: (a) Sublandlord confirms it has no actual knowledge of any material breach; and (b) if any such breach by Overlandlord occurs, then Subtenant shall have no claim against Sublandlord except to the extent of an equitable allocation of any resulting payment, settlement, or rent offset from Overlandlord. Subtenant represents and warrants that it has reviewed and is fully familiar with the Overlease and the Subpremises. Except as this Sublease states, neither party makes any representation or warranty on anything.

4. INTERACTION OF ESTATES; EFFECT ON OVERLANDLORD

4.1 Priorities. This Sublease is unconditionally subject and subordinate to: (i) the Overlease and all Overlease Provisions, as amended from time to time in compliance with this Sublease; and (ii) all present and future estates and interests to which the Overlease is expressly subject and subordinate, including any underlying ground leases and mortgages affecting Overlandlord's estate, all as amended from time to time. If, under the Overlease, Overlandlord or its ground lessor(s) or mortgagee(s) request(s) additional documentation (in compliance with the Overlease) to confirm that subordination, then Subtenant shall promptly sign and acknowledge it.

4.2 Attornment. If the Overlease terminates and this Sublease otherwise remains in full force and effect, then Subtenant shall, at Overlandlord's option, attorn to and recognize Overlandlord as landlord under this Sublease (as Sublandlord and Subtenant may have amended it), and shall, promptly on Overlandlord's request, sign and deliver all instruments necessary or appropriate to confirm that attornment and recognition, all as the Overlease requires. If Subtenant's possession of the Subpremises is not disturbed and Overlandlord recognizes this Sublease, Subtenant waives any right to terminate this Sublease, surrender possession of the Subpremises, or assert any claim against Sublandlord because the Overlease terminates.

4.3 No Effect on Overlease, Overlandlord. Notwithstanding anything else in this Sublease, including Overlandlord's consent to this Sublease, unless and until an attornment occurs between Overlandlord and Subtenant: (i) Overlandlord shall have no obligations of any kind to Subtenant; (ii) the Overlease remains in full force and effect between Overlandlord and Sublandlord; and (iii) this Sublease does not create any privity or contractual or landlord-tenant relationship of any kind between Overlandlord and Subtenant.

4.4 Overlease Termination. If the Overlease terminates for any reason, then the Term shall automatically terminate one minute before that termination unless Overlandlord elects or agrees otherwise in writing. Sublandlord's and Subtenant's obligations under this Sublease shall automatically and immediately cease and terminate on any such expiration or earlier termination of the Term, but this shall not limit (i) either party's obligations and liability that accrued before termination, (ii) Subtenant's obligations to vacate the Subpremises and return the Subpremises to Sublandlord as this Sublease requires, or (iii) any obligations under this Sublease that expressly survive termination.

5. LEASING COVENANTS

5.1 Beginning and End of Term. Except to the extent, if any, that this Sublease states otherwise: (i) Subtenant accepts the Subpremises "as is" on the Signing Date (subject to reasonable wear and tear from then through the Commencement Date) except that Sublandlord shall deliver the Subpremises to Subtenant, substantially as shown in Exhibit B, vacant and in broom clean condition on the Commencement Date; and (ii) Sublandlord need not perform any Alterations or space preparation for Subtenant. Subtenant shall return the Subpremises to Sublandlord in the same condition in which Subtenant received the Subpremises, subject to reasonable wear and tear. At Sublandlord's option, Subtenant shall also comply with all Overlease requirements on delivery of Sublandlord's Premises to Overlandlord at the expiration of the Overlease. [Notwithstanding anything else in this paragraph or in the Overlease, Subtenant need not remove or restore any Alteration installed with Sublandlord's consent or by Sublandlord, unless that removal or restoration was a condition to Sublandlord's consent or agreed on in writing.] [To the extent Subtenant performs any Alteration, whether or not material or Sublandlord consents to it, Subtenant shall on or before the Expiration Date restore the Subpremises to its condition at the Commencement Date, substantially as it existed when delivered to Subtenant, subject to normal wear and tear.] At the end of the Term Subtenant shall remove from the Subpremises all of Subtenant's furniture, belongings, personal property, trash, debris, and all other movable items of any kind and leave the Subpremises vacant and in broom clean condition and otherwise in the condition the Overlease Provisions require. To the extent Subtenant does not do that, Subtenant shall, on demand, reimburse Sublandlord for all costs and expenses of disposal and cleaning, including a reasonable allocation of Sublandlord's staff time. Subtenant's obligations under this paragraph shall survive the end of the Term.²⁰

5.2 Holdover. Subtenant shall have no right to hold over in the Subpremises for any reason. If Subtenant does not surrender the Subpremises when this Sublease expires or terminates, Subtenant shall be in default. In addition to any other rights or remedy Sublandlord may have for that default, Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord for each whole or partial month in which Subtenant holds over a sum equal to (i) [200%] _____% of the monthly Subrent payable in the last month of the Term; plus (ii) all Additional Subrent payable under this Sublease during that holdover period. This does not give Subtenant any right to hold over. Subtenant shall indemnify, defend, and hold harmless Sublandlord from and against any liability or loss caused by Subtenant's holdover or delay in surrendering the Subpremises, including any liability Sublandlord incurs: (a) to Overlandlord under the Overlease; or (b) to any succeeding person entitled to occupancy. If the Subpremises consists of only part of Sublandlord's Premises, Subtenant's holding over could make Sublandlord a holdover for all Sublandlord's Premises. Subtenant's indemnity obligations under this paragraph shall include and extend to all liability that Sublandlord incurs to Overlandlord as a result. Subtenant's obligations under this paragraph survive the expiration or termination of this Sublease.

20 Subtenant should resist any obligation to deliver the Subpremises at the end of the Term in any condition better than vacant and broom-clean. Obligations going beyond that standard just cause potential disputes with no practical benefit to anyone, subject however to consideration of Sublandlord's end-of-term obligations under the Overlease.

5.3 Quiet Enjoyment. So long as Subtenant pays the Subrent and performs its obligations under this Sublease, within notice and cure periods, Subtenant shall peaceably have, hold, and enjoy the Subpremises in the Term, subject to the Overlease and this Sublease.

5.4 Insurance. Starting on the Commencement Date, Subtenant shall provide, for the Subpremises in the Term: (a) all insurance the Overlease Provisions require; and (b) whether or not the Overlease Provisions require it, $_____ in combined single limit liability coverage for bodily injury and property damage, which number Sublandlord may reasonably increase from time to time for inflation. Subtenant shall give Sublandlord, as a condition to taking occupancy, and at least 10 days before expiration of each policy, certificates of that insurance. Those certificates shall: (i) designate Sublandlord and Overlandlord as additional insureds; and (ii) state that Subtenant's insurance will not be cancelled or terminated without 30 days' prior written notice to Sublandlord. [Sublandlord approves the proposed coverage stated in Subtenant's initial certificate of insurance attached as Exhibit E.] Sublandlord has no obligation to maintain insurance in the Term. If Sublandlord chooses to do so, it shall not benefit Subtenant. Subtenant's insurance shall be primary and Sublandlord's non-contributory. Subtenant shall also provide worker's compensation insurance as law requires, with waiver of subrogation for Sublandlord and Overlandlord.

5.5 Indemnity. Subject to any waiver of subrogation requirements in the Overlease Provisions, Sublandlord and Subtenant shall each indemnify and hold each of the persons or entities comprising the other, and all their trustees, principals, partners, officers, directors, shareholders, employees, agents and servants, harmless from and against any loss, liability or expense, including reasonable attorneys' fees, incurred or suffered by the other party (including, in the case of Sublandlord, any liability of Sublandlord to Overlandlord under the Overlease) on account of the indemnifying party's failure to perform its obligations, or because of a material breach by the indemnifying party of any representation or warranty made by it, under this Sublease (including the Overlease Provisions) or the indemnitor's negligence or intentionally wrongful acts or omissions. The provisions of this paragraph shall survive the end of the Term.

5.6 Default; Remedies. Notwithstanding anything else in this Sublease, if Subtenant defaults in performing any obligation under this Sublease or commits a default under this Sublease, including the Overlease Provisions, then Subtenant shall remedy that default within the applicable cure period (if any), which shall automatically start to run against Subtenant when it commences to run against Sublandlord provided that, in the case of Subtenant's default under the Overlease, Sublandlord gives Subtenant, reasonably promptly after receipt, a copy of Overlandlord's notice of default. If Subtenant fails to perform its obligations under this Sublease (including any Overlease Provisions), then Sublandlord may exercise against Subtenant all remedies in the Overlease Provisions or available at law or in equity.

5.7 Disputes. If any dispute arises over this Sublease: (a) if that dispute is heard in the Commercial Division, New York State Supreme Court, then the parties agree to application of the Court's accelerated procedures, Uniform Rules for the Supreme and County Courts (Rules of Practice for the Commercial Division § 202.70(g), Rule 9); (b) the parties shall promptly enter into and submit to the court, with a request to be "so-ordered," a Stipulation and Order for the Production and Exchange of Confidential Information as promulgated by the New York City Bar Association Committee on State Courts of Superior Jurisdiction; and (c) the parties waive jury trial.

5.8 Additional Covenants. Sublandlord and Sublandlord's designees shall have access to the Subpremises on reasonable oral notice as Sublandlord reasonably requires, subject to Subtenant's reasonable instructions. Subtenant shall pay all rent, occupancy, and other taxes assessed, imposed, or otherwise payable on this Sublease, the Subrent, Subtenant's subleasehold estate, and any personal property of any kind, owned by or placed in, on, or about the Subpremises by Subtenant. If any governmental authority imposes any transfer tax on creation or Transfer of this Sublease (a "Transfer Tax"), then the party with primary legal obligation to pay it shall do so. If any law would limit, control, or "stabilize" the Subrent or extend the Term beyond the agreed Term, then Subtenant waives any rights or benefits under that law.

5.9 Directory Entries. Sublandlord shall exercise reasonable efforts to cause Overlandlord to allow Subtenant entries in the lobby directory for the Building as Subtenant reasonably requests consistent with the Overlease. If the Overlease limits those entries then Subtenant shall not be entitled to more entries than Subtenant's Contribution Share times the number of entries the Overlease allows Sublandlord. Subtenant shall pay any fees or charges Overlandlord imposes for Subtenant's directory entries.

5.10 Matters Affecting Guarantor. If Guarantor: (i) dies (or becomes disabled), if a natural person; (ii) fails to perform any obligation under the Guaranty, including delivery of any required document or information, and does not cure that failure within ___ days after notice to Subtenant or Guarantor; (iii) purports to revoke, rescind, cancel, or limit the Guaranty; (iv) asserts in writing that the Guaranty is partially or wholly unenforceable; or (v) becomes bankrupt or insolvent, makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, admits in writing that it is unable to pay its debts when due, or is otherwise the subject of any similar proceeding, then within __ days Subtenant shall cause a replacement Guarantor, satisfactory to Sublandlord, to execute and deliver to Sublandlord a replacement Guaranty in the same form.

6.1 Attorneys' Fees. If this Sublease is the subject of any litigation (including litigation to enforce an indemnity and in bankruptcy or similar proceedings), then the prevailing party shall be entitled to recover all costs incurred, including reasonable attorneys' fees. If Sublandlord or Subtenant represents itself in that litigation, it shall be entitled to reimbursement of fees based on its standard hourly billing rates (including the value of the time of attorneys in any in-house law department based on prevailing rates of outside law firms for attorneys of equivalent experience) as if it were outside counsel.²¹

6.2 Confidentiality. The parties shall treat this Sublease and the Overlease as confidential, exercising the same measures they would for their own information they wanted to keep confidential. Nothing in this paragraph limits disclosure to a party's accountants, attorneys, investors, lenders, or other advisers for proper business purposes or as law requires. Any party legally required to disclose this Sublease or the Overlease shall try where reasonably possible to give the other party notice and a chance to object. This paragraph survives the end of the Term.

6.3 Execution. This Sublease shall not be effective in any way or create any obligation of any kind unless and until both parties sign and deliver it. Delivery of any draft(s) imposes no obligations on anyone. This Sublease may be executed in counterparts.

6.4 Further Assurances. Each party shall execute and deliver any further documents, and perform any further acts, as reasonably necessary to achieve the parties' intent as expressed in this Sublease. Each party shall deliver reasonable estoppel certificates within 10 days after request.

6.5 Interpretation. Although Sublandlord or Subtenant prepared the first draft of this Sublease, the party preparing this Sublease has tried to prepare a balanced and reasonable document that equitably serves both parties. This Sublease shall not be construed against whichever party drafted it. Wherever either party agrees not to unreasonably withhold consent to any matter, it shall also not unreasonably condition or delay its consent. The word "include" and its variants shall be interpreted as if followed by the words: "without limitation."

6.6 Late Payments. If Subtenant fails to pay any Subrent when and as this Sublease requires, then without limiting Sublandlord's remedies, Subtenant shall pay Sublandlord interest on that late payment at a rate equal to the prime or equivalent rate published in The Wall Street Journal or, if unavailable, a similar third-party source reasonably designated by Sublandlord, plus 4% per annum.²²

6.7 Merger and Third Parties. This Sublease contains the entire agreement between the parties. It may not be changed orally. It binds the parties' successors and assigns. If Sublandlord assigns the Overlease, Sublandlord shall simultaneously assign this Sublease and transfer the Security to the same assignee and require it to assume Sublandlord's obligations. On that assignment, transfer, and assumption, Sublandlord shall [not] be released from liability. Except as the parties expressly agree otherwise in writing: (i) Sublandlord and Subtenant do not intend to confer any benefit or enforcement right on anyone except Sublandlord and Subtenant; and (ii) no one except Sublandlord and Subtenant shall have any right to enforce, or prevent the parties from agreeing to amend or terminate, this Sublease. Notwithstanding anything in the Overlease, Overlandlord's consent to this Sublease, or any other document or agreement, Sublandlord and Subtenant expressly reserve the right to modify, cancel, or terminate this Sublease, on any terms they agree.

6.8 Notices. All notices under this Sublease shall be in writing (unless stated otherwise) and given, and shall become effective, in accordance with Overlease Provisions on notices. The notice addresses of the parties (including required copies to counsel) are in Exhibit F, subject to change by notice. Any attorney for a party may give any notice for that party.

6.9 Representations; Brokerage. Each party represents that: (a) this Sublease: (i) has been duly authorized, executed, and delivered by it; (ii) is its legal, valid, and binding obligation; and (iii) does not violate any agreement or order to which it is party or subject; and (b) it has not dealt with any broker or agent for this Sublease except _____. (the "Broker"). _____ shall compensate Broker.

7. SPECIAL COVENANTS²³

7.1 Sublandlord's Work.

7.1.1 Sublandlord's Obligations. Sublandlord shall, at its expense, with reasonable diligence, build out the Subpremises substantially in accordance with the diagram and specifications attached as Exhibit G (collectively, "Sublandlord's Work"), all in compliance with the Overlease.

7.1.2. Subtenant's Obligations. Subtenant shall pay for the actual incremental cost (including allocable general contractor's general conditions, insurance, overhead and profit; Overlandlord's charges, if any; incremental design charges; and any other costs, charges, and expenses that Sublandlord would not otherwise have incurred, net of actual savings achieved) (the "Incremental Cost") that Sublandlord incurs because of these elements of Sublandlord's Work: (i) dividing rooms _____ (previously a single conference room) into ____ separate offices, including installation of partition wall and a second door; (ii) installing a pantry in office _____, including utility lines, built-ins, and special finishes; and 23 These special covenants are deal-specific but often seen. Delete all except as they apply to a particular Sublease. Conform other provisions as appropriate, e.g., Commencement Date and Subrent Commencement Date.

(iii) any changes in Sublandlord's Work that Subtenant requests and Sublandlord approves.

7.1.3. Certification of Incremental Cost. Sublandlord shall instruct Sublandlord's design consultant engaged from time to time (now _____) ("Design Consultant") to certify to Sublandlord and Subtenant the Incremental Cost,²⁴ based on actual charges by the general contractor, subcontractors, Overlandlord, the Design Consultant, and other third parties. Subtenant shall reimburse Sublandlord for that Incremental Cost, as Additional Subrent, within 10 days after receipt of an invoice and Design Consultant's certification.²⁵

7.1.4. Progress Reports and Notice. Sublandlord shall periodically inform Subtenant of progress of Sublandlord's Work. Sublandlord shall try to notify Subtenant 20, 10, and five days before the date (the "Substantial Completion Date") when Sublandlord achieves substantial completion of Sublandlord's Work. Sublandlord shall notify Subtenant of the Substantial Completion Date promptly after it occurs. After the Substantial Completion Date, Sublandlord shall reasonably promptly complete any punchlist work for Sublandlord's Work.

7.1.5. No Warranty. Sublandlord does not make, and shall not be deemed to make, any representation or warranty on, and shall have no liability for any defect or fault, latent or patent, in, Sublandlord's Work. At Subtenant's request, to the extent reasonably necessary for specific claim(s) actually then capable of assertion against Sublandlord's contractors, Sublandlord shall assign to Subtenant, or at Sublandlord's option shall seek to enforce for Subtenant's benefit and at Subtenant's expense, any warranties Sublandlord actually received for Sublandlord's Work, subject in each case to their terms, and only to the extent necessary for a particular claim based on identified breaches.

7.2. Separation of Subpremises. On or before the Commencement Date, or as soon thereafter as is legal and reasonably feasible, Sublandlord shall, at its expense and in compliance with law: (i) install a temporary wall to block access from the Subpremises to the Reserved Premises; and (ii) perform any work legally required to make the Subpremises a separately demised legal premises and a separate legal occupancy.

24 It sounds entirely fair and reasonable for Subtenant to bear this Incremental Cost but, as a practical matter, will Design Consultant be able to calculate it? Ask.

25 Sublandlord could instead "reasonably determine" the Incremental Cost.

7.3 FF&E. [On the Signing Date, Subtenant is buying from Sublandlord, and Sublandlord is selling to Subtenant (effective on the Commencement Date), the fixtures, furnishings and equipment at the Subpremises identified or described in Exhibit H (the “FF&E”). The price for the FF&E is $_____, receipt of which (by check subject to collection) Sublandlord acknowledges. Of this amount, $_____ is allocable to tangible personal property. On account of the transfer of that tangible personal property, Sublandlord is collecting from Subtenant ___% sales tax in the amount of $_____, which sales tax Sublandlord shall promptly remit to the appropriate tax authority.]²⁶ [Sublandlord shall leave in the Subpremises, and conveys and transfer to Subtenant on the Commencement Date, all FF&E for Subtenant’s use at no additional charge. No consideration is allocable to FF&E.] Sublandlord delivers the FF&E to Subtenant in its then-current condition on the Commencement Date. Sublandlord shall disconnect the FF&E from Sublandlord’s systems serving the Reserved Premises. Subtenant shall be solely responsible for the FF&E after the Commencement Date for all purposes. Subtenant shall pay for any equipment, inventory, or work to connect or reconnect any systems, including the FF&E, for Subtenant. Subtenant shall (and Sublandlord shall have no obligation to) maintain, repair, operate, and replace the FF&E, and maintain any FF&E service contracts. Only after any FF&E has been disconnected from the Reserved Premises, Subtenant may remove or replace any FF&E without Sublandlord’s consent. SUBLANDLORD MAKES NO REPRESENTATION OR WARRANTY ON THE FF&E, AND SPECIFICALLY DISCLAIMS ANY IMPLIED WARRANTY OF MERCHANTABILITY OR FITNESS FOR ANY PARTICULAR PURPOSE. Sublandlord does, however, represent and warrant it owns the FF&E subject to no lien, encumbrance, or equipment lease.

7.4 Doors. The present configuration of the Subpremises requires Subtenant to enter the Subpremises through the Reserved Premises or requires Sublandlord (or another subtenant of Sublandlord) to pass through the Subpremises to enter the Reserved Premises. Sublandlord shall promptly (and in any event within __ days after Overlandlord’s written consent to this Sublease and to the work described in this paragraph), at Sublandlord’s expense, rearrange and reconfigure the doorways to Sublandlord’s Premises so the Reserved Premises and the Subpremises each has direct access to common corridor space, and neither has direct access to the other. Sublandlord shall perform that rearrangement and reconfiguration in a reasonable manner that reasonably minimizes interference with Subtenant's business or usability of the Subpremises. Sublandlord shall try to comply with Subtenant's reasonable requests on door placements.

7.5 Reoccupancy. Sublandlord may re-occupy the Subpremises after the Term. Sublandlord configured and fixtured the Subpremises accordingly. Without limiting any other right of Sublandlord to disapprove an Alteration, Sublandlord may disapprove it if Sublandlord determines it would materially interfere with Sublandlord's plans for the Subpremises, or otherwise materially diminish the utility of the Subpremises to Sublandlord, after the Expiration Date.²⁷

7.6 Nondisturbance/Recognition. Sublandlord and Subtenant shall reasonably seek to have Overlandlord give Subtenant nondisturbance/recognition protection. Neither shall have any obligation to spend money or start litigation for that purpose. Failure to obtain that protection shall not limit either party's rights or obligations under this Sublease.²⁸

7.7 Dispute Resolution. Wherever the Overlease provides a dispute resolution procedure or a procedure to determine any matter relevant to this Sublease, if any dispute arises with Overlandlord that relates [solely] [or in substantial part] to the Subpremises, Sublandlord shall consult with Subtenant in exercising Sublandlord's rights under or otherwise complying with that procedure under the Overlease. If Sublandlord acted in good faith, the outcome of that procedure shall bind Subtenant. Subtenant shall have no separate right to invoke that procedure as between Sublandlord and Subtenant. If Subtenant's Contribution Share exceeds 50%, then: (a) Sublandlord may require Subtenant to act for Sublandlord in that dispute resolution procedure, at Subtenant's expense; and (b) the outcome shall bind both parties. Subtenant shall have no other right to participate in or be consulted on any dispute resolution under the Overlease.

7.8 Security. If Subtenant defaults under this Sublease beyond applicable cure periods, then Sublandlord may apply the Security to cure that default. Subtenant shall replenish the Security, to the extent so applied, within five days. After the Term expires, Sublandlord shall within 30 days refund to Subtenant the Security less amounts applied to cure Subtenant's

27 This paragraph is optional. Without this language, it might not be "reasonable" for Sublandlord to withhold approval because of the considerations suggested here. Any such ground for disapproval might be idiosyncratic and personal to Sublandlord.

defaults. Sublandlord shall deposit the Security in an interest-bearing account of a banking organization with a place of business in New York State, all in compliance with New York General Obligations Law Section 7-103. Sublandlord shall promptly notify Subtenant of the name and address of the banking organization in which Sublandlord deposits the Security. Sublandlord shall be entitled to receive, as administration expenses, a sum equivalent to one percent per annum on the Security, which shall be in lieu of all other administrative and custodial expenses. The balance of the interest paid by the banking organization shall be the money of Subtenant and shall either be held in trust by Sublandlord, until repaid or applied for the use or rental of the Subpremises, or annually paid to Subtenant. Subtenant certifies that: (i) the taxpayer identification number below Subtenant's signature is Subtenant's true and correct taxpayer identification number, and (ii) the Internal Revenue Service has not notified Subtenant that Subtenant is subject to backup withholding. If the Security exceeds $_____, then Subtenant may substitute a letter of credit for the Security, but only if: (i) that letter of credit and its issuer comply with Sublandlord's reasonable requirements; and (ii) the parties enter into an ordinary and customary amendment to this Sublease to address the letter of credit.²⁹

7.9 Reduction of Security. If as of _____, 201____, Subtenant is not in default (and has never been in default beyond cure periods) under this Sublease, the Security shall be reduced to $_____ and Sublandlord shall accordingly refund $_____ of the Security to Subtenant. The Security shall thereafter remain $_____ for the rest of the Term.

7.10 Subtenant's Pending Sublease. Subtenant has notified Sublandlord that Subtenant is trying to sublease Subtenant's existing premises at ____ ("Subtenant's Old Premises"). If, as of _____ (the "Termination Deadline"), Subtenant has not yet subleased Subtenant's Old Premises and obtained all necessary consents to that subleasing, then unless Subtenant has taken possession of the Subpremises, Subtenant may terminate this Sublease by notice to Sublandlord (the "Termination Notice"). If Subtenant gives a Termination Notice, then: (i) this Sublease shall automatically terminate; (ii) Sublandlord shall refund the Security; and (iii) after that refund, neither party shall have any further rights or obligations under this Sublease. The Termination Notice, if given, must be actually received by Sublandlord and its counsel by 5:00 p.m. on the Termination Deadline. Time shall be of the essence on Subtenant's giving the Termination Notice. After 5:00 p.m. on the Termination Deadline, or if Subtenant takes possession of the Subpremises before the Termination Deadline, Subtenant shall have no right to deliver a Termination Notice.³⁰

7.11. Early Access. Subtenant may, without paying Subrent, enter the Subpremises between the Signing Date and the Commencement Date only to install communications equipment, a computer network, and furniture, and to perform any Alterations the Overlease and this Sublease allow (but not to conduct business), all in compliance with and subject to this Sublease as if the Commencement Date had occurred.

30 This paragraph represents an extraordinarily bad idea and something Sublandlord should avoid accepting, unless market conditions leave no choice. Sublandlord should try to collect an option fee for holding the space available for Subtenant.

31 This paragraph represents wishful thinking. Overlandlord will generally have its own form of consent, sometimes more extensive than the Sublease itself. As a practical matter, Sublandlord should find out Overlandlord's requirements early in the process, and tailor the Sublease and Sublease approval process to match those requirements.

CHAPTER THIRTY-ONE

LEASE RENEWALS: HOW TO GAIN THE UPPER HAND

Marisa L. Manley, Esq.

[31.0] I. INTRODUCTION[31.1] A. Tenant Renewal Strategy

Why do landlords make much better offers to brand-new tenants than to renewal tenants?

One might imagine that when a company has proven itself to be a good tenant and paid rent on time throughout the term of its lease, a landlord would make a solid renewal offer. In fact, the odds are overwhelming that a renewal tenant will get an offer inferior to terms prevailing in the market. Landlords commonly make their best offers to brand-new tenants, not renewal tenants. The difference can result in costs to a renewing tenant up to 30% higher than those offered new incoming tenants.

Furthermore, if a tenant's renewal strategy is to improve on the current lease, the likely result is a deal inferior to what other tenants new to the building are getting and inferior to what the tenant could achieve at another, competing location. This is true in both rising markets and "tenants' markets." The renewal tenant would be burdened with above-market occupancy costs, and if the tenant ever found it desirable to sublease some of its space, it would be more difficult and costly to do so.

Fortunately, it is possible for a renewal tenant to secure advantageous lease terms. For example, in a market highly favorable to tenants, a major broadcasting company negotiated an early lease renewal. Building ownership found this tenant highly desirable and sought to have it increase its total occupancy in this building. Nonetheless, and by ownership's own admission, it initially sought lease terms that would result in costs 20% higher than costs incurred by incoming tenants new to the building. Despite ownership's approach, and because of how the tenant managed the lease renewal process, it secured terms substantially better than the landlord's initial offer and more favorable than those being offered to incoming tenants. This tenant, with a substantial period left on its original lease, received additional landlord money for its installation, an extended rent holiday, favorable early termination rights, favorable escalation formulas, and a favorable base rent.

[31.2] B. Why Landlords Make Inferior Renewal Offers

When tenants consider whether to renew or move out, they tend to focus on the costs and disruptions of moving out, and landlords know it. There are moving costs and the costs of rewiring new offices for telephones, computers, and other equipment. Retail tenants are concerned about losing business because some customers might find a competitor more convenient after a move. Some employees might be lost because the new location isn't convenient for them. Management usually has more pressing matters than real estate on which to focus. Finally, inertia always favors staying put.

For these reasons, many tenants don't want to bother aggressively shopping the market for alternatives to their current location. Consequently, they might not be aware of the degree to which their landlord is making an inferior offer.

[31.3] C. How Tenants Can Strengthen Their Bargaining Positions

Four strategies will help a tenant maximize its bargaining leverage. A well-advised tenant will (1) understand its options in the marketplace, (2) use lease audits to monitor landlord behavior, (3) understand the costs a building owner will incur if the tenant moves, and (4) use time to the tenant's advantage.

Ironically, the best way to avoid moving is to plan for the possibility of a move. First, a tenant should determine what alternatives are available in the current market. This means working with a real estate advisor who can comprehensively survey the marketplace, and provide detailed information about locations, building configurations, building systems, and other tenants in each building under consideration. The only way to gain an adequate understanding of non-rent costs and lease terms is to negotiate with a landlord and determine the value of concessions it's willing to make. Understanding the value of options in the marketplace will help a tenant determine whether it might be worthwhile to move.

A tenant will be in a stronger bargaining position for a renewal if fully informed about how the landlord has handled the tenant's money during the prior lease term. This information doesn't appear in a tenant's bills. A lease audit is required, which means having an independent lease auditor examine a landlord's general ledger, invoice files and vendor contracts, to see that the landlord has properly billed the tenant in accordance with negotiated lease terms.

After an audit, the tenant will become aware of the extent of mark-ups on services, the nature and extent of management costs associated with services provided, the nature of the landlord's accounting practices and whether they are prone to costly errors, and the landlord's interpretations of the lease that may be questionable, thus leading to unnecessarily high costs for the tenant. If a lease audit were to turn up serious adverse findings, the tenant might conclude that it doesn't make sense to continue doing business with the landlord.

For a lease audit to be most helpful in preparing for renewal negotiations, a tenant must plan on conducting the audit at least 24 months before its lease expires. This will allow time to gain access to the building owner's books and records, and for necessary analysis and discussions. Tenants interested in gaining this information should be advised to remember that, under most leases, there is a limited time allowed for auditing the bills relating to any lease year, and that the start of an audit must usually occur within a short time after a landlord renders its annual billing or reconciliation.

A tenant should also be informed about the costs a landlord would incur if the tenant were to move out. Even in a strong leasing market, space a tenant vacates may remain empty, not generating income for several months. In a weak market, the vacancy period could be much longer. A landlord will incur substantial costs to market the space. Moreover, a landlord would most likely have to demolish the existing installation and give a new tenant a work letter covering at least part of the cost of a new installation. The landlord might have to offer free rent to a new tenant. The brokerage commission for a new tenant is often a bit higher than it is for a renewal tenant. So, while a tenant naturally focuses on the costs it will incur in a move, a wise tenant will also seek to understand the costs a landlord will incur should the tenant move out. The costs a landlord would incur must be estimated, to suggest the value of concessions that might be expected.

To maximize the value of a lease renewal, a tenant must have adequate time. A tenant must start early enough so that, if it becomes apparent the tenant's current landlord won't agree to market rate terms, there will still be time to negotiate with another prospective landlord (or if necessary more than one), complete a build-out, and manage a move to a new location.

[31.4] II. OVERVIEW OF THE RENEWAL NEGOTIATION PROCESS

The time a tenant requires to manage effectively the process of negotiating a lease renewal—even if the tenant is 100% committed to remaining at its existing location—must be calculated backward from the desired move-in date at a new location.

For leases of roughly 20,000 to 100,000 square feet, under normal conditions—and assuming no unusual build-out requirements and no unusual transaction complications—the minimum time a tenant needs to manage the lease renewal process is typically 18 months from an initial search for alternative sites to move-in.

Here's a quick overview of the process:

[31.5] A. Site Surveys

Allow six months or more and expect this process to continue as other phases proceed.

[31.6] B. Preliminary Financial Analysis

Overlapping the site survey process, perform an analysis of key rent and non-rent financial terms at competing locations, including the preferred current location. Anticipate that this process will start fairly early during site inspections and continue during lease negotiations until all scenarios for all alternatives have been analyzed. Allow five months or more for this process.

[31.7] C. Select Architectural/Engineering Team

This should begin early in the site search process. Part of the lease renewal process involves analyzing the current location's building systems and electrical capacity, loss factor, efficiency of the floor plate, and other physical factors. The tenant will want to determine what changes to its existing build-out will be required to make the facility suitable for use during the next lease term. Each of these systems or features involves costs that must be compared to all alternative locations and factored into the renewal negotiations. Once the architectural/engineering team has been incorporated in the process, that team should provide data for each location that will assist in the analysis.

Many tenants simultaneously hire a telecommunications consultant or involve their internal information technology staff in the site selection process to assure (for example) that the building has or can accommodate suitable wiring, and can provide sight lines to transmission towers where relevant.

[31.8] D. Secondary Financial Analysis

Financial analysis at this stage includes more detailed information. The activity typically continues for four to five months and encompasses initial offers, landlord counteroffers, evolving architectural and engineering data, as well as other steps.

[31.9] E. Submit Preliminary Offers for Preferred Locations (or Request Landlord Proposals)

Perhaps around month eight, at the preliminary stage of negotiations, it is customary for a tenant to submit offers on multiple locations—typically two or three where the preliminary analyses indicate a potentially good fit operationally and economically.

[31.10] F. Negotiate Financial Terms for Preferred Alternative Locations

Offer and counteroffer typically are initial exchanges that indicate each party's sensitivity to key issues. Additional exchanges are needed to determine the final best taking terms. A tenant must proceed to this stage with information about potentially viable alternatives before it can truly assess total likely lease costs, and this is still before taking into account non-rent operational and business terms that will only be disclosed in the landlord's draft lease. A tenant seeking to maximize value in a lease renewal may wish to have in hand results of negotiations from two or three such likely alternative locations before making a formal offer to renew at its current location.

[31.11] G. Preliminary Lease Negotiations

Savvy tenants understand that many key financial terms are contained not only in the so-called term-sheet or other similar document, but are embedded in the lease that will govern their long-term relationship with the building. Key examples of these non-rent business and financial terms include:

- operating expenses;
- real estate taxes;
- utility costs;
- maintenance obligations;

- extent of services landlord must provide;
- building systems;
- workletter issues;
- signage; and
- ability to terminate.

Often it is non-rent costs and operational lease terms, and not the basic financial terms such as base rent, that determine which location and lease arrangement will make the most sense over time.

A tenant that wishes to assess the financial and operational impact of such terms must analyze the landlord's draft lease. Depending on market conditions and norms, the tenant can either enter into preliminary lease negotiations at multiple locations in which it has a serious interest, or secure from building ownership for each such location a copy of the landlord's draft lease, not modified to show terms particular to the current transaction. Anticipate that lease analysis and negotiation will consume three to four months.

By month 10 or 11 of the renewal process, a tenant should have a good understanding of available options outside the preferred location and should be prepared to engage fully in negotiations with existing ownership.

Using information gained from site searches, financial analysis, and preliminary lease analysis and negotiations, the renewing tenant now has robust market knowledge to use in negotiations with its current landlord. It can either make an offer to its current landlord or analyze an offer that it has received from another landlord in light of its current market knowledge. The tenant is in a position to assess true life-cycle costs—on a relative basis—at competing alternative locations.

At this point, the renewing tenant must continue to manage the process carefully: Seek a firm commitment from existing ownership and, failing such a commitment, be prepared to move to an alternative location if necessary.

A tenant must always seek a final commitment in sufficient time that if the existing landlord's best offer is not competitive, the tenant has time to complete a build-out and move to a new location. If a tenant secures an acceptable commitment from the landlord during months 10 to 12, negotiations at other locations will cease and the renewal negotiation process will be essentially complete. If, however, a renewing tenant does not secure an acceptable commitment from existing ownership, the tenant is still well-positioned to conclude negotiations at an alternative location—not as a “desperation solution”—so it can maximize the value it receives.

[31.12] H. Final Lease Negotiations

Depending on whether the tenant renews at its current location or at a new one, final detailed lease negotiations for an uncomplicated lease may take another nine to 12 weeks. By the date of lease execution, it is likely that the tenant will be at months 12 to 14.

[31.13] I. Preparation for a Move

If a tenant must move to a new location (or requires extensive alterations at a current location), it will proceed through the following steps:

- Schematic design
- Design development
- Preparation of working drawings
- Construction

If this process is effectively managed, the tenant can complete an on-time, cost-effective move-in to a new location within 18 months from the start of market surveys.

Now that we’ve reviewed why even a tenant wholly committed to remaining at its current location must allow at least 18 months for the process under normal circumstances, let’s review key aspects of the lease renewal process where a tenant can gain significant advantage.

[31.14] III. THE ADVANTAGE OF EARLY RENEWALS

As the previous discussion suggests, when a tenant begins the process early—and develops viable alternatives—the tenant has the bargaining advantage because the tenant has ample time to walk away from an unsatisfactory negotiation, begin negotiations with another landlord, walk away from that if necessary, pursue yet another negotiation, and so on. As time slips away, however, and the tenant's lease expiration approaches, fewer alternatives can be pursued, and the landlord is likely to gain the upper hand.

There are often situations in which it makes sense for a tenant to begin negotiations with the landlord well in advance of its current lease expiration date. The aim might be an early commitment for terms that take effect at the end of the current lease or a current commitment that results in changed lease terms for the duration of the current lease and some extended period. In an early lease renewal, the landlord gets a current commitment for continued cash flow. This may be particularly attractive to a landlord seeking refinancing, a landlord concerned about a downturn in the market, a landlord with a high vacancy rate, and other situation-specific circumstances.

Tenants most likely to benefit will be those for whom a disruption in business operations would be a serious issue, those who can secure substantially more favorable terms through an early lease renewal, those seeking to expand or contract before a current lease expires, and those with special requirements (e.g., tenants that must make costly decisions about capital expenditures for their operations).

A tenant contemplating an early lease renewal will be well advised to consider all the same issues associated with any other renewal—how price and terms compare to other options—and must also analyze how the remaining costs at the current location will be handled. For instance, if an early renewal is desired and cannot be negotiated, the tenant must determine if ownership at a new location will absorb some or all of the remaining costs and whether total net costs at a new location will justify an early move. The tenant must also be advised on whether a move from the current premises could constitute abandonment, and a technical default under the lease even if rent is timely paid, and the prospects and procedures for subleasing the space or negotiating a buy-out if this is desired.

Familiarity with the variety of ways an early lease renewal can be structured, the alternatives to early lease renewals, and the possible resulting benefits will give a tenant additional tools for controlling occupancy costs.

[31.15] IV. EIGHT KEY ISSUES TO ADDRESS IN NEGOTIATING A LEASE RENEWAL

Often a tenant assumes that if things went reasonably well during the previous lease term, a renewal will involve little more than updating base rents and perhaps a few other terms. But much will have changed. For instance, a tenant's business may be larger or smaller and its growth prospects may be dramatically different than at the start of the lease term. The tenant might have taken more space and become a large tenant but still be living under a lease that is primarily suitable for a much smaller tenant. In addition, the building systems, unless replaced as part of a landlord's capital program, are probably many years older than when the lease was signed, and higher operating expenses are likely. The infrastructure considered appropriate for an office building may have changed during the past lease term.

Here's a summary of eight key lease issues every tenant should address during a lease renewal negotiation:

1. Base Years. Typically, a renewing tenant operating under a modified gross lease will want to reset the base years so it pays increases over a current base year for operating expenses, CPI (Consumer Price Index), porter's wage or other escalation formula as agreed upon. The same is true of real estate taxes and utility costs when a tenant pays increases over some base amount for these costs. Exceptions to the rule of seeking a new base year exist when it is more advantageous for a tenant to retain an existing escalation formula and the cost of switching to new base years would be accepting a less advantageous escalation formula that is prevalent in the current market.

For instance, if a tenant under an existing lease pays a proportionate share of increases in the building's actual operating expenses, and if those expenses have been moderate, and if the economy supports a reasonable belief that moderate operating expenses are likely to continue, a tenant is likely to be better off with old base years and a favorable escalation formula rather than insisting upon new base years and accepting with them a current market escalation formula which may involve significant, fixed increases each year during the term (e.g., 3% of base rent cumulating annually or higher). In this situation, a renewing tenant that negotiates effectively will have an advantage not available to an incoming new tenant.

Another base-year related issue to consider in connection with a lease renewal is whether building ownership has added staffing or services not formerly provided that should be included in the base year compilation. For instance, after 9/11, many building owners substantially increased security at their buildings—often adding more than a dollar per square foot to operating expenses. Costs of security increased both to provide for additional personnel and to pay for security systems—such as metal detectors and enhanced computer systems. If these costs are not reflected in the new base year compilation, your tenant-client will pay not only for increases in the cost of security—but for the full cost. Accordingly, in negotiating for a new base year it is important to review types of charges included in the compilation to assure that all current costs are fully provided for.

2. Escalation Formula. Operating expenses or the surrogate formula agreed upon by landlord and tenant continue, over time, to be a major cost of a long-term lease and should be aggressively negotiated in connection with any renewal. A tenant seeking to renew that has regularly performed escalation reviews will be particularly well-informed on this point. For instance, if a landlord has recently made significant capital improvements, the value of those improvements is likely to be reflected in the current base rent and should be explicitly excluded from operating expenses. Examples of this type may include lobby upgrades, common area upgrades, building system upgrades, and elevator upgrades.

A tenant that has regularly audited its landlord's billings will know to what extent ownership has included questionable costs in operating expenses and will be in a position to demand specific changes. By way of example, a well-known and highly regarded building owner regularly billed all tenants in all buildings for the services of an on-staff locksmith. When questioned on this point, the owner acknowledged that the locksmith worked full time at a single building and performed services primarily for a single large tenant. When services were occasionally performed for other tenants, these services were billed separately. Because this tenant audited the landlord's billings on a regular basis, it was well prepared to address these and other non-rent financial issues during its renewal negotiations.

When dealing with other types of escalation formulas, similar issues arise. For instance, if the lease calls for CPI increases, be sure that the increases are based on a CPI index that still exists and not one that the BLS (Bureau of Labor Statistics) has eliminated. For instance, a Fortune 10 company signed a lease that called for using a Washington, D.C., area index, but that particular index no longer existed because the BLS had consolidated it with a new aggregate index that included dissimilar rural areas and had different components. The tenant did not notice this during its renewal negotiations. Subsequent determination of a correct substitute index caused ongoing friction between landlord and tenant and had the potential to result in substantial excess costs for the tenant.

Similar issues arise in dealing with something like a porter's wage index. This, of course, is most common in and around New York City, and is based on a union contract. The contract is negotiated every three years, and has changed with its last several iterations—with benefits being added and a new category of employee being created. Any tenant renewing under a porter's wage lease who determines that a negotiated porter's wage formula will be more beneficial than other types of formulas should address this type of issue in any renewal negotiation.

3. Real Estate Taxes. In addressing real estate tax issues during a negotiation for a lease renewal, a tenant will first address the base year question, then should look carefully at how taxes are defined. To the extent that a tenant is exposed to costs not traditionally included in the definition of real estate taxes, such as special assessments and business improvement district fees, the tenant should assess the effect these have had during the preceding lease term and, based on current local conditions, what effect they may have during the coming lease term.

A tenant must also determine whether changes in the use of the property or the jurisdiction's tax practices could unnecessarily increase its taxes during a new follow-on lease term.

For instance, an engineering firm was the major tenant in a Class A suburban building. During much of its lease term, the real estate market was depressed and the building experienced a high vacancy rate. Close to the end of its lease term, demand in the real estate market increased and ownership moved forward with plans to develop a second office building on adjacent acreage, which was part of the same tax lot. This tenant faced a significant issue during its renewal negotiations—negotiating an appropriate percentage share of both real estate taxes and operating expenses taking into account this as-yet-unbuilt additional property. A tenant that assumed that its lease negotiation would be a straightforward matter of simply negotiating new base rents would likely face excessive real estate taxes and other such costs as compared to its occupancy and the benefits it receives.

4. Work Letter. A tenant contemplating a renewal must carefully consider the work that will be needed for the interior installation that it desires. Most tenants, at the end of a five-, seven-, ten-year or longer initial lease term, will at a minimum want new paint and carpet. Very often the organization's operational needs will have changed, and significant changes in the layout and circulation patterns of the space will be beneficial. Lighting currently in use in the space may be harsh compared to newer alternatives, and older bulbs may be significantly more expensive to operate. Although a tenant may think in terms of moving or adding walls, how to accommodate additional staff, and a new set of space standards that will be more efficient—along with these highly visible changes will come less obvious but very expensive changes in the lighting grid, and electrical and HVAC distribution systems. A tenant that wishes to maximize the value it receives in a lease negotiation will have developed reasonably detailed plans and have reliable initial cost estimates for this work before proceeding.

A landlord may look at an installation, assess it as being in “reasonably good condition,” decide the tenant does not need anything more, and predicate its negotiations on an “as-is” condition of the premises. But the appearance of the premises often has little to do with functionality.

For example, the subsidiary of a major financial services company wished to renew at its existing location. Its building was conveniently located and attractive; face rents were lower than at other nearby buildings. The tenant knew, however, that it would have to substantially reconfigure its premises to make them cost-effective. As configured, they were highly inefficient. Much of the premises was used by programmers. Lighting in this area was so poor for the tasks to be performed that the staff kept the lights off all day and worked in semi-darkness. Other staff, located at sheet-rock workstations, did not have enough desk surface area. They frequently put sensitive documents on adjacent ledges, where they could spill onto the floor and were visible to passersby. One conference room, frequently used for staff meetings, also functioned as a corridor from one part of the premises to another. Offices built for former executives were grandiose and not suitable for their intended use. Despite these significant problems with the existing installation, the landlord would discuss a renewal only on an as-is basis, while giving incoming tenants at comparable rents between $20 to $30 per square foot for build-out.

As the tenant explored the cost of reconfiguring the existing installation while remaining in the premises, it discovered a fact common to such in-place upgrades: it would easily cost 20% more to reconfigure the existing installation than to build from scratch at a new location. In this case, because the installation desired was relatively simple, that meant an additional cost of $8 to $10 per square foot, which translated to about $1.50 per square foot per year in higher rent over the lease term. When a tenant understands cost factors such as this, it is in a much better position to objectively assess the value of a renewal and use this information in lease negotiations to achieve the most cost-effective solution.

5. Building Infrastructure. Building infrastructure, particularly flexible, cost-effective HVAC systems, the availability of adequate electrical capacity at reasonable cost, and broadband telecommunications capability, have become increasingly important to most tenants' business operations and have a significant value in lease negotiations.

This means that a renewing tenant should assess the infrastructure at its building compared against other options available in the marketplace. If a tenant occupies a building with a central HVAC plant with significant costs for overtime use, and if many buildings in that market offer tenants tenant-controlled HVAC systems with substantially lower costs, the landlord will be under competitive pressure to provide an alternative to costly overtime HVAC when faced with a savvy tenant. The tenant may seek to have the landlord install supplemental HVAC systems for part of its space, have the landlord agree to favorable long-term rates for chilled water or condenser water, or provide extended hours for use of the base building system at no additional cost. For a mid-sized tenant with substantial overtime or supplemental HVAC needs, proper negotiation of terms like this can result in savings of tens of thousands of dollars each year during the lease term. Other solutions are possible depending on the nature and extent of a tenant's needs.

Increased technological needs are just one issue to consider in connection with an assessment of building infrastructure and how it may affect a tenant's negotiation for a lease renewal.

For instance, a multinational firm sought to renew its lease of a single-tenant suburban building. The tenant had extensive supplemental and overtime HVAC requirements. The firm obtained an engineering analysis, which demonstrated that the existing HVAC units, which the tenant was responsible for maintaining, had substantially exhausted their useful lives. In addition, the HVAC control system in use was obsolete. It was increasingly difficult to get parts and to find technicians skilled in the repair of such systems. Because the tenant was fully prepared with this information, the nature and condition of the HVAC system and its controls became a significant issue during renewal negotiations. The landlord agreed to accept additional responsibilities and absorb costs that under the existing lease would have been the tenant's responsibility. This aspect of the renewal negotiations saved the tenant at least $400,000 during its renewal term.

6. Building Services. In addition to assessing physical infrastructure, a renewing tenant must assess a wide range of building services to determine adequacy for current needs and comparability to what is generally available in the market.

Many older buildings gave tenants little choice as to how HVAC systems would be zoned, and everyone was served by standard hours of operation. Newer buildings or those with upgraded infrastructure allow substantially more flexibility in zoning HVAC systems and may provide 24-hour HVAC service at no additional cost to the tenant, except for the actual cost of utilities consumed when the service is used. A related building service issue is the performance of the existing building HVAC system in terms of temperature, humidity and hours of operation. A tenant that has experienced significant discomfort may negotiate to have building ownership install and maintain supplemental HVAC equipment (tenant pays for use), to extend the daily or seasonal hours of HVAC operation, to agree to an earlier start-up time for heat during the heating season, and similar matters. Some landlords are more receptive to changes of this nature, which do not affect the face rental rates, and thus do not affect refinancing negotiations, than to other ways of accomplishing a similar result.

Other significant service issues to be assessed and negotiated at the time of a lease renewal are the general performance of the cleaning contractor, adequacy of the HVAC specification including temperature and humidity standards and dates of operation, and performance of the cafeteria vendor. Security is another building services issue to be addressed during renewal negotiations; to maintain comparability with other options in the market, a tenant may seek to have a landlord agree to provide manned, on-site security during off-hours, card-key access to building entrances, camera surveillance of common areas and similar matters. Landlords may be receptive to such requests because they tend to enhance the value of the building as a whole.

7. Sublease Rights. Negotiating adequate sublease rights, of course, should be part of every lease negotiation, whether a new lease or a renewal. A renewing tenant that may be inclined to substantially rely on the existing lease document and merely modify basic economic terms should consider carefully its current needs for an exit strategy, whether its corporate relationships have changed or may change—e.g., through merger or acquisition—and how these and similar issues should affect the sublease rights it agrees to.

A renewing tenant that has grown since entering into a lease may seek substantially stronger sublease rights, including the ability to sublease only a portion of the premises, limit the landlord's right to take back the space, or retain all or some of the net profits from a sublease. A renewing tenant should assure that it will have a relatively free right of transfer to all affiliated companies and that a successor, through purchase or otherwise, will have the right to assume the lease. Any tenant seeking a renewal should look carefully at procedural aspects of sublease clauses. If a tenant compromised during initial lease negotiations, it should now assess whether the landlord should have a duty to be reasonable, and whether the lease contains meaningful guidelines as to what is reasonable, whether there are clear and reasonable time limits on the landlord's right to deny a proposed sublease, whether the lease permits the tenant to submit a term sheet as the basis for gaining sublease approval or whether it must submit the sublease in its entirety, and similar matters. Failure to address sublease procedures can result in a situation where impractical procedures substantially negate sublease rights that might otherwise have significant value for the tenant. Substantially similar issues arise in connection with negotiating rights to assign during a new lease term. These are all issues that older leases often cover in a way that does not meet current standards and expectations of major tenants.

8. Utilities, Capacity, and Pricing. The need for and provision of electricity has changed significantly during the last few years and continues to change. A renewing tenant should therefore look at this issue in terms of current and expected needs, no matter what the existing lease now says.

The lease should stipulate the minimum capacity of electricity that will be available to the tenant, in the premises throughout the lease term. It is typical to specify this capacity in watts-per-square-foot, and preferable to specify in watts-per-rentable-square-foot (demand load), as this maximizes the electricity actually available to the tenant to use. A tenant in a multi-tenanted building seeking additional power in connection with a lease renewal should specify that the landlord will deliver the power to the premises. Otherwise, the tenant may need to pay substantial sums to install risers or other distribution systems to bring the electricity to its space.

Payment for electricity is another matter to be negotiated in a lease renewal. If a tenant accepted a so-called rent inclusion formula in its original lease, it may want to insist at this time upon submetered or directly metered electricity, as this is likely to substantially reduce costs. For one renewing tenant with substantial laboratory requirements and above-standard electricity needs, for example, it made sense to retain rent inclusion electricity for basic office use and the landlord agreed to provide all supplemental service (above four watts-per-square-foot in this case) on a submetered basis at cost. Through this arrangement, the tenant expected to save 30% or more on its total electricity costs.

With the advent of alternative electrical providers, a tenant may wish to reserve the right to select its own provider of electricity, and to refuse the landlord's selection of an electrical provider if that new provider cannot provide service of comparable scope and quality to the tenant's existing electrical provider.

[31.16] V. NEGOTIATING A RENEWAL OPTION

The discussion so far has considered the issues in negotiating a renewal of an existing lease when either the tenant has no right to renew or the renewal rights provided allow room for negotiation. As another very common element of lease negotiations, a tenant will often seek to secure rights to renew a lease as part of the total agreement when initially negotiating a new lease. Here are key business and strategic issues to keep in mind in such negotiations:

1. Importance of Renewal Option. Often a tenant will see a renewal option as an opportunity to lock in below-market rates or otherwise favorable terms. Some landlords resist renewal options for this reason. The benefit of a renewal option may not, however, lie in lower costs at the renewal location, compared to the costs available elsewhere. For some tenants, the most significant benefit of a renewal option is simply the ability to maintain their operations at a current location. In the case of an office tenant, there may be no revenue or identity issue associated with the location as can be the case with a retail tenant, but the ability to stay in the same location may be important for reasons of demographics, continuity of business operations, and other operational issues. For this reason, any renewal option, even if not available on ideal terms, is preferable to none. A renewal option gives a tenant substantial assurance that it will not have to move to accommodate a landlord's desire to re-stack a building, because some other tenant is expanding, because the landlord no longer desires to have tenants of a certain type in the building, or for other reasons that may not be strictly economic, and that therefore could not be overcome by a market-rate offer on the space.

In negotiating a renewal option, fundamental contract considerations apply. In particular, the option must have definite price terms or a court may find that it is unenforceable. For example, a Louisiana tenant entered into a lease of a truck stop and gaming parlor. The landlord and tenant could not agree on a rental rate for the renewal term, so their lawyers drafted a lease clause providing that the tenant had the option for three five-year renewals, with all terms and conditions of the original lease term to continue to apply, except that “the monthly percentage due Lessor shall be negotiable.” The tenant made substantial improvements to the property and operated an apparently successful business there. Despite good-faith efforts to fix a rental rate during and after the conclusion of the initial term, the landlord and tenant could not agree on a renewal rate. When the landlord refused to honor the tenant’s renewal option, the tenant sued to enforce the option and retain its business operations. As so often happens, issues became complicated. The landlord charged that not only was there no enforceable option, but the tenant had breached its lease by opening a second, competitive gaming operation nearby. The landlord’s counsel had drafted the option language and testified that he believed it was enforceable. The court held that the option was not enforceable because it lacked a “certain and determinate price.” Such a price could be set by formula or could be left to third parties to decide, but must be fixed in some way so that once the option was exercised, the rent could be determined from factors or circumstances not within the control of the parties. The court rejected the tenant’s argument that setting a price by negotiation is the equivalent of establishing a price by arbitration or through experts.¹ Because this tenant lacked an enforceable renewal option, it lost a significant capital investment, as well as the ability to continue its business operations at a profitable location.

2. Fixed-Rate vs. Market-Rate Renewal. A landlord and tenant negotiating terms of a lease renewal often debate over a fixed-rate or market-rate renewal. In general, a market-rate renewal may be the most advantageous for both sides to the transaction. A market-rate renewal right for the tenant gives the landlord some assurance that it will be able to secure reasonably favorable terms and that the renewal right will not interfere with financing or a possible sale of the property.

From a tenant's perspective, a fixed-rate renewal right may seem preferable, but only if the rate agreed upon turns out to be at- or below-market when it is exercised some years after it is negotiated. If the rate is then above-market, the tenant's right has no practical value, and that particular tenant would have been better off with a market-rate renewal right.

In negotiating a market-rate renewal right, a tenant must be sure to structure a definition of "market rate" that includes key non-rent monetary terms available to tenants generally in the relevant market. The relevant marketplace must also be defined, and should be defined with enough specificity and objectivity that it can be ascertained by a third party. The market should not be limited to the building where the renewal will occur or to that landlord's portfolio if it owns multiple buildings in the area.

3. Definition of Market Value. At a minimum, terms to be included in a definition of "market rate" when a tenant is seeking to structure a lease renewal should include:

- Base rental rates for comparable new leases
- Creditworthiness of the tenant (assuming the tenant is in fact highly creditworthy and expects to remain so at renewal time)
- Presence or absence of a workletter contribution from the landlord
- Nature of escalation formulas to be employed
- Base years, if any, to be used during the new lease term
- Length of lease term

For any renewal term, the space should be valued for use as office space (or R&D space, as the case may be) and not at the "highest and best use" for the space. As a practical matter, this issue will seldom arise in connection with multi-tenanted urban office space. It may arise in connection with a single-tenant or multi-tenant suburban building, where land use patterns can change more frequently.

Any value attributable to the tenant's existing installation, especially if it is unique or above-standard, should be excluded from consideration in determining a market-rate base rent.

4. Procedure to Set Market Value. If the landlord and tenant cannot agree on market value, the tenant should insist upon some kind of neutral arbitration, and not agree that the landlord may unilaterally determine market value, the tenant's only remedy then being to challenge the landlord's determination. In general, baseball-style arbitration is encouraged so that neither side to the transaction has an incentive to inflate/deflate its estimate. Another recommendation is that the lease include qualifying criteria for arbitrators (e.g., no less than 10 years recent and continuous experience in the leasing of similar commercial space in the relevant geographic market). Each party is to select an arbitrator; if the two arbitrators cannot agree upon a base rental figure within the time allotted, the two arbitrators are to agree upon a third—failing which either party may apply to the American Arbitration Association or a local court for the appointment of an arbitrator. In any case, the arbitrators should be required to select only either the base rent figure as determined by landlord or as determined by tenant.

Such a procedure can be cost-effective, as it does not involve lengthy presentation and argument, the time frames involved in the process can be relatively short, and all parties have an incentive from the outset to agree upon a base rent.

5. Time of Exercise. When a tenant has a renewal option for a certain space, the landlord will insist that the tenant exercise or decline the option far enough in advance to give the landlord an adequate time to market the space if necessary. A tenant may prefer to delay exercising its option until as late a date as reasonable so that it can be more certain of its business plans, but the two parties tend to rapidly agree upon a date, often 12 months or so in advance of the beginning of any renewal term. A significant failing of the most commonly seen lease clause of this type is that the tenant does not know what its rent will be until after the option is exercised and the tenant is obligated to remain in the space. Because occupancy costs are significant for most tenants—often the second- or third-largest fixed cost—this is a significant problem. In addition to the fact that a tenant will know what its costs will be only after a commitment is made, many tenants are reluctant to enter into an arbitration proceeding, no matter how carefully structured, for fear that the result will be something not supported by the facts, that costs will get out of control, or that it will lead to animosity with the landlord.

From the tenant's perspective, it is critical to know, before committing to a location, what its costs will be and how these costs compare to alternative locations. Tenants should negotiate renewal provisions that provide for this. One kind of renewal option that provides this essential certainty triggers a discussion period starting 15 to 18 months before the current lease expiration date. If the landlord and tenant, based on parameters in the lease, cannot agree upon a base rent and other lease terms, either party may elect to arbitrate a base rent rate. The final rental rate must be determined by the arbitrators no later than 13 months before the current lease expiration date and the tenant must elect to proceed—or not—no later than 12 months before the current lease expiration date. (A landlord would argue that a final “opt out” right of this type makes the arbitration a waste of time because the tenant will always be free to renegotiate its outcome.) Landlord and tenant sometimes negotiate as to who will bear the cost of arbitration if the tenant arbitrates, but ultimately does not elect a new lease term.

Beyond strategic considerations of the best time to exercise a renewal option to ensure maximum value and the availability of alternatives, renewal options need to be structured so that the timing of when a tenant may exercise the option is clear and unambiguous. In one case, an Ohio tenant entered into a 30-year lease; the lease also provided for seven additional five-year terms. The lease stipulated that if the parties could not agree on rent for the renewal terms, the rent would be determined by arbitration. The renewal clause stated:

At the expiration of the [initial thirty year] term of this Lease, Lessee shall have the option to again lease the demised premises for seven (7) additional successive five (5) year terms, provided Lessee notifies Lessor by registered mail not less than one year prior to the expiration of the term herein granted of its desire to lease said property for an additional five year term, and thereafter notifies Lessor in the same manner one (1) year prior to the expiration of each said five (5) year term of its desire to again lease said property.

Slightly more than a year before the end of the initial lease term, the tenant notified the landlord of its desire to renew the lease—for two successive terms. When they could not agree on a rental rate, the matter went to arbitration. At the end of the first renewal period, with the rental rate still an issue, the landlord declared the exercise of the option for two terms simultaneously ineffective, and sought to evict the tenant. The court, asked to decide the issue, offered four plausible readings of the language in the lease. The court said the clause could be interpreted to allow the tenant to exercise all seven options at the end of the initial term; or to require the tenant to exercise the options successively, including the exercise of all options successively within the initial term; or to require that each option be exercised on one day only, the day precisely one year before the end of the then current term; or only during the immediately preceding term, and no less than one year before the expiration date of that term.² With this ambiguity, the court remanded the case for a factual determination of the intent of the parties, and an already-protracted litigation continued. The ultimate issue between the landlord and tenant may have been an inability to agree upon rent, but perceived ambiguity became a costly hurdle that diminished the value of the tenant's renewal and jeopardized its ability to continue doing business at a preferred location.

Costly ambiguity in renewal options takes many forms. As another example, a certain Davis owned a commercial property in Delray Beach, Florida. He negotiated with Kahan to allow Kahan to use the lot for an auto paint and body shop. Because Kahan planned to make a substantial investment in setting up the shop, he negotiated for a seven-year initial term with a seven-year option. Davis felt an auto body shop might be an unsightly use, so he countered with a proposal for a five-year term with a five-year option, required Kahan to store cars inside at night, and imposed other restrictions. The renewal option language the parties agreed upon stated that:

Landlord will grant tenant one (1) five-year option to renew the Lease. On or before May 1997, and Tenant has abided by all the terms of the Lease and is not in default, Landlord—at Landlord's sole option to renew—shall notify Tenant if they desire to honor the option granted in this Lease. If Landlord grants Tenant said option, Tenant will give Landlord 180 days prior written notice from Lease Expiration of Tenant's intent to exercise said option.

When Kahan sought to exercise his renewal option, Davis declined the exercise, advising that the option belonged to him as landlord. Kahan, who had spent more than $100,000 improving the property, sued. The trial court held that the parts of the renewal option language were in “hopeless and irreconcilable conflict,” and that under the principle of adverse construction, the right to exercise the ambiguous option belonged to Kahan, the tenant, who had not drafted the lease. The decision was affirmed on appeal.³ While Kahan ultimately received a favorable opinion, a sloppy renewal option put his substantial investment at risk and added substantial cost to its exercise. Relying on the doctrine of adverse construction may be risky itself in a heavily negotiated lease. Best advice: Make renewal rights clear and unambiguous—as to content and procedure.

What if you miss a renewal option? In many states, an equitable doctrine will excuse a tenant's late exercise of a renewal option if it finds "special circumstances" or even simple negligence. For example, a tenant took over an existing lease that had been substantially modified over time. When the incoming tenant took over, there was just about a year remaining. In addition, there were eight five-year renewal options. The lease required the tenant to notify the landlord of its intent to exercise the first option about six months in advance of the lease termination date, and just about six months after the second tenant took over the lease. The lease provided that "time is of the essence." When the tenant failed to notify the landlord of its intent to renew, the owner promptly sent a notice advising the tenant that since it had not exercised its renewal option, the tenant's lease term would expire at the end of the original lease term in about five months. The tenant immediately sent a notice seeking to exercise its renewal option. When the landlord refused to accept the late exercise of the renewal option, the tenant sued to force enforcement. The court held that an equitable remedy was appropriate because of the hardship the tenant would suffer from a move, even though the landlord had offered alternative sites and relocation assistance. The tenant was allowed to renew, even though no "special circumstances," but only simple negligence, caused its failure to renew on time.⁴

6. Conditions for exercising a renewal option. Because many landlords disfavor renewal options, even when a tenant succeeds in negotiating a right to renew, the building owner may seek to limit this right by imposing various conditions. Three conditions building owners commonly use to limit renewal options are (1) claims of tenant default, (2) a requirement that the tenant be in possession of the entire premises, and (3) a requirement that the tenant exercising the renewal option be the original tenant.

To protect your client from losing valuable renewal rights inadvertently or merely through normal business operations, consider the following.

(a) Tenant not in default. When a landlord seeks to condition exercise of a renewal option on the tenant not being in default, limit relevant defaults to those outstanding at the time of the election, and of which your client has been given written notice. Avoid situations in which building ownership can claim a previous default as the reason for defeating a right to renew a lease.

(b) Entire premises. For tenants with sizable premises or premises which may be smaller but consist of non-contiguous units or units on multiple floors, limiting a renewal option to the entire premises may be unnecessarily restrictive. Advise your client to assess potential changes in the way they may use their space, and then seek to negotiate reasonable subdivisions of the premises which the tenant would be entitled to renew even if they do not occupy the entire premises when the exercise date arrives.

(c) Original tenant only. At a minimum, seek to extend the right to renew your client's lease to any entity which is a successor to the original tenant or to whom your client may sublease the premises as of right. If your client is creditworthy and will remain on the lease after any sublease or assignment, there is a strong argument that no change in the identity of the tenant should defeat the right to renew the lease.

By avoiding these limitations on renewal rights, your client will retain additional flexibility for its business operations and will enhance the value of its lease.

[31.17] VI. PROTECTING A RENEWAL OPTION

In some jurisdictions, the exercise of an option must be recorded to be effective against third parties. Louisiana case law provides a clear example of this. In 1991, Thompson, the operator of a bar, entered into a five-year lease with Roach. The lease expired August 31, 1996, and contained an option to renew for five years. In early August 1996, Thompson effectively exercised the renewal option. In September, Thompson re-recorded with the Parish Recorder the now-expired lease; the exercise of the option was not recorded. In March 1998, Roach sold the property to Indigo. About two weeks later, Indigo wrote to Thompson advising Thompson of the change in ownership and that Indigo intended to exercise its rights under the lease. Several months later, Indigo wanted possession of the premises and advised Thompson to vacate as he occupied under a month-to-month lease. Thompson refused, believing that he occupied for a five-year term by virtue of his renewal option. Indigo sued and gained possession. The court held that by Louisiana statute, no lease of real property is binding on third parties unless recorded. Recording of an expired lease which contains a renewal right is not sufficient because third parties have no duty to look beyond the public record. Indigo could have assumed Thompson's lease in connection with the purchase, but did not do so. Indigo's letter to Thompson, advising that Indigo would exercise its rights under the lease, did not imply a lease for fixed duration, but is consistent with the intent to exercise its rights under a "re-conducted" lease—the month-to-month lease which arises when an original lease expires and a tenant remains in possession.⁵ The tenant lost a valuable business location because it failed to protect its renewal option. A tenant should be aware of particular procedures that may be required in jurisdictions where it is negotiating a lease or renewal, and of particular situations—such as an unstable landlord—that may require paying extra attention to this issue.

[31.18] VII. HOLDING OVER NO SUBSTITUTE FOR LEASE RENEWAL

Occasionally, it will be important to remind a client that holding over is no substitute for a lease renewal. The New York courts have emphasized this and arguably added to the cost of holding over. In 1996, Tahari Ltd. sublet from W.R. Grace & Co. the entire 48th floor at 1114 Avenue of the Americas for a term that expired May 31, 2003. In 1993, Kronish, Lieb, Weiner & Hellman, LLP (Kronish) leased the entire 46th and 47th floor, with an option to lease the entire 48th floor starting June 1, 2003. Tahari failed to move out when its sublease expired and litigation between the building owner, Grace, Kronish, Tahari and others followed. In December 2004, with Tahari still occupying the 48th floor, the Appellate Division issued an ejectment order. Kronish follow up with a claim against Tahari for trespass and sought damages for its delayed move-in. The Supreme Court of New York County upheld Kronish's claim.⁶ Accordingly, in New York tenants who hold over may be liable not just for the costs and penalties traditionally associated with holding over—increased rent, and damages for breach of the lease, including consequential damages payable to the building owner—but also damages for trespass payable to an incoming tenant.

[31.19] VIII. A STRONGER LEASE MEANS COST ADVANTAGES OVER COMPETITORS

Although landlords make inferior offers to renewal tenants compared against brand-new tenants, renewal tenants can definitely achieve market-rate terms or better.

The first step is to recognize that renewal tenants face a significant challenge that requires timely attention from top executives. If the renewal process is delayed until there isn't time to develop meaningful alternatives, then a tenant is sure to be stuck with an inferior lease—and above-market costs that could undermine a tenant's ability to control business costs.

Most tenants should begin the renewal process at least 18 months before their current lease expires. Large tenants—the number of square feet qualifying as large will vary from market to market—will need to start earlier, because the larger the requirements, the fewer the options.

The best way to avoid moving is to prepare for a move, because this will put a tenant in the strongest negotiating position. A tenant ready to go elsewhere is a better bet to be taken seriously by a landlord and more likely to get a market-rate proposal.

A tenant should retain an advisor capable of comprehensively surveying a market and aggressively negotiating with landlords to identify good alternatives.

A renewal negotiation should proceed as if one were negotiating a brand-new lease. Take nothing for granted, because a tenant might actually need a new lease to reflect changes in the business, changes in the economy, or changes in the real estate market.

Be especially careful when trying to lock in terms for the next lease renewal.

Monitor the lease to assure timely exercise of renewal rights, and provide protection for renewal rights against changes in ownership and similar matters.

A tenant who does all these things will be in an excellent position over the medium and long term to control occupancy costs and gain advantages over competitors.

CHAPTER THIRTY-TWO

LEASE SURRENDER AGREEMENTS

NEGOTIATING THE EARLY TERMINATION OF COMMERCIAL LEASES AND SURRENDER OF POSSESSION OF THE PREMISES

Scott Shostak, Esq.

[32.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter addresses issues that commercial landlords and tenants should consider in negotiating the early termination of leases and the surrender of possession of leased premises through lease surrender agreements.

One of the more perplexing yet least negotiated aspects of commercial leasing is the early termination of a lease. The terms of a commercial lease are often extensively negotiated by the landlord and tenant based on assumptions that include the lease continuing for the entire negotiated length of time.

The early termination of the lease can undercut many of the underlying assumptions upon which the commercial lease was initially negotiated and affect third parties that occupy the premises as well as parties that provided financing. Questions and issues that arise from an early lease termination include: Should the tenant pay an “early termination fee” to compensate the landlord for the potential loss of rental revenues or for the unamortized portion of a rent-free period, the build-out concession or the brokerage fees? Or, if the landlord requests the early termination, should the landlord compensate the tenant for moving and build-out costs or an increased rental rate at another location (i.e., “buy out” the tenant)? Who are the necessary parties to a lease surrender agreement? Can subtenants stay in the premises even after the tenant has surrendered possession? What would be the consequences of the tenant simply abandoning and unilaterally “surrendering” the premises? Is a lender’s consent required for a lease surrender agreement to be effective as against that lender?

Section II of this chapter provides an overview of general issues and considerations in negotiating commercial lease surrender agreements in New York State. Section III addresses the technical drafting requirements of lease surrender agreements. Section IV covers general issues and problems that arise in negotiating an early termination of a commercial lease through a lease surrender agreement. Sections V and VI discuss potential problems and the enforcement of lease surrender agreements.

Some specific issues covered here include:

- Early termination fee and compensation for costs (Section IV.A.).
- Necessary parties to a lease surrender agreement (Section III.C.).

- Subtenants' rights to remain in the premises (Sections III.C.1. and V.A.).
- Tenant's continuing rental obligations, while the landlord has no duty to mitigate in New York, if tenant abandons the premises (Section II.H.).
- Mortgagee approval of a lease surrender agreement (Sections III.C.2. and V.D.).

[32.1] II. OVERVIEW OF LEASE SURRENDER AGREEMENTS

[32.2] A. Overview

Lease surrender agreements can provide the parties with the opportunity to set forth the conditions and terms of an early termination of a lease and surrender of the premises. In addition to the issues that arise at the original expiration date set forth in a commercial lease, an earlier expiration of a lease arising from a lease surrender agreement raises issues of the costs, liabilities and obligations for the parties (obvious and hidden) such as: the duty to pay rent for the balance of the term after the tenant has vacated the premises, the possible recoupment of rent concessions or partial reimbursement of expenses for improvements to the premises, the application of the tenant's obligation to restore the premises, and the status of other occupants in the premises.

[32.3] B. Reasons for Early Lease Terminations

There are many reasons that a tenant or landlord may need to terminate a lease before the original expiration date set forth in the lease.

Tenants may seek to terminate a lease early in order to relocate or discontinue a business. The need to relocate may reflect a range of a tenant's business needs, such as the contraction of the tenant's business or the expansion of the business without additional space available from the landlord, an offer of significantly lower rental rates at another location, or a substantially more cost-effective location. For example, the other location may be closer to customers or to raw materials; more accessible for employees; provide for a better distribution system, including more effective transportation; or benefit from substantial governmental incentive packages for this particular type of business (e.g., light manufacturing that is job-intensive). In addition, early terminations of commercial leases can result from a merger or acquisition of the tenant's business or the discontinuation of the tenant's business (e.g., the tenant has decided to go out of business or to close that particular branch).

From the landlord's perspective, the reasons for seeking an early termination of an existing lease may include increasing revenue from higher rental rates in a "boom" real estate market, accommodating the expansion of another tenant, changing the mix of the tenant base, enabling major capital improvements to the premises, creating an assemblage of units within the building, demolishing the existing building to construct a new building, or attracting a buyer for the premises and increasing the sales price. (A buyer might be willing to pay a higher price if the premises were vacant of all occupants—therefore enabling the buyer to choose the tenants and tenant mix, substantially renovate the premises, or demolish the premises and re-build on the land.)

[32.4] C. Definition of Lease Surrender Agreement

For the purposes of this chapter, a lease surrender agreement is defined as an express surrender between the landlord and tenant for the early termination of the lease and surrender of possession of the premises.

The mere surrender of possession of the premises by the tenant does not necessarily constitute a termination of the lease; without an acceptance by the landlord, the mere surrender by the tenant may constitute an abandonment of the premises and therefore not effectuate a termination of the lease. The Court of Appeals has stated that

[A] surrender of "possession" is not always a surrender of a "lease" or of the "estate" thereby created. . . . A surrender of possession, if accepted, is evidence indeed from which a surrender of the estate may be inferred, yet it will not have that effect if the parties otherwise agree.¹

A lease surrender agreement provides express evidence of the landlord's and the tenant's intent and acceptance of the surrender of the lease. There are, however, different methods of surrendering a lease.

[32.5] D. Methods of Surrendering a Lease

A tenant can surrender a lease in three possible ways:² (1) an express surrender; (2) a surrender by operation of law; and (3) a surrender pursuant to law.

1. Surrender by Express Surrender. “An express surrender of a lease is one voluntarily made by the express mutual agreement of the parties to a lease, and expressly manifests an intention to reconvey the leasehold to the landlord.”³
2. Surrender by Operation of Law. “A surrender of a leasehold estate by operation of law occurs when the parties to a lease, without any express surrender, both do some act so inconsistent with the subsisting relation of landlord and tenant as to indicate that they have both agreed to consider the surrender as made.”⁴ For example, when a tenant abandons possession during the term in such a manner as to indicate the tenant’s intention to surrender its lease and the landlord retakes the possession of the premises in such a manner as to demonstrate the intention to reassume dominion and control for the landlord’s benefit, and not for the benefit of the abandoning tenant, then an “agreement” is inferred by law from the conduct of the parties and the “surrender of the lease” is deemed to have occurred by operation of law.⁵
3. Surrender Pursuant to Law. A surrender of a leasehold estate may also occur pursuant to the provisions of a particular law. For example, in New York State, under certain circumstances, in the event of a casualty that renders the premises untenable, a tenant may surrender possession of leased premises pursuant to section 227 of the New York State Real Property Law (RPL), which provides that:

2 The second method (a surrender by operation of law) and the third method (a surrender pursuant to law) are also collectively referred to as a surrender by “act or operation of law.” See Dolan, supra note 1, § 26:2 and N.Y. General Obligations Law, § 5-703 (GOL), regarding the requirement that a lease surrender agreement be in writing. GOL § 5-703 is discussed in Section III.B. of this chapter.

4 Id. § 26:6.

5 Id.; see Altamuro v. Capocetta, 212 A.D.2d 904, 622 N.Y.S.2d 155 (3d Dep’t), appeal denied, 85 N.Y.2d 808, 628 N.Y.S.2d 51 (1995); Queensboro Dodge, Ltd. v. Queens J.K. Mgmt. Corp., 284 A.D.2d 383, 725 N.Y.S.2d 398 (2d Dep’t 2001).

Where any building, which is leased or occupied, is destroyed or so injured by the elements, or any other cause as to be untenable, and unfit for occupancy, and no express agreement to the contrary has been made in writing, the lessee or occupant may, if the destruction or injury occurred without his or her fault or neglect, quit and surrender possession of the leasehold premises, and of the land so leased or occupied; and he or she is not liable to pay to the lessor or owner, rent for the time subsequent to the surrender. Any rent paid in advance or which may have accrued by the terms of a lease or any other hiring shall be adjusted to the date of such surrender.⁶

Commercial leases, however, often contain “express agreements to the contrary” (e.g., clauses on “Destruction, Fire and Other Casualty,” which often provide no right or only limited rights for a tenant to cancel the lease in the event of casualty) and in New York State such lease clauses⁷ would include the tenant’s waiver of the provisions of section 227.

This chapter will focus on an express surrender through a lease surrender agreement.

[32.6] E. Terminology for Early Lease Terminations

There are a plethora of words that describe the circumstances pertaining to the early termination of a lease, including: expiration, termination, annulment, cancellation, and surrender. Each of these terms applies to specific circumstances.

Early lease termination terminology, on occasion, is used interchangeably by landlords, tenants, attorneys, the courts and the legislature.⁸ Consequently, understanding the differences and including the appropriate lease termination terminology in the lease surrender agreement can reduce confusion in implementing and enforcing the lease surrender agreement. Identifying the method by which the early termination of the lease is effectuated can help determine the appropriate terminology.

6 RPL § 227.

7 See Chapter 7, supra, generally, Section 9 entitled “Destruction, Fire and Other Casualty,” and, specifically, Section 9.5, entitled “Termination Right; Limitation on Restoration” and Section 9.4, entitled “Tenant Waiver.”

8 See Dolan, supra note 1, § 23:23 (word “expire” not essential).

For the purposes of this chapter, the term “surrender” is used in two different contexts:

1. “Surrender of possession” of the premises pertains to the tenant’s re-delivery of the possession of the premises to the landlord, but does not necessarily terminate the lease and the obligations of the tenant; and
2. “Surrender of the lease” (also referred to as “surrender of the leasehold estate”) pertains to the tenant’s termination of the lease and surrender of possession of the premises, which merges the estate (e.g., an estate for years) with the immediate estate in reversion or remainder.⁹

[32.7] F. Impact of Business Cycles

From the perspective that the commercial landlord-tenant relationship is a business relationship, many of the business decisions that govern whether to enter into a lease also govern whether to pursue an early termination of a lease. Good business practices include an evaluation by both the landlord and the tenant of the general economic environment and the specific economic issues of a particular lease.

The decision about whether any particular landlord and tenant will negotiate a lease surrender agreement and the terms of such a lease surrender agreement will depend, in part, upon their respective opinions of the real estate market and the financial viability and strength of the parties at the time of the proposed early termination.

In real estate markets classified as “boom” markets (such as the mid- to late-90s when the rental rates per square foot were rising in most real estate markets) the landlord may be more inclined to negotiate a lease surrender agreement in order to benefit from securing a higher rental rate with little risk of loss from the early termination of the lease.

In economic climates with corporate downsizing and decreasing rents in the commercial leasing market, more tenants may seek lease surrender agreements, while landlords may be more concerned about the prospects for re-letting the premises and therefore more reluctant to relieve the tenant of the lease obligations. During “down” business cycles, the landlord may need to balance whether to reject a tenant’s request for an early termination of the lease (to try to avoid the risk that the premises may remain vacant for a long time and possibly be rented at a lower rental rate) against the business reality that a financially weak tenant may not be able to pay the rent. By rejecting the request for an early termination, the landlord may incur the costs and delays associated with commencing litigation for a judgment for rent and the possession of the premises and possibly further delays—as well as little money—if the tenant’s financial circumstances result in a bankruptcy filing.

[32.8] G. New York State and Other Jurisdictions

The case law, statutes, and practices of each jurisdiction can significantly affect the decision about whether to enter into a lease surrender agreement and, if so, the negotiating positions of the landlord and tenant. For instance, in New York State, the commercial landlord has no duty to mitigate damages after a unilateral vacatur of the premises by the tenant.¹⁰ Therefore, a commercial tenant in New York may be advised to secure a lease surrender agreement to prevent or limit its continuing obligation to pay rent unless the vacatur is in accordance with a provision in the lease or has a basis in law.

[32.9] H. No Duty to Mitigate in New York: Tenant’s Abandonment May Not Terminate Tenant’s Liability

In New York State, abandonment of the premises by a tenant without a lease surrender agreement, and not based on a provision in the lease or the law, generally subjects the tenant to continuing liability under the terms and obligations of the lease. Meanwhile, as noted, the landlord has no duty to mitigate damages under New York law.

The decision in Holy Properties Ltd., L.P. v. Kenneth Cole Productions, Inc.,¹¹ by the Court of Appeals of New York, reaffirmed the rule in New 11 87 N.Y.2d 130. The New York Court of Appeals in 2014, re-affirmed the holding in Holy Properties Ltd. that, under New York law, a landlord is not to be subject to a duty to mitigate after a tenant abandons the premises; see 172 Van Duzer Realty Corp. v. Globe Alumni Student Assistance Assn., Inc., 24 N.Y.3d 528, 2 N.Y.S.3d 39 (2014) decided December 18, 2014.

York that the landlord has no duty to mitigate damages after a tenant abandons the premises.¹²

In New York, as noted in the Holy Properties Ltd. decision, the landlord has three options when a tenant has abandoned the leased premises before the lease expires: (1) do nothing and collect the full rent due under the lease;¹³ (2) accept the tenant's surrender, re-enter the premises and re-let the premises for the landlord's own account, thereby releasing the tenant from further liability for rent; or (3) notify the tenant that the landlord is entering and re-letting the premises for the tenant's benefit.

If the landlord chooses the third option, the rent collected would be apportioned to pay the tenant's rent obligation after first repaying the landlord for the expenses in entering and re-letting the premises. Accordingly, this option may offer some degree of mitigation, but only after the landlord's expenses have been covered and only if the rent collected for the premises after the tenant's abandonment is equal to (or greater than) the tenant's rental obligation under the lease for the abandoned premises.

As a result of the absence of any duty for the landlord to mitigate, a commercial tenant in New York State may have substantial economic exposure, including liability for continuing accrual of rent due under the lease, if the tenant unilaterally abandons its leased premises. Negotiating a lease surrender agreement gives the parties an opportunity to express their 12 See Vaeth, supra note 10. For an analysis of the landlord's duty to mitigate in New York State and the Holy Properties Ltd. case, see Jason Kee Low, Have Reports of the Death of the Duty to Mitigate in New York Been Greatly Exaggerated? A New Interpretation of Holy Properties Ltd., L.P. v. Kenneth Cole Productions, Inc., N.Y. Real Prop. L.J. (NYSBA) Vol. 30, No. 2, at 77 (Spring 2002), where the author suggests that "[t]here potentially exists a duty to mitigate damages by a landlord [in New York State]." In concluding, the author raises key issues regarding: first, whether the duty to mitigate would apply to residential leases; second, whether, "[b]y not imposing a duty to mitigate upon the landlord," the court appeared to be "implicitly stat[ing] that the contract was terminated along with the conveyance, instead of being breached"; and, third, whether a provision in the lease relieving the landlord of any duty to mitigate is a necessary antecedent to a landlord's position of having no mitigation duty. Since this chapter is exclusively about commercial leases and, furthermore, since many commercial leases contain provisions relieving landlords of any duty to mitigate, the article does not appear to alter the subject matter or positions set forth in this chapter on commercial lease surrender agreements. However, a Bronx County Supreme Court decision in 2004 made a distinction from the Holy Properties Ltd. case for residential leases; see 29 Holding Corp. v. Diaz, 2004 N.Y. Misc. Lexis 277 (Sup. Ct., Bronx, March 31, 2004). For an example of other states' opinions that do impose a duty to mitigate on landlords and therefore are contrary to New York State law, see the Supreme Court of Ohio decision in Frenchtown Square P'ship v. Lemstone, Inc., 99 Ohio St. 3d 254, 791 N.E. 2d 417 (2003).

[32.10] I. The Difference Between Termination of Lease and Early Termination of Lease

The most common form of lease termination occurs at the time of the original expiration date set forth in the lease. Because this form of lease termination is not an "early termination," there is no "surrender of possession" nor "surrender of the lease." When a tenant vacates the premises at the expiration of the term, there is no estate to be re-conveyed because the tenant's rights to the premises have expired by the terms of the lease. Therefore, a lease surrender agreement is not necessary when the termination of a lease occurs on the original expiration date set forth in the lease.

Even then, however, the parties may find a written agreement on the tenant's vacating of the premises helpful in clarifying and resolving issues such as:

- (i) setting forth the repairs and work, if any, that the tenant must perform to meet the underlying obligations of the lease pertaining to restoration of the premises;
- (ii) identifying which property in the premises constitutes improvements that shall remain in the premises and which the tenant shall remove;
- (iii) allocating the risks and costs of any environmental remediation, possibly obtaining an environmental insurance policy coverage;
- (iv) obtaining representations by the parties regarding any claims or litigation;
- (v) obtaining a representation that the premises are vacant of all occupants;
- (vi) determining whether any personal property remaining in the premises after vacatur shall be deemed abandoned and which of the parties shall be responsible for any costs of removal;

- (vii) setting the amount of the security deposit that shall be returned, if any, and time when it would be returned, if any; and
- (viii) obtaining, possibly, a limited release of the parties.

[32.11] J. Conclusion

A lease surrender agreement gives landlords and tenants an opportunity to chart the course of any early (or even any scheduled) termination of the lease and surrender of possession of the premises, set forth an orderly time schedule, allocate existing and post-termination liabilities, and limit exposure to the uncertainty and risk associated with an early termination of a commercial lease. A lease surrender agreement can give the parties:

- (i) an orderly return of the possession of the premises to the landlord;
- (ii) a specific date upon which the tenant shall be relieved from further obligations under the terms of the lease, such as subsequent rent;
- (iii) an allocation of the liability from claims and the cost of the removal of property left in the premises;
- (iv) an agreement on the condition of the premises upon surrender, including the extent of the restoration and/or the remediation of the premises; and
- (v) a set time and amount of the return of the security deposit.

The uncertainty of the process and continuing liability of the landlord and tenant are some of the major distinctions between the arrival of the original expiration date and the date of an early termination of the lease. A lease surrender agreement can provide some certainty and clarity about the process and allocate any continuing liability arising from the early termination of the lease and surrender of the premises.

[32.12] III. DRAFTING LEASE SURRENDER AGREEMENTS

[32.13] A. Introduction

In the early stages of negotiating a lease surrender agreement, the parties should consider the following issues that could influence its terms, conditions, and method of drafting:

- determining whether the lease surrender agreement must be in writing;
- identifying the appropriate and necessary parties (whether to include other occupants such as subtenants and whether to secure the consent or approval of lenders);
- confirming the accuracy of the parties' representations through appropriate due diligence;
- securing timely information and documentation that could be useful, yet difficult to obtain, after the surrender;
- clarifying the definition of "surrender" of the premises;
- defining the continuing liability of the parties (see Section IV.C.);
- deciding whether to include a confidentiality clause; and
- deciding whether to record the lease surrender agreement.

A significant resource for obtaining information and identifying issues in drafting a lease surrender agreement is the underlying lease. Commercial leases often contain articles—or specific language within different articles—setting forth certain responsibilities of the tenant upon the expiration date of the lease term, such as the tenant's responsibility to restore the premises to a certain condition or to remove the tenant's personal property. Therefore, as a first step in negotiating the lease surrender agreement, counsel to landlord and tenant should carefully review the lease to determine whether it addresses these issues and decide whether to proceed within the provisions of the lease, modify them, rescind them, or create new terms in a lease surrender agreement.

[32.14] B. Written or Oral Lease Surrender Agreements: Determining Whether the Lease Surrender Agreement Must Be in Writing

In general, a lease surrender agreement should be in writing. The landlord and tenant, however, may have a choice of entering into a written or oral lease surrender agreement. In some circumstances, an express lease surrender agreement can be oral, when the balance of the remaining term of the lease does not exceed one year. To determine whether a lease surrender agreement must be in writing, landlords and tenants should consider the New York State statutory requirements on creating and terminating interests in real property, as well as the specific provisions of the lease.

In New York State, the statute that requires a lease surrender agreement to be in writing is section 5-703 of the General Obligations Law (GOL), which codifies the part of the Statute of Frauds on conveyances and contracts relating to real property. According to GOL § 5-703(1):

An estate or interest in real property, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year . . . cannot be . . . surrendered . . . unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the person . . . surrendering . . . the same, or by his lawful agent, thereunto authorized by writing.

As a result of the “exception” language of GOL § 5-703 (“other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year”), a lease agreement need not be in writing when the term of the lease does not exceed one year. It is well established in New York that GOL § 5-703 applies to lease surrender agreements. It is also well established that the “not exceeding one year” period refers to the duration of the remaining lease term being surrendered (i.e., the period measured from the lease surrender date until the expiration date originally set forth in the lease), rather than the duration of the original term set forth in the lease (even if that original term had exceeded one year).¹⁴

Therefore, landlords and tenants may enter into oral lease surrender agreements provided that the balance of the term of the lease that is being surrendered does not exceed one year, regardless of the original length of the lease term.¹⁵ When the balance of the term (as measured from the date of surrender through the date set forth in the lease as its original expiration date) exceeds one year, though, the lease surrender agreement must be in writing unless the termination occurs by act or operation of law.

Even if a lease surrender agreement can be oral and need not be in writing under GOL § 5-703 or the terms of the lease, there are sound reasons to put the lease surrender agreement in writing. The terms of an oral lease surrender agreement, if disputed later, may be difficult to establish. If they conflict with the terms of the underlying lease, they may be unenforceable if the lease included a bar against oral modifications—as do nearly all commercial leases.

In the case of 85 John Street Partnership v. Kaye Insurance Associates, L.P.,¹⁶ the tenant's claim that the landlord had orally agreed to be responsible to re-let the premises as part of their lease surrender agreement was rejected by the court based upon two provisions in the lease: one provision barring oral modifications and the other specifically relieving the landlord of any liability for failure to re-let the premises.¹⁷ Furthermore, many commercial leases include specific proscriptions against oral modifications of the terms of the lease and, often, against an oral agreement to terminate the lease. With regard to leases with such provisions, section

17 Id. The "no-duty to re-let" clause in the lease stated that: "Landlord shall in no event be liable in any way whatsoever for failure to re-let the demised premises." Provisions relieving the landlord of any duty to mitigate are commonplace in commercial leases in New York.

15-301 of the GOL statutorily prohibits the oral changing or surrendering of such leases unless the agreement is in writing and signed by the party.¹⁸

A tenant, in deciding whether to pursue the early termination and surrender of its lease, may inappropriately rely on the oral representations of a landlord to allow the surrender of the lease or to agree to assume the duty to re-let the premises (and therefore limit the tenant's exposure to liability after the surrender). Those oral representations, however, may not be enforceable against the landlord based upon the provisions of the written lease expressly prohibiting oral modification of the lease, prohibiting oral termination of the lease, or providing that the landlord shall not be liable for the failure to re-let the demised premises.

It is therefore recommended that the lease surrender agreement be in writing to reduce the potential for disputes over the terms of an oral lease surrender agreement.

[32.15] C. Setting Forth the Appropriate and Necessary Parties

The effectiveness of a lease surrender agreement may depend upon identifying and addressing the appropriate and necessary parties. In addition to the landlord and tenant, other parties may be necessary or appropriate parties, including assignees, subtenants, other occupants in the premises, ground lessors, and—depending on the financing arrangements—lenders. Landlords and tenants should discuss and include representations and warranties in the lease surrender agreement that the tenant

18 GOL § 15-301 states:

When written agreement or other instrument cannot be changed by oral executory agreement, or discharged or terminated by oral executory agreement or oral consent or by oral notice.

1. A written agreement or other written instrument which contains a provision to the effect that it cannot be changed orally, cannot be changed by an executory agreement unless such executory agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement of the change is sought or by his agent.

2. A written agreement or other written instrument which contains a provision to the effect that it cannot be terminated orally, cannot be discharged by an executory agreement unless such executory agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement of the discharge is sought, or by his agent, and cannot be terminated by mutual consent unless such termination is effected by an executed accord and satisfaction other than the substitution of one executory contract for another, or is evidenced by a writing signed by the party against whom it is sought to enforce the termination, or by his agent.

is the only party with regard to its interest in the lease and premises or, in the alternative, set forth all other interested parties.¹⁹

As noted below (and later in Sections V.A. and V.D.), in the absence of their consent or approval of the lease surrender agreement (i) subtenants may have rights to remain in the premises after the tenant has voluntarily surrendered the premises and (ii) lenders may be able to assert that the lease surrender agreement is not effective as to their interest in the lease or premises. Attorneys should thoroughly pursue with their clients the possibility of other interested parties to assure that the objectives of the lease surrender agreement are realized. The premises should be inspected immediately prior to the execution of the lease surrender agreement to confirm the status of their occupancy. Thoroughly review pertinent documents and records—including leases, assignments, subleases, deeds, financing agreements, loan documents, recorded mortgages and other instruments, and nondisturbance agreements—to determine any lender interests.

[32.16] 1. Identifying Occupants Who Should Be Parties to the Lease Surrender Agreement

If the intent of the parties is for the premises to be vacant and free and clear of all occupants upon the surrender date set forth in the lease surrender agreement, then—in addition to the tenant—all other non-tenant occupants (subtenants and any sub-subtenants) in the premises and interested parties (such as assignees) of the lease should be parties to the agreement. Alternatively, the agreement should be conditioned upon all occupants of the premises, including non-party occupants, having vacated the premises.²⁰

The doctrine in New York State is that a voluntary lease surrender agreement between the landlord and the prime tenant will not automatically terminate the estate of a valid subtenant.²¹

As a general rule, where a landlord and prime tenant enter into an agreement to voluntarily terminate the paramount lease, the subtenant becomes the immediate tenant of the original lessor, and the interest of the subtenant and terms of the sublease continue as if no termination had occurred.²²

Upon the voluntary surrender of the lease between the landlord and lessee and the consequent merger of the greater and lesser interest terminating that lease, the landlord becomes the immediate landlord of the subtenant and has only such rights against the subtenant as the lessee would have had to the possession of the premises before the expiration of the term.²³

20 An example of Model Language pertaining to the lease surrender agreement being conditioned upon the all occupants vacating the premises is provided in 11 Key Points, supra note 19, at 2, and republished here with permission of Brownstone Publishers, Inc., New York City, N.Y.:

Landlord and Tenant agree that the Lease shall be terminated effective as of [insert time] on [insert date] (“Termination Date”); provided that:

- (i) the conditions specified in Paragraphs [insert #s] have not been met, and
- (ii) Tenant and all subtenants or occupants have vacated the Premises.

If such conditions have not been met or Tenant or any subtenants or occupants have failed to vacate the Premises on the Termination Date, Landlord may declare an incurable Event of Default and pursue its remedies under Clause [insert #] of the Lease.

In the decision of Da Costa's Automotive, Inc. v. Birchwood Plaza Shell, Inc.,²⁴ the Appellate Division, Second Department, noted that since the subtenant was not a party to the lease surrender agreement, the subtenant's interest and term as a subtenant of the lessee continued as if no surrender had been made and the landlord/owner of the premises, upon the surrender of the lease, became the subtenant's immediate landlord. Assuming the subtenant is in possession of the premises pursuant to a valid sublease agreement, the landlord would not be entitled to evict the subtenant from the demised premises by reason of the lessee's voluntary surrender of the paramount lease.²⁵

The doctrine that a lease surrender agreement is a voluntary termination of the lease between the landlord and tenant, and therefore the estate of a valid subtenant would not be automatically terminated upon the voluntary termination of the prime tenant's estate, is in contrast to the basic rule that a sublease is dependent on and limited by the terms and conditions of the main lease from which it is carved and that subtenancy may be terminated by the expiration of the term of the lessee or a re-entry by the landlord for a condition broken.²⁶

The contrast is reflected in the distinction made in New York State between the termination of a prime lease based upon a voluntary lease surrender agreement and the termination of a prime lease based upon its own terms (termination upon default of the prime lease, a re-entry by the landlord for some condition broken, or expiration of the prime lease).

The result is that a valid subtenant that is not a party to the lease surrender agreement may legally be entitled to remain in possession after the prime tenant has surrendered the premises pursuant to a voluntary lease surrender agreement. This is a matter of some significance and can affect the negotiating positions of the parties. The application of this doctrine might be regarded as an unexpected result (for some New York landlords): a subtenant, without any privity to the landlord, without a new lease, and without a subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreement from the landlord, may have rights to continue possession of the premises, along the lines of a merger of the estate, after the prime tenant has surrendered and vacated the premises pursuant to a voluntary lease surrender agreement.

A landlord may consider a request for consent to a sublease as a routine request which, if granted, merely represents that the particular sublease by the tenant would not constitute a violation of the lease. The landlord may find, however, that such valid subtenant would be permitted to automatically attorn to the position of tenant as a result of the prime tenant's voluntary surrender of the lease, absent the subtenant's consent to surrender the premises pursuant to the lease surrender agreement.

In general, the landlord's denial of the request to sublet, wherein a subtenant's interest is expressly conditioned upon consent by the landlord, will mean that the party "never became a sublessee but remained merely a potential sublessee"²⁷ and is not entitled to rights of continued possession of the premises under the voluntary surrender agreement doctrine. Issues arise when there has been no express consent or denial by the landlord. A party alleging the status of "subtenant" for the purposes of protection of the lease surrender doctrine may be afforded an opportunity to establish, if it can, that the landlord impliedly consented to the subleasing arrangement²⁸ or that there was a waiver of the subletting prohibition based upon the length of the asserted subtenancy.²⁹

Another issue that may be litigated is whether the termination of the lease was based upon a breach of the lease or based upon a voluntary surrender of the lease, which, in some court decisions, may be determined upon the circumstances or upon a finding of collusion between the landlord and prime tenant.³⁰

In summary, subtenants may well be appropriate parties to a voluntary surrender agreement. Alternatively, the surrender agreement should be conditioned upon all subtenants having vacated the premises or the parties must set forth in the lease surrender agreement which, if any, subtenants would be permitted to continue in possession after the prime tenant's voluntary surrender of the possession of the premises.

[32.17] 2. Financing Arrangements with Third Parties— Lenders

Commercial landlords and tenants may have financing arrangements with covenants regarding the leasehold and the premises. These financing covenants may provide a third party, such as a lender, with consent rights or approval rights prior to the early termination of a lease. Therefore, the lender would be an appropriate party to the lease surrender agreement for the limited purpose of providing the lender's necessary consent or approval to the termination. The landlord should inquire whether the tenant has encumbered the lease as collateral and require the leasehold mortgagee to release its security or consent to the termination.³¹ Tenants should inquire about the landlord's lenders since typical loan documents can require consent prior to lease termination or require the borrower to assign to the lender all of the borrower's rights under the lease.

Failure to secure the consent of the mortgage holder could be a violation of the underlying financing arrangements (e.g., mortgages) and therefore, the lease surrender agreement would not be effective upon the mortgagee.³² “[A]n agreement by the mortgagor with respect to the mortgaged premises is not conclusive upon the mortgagee, or the receiver, where such agreement contravenes an express covenant or the necessary implications of a prior recorded mortgage.”³³

In accordance with RPL section 291-f, an agreement restricting the right of surrender of the premises may also be binding upon a tenant or subtenant and could result in a lease surrender agreement being voidable as against a mortgage holder wherein:

- (i) the lease surrender agreement was entered into without the mortgage holder’s consent;
- (ii) there is an agreement containing restrictions on the right of the owner of the mortgaged real property to terminate the lease;
- (iii) the agreement containing the restrictions refers to section 291-f of the RPL and is contained in a recorded mortgage of real property, or in a recorded instrument relating to such mortgage;
- (iv) notice has been provided by the mortgage holder and is accompanied by the text of the restriction agreement; and
- (v) the lease has an unexpired term of five years or more at the time of the restrictive agreement.³⁴

Additionally, the parties must determine if the lender’s consent requires that any termination consideration be paid directly to the lender to reduce an outstanding loan balance.³⁵

a due diligence review. This should include researching, investigating, and inspecting the premises; requesting and reviewing pertinent documents; and setting forth in the lease surrender agreement express representation and warranties of full disclosure of the occupants and applicable third parties. The representations and warranties in a lease surrender agreement by the landlord and tenant may include, as appropriate:

- Representations by the tenant that it is the only party in possession of the premises and the only party with an interest in the tenant's interest in the lease. Alternatively, the tenant should set forth the names, relationship and status of any other occupants (e.g., subtenants and licensees) and any other parties with interests in the lease (e.g., affiliates or subsidiaries of the tenant as well as other parties that may occupy the premises through a change in control, merger or acquisition).

[For this purpose, it would be advisable for the parties to conduct physical inspections of the premises to confirm the status of the occupancy of the premises; inspections could be conducted at the beginning of (and during) the negotiation process and on the date of the surrender.]

- Representations by each party that the party has the authority to enter into the agreement, holds the entire interest, and is the appropriate party to enter into the agreement.

[For this purpose, the parties may require corporate resolutions or other written form of verification of the individual's capacity to bind the party. In addition, the parties may review the most recent title report (or even order a new search) or a conduct a search of the records at the appropriate registrar's office for the most recent recorded deed and any recorded leases, leasehold mortgages and/or memorandum of any of them.]

- Representations setting forth the form of the business entity of the landlord, tenant, subtenant and assignee (e.g., corporation, limited liability company, professional corporation, partnership, sole proprietorship) and the accuracy of the names of the parties.

[To check the accuracy of the names and status (e.g., active standing) of landlord and tenant corporations (as well as limited liability company entities), conduct a name search on the New York State Department of State, Division of Corporations, Corporation and Business Entity Database's website: https://www.dos.ny.gov/corps/bus_entity_search.html. The county clerk's offices maintain records on partnerships and sole proprietors doing business as assumed names—"d/b/a."]

- Representations that there are no third parties with financial interests or superior interests in the premises or the lease that may affect the interests in the lease (such as lenders or ground lessors) and—if there are such interests—whether any of the underlying financial agreements have restrictions on the right to terminate the lease, such as requirements for consent for the early termination of a lease before a surrender of a lease can be effectuated.

[Careful review of the loan documents as well as any subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreement or any estoppel certificates that the parties have signed could reveal the existence of such restrictions on the termination of the lease.]

- Representations by each party that there are no defaults of the lease or facts, circumstances, situations, or events known to the party that would constitute a default of the lease.

For a further discussion of the issues and impacts of the potential liability of the parties in the context of a lease surrender agreement, see Section IV.C.

[32.19] D. Clarifying and Defining What Constitutes the “Surrender” of the Lease

In negotiating the definition of the “surrender” of the premises, the parties should consider:

- the specific date of the surrender of possession;
- surrender of all rights, interests and claims to the premises;
- all occupants vacating the premises (see Sections III.C. and V.A.);
- removal of all personal property, equipment, debris, and trade fixtures (see Section V.C.);
- repair of any damage caused by vacating the premises (including damage to the premises or common areas from the removal of personal property, trade fixtures or tenant improvements);
- restoration of the premises in accordance with the lease terms (see Section III.B.);
- premises “broom clean”;
- return of the keys.

At the time of the surrender of the premises, the parties are advised to conduct a walk-through to confirm that the premises are vacant and their condition complies with the terms agreed upon in the lease surrender agreement.

[32.20] E. Confidentiality Clauses

A confidentiality clause may be appropriate when one or both parties would prefer that the terms of the lease surrender agreement not become public information.³⁶ There are a number of reasons that the landlord or tenant may want the terms to remain confidential.³⁷ The tenant may not want its competitors to know any economic information about it (e.g., its present or past operations, obligations, or liabilities). Additionally, the tenant may be concerned about the perception of investors or the public concerning its financial status. The landlord may be negotiating with other tenants to surrender their tenancies on terms that are more favorable to it, or be concerned that other tenants might seek to negotiate a surrender of their premises upon the terms offered this tenant. In the context of lease surrender agreements, confidentiality clauses may be problematic to enforce and it may be difficult to prove damages in the event of a breach. These clauses may provide a level of comfort for the parties, however, by expressly setting forth the intent that information about the terms of the lease surrender agreement should not be released. The potential of a lawsuit for the breach of the confidentiality clause may act as a deterrent against any prohibited release of information.

36 An example of Model Language for confidentiality language is provided in 11 Key Points, supra note 19, at 4, and republished here with permission of Brownstone Publishers, Inc., New York City, N.Y.:

Model Language

Landlord and Tenant acknowledge that this Agreement contains confidential information. Accordingly, Landlord and Tenant agree that they shall keep this Agreement confidential and shall not disclose it to anyone other than the following:

- (i) Attorneys for the Landlord or Tenant;
- (ii) Accountants for Landlord or Tenant;
- (iii) Lender or mortgagee of Landlord; and
- (iv) Any other person, whom Landlord determines, is reasonably necessary or required to review these contents.

37 Dennis Greenwald, Lease Termination Agreements, Prob. & Prop. (A.B.A.), Sept./Oct. 2000, at 40.

[32.21] F. Recording the Lease Surrender Agreement

The parties may also have the option to record the lease surrender agreement. If the underlying lease—or a memorandum of the underlying lease—was recorded, the parties may be advised to record the lease surrender agreement—or a memorandum of the lease surrender agreement or memorandum of lease termination.³⁸ In order to record an interest in the real property at the registrar’s office, the document must be notarized and conform to the appropriate notarization format.³⁹

[32.22] IV. LEASE SURRENDER AGREEMENTS: GENERAL ISSUES

This section will focus on four general issues that arise in negotiating a lease surrender agreement: (a) determining whether the landlord or the tenant is entitled to a “termination fee”; (b) clarifying the “condition of the premises” upon surrender by the tenant; (c) determining the extent of the continuing liability of the tenant after the surrender of the lease; and (d) resolving contingent rights and pending proceedings.

As a starting point in the negotiation process, the landlord and tenant should review the terms of the lease to determine if these issues are addressed and decide whether to incorporate the lease terms into the lease surrender agreement, or to modify or rescind them or create new terms.

[32.23] A. Who Is Entitled to the Termination Fee for the Early Termination of a Lease?

In negotiating a lease surrender agreement, one of the more extensively negotiated issues is whether there should be a “termination fee” and, if so, how to determine its amount. In effect, a termination fee is consideration to compensate the landlord (or the tenant, as appropriate) for the costs associated with the early termination of the lease. As set forth below, these may include:

38 See Nancy E. Grauman & Pamela L. Westhoff, Get Signed Memorandum of Lease Termination Upfront, Commercial Lease Law Insider, Brownstone Publishers, Inc., pages 1–5, November 2003 (Note: in the context of lease surrender agreements, it is recommended that the beginning of paragraph 2 of the Model Form of the Memorandum of Lease Termination be modified to read “The Lease has terminated or expired in accordance with the terms and conditions more specifically set forth therein or more specifically set forth in a written lease surrender agreement” (underlined portion is the recommended modification)).

39 RPL § 309-a.

- cost of moving (incurred by the tenant),
- cost of negotiating and drafting the lease surrender agreement (and any other associated legal costs),
- cost to repair damage caused during the tenant's vacating the premises (incurred by the landlord), or
- future damages, such as the potential loss of rental income for the period pending the placement of a new tenant and/or for a lower rental rate than the surrendering tenant had been obligated to pay.

Consideration paid by the landlord to the tenant is sometimes referred to as a “buy-out” of the lease and consideration paid by the tenant to the landlord is sometimes referred to as a “buy-down” of the lease.⁴⁰

[32.24] 1. Factors in Negotiating the Termination Fee

Early termination of a lease can change the underlying economics of the lease. Commercial landlords and tenants negotiate the rent and evaluate the inducements to rent the premises based upon the length of the lease. Expediting the termination of the lease shortens the length of time the parties have to amortize costs such as the broker's fee, tenant improvement allowance, rent credits, and free rent period, as well as tax benefits from the depreciation expense.

The tenant that vacated the premises to accommodate the landlord's needs may incur an additional cost calculated as the difference between the original rent and an increased rental rate at another location. The landlord may experience the loss of rental revenue if the premises are vacant before the next tenant moves in and/or if the new rent is lower than the rent set forth in the surrendered lease.

The termination fee may also include other costs associated with the correction or removal of alterations improperly performed by the tenant (e.g., those not in compliance with local building codes). Alternatively, the parties may negotiate a dollar amount to be paid to the landlord in exchange for waiving any lease provisions regarding the condition of the premises upon surrender (e.g., requiring the tenant to restore the premises to “good” or “original” condition or to leave them clean and vacant of all personal property and fixtures).

[32.25] 2. From the Tenant's Perspective

The cost to the tenant for complying with a landlord's request to surrender the premises may include the costs associated with finding an alternative location—such as an increased rental rate, the cost of the build-out of the new premises, the expenses of transferring the tenant's business to the new location and perhaps having to find new employees or pay higher impositions such as higher taxes based upon the other location. The termination fee paid to the tenant may include moving costs as a further incentive to move. The tenant may also negotiate for reimbursement of a portion of the expense that it incurred to build out the premises that constituted substantial improvements (such as internal stairways, structural subdivisions within the premises, telecommunication systems, etc.) which the tenant must now leave, without having received the full extent of use.

[32.26] 3. From the Landlord's Perspective

The cost to the landlord associated with the early termination of the tenant's lease may include the loss of rental revenue (from the premises remaining unoccupied for a period of time and/or from the premises being rented at a lower rental rate). "Hidden" costs may include having to find another tenant for the premises (and providing another rent-free period or rent credit for the new tenant's improvements), making improvements to the premises in advance of a new tenant's occupancy, or paying another broker's commission.

Even if the landlord secures a new tenant immediately after the surrender of the premises, the landlord may have to offer the new tenant a greater amount of inducements (e.g., rent-free periods, tenant improvement allowances, as well as payment of another real estate broker fee) than the original tenant was given. Therefore the landlord should demand at least an apportioned payment relative to the balance of the lease term that is being surrendered.

Some commercial leases contain provisions that the entire amount of tenant inducements shall be repaid to the landlord in event of default. However, the tenant could legitimately argue that such a provision would unjustly enrich the landlord and should be apportioned relative to the remaining time of the unexpired term of the lease (calculated from the date of surrender to the original lease expiration date).

[32.27] 4. External Matters Affecting the Determination of a Termination Fee

The negotiation of the termination fee may be influenced by the current real estate market as well as the financial position of the parties.

Real estate market. If there is strong demand in the local real estate market with generally increasing rental rates (e.g., the mid- to late-90s), a landlord may not demand a termination fee—or may accept a lower amount—in order to recover the premises as quickly as possible to take advantage of the higher per-square-foot rental rates. In this type of market, a tenant may demand a higher termination fee to cover the anticipated additional rent at another location. Conversely, if the local real estate market is depressed (e.g., oversupply of available commercial space, corporate downsizing, and decreasing rents), a landlord may insist on a higher termination fee to cover additional tenant inducements, an extended vacancy period, and possible lower rent. A tenant, however, may not demand as high a termination fee in order to take advantage of the lower rent at another location.

Financial position of the parties. If the tenant is in financial trouble, the landlord may decide to enter into a lease surrender agreement for little or no termination fee in order to promptly obtain possession of the premises. For instance, if the tenant already owes rent for a period prior to the proposed surrender date, the landlord may be willing to waive the rental arrears or negotiate that the payment of all, or part, of the existing rental arrears may constitute the termination fee and such would be paid before or at the time of the execution of the lease surrender agreement. Alternatively, part or all of the rental arrears could be paid even subsequent to the lease surrender date—such as in the form of an Affidavit of Confession of Judgment. In this manner, the landlord could possibly avoid a long delay and legal fees associated with instituting a summary proceeding and evicting the tenant. Additionally, in some circumstances the tenant may have few assets that the landlord could attach and satisfy a money judgment. The tenant's only significant asset may be the lease for the premises, while the equipment and inventory in the premises may have been leased from a third party or obtained on credit. Accordingly, in the absence of a personal guaranty or security deposit, even if the landlord successfully obtained a money judgment against the tenant, the tenant's revenues and assets that the landlord could attach to collect the judgment might be nominal and not sufficient for the landlord to recover its damages.

Therefore, unless there is some guaranty of payment (such as a large security deposit, letter of credit, or personal guaranty) that could be applied, the landlord might not be able to collect on a money judgment against the tenant even if the landlord had a meritorious claim and successfully litigated the matter, instead of entering into a lease surrender agreement. Alternatively, if the tenant were to file for bankruptcy, the landlord could be subject to delay in the return of the premises and only receive a nominal payment for the landlord's unsecured claims for rental arrears and costs associated with the early termination of the lease.

[32.28] 5. Tax Implications of Lease Surrender Agreements and Termination Fees

Landlords and tenants should consider the categorization of the termination fee because of the potential tax implications. The portion of the termination fee, if any, that reflects the settlement of the "rent" payments for the period after the lease surrender may be classified as income and taxed accordingly (also, there may be real estate transfer tax implications). The compensation for the capital improvement may or may not be a non-taxable event.

Additionally, there may be real property transfer tax implications applicable to the surrender of real property. Pursuant to section 11-2102 of the New York City Administrative Code, there may be tax imposed with respect to the consideration for granting of the surrender of a leasehold which is located in whole or in part in within the city of New York.⁴¹ Both the lease surrender agreement's landlord/owner and the tenant can be held responsible for the payment of this real property transfer tax: "The grantee shall also be liable for the payment of such tax in the event that the amount of tax due is not paid by the grantor or the grantor is exempt from tax."⁴² The New York State real estate transfer tax provisions are set forth in article 31 of the New York Tax Law.⁴³

There may also be sales tax implications depending upon the structure of the surrender agreement. An example is an auction of personal property that was surrendered: the purchaser of the personal property may be obligated to pay a sales tax.

43 See Tax Law §§ 1401 (definitions), 1402 (imposition of tax), 1404 (liability for tax).

Recognizing that the subject of taxation is complex and beyond the scope of this chapter, it is recommended that landlords and tenants confer with their accountants (and with specialists and lawyers that specialize in tax issues) for a full analysis and discussion of the tax implications of a lease surrender agreement and, in particular, the termination fee.

[32.29] B. Negotiating Tenant’s Obligations to Restore the Premises and Comply With Lease Terms Regarding Its Condition

Commercial leases often contain provisions pertaining to the condition of the premises at the time of the expiration or early termination of the lease (e.g., the tenant is obligated to restore the premises to a “good,” “original,” “normal,” or “lawful” condition—all usually “with normal wear and tear excepted”—and/or the tenant is obligated to remove tenant alterations and property). Additionally, other lease provisions may indirectly impose obligations on the condition of the premises, including the tenant’s obligation to repair and maintain the premises during the lease period, comply with restrictions and conditions placed on tenant improvements and alterations, and obey local, state, and federal laws.

When negotiating the condition of the premises upon the surrender of the lease, the landlord’s objective is to secure possession in order to prepare for the next tenant as quickly as possible and to minimize the associated costs. The tenant’s objective is to minimize its costs associated with vacating the premises and limit (or be released from) its obligations pursuant to the terms of the lease to maintain, repair and restore the premises.

[32.30] 1. Costs Associated With the Condition of the Premises

From the landlord’s perspective, the tenant’s improper actions or inadequate performance of the terms of the lease could result in unanticipated costs that become apparent with the tenant’s surrender of the premises.

These unanticipated costs could include expenses to restore the premises to a condition that is acceptable to a future tenant or to remove/correct alterations made by the tenant that do not comply with the law. This may include making changes to comply with local building codes (e.g., the tenant installed wooden partitions where metal ones are required, doors that do not meet the fire safety rating, ceiling tiles that cover sprinkler heads, lofts built without a permit, or areas with insufficient ventilation). The landlord may need to change tenant alterations that do not comply with federal Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) requirements

(i.e., mandates covering ingress and egress to the premises, door widths, or bathroom configuration). Additionally, any necessary alterations would cause time-consuming delays.

The landlord could also incur costs after the lease surrender agreement has been signed and after the tenant has moved out. For example, the cost to repair damage caused by the tenant in vacating the premises (e.g., damage to walls or doors or damage caused in removing equipment, trade fixtures, or machines); and/or to remove and possibly store the tenant's property (e.g., equipment, machines, fixtures, materials, inventory, debris, or other personal property left in the premises by the tenant or its invitees). Future costs may arise relating to the remediation of the site, such as remediation of hazardous materials that may have been improperly stored or disposed of by the tenant, or remediation of asbestos that became "friable" as a result of actions of the tenant, or, more recently, responding to the presence of—and allocating the costs associated with the removal of—"toxic" mold⁴⁴ or abandoned wires (e.g., telecommunications, fiber, cable, fire alarm, and electric power cables).⁴⁵

[32.31] 2. Inspection of the Condition of the Premises

To evaluate and assess the condition of the premises, the landlord and tenant should conduct inspections during the negotiation of the lease surrender agreement and on the date of the surrender of possession (or, in the case that the tenant has already vacated the premises, upon the effective date of the surrender of the lease).

An inspection of the premises should provide the parties with an opportunity to consider:

- (i) the level of repair at which the tenant maintained the premises (i.e., whether the condition of the premises is in a sufficient state of repair taking into account “ordinary wear and tear”);

- (ii) the type and extent of tenant improvements and alterations (e.g., whether the improvements were authorized under the terms of the lease, add value to the premises, may be desirable for the next occupant, may detract from the ability to rent the premises—or perhaps the improvements, or alterations, are “illegal,” such as those constructed without permits or from materials unacceptable under the building code, in which case the landlord may insist that the tenant remove them or that they be included in the landlord’s estimated costs of removal as part of the termination fee);
- (iii) the existence of unlawful conditions (e.g., including asbestos that may have been installed prior to the tenancy that may have become “friable” either over time or exacerbated by the tenants occupancy or vacatur; and, since the late 1990s, similar concerns about the presence of “toxic” mold;⁴⁶ and, as of 2003, the requirement for the removal of abandoned telecommunications, fiber, cable, fire alarm, and electrical power cable wires);⁴⁷ and
- (iv) damage to the premises caused by the removal of personal property, equipment, and trade fixtures (and, to the extent required and/or permitted by the terms of the lease, fixtures) during the tenant’s vacating of the premises.

[32.32] 3. Factors to Consider in Negotiating the Condition of the Premises

The negotiation of the lease surrender agreement provides an opportunity for the landlord and tenant to establish the extent of the obligations of the tenant pertaining to the condition of the premises. The landlord and tenant can agree to apply the existing lease obligations, modify the obligations of the lease, or formulate entirely new obligations.

Several factors affect the landlord’s negotiation of the tenant’s obligation. If the landlord has requested the tenant to surrender the premises in order to accommodate its own needs (e.g., to provide the premises to another tenant that needs to expand, permit the landlord to perform substantial alterations to the premises, or comply with the terms of a prospective purchaser of the premises), then the landlord may accept the premises virtually “as is” without requiring the tenant to comply with the restoration requirements of the lease.

Even if the tenant requested the lease surrender, however, the landlord may accept surrender and the costs associated with the condition of the premises instead of litigating the matter. Factors (such as the weak financial position of the tenant) might lead the landlord to conclude that the tenant would not correct the conditions (but a long delay in securing possession of the premises would ensue while the landlord insisted the tenant resolve the matter). The real estate market might be so strong that the increase in rentals would offset the delay in pursuing the tenant to correct the conditions. See Section IV.A.4. for a discussion of the real estate market and “financial position of the tenant” factors. Although, if there are substantial costs, such as those associated with environmental remediation, then it would be less likely that a landlord would accept these costs.

In considering whether to negotiate the issue of the condition of the premises, the landlord and tenant can evaluate the alternatives to entering into the lease surrender agreement (which may include litigating those “condition of premises” issues that would constitute a default of the lease). From the landlord’s perspective, however, litigation could cause a long delay in securing possession of the premises, the condition of the premises could deteriorate during that time, and the end result could be a money judgment that is difficult, if not impossible, to collect from the tenant. From both the landlord’s and tenant’s perspectives, there could be extensive legal fees arising from litigation.

Additionally, in certain circumstances, the tenant’s alterations may be deemed by the landlord to add value to the premises or have potential value for a subsequent tenant. In such cases, the landlord would waive a restoration obligation.

It is therefore advisable that the lease surrender agreement expressly set forth the obligations of the tenant as to the condition of the premises, and the landlord should conduct itself accordingly. Failure to address the issue of the “condition of the premises” upon surrender can result in extended dispute, expensive litigation, delay in restoring the premises to an income-producing asset, and possibly the waiver of the tenant’s obligation under the lease. In the event of a subsequent dispute, some courts may interpret a voluntary lease surrender agreement as a basis to reduce the tenant's obligations, or interpret the conduct of the landlord as a basis to discharge some of the tenant's obligations.⁴⁸

[32.33] 4. Pitfalls and Difficult Issues Regarding Repairs and Remediation

One of the more vexing issues that arises at the expiration of the term of the lease (whether by early termination or upon the original expiration date set forth in the lease) with regard to the condition of the premises is the level of the obligations regarding the repair and remediation of the premises (particularly if there are expensive environmental remediation issues).

Interpreting the nature and extent of the repair/restore/removal clauses can become particularly difficult in the context of remediation. The potential liability associated with environmental remediation is enormous pursuant to the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA).⁴⁹ Another area of continuing concern is the responsibility for remediation of asbestos which can arise in a number of contexts, including the need for abatement of an asbestos condition that is aggravated by the tenant's presence in the premises or in vacating the premises or by the necessity to remove equipment or improvements that were illegally installed.

In some commercial leases, the issue of asbestos arises in part as a result of the change in the laws over the past 40 years. As the court noted in the *Chemical Bank v. Stahl*⁵⁰ case, fireproofing that consisted of asbestos-containing materials (ACM) was legally required during the 1960s. Meanwhile, by the 1970s, the use of ACM in construction was prohibited by many municipalities as the dangers of asbestos became more apparent. The result has been an enormous cost for the remediation of asbestos through removal, encapsulation, and other methods. Similar concerns arise when considering the possible impact of the growing litigation over "toxic" mold⁵¹ and the requirement for the removal of abandoned telecommunications, fiber, cable, fire alarm, and electrical power cable wires.⁵²

[32.34] C. Determining Continuing Liability After Lease Surrender

By entering into a lease surrender agreement the parties are effectively accelerating the expiration of the lease, which raises a number of issues regarding the continuing liability of the parties. These include indemnification for pending and potential claims and actions brought by third parties for personal injury or property damage, as well as responsibility arising from the condition of the premises. To determine the continuing liability after the surrender of a lease, the landlord and tenant should carefully review the applicable provisions of the lease, common law, and statutory law upon which continuing liability is based. The parties can also set forth in the lease surrender agreement specific references to those obligations in the lease that the parties intend to survive its termination.

[32.35] 1. Continuing Liability in General

Continuing liability occurs when claims against the landlord and/or tenant, which arose from the usage of the premises or an incident that occurred in the premises, continue (and in some cases are discovered) after the lease has been surrendered. In general, such claims arise from third-party claims for personal injury, bodily injury (including death), or property damage; claims, fines or penalties by governmental authorities for violations of law or regulations (e.g., violation of environmental laws, building codes, fire codes) or claims between the landlord and tenant for incidents that occurred during the surrender of the premises (e.g., damage to the premises caused by the removal of trade fixtures or equipment).

Continuing liability associated with claims by third parties for personal injury, bodily injury (including death), and property damage should be evaluated in the context of whether the landlord or tenant owes an obligation of indemnification to the other party. This obligation may arise pursuant to either the contractual indemnification provision of the lease or common-law indemnification (or both). Landlords and tenants should carefully examine the indemnifications, representations, warranties and various obligations in the lease—undertaken by themselves and any other party—and determine which liabilities should survive the surrender of the lease.

Continuing liability may also arise from costs incurred by the landlord from correcting conditions of the premises caused by the tenant. The landlord could incur substantial costs correcting alterations by the tenant which did not comply with city, state, and federal law. For example, the tenant may not have complied with the ADA (e.g., not meeting the ADA requirements for a bathroom) or with local building codes (e.g., making inadequate provisions for ventilation or lighting) or with fire safety codes (e.g., installing doors with insufficient fire rating or drop ceilings covering existing sprinkler heads) or with local laws requiring permits to perform certain construction. Environmental conditions represent another area of concern. A tenant's non-compliance with environmental laws such as the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA),⁵³ the Toxic Substances Control Act (TSCA),⁵⁴ and CERCLA⁵⁵ could result in significant liability and remediation costs arising from improper handling, storage, use, leakage, or disposal of hazardous materials.⁵⁶

Additionally, in the event the landlord and tenant do not enter into a lease surrender agreement or the agreement does not resolve outstanding arrears in rent, there may be continuing obligations of the tenant with regard to the payment of rental arrears (as well as arrears in "additional rent" including tenant's proportionate share of the operating costs, utility costs, insurance premiums, taxes, late fees and other charges as set forth in the commercial lease) that are due through the lease surrender date. As noted in Section II.H. of this chapter, a tenant in New York State may continue to be liable for the payment of “rent”⁵⁷ after abandoning the premises until the end of the term set forth in the lease. By entering into a lease surrender agreement, however, the parties can negotiate a “termination fee,” if any, and can clarify the termination of the tenant’s obligation, if any, to pay “rent” for the period following the surrender date.

57 At times there appears to be some confusion between the terms “rent” and “damages” with regard to the obligation under a lease to pay “rent” for the period after a tenant has abandoned the premises. The courts in New York have generally held that the landlord’s right to a money judgment does not accrue until the period for which the rent is due has occurred. The basis is a breach of contract and that the “rent” set forth in the lease that will be due for the subsequent periods is not due until that period. Therefore, under contract principles, the “rent” is classified as “damages” and the right to a money judgment occurs only after the tenant has “breached” the lease (contract) terms which occurs after the period the “rent” was due. The use of the phrase “rent” due for the period after the surrender of the lease is somewhat of a misnomer. Although the parties may negotiate as part of the termination fee an amount to compensate the landlord for the “rent” that may have come due after the surrender of the premises, technically, the amount is “damages” and not continuing liability unless the parties negotiate for the payment in the lease. The lease surrender agreement constitutes a voluntary termination of the lease by expediting the expiration date of the lease. One should note that this is quite different from circumstances wherein the tenant abandoned the premises (or the lease is terminated pursuant to a default by the tenant). In those circumstances a commercial landlord can opt to claim for rent (if the tenant abandoned the premises and landlord does not re-take the premise) or for damages (instead of “rent” if the lease is terminated pursuant to a tenant default) for each subsequent month. In the case of the voluntary surrender of the lease, the parties can negotiate whether the landlord is entitled to any payment for “rent” or “damages” for the period after the lease surrender date until the original lease expiration date. However, in the absence of a negotiated agreement set forth in the lease surrender agreement as to the continuing liability for the payment of rent, the lease surrender agreement would extinguish the obligation of the tenant for payment of rent due for the period after the lease surrender date.

[32.36] 2. Factors in Negotiating Continuing Liability

The extent to which the landlord and tenant are willing to negotiate the issues regarding continuing liability will be affected by the particular type of continuing liability. Continuing liability regarding third party claims for personal injury (including death) or bodily injury and extensive property damage and substantial fines or penalties may be hard to quantify and the parties may be focused upon conducting due diligence to ascertain the issues (such as the existence or extent of insurance coverage). Other types of continuing liability, however, such as minor property damage claims and legal fines and penalties, as well as some rental arrearages, may be quantifiable enough to set forth in the lease surrender agreement as specific amounts, or the amount may be estimated to be so negligible that the parties decide to waive continuing the liability.

For additional factors that influence negotiations, see Sections IV.A.4. and IV.B.3. These factors include

- (1) the financial position of the tenant—if the tenant is in financial trouble, has few assets or revenue streams, could petition for bankruptcy, and there is no personal guaranty nor a substantial security deposit or letter of credit, then the landlord may be willing to secure the premises through the lease surrender agreement and not pursue some costs;
- (2) the economic situation of the real estate market—if the rent per square foot is increasing, then the landlord may pursue a quick return of possession of the premises in order to take advantage of significantly more rent from the next tenant in exchange for waiving some lease provisions or claims for damage to the premises; and
- (3) alternatives to entering into the lease surrender agreement, such as litigating those issues that constitute a default of the lease.

The alternative of pursuing the tenant for the default of the lease, however, could entail expensive and extensive litigation and result in significant delay in the return of possession of the premises. Depending upon the parties’ perceptions, the above may be factors in deciding whether to enter into a lease surrender agreement.

[32.37] 3. Managing Uncertainty and Risk in Assessing Continuing Liability

Assessing continuing liability can be complicated by a number of issues, such as the difficulty inherent in managing risks associated with real property. In part, the difficulty arises from the absence of accurate and timely information and uncertainty regarding potential claims that are as yet unknown to the parties. Claims for personal injury, property damage, and environmental actions have statutes of limitations that can extend for years after the lease has been surrendered (e.g., under New York State law, the statute of limitations for a regular “slip and fall” personal/bodily injury case or a general property damage case that is based upon negligence is three years,⁵⁸ and it is six years for a breach-of-contract case⁵⁹).

Secure as much information, data, records, and documents as possible during the negotiation of the lease surrender agreement. This provides the landlord and tenant with an opportunity to understand and manage the uncertainty and potential risk associated with continuing liability that can arise pertaining to the lease, tenant’s use of the premises, and any incidents that occurred in the premises, as well as all alterations and repairs made to and in the premises during the tenancy. A number of items listed below may be required by the lease and perhaps are already known by—or are already in the possession of—the parties.

- Request representations by each of the parties regarding any defaults of the lease or facts, circumstances, situations, or events known to the party that would constitute a default of the lease.
- Request the following information and data:
 - a) a list of representations regarding, information on, and records about, all of the legal actions, proceedings, and claims pending against the parties that arise from the lease or the use of the premises—and the current status of these matters (along with pertinent information such as their full caption, index number, court, and appropriate counsel, insurance companies, and contact persons for all pending claims);

⁵⁹ CPLR 213.

- b) a list of all anticipated or threatened legal actions, proceedings, and claims;
 - c) a list of all equipment lenders and parties with security liens to any of the tenant's personal property in the premises; and
 - d) a list of any mechanic's or construction liens (private or public) on the premises, as well any contractors who have not been paid or have claims for payment.
- Request the following records and documents:
 - a) copies of the underlying notices and papers, including all records and correspondences to and from the parties regarding any personal injury or property damages claims and lawsuits, both pending and expected to be commenced; and
 - b) copies of all of the certificates of insurance and, as appropriate, copies of the entire insurance policies.
 - Request records regarding repairs, alterations and the condition of the premises:
 - a) representations setting forth all alterations made to the premises and any hazardous materials stored, processed, used, or disposed of by the tenant (whether at, in, or from the premises); along with a summary of the contractors and copies of the applicable contracts, manifests, and insurance policies;
 - b) copies of all "as-built" plans, drawings, and specifications of improvements, alterations, utility systems, or any other substantial work done at the premises or to the building systems (and initial plans, specifications, and drawings if "as-built" not prepared yet)—all of which would preferably be in a CAD format;
 - c) copies (and assignments) of all warranties applicable to alterations or work performed at the premises or to the building systems; and
 - d) copies of all permits, temporary certificates of occupancy, certificates of occupancy, and/or certificates of completion (as appropriate, pursuant to local building codes).
 - Request information and records regarding financial and risk management issues:

- a) copies of all appropriate financial records that apply to tax issues, such as records of costs of tenant's improvements (may be helpful in a tax certiorari proceeding);
 - b) copies of insurance policies or, at least, copies of the certificate of insurance and perhaps the "Declaration" page(s) and the policy's endorsements; and
 - c) copies of all recognition, nondisturbance, subordination, and attornment agreements and all estoppel certificates.
- Request information regarding potential environmental liability.

As a result of the potential extensive exposure to environmental liability that can be imposed upon the landlord and tenant, it is advised that the parties engage in sufficient discussions and exchanges of information, data, records, and documents (perhaps even conduct an environmental audit or evaluation as an benchmark).⁶⁰

Environmental liability information should include representations and a written summary setting forth any hazardous materials (e.g., "hazardous waste," "hazardous materials," "hazardous substances"; or Polychlorinated Biphenyls (PCBs), asbestos, and petroleum and petroleum by-products) stored, processed, used, or disposed of by the tenant (whether at, in, or from the premises). A summary of the contractors, transporters, disposal sites, material safety data sheets, manifests, and copies of any notices of violations, administrative orders, consent orders, consent decrees, civil orders, applicable contracts, and insurance policies should be included.

For commercial industrial sites or other large sites, the document request could extend to a review of the federal, state, and local environmental permits and pending applications for any such permits. All correspondence with (and records of any negotiations with) federal, state, and local environmental regulatory agencies and any inspection reports, and EPA identification number(s)

received pursuant to the RCRA should be examined.⁶¹ Descriptions of any underground or above-ground storage tanks (USTs or ASTs) and any Spill Prevention Control and Countermeasure Plan or emergency response plan should be included, along with a list with the name and location of every site or facility used by the tenant or its predecessor since 1980 for the storage or disposal of solid or hazardous waste materials.⁶²

Landlords and tenants can attempt to manage and evaluate the uncertainty and risk associated with their continuing liability by obtaining information, representations, documents, and records. This will improve their ability to assess (and strategically respond to) the uncertainty and risk of potential continuing liability. The lease surrender agreement can provide an opportunity to secure significant information, records, representations, and documents pertaining to pending and threatened liability, exposure, claims, or incidents.

With regard to potentially significant environmental liability, the parties may consider methods of allocating the environmental risk such as obtaining environmental insurance coverage in the form of clean-up cost-cap coverage, environmental impairment liability coverage, and/or a pollution legal liability coverage insurance policy. In conjunction with obtaining the environmental insurance coverage or independent of environmental insurance, the parties may consider entering into a Voluntary Clean-Up Agreement with the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation (for which cost-cap environmental insurance may be appropriate and advisable).

[32.38] 4. Pitfalls to Avoid

The parties may decide to negotiate the release of some of the leasehold obligations pertaining to continuing liability. The release should be limited. The parties should be cautious about using the form “general releases.” Although general releases are commonly available and simple to prepare, in the context of a lease surrender agreement, the “settlement” and general release of the landlord-tenant issues could extinguish all claims, including claims for environmental liability for remediation costs.

61 42 U.S.C. §§ 6901–6992k.

62 For a more extensive discussion of the environmental issues, see Greenwald supra note 37, at 40. With regard to environmental due diligence, see New York State Bar Association, Cost-Effective Environmental Due Diligence for Corporate, Real Estate & Brownfield Transactions at 24–30 (Fall 1999) (CLE course materials), section entitled “Environmental Due Diligence Document Request List,” as well as throughout the text.

In Fisher Development Co. v. Boise Cascade Corp.,⁶³ the owner of the premises gave a general release to former tenants in the settlement of a landlord-tenant dispute for which the owner received $2,000 and which resulted in extinguishing over $860,000 in CERCLA liability.

Additionally, there may be pending or potential claims—particularly third-party personal injury, bodily injury, or property damage claims or governmental fines, penalties, or remediation requirements—that would be inappropriate to include in a release of the other party, and which could result in unintentional costly consequences and exposure to liability.

[32.39] D. Resolving Contingent Rights and Pending Proceedings

The lease surrender agreement should resolve, or at least identify, (i) contingent rights of parties arising from the lease and (ii) litigation, arbitration, and other proceedings pending between the parties that are related to or arising out of the lease or leased premises.

Contingent rights of parties arising from or appended to some commercial leases include the tenant's right of renewal, right of first refusal for additional space and/or right of purchase of the premises, as well as the landlord's rights to pursue third parties in accordance with an existing guaranty of the lease. Following a review of the terms of the underlying agreements, the parties should determine whether any of these contingent rights will survive the lease surrender agreement. Generally, the right of renewal of the lease, right of first refusal, or right to purchase the premises is terminated upon the lease surrender.

In general, a guaranty would terminate upon the surrender of the lease; however, the right to proceed against a guarantor of the lease depends upon the language of the underlying guaranty. Some guaranty agreements (such as a "good guy" lease guaranty) terminate the obligations of the guarantor upon the vacatur of the tenant from the premises. It may be appropriate to request written acknowledgement from the guarantor as to which, if any, obligations arising from the lease shall survive the early lease termination and continue to be within the responsibility of the guarantor to guarantee. This document should also state that the guarantor understands that the lease surrender agreement does not automatically terminate all of the guarantor's obligations under the guaranty.

The lease surrender agreement may afford the parties an opportunity to specifically identify—and, as appropriate, resolve—any litigation, arbitration, and other proceedings that pertain to the lease or the leased premises. Litigation or arbitration relating to the early termination of the lease often is resolved by the negotiation of the lease surrender agreement and should be dismissed, discontinued, or otherwise terminated upon the surrender of the lease. In some circumstances, for some landlords or tenants, the litigation may be maintained as an enforcement mechanism to be discontinued or dismissed upon compliance with the terms of the lease surrender agreement.

There may, however, be additional litigation or claims that may not be appropriate or possible for the landlord and tenant to resolve, including third-party personal injury actions or property damage actions (such as an existing property damage action against the landlord by the tenant's insurance company acting as the subrogee, in the absence of a waiver of subrogation). These matters should be noted in the lease surrender agreement.

A release by the parties can be included in the lease surrender agreement, though advisably in the form of a limited release.

There may be specific litigation or other outstanding claims arising from the lease or the leased premises, that the landlord or the tenant do not want to release, waive, or relinquish as against the other party. In this case, the lease surrender agreement should be drafted to specifically make reference to these matters. This avoids the possibility that the lease surrender agreement would be construed to mean that the parties intended to cancel or forfeit the particular litigation or claim or intended to release or exonerate the other party.

[32.40] V. POTENTIAL PROBLEMS

The negotiation of a surrender of a lease involves addressing both the possession of the premises and the termination of the contractual landlord-tenant relationship of the parties. As described in this chapter, there are a variety of issues that could arise and develop into possible problems, including subtenants remaining in the premises, unintentional acceptance of tenant's abandonment, the handling of tenant's property remaining in the premises, failure to secure necessary approvals, and bankruptcy. In addition, enforcement of the lease surrender agreement, as discussed in Part V, can be an area of great complexity.

[32.41] A. Subtenants Remaining in the Premises

For a thorough review of the issues and problems with subtenants remaining in the premises, see Section III.C.1. One of the potential problems with a voluntary lease surrender agreement is that it may have the unanticipated result (for the landlord) of automatically converting an existing subtenancy interest into a tenancy interest. The basic rule that a sublease is dependent on and limited by the terms and conditions of the main lease from which it derives is not necessarily applicable in the context of lease surrender agreements. Even though, in general, the expiration of the term of the lessee or a re-entry by the landlord for a breach of a condition of the lease may terminate a subtenancy interest

[W]hen a sublessor voluntarily surrenders his main lease not pursuant to any provision of such lease and same is accepted by the landlord, the subtenant becomes the immediate tenant of the original lessor and the interest and terms of the subtenant continue as if no surrender had been made.⁶⁴

The effect of such a surrender agreement is equivalent to a transfer of the reversion. The interests of the landlord and tenant merge, and what remains is the landlord's fee subject to the subtenancy. Such subtenancy remains because the landlord and tenant may not affect the rights of third parties who are not parties to their separate surrender agreement.⁶⁵

An option for the landlord is to set forth, as a condition of the acceptance of the surrender of the premises, the tenant's delivery of the premises free of any subtenancies or require that all subtenants be parties to the lease surrender agreement.

[32.42] B. Unintentional Acceptance of Tenant's Abandonment

A landlord may unintentionally release the tenant from the lease obligations by impliedly accepting the tenant's unilateral surrender (abandonment) of the premises. In accordance with the Holy Properties decision, the second option of the landlord, upon the abandonment of the premises by the tenant, is to accept the tenant's surrender, re-enter the premises, and re-let the premises for the landlord's own account—thereby releasing the tenant from further liability for rent. In the absence of a lease surrender agreement (or in the wake of a failed lease surrender negotiation), the conduct of the landlord—such as re-entry, re-letting, or other expressions manifesting an intent to accept the surrender of the tenant—should be carefully evaluated. The landlord's conduct may be found by the court “obviously inconsistent with the landlord-tenant relationship,” therefore constituting an acceptance of the tenant's surrender as an operation of law.⁶⁶ If the landlord intends to exercise the third option set forth in *Holy Properties*⁶⁷—to re-let the premises on behalf of the tenant—then the landlord's intent must be made evident. Otherwise, if any rent is owed or any other provision of the lease has been breached, then the landlord should commence a summary proceeding for non-payment of rent or holdover to indicate the non-acceptance of the tenant's surrender.⁶⁸

[32.43] C. Tenant's Property Remaining in the Premises

The law on property left in the premises by a tenant is not definitive. In the absence of an agreement between the parties, such as a lease surrender agreement or express provision in the lease, the improvements, trade fixtures, equipment, and other personal property of the tenant left in the premises can be a conundrum for the landlord.⁶⁹

68 In Altamuro, 212 A.D.2d 904, the court held that the landlord's attempt to sell (and the actual sale of) the premises after the tenant surrendered possession constituted acts precluding the landlord from seeking damages that accrued thereafter because, by operation of law, they constituted landlord's acceptance of the tenant's surrender.

The lease surrender agreement can expressly provide that any property remaining in the premises shall be deemed abandoned by the tenant and may be disposed of by the landlord in any manner including—without limitation—sale, use, retention, giving away, donating, or disposing as debris. There should be representations by the tenant as to the ownership of the property and, in the case of equipment and major items, the landlord can conduct a UCC search. Additionally, the tenant could be required to indemnify the landlord for any costs associated with the property and its removal from the premises.

Upon the vacatur of the tenant, if there is property remaining in the premises and the landlord is concerned about a possible lawsuit, the landlord may be advised to make an inventory and record by photo or video the remaining property in the premises.

Other options for resolving the issue of property left by the tenant include:

1. giving notice to the tenant of 30 days (or other “reasonable” amount of time) to remove the property, otherwise the property shall be deemed abandoned and disposed of by the landlord in any manner that the landlord deems appropriate, while the tenant shall be liable for the costs incurred by the landlord;
2. setting up a temporary storage room elsewhere in the facility for the property and perhaps providing the tenant 30 days or longer without charge to remove the property, then charging for the storage or implementing subsection (1) above or subsection (3) below; or
3. arranging for removal and having the property stored by a storage company.

[32.44] D. Failure to Secure Approval of Termination in the Context of Financial Agreements

If there are any financing agreements, such as a loan or a mortgage on the premises or the leasehold, the landlord and tenant must conduct a review of the provisions of the financing agreements. Loan documents should be reviewed, as well as any subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment agreements or any estoppel certificates and any recorded mortgages and other recorded instruments of the applicable real property, or a recorded instrument relating to such loan documents. Consent may be required to terminate the landlord's lease with the tenant.

For further detailed discussion with cases and statute citations, see Section III.C.2. The failure to secure such lender consent could be a violation of the mortgage, and the mortgagee could be found not to be affected by the lease surrender agreement.⁷⁰ “[A]n agreement by the mortgagor with respect to the mortgaged premises is not conclusive upon the mortgagee, or the receiver, where such agreement contravenes an express covenant or the necessary implications of a prior recorded mortgage.”⁷¹

Additionally, as described in Section III.C.2., pursuant to RPL section 291-f, a lease surrender agreement may be voidable as against a mortgage holder without the mortgage holder's consent.

[32.45] E. Bankruptcy

While the consequences of a bankruptcy filing by either the tenant or the landlord are beyond the scope of this chapter, such a development could represent a significant problem for the non-bankrupt party to the lease surrender agreement. Even though a lease surrender agreement has been executed (and the premises surrendered) prior to the filing of the bankruptcy petition, the lease surrender agreement may be found to have been a “fraudulent conveyance” under the U.S. Bankruptcy Code.⁷² This could happen in the event the surrender was within 365 days prior to filing, pursuant to Bankruptcy Code section 548—and/or possibly a substantially longer prior period, pursuant to the applicable state laws (which, in New York State, could be up to six years).

A determination that the surrender constituted a fraudulent conveyance could result in the avoidance of the lease surrender agreement. In general, the possibility of a finding of fraudulent conveyance would arise in circumstances where, in the case of a bankruptcy of the tenant, the tenant entered into a lease surrender agreement of an under-market lease or, in the case of a bankruptcy of the landlord, the landlord had entered into a lease surrender agreement for an over-market lease. In both of those scenarios, the issue of a valuable asset being transferred at less than fair or reasonably equivalent value would arise.

In order to minimize the risk of a possible fraudulent conveyance problem, either party may wish to consider:

- unilateral termination of the lease, followed by litigation for a final judgment of possession and issuance of warrant of eviction prior to the filing for the bankruptcy;
- “affording some value or consideration for termination if the lease has a definite commercial value because of favorable rent or other benefits”;
- “providing for an automatic permanent increase in rents upon default for the purpose of limiting the value of the lease” and discouraging a financially irresponsible interested party from seeking to take over the lease;
- “imposing requirements of performance and strict deadlines in the exercise of any purchase option or right of first refusal”; and/or
- “imposing a prohibition on assignment of a lease in default.”⁷³

[32.46] VI. ENFORCEMENT OF LEASE SURRENDER AGREEMENTS

Enforcement of leases, in general, can be a perplexing problem because leases represent an amalgam of contract rights and property interests. Enforcement of a lease surrender agreement is further complicated because of the early termination of the lease. Depending on the terms of the agreement, enforcement may involve enforcing obligations originally set forth in the underlying lease or new obligations first set forth in the agreement, as well as enforcing the surrender of possession of the premises on the date agreed upon in the lease surrender agreement.

In addition to instituting the traditional contractual civil action for breach of the lease surrender agreement and suing for damages and/or specific performance, the enforcement of the surrender date may involve commencing a summary proceeding to recover real property. The following suggestions (some of which involve ancillary agreements or third parties) may be included as additional provisions in the lease surrender agreement. Including these might provide a disincentive for the parties to breach the agreement or make the enforcement of the agreement more efficient.

The following list of enforcement methods (as well as provisions that could be included or required in a lease surrender agreement or the underlying lease) is by no means exhaustive and these may be used individually or in conjunction with one another, as appropriate:

1. Contract Actions and Proceedings in Law and Equity. When enforcing the terms of a lease surrender agreement, the landlord or tenant may commence a civil court action to sue for monetary damages for the breach of the agreement and/or to enforce the terms through specific performance.
2. Summary Proceeding. If the tenant does not surrender the premises upon the surrender date, then the landlord may pursue a “holdover” summary proceeding for a warrant of eviction of the tenant (for instance, based upon subsections 3 and 4 described below regarding default of the lease surrender agreement or an expiration of the lease). If unauthorized occupants continue in possession after the tenant has surrendered the premises, the landlord may pursue an eviction of the other party by instituting a “squatter” summary proceeding⁷⁴ that would result in a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction.

3. Default of the Lease Surrender Agreement Equals a Default of the Lease. The lease surrender agreement can include a provision that in the event of a default of the agreement (e.g., the tenant and occupants have not vacated the premises upon the surrender date), the landlord may declare an event of default of the underlying lease and therefore have the right to institute a “holdover” summary proceeding to obtain a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction.
4. Expiration of the Lease. Another approach would be to amend the lease to include a provision that the term of the lease shall expire upon the surrender date set forth in the lease surrender agreement regardless of the actual surrender of the tenant; therefore, the tenant would be “holding over” and subject to eviction following a “hold-over” summary proceeding resulting in a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction.
5. Security Deposit. The lease surrender agreement can provide that the tenant forfeits the entire security deposit in the event of a default (or “material” default) in the terms of the lease surrender. Caveat: The provision should be drafted to avoid the security deposit being deemed liquidated damages, which would limit the damages awarded to the amount of the security deposit.
6. Letter of Credit or Escrow Account. Either the landlord or the tenant may request a letter of credit or an escrow account in an amount equivalent to payments required to be paid pursuant to the lease surrender agreement, or in an amount that is an estimate of the costs to comply with obligations set forth in the agreement.
7. Affidavit of Confession of Judgment. In addition to the lease surrender agreement, the parties can enter into an Affidavit of Confession of Judgment. This method provides the party with an expedited process for obtaining a money judgment (without incurring the expense and delay that may occur in a civil action) in the event one of the parties defaults in the payment set forth in the agreement.

74 N.Y. Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law art. 7 (RPAPL). See RPAPL §§ 711 and 732 for holdover and nonpayment proceedings and § 713 for squatter proceedings.

8. “Directed Payments.” If the lease surrender agreement provides for a payment to the tenant for the early termination of the lease, the tenant may request part or all of the payment prior to the surrender date (e.g., to be applied to the costs of moving from the premises). The landlord could make a payment directly to a third party that would benefit the tenant without directly giving the payment to the tenant. The objective is to reduce the mistrust between the parties by including a third party. Examples of directed payments would include payment directly to a moving company in an amount estimated by the moving company, or payment of the first (or more) month’s rent directly to the tenant’s next landlord.
9. “Consent Eviction” Proceeding. If a summary proceeding pursuant to article 7 of the RPAPL has already been instituted (for instance, for default of any of the terms of the lease or for non-payment under the lease) and the parties are amenable to resolving the dispute through a lease surrender agreement, an additional enforcement method would be to continue with the proceeding in order to obtain a judgment of possession and the issuance of a warrant of eviction upon the consent of both the landlord and tenant. By stipulation, the parties can incorporate the lease surrender agreement and stay the execution of the warrant of eviction until the agreed-upon surrender date. If the tenant fails to surrender the premises on or before that surrender date, the tenant could be evicted from the premises pursuant to the warrant of eviction.
10. Liquidated Damages Clause. Liquidated damages are technically not methods of enforcement; but, rather, are methods of determining the appropriate compensation in the event of a breach of an agreement. A landlord and tenant should be careful to use the liquidated damages clause in such a way that it is not construed to be a penalty.

A liquidated damages clause in a lease surrender agreement is supposed to provide the landlord and tenant with an opportunity to agree to the amount of damages to be recovered in the event of a breach. The liquidated damages clause, however, must not impose a penalty for non-performance or otherwise violate public policy.⁷⁵ It is well settled that “[a] contractual provision fixing damages in the event of breach will be sustained if the amount liquidated bears a reasonable proportion to the probable loss and the amount of actual loss is incapable or difficult of precise estimation” at the time the agreement was made.⁷⁶ If the amount of the liquidated damages is clearly disproportionate to the expected loss, however, the provision will not be enforced.⁷⁷

In New York State, therefore, it is likely that a liquidated damages clause provision will be upheld only if (1) the amount fixed is a reasonable measure of the probable actual loss in the event of a breach and (2) the actual loss suffered is difficult to determine precisely. In New York State, the courts may closely scrutinize liquidated damages clauses in lease surrender agreements. In Irving Tire Co. v. Stage II Apparel Corp.,⁷⁸ the court found that the amount of the actual damages arising from breach of a lease surrender agreement was readily ascertainable and the sum fixed was disproportionate to the landlord’s loss; thus, the court rejected the liquidated damages clause as an unenforceable penalty.

Although these enforcement methods are weighted towards addressing the issue of enforcing the surrender of possession of the premises if the tenant does not vacate the premises upon the agreed date, most of them can be used by either the landlord or the tenant to enforce the contractual obligations set forth in the lease surrender agreement—and they may be available even after the premises have been surrendered.

[32.47] VII. CONCLUSION

This chapter has addressed some of the issues for commercial landlords and tenants in negotiating the early termination of leases and the surrender of possession of the premises through lease surrender agreements. These agreements provide landlords and tenants with an opportunity to chart the course of the early termination of the lease, set forth an orderly time schedule, allocate the existing and post-termination liabilities, and limit the exposure to uncertainty and risk associated with the early termination of the lease and their commercial landlord-tenant relationship. Additionally, through the process of negotiating a lease surrender agreement, landlords and tenants can identify and address the

MODEL SURRENDER AGREEMENT

Description. This Model Document is a surrender agreement, for use when a Tenant gives up its lease and possession of its space. If this surrender agreement is used in the context of a good-guy guaranty, Landlord may want to make sure that the “surrender” does not eliminate Landlord’s claims against Tenant, even if it resulted in terminating the good-guy guaranty.

[NAME]

(the "Effective Date")

[Addressee]

Confirmation of Surrender of Leased Premises at _____

To Whom It May Concern:

Please refer to the _____ Lease between _____ ("Landlord") and _____ ("Tenant"), dated _____ (the "Lease"), for premises located at _____ (the "Premises"). The Lease has not been amended, except as follows: _____. Definitions in the Lease apply in this letter agreement (the "Surrender Agreement").

The term of the Lease expired on _____ (the "Termination Date").¹ The parties desire to confirm that termination and Tenant's surrender of the Premises. Landlord and Tenant therefore agree, acknowledge and confirm:

1. Expiration and Surrender. The Lease expired on the Termination Date. Tenant has no further rights to use, occupy or possess the Premises after the Termination Date. Tenant confirms it has vacated the Premises and surrenders the Premises to Landlord. Tenant acknowledges it has removed from the Premises all personal property that Tenant desires to remove. On the Effective Date, Tenant is delivering to Landlord all keys and other access devices for the Premises.

2. Security Deposit. Tenant demands the return of Tenant's security deposit, with interest to the extent the Lease or law requires. The principal amount of the security deposit is $_____. To the extent that the security deposit consists of a letter of credit, Tenant demands that Landlord return that letter of credit and execute documents reasonably necessary to consent to its cancellation.²

3. Acknowledgment by Landlord. Landlord acknowledges receipt of notice from Tenant that Tenant is surrendering the Premises to Landlord in accordance with the Lease. This Surrender Agreement satisfies any requirement in the Lease that Tenant notify Landlord of Tenant’s surrender of the Premises. Neither this Surrender Agreement nor that acknowledgment by Landlord waives or limits any of Landlord’s rights under the Lease, including the right to collect any rent or other payments due under the Lease, whether or not previously billed. Similarly, to the extent that the Lease requires Landlord to refund any amounts after the Lease terminates, this Surrender Agreement does not limit Tenant’s rights to those refunds.

4. Tenant’s Address. From and after the Effective Date, Tenant’s address for any notices is: _____. Notices shall continue to be given (and become effective) as the Lease states.

5. Status of Lease. Tenant acknowledges: (a) the Lease has not been modified; (b) Tenant has no claim, counterclaim, defense, offset or setoff against the Lease; (c) Landlord has not waived any right or remedy under the Lease; (d) Landlord is not in default under the Lease; and (e) the Lease terminated and expired on _____.

The Lease, this Surrender Agreement, and _____ collectively constitute the entire understanding between the parties relating to the Premises.

If the foregoing accurately reflects your understanding, please sign and return a copy of this Surrender Agreement to us. It shall then bind the parties as of the Effective Date.

Thank you.

Very truly yours,

Each of the undersigned, a Guarantor under that certain _____ Guaranty dated as of _____ in favor of _____ (the “Guaranty”) consents to the above Surrender Agreement and confirms that, as to that Guarantor: (a) the Guaranty remains in full force and effect; (b) that Guarantor has no defense, claim, counterclaim or offset against its obligations under its Guaranty; and (c) Landlord has not waived or released any of its rights or remedies under that Guaranty.³

³ Ordinarily Tenant and Guarantor would demand a full release in exchange for this surrender. It may, however, make sense to keep Guarantor “on the hook” for any liabilities that arose during the Lease before Tenant surrendered it. CHAPTER THIRTY-FOUR

HOW TO STAY AWAY FROM THE MINEFIELDS IN LEASE EXPANSIONS, EXTENSIONS, AND RENEWALS

Joshua Stein, Esq.*

When a Landlord and a Tenant want to expand, extend, or renew an existing Lease, they often think it's as simple as "pushing a button" to document their transaction. It isn't. These transactions are tricky, creating all kinds of opportunities for error and surprises.

This chapter will refer to Lease expansions, extensions, and renewals collectively as "Lease amendments." Though they're much less work than negotiating a new Lease from scratch, Lease amendments do require turning over lots of stones and asking lots of questions. Missing one of those can create a mess.

Before you can start to document any Lease amendment, you first need to know what the existing Lease already says. What documents already exist?

Collect all existing Lease documentation, and look at it closely. Don't just look at the original Lease and any prior amendments. Are there any related documents you need to consider? A guaranty? A nondisturbance agreement? Letters that significantly affected the relationship between the parties? Any disputes that have already arisen about the terms of the Lease?

As you look through those documents, see if they suggest any gaps, for example, if the premises seem to have diminished at some point without a document to explain what happened. You may also notice that one document refers to some other document that isn't in the collection you received. Ask to see the missing documents and look at them.

The Lease file might include a Memorandum of Lease, which the parties may have recorded. The parties may, in occasional cases, have even recorded the entire Lease. In either event, today's amendment should mention what was recorded. And if the original Lease (or even just a Memorandum) was recorded, you will usually need to take the extra step of recording the entire Lease amendment, or at least a Memorandum giving notice of the Lease amendment.

Any Lease amendment may require consents from third parties. The Landlord will almost always have a lender. Occasionally, the "Landlord" will really be a Tenant, holding only a Leasehold estate under a long-term ground Lease from the fee owner. Either of these documents may require the Landlord to obtain consent to any future Lease amendments, depending of course on the specific terms of the third-party documents.

Even if no agreement between the Landlord and Landlord's lender (or ground lessor) specifically requires lender (or lessor) approval, ask whether the Tenant entered into a nondisturbance or recognition agreement with the lender or the ground lessor. If that happened, then the agreement will usually say that the lender or ground lessor won't be bound by any Lease amendments made without their consent. Thus, even if the Landlord hasn't directly agreed to seek this third party's consent, the nondisturbance or recognition agreement will effectively require such consent, producing the same practical result.

If you see you will need a third-party consent, start the process of obtaining it as soon as possible. It may require lead time, or nonobvious documentation or procedures. Does any document describe the process or limit the third party's discretion in consenting to Lease amendments? For previous transactions, how did the process work, and how long did it take? Will the third party consider a proposed transaction based on a term sheet or an informal email inquiry, or a final document ready to sign or will they insist on doing nothing until they receive signed documents? Counsel should answer those questions early in the process, and then proceed accordingly. The first step usually consists of trying to identify exactly who to speak with about the requested consent. If the third party is a securitized lender, merely finding a person to talk with can take time and great effort.

The Lease file may contain at least one brokerage agreement, and very likely two, for the original Lease. If it doesn't, you should ask why not, and try to find a copy of any brokerage agreement(s) that exist. Any brokerage agreement may say the broker can collect a further commission if Landlord and Tenant extend or renew their Lease. Sometimes, the broker(s) who negotiated the original Lease will remain in the picture at the time of the Lease extension or renewal, and participate. In other cases, one or another broker is no longer involved, but the agreement may still award them a supplemental commission on an extension. In the worst case, no one can find the brokerage agreement, and no one knows the broker's rights. Once again, this possibility, which is hardly hypothetical, demonstrates the importance of collecting all documents for any transaction in one logical place, where they can be found years later. That principle applies with special force to Leases, given their long life expectancies.

Once you have all the original documentation for the existing Lease, you need to ask whether today's transaction is an entirely new deal never contemplated under the original Lease, or whether the Tenant already had a renewal or extension right under the existing Lease, and is merely exercising it.

If the Lease already contains an expansion or extension right, the Lease will sometimes contain very specific provisions on how the Tenant can exercise that right, and what happens if the Tenant does so. If the Lease does that and the Tenant merely exercises its rights under the Lease, the necessary documentation to confirm the Lease amendment can consist of a one-page unilateral letter from the Tenant to the Landlord. In that case, however, the Tenant must take care to comply with the specific requirements of the Lease, or the Tenant's exercise of its rights may not be valid or effective.

If the Lease contemplates a process to determine fair market rental value for a renewal or expansion term, the procedures can as a practical matter turn out to be rather sticky and complex, even if they sounded quite simple in the Lease. Whether you represent Landlord or Tenant, you should advise your client to focus on the rent determination process as early as possible. For example, if your client anticipates an appraisal process ahead, your client may want to engage a preferred appraiser before the other party does.¹

Even if the Tenant merely exercises a renewal or expansion right expressly provided for in the Lease, both Landlord and Tenant may want to memorialize the resulting changes in the Lease in a separate Lease amendment. In that case, all the suggestions in this article would apply.

In many—perhaps most—cases, although the Lease gives the Tenant a specific renewal or expansion right, the parties will end up agreeing to do something else. At a minimum, instead of enduring a rent appraisal process, the parties will often agree on the rent. Instead of renewing for five years, the Tenant may want to renew for seven; the Landlord may accommodate. The parties may agree to tweak the escalation clauses. And they may, in any number of other ways, proceed in a way that's not exactly what they had in mind years before when they negotiated their Lease.

In many cases, the original Lease did not contemplate expansion or renewal, or may have addressed the topic in a sloppy, incomplete, or minimalistic way. This can occur when the Tenant never saw value in having rights of this type, or if the Landlord didn't really want to grant them. Some Landlords try, as a matter of policy, not to include extension or expansion options in their Leases. They reason that they may be in a better bargaining position when the Lease term expires and don't want to agree to any rights that extend beyond the initial term. Landlords may also value the future flexibility that they retain by not having to reserve space to accommodate future contractual extension and expansion rights. If you represent the Landlord, though, don't assume that a negotiated extension or renewal avoids the need to pay a commission to the broker(s) who originally negotiated the Lease. Often these brokerage agreements require another commission on any extension or renewal.

In documenting any Lease amendment, the issue of first and most importance to the parties will be the rent payable under the Lease amendment. In most significant Leases, the parties' brokers will agree on the rent as part of a negotiated term sheet. The term sheet will state whether the Landlord must give the Tenant a new "free rent" period and whether the Landlord will give the Tenant a new Tenant improvement allowance. The term sheet, which is something lawyers are not often involved in negotiating, will also likely include important items such as base years for escalations, and perhaps changes in Tenant's share of expenses above the base.

The final term sheet goes to counsel as a rough guideline for drafting the Lease amendment, usually accompanied by statements that: (a) it's a very simple transaction; (b) the parties want to get it signed up as quickly as possible; and (c) they have already been negotiating the transaction for, e.g., an entire year, so this makes it all the more important to sign as quickly as possible.

If Landlord and Tenant negotiated the Lease amendment outside of the four corners of the existing Lease, counsel might be tempted to start from scratch and create an entirely new Lease. In most cases this is a waste of time (and expense for the client), unless the existing Lease is truly antiquated and inadequate. Any specific identified mistake or omission can be dealt with in the amendment, which will ultimately be shorter and simpler—less expensive—than drafting an entirely new Lease. A new Lease will also open up a Pandora's Box of Lease issues and negotiations that otherwise probably never would attract anyone's attention. Most likely, both Landlord and Tenant will prefer to just amend their original Lease—for better or worse—particularly since that's how everyone else generally does it. Unless there is an overwhelming compelling reason to prepare an entirely new Lease, counsel should stick to the amendment format to memorialize the new deal.

Any Lease amendment must start by accurately handling every point mentioned in the term sheet. If counsel misses or misinterprets even one provision in the term sheet, this is a great way to antagonize, and lose the confidence of, everyone involved the deal, including your own client.

From counsel's perspective, the broker's most important job will consist of reviewing the business terms in the Lease amendment to confirm they accurately reflect the term sheet, which may have been written in a more abbreviated way than a formal Lease amendment.

Doing justice to a term sheet in a Lease amendment is not as simple as cutting and pasting. Even before the Tenant sees the first draft of any Lease amendment, the Landlord's broker should review the Lease amendment to try to confirm that it matches up to the intent of the term sheet. Rental rates, and precise adjustment dates and changes in formulas, are hot buttons in any amendment.

Does the rent always go up on the first day of the month? Or does it go up on an anniversary of a particular date, regardless of the day of the month that date occurred? And is the "base" date for these adjustments the commencement date of the Lease or the rent commencement date? If the term sheet doesn't fully answer these questions, counsel needs to ask them and insist on obtaining answers.

The original Lease may contain detailed provisions on expansion rights under the Lease. These provisions may include a definitive rental rate (or a process for determining rent), the size of the expansion premises, whether the base years for taxes and operating expenses will change, and the termination date of the expansion premises, typically coterminous with the original premises. Here, your main responsibility will consist of memorializing the details of today's transaction in a Lease amendment, and understanding whether the parties somehow varied from what the Lease originally contemplated. Identification of base years for escalations, in particular, is crucially important. If the amendment says nothing on the topic, then the base years in the previous Lease will continue to apply. Usually that's not what the Tenant expected.

Whether or not a broker is not involved, make sure your client carefully reviews the provisions on rent and escalations. They are perhaps 2% of the verbiage in any Lease, but they represent 98% of what matters.

One way to clearly draft the rental section is to create a grid that includes the time periods and the rental for each time period using specific dates. If the commencement of the payment of rent is a contingent date, you can assume a certain date. If you do that, you should explain what you're doing as part of the Lease language, and also include a provision saying the parties will adjust the dates in the rental grid once the Lease has been executed or the conditions necessary for the obligation of rent to be triggered occur. In that case, the commencement date letter for the lease would include an updated grid for rent rates and dates.

The "rental grid" approach with specific dates makes the economics of the Lease amendment far more comprehensible to counsel, brokers, and their mutual clients, thus reducing the likelihood of mistakes. But you still need to remember to finalize them in the commencement date letter. By making the economic terms easier to understand, you make them easier to check, because you don't waste a lot of the reader's brainpower on decoding them.

You should, however, still read through the entire Lease and related documents to make sure you don't miss anything relevant to the Lease amendment. Any provision in the Lease may refer to dates or something that you should now adjust because of the amendment. Simply reviewing the expansion right section in the original Lease without further investigation can invite trouble.

Going beyond the economic terms of the term sheet and the words of the original Lease, any Lease amendment can also be used to adjust the relationship—solve problems—between the Landlord and the Tenant. It can give both parties a chance to repair mistakes in the original Lease or its administration. Sometimes the Lease amendment process will itself focus attention on these mistakes.

For example, in one Lease amendment the author handled, the parties had miscalculated the expiration date of the original Lease. Both parties simply had the wrong date. As part of the amendment, the parties corrected their mistake. (The problem arose because the original Lease treated the commencement date and expiration date in a way that was almost incomprehensible. It came as no great surprise that no one had properly comprehended it.)

Issues may have arisen about either Landlord's or Tenant's obligations under the original Lease. Perhaps Landlord did not complete its construction obligations or fully disburse a Tenant improvement allowance. The Lease may have required the Tenant to perform certain maintenance that it has never actually performed—or that made more sense for the Landlord to perform—and the Landlord actually did the work.

For example, one retail Landlord represented by the author had experienced a number of problems with the Tenant during the initial term. The Tenant was quite desirable, but also badly wanted to keep this particular location, and had no contractual renewal right. Both parties had some degree of leverage. The Landlord's problems with the Tenant did not relate to payment of rent, but instead related to practical considerations such as use of basement space, storage of trash, lighting, scheduling of deliveries, and other operational matters.

As part of the Lease amendment negotiations, the Landlord asked for changes in all the provisions of the Lease that had proven inadequate to deal with these practical issues. The Tenant didn't agree to everything the Landlord wanted, but did agree to most of it. The likely result: a more satisfactory Landlord-Tenant relationship in the renewal term – assuming anyone pays any attention to the words of the Lease going forward.

One particular Lease required the Tenant to perform certain maintenance obligations. The Tenant hadn't bothered to comply during the initial term. To avoid municipal penalties, the Landlord performed the Tenant's obligations, but never notified the Tenant of its default. The original Lease did not adequately address Tenant's maintenance obligations and the consequences of Tenant's nonperformance, i.e., Landlord's rights and remedies. As a result, the subsequent amendment revisited the section on maintenance obligations and set up consequences for the Tenant's nonperformance in certain circumstances. Because the maintenance obligations under the Lease were supposed to be picked up by Tenant, its counsel did not push back.

These various examples teach the same lesson. A Landlord can and should use a Lease amendment to revisit the existing relationship, and think about whether anything needs adjustment or repair. In many cases, the same areas of concern in these examples will raise concerns for other Landlords.

Lease amendments can clear up these situations by rethinking them as necessary. If the terms of the original Lease need to be reaffirmed, the Lease amendment can do that. By specifically addressing these obligations, the Lease amendment prevents future disputes, underscores what the parties really expect, clarifies the parties' obligations, cleans up messes, and prevents claims of waiver that might otherwise arise.

Regardless of which party you represent in a Lease amendment, ask whether anything about the leasing relationship to date has proven unsatisfactory and might merit change or correction. If so, now is the time to change or correct it. Of course, that approach may complicate and draw out a Lease amendment that could otherwise be quite simple. The client will have to decide whether those costs are worth the benefits. It amounts to a business decision.

If the Landlord and Tenant have had disputes about anything – or if any disputes are underway at the time of the Lease amendment – the Lease amendment may give both parties an opportunity to resolve their dispute and prevent it from recurring. In the alternative, if the parties want to leave it open, they should expressly say so, to avoid any surprises about unintentional waivers or releases of claims.

Whether a Lease amendment merely addresses a few economic terms or makes wholesale adjustments in the relationship between the parties, write any amendment in an organized manner. Usually this means following the same order as the original Lease. Delete provisions that no longer apply and may cause confusion in the new amendment. Modify specific provisions of the original Lease where necessary. In some cases, you may want to incorporate by reference certain provisions from the original Lease and in other cases, for clarity, you may want to restate an entire provision, for example if the amendment process would otherwise become very complex and intricate.

Usually, it doesn't make sense to write a Lease amendment in a conceptual way—i.e., addressing a few topics on whatever order counsel wants to cover them, memorializing the agreement of the parties without referring to the terms of the original Lease. This approach creates a high risk of interpretational problems, inviting the parties to disagree on whether some “concept” addressed in the Lease amendment did or didn't change something that appeared in the original Lease.

For example, if the original Lease defined the “Scheduled Expiration Date” and the parties agree to extend the Lease term by ten years, they shouldn't just say “we hereby extend the Lease term by ten years.” The drafter of the Lease amendment should go in and surgically adjust the “Scheduled Expiration Date” by making it ten years later. Otherwise, the parties leave open potential debate over whether the Lease amendment actually changed the “Scheduled Expiration Date” and any rights and obligations that the “Scheduled Expiration Date” may trigger.

Any Lease amendment on expansion or renewal should clarify whether any expansion or renewal rights in the original Lease continue to apply. Usually, they shouldn't. In such cases, the Landlord's counsel should drive a stake through their heart by deleting them. But what happens if the Lease gives the Tenant further expansion or renewal rights? Clarify that those continue, and only delete the option rights being exercised. Do the parties need to adjust the future option rights to take into account the Lease amendment they sign today? If so, make the adjustment.

Make the Lease amendment as specific as possible while still adhering to the original Lease as much as possible. In the case of an expansion, the definition of “premises” under the original Lease may or may not change. You may find it's easiest to leave the “premises” alone and define a new and separate “expansion premises,” with different economic terms. This approach will typically make sense if the expansion premises: (1) requires the Tenant to pay a different rental rate than the original premises, perhaps with different scheduled increases; (2) has different escalation formulas; or (3) uses the same formula but different base years.

If you find that even one of the foregoing circumstances applies, having a separate definition, with separate economic terms, for the “expansion premises” will create less confusion in the future. The amendment will, of course, then need to include new economic definitions for the expansion premises, such as rent, tax base years, and operating expense base years. For everything else, the Lease should say the expansion premises are governed by the same Lease provisions that govern the original premises.

Any Lease amendment may also need to address construction and Tenant improvements. Will the Landlord provide either of those for the new space or the extension term? If not, the Lease amendment should make that clear, to prevent any argument by implication or inference. If the Landlord will in fact provide either of these benefits, the terms of the original Lease on those subjects may make sense for the Lease amendment, but they also may not. Adjust them as appropriate. Deal with the issue one way or another. Silence is not good.

If the Landlord obtained a guaranty of the original Lease, then the Landlord should insist that the same guarantor, or a satisfactory replacement, guaranty the Lease as affected by the Lease amendment. Absent an express confirmation from the guarantor, the Landlord may find that the Lease amendment eliminates the guaranty.

Conversely, if the original Lease contained an exculpation or nonre-course clause benefiting the Landlord, the Lease amendment should reaffirm that concept.

Counsel also needs to think about the possible issues created by past and present leasing brokers, as suggested earlier in the context of brokerage agreements. Counsel should ask the client about brokers early in the course of the transaction, especially if you are representing the Landlord, as the Landlord is generally the party who pays the brokerage commission. Your client will not be happy to discover an unexpected brokerage commission on top of the attorneys' fees incurred for the amendment.

If a broker is involved, and there is an existing brokerage agreement (assuming the same broker(s) is involved), counsel should consider drafting a new brokerage agreement or letter agreement that specifically deals with the commission due under the amendment. This amendment will state the amount of the commission and when the payout will occur. And if no existing agreement applies, the Landlord will want to sign a new agreement with the broker about their commission. To prevent unexpected claims, the Landlord may want to sign up that agreement early in the process, with an acknowledgment that the broker can't make a claim unless the parties actually sign and exchange Lease documents and they become fully effective.

To prevent future debates, try to express any commission as a specific number of dollars instead of a formula with inclusions and exclusions inviting debate and disputes over interpretation. The brokerage agreement should expressly include or reaffirm provisions in the original brokerage agreement, such as a broker's indemnity and restrictions on publicity and disclosure.

A broker's involvement can help counsel, as a broker can readily provide answers that the client may not be able to provide quickly. Brokers may help negotiate the Lease amendment. Brokers can be especially helpful when they have intimate knowledge of the space and practical questions arise, such as when a client wants to expand and will need additional riser space, air-conditioning units, back-up generators, or the like. A broker who knows the building well can help counsel understand the building's systems and whether a Tenant's requests can even be accommodated.

Counsel should, however, keep in the back of their mind the fact that brokers usually don't get paid unless deals get signed and closed. In the author's experience, this fact does not seem to warp the judgment and advice provided by reputable brokers.

Once Landlord and Tenant finalize and sign their Lease amendment, make sure that both lawyer and client have copies in locations where the documents can easily be retrieved for future reference. Counsel hopes that they will be involved in subsequent amendments, but even if the client uses the same firm, different lawyers may handle the next Lease amendment.

This all just represents another reason to make sure any Lease amendment is totally clear ("even clearer than it needs to be") and addresses all possible concerns. This way, the next person who reads the Lease amendment, perhaps five years later, won't need to guess at what the parties really intended, or perform detective work to figure out what the Lease amendment really means.

CHAPTER THIRTY-FIVE

LEASE GUARANTIES

Michelle Maratto Itkowitz, Esq.
Jay Itkowitz, Esq.

[35.0] I. INTRODUCTION TO THE LEASE GUARANTY

A Guaranty is a promise to answer for the payment of some debt or the performance of some duty, in case of the failure of another who is liable in the first instance.¹

In the context of a lease, a guaranty is a promise to the landlord by a third party, typically the principal of a tenant-business, that it will remain liable for the tenant's obligations in the event that the tenant is unable to perform.

[35.1] A. Vocabulary

Some necessary vocabulary follows:

The “guarantor” is the party that signs the guaranty. The party may be an individual or a corporate entity.

Three common types of guaranties:

Complete Guaranty: A guarantor promises to remain liable for all of the tenant's obligations under the lease for the entire term.

Limited Guaranty: A guarantor promises to remain liable for a fixed portion of the term (e.g., six months' rent), or, up until the surrender of the premises.

Good Guy Guaranty: A type of limited guaranty that typically cuts off the guarantor's liability upon the tenant's surrender of the premises (i.e., vacatur and turning in the keys), and, as has increasingly become standard practice, upon the tenant's satisfaction of additional conditions, such as notice and being current on all rent, which will be discussed later in the course.

This chapter focuses on the Good Guy Guaranty (“GG Guaranty”). It will first introduce you to the simplest form of a GG Guaranty, i.e., the kind that extinguishes the guarantor's liability upon the tenant's surrender of the premises to landlord.

Next, using samples of actual GG Guaranties from the authors' practice as well as related case law, the chapter will illustrate the variety of additional conditions a GG Guaranty can impose on the tenant.

These conditions have the aggregate effect of increasing uncertainty or risk for the guarantor seeking to avoid or minimize liability on the one hand, and, on the other hand, giving the landlord significant bargaining leverage during both lease negotiations and when faced with a tenant who is behind on rent and looking for a way out.

[35.2] B. Why a Guaranty?

Entering into a contract of any kind is like entering into a marriage. If things go well, both parties are better off for having come together. On the other hand, if the relationship becomes too costly for one party or ceases being mutually beneficial for both, the endgame becomes trying to unravel the relationship in the most cost effective manner.

In a marriage, spouses often enter into prenuptial agreements to account for this contingency and to avoid costly divorce litigation in the event they decide to part ways. You can think of a guaranty in the same manner. It is an agreement made at the outset of a relationship to account for the grim possibility that things may not turn out so well—an insurance policy to account for the likelihood that somebody will not perform in the manner they have promised.

[35.3] II. THE ANATOMY OF A GUARANTY

[35.4] A. Who Is the Guarantor?

Remember, the guaranty is only as good as the guarantor!

[35.5] 1. Individual Lessees Are Already Personally Liable

If the lease is signed by an individual or a person “doing business as” (d/b/a), then you already have a complete guaranty!

Remember, the point of a guaranty is to avoid a party charged with certain obligations from abusing the trust of the obligee by imposing certain consequences on the guarantor, namely personal liability, for breaching the underlying agreement.

In the case of a lease, if you already have the individual(s) on the lease, you SHOULD NOT ask them to sign a GG Guaranty. Why? Because you would, in effect, be entering a new contract with the same individual that turns the complete guaranty into a limited guaranty. How? By signing the lease as an individual, the person is already promising to be personally liable for all of its enumerated obligations. If this same person then signs a GG Guaranty that terminates the individual's liability upon surrender of the premises, you just gave the tenant a free pass to walk away from the lease before its natural expiration without any consequences! The GG Guaranty becomes the subsequent agreement by the same parties that takes precedence over the prior conflicting lease agreement.

[35.6] 2. A Guaranty Is Only as Good as the Guarantor

Is the Guarantor a corporation or an individual? Is it credit-worthy? This may seem obvious, but it is an all too often neglected, but vital, step in the process—checking the Guarantor's bona fides.

[35.7] a. Individual Guarantor

Individual guarantors are generally better. Having the principal of a company face personal liability in the event of a default is generally better provided the individual has reachable assets. Once again, the fundamental value-added by a Guaranty is the ability to bypass the formal obstacles that get in the way of recovering against a corporate entity. On the other hand, if you have a blue-chip corporation, for example, McDonalds Inc., willing to sign a guaranty, then there is good reason to go with the corporate guarantor because collectability becomes a non-issue.

[35.8] b. Due Diligence

Do the Due Diligence. Before entering into a lease and GG Guaranty with anyone, do your homework. This may include:

- Internet searches on the principal(s) such as Google, LinkedIn, etc.
- Running credit checks using Transunion or other credit reporting services, and an Accurint search to obtain records on the principal(s)' assets.

PRACTICE TIP: Note that obtaining credit reports is governed by federal law 15 U.S.C. § 1681(b) which outlines the “permissible purposes” for a consumer reporting agency to disclose credit reports. The permissible purposes in the case of landlords obtaining credit reports on guarantors are when the report will be used in connection with a collection involving a “credit transaction,” i.e., the guaranty (§1681b(a)(C)); or, under § 1681b(a)(F) a “legitimate business purpose” concerning a transaction that the consumer, i.e., the guarantor, has initiated.

Essentially, in the context of a lease, this means that counsel can only run credit reports when either the guarantor owes the landlord money, or at the outset of the relationship when landlord is evaluating a guarantor’s creditworthiness.

- Obtain bank statements, tax returns and other financial documentation indicating the principals’ solvency.
- View guarantor’s assets with an eye toward the future. Just because a guarantor has assets at the outset of a lease deal, that does not mean those assets may not dissipate over time.
- If your guarantor is an entity, the due diligence should be even more rigorous and should examine the entity’s balance sheets, annual financial reports, tax returns and prior litigation history.

[35.9] B. Guarantor’s Identifying Information

It is essential that the Guaranty include the following personal information of the guarantor. It is surprising how often one sees a Guaranty that lacks some of these items.

[35.10] 1. Social Security Number

The Social Security Number will also be crucial during the judgment enforcement phase when you will need it to locate and attach assets of the guarantor, such as bank accounts, wages, and personal and/or real property.

[35.11] 2. Home Address

Be sure to include the guarantor(s)’ home address in the signature block of the GG Guaranty. This will aid in running credit reports and will also be the address you will use to effectuate service of papers in the event of litigation.

[35.12] C. Personal Jurisdiction

Most well-drafted GG Guaranties now include personal service waiver clauses like the example below providing for service by certified mail.

This will save landlord the trouble of complying with personal service and the cost of paying for a process server. Courts routinely uphold these provisions.²

EXAMPLE 1:

Guaranty cannot be modified, waived or terminated unless such modification, waiver or termination is in writing, signed by Landlord.

As a further inducement to Landlord to make and enter into the Lease, Guarantor covenants and agrees that (i) in any action or proceeding brought in respect of this Guaranty, the undersigned hereby waives trial by jury, (ii) the Supreme Court of the State of New York of the County of New York (or, in a case involving diversity of citizenship, the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York) shall have jurisdiction of any action or proceeding and (iii) service of any summons and complaint or another process in any such action or proceeding may be made by certified mail directed to the undersigned at the address below set forth, personal service being hereby waived. This Guaranty shall be enforced and construed in accordance with the laws of the States of New York and shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of Landlord and the undersigned and their respective heirs, executors, administrators, legal representatives, successors and assigns.

[35.13] D. Counsel Fees

Every GG Guaranty should contain a provision allowing the Landlord to recover counsel fees from the guarantor that may be incurred in the enforcement of its terms.

[35.14] E. Survival Clause

Every GG Guaranty should contain a provision that clearly states that the guaranty “shall remain and continue in full force and effect as to any ² See Credit Car Leasing Corp. v. Elan Group Corp., 185 A.D.2d 109, 109, 586 N.Y.S.2d 3 (1st Dept. 1992) (holding that service was proper when effectuated in accordance with substituted method provided for in the lease); *Marine Midland Bank, N.A. v. renewal, change or extension of the [underlying agreement].” Variations on this important point are discussed in more detail below. However, the basic idea is to make sure that the guarantor remains liable for obligor’s obligations under the Guaranty in spite of subsequent agreements between the obligee and obligor.

[35.15] F. Signatures

It is essential that the obligee obtain the guarantor’s signature on the guaranty, as an individual, and be sure to obtain signatures on the underlying agreement from the obligor’s corporate officers.³

PRACTICE TIP: Get signatures notarized or get a copy of guarantor(s)’ driver’s license to avoid authentication issues in the event of litigation.

[35.16] III. THE BASIC GOOD GUY GUARANTY

As we have already mentioned, the simplest and earliest iteration of the GG Guaranty provides that the tenant’s principal remains liable for the tenant’s obligations under the Lease through the date that the tenant vacates the premises and delivers possession to the Landlord.

GUARANTY

FOR VALUE RECEIVED, and in consideration for, and as an inducement to Lessor to the reassignment of the lease with _____ for the Premises known as _____ in the building.

City, County and State of New York, the Undersigned guarantees to Landlord, Landlord’s successors and assigns, the full performance and observance of all the covenants, conditions and agreements, therein provided to be performed and observed by Tenant, including the “Rules and Regulations” as therein provided, without requiring any notice of non payment, non performance or non observance, or proof, or notice or demand whereby to charge the undersigned therefor, all of which the undersigned hereby expressly waives; and undersigned expressly agrees that the validity of this Guaranty and the obligations of the Guarantor hereunder shall in no wise be terminated, affected or impaired by reason of the assertion or non assertion by Landlord against Tenant of any of the rights or remedies reserved to Landlord pursuant to the provisions of the within Lease. The undersigned further covenants and agrees that this Guaranty shall remain and continue in full force and effect as to any renewal, modification or extension of this Lease and during any period when Tenant is occupying the premises as a "statutory tenant." As further inducement to Landlord to make this Lease and in consideration thereof, Landlord and the undersigned covenant and agreed that any action or proceeding brought by either Landlord or the undersigned against the other on any matters whatsoever arising out of, under or by virtue of the terms of this Lease or of the Guaranty that Landlord and the undersigned shall and do hereby waive trial by jury.

ANYTHING HEREIN TO THE CONTRARY NOTWITHSTANDING this Guaranty shall not extend to any obligations incurred by Tenant under the Lease after the date after the date the Tenant and anyone claiming through the Tenant vacate the premises demised under the Lease, removes all of its personal property therefrom and then offers to deliver possession of the demised premises to the Landlord. This Guaranty does not modify the terms of the Lease and nothing herein contained shall relieve Tenant from any liability thereunder in accordance with the terms of this Lease.

The language appears clear and unequivocal. After the tenant, or anyone claiming through the tenant (i.e., subtenants), vacates the premises, removes all personal property, and offers to deliver possession to the landlord, the guarantor is in the clear.

However, even this simply phrased guaranty could be simpler. For instance, what does it mean to "offer" to deliver possession? When will "delivery" be complete? What if tenant slides the keys under landlord's office or leaves them with a doorman and landlord does not find out that the keys were returned until weeks after the "delivery"?

What if the tenant surrenders the premises in writing and the landlord accepts the keys without saying a word, only to find out later that tenant has abandoned all of its personal property in the premises? And now the landlord wants to pursue a claim for future rent owed under the lease given tenant's failure to comply with the terms of the guaranty.

If landlord accepts tenant's surrender without reserving its rights under the lease and the guaranty, landlord waives any claims to future rent absent an agreement to the contrary because such acceptance terminates the leasehold.⁴

GG Guaranties are “commonly understood to apply to obligations which accrue prior to the surrender of the lease premises.”⁵ If there is a basis to hold guarantor personally liable for future rent given tenant’s failure to surrender the premises in the manner prescribed by the lease and GG Guaranty, Landlord must reserve all of its rights under the GG Guaranty to pursue those claims against guarantor.⁶

[35.17] IV. GG GUARANTIES THAT REFER BACK TO THE LEASE

In current practice, most GG Guaranties require the tenant to surrender the premises in the same condition prescribed under the lease, or, in “broom clean condition,” and many require that the tenant be current in all rent and additional rent due and owing at the time of surrender.

The interplay between a GG Guaranty and provisions of a lease can lead to a whole host of issues for the tenant seeking to terminate the leasehold.

EXAMPLE 3:

GUARANTY

FOR VALUE RECEIVED, and in consideration for, and as an inducement to Landlord making the within Lease with Tenant, the undersigned, guarantees to Landlord and Landlord’s successors and assigns, the payment of base and additional rent as provided in the Lease and that Tenant will bond and/or remove and lien(s) which may be incurred by Tenant, during the period that Tenant (or anyone claiming under or through Tenant) is in possession of all or any part of the premises demised under

Aug. 1, 2016) (“The reletting expenses, including rent concessions, and broker’s fees occurred after the Plaintiff vacated the Premises and returned the key on May 15, 2015. Defendant does not dispute that Plaintiff returned the keys and vacated the entire premises. Therefore, when [Tenant] vacated the property on May 15, 2015, [Guarantors’] liability for future rent ceased.”).

the Lease (the “Premises”), together with the payment of all costs, attorney’s fees, and other expenses incurred by Landlord in enforcing such payment. Except as hereinafter expressly provided, this Guaranty shall not extend to any obligations incurred by Tenant under the Lease after the date (the “Surrender Date”) on which Tenant and everyone claiming under or through the Tenant (a) vacate the Premises and surrender the same in the condition required under the Lease and (b) deliver all keys for the Premises to the Landlord. The undersigned hereby expressly agrees that the validity of this Agreement and the obligations of the Guarantor hereunder shall in no wise be terminated, affected or impaired by reason of the assertion by Landlord against Tenant of any of the rights or remedies reserved to Landlord pursuant to the provisions of the within Lease.

As a further inducement to Landlord to make this Lease and in consideration thereof, Landlord and the undersigned covenant and agree that in any action or proceeding brought by either Landlord or the undersigned against the other on any matters whatsoever arising out of, under or by virtue of the terms of this Lease or of the Guaranty that Landlord and the undersigned shall and do hereby waive trial by jury.

By accepting this Guaranty, Landlord agrees that it will accept a substitute Guarantor, in the event that Guarantor herein sells her interest in Tenant or Tenant assigns the Lease with Landlord’s prior consent, so long as the substitute Guarantor or Guarantors collectively have a net worth equal to or better than the undersigned Guarantor.

Nothing contained in this Guaranty shall be deemed to limit or exempt the assets of Tenant (including a successor partnership or corporation), or in any manner excuse Tenant from the obligation to fully satisfy the liabilities and obligations of Tenant under the Lease.

this Guaranty shall not extend to any obligations incurred by Tenant under the Lease after the date (the “Surrender Date”) on which Tenant and everyone claiming under or through the Tenant (a) vacate the Premises and surrender the same in the condition required under the Lease and (b) deliver all keys for the Premises to Landlord.

When interpreting the guaranty in conjunction with the lease, the first step is to find the surrender provision in the lease which will typically prescribe the condition in which tenant should leave the premises.

[35.18] V. END OF TERM

In the Standard Form of Store Lease prepared by the Real Estate Board of New York (“Standard Board Lease”), Article 21, End of Term, is the relevant provision and it reads:

Upon expiration or other termination of the term of this lease, Tenant shall quit and surrender to Owner the demised premises, broom clean, in good order and condition, ordinary wear excepted, and Tenant shall remove all its property.

Straightforward, right? Think again. Tenant may ask its counsel:

- What does “broom clean” mean?
- What does in “good order and condition” mean? There’s a hole in one of the walls. Will that be a problem?
- I removed all my merchandise and furniture. Is that enough to satisfy “Tenant shall remove all its property”?

Each of these questions, to varying degrees, adds a level of uncertainty that the tenant must reckon with.

The phrase “broom clean” is probably the easiest and least risky condition with which to comply. Counsel may advise tenant to simply sweep the floors and clean off any surfaces before vacating. A landlord is also unlikely to pursue litigation based on a breach of this condition alone unless the premises is left in such a bad state that it requires significant expenditures to clean up.

The phrase “good order and condition” leaves a lot of room for interpretation. If we take the example above of the hole in the wall, counsel may ask tenant, “well how big is the hole?” Depending on the size, what the premises was used for and how the hole got there to begin with, tenant may well be on the hook for the cost of repairing the hole. A more salient question for our discussion, however, is, has the tenant satisfied the terms of the GG Guaranty by surrendering a premises that is arguably not in “good order and condition?”

In this scenario, the answer may well be “no,” in which case, the guarantor is not only also on the hook for repairing the hole, but is also on the hook for all future rent for failure to comply with the termination clause of the guaranty!

In other words, the landlord could argue that it has a complete guaranty for all future rent because of tenant’s failure to surrender the premises in “good order and condition” as required by the lease and the guaranty.

WAIVER ALERT! Remember the Freeman Foursome case discussed above: landlord can only keep guarantor on the hook for the default and future rent if, at the time of surrender, it expressly states to tenant that “I accept your surrender but reserve my rights under the Guaranty.”

Consider the phrase “tenant shall remove all its property.” If Tenant has removed its merchandise, furniture and otherwise disposed of all other waste in the premises is tenant’s work finished? Not necessarily. “Property” is a term of art and needs to be interpreted in conjunction with the lease’s definition of what constitutes “tenant’s property.”

[35.19] VI. ALTERATIONS AND FIXTURES

Under a Standard Real Estate Board Lease, if tenant is surrendering the premises, Article 3-Alterations, is implicated. It reads in pertinent part:

All fixtures and all paneling, partitions, railings and like installations, installed in the premises at any time, either by Tenant or by Owner on Tenant’s behalf, shall, upon installation, become the property of Owner and shall remain upon and be surrendered with the demised premises unless Owner, by notice to Tenant no later than twenty days prior to the date fixed as termination of the lease, elects to relinquish Owner’s rights thereto and to have them removed by Tenant, in which event, the same shall be removed from the premises by Tenant prior to the expiration of the lease, at Tenant’s expense.

Assume, for our purposes, that Tenant notifies Landlord that it will be terminating the lease early and vacating the premises in twenty days. Landlord accepts, reserving its rights under the guaranty against the guarantor, and also relinquishes title in certain fixtures and installations made by the Tenant and requires their removal at Tenant’s expense. If the tenant then vacates without removing the fixtures and installations, the guarantor has not complied with the guaranty's terms and once again could be liable for all future rent!

Depending on the tenant's business, Article 3 can become a quagmire to navigate because the following clause draws a distinction between the fixtures just described, and "trade fixtures". Under Article 3, the Landlord cannot take title to "trade fixtures" and Tenant must remove them from the premises at surrender, restoring the premises to the condition existing prior to the installation. A typical scenario where this comes up is a tenant who runs a restaurant business. We will explore this distinction further when we discuss liens and encumbrances. For the time being, it is simply worth highlighting "trade fixtures" as another issue that tenant's counsel should consider when its clients are planning an early termination of the lease.

[35.20] VII. NOTICE REQUIREMENTS

EXAMPLE 4:

Guaranty

In order to induce _____, a New York limited liability company, as landlord ("Landlord"), to enter into a lease bearing even date herewith with _____ a New York limited liability company, as tenant ("Tenant"), in the form and upon the terms of the lease hereto annexed ("Lease") for premises described as _____ (the "Premises") in the building known as _____ having an address at _____ ("Guarantor"), hereby represents, guarantees and agrees with Landlord as follows:

- (1) Guarantor is a member of Tenant.
- (2) Until the date upon which Tenant delivers possession of the Premises to Landlord, together with the keys to said Premises, vacant (except the Tenant's Improvements), free of all tenancies and occupants (other than Landlord or Landlord's designee pursuant to Article 11 of the Lease), in the condition required pursuant to the terms of the Lease, and confirms its surrender of the Premises pursuant to a (Blumberg form of) surrender agreement via fax whether such delivery of possession and confirmation shall be before or after the occurrence of a default under the Lease, Guarantor hereby guarantees to Landlord:

(a) the payment of any and all costs and expenses, (including, but not limited to, reasonable counsel fees) that are incurred by Landlord in connection with the enforcement of the terms and provisions of the Lease or the exercising of any remedy thereunder or at law or in equity as against Tenant, or with respect to any action or proceeding by Landlord to obtain or attempt to obtain possession of the Premises; and

(b) the payment of minimum rent as defined in Section 3.01(a) of the Lease, additional rent as set forth in Article 22 of the Lease and any all sums for which Tenant may be liable under the Lease, and/or for use and occupancy following a termination of the Lease, as the case may be.

- (3) This Guaranty is primary, absolute and unconditional, except as herein expressly provided, and shall not be discharged, mitigated, or affected by (i) any modification of the Lease; (ii) any failure of Landlord to enforce any of the provisions of the Lease or by any extension of time or indulgence extended by Landlord to Tenant thereunder; (iii) any defense available to Tenant or Guarantor; or (iv) any invalidity or unenforceability of all or any portion of the Lease; and Guarantor hereby consents to all of the foregoing without notice to Guarantor, and Guarantor's liability shall extend to the Lease as so modified or extended.

The structure of the Example 4 GG Guaranty may seem convoluted but it is, in essence, as simple as the basic GG Guaranty discussed earlier, i.e. the guarantor's liability is terminated upon surrender of the premises in the condition required pursuant to the terms of the Lease, plus one additional wrinkle:

. . . and confirms its surrender of the Premises pursuant to a (Blumberg form of) surrender agreement via fax. . .

Read in its entirety, ¶ 2 of this guaranty essentially states that the guarantor shall remain liable for the tenant's obligations under the Lease until the date that tenant surrenders the premises in the condition required by the Lease AND confirms the surrender pursuant to a Blumberg form of surrender via fax.

What if Tenant terminates the lease early, surrenders the premises, and confirms the surrender by certified mail? Does the guarantor avoid liability? Technically, no. Terms of a guaranty are strictly construed by the court.⁷ Where the guaranty provides for a method of notice, guarantors who fail to comply with such provisions have been held liable for future rent under the lease.⁸

Of course, it is worth reiterating that landlord should always expressly reserve its rights under the GG Guaranty at the time of surrender if it hopes to prosecute claims arising from a failure to comply with its terms!⁹

[35.21] VIII. ADVANCE NOTICE REQUIREMENTS

Many GG Guaranties require, among a host of other conditions, advance notice of a tenant's intent to terminate the lease early and surrender the premises, in order to terminate the guarantor's liability.¹⁰ The interpretation of the terms of the Good Guy clause are a question of law for the Court, which accords those terms their plain and ordinary meaning.

EXAMPLE 5:

(H) The obligations of Guarantor under this Guaranty shall be limited to the period of time commencing on the date hereof and ending on the date Tenant has surrendered possession of the Premises in vacant and broom clean condition, free of all tenancies and occupants, on the condition that all of the following have occurred (i) at the time of such surrender, all Fixed Annual and Monetary Additional Rental (but not accelerated rent) due under the Lease have been paid to Landlord up to the later of (a) the time of surrender, or (b) the end of the sixty (60) day period set forth in subsection (ii) below, and (ii) Landlord has received at least sixty (60) days written notice from Tenant of Tenant's intent to vacate the Premises and Tenant has vacated the Premises on or before the date for delivery of possession to Landlord set forth by Tenant in such notice, and (iii) Tenant has forfeited to Landlord its Security Deposit under the Lease in the amount set forth in Article 31 of the Lease.

10 See Fairchild Warehouse Associates, LLC v. Water Chef, Inc., 2014 WL 12639275 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 2014) (“[Guarantor’s] arguments are unavailing in light of the unambiguous language in the Guaranty. The Good Guy clause required tenant give landlord two month’s notice prior to the vacancy date. Tenant gave landlord less than 30 days notice. The rent was in arrears ($72,000) when tenant vacated the premises. Tenant was given timely Notice of Default to allow a cure of the arrears. Since the defendants have failed to satisfy the relevant conditions of the Good Guy clause, the limitation of liability set forth in the Good Guy clause is unavailable to Lazar. The guarantor is liable for damages for the full term of the lease, as it is undisputed that the conditions in the Good Guy clause were never satisfied [citations omitted].”)

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, Guarantor has duly executed and delivered this Guaranty as of the date first above written.

In the above example, subsection (ii) lists as one of the required conditions that:

Landlord has received at least sixty (60) days written notice from Tenant of Tenant’s intent to vacate the Premises and Tenant has vacated the Premises on or before the date of delivery of possession to Landlord set forth by Tenant in such notice . . .

This clause has a dual effect. First, if Tenant fails to give at least 60 days written notice by either giving less than 60 days’ notice, OR gives sufficient notice but orally rather than in writing, then the condition is left unsatisfied and guarantor remains liable under the lease for past and future rent owed. Second, the effect of requiring 60 days advance notice of a tenant’s intent to surrender the premises functions as an additional two months of security. If the notice period was 180 days, it would an additional 6 months of security. Remember, in a basic GG Guaranty, guarantor’s liability is cut off at the time of surrender. Here, the advance notice requirement must be read in conjunction with the surrender provision, subsection (i):

. . . at the time of such surrender, all Fixed and Annual and Monetary Additional Rental [. . .] due under the Lease have been paid to Landlord up to the later of (a) the time of surrender, or (b) the end of the (60 day period set forth in subsection (ii) below. . .

By requiring the advance notice and also requiring that all fixed annual and additional rental be paid through the date of surrender or the end of the 60 day period, landlord has effectively tacked on two months that the guarantor will be liable for one way or another. Below are two scenarios to demonstrate how this plays out.

Scenario 1

Tenant gives 60 days written notice of its intent to surrender. Landlord accepts, reserving its rights under the GG

Guaranty. Tenant occupies the premises for the duration of the 60 days and vacates on the 60th day as per the notice. If guarantor wants to walk away from this with no personal liability for all obligations past and future, it must pay the rent due and owing for those two months in addition to any other arrearage.

Scenario 2

Tenant gives 60 days written notice of its intent to surrender. Landlord accepts, reserving its rights under the GG Guaranty, but tells Tenant that it can vacate and surrender even earlier than the 60th day. Any difference in what needs to happen for guarantor to satisfy the termination clause of the GG Guaranty? No! Read the language of subsection (i) carefully. It reads that all Fixed Annual and Monetary Additional Rental due under the lease must be paid to Landlord up to the later of (a) the time of surrender, or (b) the end of the sixty (60) day period.

One possible downside of drafting a GG Guaranty with an advance notice requirement is that it makes it harder to obtain a summary determination when enforcing a GG Guaranty.¹¹

[35.22] IX. LANDLORD'S ACCEPTANCE OF SURRENDER

It is absolutely critical that landlord reserves its rights under the guaranty even if it may seem that the tenant has complied with the advance notice requirement.

CERTIFIED MAIL

June 10, 2010

11 See Pajeot & Otter LLC v. Westbeth Entertainment LLC, 2016 WL 6125407 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 2016) (“Generally, a ‘good guy’ guaranty only holds the guarantor liable for rent and/or additional rent due prior to the tenant’s surrender of a commercial premises. In this case, the guarantor also agreed to provide specific notice of its intent to surrender the premises in accordance with the terms of the expired lease . . . The conflicting allegations regarding, inter alia, notice, payment of rent, condition of the premises etc., make this case unworthy of summary judgment.”).

Dear Guarantor,

We are in receipt of your letter dated May 27, 2010 regarding vacating the premises on August 31, 2010. The lease dated May 13, 2009 has an expiration date of May 31, 2016, and does not have an early termination clause. Your letter meets the requirements of the Personal Guaranty, however, XYZ Corp. will remain on the lease and be liable for all damages after vacating the premises.

Please be advised in order to ensure the tenancy has elevator service, the Landlord has instructed _____ to make any required repairs and maintain the present elevator. If a situation arises whereby the elevator needs to be manually operated, the Building will provide such personnel at no charge to the tenancy. You may contact _____ at the building office _____ the day prior to a delivery in order to schedule the manual operation, and give a follow up call approximately ten minutes prior to the actual arrival of the delivery to ensure the operator will be on site.

Also be advised the _____ elevator has undergone contractor solicitation for a completion modernization and/or renovation. The Landlord is taking your concern and complaints very seriously.

Sincerely,

Managing Agent on behalf of Landlord

In Example 6, the managing agent's letter was inadequate. It lacks language reserving its rights under the GG Guaranty.

Example 7:

Dear Guarantors:

Our firm has been retained by OWNER LLC ("Landlord") to handle all matters pertaining to the above-referenced Lease. We write to advise that on or about _____, 2010 (the "Surrender Date"), XYZ Company ("Tenant") surrendered possession of the Premises.

TAKE NOTICE that although the Landlords hereby acknowledge Tenant's surrender of possession only of the subject Premises, effective as of the Surrender Date, the Landlords do so expressly without prejudice to their rights under the Lease and pursuant to any and all applicable law. In particular, Landlords reserve the right to sue and collect damages, including but not limited to past and/or future rent that has or will become due under the Lease, as well as costs and attorneys' fees, for Tenant's untimely vacatur and breach of the Lease. Landlords also reserve the right to sue and collect damages under the Personal Guaranty dated _____ executed by John Doe and Jane Doe.

Without this language, landlord cannot seek all arrears and future rent against the guarantor.

[35.23] X. LIENS AND ENCUMBRANCES

By way of review, we first note that this GG Guaranty features a 180-day notice provision. Notice must be given at least 180 days before the intended date of surrender, and landlord effectively has six months of additional security as a result.

In addition to the notice period, the termination clause of this GG Guaranty requires tenant to deliver possession of the Premises [...] free from all liens and encumbrances.

EXAMPLE 8:

GUARANTY OF LEASE

1. In consideration of, and as an inducement for the granting, execution and delivery of a certain lease dated as of June 24, 2008 ("Lease"), by _____ landlord therein named ("Landlord," which term shall be deemed to include the named Landlord and its successors and assigns) to _____ tenant therein named ("Tenant," which term shall be deemed to include the named Tenant and its successors and assigns) for the premises located at _____ as more particularly described in the Lease ("Premises") and in further consideration of the sum of One ($1.00) Dollar and other good and valuable consideration paid by Landlord to the undersigned, the receipt and sufficiency of which are hereby acknowledged, the undersigned, _____ and _____ (collectively, "Guarantor" which term shall be deemed to include each named Guarantor and his successors and assigns), hereby guarantees, absolutely and unconditionally, to Landlord all of the obligations and liabilities of Tenant under the Lease arising or accruing at any time prior to the date that Tenant, on not less than one hundred eighty (180) days prior written notice to Landlord sent in accordance with the terms of the Lease, delivers possession of the Premises to Landlord, vacant and free of all tenancies and occupancies, free of all liens and encumbrances and otherwise in the condition required under the Lease, together with delivery to Landlord of the keys to the Premises and a letter from Tenant to Landlord stating that: “We have delivered possession to you of the premises located at _____ and leased to us pursuant to Lease dated as of June 24, 2008 in accordance with the terms of such Lease.” The date upon which such delivery of possession occurs in accordance with the provisions of the Lease and this Guaranty is referred to as the “Surrender Date.”

2. This Guaranty is absolute and unconditional. The liability of Guarantor is coextensive with that of Tenant and this Guaranty shall be enforceable against Guarantor without the necessity of any suit or proceeding on Landlord’s part of any kind or nature whatsoever against Tenant and without the necessity of any notice of nonpayment, nonperformance or nonobservance all of which Guarantor hereby expressly waives. Guarantor hereby expressly agrees that the validity of this Guaranty and the obligations of Guarantor hereunder shall in no way be terminated, affected, diminished or impaired by reason of (a) the assertion or the failure to assert by Landlord against Tenant of any of the rights or remedies reserved to Landlord pursuant to the terms, covenants and conditions of the Lease, or (b) any non-liability of Tenant under the Lease, whether by insolvency, discharge in bankruptcy, or any other defect or defense which may now or hereafter exist in favor of Tenant.
3. This Guaranty shall be a continuing Guaranty, and the liability of Guarantor hereunder shall in no way be affected, modified or diminished by reason of (a) any assignment, renewal, modification, amendment or extension of the Lease, (b) any modification or waiver of or change in any of the terms, covenants and conditions of the Lease, (c) any extension of time that may be granted by Landlord to Tenant, (d) any consent, release, indulgence or other action, inaction or omission under or in respect of the Lease, (e) any dealings or transactions or matter or thing occurring between Landlord and Tenant, or (f) any bankruptcy, insolvency, reorganization, liquidation, arrangement, assignment for the benefit of creditors, receivership, trusteeship or similar proceeding affecting Tenant, whether or not notice thereof or of any thereof is given to Guarantor.

One of the most common liens that may attach to a property is a mechanic's lien. A mechanic's lien is a security interest in the property belonging to someone who provided labor and/or materials to the tenant/landlord to improve the property.

A common scenario that gives rise to a mechanic's lien is when tenant contracts to have alterations made to the premises for its business purposes. Assume a dispute arises between tenant and the contractor resulting in tenant refusing to pay the entire amount invoiced by the contractor. Contractor feels it is entitled to the funds having completed the alteration and files a mechanic's lien with the County Clerk's office against the demised premises. Only months into its lease, tenant's business suffers and it seeks to terminate the tenancy and absolve the guarantor of liability. If tenant notifies landlord of its intention to surrender the premises complying with the notice period, but does nothing to discharge the lien, the GG Guaranty stays in effect and keeps guarantor on the hook for the entire term of the lease!

UCC liens are filed by vendors of equipment/merchandise and, are typically a security interest in the items that are leased or sold. This may lull tenants into a false sense of comfort that a UCC lien on, for example, a set of computers and sales equipment for a store, does not implicate the leased premises, and therefore need not be discharged prior to surrender.

The authors of these materials handled a case in which a restaurant leased space from the landlord and performed certain alterations to the space that included installation of kitchen equipment, sales systems and an HVAC system. Months after the restaurant opened its doors, it fell into financial turmoil, eventually falling behind on rent and seeking bankruptcy protection (we will discuss the effect of declaring bankruptcy later in this course using the same case study, however, for the purposes of our present discussion we focus solely on the lien dimension of the case).

The principal of the restaurant had financed the improvements to the premises using a loan from his sibling. The sibling secured the loan by filing a UCC lien against "all assets and personal property and fixtures of Debtor, of every description, whether now or hereafter existing or now or hereafter owned or acquired, wherever located."

This is what is known as a blanket lien because it can be construed to include among other things, fixtures that, by the lease's terms, belong to the landlord.

Recall our discussion about Article 3 of the Standard Board Lease. Earlier, we alluded to the distinction between those alterations that the landlord can elect to assume ownership of, and those characterized as "trade fixtures" which the tenant must remove at the expiration of a lease. Article 3 reads, in pertinent part:

Nothing in this article shall be construed to give Owner title to, or to prevent Tenant's removal of, trade fixtures, moveable office furniture and equipment, but upon removal of same from the demised premises or upon removal of other installations as may be required by Owner, Tenant shall immediately and at its expense, repair and restore the demised premises to the condition existing prior to any such installations, and repair any damage to the demised premises or the building due to such removal.

The natural follow-up question is, "What are trade fixtures?" There is no simple answer and you may have guessed by now that there is a whole body of case law interpreting this term in different contexts. For our purposes, it is enough to note that the distinction between those installations that the landlord may elect to assume ownership of, and those that are "trade fixtures" is vague enough to add to the uncertainty facing a tenant who wants to terminate the lease early and surrender the premises.

In this particular case, in addition to Article 3, the lease also had the following provision included in a Rider to the Lease:

At the expiration or sooner termination of the term of this Lease, except with respect to furniture, movable fixtures and equipment, and except as Landlord may elect otherwise under Article 3 hereof, all such installations and equipment made or installed by or for Tenant, including, without limitation, kitchen and HVAC equipment and duct work, shall be and become the property of Landlord and shall remain upon and be surrendered with the Demised Premises.

Reading these provisions together, a blanket UCC lien that purports to have a security interest in “all assets and personal property and fixtures of Debtor, of every description,” can cast enough of a cloud over the title to the premises to cause the tenant to be in default of a GG Guaranty’s provision requiring that the premises be free and clear of all liens or other encumbrances upon surrender, thus leaving the guarantor potentially liable for all future rent.

[35.26] XIII. RENT ABATEMENT AND CLAWBACK PROVISIONS

64. “GOOD GUY” GUARANTY

(a) Tenant represents that all of its corporate stock is owned by the shareholders whose names, residence addresses, social security number (or tax identification numbers) and signatures are set forth in Schedule B annexed hereto and made a part hereof. Tenant further represents that the shareholders referred to in said Schedule B are all of the shareholders of Tenant and that there are no other shareholders at the present time. In order to induce Landlord to enter into the lease and in consideration of Landlord’s entering into this lease, the individuals and entities set forth on said Schedule B (hereafter individually and collectively referred to as “Guarantor”) hereby guaranties, unconditionally and absolutely, to Landlord, its successors and assigns (without requiring any notice of nonpayment, nonperformance or nonobservance or proof of notice or demand whereby to charge Guarantor, all of which Guarantor hereby expressly waives), the payment as and when due of the fixed rent (which is sometimes referred to in this lease as the “annual rental rate”), payable by Tenant under Article 39 of the lease (hereinafter collectively referred to as “Tenant’s Monetary Obligations”). Notwithstanding the foregoing, Guarantor’s liability pursuant to this Article 64 (hereinafter sometimes referred to as the “Guaranty”) shall be limited to the sum of: (x) the payment of Tenant’s Monetary Obligations which accrue up to the date that is the last to occur of: (A) Tenant vacates the demised premises, (B) Tenant removes its property from the demised premises, and (C) Tenant delivers the key to Landlord.

First, it is important to note that this GG Guaranty appears in the lease itself and names the guarantors in a schedule annexed to the lease. This does not alter the legal effect of the GG Guaranty. Think Shakespeare: “A rose by any other name would smell as sweet.” If drafting a GG Guaranty clause within a lease and listing guarantors in an attached schedule, just go over our handy checklist discussed at the top of the chapter and make sure you include all the guarantor(s)' vital information that will be necessary to conduct due diligence on their credit worthiness or to enforce a judgment. And, of course, do not forget signatures (for each guarantor in their individual capacity)!

Second, by way of review, note that this is also a basic GG Guaranty where the guarantors' liability cuts off once the tenant perfects surrender of the premises to landlord, i.e. the last day that tenant vacates the premises, removes its property from the premises, and delivers the key to the landlord.

[35.27] A. Rent Abatements

Example 9 is included to highlight the interplay between a GG Guaranty and provisions in a lease that entitle tenant to rent abatements conditioned on the tenant's good standing.

It is not uncommon for leases to include incentives such as rent reductions or months of free rent, to encourage tenants to stay in good standing and remain current on payments.

In this particular case, the tenant had negotiated rent abatement via an amendment to the lease, for the month of January 2011 and two months' free rent for the months of February and March 2011, i.e. the last two months of the lease. The amendment read in pertinent part:

Notwithstanding anything contained in the Lease to the contrary, provided Tenant has made all payments required under this Lease no later than fifteen (15) days after such sums were due: (a) Tenant's monthly rent for the month of January, 2011 shall be reduced by $6,666.66, provided Tenant is not in default of a monetary obligation under the Lease and not in default of a nonmonetary obligation under the Lease beyond the expiration of any applicable notice and grace period as of January 1, 2011; (b) Tenant's monthly rent for the month of February, 2011 shall be reduced by $31,666.67, provided Tenant is not in default of a monetary obligation under the Lease and not in default of a nonmonetary obligation under the Lease beyond the expiration of any applicable notice and grace period as of February 1, 2011; and (c)

Tenant's monthly rent for the month of March, 2011 shall be reduced by $31,666.67, provided Tenant is not in default of a monetary obligation under the Lease and not in default of a nonmonetary obligation under the Lease beyond the expiration of any applicable notice and grace period as of March 1, 2011.

As the language clearly indicates, tenant was only entitled to the rent abatement in January if it had made all payments required by the lease within 15 days after such payments were due. Then, each month of free rent for February and March were also contingent on the tenant being current on monetary obligations and, not in default of nonmonetary obligations under the lease.

In this case, the tenant made a payment for January 2011 of $25,000 on January 10, 2011, citing the rent abatement as the reason for deducting $6,666.66 from the base rent of $31,666.67.

Landlord notified tenant that it was not entitled to the rent abatement as it had consistently made late rental payments beyond the prescribed 15th day of each month. It further noted that, for the same reason, tenant was also not entitled to the free rent in February and March of 2011.

Tenant failed to make its February payment and Landlord sued the guarantors under the guaranty clause of the lease.

Eventually, landlord was able to use the leverage of having the guarantors on the hook for a little over $70,000 in back-rent and electric charges, to extract a favorable settlement without ever going to trial.

Here, the effect of the GG Guaranty was to leave the landlord in a better position at the end of the tenancy than it may have originally predicted. Although tenant may have been current on all payments up through December 31, 2010, the fact that the payments were made chronically late, in violation of the rent abatement provision, was enough to trigger landlord's right to "clawback" the rent reduction in January and the free rent for February and March 2011. Moreover, landlord was able to accomplish this efficiently by capitalizing on the GG Guaranty's leverage against the principals.

In the preceding example, tenant received the free rent concession in the final two months of the term, if it had not made late payments up until that time. In other words, this was a condition precedent to receiving the rent concession at all. Landlord, up until that time, had not foregone any rent and could demand full payment of the two months if the tenant failed to comply with the condition and, as we learned, hold the guarantor liable.

Section 3.02. Notwithstanding the provisions of Section 3.01 hereof, and provided Tenant is not then in default hereunder after any applicable notice and expiration of any applicable cure period, Tenant shall be entitled to an abatement of part of the minimum rent only in the amount of $15,437.50 per month for each of the first, second, third, fourth, and fifth months following the Commencement Dates, provided that the balance of minimum rent of $1,385.42 for each month shall be due and payable. Tenant acknowledges that the consideration for the aforesaid abatement of minimum rent is Tenant's agreement to perform all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease on its part to be performed. Therefore, if Tenant shall be in default under any of the terms, covenants and conditions at any time, during the term hereof, the aggregate amount of all minimum rent that was abated shall immediately thereafter become due and payable by Tenant to Landlord. In the event of Tenant's failure to pay such aggregate amount to Landlord, Landlord shall be entitled to the same rights and remedies as in the event of tenant's default in the payment of minimum rent. Tenant shall be required to pay additional rent and all other sums from and after the Commencement Date.

In this example, the rent concession comes at the beginning of the lease term and it lasts for five months, totaling almost $78,000.

Assume that tenant's principal has signed a simple GG Guaranty guarantying the tenant's obligations up until the time of surrender. If tenant becomes unable to carry the lease to its full term and is forced to surrender, can the guarantor be held liable for the abatement amount in light of the following language in the lease? Yes. Recall that guarantors are liable to the full extent of tenant's obligations.

Tenant acknowledges that the consideration for the aforesaid abatement of minimum rent is Tenant's agreement to perform all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease on its part to be performed. Therefore, if Tenant shall be in default under any of the terms, covenants and conditions at any time, during the term hereof, the aggre- gate amount of all minimum rent that was abated shall immediately become due and payable by Tenant to Landlord.

If the tenant breaches the lease by terminating early, that default triggers the “clawback” of the rent concession given at the beginning of the term making tenant liable for the concession amount under the lease. Thus, landlord may pursue the guarantor for the concession amount.

[35.29] XIV. LEASE RENEWALS, EXTENSIONS AND MODIFICATIONS

The scenario we examine in this section is the following: landlord, tenant, and guarantor have already entered into a lease and a GG Guaranty, respectively. Subsequently the parties agree to another set of terms embodied in either a lease renewal or extension at the expiration of the term, or a lease modification, amending certain rights and obligations of the parties.

Query: Does the GG Guaranty still bind the guarantor? It depends.

The Presumption: Courts construe guaranties strictly in favor of private guarantors.¹² If a guaranty is silent as to its effect in light of a renewal or other subsequent agreement between the landlord and tenant, courts will not extend the guaranty’s enforceability beyond the original agreement.¹³

[35.30] XV. SURVIVAL CLAUSES

One way to ensure that the GG Guaranty still binds the guarantor after a subsequent agreement between the landlord and the tenant is to include a survival clause in the original GG Guaranty. We previewed this clause at the top of the course when we covered the anatomy of a GG Guaranty. The following is sample language for a survival clause in its entirety:

This Guaranty shall be a continuing Guaranty, and the liability of Guarantor hereunder shall in no way be affected, modified or diminished by reason of (a) any assignment, renewal, modification, amendment or extension of the Lease, or (b) any modification or waiver of or change in any terms, covenants and conditions of the Lease, or (c) any extension of time that may be granted by Landlord to Tenant, (d) any consent, release, indulgence or other action, inaction or omission under or in respect of the Lease, or (e) any dealings or transactions or matter or thing occurring between Landlord and Tenant, or (f) any bankruptcy, insolvency, reorganization, liquidation, arrangement, assignment for the benefit of creditors, receivership, trusteeship or similar proceeding affecting Tenant, whether or not notice thereof or of any thereof is given to Guarantor.

First, note that this is a harsh example of a survival clause because the guaranty even survives an assignment. From the guarantor's perspective, it does not want to be on the hook even after a new business (and presumably new principals), have taken over. Guarantor should negotiate that upon assignment, a suitable guarantor of equal or greater financial net worth assume the guaranty and release the original guarantor.

This survival clause errs on the safe side to say the least. The draftsman of this clause was clearly aware of the situations that can arise which may well defeat a GG Guaranty's survival clause because its language fails to contemplate the contingency at hand.

The following cases illustrate how (1) a survival clause can fail to keep the guarantor on the hook, and (2) how changes to material terms of a lease may require a showing that guarantor consented to the changes.

[35.31] A. New Agreement

In these cases, the operative fact was that the guaranty's survival clause did not contemplate the kind of arrangement that the landlord and tenant's subsequent agreement embodied, i.e. the guaranty was inextricably tied to the original lease and its terms.

Where a guaranty executed in 2000 stated that it would "remain and continue in full force and effect as to any renewal, change or extension of the Lease," the language was held not to cover an "extension agreement" between landlord and tenant that, inter alia, (1) specifically referred to the 2000 lease as "expired" and, (2) materially altered the terms of the 2000 lease by increasing rent for the tenant, and thus, increasing the risk for the guarantor without his consent.¹⁴

Where a guaranty stated that it would “remain and continue in full force and effect as to any renewal, change or extension of the Lease,” and tenant stayed on as a month-to-month tenant after the expiration of the term, the court held that the guaranty no longer applied, because there hadn’t been a renewal or extension of the lease.¹⁵

[35.32] B. Material Terms of the Original Lease Have Changed

A creditor (landlord) and debtor (tenant) cannot materially alter the terms of an agreement that a surety (guarantor) is bound to without the surety’s (guarantor’s) consent.

Where a modification agreement increased rent, which was a material term, but guarantor could not make a prima facie showing that it did not consent to modification, summary judgment dismissing counts against guarantor was not warranted.¹⁶

Where a lease renewal agreement changed a material term of the lease by granting landlord a right to terminate the lease unilaterally, without qualification, in the event of a use violation placed on the premises, the guarantors were discharged of their obligation because they had not consented to the change in their individual capacity.¹⁷

[35.33] XVI.WAIVER OF NOTICE OR RATIFICATION

There are two ways to avoid the issue of showing that a guarantor consented to a “material” change in a lease modification, renewal, or extension.

[35.34] A. Guarantor Waives Notice

Where the original guaranty includes a provision in which guarantor expressly waives his right to receive notice of changes to the lease, the Lerner*, 75 A.D.3d 481, 906 N.Y.S.2d 36 (1st Dep’t 2010) (reversing trial court’s grant of summary judgment to plaintiff and remanding for trial, where a guarantor did not sign the second guaranty executed with a lease extension and issue of fact remained as to whether he consented).

guaranty is not extinguished simply because material changes to the lease were made without giving notice to the guarantor.¹⁸

[35.35] B. Ratification of Guaranty

Where guarantors execute a ratification or reaffirmation of the guaranty and acknowledge their assent to any material changes in the terms of the original contract, courts will hold guarantors liable.¹⁹

EXAMPLE 11:

RATIFICATION AND CONFIRMATION OF GUARANTY

By signing below, _____ and _____ (jointly and severally, “Guarantors”) (i) ratify and confirm all of the terms and conditions of that certain “Good Guy” Guaranty dated as of June 17, 2005 (the “Guaranty”) from Guarantors to _____ (“Landlord”) guaranteeing unto Landlord the payment by _____ and _____ (“Tenant”) of all the terms, covenants and conditions of that certain Agreement of Lease dated as of June 17, 2005 (the “Lease”), and (ii) acknowledge and agree that the Guaranty of the Lease, as amended by this Agreement, remains in full force and effect.

GUARANTORS:

PRACTICE TIP: The best practice is to have the guarantor(s) sign a ratification of the guaranty anytime the underlying agreement is in anyway modified, renewed, or extended irrespective of whether you may consider the change to be a “material” term.

[35.36] C. Continuing the Guarantor Relationship

Someone who seemed to be a solid guarantor at the inception of a lease may later fall into insolvency for any number of reasons. E.g. halfway through a five year contract term, if the guarantor faces litigation and is subject to a $1.5 million money judgment that wipes out its assets, obligee will be left holding the bag if the guarantor’s business is the next thing to fold. In that case, you may decide that you will only continue the relationship if the guarantor posts additional security or obtains a letter of credit from a bank.

[35.37] XVII. WITHDRAWING FROM A GG GUARANTY

Sometimes GG Guaranties signed by multiple partners or shareholders allow for withdrawal of such guarantors as they withdraw from the business. Example 12 demonstrates how a small restaurant with four partners was handled for purposes of the GG Guaranty.

EXAMPLE 12:

15. Notwithstanding anything in this Guaranty to the contrary, (a) if (i) any individual constituting Guarantor shall transfer his membership interest in Tenant to any other individual constituting Guarantor, (ii) the aggregate net worth of the remaining guarantors equals or exceeds $1,000,000 and (iii) Tenant is not then in default under the Lease, then the transferor will be released from all obligations under this Guaranty; and (b) if (i) any individual constituting Guarantor shall transfer his membership interest in Tenant to a third party, (ii) either (x) such transfer does not require Landlord's consent under the Lease or (y) such transfer does require Landlord's consent and Landlord has consented thereto, (iii) the transferee executes, acknowledges and delivers to Landlord a guaranty in the form of this Guaranty, and (iv) the aggregate net worth of the remaining original guarantors and the new guarantor equals or exceeds $1,000,000, then the transferor will be released from all obligations under this Guaranty.

Next, we examine, in detail, a case where the court considered whether two of the four partners in a law firm were properly withdrawn from a GG guaranty. *150 Broadway N.Y. Assocs., L.P. v. Shandell*²⁰ concerned a law firm tenant. The law firm was a partnership of four lawyers. The GG Guaranty was signed by all the partners. There was a provision whereby partners could bail out of the guaranty if they bailed out of the partnership. The GG guaranty stated:

In order to induce Owner to enter into this Lease and in consideration of Owner's entering into this Lease, the four (4) individuals executing this lease rider at the foot hereof (hereinafter, collectively, referred to as “Guaranty”) hereby guaranties, unconditionally and absolutely, to Owner, its successors and assigns (without requiring any notice of nonpayment, nonkeeping, nonperformance or nonobservance or proof of notice or demand whereby to charge Guarantor, all of which Guarantor hereby expressly waives) . . . (the payment as and when due of the Fixed Annual Rent, Additional Rent, charges and damages payable by Tenant under the Lease) . . . up to the date that Tenant vacates the demised premises and removes its property therefore, delivers the key to Owner and gives written notice to Owner that it is surrendering possession of the premises.

(i) Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this Good Guy Guaranty, in the event that any Guarantor (1) fully withdraws as a partner from the limited liability partnership which is the tenant under this Lease (hereinafter referred to as the “LLP”) and (2) physically vacates the Demised Premises, except that such Guarantor may remain associated with the LLP as “of counsel” and in connection therewith may utilize a small portion of the Demised Premises and further provided that all Fixed Annual Rent, Additional Rent and other charges due and payable under the lease by the Tenant is then current, and if proof satisfactory to the Owner which shall include a signed statement by the LLP and each other Guarantor of the within lease certifying that the that both of the foregoing events described in items (1) and (2) of this subparagraph have occurred, then such withdrawing Guarantor shall be released and discharged from his guaranty of this Lease. Such release shall not have any effect upon the Guaranty of each other Guarantor hereunder which shall remain in full force and effect.”

Two of the partners withdrew from the partnership and attempted to get out of the guaranty by sending the above-described notices. The landlord rejected the notices, on the basis that there were rent arrears at the time of the withdrawal notices.

Tenant argued that only the current month’s rent was due at the time their respective withdrawal notices were sent. One notice was dated January 23, 2006, at which point January 2006 rent had not yet been paid (tenant was otherwise current). The rent was, however, paid in full by January 30, 2006.

The court found for the withdrawing tenant guarantors, stating:

The interpretation of the guaranty that plaintiff urges the court to accept, that a guarantor cannot be released from his or her guaranty the day the notice is tendered, because the current month's rent is paid several days or weeks later, allows the owner unfettered discretion on when to cash any payments that the tenant makes. Theoretically, this would eviscerate a guarantor's express right to terminate the guaranty when s/he notifies the owner in good faith that s/he has withdrawn from the law firm as partner. This was clearly not the underlying intention of the lease provision at bar. Under the guaranty, each guarantor waived notice of any rent arrears the tenant might have. The guarantors did not, however, waive the right to notice that their individual withdrawal notices were rejected as inadequate or deficient by the owner. Therefore, when Shandell sent his notice of withdrawal it was up to the landlord to either notify him it was satisfactory or unsatisfactory. The landlord did not tell Shandell there were rent arrears or that his notice was rejected for that reason. Instead, the landlord played coy and had its attorney send an obtuse letter which avoids this issue altogether.

[35.38] XVIII. BANKRUPTCY & GG GUARANTIES

This section focuses on the effect bankruptcy has on a landlord's ability to proceed against the guarantor to recover rent and other damages arising from the tenant's default under the lease.

Specifically, we are examining the scenario where a business/tenant files a petition in federal bankruptcy court, thereby invoking the protection of the "automatic stay" under the Bankruptcy Code that stays all pending actions against the debtor-business, and the debtor proceeds, either with liquidation under Chapter 7, or reorganization under Chapter 11.

Below the question is addresses of whether the landlord proceed directly against the guarantor/principal of the business who guaranteed the tenant's obligations under the lease

Title 11 of the United States Code (“Bankruptcy Code”) governs proceedings in federal bankruptcy court.

Bankruptcy Code § 362 provides that a bankruptcy petition “operates as a stay, applicable to all entities,” of the commencement or continuation of judicial proceedings against the debtor.²¹

Thus, under § 362 of the code, a landlord SHOULD NOT attempt to evict, or otherwise pursue judicial relief against, a tenant who has filed for bankruptcy.

The landlord will likely know that a tenant has filed for bankruptcy. When the debtor files for bankruptcy, creditors who are listed by the debtor on its schedules, receive notice of the filing. However, under § 362 of the Code, the petition’s filing itself triggers the automatic stay and Landlord is immediately restrained from pursuing ANY claims against the tenant, including seeking eviction, and would be well advised to consult with its attorney before serving any kind of notice or correspondence on the tenant in connection with defaults under the lease.

Section 362 of the Bankruptcy Code imposes an automatic stay upon the filing of a bankruptcy petition, prohibiting, inter alia, “any act to obtain possession of property of the estate or of property from the estate or to exercise control over property of the estate.”²²

Section 362 further provides that “an individual injured by any willful violation of a stay provided by this section shall recover actual damages, including costs and attorneys’ fees, and, in appropriate circumstances, may recover punitive damages.”²³

For the purposes of § 362(k), “willful” means “any deliberate act taken in violation of a stay, which the violator knows to be in existence.”²⁴

24 In re Crysen/Montenay Energy Co., 902 F.2d 1098, 1105, 902 F.2d 1098 (2d Cir. 1990).

In other words, specific intent to violate the stay is not required; instead, “general intent in taking actions which have the effect of violating the automatic stay” is sufficient to warrant damages.”²⁵

In a typical landlord-tenant scenario, the debtor is usually a business, i.e., a corporate entity. The debtor’s “estate” is comprised of the debtor’s assets, including, among other things, real and personal property.

Thus, formally speaking, the guarantor is distinct from the debtor and the debtor’s estate. However, given the state of the law, merely relying on a formal distinction to go after the guarantor for tenant’s defaults under the lease would be ill advised.

Landlord’s counsel should instead recommend to the client that a safer way of pursuing the guarantor may be to file a motion in bankruptcy court seeking a declaration that the guarantor is not protected by the stay, or, in the alternative, a lift of the automatic stay to go after the guarantor if landlord’s interest is not “adequately protected.”

[35.40] B. Landlord’s Motion In Bankruptcy Court

As with any motion, you should know the court’s standards and consider the likelihood of success in light of the associated litigation costs and potential recovery for the client.

[35.41] 1. The Standard for Proceeding Against Guarantor

It is axiomatic that stays pursuant to § 362(a) “are limited to debtors and do not encompass non-bankrupt co-defendants.”²⁶

Thus, a plenary action against a good-guy guarantor of a bankrupt entity falls outside the protection of the stay.²⁷

26 Teachers Ins. and Annuity Ass’n of America v. Butler, 803 F.2d 61, 65 (2d Cir. 1986) (declining to extend stay to non-bankrupt general partners); see also Fortier v. Dona Anna Plaza Partners, 747 F.2d 1324, 1329-30 (10th Cir. 1984) (“The language of [sec. 362] extends stay proceedings only to actions ‘against the debtor.’”).

27 Live Nation Worldwide, Inc. v. GTA, Inc., 2007 WL 1489761, at *4 (S.D.N.Y. May 18, 2007) (“Notwithstanding the initiation of a primary obligor’s bankruptcy proceeding and the resulting automatic stay, a creditor may bring a debt collection against a guarantor in accordance with the guaranty’s venue provision.”); Conti v. Blau, 234 B.R. 627, 628 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) (holding that stay did not prevent hearing to proceed against general partners to determine whether employees committed malpractice).

The rationale behind this prohibition is that creditors obtain “the protection they sought and received when they required a third party to guaranty the debt.”²⁸

However, a Court can extend the stay to a non-bankrupt party such as a guarantor in certain limited circumstances where it can be shown that such party is essential to any reorganizational effort.²⁹

In cases involving small businesses like restaurants or retail outfits involving one or two principals, this exception may apply and extend the stay to the principal-guarantors.

PRACTICE POINTER: On one hand, the presumption is that guarantor/non-debtors are fair game as far as the Bankruptcy Code is concerned. The creditor bargained for a security blanket in the form of a GG Guaranty, and bankruptcy law honors that agreement.

On the other hand, assume for argument’s sake, that you do go after the guarantor(s), confident that no bankruptcy court would extend the stay to protect them.

Assuming the guarantor/tenant is represented by competent counsel, he or she might file a motion in bankruptcy court seeking to extend the stay to the guarantor.

If counsel is particularly aggressive, they may even seek a declaratory judgment finding that landlord violated the automatic stay and is now liable for attorneys’ fees associated with the motion. However, given the presumption in favor of limiting the stay to cover the debtor, a bankruptcy court is unlikely to grant the relief.

In any case, you see where we ended up?—right back in bankruptcy court while our clever motion for summary judgment in lieu of complaint is stalled by the pending bankruptcy motion. So instead of a shortcut, this tactic ended up being a detour which resulted in the client having to pay for both the state court papers AND the briefing associated with defending against the guarantor's bankruptcy motion.

You will also have a very disgruntled client on your hands after you explain why you were bounced back to bankruptcy court. Therefore, the most prudent course that would be beyond reproach would be to file a motion in bankruptcy court seeking a declaration that the stay does not apply to the guarantor in order to allow an action on the guaranty to proceed in state court uninhibited.

[35.42] 2. The Standard for Getting Relief From The Stay

Whether landlord's counsel opts for the aggressive tack we just played out or decides to file a motion in bankruptcy court seeking its blessing to go after the guarantor, there is a possibility that the court will find that the automatic stay should apply to the guarantor for one of the two limited exceptions developed in the case law we discussed; namely

- guarantor is essential to any reorganizational effort; or,
- there is such an identity between debtor and the guarantor that a judgment against guarantor would be like a judgment against the debtor.

Should this happen, landlord's counsel has one last resort—Bankruptcy Code § 362(d). It reads, in pertinent part:

On request of a party in interest and after notice and a hearing, the court shall grant relief from the stay provided under subsection (a) of this section, such as by terminating, annulling, modifying, or conditioning such stay—

(1) for cause, including the lack of adequate protection of an interest in property of such party in interest....³⁰

Under this provision the court has broad discretion to tailor a remedy that protects landlord's interest while allowing the debtor to reorganize.

Indicative of the court's inherent discretion is the fact that Congress did not provide any guidance as to what constitutes "cause" under the statute. Thus, the courts developed their own methodology examining a variety of factors to arrive at what may constitute adequate "cause" to lift the stay.

The test adopted by the Second Circuit originates from *In re Sonnax Industries, Inc.*³¹ Other circuits follow similar tests but counsel should always conform the analysis to the appropriate jurisdiction's methodology.

In Sonnax, the Court identified twelve factors that bankruptcy courts in the Second Circuit have come to use as guideposts in determining whether sufficient cause exists to grant relief from the automatic stay:

- (1) whether relief would result in a partial or complete resolution of the issues;
- (2) lack of any connection with or interference with the bankruptcy case;
- (3) whether the other proceeding involves the debtor as a fiduciary;
- (4) whether a specialized tribunal with the necessary expertise has been established to hear the cause of action;
- (5) whether the debtor's insurer has assumed full responsibility for defending it;
- (6) whether the action primarily involves third parties;
- (7) whether litigation in another forum would prejudice the interests of other creditors;
- (8) whether the judgment claim arising from the other action is subject to equitable subordination;
- (9) whether movant's success in the other proceeding would result in a judicial lien avoidable by the debtor;
- (10) the interests of judicial economy and the expeditious and economical resolution of litigation;
- (11) whether the parties are ready for trial in the other proceeding; and
- (12) the impact of the stay on the parties and the balance of harms.³²

³¹ 907 F.2d 1280, 1285 (2d. Cir. 1990).

³² Id. at 1286.

In the landlord-tenant context, bankruptcy courts have weighed the above factors and found sufficient cause to lift the automatic stay when:

- the debtor has filed a bankruptcy petition on the eve of trial or an eviction;
- remained delinquent in its obligations to pay rent;
- failed to provide adequate assurances to landlord, and
- paid no post-petition rent or otherwise indicated that it can make the landlord whole.³³

[35.43] XIX. EXAMPLES

To highlight the major themes that guided our discussion during this chapter, we offer two final GG Guaranty examples.

[35.44] A. Tenant Friendly GG Guaranty

The first is extremely tenant-friendly, to a fault, if you are the landlord.

EXAMPLE 13:

ANYTHING HEREIN TO THE CONTRARY NOTWITHSTANDING, this guarantee shall not extend to any obligations incurred by Tenant or Guarantor under the lease either:

1. After the date Tenant vacates the demised premises, removed all of its personal property therefrom and then offers to deliver possession of said premises to the Landlord, or ³³ See, e.g., In re Burger Boys, Inc., 183 B.R. 682, 688 (S.D.N.Y. 1994) (affirming bankruptcy court's lift of the automatic stay where Chapter 11 petition was filed by tenant on the eve of a civil court summary eviction proceeding and where the bankruptcy court found that the issues would be more expeditiously resolved in the state forum); Zagata Fabricators, Inc. v. Superior Air Products, 893 F.2d 624, 628 (3d Cir. 1990) (holding that bankruptcy court erred in denying landlord relief under Section 362 (d) and allowing it to pursue state law remedies where debtor remained in possession of landlord's premises but failed to pay rent, stating that "no authority of which this court is aware provides support for the extraordinary remedy granted here, namely, possession free of charge"); In re Rocchio, 125 B.R. 345, 347 (Bankr. D. R.I. 1991) ("[t]he Debtor's failure to pay postpetition rent, together with a total absence of evidence that they [sic] will: (1) cure the default, (2) provide adequate protection, or (3) give adequate assurance of future performance, all violate clear requirements of § 365(d)(3), and we hold that said violations (individually and cumulatively) constitute 'cause' under § 362(d)(1) to lift the stay.").

2. Upon tenant assigning this lease or subletting the premises, provided however that the principal officer and such assignee or subtenant assumes the responsibility of the Guarantor hereunder.

Subparagraph 1 looks standard. Read together with the preamble, this means the guarantor will be relieved of liability upon vacatur (including removal of personal property) and surrender of the premises.

The next clause, however, is troubling if you are the landlord. It reads that the guaranty shall not extend to obligations incurred if:

Upon tenant assigning this lease or subletting the premises, provided however that the principal officer and such assignee or subtenant assumes the responsibility of the Guarantor hereunder.

Sounds reasonable right? NO! Under this clause, a tenant-guarantor could literally assign the lease or sublet it to anybody who would sign a piece of paper irrespective of whether he is a creditworthy person who would actually have the assets to collect against in the event of a default. There might as well not be a guaranty!

Example 13 highlights, by way of contrast, the primary concern of landlord—to make it as difficult as possible for tenant and the guarantor to walk away from the lease by ensuring a level of security in terms of cash and uncertainty for tenant in terms of how to terminate early while relieving guarantor of personal liability.

[35.45] B. Landlord Friendly GG Guaranty

EXAMPLE 14:

SCHEDULE B

Guaranty

In order to induce _____ a New York limited liability company, as landlord (“Landlord”) to enter into a certain lease dated July 7, 2011 (the “Lease”) with _____ a New York corporation, as tenant (“Tenant”) for that certain premises in the lobby (the “Premises”) of the building located at _____ residing at _____ (“Guarantor”), hereby represents, guarantees and agrees with Landlord as follows:

1. Guarantor is a majority shareholder of Tenant.
2. Guarantor hereby unconditionally guarantees to Landlord the full, prompt and complete payment, performance, and observance of and compliance with all of the Tenant's obligations under the Lease, including, without limitation, the payment of the minimum rent and additional rent (including under Article 4 and Article 25 of the Lease) and all other charges and sums due and payable by Tenant under the Lease. Notwithstanding the foregoing, provided that (i) Tenant is not in default under the Lease, (ii) Tenant has paid to Landlord not less than twelve (12) consecutive months of the minimum rent, and (iii) after Tenant pays twelve (12) consecutive months of the minimum rents, Tenant then delivers to Landlord (in accordance with the notice requirements of the Lease) not less than nine (9) months prior written notice (the "Notice") that Tenant will surrender the Premises, and Tenant paying such minimum rent and then giving the Notice to Landlord thereafter surrenders the Premises to Landlord, together with the keys to the Premises, on the date set forth in the Notice, with the lien free completion of Tenant's Work to prepare the Premises for Tenant's occupancy and in accordance with Article 6 of the Lease, in vacant broom-clean condition, free of all subleases and occupants, in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Lease (the date upon which the Premises is so surrendered in accordance with the preceding is hereinafter referred to as the "Surrender Date"), then Guarantor's liability shall cease with respect to any further obligations under the Lease accruing after the Surrender Date. Anything to the contrary notwithstanding in the Lease and this Guaranty, in the event that Tenant delivers the Notice, then Tenant shall not be entitled to the return of the security deposit under the Lease and Landlord shall have the absolute right to retain the entire security deposit as fee without being required to apply the security deposit to any minimum rent, additional rent or any other changes.
3. This Guaranty is a primary, absolute and unconditional guaranty of payment and performance. This Guaranty shall not be discharged, mitigated, or affected by (i) any modification, renewal or extension of the Lease; (ii) any failure of Landlord to enforce any of the provisions of the Lease or by extension of time or indulgence extended by Landlord to Tenant thereunder; (iii) any defense available to Tenant or Guarantor; or (iv) any invalidity or unenforceability of any portion of the Lease; and Guarantor hereby consents to all of the foregoing without notice to Guarantor, and Guarantor's liability shall extend to the Lease as so modified, renewed or extended.

The Example 14 GG Guaranty piles on the protection for the landlord and leaves a lot for tenant and guarantor to worry about before they can terminate the relationship. The protections break out into the themes we have highlighted throughout this course:

[35.46] C. Additional Security for Landlord

This guaranty provides for a generous 9 months prior written notice which, as we discussed earlier, functions as 9 months' additional security on top of the security deposit.

Under subparagraph (ii) It also has a minimum rent clause. That is, tenant and guarantor cannot even consider terminating the lease early before tenant has paid 12 consecutive months of minimum rent if guarantor hopes to walk away with zero liability.

Finally, it explicitly states that if the tenant does choose to serve a notice indicating its intent to surrender the premises before expiration, landlord has an absolute right to retain the entire security deposit without being required to apply it towards minimum rent or any other charges.

In sum, landlord has secured at least as much as 21 months of rent from the tenant in addition to the amount it holds as a security deposit!

[35.47] D. Additional Uncertainty for Tenant

On top of the significant cushion this landlord was able to negotiate, this GG Guaranty also has all the elements we discussed that could trip up a tenant who is trying to terminate early:

- that written notice be provided at least 9 months prior to the surrender date.
- that surrender of the premises must be lien free with respect to tenant's work that was conducted to prepare the premises for its occupancy.
- that surrender of the premises should be in "vacant broom-clean condition" and "in accordance with the terms and conditions of the Lease."

[36.0] I. INTRODUCTION

“Should I stay or should I go?” – The monthly decision process of an uncreditworthy tenant, as immortalized by The Clash.¹

When an owner of commercial real property (“Landlord”) signs a lease with a space tenant (“Tenant”), Landlord will care a lot about Tenant’s creditworthiness. If Tenant doesn’t have strong credit, Landlord will have to hold its breath at least 12 times a year to see if Tenant has decided to stay, go or even try to stay but not pay rent. To bring more certainty to its cash flow, Landlord will often demand that someone more creditworthy than Tenant guaranty Tenant’s obligations. The guaranty could cover all Tenant obligations under the Lease (a “full” guaranty), or just some of them (a “partial” guaranty), or just Tenant’s obligations until Tenant surrenders the premises without a fight and pays rent until then (a “good guy” guaranty). A guaranty can also go away, either all at once or gradually, or have a cap on liability.

The following Model Lease Guaranty offers template language for the three main flavors of Guaranty, plus optional language for other particular circumstances or deal structures.

This Guaranty template started, once upon a time, as a “short-form” Guaranty, in contrast to a “long-form” Guaranty. Both appeared in the first and second editions of the New York State Bar Association Commercial Leasing treatise edited by the author. Over time the Guaranties converged into this one Guaranty. The “base” Guaranty omits optional and “overkill” provisions, making most available instead as options. And after footnote removal, the “base” version takes up only about four pages.

The “base” Guaranty consists of a full Guaranty of a Tenant’s obligations under a commercial lease (the “Lease”), to be signed at the same time as the Lease. The “base” Guaranty contains a reasonable set of Guarantor waivers—though one can always add more, such as from the optional provisions after the “base” Guaranty. Blank spaces, brackets and footnotes indicate blanks to fill, options, and issues to consider.

The optional provisions after the base Guaranty cover partial guaranties, good-guy guaranties, limited guaranties, representations and warranties, multiple or off-shore guarantors, bells, whistles and other long form (a.k.a. “overkill”) provisions that sometimes appear in Lease Guaranties.

These optional provisions can make any Lease Guaranty quite long. Some may matter in some transactions. More often they just add words. They are offered here for use as needed or desired. Few serious commercial Lease Guaranties will be shorter than the “base” form offered here, though this article offers two possibilities that are even shorter than the model Guaranty.

Landlord and its counsel typically fear a court will try very hard to find a way to not enforce any Guaranty. Why? Courts often seem to believe that any Guarantor is a “fool with a pen” who calls out for the court’s special sympathies and protection. In commercial transactions, that theory usually holds no water. Still, judges seem to have gone out of their way to invalidate or limit guaranties, particularly in California, less so in New York, with other states all over the lot.

Which party does this model Guaranty favor—Landlord or Guarantor? That’s a simple question with a complicated answer. A Guaranty is supposed to achieve a very simple result for Landlord: Guarantor stands behind Tenant’s obligations, so Landlord gets the benefit of Guarantor’s credit in addition to Tenant’s, all as if Guarantor had signed the Lease instead of, or in addition to, Tenant. That is a rather simple goal. To the extent the Guaranty achieves it, the Guaranty helps Landlord meet its expectations. Guarantor cannot complain.

The courts have, however, turned Guaranties into a complex minefield by giving Guarantors a panoply of defenses, some rather counterintuitive and exotic. Any or all of these defenses can interfere with Landlord’s achieving its reasonable expectations. The defenses “favor” Guarantor.²

Faced with apparently boundless judicial solicitude for Guarantors, any Landlord tries to level the playing field by requiring Guarantor to waive defenses. But those waivers sometimes go so far that Landlord achieves more than its reasonable goals. Instead, Landlord burdens Guarantor with obligations and procedural burdens that unnecessarily or inappropriately exceed Tenant’s. If a Guaranty does that, it unreasonably favors Landlord. This Guaranty seeks not to do that. Instead it limits the waivers to the minimum necessary to undo the damage done by the courts in their zeal to protect Guarantors.

2 For an introduction to them, see Joshua Stein and Elaine Wang, Revisiting the 24 Defenses of The Guarantor—24 Years Later, The Practical Real Estate Lawyer 9, January 2012.

A Guarantor should live with waivers that make Guarantor's position no worse than Tenant's, but reject waivers that put Guarantor in a worse position than if Guarantor had simply signed the lease itself. A careful Guarantor should also ask serious questions about the underlying Lease. Since Guarantor should end up with the same liability as if it had signed the Lease, Guarantor should care whether the Lease is a balanced document, reasonably negotiated for Tenant. A Lease defines a relationship far more complex than a Guaranty. Landlords want and usually achieve leases that favor Landlords, period. Guarantor will have to live with everything in the Lease. Rather than focus primarily on whether the Guaranty "favors" Landlord or Tenant, Guarantor should focus on the Lease itself. And, by delivering the extra credit support of a Guaranty, Tenant and Guarantor can in exchange sometimes obtain a more balanced Lease.

[36.1] II. GENERAL COMMENTS AND ISSUES TO CONSIDER

[36.2] A. Bankruptcy Risks

If a Guaranty covers all obligations under a Lease, this will increase the likelihood of a substantive consolidation if Tenant or Guarantor files bankruptcy. That risk terrifies securitized lenders to a point where its mitigation becomes a major obsession in the closing process. But it is a small price for Landlord to pay for the benefit of receiving credit support via the Guaranty. Some Landlords will worry about it anyway and, of course, any Lease or Guaranty (or other business transaction of any kind) could face special issues if any party to the transaction filed bankruptcy. Those issues lie beyond the scope of this model document, but Landlord's counsel should think about them in structuring and negotiating any Lease and Guaranty. Others have written about those issues at length.

[36.3] B. Bankruptcy Risks—Large Security Deposits

If Tenant delivers a security deposit or letter of credit that exceeds one year's rent, which doesn't happen all that often, and then files bankruptcy, the bankruptcy courts may force Landlord to "disgorge" part of the large security deposit or L/C proceeds. That result makes no sense given the independence principle underlying any L/C, but bankruptcy judges may care more about unsecured creditors than about the independence principle.

Landlord might protect itself, with or without a creditworthy Guarantor, by having Guarantor rather than Tenant deliver the large security deposit or L/C. The Guaranty becomes a mechanism to support an L/C or security deposit, even if the Guarantor has no credit at all. Having Guarantor rather than Tenant deliver the L/C or cash security should protect Landlord—although one can never guarantee anything in bankruptcy court. This model Guaranty does not offer special language for these circumstances, but the author can provide it on request. As is so often true in leasing, L/C's and bankruptcy, it is not as simple as it sounds.

[36.4] C. Completion Guaranties

This model Guaranty does not include sample language for a completion Guaranty. That type of Guaranty typically arises in ground leasing, not so much in ordinary commercial space leasing, and raises interesting and substantial questions about remedies and measures of damages. The author has a template for completion Guaranties, which is available on request and devotes some attention to the special issues that completion Guaranties create. It will appear in the second edition of the author's book on ground leases.³

[36.5] D. Conflicts of Interest

The interests of Guarantor and Tenant may conflict, yet the same counsel typically represents both. Counsel may want to disclose that conflict and obtain an informed waiver.

[36.6] E. Different Deals

One can readily adapt this Guaranty to become a “partial” Guaranty or a “good guy” Guaranty, depending on the business deal. For example, a “good guy” Guarantor's liability might continue until six months after Tenant has moved out and surrendered possession of the space, rather than immediately after those events have occurred. Or the Guaranty might cover the entire Lease for two years, and then only after a default-free two years does the Guaranty convert to a mere “good guy” Guaranty--though perhaps still covering claims and issues that accrued during those first two years. A Guaranty might also in some other way “burn off” over time or limit Guarantor's exposure in other ways. This represents a business negotiation to be resolved as part of the fundamental Lease deal, best documented as part of the letter of intent or term sheet and not left for future conversation. Optional provisions offered here can help document many possible business deals.

[36.7] F. Distributions

One could prohibit Guarantor from receiving distributions from Tenant when the Lease is in default. Such provisions rarely appear in Lease Guaranties, though, so are not offered here even as “overkill” options for the Guaranty. Nor would a Guaranty otherwise typically limit salary increases, bonuses, or other payments to Guarantor’s principals, but some lawyers might think of that.

[36.8] G. Due Diligence

For an entity Guarantor, Landlord should perform the same due diligence one would on a borrower or tenant—confirm its legal existence and exact name; obtain organizational documents, resolutions and consents; perhaps even obtain an opinion of counsel for, e.g., a foreign guarantor. Verify reputation and financial condition. Perform litigation search; general online searches; etc. For an individual person acting as Guarantor, check the Guarantor’s address. Confirm it’s a residence and not, for example, a vacant lot, motel or office building. Does Guarantor actually own it?

[36.9] H. Enforcement

For an offshore Guarantor, Landlord might consider having the Guaranty provide for arbitration rather than litigation if Landlord ever needs to enforce the Guaranty. Foreign courts are often more hospitable to arbitration awards than to American court judgments. Use of arbitration clauses in guaranties is, however, unusual and might create issues of inconsistency with Lease enforcement. On the other hand, the Guaranty allows Landlord to enforce the Guaranty without enforcing the Lease at all. Whether and exactly how to go down this road depends on the circumstances of a particular Guaranty, including the Guarantor’s home country. As a result, this model Guaranty does not offer arbitration language, but Landlord’s counsel should think about it and consult with arbitration experts. In the author’s experience, no arbitration expert ever likes the arbitration language crafted by any transactional lawyer.

[36.10] I. Full Recourse?

If the Guaranty covers less than all Lease obligations, consider adding language to create full liability for all Lease obligations if Guarantor or Tenant commits bad acts, such as frivolous litigation, or seeks a “Yellowstone” injunction⁴ (a New York procedure by which the tenant seeks to maintain the status quo)—much like the growth of nonrecourse carveouts in loan documents. This concept is, however, off market.

[36.11] J. Joinder by Spouse

For an individual Guarantor, consider requiring Guarantor’s spouse to join in the Guaranty to avoid problems with who owns which assets, particularly in community property states. In this case, include optional language offered here for multiple Guarantors. But also consider legal restrictions on requirements for spousal joinders.⁵

[36.12] K. Not So Good?

A “good-guy” Guaranty protects Guarantor but doesn’t help Tenant. Thus, if Tenant wants the right to move out before the Lease expires by paying rent until departure and satisfying some other conditions, Tenant might prefer to obtain a termination right in the Lease. This would allow Landlord to keep the security deposit and prepaid rent, and perhaps more, rather than structure the arrangement as a good-guy Guaranty. If Tenant has meaningful assets or anticipates it will want to stay in business at another location after “walking” from this Lease before expiration, then Tenant will not want Landlord to have a claim against Tenant. This is the reason for a termination option in the Lease (with the Lease backed by Guarantor until Tenant meets the conditions to termination, and terminates and moves out), instead of a simple “good-guy” Guaranty. Conversely, if the parties agree to a “good-guy” Guaranty, then Landlord will want to preserve its claims against the defaulting Tenant, even if Tenant has moved out and thus terminated Guarantor’s liability.

[36.13] L. Plain English

This Guaranty is written in plain English, to the extent reasonably possible. This means active voice sentences and short paragraphs. Ordinary

4 See First Nat’l Stores, Inc. v. Yellowstone Shopping Ctr., Inc., 21 N.Y.2d 630, 290 N.Y.S.2d 271, (1968).

5 See, e.g., 15 U.S.C. §§ 1691–1691(f); 12 C.F.R. § 292.7(d). States may have their own rules.

English words replace legalese where possible. After making a point, this Guaranty does not repeat the same point in different words. It never refers to section numbers. When this Guaranty must refer to a number, it does so only once. As a result of these and other plain English techniques, this Guaranty sometimes does not read like a typical legal document. A non-lawyer might read and actually understand it. And that's a good thing.

[36.14] M. Principal

This Guaranty assumes Guarantor is a principal of Tenant or otherwise owns or controls Tenant—or at least has some significant interest in Tenant's business—and is somewhat creditworthy. The client should of course confirm this. If Guarantor is no more creditworthy than Tenant, then this Guaranty may, in practice, add little value, except perhaps as a club to hold over Guarantor's head (or as a vehicle for a large security deposit or L/C, as discussed above). If Tenant's credit declines, however, and Guarantor's does not, this Guaranty may indeed have value.

[36.15] N. Security

If Landlord obtains security for Guarantor's obligations, this Guaranty may require changes. Any security arrangements will create their own issues, which: (a) will vary by state; and (b) this model Guaranty does not consider.

[36.16] III. CAVEATS

[36.17] A. Bad Dates

If the parties engage in a mad last-minute scramble to sign and exchange documents, inconsistencies may arise regarding dates. Those inconsistencies can allow a Guarantor to try to disclaim liability under the Guaranty if, for example, the Guaranty refers to the wrong date on the Lease. And if the Guaranty is dated after the Lease, it could raise issues on consideration. As the best practice, counsel should make sure all dates align. Because that might not happen, this Guaranty refers to a Lease dated "on or about" a certain date.

[36.18] B. Defined Terms

The "base case" Guaranty includes its own definitions for all capitalized terms. Check and adjust those definitions as appropriate. They should typically match the nomenclature and definitions in the Lease. Terms fundamentally important to the Guaranty, such as the "Guaranteed Obligations,” should be defined in the Guaranty, but the wording should match the Lease to the extent appropriate. For lesser definitions, one can refer to the Lease, which avoids the risk of inconsistencies if the parties negotiate the Lease definitions but don’t conform the Guaranty. After the “base case” Guaranty, optional language offered here does not always include all necessary definitions. In any case, check that every capitalized term is defined somewhere, or adjust it to match the structure of definitions in the Lease. As a matter of preference, one might want to move definitions in the Guaranty to an Exhibit, so the reader doesn’t have to wade through them before reaching the Guaranty’s operative language. On the other hand, this Guaranty doesn’t have that many definitions to wade through.

[36.19] C. State-Specific Provisions

This Guaranty assumes New York law governs. New York has no special state-specific provisions that must or should appear in a Guaranty except as this paragraph notes. In any other state, check for state-specific waivers or provisions. For example, use in California would require waivers of specified statutory or even constitutional provisions, sometimes in all capital letters, which may look very fierce but typically just impede comprehension and overwhelm the reader—assuming anyone actually tries to read them. Other states have other requirements. Also consider adding language driven by Guarantor’s home state or other jurisdiction, even if the law of that state or other jurisdiction does not otherwise govern the Guaranty, because Landlord might choose to enforce the Guaranty there. As a New-York-specific provision, optional language for this Guaranty does require Guarantor to acknowledge that the Guaranty is an instrument for the payment of money only. This might give Landlord some benefits under Civil Practice Law and Rules 3213, but those benefits come with issues. The Guaranty does not strictly need to refer to 3213. If the Guaranty covers performance rather than payment, one may wish to delete the reference to 3213, though keeping it probably does no harm. Landlord may choose not to rely on this language. The optional provisions also include some language seeking confidentiality and speed in any action to enforce this Guaranty. Those are generic but not yet market standard.

[36.20] IV. SHORTER-THAN-SHORT

If this model Lease Guaranty does not seem short enough, one could take an entirely different approach and try to distill the essence of a lease guaranty into just a few paragraphs. As an exercise in comparative law, here is how a “shorter-than-short” lease guaranty might look. This was designed for use in residential leasing outside New York City. No representation or warranty is made on the efficacy of this “shorter-than-short” lease guaranty, particularly in New York City.

1. Guarantied Obligations. Guarantor unconditionally and irrevocably guarantees to Owner that Resident shall perform and observe all its obligations under the Lease, or arising by law from Resident’s occupancy of the Premises, including Resident’s obligations to pay rent and do everything else the Lease or law requires (collectively, the “Guarantied Obligations”). Resident’s bankruptcy or other proceeding shall not reduce, limit or discharge the Guarantied Obligations.
2. Nature of Liability. Guarantor shall be equally and primarily liable with Resident for all Guarantied Obligations as if Guarantor had signed the Lease. Owner can sue Guarantor directly without suing Resident or applying security to cure a default. This Guaranty remains in full force and effect even if the Lease is assigned, changed, extended or renewed in any way, with or without Owner’s or Guarantor’s consent; Owner makes a claim against Guarantor or Resident; or Resident leaves.
3. Waivers. Guarantor waives all notices of any kind, including notices about Resident, the Lease, the Guarantied Obligations or any default. Owner doesn’t need to notify Guarantor of anything at all or deal with Resident in any particular way. Guarantor waives all defenses otherwise available to Guarantor under suretyship or guaranty law except only the defense of actual full payment and performance.
4. Miscellaneous. Any amendment or waiver of this Guaranty must be in writing and signed by Owner to be effective. Owner may perform credit checks and other investigations at any time on Guarantor. On request, Guarantor shall deliver a certificate satisfactory to Owner confirming the status of this Guaranty. In any action, proceeding or counterclaim relating to or arising from this Guaranty, the Lease or the parties’ relationship: (a) the parties waive jury trial; (b) Guarantor consents to New York jurisdiction; and (c) if Owner prevails, Guarantor shall pay Owner's reasonable attorneys' fees.⁶

This language probably delivers 95% of the practical benefit of any Guaranty. It does, however, expose Landlord to the risk that a court might decide Guarantor did not adequately waive one defense or another. In today's world, well-represented Landlords know about those defenses and in most cases can take steps to prevent them. Relatively few recent Guaranty litigations have actually hinged on the exact words of the Guarantor's waivers. Nevertheless, no one wants to be the first commercial real estate lawyer who chopped out most of the standard provisions of a Guaranty.

If even the four paragraphs above are not short enough, one could try replacing them with this, right after Tenant's signature: "I join in, assume, and guaranty payment and performance of all obligations of Tenant, as if I had personally signed the above Lease myself." It makes the point and supports a claim, but leaves out everything else.

[36.21] V. LEASE LANGUAGE BASED ON GUARANTY

The Lease should recognize the Guaranty exists. For example:

[36.22] A. Concessions to Guarantor

To the extent Landlord agrees to any concessions to Guarantor of the types suggested in the optional provisions below, those may work better if incorporated into the Lease than if incorporated into the Guaranty, just so Landlord can't argue the concessions don't bind Landlord. For example, the Guaranty might say Landlord agrees to pay Guarantor's attorneys' fees if Guarantor prevails in litigation. But Landlord never actually signed or became a party to the Guaranty. One can easily argue that Landlord agreed to its terms by preparing and accepting the form of Guaranty, but it's still a potential issue. One could avoid it by moving any "Landlord covenants" out of the Guaranty and into the Lease. As an alternative, if the form of Guaranty is attached to the Lease, Landlord could confirm in 6 Under New York Real Property Law § 234, any attorneys' fees clauses in "leases of residential property" are automatically deemed mutual. As between landlord and tenant, which party (if unsuccessful in litigation) is more likely to actually pay a judgment entered against it for the other party's attorneys' fees? Although § 234 has led to much litigation, no available case indicates whether "leases of residential property" include guaranties of such leases. Ordinary principles of the English language suggest that a "lease" is not a "guaranty" and vice versa. But ordinary principles of the English language are not always a good guide to residential landlord-tenant jurisprudence in New York.

the Lease that Landlord agrees to all the terms of the Guaranty, and will perform all Landlord obligations under the Guaranty. Broad language like that might scare a Landlord, so it may make more sense to move the substantive provisions to the Lease.

[36.23] B. Events of Default

If a Lease contemplates a Guarantor, the Events of Default should include a few that relate to the Guaranty and the Guarantor. Tenant could negotiate a right to cure each by delivering a replacement Guaranty from a Satisfactory Guarantor⁷ within a certain time. As Landlord's starting position, the Lease should define an Event of Default to include occurrence of each of these circumstances:

1. Guarantor Impairment. Only for so long as this Lease requires a Guaranty to remain in effect (a "Guaranty Period"), if Guarantor fails to meet the Guarantor Financial Standard.⁸
2. Guarantor Insolvency. Only in a Guaranty Period, if any Guarantor is the subject of an Insolvency Proceeding, unless involuntary and dismissed within __ days.⁹

7 This definition will matter. See sample definition of "Satisfactory Guarantor" offered within the optional Concessions to Guarantor later in this model document. Landlord will prefer to have the right to approve any replacement Guarantor in its sole discretion. In that case, Tenant's right to deliver a replacement Satisfactory Guarantor gives Tenant no comfort at all. It doesn't really justify any verbiage, legal time or printing costs.

8 The Lease or Guaranty should define "Guarantor Financial Standard." For inspiration, see the definition of "Satisfactory Guarantor" in § 39.89. If a Lease contains financial covenants for Guarantor, then it should have consequences for not meeting them. But must those consequences always include a premature end of the transaction? Tenant and Guarantor would argue they cannot control the risk of future Guarantor financial impairment, and it should not adversely affect the Lease and Tenant's right to occupy its space and obtain the benefit of its investment in the location. Hence, if Guarantor fails to meet the Guarantor Financial Standard, Tenant may want the right to post a letter of credit; demonstrate that Tenant's credit has improved in a way that compensates for any problems with Guarantor's credit; eliminate or trim back the Guarantor Financial Standard if Tenant has adequately performed for a certain time; or push back in other ways limited only by the ingenuity of counsel. Landlord might suggest that an increase in Fixed Rent, rather than an Event of Default, might adequately compensate Landlord for the increased risk resulting from an impairment of Guarantor's credit.

9 Guarantor or Tenant might propose that, especially for an involuntary Insolvency Proceeding, Guarantor should have a reasonable time in which to assume the Guaranty, cure all defaults, give Landlord relief from the automatic stay, and thereby prevent an Event of Default. Tenant should remember that, if Tenant is not itself subject to an Insolvency Proceeding, then Guarantor's Insolvency Proceeding constitutes a perfectly valid and enforceable Event of Default.

3. Guarantor Nonperformance. Only in a Guaranty Period, if Guarantor fails to perform any obligation under the Guaranty, including failure to deliver any document or financial information, or fails to comply with any negative covenant in the Guaranty, and any such failure continues for __ days after notice from Landlord, or if any representation or warranty by Guarantor in the Guaranty is false or misleading in any material respect.
4. Guarantor Termination. Only in a Guaranty Period, if any Guarantor dies, becomes disabled,¹⁰ is dissolved or terminates its legal existence.¹¹

[36.24] C. Guaranty

The Lease should require Tenant to deliver the Guaranty, and state that Landlord would not have entered into the Lease without the Guaranty, to prevent any later issues about why the Guaranty existed.

[36.25] D. Interaction With “Good Guy” Guaranty

A “good guy” Guaranty will allow Guarantor to terminate liability if Tenant gives, e.g., 60 days’ notice that Tenant intends to vacate and surrender the Lease. Creative and aggressive Landlords have been known to assert that mere delivery of such a notice constitutes an anticipatory breach of the Lease, immediately entitling Landlord to all remedies for an Event of Default. Although the argument has a certain dubiousness and hypertechnicality to it, Tenants and Guarantors should prevent it entirely by stating in the Lease that delivery of such a notice does not constitute an anticipatory breach. Even better, Tenant and Guarantor should try to simplify the relationship and deal structure by giving Tenant an outright termination option, under conditions like those contemplated in a good-guy guaranty, as suggested above.

[36.26] E. Notices

In the “notices” clause of the Lease, include Guarantor as a party that must receive copies of any notices to Tenant. Guarantor and Tenant 10 Disability should perhaps not constitute an Event of Default, but incompetence or a guardianship might.

11 Tenant may want a mechanism to replace a dead or disabled Guarantor with one or more people, named or to be named, who individually or collectively meet the Guarantor Financial Standard. If Guarantor’s estate assumes the Guaranty, that might also prevent an Event of Default.

should resist any language suggesting that notice to Guarantor is just a “courtesy” and not really required.

[36.27] F. Special Tenant Rights

If the Lease gives Tenant any preemptive rights, such as an expansion or purchase option or a right of first refusal or first offer, Landlord might require that any notice of exercise include Guarantor’s consent. As an alternative, the Guaranty might affirmatively say no such consent is necessary and any exercise will nevertheless bind Guarantor. This model Guaranty does include language to that effect. And if the preemptive right involves a sale of Landlord’s building, does the business deal contemplate that Guarantor will backstop Tenant’s obligations regarding the sale? It may not matter, if Tenant’s liability will not exceed loss of its deposit. That will depend on the circumstances of the particular deal.

[36.28] VI. TENANT OR GUARANTOR?

If Guaranties present so many possible impediments to enforcement, should Landlord instead just ask Guarantor to sign the Lease, along with Tenant? Or perhaps have Guarantor alone sign the Lease instead of Tenant and then sublease to the originally intended Tenant? Would that give Landlord a stronger position against Guarantor?

The answers to those questions are not simple.

Litigation to enforce a Guaranty may turn out to be easier to pursue than litigation to enforce a Lease, especially if the Lease raises lots of complex landlord-tenant issues. The various waivers in the Guaranty may, if Landlord is lucky, eliminate issues that Tenant have raised. Depending on the procedural posture and strategy of the dispute, Landlord might be able to bring separate actions, suing Tenant in one action while also suing Guarantor in a simpler action, or at least having some possible options along those lines.

If the creditworthy Guarantor is a foreign company, Landlord may want the option of easily suing Guarantor in its home country, rather than obtaining a judgment in the United States and then trying to enforce it overseas—not always easy. If Landlord ever did try to sue Guarantor in its home country, Landlord might have better luck trying to enforce a Guaranty (an ordinary contract) rather than a Lease (which the foreign court might deem a real estate transaction that can only be enforced where the property is located). That’s another reason why Landlord might well prefer a Guaranty to a direct Lease obligation.

A creditworthy Guarantor may also prefer signing a Guaranty to signing a Lease. Signing a Lease may increase Guarantor’s exposure to all kinds of claims and litigation arising from the leased space—personal injury lawsuits, bills from someone providing services, and the other exposures that come from visible operation and occupancy of any real estate. If Guarantor is based overseas, it may want to minimize any argument it is “doing business” in the United States, to protect itself from high corporate tax rates and American plaintiffs and judges in unrelated lawsuits. Signing a Lease looks a lot more like “doing business” than does just signing a Guaranty.

All things considered, it might make sense for both parties to use a Guaranty rather than have a creditworthy parent company directly sign onto the Lease. Of course, that puts the burden on Landlord and its counsel to assure the Guaranty contains the waivers it needs, so Guarantor cannot assert spurious theories to escape liability. This model offers suitable language. For a foreign Guarantor, Landlord may want to add language, also offered here, by which Guarantor appoints an agent for service of process in the United States.

On the other hand, Landlord may also want to consider the business culture of Guarantor’s home country. That culture, unlike the American business culture, might make it very difficult for a Guarantor to default—for example because it would cause great “shame” to Guarantor. In that case, Guarantor might be more willing to let Tenant default, and Landlord might mitigate that risk by having Guarantor actually sign the Lease. Guarantor’s fear of suffering shame if it defaulted on the Lease might help protect Landlord’s cash flow more than if Tenant, a mere foreign subsidiary of Guarantor, signed the Lease.

[36.29] VII. CLOSING DOCUMENTS

In addition to the Guaranty, the Lease and any Lease-related documents, the transaction may require these closing documents:

- A. Consent to obtain copies of Guarantor’s tax returns from tax authorities. (This requirement is atypical but not insane.)
- B. Copy of Guarantor’s driver’s license or passport, if an individual.

- C. Corporate documentation (formation, authorization, internal approvals, etc.) for an entity.
- D. Due diligence searches and information on Guarantors.
- E. Financial statements and (to facilitate future enforcement of a judgment) information to identify assets and liabilities. Guarantor will typically delay delivering these items until the last minute, hoping Landlord will be so anxious to close the deal that Landlord won't pay much attention or ask many questions.
- F. If multiple Guarantors exist, then an indemnification and contribution agreement among them, and suitable language in Tenant's organizational documents to address the consequences of payments under the Guaranty.
- G. Any other special arrangements to reimburse Guarantor if Guarantor needs to pay under the Guaranty, at least to the extent those arrangements go beyond Guarantor's automatic common-law claims against Tenant.
- H. Opinion of counsel, in rare and special cases, relating to corporate matters but not enforceability.¹² A Landlord might more likely obtain an opinion for an "unusual" Guarantor such as a governmental entity, a nonprofit, a small business investment company, a credit union or other financial institution, a foreign entity, an entity subject to special regulatory restrictions, or the like. Even in an ordinary partnership, a partner may lack authority to sign a guaranty on behalf of the partnership unless the partnership agreement expressly allows it.
- I. Waiver of conflicts, if necessary, reflecting the fact that the same counsel represents both Tenant and Guarantor, whose interests may conflict.

12 The general absence of opinions of counsel in leasing transactions, including Guaranties, does not seem to have produced an epidemic of invalid or unauthorized Leases or Guaranties.

[36.30] VIII. POST-SIGNING ADMINISTRATION

Once the Lease transaction has closed and the Guaranty is in place, the existence of a Guaranty requires Landlord to consider a few special matters in administering the Lease and otherwise. Some of these administrative suggestions apply to all legal documents, not just Guaranties.

[36.31] A. Amendments, Etc.

If Landlord and Tenant agree to amend (or extend, etc.) the Lease, Landlord should insist that Guarantor consent and confirm the continued effectiveness of the Guaranty, and also acknowledge that the Lease and the Guaranteed Obligations have been redefined to include the changes to which Guarantor consented. That's true even though the Guaranty waives any requirement for Guarantor consent.

[36.32] B. Change of Address; Other Notices

If Landlord receives a notice of a change of Guarantor's address, Landlord should update its records. If any other notice arrives from Guarantor, Landlord should pay attention. And if Guarantor or Landlord moves, it should remember to send a change of address notice. If Guarantor appointed a corporate service company as its agent for the Guaranty, Guaranty should also notify that company of the new address.

[36.33] C. Lines of Communication

Aside from administering the words of the Guaranty, Landlord would be well advised to maintain good relations and lines of communication with Guarantor and Tenant. If Landlord ever needs anything from them, it will help if Landlord readily knows who to call; has spoken to them before, and recently; and has handled any of their previous requests in an expeditious and reasonable way.

[36.34] D. Loan Closings

For a future mortgage loan on the property, Landlord or its lender may (should) require an estoppel certificate from Guarantor, not just Tenant. Landlord should handle that as part of the closing process. It may take longer than an ordinary tenant estoppel certificate.

[36.35] E. Renewal and Extension

This Guaranty, like most other lease guaranties, covers any “renewal” or “extension” of the guaranteed Lease. If that Lease expires and Landlord and Tenant sign a new lease, is that a renewal or extension of the old Lease? Probably not. Therefore, if Landlord wants to preserve (or have any hope of preservation) the benefit of the Guaranty, any extension or renewal transaction should not be documented as a new lease, but instead as an extension or renewal of the old Lease.

[36.36] F. Reporting

Obtain periodic financial statements, estoppel certificates, litigation searches, credit check updates, background investigation updates, etc. If Guarantor authorized Landlord to obtain copies of tax returns from the tax authorities, periodically exercise that right. If Landlord anticipates a sale or refinancing, Landlord may wish to pay particular attention to enforcing Guarantor’s reporting obligations.

[36.37] G. Termination of Guarantor

Landlord should check periodically that Guarantor has not died, become disabled, filed bankruptcy, liquidated, lost its corporate (or other entity) status, or taken any other action that would constitute a Lease default or limit the utility of the Guaranty. If one of these events does occur, Landlord may have a relatively short time in which to act to protect itself. If a Guarantor dies, for example, Landlord may need to file a claim relatively quickly in Guarantor’s estate. The Lease may, as suggested above, give Landlord certain rights and remedies upon Guarantor’s death, etc.

[36.38] H. Workout Negotiations

If the transaction gets into trouble and Landlord and Tenant sign a pre-negotiation agreement, Guarantor should also sign it. Guarantor should participate in any workout discussions, as Guarantor may be the most likely source of a financial solution to the problem.

[36.39] IX. BASE CASE: FULL GUARANTY OF LEASE¹³

This GUARANTY (the “Guaranty”) is made as of _____, 201__ (the “Guaranty Date”) by _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (with its successors and assigns, “Guarantor”),¹⁴ for the benefit of _____, whose address is _____ (with its successors and assigns, “Landlord”). This Guaranty uses terms before defining them. An Index of Defined Terms follows the signatures. Guarantor signs and delivers this Guaranty based on these facts:

A. Landlord is about to enter into a _____ Lease (as further defined below, the “Lease”) with _____ (with its successors and assigns, “Tenant”), dated on or about the Guaranty Date.¹⁵

B. The Lease initially demises premises consisting of _____ (as modified from time to time in accordance with the Lease or by agreement between Landlord and Tenant, the “Premises”).

C. Guarantor directly or indirectly owns a substantial percentage¹⁶ of the equity interests of Tenant, or is a principal of Tenant.

D. The Lease will therefore benefit Guarantor.

E. Landlord would not enter into the Lease unless Guarantor signed this Guaranty.

13 One might adjust the title of the document, to prevent confusion, misunderstandings, and bad assumptions about the Guaranty's scope. For example, it could be a Full Guaranty, Lease Guaranty, Limited Guaranty or Good-Guy Guaranty. On the other hand, such gradations may invite arguments and theories about what the guaranty was “really” intended to cover. Those issues don't arise if it's just a “Guaranty” and someone has to read it to figure out what it means. As a psychological matter, Guarantor may derive comfort from a more limited title for the document.

14 If multiple Guarantors exist, they will typically sign the same document rather than each sign a separate Guaranty. This prevents needless multiplication of documents and can simplify enforcement. The optional provisions after this model Guaranty include some for multiple Guarantors.

15 One could also identify the leased premises here, but it seems unnecessary. It should suffice to identify the Lease.

16 One could specify the percentage as a matter of extra care, but it seems unnecessary and just creates extra work. And what if the percentage is inaccurate?

NOW, THEREFORE, in exchange for $100 and other valuable consideration,¹⁷ receipt of which Guarantor acknowledges, and to induce Landlord to enter into the Lease, Guarantor agrees:

[36.40] A. Definitions

Any term defined in the Lease has the same meaning in this Guaranty, except as expressly modified or superseded here.¹⁸ This Guaranty also uses these terms:

1. “Guaranteed Obligations” means all liabilities and obligations of Tenant under the Lease,¹⁹ in each case whether or not Tenant’s notice or cure period, if any, has ended.²⁰ If a Guaranteed Obligation arises only after notice to Tenant but Landlord cannot legally give notice to Tenant, then Landlord may at its option instead notify Guarantor. The Guaranteed Obligation shall then be determined, for this Guaranty, as if Landlord had notified Tenant. If the Lease gives Tenant a right to contract, expand, extend or renew, or to acquire the Premises or an interest in Landlord, then the “Guaranteed Obligations” include Tenant’s obligations from an exercise of that right, whether or not Guarantor consents.²¹ The Guaranteed Obligations also include all obligations of Tenant to Landlord relating 17 If Guarantor delivers the Guaranty separately, well after the Lease closing, then issues could arise on consideration. In those cases one may need to do more than recite consideration, instead explaining for example that Landlord agreed to accept the Guaranty in exchange for a Lease amendment or a forbearance in Lease enforcement. In any case, Landlord’s counsel should make sure Landlord can satisfy ordinary contractual requirements for delivery of consideration.

18 The “base case” Guaranty contains all its own definitions, so one can delete the previous sentence, using it only when additional defined terms have crept into the document. One may, however, prefer to delete some lesser definitions in this document and rely on definitions in the Lease. In that case, one would keep this sentence. One might also adjust defined terms to match those in the Lease (e.g., “Attorneys’ Fees” rather than “Legal Costs”).

19 This language works for a full guaranty. Some Landlords like to add a laundry list of “Guaranteed Obligations,” such as obligations to pay rent, escalations, utilities, and construction costs; to comply with law; to provide insurance; to remove liens; etc. This seems unnecessary. What is unclear or inadequate about referring to “all” obligations under the Lease? If Landlord wants to include a list, or if the Guaranty is just a partial guaranty of the Lease, please see the menu of “Guaranteed Obligations” offered below for a partial guaranty. If Landlord leaves something out by mistake, does that implicitly diminish the scope of “Guaranteed Obligations”? And what about performance obligations that Guarantor cannot perform? For example, what if a performance obligation requires a special license that Tenant has but Guarantor does not? Landlord would typically not care about these questions or their answers.

20 One could state that the Guaranty of “all” obligations ends on a Termination Date, in which case it could become a broad form of good-guy Guaranty and require some conforming changes. Sample language appears in the optional provisions below.

21 Not everything in this sentence would apply in a typical space lease. Trim as appropriate.

to the Premises and arising under landlord-tenant law, such as liability for holdover rent, damages, use and occupancy payments, and rent for month-to-month occupancy after the Lease ends.

2. “Insolvency Law” means Title 11 of the United States Code, or other or successor state or federal statute on assignment for benefit of creditors, appointment of a receiver [(excluding one appointed at the request of a Leasehold Mortgagee)]²² or bankruptcy, composition, insolvency, moratorium, reorganization, trustee appointment or similar matters.

3 “Insolvency Proceeding” means any proceeding (or appointment), voluntary or involuntary, under Insolvency Law.

4. “Landlord Remedies” means Landlord’s rights and remedies under the Lease or law, including Insolvency Law, including any right to terminate the Lease, evict Tenant, collect damages for default and apply or not apply any security deposit or letter of credit Tenant delivered.

5. “Lease” means: (a) the Lease, as initially defined above, as amended,²³ assigned, extended or renewed from time to time,²⁴ whether or not with Guarantor’s consent; and (b) Tenant’s obligations to Landlord under law regarding the Premises, including after the expiration or termination of the Lease as defined above. The “Lease” shall be defined without regard to any: (i) Insolvency Proceeding; (ii) resulting limitation, modification, reinstatement, rejection or termination of the Lease or Tenant’s obligations; or (iii) exercise of Landlord Remedies.

6. “Legal Costs” means Landlord’s actual reasonable costs of collection and legal representation for any actual or threatened: (a) Tenant default under any Guaranteed Obligation; (b) Guarantor default or Landlord claim under this Guaranty; or (c) Proceeding. Those costs include 22 Add this bracketed language for a ground lease.

23 One expects to also see “modified.” But is “modified” any different from “amended”? “Extended” and “renewed” may in fact be different concepts, hence both appear.

24 Typically, a Guaranty supports not only the original Lease but amendments, extensions, renewals, and so on, whether or not the Lease provides for them. At least that’s what it says. If Guarantor does not in fact control Tenant (or stops controlling Tenant because Tenant assigns to a third party), Guarantor may want to limit the Guaranty to cover just the original Lease, not any future transactions, or perhaps not any renewals, extensions or expansions. In that case, Landlord will want to state that any future amendment, etc., does not vitiate Guarantor’s liability for the original Lease. Instead, Guarantor merely has no incremental liability (or benefit) as a result of the amendment, etc. In any event, counsel should make sure Guarantor understands the scope of its potential liability. For an unsophisticated or forgetful Guarantor, this could require written advice to Guarantor.

reasonable²⁵ attorneys' fees, disbursements and other charges billed by Landlord's attorneys, court costs and costs of process servers, private investigators and all other personnel whose services are charged to Landlord in connection with Landlord's receipt of legal services.²⁶ Legal Costs also include all other costs of collection.

7. "Proceeding" means any action, arbitration, counterclaim, litigation or other proceeding on, arising out of or relating to interpretation or enforcement of this Guaranty or the Lease, including a Tenant or Guarantor Insolvency Proceeding and any exercise of Landlord Remedies.²⁷

8. "Tenant" means: (a) Tenant as defined above; (b) any estate created through a Tenant Insolvency Proceeding; (c) any liquidator, receiver or trustee of Tenant or any of its property; (d) any similar person or officer, appointed in any Insolvency Proceeding or otherwise and (e) any heir, successor or assign of Tenant.

[36.41] B. Guaranty of Guaranteed Obligations

Guarantor absolutely, irrevocably and unconditionally guarantees Tenant's timely payment [and performance]²⁸ of all Guaranteed Obligations. Guarantor covenants that Tenant will pay [and perform]²⁹ all Guaranteed Obligations when and as the Lease requires.³⁰ If Tenant does not do 25 A court will often infer the word "reasonable" whether or not the parties include it, but if it's not there Guarantor will ask for it and Landlord will typically agree. So here it is. And perhaps it creates an unnecessary hook on which Tenant can hang issues in a Proceeding. But the hook is there anyway, in all likelihood.

26 Landlord may want to add: "If Landlord uses in-house counsel, "Legal Costs" shall include the estimated value of the time of those attorneys based on billing rates of Landlord's outside counsel."

27 Guarantor will want to limit this definition to anything arising from the Guaranty, so it excludes anything arising from the Lease or Landlord Remedies under the Lease. That argument may make sense if the Guaranty covers less than all obligations under the Lease. But if the Guaranty covers all Tenant obligations under the Lease, then it would include Tenant's obligations regarding any Proceeding or exercise of Landlord Remedies.

28 Landlord may not care about performance, just payment. Performance raises issues about access. Landlord may prefer to cure any performance defaults and send a bill. In that case, delete all references to the Guaranty covering performance. Limit it to payment.

29 See previous comment.

30 Guarantor may ask that if Tenant does not pay or perform, Landlord will give Guarantor notice, and then Guarantor will have, e.g., 30 days to cause Tenant to pay or perform before Guarantor must.

that, then Guarantor shall.³¹ For any Guaranteed Obligation, Guarantor shall pay all damages³² and losses that Landlord suffers and the Lease or governing law entitles Landlord to recover, including Landlord's Legal Costs, because Tenant fails timely to pay or perform. Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty is primary, not secondary, in the full amount of the Guaranteed Obligations, including interest, default interest, late fees³³ and costs and fees (including Legal Costs) relating to the Guaranteed Obligations. Any unpaid Guaranteed Obligation shall bear interest from the date it accrues until the date paid, both before and after entry of judgment, at the higher of: (a) the interest rate that applies after default under the Lease; or (b) the judgment rate. If Landlord obtains a judgment against Tenant for any Guaranteed Obligation, then Guarantor shall on Landlord's demand pay it and Landlord's Legal Costs of collecting it.

[36.42] C. Landlord's Exercise of Landlord Remedies

Landlord may enforce this Guaranty against Guarantor independently of, and with or without enforcing, any Landlord Remedy, and without regard to any event in any Proceeding with Tenant. Any Guaranteed Obligation and Guarantor's primary personal liability for it shall not decrease if: (a) Tenant abandons, surrenders or vacates the Premises or is subject to an Insolvency Proceeding; (b) Landlord exercises any Landlord Remedy or enforces this Guaranty; (c) Landlord fails to do so or delays in doing so; (d) Landlord obtains a judgment against anyone; (e) the Lease ends; or (f) any other circumstance occurs except actual payment and performance.³⁴ Nothing in this paragraph limits Landlord's obligation to credit Guarantor for any sums actually collected on account of the Guaranteed Obligations.

31 What about nonmonetary obligations that require access to the Premises? Does Landlord implicitly allow Guarantor to enter the Premises for that purpose? Or does Guarantor need to work out access with Tenant, the party with the right to possession? Though these questions are interesting, they would seem to be Guarantor's problems rather than Landlord's. If Landlord worries about them, Landlord may want to address them, but it seems unnecessary, especially in a "short form" Guaranty.

32 One could include a list of damages; for example: "direct, indirect, incidental, and consequential." Usually an obligor will want to exclude some of these.

33 If the Lease, and hence the Guaranteed Obligations, do not already provide for a late fee and default interest, consider providing for them in the Guaranty.

34 Adjust if the business deal contemplates a Termination Date for the Guaranty.

[36.43] D. No Offset

The Guaranteed Obligations are not subject to counterclaim, deduction, defense, offset or reduction of any kind, including any arising or purportedly arising under the Lease or from the landlord-tenant relationship under the Lease, except actual payment or performance. If Landlord holds a security deposit: (a) Landlord need not apply it toward the Guaranteed Obligations; (b) Landlord may continue to hold or apply it, in accordance with the Lease, as Landlord determines; and (c) it does not limit the Guaranteed Obligations.³⁵ If Landlord holds a letter of credit, Landlord may draw on it or not, in Landlord's sole discretion subject to the terms of the Lease.

[36.44] E. Changes in Lease

Without notice to or consent by Guarantor, in Landlord's discretion and without prejudice to Landlord or in any way limiting or reducing Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty, Landlord may but shall have no obligation to: (a) grant extensions of time, renewals or other modifications; (b) amend the Lease by agreement with Tenant; (c) accept or make compositions or other arrangements or file or not file a claim in any Insolvency Proceeding; and (d) otherwise deal with Tenant and anyone else related to the Lease as Landlord sees fit. Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty shall continue even if Tenant's obligations under the Lease are altered or terminated in any way or if any Landlord Remedy is in any way impaired or suspended with or without Guarantor's or Landlord's consent. A Lease assignment, even with Landlord's consent, does not limit this Guaranty.³⁶

[36.45] F. Waivers of Rights and Defenses

Guarantor waives any right to require Landlord to proceed against Tenant or anyone else or pursue any Landlord Remedy for Guarantor's benefit. Landlord may exercise in its sole discretion any right or remedy against anyone without impairing this Guaranty. Guarantor waives diligence and every demand, protest, presentment and notice, including notice of acceptance, accrual, creation, dishonor, extension, modification, nonpayment, protest or renewal of any Guaranteed Obligation.

35 Guarantor and Tenant may think Landlord should first use the security deposit before claiming under the Guaranty. Landlord will of course feel otherwise and will note that if Landlord does apply the security deposit, then Tenant and Guarantor will have an immediate obligation to replenish it, so they shouldn't care.

36 Tenant and Guarantor may negotiate for a release of liability if an assignment meets certain tests. See suggested concessions to Guarantor, following this Model Document.

[36.46] G. Nature of Guaranty

This is a guaranty of payment, not collection. Guarantor's liability is not conditioned or contingent on the Lease's enforceability or validity. If any Guaranteed Obligation is or becomes void or unenforceable, Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty shall continue as if all Guaranteed Obligations were and remained legally enforceable.

[36.47] H. Miscellaneous

Guarantor waives any defense because Landlord failed to obtain or perfect any security interest. The parties waive jury trial in any proceeding.³⁷ Nothing in this Guaranty may be amended, terminated or waived without Landlord's written consent. This Guaranty contains all (and supersedes all prior) agreements between the parties on the matters this Guaranty covers. In entering into this Guaranty, Guarantor does not rely on any representation, promise or other assurance by Landlord. Nothing Landlord said or did, except entering into the Lease, in any way induced Guarantor to enter into this Guaranty. The words "include" or "including" shall be interpreted as if followed by "without limitation." Landlord may give notice under this Guaranty in accordance with the notice procedures in the Lease.³⁸

[36.48] I. Additional Documents

Guarantor shall within 10 days after Landlord's request sign and deliver a certificate as Landlord reasonably requests directed to such addressee(s) as Landlord reasonably requires confirming: (a) this Guaranty and its continued status and validity; (b) the fact that it has not been waived or amended; (c) the current identity of Guarantor, Landlord and Tenant; (d) whether Guarantor has received notice of assignment; (e) whether Guarantor has any defenses and, if so, what they are; (f) if an attornment occurs under any nondisturbance agreement signed by Tenant, then the new landlord will also be entitled to the benefit of this Guaranty but not be bound by any amendment or waiver of this Guaranty made by 37 Particularly outside New York, a jury trial waiver often appears in ALL CAPITAL LETTERS, BOLD TYPE. Any jury trial waiver could also include this language: "Neither party shall seek to consolidate any Proceeding involving this Guaranty with any Proceeding in which jury trial has not been waived." Although that language seems right, it is not market standard.

38 Should those procedures allow email notices? Cautious lawyers say no, because of potential issues of proof. Those same lawyers often regret their caution the first time they need to give a formal notice under the document in question. Pressure for verifiable notices by email will probably continue to build.

Landlord without the requisite mortgagee consent; (g) Guarantor knows of no facts inconsistent with any simultaneous estoppel certificate delivered by Tenant; and (h) other matters as Landlord reasonably requires. So long as Tenant is not in default under the Lease, Landlord shall not request more than two such certificates in any calendar year.³⁹ Landlord may from time to time without notice as Landlord deems appropriate: (a) obtain updated credit reports or other information on Guarantor; and (b) investigate Guarantor and Guarantor’s credit, property and background.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, Guarantor has executed this Guaranty as of the Guaranty Date.⁴⁰

The previous page can be a “short page” ending with, e.g., “No Further Text on This Page.” The signature page could then include language like: “Signature Page for Guaranty Signed by _____ for Lease [Dated _____] Between _____ and _____.” Marc Dreier’s contribution to this Model Guaranty is duly noted.

41 To underscore the “personal” nature of the Guaranty, Landlord might ask Guarantor to provide its social security number and driver’s license information, plus a copy of the latter. If the Guaranty includes blanks for those items, Landlord should make sure Guarantor fills them in; leaving them blank could invite theories and claims. Guarantor will generally procrastinate about providing any of this information, and will try not to provide it at all by forgetting about it. If Landlord wants it, Landlord’s counsel should insist on obtaining it well before closing, and tracking its absence on the closing checklist.

For a partial guaranty, change the definition of “Guarantied Obligations” in the base Guaranty to capture only whatever Tenant obligations Guarantor has agreed to guaranty. This will represent a business negotiation in each case. Landlord can always suggest reasons why the Guaranty should cover just about any Tenant obligation. See, for example, the expansion of nonrecourse carveouts in real estate financing.

Any attempt to limit the Guaranty to certain “Guarantied Obligations” could cause disputes over line drawing. For example, if the Guaranty covers Tenant’s construction obligations, does that also cover some maintenance and repairs? If it relates to Tenant’s end of term obligations, does that only mean obligations that specifically arise at the end of the term, or also Tenant’s obligations to be in general compliance with the Lease at the end of the term? Guarantor might argue for a limited reading of “obligations at the end of the term.” One can mitigate these issues by referring to specific Lease sections⁴³ or by foreseeing them and trying to prevent them.

The Guaranteed Obligations might also reduce over time, potentially to zero, if Guarantor and Tenant meet certain conditions. Language to that effect follows the menu of Guaranteed Obligations.

Menu of Guaranteed Obligations. For defining the “Guaranteed Obligations” under a partial Guaranty, consider this menu, but bear in mind that many of these items are “off market,” assuming it is possible to define “market”:

A. “Guaranteed Obligations” means these obligations of Tenant under the Lease.⁴⁴

1. Construction. Tenant’s obligations under Lease Section ____, including Tenant’s obligations under Section ____ to remove mechanics’ and other liens.⁴⁵
2. Contests. Tenant’s obligation to pay or perform any Contested Matter if Tenant’s Contest fails.
3. Demolition. Tenant’s obligation not to commence or perform any demolition or construction except as the Lease allows.
4. Deposits. Tenant’s obligations to make, replenish or increase any deposit the Lease requires.
5. End of Term. Tenant’s obligation to surrender possession of the Premises when and as the Lease requires, and in the condition the Lease requires, at the end of the Term (including any premature end because of an Event of Default or a surrender of the Premises) and Tenant’s obligation under the Lease to indemnify Landlord, or otherwise make any payment to Landlord on account of Tenant’s breach of any obligation under the Lease on those matters.

43 Section number references create the risk that they will become incorrect as the Lease changes during negotiations. The author prefers to use (and refer to) suitable defined terms in the Lease.

44 This Guaranty defines the Lease, once, in a manner that disregards any Tenant Insolvency Proceeding. One doesn’t need to keep saying that.

45 Try to create and refer to suitable defined terms in the Lease rather than Section references, which will inevitably become wrong as the parties negotiate the Lease.

6. Environmental Matters. Tenant's obligations under Lease Section ____.
7. Expenses. Tenant's obligations under the Lease to pay utilities, management fees and operating expenses for the Premises.
8. Insurance. Tenant's obligations to maintain insurance under Lease Section ____, and if Tenant fails to perform those obligations then this Guaranteed Obligation shall include an obligation to pay any amounts that an insurance carrier would have paid if Tenant had performed its obligations to maintain insurance.⁴⁶
9. Judgment. Payment of any judgment Landlord obtains against Tenant for breach of any Guaranteed Obligation.
10. L/C. Tenant's obligation to maintain, extend and replace the L/C from time to time.
11. Legal Costs. Payment of Landlord's Legal Costs in enforcing the Guaranteed Obligations against Tenant or Guarantor.
12. Liens. Tenant's obligations regarding mechanics' and similar liens.
13. Rent. Tenant's obligation to pay all "Rent," which means any and all payments that the Lease requires Tenant to make as Fixed Rent, Additional Rent, interest, default interest, late charges, per diem damages or administrative fees, holdover rent, or otherwise, and any and all damages and other sums otherwise payable by Tenant under the Lease or for or on account of Tenant's default under the Lease or Lease termination or in any Tenant Insolvency Proceeding⁴⁷. "Rent" also includes any payments Tenant must legally make for use, occupancy or possession of the Premises (after the Lease ends), or in substitution for any payments under the Lease, or otherwise under the terms of the Lease, or after its rejection or premature termination. Rent and any damages for nonpayment of Rent shall be calculated without regard to any deferral, limitation or reduction that might 46 Guarantor should try to limit the Guaranteed Obligations to payment of premiums, arguing that Landlord should maintain its own backup coverage in any case. Landlords typically reject that argument.

47 The remaining language in this subparagraph sometimes appears in Guaranties but probably adds words without adding value.

apply under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6) or otherwise in a Tenant Insolvency Proceeding.⁴⁸

14. Subleases. Tenant’s obligation not to enter into below-market or statutory subleases, as provided for in Lease Section ____.

Limitation of Liability. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Guaranty, the aggregate dollar amount of the Guaranteed Obligations, and Guarantor’s liability for the Guaranteed Obligations, shall never exceed the sum of: (a) $_____ ⁴⁹ plus (b) Landlord’s Legal Costs in enforcing the Guaranteed Obligations against Tenant and Guarantor.

Application of Payments. To the extent Tenant makes any payment under the Lease, Landlord shall credit it as Landlord determines. For example, Landlord may credit it first against any Tenant obligation under the Lease that does not also constitute a Guaranteed Obligation, regardless of how Tenant characterized the payment.

[36.50] XI. GOOD-GUY GUARANTY

For a Good-Guy Guaranty, one could start with either a partial Guaranty (mix and match as suggested above) or a full Guaranty (“all” means “all” Lease obligations). Either way, one would then say liability ends on a “Termination Date,” subject however to Landlord’s rights on Recovered Payments.

A. Definitions

1. “Tenant Occupant” means Tenant and any person occupying or claiming any Premises by or through Tenant, except to the extent Land-

48 For a partial Guaranty or good-guy Guaranty, Guarantor should worry that this very broad definition of Rent will capture too much. Any Lease typically says that if Tenant commits an Event of Default and the Lease terminates, then Tenant owes damages based on an acceleration of some component of rent that would otherwise become due after termination. A partial or “good guy” Guarantor will want to avoid liability for those damages.

49 One could express this as a multiple of the monthly Fixed Rent at the time of determination, or in some other formulaic way. One could also have a fixed number, but adjust it based on the Consumer Price Index (CPI).

lord has agreed in writing that such person may remain after the Lease ends.⁵⁰

2. “Termination Date” means the date [__ days after the date] when Tenant has met these conditions: (a) all Tenant Occupants have vacated the Premises and delivered possession of the entire Premises⁵¹ in the condition the Lease requires; (b) Tenant has given Landlord at least __ days prior written notice of Tenant’s intention to do so;⁵² (c) all Tenant Occupants have surrendered the Lease under surrender documentation in form and substance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord;⁵³ (d) Tenant has performed all its Lease obligations arising from any construction Tenant initiated; and (e) all Rent accrued under the Lease to date has been paid, and all other obligations of Tenant accrued to date under the Lease (excluding any obligations calculated in whole or in part by any reference to obligations accruing or arising after the Termination Date) have been paid or performed.⁵⁴

50 This language covers nondisturbance agreements and pick-up leases. If a Subtenant is in default beyond cure periods under its Sublease, then it will typically lose nondisturbance protection. Landlord may want any such bad Subtenant to constitute a Tenant Occupant. If Tenant enters into subleases without nondisturbance protection, Tenant should remember that if any such subtenant remains, or fails to deliver the required surrender documentation, no Termination Date can occur. Tenant should keep this in mind when: (a) negotiating Subtenant nondisturbance protections in the Lease; (b) evaluating possible Subtenants; and (c) writing Subleases and Sublease guaranties.

51 For a large space, Tenant might seek some wiggle room on the “entire” Premises. For example, if a Subtenant remains in a corner of one floor, Tenant might still have the right to achieve a Termination Date for three other floors, all vacant. Or Tenant’s holdover exposure might be limited to just the subleased space, or in some other way.

52 This notice requirement does not always apply. If a good-guy Guaranty does contemplate Tenant or Guarantor will give prior notice of Tenant’s departure, what happens if Tenant doesn’t move out as scheduled? Often Landlord will establish draconian per diem damages, but this seems excessive as long as Tenant moves out reasonably soon after the scheduled date, and otherwise goes away in peace.

53 Guarantor may want to attach a required form of Surrender Agreement, to prevent any future discussions or uncertainty if Tenant ultimately decides to surrender. Landlord will want to make sure the Surrender Agreement only relates to Tenant’s surrender of possession, and does not in any way limit Landlord’s rights to recover damages under the Lease.

54 Guarantor can reasonably object to this clause “d,” as it is unnecessary to create the incentives that a good-guy guaranty is supposed to create, and exposes Guarantor to potentially open-ended liability even after giving up and surrendering the Premises—the desired behavior that this Guaranty sought to incentivize. Landlord will feel otherwise, probably strongly.

[36.51] XII. REPRESENTATIONS AND WARRANTIES

Many legal documents require the obligor to make representations and warranties to confirm facts about itself, the real property in question and other matters. One could argue that in most cases--at least for a “full” Guaranty of all obligations under the Lease—representations and warranties don’t give the obligee much incremental benefit. Still, the obligor just might go to the trouble of confirming they are correct and disclosing any inaccuracies. Guaranties typically do not include representations and warranties, but of course they sometimes do. If Landlord wants to include them, here is some sample language.

[36.52] A. Representations and Warranties

Guarantor acknowledges, represents and warrants as follows, and acknowledges that Landlord is relying on these assurances in entering into the Lease and accepting this Guaranty.⁵⁵

1. Accuracy of Facts. The recitals of this Guaranty are correct.
2. Authority to Contract. Guarantor has full power, authority and legal right to execute, deliver and perform its obligations under this Guaranty. Guarantor has taken all necessary actions to authorize this Guaranty, and has duly authorized, executed and delivered it.
3. Formation. Guarantor is an entity duly organized, validly existing and in good standing under the laws of an American state.
4. Guarantor’s Financial Statements. Guarantor’s most recent financial statements delivered to Landlord on or before the Guaranty Date⁵⁶ were prepared in accordance with sound accounting practices consistently applied. They correctly depict Guarantor’s financial condition

55 Sometimes the corporate representations and warranties about Guarantor will also cover Tenant. For a partial Guaranty, that represents a backhanded expansion of the scope of the Guaranty. For a full Guaranty, it doesn’t matter. The menu of representations and warranties offered here is fairly typical for any transactional document. The fact that most Guaranties don’t include these representations and warranties does not seem to have caused terrible problems for holders of Guaranties. One could include the same representations and warranties in the Lease. Whether the representations and warranties appear in the Guaranty or the Lease, one can easily expand them without limit beyond those suggested here.

56 The parties may want to identify those financial statements by date. Add them to the closing checklist. Guarantor, especially if weak, will typically not rush to deliver financial statements, hoping Landlord will be “so pregnant” by the time of signing that Landlord will pay no attention to them.

as of their date. Since then, no material adverse change has occurred in Guarantor's condition. Guarantor is solvent. Delivery of this Guaranty on the Guaranty Date does not render Guarantor insolvent.

5. Lease Representations and Warranties. Tenant's representations and warranties in the Lease are correct in all material respects.⁵⁷
6. No Conflict. The execution, delivery and performance of this Guaranty will not violate any provision of any law, regulation, judgment, order, decree, determination or award of any court, arbitrator or governmental authority, or of any mortgage, indenture, loan or security agreement, lease, contract or other agreement, instrument or undertaking to which Guarantor is a party or that purports to bind Guarantor or any of its assets.
7. No Legal Action Pending. "Legal Action" means any litigation, arbitration, investigation or administrative proceeding of or before any court, arbitrator or governmental authority: (a) regarding this Guaranty or (b) against or affecting Guarantor's property or assets. No Legal Action is pending or, to Guarantor's knowledge, threatened against Guarantor or any of its assets. Guarantor shall notify Landlord of any future Legal Action within five days after Guarantor becomes aware of it.
8. No Misstatements. No information, exhibit or report that Guarantor gave Landlord in connection with this Guaranty contained as of its date, or, if there is no such date, the Guaranty Date, any material misstatement of fact or omitted to state a material fact or any fact necessary to make any statement in it not materially misleading.
9. No Third Party Consent. Guarantor's execution of, and payment and performance under, this Guaranty are not contingent on any unobtained consent, license, permit, approval or authorization of, exemption by, notice or report to, or registration, filing or declaration with any person or governmental authority.
10. Tax Returns. Guarantor has filed all tax returns it must legally file, except to the extent any deadline(s) have been validly extended.

Guarantor has paid all taxes due on those returns and any assessments made against it.

11. Tenant's Financial Condition. Guarantor is fully aware of Tenant's financial condition. Guarantor delivers this Guaranty based solely on its own independent investigation and based in no part on any representation or statement by Landlord. Guarantor is not relying on, nor expecting, Landlord to give Guarantor any information on Tenant's financial condition.⁵⁸
12. Valid Obligation. This Guaranty constitutes a legal, valid and binding obligation, enforceable against Guarantor in accordance with its terms.⁵⁹

[36.53] XIII. MULTIPLE GUARANTORS

When multiple Guarantors exist, new issues arise. The next few paragraphs offer sample language to deal with them. Are the multiple Guarantors jointly and severally liable? (Usually yes.) Does each Guarantor make any representations or warranties about the others? (Usually, no. Each Guarantor should insist on that.) As with anything else in this model Guaranty, the appropriateness of the following language will depend on the circumstances. Also, multiple Guarantors will usually want to sign a reimbursement and indemnification agreement among themselves, a mutual-aid pact, so that if Landlord claims against one Guarantor, the other(s) must pay their share(s). The author can provide a template for such an agreement. Finally, think about how to tailor Events of Default triggered by Guarantor-related events. If one Guarantor runs into trouble but the others are just fine, should that constitute an Event of Default? (Probably not.) What if one Guarantor fails to deliver required financial reports, but the others do timely deliver their reports? If one Guarantor dies or becomes disabled, but all the others are alive and well, should that constitute an Event of Default? (Probably not.) Of course it all depends on the relative strength of the various Guarantors.

58 This proposition may seem rather obvious, but the California courts once decided that a holder of a Guaranty has an obligation to inform Guarantors about financial risks relating to their principals.

59 And what if Guarantor is lying about this? Does it change anything? If the Guaranty is not enforceable, then neither is this paragraph.

[36.54] A. Joint and Several Liability

If more than one person signs this Guaranty, then every signer shall be jointly and severally liable as “Guarantor” under this Guaranty. Guarantor shall indemnify Landlord on any claims arising from any dispute between or among Guarantors, plus Legal Costs. Landlord may, at its option, proceed against any one or more Guarantor(s) in any order without proceeding against other any Guarantor(s). Landlord may settle its claims against Guarantor(s) without, as a result, impairing Landlord’s rights against any other Guarantor(s).

[36.55] B. Notices and Service

Each Guarantor irrevocably appoints each Guarantor as its agent for receipt of notices and service of process. If Landlord gives any notice to any Guarantor, or serves any process on any Guarantor, then Landlord shall be deemed to have given that notice or served that process on all Guarantors.⁶⁰

[36.56] C. Counterparts

This Guaranty may be executed in counterparts.⁶¹ If any Guarantor fails to execute this Guaranty, that does not limit any other Guarantor’s liability.

[36.57] XIV. GUARANTOR FINANCIAL MATTERS

If Guarantor’s credit motivated Landlord to enter into the Lease, what happens if Guarantor’s credit later suffers? Nothing, usually. Landlord makes its decision at Lease inception, signs the Lease and then lives with the risk that Guarantor will suffer financial reverses.

Even under those circumstances, Landlord may still want to receive regular financial reports on Guarantor. If Guarantor merely delivers summary financial statements, they don’t help Landlord much if Landlord can’t act on any adverse information. But Landlord might also require 60 This may make Guarantors uncomfortable. Why can’t Landlord serve process on a Guarantor the same way Landlord would serve process on any other defendant in any action? Special language on service of process on Guarantor may amount to another example of irrational exuberance in trimming back a Guarantor’s rights and protections.

61 One could add: “Delivery of this Guaranty by electronic (including scanned pdf) or facsimile transmission shall have the same effect as delivery of original signatures.” Do we really need that language or will general legal principles adequately cover the issue?

Guarantor to deliver identifying information for Guarantor's assets—both at inception and periodically after that—to help Landlord chase Guarantor if the transaction ever gets into trouble. As a practical matter, though, how likely will those schedules of assets be complete, informative and useful?

In a minority of cases, Landlord goes a step further and requires Guarantor to meet a certain financial standard throughout the Lease term. If Guarantor no longer meets the standard, Landlord can call an Event of Default. This makes great sense for Landlord—assuming the courts will enforce that Event of Default—but imposes on Guarantor and Tenant a risk they cannot really control, with draconian consequences.

Within __ days after each calendar year, Guarantor shall give Landlord Guarantor's complete financial statements as of the end of that year. Within __ days after Landlord's request, made up to once a year, Guarantor shall deliver schedules of assets, identifying Guarantor's assets in reasonable detail.⁶³ Guarantor shall file its tax returns on or before the last day (after any valid extensions) Guarantor must do so without penalty. Within 15 days after each such filing, Guarantor shall give Landlord a copy of Guarantor's complete filed tax returns. [Guarantor shall also, promptly on request, give Landlord any other financial or other information on Guarantor as Landlord reasonably requests.]⁶⁴

62 If Guarantor is a public company, financial reporting could raise some special issues. For example, Guarantor will not want to provide (and Landlord might not want to receive) material non-public information. On the other hand, any public information will usually be available online – at least as long as Guarantor remains a public company. One could limit the reporting obligations accordingly.

63 This is intended to help Landlord chase Guarantor later.

64 Any obligation to deliver financial statements should also trigger obligations of confidentiality, which should appear directly in the Lease rather than require negotiation of a future confidentiality agreement. Sometimes Landlord will go a step further and require Guarantor to sign a consent (in the form the tax authorities require) so Landlord can obtain copies of Guarantor's tax returns directly from the tax authorities. This is not market for lease guaranties, but one often sees it in some areas of commercial lending.

[36.59] B. Guarantor Financial Standard⁶⁵

Guarantor shall, so long as this Guaranty has not been terminated or released: (a) meet the Guarantor Financial Standard; and (b) not Transfer any property or asset or take any other action if, after that Transfer or other action, Guarantor would no longer meet the Guarantor Financial Standard.⁶⁶

[36.60] XV. RECOVERED PAYMENTS⁶⁷

Any holder of a Guaranty may worry that the principal (here, Tenant) will pay a Guaranteed Obligation and then soon commence an Insolvency Proceeding, persuading the court that Tenant's payment constituted a preference or a fraudulent transfer. Some Guaranties address that hypothetical circumstance, by allowing the beneficiary of the Guaranty to "claw back" the Guaranty as soon as the court "claws back" the payment in question. Here is some suggested language:

- A. Definition. A "Recovered Payment" means any payment that Landlord: (a) received from Guarantor or Tenant on account of a Guaranteed Obligation or as a condition to a Termination Date; but (b) must return or "disgorge" for any reason, for example because a court decided it constituted a preference or fraudulent transfer. The Recovered Payment shall include: (a) Landlord's reasonably projected interest and other charges on the Recovered Payment until the date of reimbursement by Guarantor and (b) Landlord's Legal Costs in determining the existence and amount of that Recovered Payment.
- B. Landlord's Disgorgement of Payments. If Landlord is required to return or "disgorge" any Recovered Payment, then Guarantor's obligations under this Guaranty shall continue and remain in full force and effect as if Landlord had never received the Recovered Payment.

65 This paragraph is optional depending on the business understanding, and not often seen. If this paragraph is included, one must define the Guarantor Financial Standard either in this Guaranty or in the Lease. See the definition of "Satisfactory Guarantor" in § 39.89 for possible language. For a Lease of any significant term, Landlord should think about adjusting the Guarantor Financial Standard for inflation. And what happens if Guarantor fails to meet the Guarantor Financial Standard? Does that constitute an Event of Default? Is there a cure period to allow Guarantor to make more money? Must Tenant post cash security or a letter of credit? All of this belongs in the Lease, not (just) in the Guaranty.

66 Does clause "b" give Landlord anything Landlord did not already have by requiring Guarantor to meet the Guarantor Financial Standard at all times?

67 The first paragraph is typical and often appears in "full" guaranties. The second paragraph could be regarded as overkill. Without the second paragraph, though, Landlord has no (possible) protection from a degradation of Guarantor's financial condition.

If Guarantor purports to revoke this Guaranty, or if this Guaranty otherwise terminates, before Landlord has a claim against Guarantor under the previous sentence, then that termination or purported revocation shall not limit Landlord's rights against Guarantor. Guarantor shall promptly pay Landlord the amount of any Recovered Payment. Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty shall continue until (a) all periods have expired within which Landlord could be required to make any Recovered Payment; (b) Guarantor has reimbursed all Recovered Payments; and (c) all other conditions to termination of this Guaranty have been met.

- C. Recovery Motions. If, in any Tenant Insolvency Proceeding, any party claims Landlord must repay any Recovered Payment (a "Recovery Motion"), then Guarantor shall pay Landlord on demand an amount equal to the claimed Recovered Payment, as increased from time to time through accrual of interest and other fees (a "Recovery Security Payment"). If Guarantor pays a Recovery Security Payment and continues to perform its Guaranty obligations when and as required, then Landlord shall, at Guarantor's request, allow Guarantor to defend the Recovery Motion at Guarantor's expense (including Landlord's Legal Costs) on Landlord's behalf, all in a manner reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, provided this does not in Landlord's judgment cause Landlord to incur any cost, expense, liability or other detriment of any kind, including any adverse effect on any other actions by Landlord in the Tenant Insolvency Proceeding. To the extent Guarantor's defense succeeds, Landlord shall return the Recovery Security Payment. If the defense fails, Landlord shall apply the Recovery Security Payment to reimburse Landlord for the Recovered Payment.⁶⁸

[36.61] XVI. SPECIAL MORTGAGEE PROTECTIONS

Sometimes Landlord uses a Lease as a vehicle to create a stream of high-quality payments ultimately backed by Guarantor, supporting substantial financing. In these cases, the Lease itself may purport to "demise" something that isn't really separately demisable, such as the fixtures in a store. The transaction is really just a financing backed by Guarantor. The store fixtures aren't really very good real property collateral, but the Guaranty from the corporate parent may make the transaction work. In those cases, the mortgagee will worry even more than usual about preserving and protecting the stream of incoming “rent” payments. Language offered here will help Landlord mitigate that concern. Ordinarily neither Landlord nor its typical real property mortgagee would expect to see any of this language.

Guarantor acknowledges Landlord has mortgaged or collaterally assigned (or intends to mortgage or collaterally assign) the Lease, this Guaranty, all payments and obligations arising under the Lease and this Guaranty and Landlord’s entire interest in the Premises, to _____ (“Mortgagee”).⁶⁹ Guarantor has received notice of that assignment and acknowledges its validity and effectiveness. That assignment, and any later assignment, does not require Guarantor’s consent. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease or this Guaranty, unless and until Mortgagee has released of record its interest in this Lease:

1. Effect on Guaranty. Landlord’s assignment of the Lease shall be deemed, without any further action by anyone, to include a collateral assignment of this Guaranty to Mortgagee or, from and after a Foreclosure Transfer,⁷⁰ an outright assignment to any party that acquires the Fee Estate through a Foreclosure Transfer.
2. No Impairment. This Guaranty may not be amended, modified or waived, in whole or in part, without Mortgagee’s prior written consent.
3. Continuation of Guaranty. From and after any Foreclosure Transfer, this Guaranty shall, in accordance with its terms, continue to apply to the Guaranteed Obligations for the benefit of Successor Landlord⁷¹, but only until the Termination Date. Guarantor shall not assert against Successor Landlord any claim, defense, counterclaim or offset that the Lease or a separate nondisturbance agreement would prohibit Tenant from asserting against Successor Landlord.

69 One could also provide generically for future Fee Mortgages rather than a specific Fee Mortgage a specific Fee Mortgagee.

70 In the definitions, add: “Foreclosure Transfer” means any (a) foreclosure sale (or trustee’s sale, assignment in lieu of foreclosure, bankruptcy sale, or similar transfer) affecting the Fee Estate; or (b) a Fee Mortgagee’s exercise of any other right or remedy under its Fee Mortgage (or Law) that divests Landlord of the Fee Estate.

71 In the definitions, add: “Successor Landlord” means any party that becomes owner of the Fee Estate through a Foreclosure Transfer.

4. Direct Enforcement. Mortgagee may enforce directly against Guarantor (and give notices under) this Guaranty with no need for any confirmation, consent or joinder by Landlord.
5. Redirection Notice. If Mortgagee so directs in writing (a “Redirection Notice”), then Guarantor shall pay to Mortgagee, as Mortgagee directs, all payments this Guaranty requires, and shall not make those payments to Landlord. Payments made to Landlord in violation of or after a Redirection Notice shall not bind Mortgagee. Any Redirection Notice shall be irrevocable unless and until Mortgagee notifies Guarantor otherwise in writing. Guarantor shall disregard any instructions from Landlord inconsistent with a Redirection Notice.⁷²

[36.62] XVII. ENFORCEMENT

If the Guaranty goes into litigation, Landlord will want it to contain a few provisions to make that litigation go faster and better. Some of those provisions appear in the “base” model Guaranty, such as a jury trial waiver. Here are a few more provisions Landlord might add.

In the event of any Proceeding:

- A. Commercial Division. If that Proceeding is heard in the New York State Supreme Court Commercial Division, then the parties consent and agree to application of the Court’s accelerated procedures, Uniform Rules for the Supreme and County Courts (currently, the Rules of Practice for the Commercial Division, Section 202.70(g), Rule 9).
- B. Confidentiality. The parties shall promptly enter into and submit to the court (with a request to be “so-ordered”) a Stipulation and Order for the Production and Exchange of Confidential Information in the form promulgated by the Association of the Bar of the City of New York Committee on State Courts of Superior Jurisdiction.

The miscellaneous provisions that follow consist of Guaranty “boilerplate” that sometimes appears but does not seem strictly necessary. One might call these provisions “overkill,” although they will occasionally make a difference. They generally relate to weird hypothetical eventualities that rarely occur, although arguably they “could” occur and hence ⁷² The loan documents should limit Mortgagee’s right to give a Redirection Notice. Tenant and Guarantor will not want to get involved in those limitations.

“should” be addressed. And that is how any type of legal document gets longer and longer—never shorter—over time and how the “base” Guaranty can easily double in length.

[36.64] A. Consent to Jurisdiction

Any Proceeding to enforce this Guaranty may be brought in any state or federal court located in the State with subject matter jurisdiction. Guarantor irrevocably accepts and submits to the nonexclusive personal jurisdiction of each such court, generally and unconditionally for any such Proceeding. Guarantor shall not assert any basis to transfer jurisdiction of any such proceeding to another court. A final judgment against Guarantor in any Proceeding shall be conclusive evidence of Guarantor’s liability for the full amount of that judgment. Any such judgment may be enforced in any other jurisdiction, either inside or outside of the United States, by suit on the judgment. Nothing in this paragraph limits Landlord’s right to enforce this Guaranty in any court with jurisdiction.

[36.65] B. Death or Disability

If Guarantor dies or becomes disabled or incompetent, then, whether or not Tenant is in default under the Lease, Landlord may: (a) make a present claim against Guarantor’s estate in an amount equal to Landlord’s reasonable estimate of Guarantor’s maximum full liability under this Guaranty, measured as if Tenant had defaulted under the Lease beyond applicable cure periods; and (b) require Guarantor’s executor or other personal representative to escrow that amount or any other amount Landlord reasonably determines would be appropriate to cover any possible future claims under this Guaranty.

[36.66] C. Tenant Insolvency Proceeding

If Tenant is subject to any Insolvency Proceeding, then Landlord may, on demand, require Guarantor to deposit with Landlord, as security for Guarantor’s payment and performance, an amount equal to _____. Guarantor shall comply with any such demand within 10 days. Landlord shall apply any such deposited funds against Guarantor’s obligations under this Guaranty, when and as they arise. If a Termination Date occurs, then Landlord shall refund the unapplied amount of the deposit.

[36.67] D. Debt Collection

Guarantor acknowledges that none of Guarantor's obligation(s) under this Guaranty constitute(s) a "debt" under the United States Fair Debt Collection Practices Act, 15 U.S.C. § 1692a(5). Landlord and its counsel do not need to comply with that Act if they make any demand or start a Proceeding to enforce this Guaranty.⁷³

[36.68] E. Demand on Guarantor

Whether or not Landlord has requested payment or performance of any Guaranteed Obligation from Tenant, Landlord may at its option demand that Guarantor pay or perform any Guaranteed Obligation then accrued without demanding that Tenant do so. Guarantor shall promptly comply with any such demand.

[36.69] F. Further Assurances

Guarantor shall execute and deliver such further documents, and perform such further acts, as Landlord reasonably requests to achieve the intent of the parties as expressed in this Guaranty, provided in each case that Landlord's requests are consistent with this Guaranty and the Lease.

[36.70] G. Maximum Guaranteed Amount

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Guaranty, if a court determines that Guarantor's obligations under this Guaranty would otherwise be unenforceable to any extent because of the amount of that Guarantor's liability, then notwithstanding anything else in this Guaranty to the contrary, the amount of that Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty shall be reduced to the maximum amount that is enforceable. That limitation of liability shall in no way limit anyone else's liability.

[36.71] H. Notices

All notices, requests and demands under this Guaranty shall be given in writing at the address in the opening paragraph in accordance with the notice provisions of the Lease. Guarantor and Landlord may each change its address for notices, to any other address within the United States, by notice to the other. Notices shall become effective as the Lease states.

⁷³ If this statement is inaccurate, Guarantor's acknowledgment won't change that. Therefore Landlord and its counsel should consider possible application of FDCPA and not rely on Guarantor.

[36.72] I. Other Guaranties

This Guaranty is in addition to and independent of any: (a) guaranty(ies) executed by any other person(s) and (b) other guaranties of Tenant's obligations executed by Guarantor in favor of Landlord.

[36.73] J. Reimbursement and Subrogation Rights

Guarantor waives⁷⁴ any right to be reimbursed by Tenant for any payment(s) Guarantor makes on account of the Guaranteed Obligations. Guarantor acknowledges that Guarantor has received adequate consideration for execution of this Guaranty by Landlord's entering into the Lease, which benefits Guarantor, as a principal of Tenant. Guarantor does not require or expect, and is not entitled to, any right of reimbursement against Tenant as consideration for this Guaranty. Guarantor shall have no right of subrogation against Tenant or Landlord, and no right of contribution against any other person, unless and until: (a) that right of subrogation does not violate (or otherwise produce any result adverse to Landlord under) any Law, including any Insolvency Law; (b) all Guaranteed Obligations have been paid in full and all other performance required under the Lease has been rendered in full to Landlord; and (c) all periods within which any Person can claim against Landlord for a Recovered Payment have expired with no such claim (that deferral of Guarantor's subrogation and contribution rights, (the "Subrogation Deferral"). To the extent that a court determines Guarantor's Subrogation Deferral is void or voidable for any reason, Guarantor agrees: (a) Guarantor's rights of subrogation against Tenant or Landlord and Guarantor's right of subrogation against Tenant's assets shall at all times be junior and subordinate to Landlord's rights against Tenant and Tenant's assets; (b) Guarantor's right of contribution against any other person shall be junior and subordinate to Landlord's rights against that other person; and (c) Guarantor shall not file a claim in any Tenant Insolvency Proceeding without Landlord's consent.

[36.74] K. Scope of Lease Obligations

Each reference to the "Lease" also includes Tenant's obligations when Tenant occupies the Premises as: (i) a "holdover tenant"; (ii) a "statutory tenant"; or (iii) as the beneficiary under any other rent regulation, mandatory arbitration or other scheme that continues the landlord-tenant relationship in a manner not contemplated by the express terms of the Lease. As of the Guaranty Date, however, nothing mentioned in clause “ii” or “iii” now applies.⁷⁵ The “Guarantied Obligations” shall be determined without regard to any (a) Tenant Insolvency Proceeding or (b) determination or limitation that applies to Tenant in any such Insolvency Proceeding, including any limit on Landlord’s recovery under 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6) or any similar provision.

[36.75] L. Security

If at any time Tenant is in default under the Lease beyond applicable cure periods, or is the subject of any Insolvency Proceeding, Guarantor shall, on Landlord’s written request, deliver to Landlord cash, a letter of credit or other security satisfactory to Landlord in an amount equal to 110% of Landlord’s reasonable estimate of the amount of Landlord’s claim against Tenant as a result of Tenant’s default.⁷⁶

[36.76] M. Miscellaneous

No course of dealing, trade usage, or parol or extrinsic evidence shall modify this Guaranty or waive any Landlord right. If any court decides that any provision of this Guaranty is unenforceable, then the balance of this Guaranty shall remain fully effective. This Guaranty is an instrument for the payment of money only under Civil Practice Law and Rules 3213 (CPLR).⁷⁷ New York law governs this Guaranty, its interpretation and enforcement and the relationship between the parties.⁷⁸ Guarantor confirms that the recitals of this Guaranty are true and correct. The Lease and this Guaranty are a commercial transaction. Neither is entered into for personal, family, household or agricultural purposes. This Guaranty is executed and delivered to benefit Landlord and its successors and assigns, 75 This concept makes sense but the vast majority of Lease Guaranties seem to get by without it.

76 This is nonstandard but could enable Landlord to act aggressively against Guarantor upon default.

77 Delete preceding sentence for Guaranty of performance. Even for a Guaranty of payment, don’t assume it helps much.

78 Guaranties often require Guarantor to waive the statute of limitations, perhaps because as long as Guarantor is waiving things, the statute of limitations seems like a good thing to add to the list. One might describe this as irrational exuberance in Guarantor waivers. Why should a Guarantor lose the benefit of a general principle of civil procedure that applies to all other obligors under all other contracts? No one expects Landlord, Tenant or any other contracting party to waive statutes of limitation. Why should Guarantor? Such waivers may not be enforceable anyway, but that’s not a reason for Guarantor to accept them.

and no one else. This Guaranty shall bind Guarantor and its administrators, assigns, executors, heirs and successors.

[36.77] XIX. DESIGNATION OF AGENT FOR SERVICE

Language like this sometimes appears, especially for foreign Guarantors.

[36.78] A. Initial Designation

Guarantor irrevocably designates and appoints _____,⁷⁹ whose address is _____, in the Borough of Manhattan, City of New York, as Guarantor's agent ("Agent") to receive, accept and acknowledge, for and on behalf of Guarantor and its property: (a) demands for performance under this Guaranty or the Lease; (b) any notice regarding this Guaranty; and (c) service of any legal process, summons, notices and documents for any Proceeding, including all notices required to institute a Proceeding in any court or in any other way required to confer personal jurisdiction over Guarantor in any court (item "c" being referred to as "Service"). Service may be made on Agent in accordance with the procedures of the court where the Proceeding is pending. Service or demand on Agent shall constitute good and sufficient service and demand on Guarantor for all purposes, including to obtain personal jurisdiction over Guarantor and its property, wherever located, for any Proceeding.

[36.79] B. Preservation of Agent's Status; Replacement of Agent

Guarantor shall take all actions necessary to continue Agent's designation in full force and effect. If Agent becomes unable to act as Agent for any reason, then Guarantor shall forthwith irrevocably designate a replacement Agent satisfying the requirements of this paragraph that would apply to any replacement Agent. Upon written notice to Landlord (but no more often than once every six months), Guarantor may substitute in place of Agent any one other person. If Agent changes its address, then Guarantor or Agent shall promptly notify Landlord. Agent must always have a full-time business office in [New York City].

⁷⁹ Counsel should generally hesitate to accept this appointment as it can only produce grief. Guarantor should appoint a corporate service company and then make sure the corporate service company always has Guarantor's correct address.

[36.80] C. Means of Service

Guarantor irrevocably consents and agrees to Service in any Proceeding by mailing copies of such Service by registered or certified mail, postage prepaid or by third party overnight delivery service such as FedEx,⁸⁰ to Agent as described above or to Guarantor at Guarantor's address stated in this Guaranty or to any other address of which Guarantor shall have given notice to Landlord or to Agent. Service in accordance with this paragraph on Guarantor or Agent shall constitute valid and effective personal service on Guarantor. Any such Service shall be effective upon dispatch as evidenced by the receipt from the Postal Service or delivery service. Any failure of Agent to notify Guarantor of any Service shall not impair or affect the validity of that Service or any judgment rendered in any Proceeding based on it.

[36.81] D. No Limit on Landlord

Nothing in this Guaranty or the Lease limits Landlord's right to (a) bring any Proceeding in any court where Landlord could otherwise validly do so; (b) serve process in any way law allows; or (c) give notice in any way this Guaranty allows.

[36.82] XX. CONCESSIONS TO GUARANTOR

When a Guarantor negotiates a Guaranty, Guarantor may want to seek concessions to prevent unexpected or uncontrollable liability, particularly given that many Guaranty forms seem to go quite far in imposing broad obligations on Guarantor. Here are provisions a Guarantor might add to a Guaranty along these lines. In rare cases, Landlord might include some such concessions in the first draft Guaranty. These provisions all work better in the Lease itself, because Landlord signs the Lease but not the Guaranty, but: (a) Landlord can say in the Lease that Landlord agrees to its obligations under the form of Guaranty attached as an exhibit; and (b) Guarantor will want to protect itself from a Lease amendment that might eliminate these Guarantor protections.

80 Language like this often appears in Guaranties. But the rules of civil procedure do provide reasonable means of serving process. A careful Landlord will probably not rely on language like this paragraph anyway. And a careful Guarantor will argue, legitimately, that this entire paragraph represents another example of a Landlord's irrational exuberance in trimming a Guarantor's rights in a way that goes beyond waivers of case law principles that unreasonably prevent a Landlord from achieving its reasonable expectations as the result of obtaining a Guaranty. On balance, the author disfavors this paragraph, but recognizes that many Guaranties include similar language.

[36.83] A. Assignment to Guarantor

Tenant may assign this Lease to Guarantor without Landlord's consent, provided that: (a) Guarantor assumes this Lease by an instrument reasonably satisfactory to Landlord; (b) at the time of assignment, Guarantor cures all monetary Defaults; (c) with reasonable diligence after the assignment, Guarantor cures all nonmonetary Defaults; and (d) Tenant (assignor) and Guarantor (assignee) deliver an Estoppel Certificate and a waiver of any claims against Landlord.⁸¹

[36.84] B. Confidentiality

To the extent that this Guaranty or the Lease requires delivery to Landlord of any information about Guarantor, Landlord shall maintain the confidentiality of that information, in accordance with the same procedures Landlord would employ for its own information that it desired to keep confidential.⁸²

[36.85] C. Mutual Attorney Fees

If Guarantor prevails in any Proceeding with Landlord, then Landlord shall pay Guarantor's Legal Costs.⁸³

[36.86] D. New Lease⁸⁴

If (a) Landlord terminates the Lease for an Event of Default; and (b) Guarantor fully pays and performs all defaulted obligations of Tenant

81 The waiver of claims may be excessive.

82 One can easily convert these few lines into a few pages, but the few lines say it all. In any case, Landlord will want to avoid any obligation to "enter into a confidentiality agreement" as the price of receiving financial reports down the road. Those agreements can be very difficult to negotiate, if one side or the other wants them to be difficult to negotiate.

83 In the "base case" Guaranty, "Legal Costs" is defined to mean only Landlord's attorneys' fees. One would need to adjust that definition.

84 This paragraph and the next one are optional and reflect concessions a Guarantor might sometimes seek. Giving a Guarantor a New Lease sounds bizarre and rarely appears. Landlords will presumably hesitate to give a New Lease to an Affiliate of a Tenant that defaulted. It may, however, actually help Landlord enforce the Guaranty by showing that the relationship is balanced and reasonable. But Landlord may prefer to decide whether to offer a New Lease only when Landlord enforces the Guaranty. It may make sense to make the New Lease Option something Landlord can choose to initiate. Moreover, Landlord might reasonably argue that if Guarantor wants a New Lease, Guarantor can achieve exactly that result by having Tenant assign the old Lease to Guarantor when Guarantor cures Tenant's defaults. Guarantor is hardly in the same position as a leasehold mortgagee, because Guarantor presumably controls Tenant whereas a leasehold mortgagee does not control its leasehold mortgagor.

under the Lease (not merely the Guaranteed Obligations under this Guaranty),⁸⁵ within 15 days after Lease termination, then upon full completion of all that payment and performance Guarantor shall have the right (the “New Lease Option”) to enter into a new lease for the Premises with Landlord for what would have been the remaining Term of the Lease, on the executory terms of the Lease as it existed before termination (a “New Lease”). To exercise the New Lease Option, Guarantor must, within five Business Days after Lease termination: (x) notify Landlord that Guarantor exercises the New Lease Option, which notice must be accompanied by payment of all sums due under the Lease at termination; and (y) cure all existing Tenant defaults under the Lease, as if the Lease continued. If Guarantor exercises its New Lease Option then Landlord shall promptly prepare at Guarantor’s expense and give Guarantor a New Lease. Guarantor shall sign and return the New Lease within five Business Days after receipt or shall be deemed to have waived the New Lease Option. Any New Lease Option shall be subject and subordinate to Tenant’s claims and any possessory rights of Tenant or anyone claiming through Tenant. Landlord shall make no representation, warranty or covenant of quiet enjoyment under any New Lease.⁸⁶

[36.87] E. Notice and Opportunity to Cure

Landlord shall give Guarantor notice, simultaneous with notice to Tenant, of any Tenant default for which Landlord intends to exercise Landlord Remedies. Guarantor may cure that default on Tenant’s behalf. Landlord shall accept that cure from Guarantor.⁸⁷

[36.88] F. Preserved Defenses

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Guaranty, Guarantor does not waive, and reserves and may assert, any claim, counterclaim, defense or offset that Tenant could validly assert against Landlord arising only from: (a) Landlord’s acts or omissions, including Landlord’s breach 85 This parenthetical applies only if the Guaranteed Obligations consist of less than all the obligations under the Lease.

86 This New Lease Clause may require consent from Landlord’s lender.

87 Guarantor may also want some additional time to cure, similar to the rights of a leasehold mortgagee. That may be excessive.

of the Lease;⁸⁸ (b) the express terms of the Lease; or (c) Tenant's actual payment and performance in accordance with the Lease. In no event shall the Guaranteed Obligations exceed Tenant's express obligations under the Lease on the same matters (plus Legal Costs), except to the extent Tenant's obligations are diminished, limited or terminated through any: (x) Tenant Insolvency Proceeding; or (y) judicial determination that they are unenforceable, in whole or in part, for any reason except those in clauses "a" through "c" of this paragraph.

[36.89] G. Release on Assignment

If Tenant assigns the Lease in compliance with the Lease (except an Affiliate Transaction),⁸⁹ then Landlord shall release Guarantor from this Guaranty (and return the original Guaranty marked "CANCELLED" or deliver a lost document certificate in ordinary and customary form) if Tenant or the assignee: (a) pays by certified check all Guaranteed Obligations then accrued and outstanding; (b) cures all Defaults; and (c) gives Landlord a new Guaranty in the same form as this one, signed and acknowledged by a Satisfactory Guarantor.⁹⁰ That replacement Guaranty must also cover existing undischarged Guaranteed Obligations, if any.⁹¹ A "Satisfactory Guarantor" means a person that, based on Landlord's reasonable confirmation: (a) has a net worth at least equal to [the net worth of Guarantor] [on the Commencement Date] [at the time] [___ times then annual Fixed Rent]; (b) is a person with whom United States persons may legally do business; (c) is subject to the jurisdiction of 88 Landlord may regard clause "a" as very broad, and want to trim it back. On the other hand, if the Lease requires Landlord to do or not do something, and Landlord violates that requirement, and Tenant could have asserted a defense as a result, why shouldn't Guarantor have the same defense?

89 The parties will need to adjust this paragraph based on the negotiated business deal. What type of assignment (and new Guarantor) will get the former Guarantor off the hook? The Lease will set conditions for the permitted assignment, such as no uncured default; completion of construction; prior notice; assumption by the assignee; and criteria the assignee must meet. Those are all beyond the scope of this model Guaranty. The conditions to any release will vary depending on the space, Tenant, Guarantor and market conditions.

90 Rather than define a Satisfactory Guarantor, Landlord would prefer to require: "a replacement Guarantor satisfactory to Landlord in all respects, in Landlord's sole and absolute discretion, including creditworthiness." Without an objective definition of Satisfactory Guarantor, though, the right to replace Guarantor doesn't give Tenant/Guarantor anything more than they would have if the Guaranty were silent. And a "reasonable" Landlord would typically agree to a later substitution of Guarantor, absent extraordinary circumstances, so Landlord isn't really giving up much by agreeing to an objective definition of Satisfactory Guarantor.

91 Tenant may object to this sentence. Landlord's response will depend on circumstances.

_____ and not entitled to any sovereign, diplomatic or other immunity (unless waived in a manner reasonably satisfactory to Landlord); and (d) _____.⁹²

[36.90] H. Termination of Guaranty

If [at any time no undischarged Guarantied Obligations remain or can later arise,⁹³] [Tenant has never been in default under the Lease, beyond applicable notice and cure periods, as of the date _____ months after the Guaranty Date,] then Guarantor's liability under this Guaranty shall terminate, subject to Landlord's rights under this Guaranty on Recovered Payments. At Guarantor's or Tenant's request, Landlord shall promptly confirm that termination of liability in writing⁹⁴ and return the original of this Guaranty marked "Canceled" or deliver a [notarized certificate] [lost document certificate and indemnity] in customary form, reasonably satisfactory to the parties, to that effect. Landlord's failure to comply with the previous sentence shall not limit the effect of any termination of this Guaranty.

92 Add any deal-specific criteria the Satisfactory Guarantor must meet.

93 If Tenant could remain liable under the Lease even after it ends, Landlord should hesitate to define the circumstances under which Landlord will release Guarantor. For example, even after the Lease ends, Landlord could incur liability for which Tenant (and Guarantor) must indemnify.

94 Landlord could argue that under these circumstances the Guaranty is a nullity and Guarantor has no need for a written confirmation. But Guarantors often want one anyway, for essentially the same reason Landlords want lien waivers from potential mechanics' lien claimants even if Tenant has delivered proof of payment.

LEGAL ISSUES, PRACTICES, AND PRACTICALITIES FOR LETTERS OF CREDIT IN COMMERCIAL LEASES, WITH A SAMPLE LETTER OF CREDIT AND COMMENTARY

[37.0] I. INTRODUCTION

When negotiating a prospective business transaction, one party may doubt the credit of another party. To solve that problem, the party with dubious credit (here, an “Applicant”) will sometimes give the skeptical party (a “Beneficiary”) a standby letter of credit (an “L/C”) to back Applicant’s obligations. As a typical example, particularly for purposes of this book, when a commercial landlord (“Landlord”) wants security from a tenant (“Tenant”) under a commercial lease (“Lease”), Tenant will often, as applicant, deliver an L/C to Landlord, as Beneficiary.

To obtain that L/C, Tenant will ask a creditworthy third party, typically but not necessarily a bank (“Issuer”) to issue the L/C to Beneficiary. If the Lease or other transaction ever goes into default, Beneficiary can submit to Issuer a document called a “sight draft.”¹ Here, Beneficiary demands that Issuer pay the amount specified in the sight draft, up to the amount of the L/C. This is called “drawing upon” the L/C. When Issuer issues an L/C, Issuer agrees to pay Beneficiary in response to valid sight drafts. Beneficiary can use the proceeds of any draw upon the L/C to cure Applicant’s default, or may retain the proceeds to the extent governing law and documentation allows.²

Issuer will look to Applicant to reimburse any payment Issuer makes in response to any sight draft that conforms to the L/C. Toward that end, Applicant and Issuer will enter into an agreement (a “Reimbursement Agreement”). In any Reimbursement Agreement, Issuer agrees to issue the L/C in exchange for a fee, and Applicant agrees to reimburse Issuer for any drawings that Beneficiary makes upon the L/C (in compliance with the L/C), with interest. The Reimbursement Agreement may actually

1 Some authority suggests the drawing document should consist of a “demand” for payment rather than a “draft,” because a “draft” has special meaning in banking law, which sometimes leads to unusually exacting technical requirements. As long as the required form of the document is attached to the L/C as an exhibit and Beneficiary complies with the form, this distinction should not make a difference. In the author’s experience, L/C’s and people who deal with L/C’s refer to “sight drafts” even if they shouldn’t. For more on this topic, see Carter H. Klein, Standby Letter of Credit Rules and Practices Misunderstood or Little Understood by Applicants and Beneficiaries, 40 U.C.C.J. 125 (Fall 2007).

2 If any genuine default exists, Beneficiary will typically prefer to apply the proceeds to cure it, as opposed to leaving the proceeds in some escrow or cash collateral account where they may tempt a creditors’ committee.

appear in (or tie to) a larger revolving credit agreement between Applicant (or its parent company) and Issuer.³

If Applicant never defaults, then Beneficiary never draws upon the L/C, and eventually returns it, consents to its cancellation, or lets it expire without submitting a sight draft. Although that outcome is nearly universal, lawyers write Leases and structure L/C to prevent surprises when the exceptions arise.

When Applicant delivers an L/C in a Lease or other real estate transaction, typically no one anticipates that Beneficiary will ever draw upon the L/C. That fact makes such an L/C a “standby” L/C⁴ under L/C parlance.

This Chapter discusses a number of issues, many specific to commercial space leasing, that arise when any Beneficiary accepts a standby L/C to back an obligation.⁵ This Chapter concludes by offering a model L/C, suitable to back Tenant’s obligations under a Lease or almost any other obligation that might require credit enhancement.⁶ It may be overoptimistic to offer such a model, as most L/C issuers insist on using their own model, which typically covers almost all the same ground though not as clearly and simply and with different bells and whistles (optional provisions).

This Chapter and its model L/C mostly focus on Beneficiary’s agenda. Because an L/C constitutes a fairly standard document, one could also use

- 3 To the extent that Applicant asks Issuer to issue any L/C, Issuer will regard that transaction as a contingent drawdown under the revolving credit agreement. Hence Issuer will block availability under the revolving credit agreement to the extent of all funds available under the L/C. In exchange for bearing the credit risk implied by Issuer’s issuing the L/C, i.e., the risk of having to pay sight drafts upon the L/C and seek reimbursement from Applicant, Issuer will charge a fee that generally equals the margin that Issuer would add to the London Interbank Offered Rate (shorthand for Issuer’s cost of funds, “LIBOR”) for funds actually drawn under the revolving credit agreement. That spread compensates Issuer for credit risk and perhaps gives Issuer some profit, but does not compensate Issuer for the actual use of funds. If Issuer paid a draw upon the L/C, the fully loaded interest rate under the revolving credit agreement would compensate Issuer for (a) cost of funds (LIBOR); plus (b) Applicant’s credit risk and profit (the spread).
 - 4 In contrast, import/export transactions use “commercial” L/Cs, where everyone expects Beneficiary to draw upon the L/C in the ordinary course.
 - 5 The possibility of a Tenant bankruptcy can create thorny issues in this area, at least if the L/C exceeds a year’s rent. Those issues are discussed in another Chapter.
 - 6 Because of the “independence principle” of L/Cs, a standby L/C should require relatively little customizing regardless of the transaction for which the parties use it. Any L/C should simply confirm Issuer’s unconditional promise to pay Beneficiary if Beneficiary presents a compliant sight draft. Just about everything specific to the particular transaction belongs elsewhere.

this model L/C, with care, when acting for Issuer⁷ or Applicant.⁸ Any such use should take into account, among other issues, those flagged in the footnotes of this model L/C. This model L/C was not intended for use as a nonstandby or “commercial” L/C, although it could readily be adapted for that purpose.

[37.1] II. SUBSTANTIVE COMMENTS

Drawing Conditions. If possible, any L/C should not require Beneficiary to provide any certification, prior notice, or third-party verification to draw upon the L/C. As an extreme example of language that any Beneficiary would reject out of hand, an optimistic Applicant once proposed to the author⁹ that any Draw Documents must include this statement:

7 Issuer cares less about the form of the L/C than about the form of the Reimbursement Agreement (either part of the revolving credit agreement between Issuer and Applicant, or a separate agreement). Issuer should stand ready to issue any L/C at all so long as: (a) it’s just an L/C and not, for example, also an agreement to build a house or to dance a jig; (b) the form of L/C and its drawing requirements match Issuer’s operating procedures; (c) the drawing conditions are simple and clear enough so Issuer’s clerical personnel can reliably honor or dishonor a sight draft without parsing words in great detail, involving counsel, or risking liability to either Beneficiary or Applicant; and (d) Issuer is comfortable with Applicant’s credit and the airtight nature and reliability of any Reimbursement Agreement. Issuer can and must treat the issuance of the L/C as an unconditional commitment to make a loan to Applicant at an unpredictable future moment—tomorrow, the next day, nine months from now, whenever Beneficiary draws upon the L/C (at any time before expiry), whether or not Applicant remains creditworthy at that moment or Issuer otherwise would still like to make such a loan. If the conditions listed earlier in this footnote are satisfied, the substantive terms and conditions of the L/C merely determine the timing of Issuer’s loan disbursement. Thus, if Applicant tries to blame Issuer for introducing off-market complexities or conditions into an L/C, Beneficiary should often take Applicant’s claims with a bushel of salt.

8 For a Lease, Applicant would be Tenant. Applicant might also consist of Tenant’s principals or, in the “New Economy” or dotcom world, the venture capitalists that backed Tenant. This Chapter treats the whole group as Applicant, disregarding any issues within the group. Any Applicant will in most cases want to defer, frustrate, and complicate – and ideally prevent entirely – any L/C draw. This Chapter offers plenty of clues for how to do exactly that. A careful Beneficiary, particularly if represented by the author, will try very hard to reject Applicant’s proposals, regardless of how rational, reasonable, earnest, and well thought through they may sound.

9 Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel argues that (a) these drawing conditions are “not so horrible, just snug”; (b) any Landlord can readily meet these conditions; and (c) in any case, at least when Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel reviewed this Chapter, Tenants have the upper hand in Lease negotiations. (Point “c” actually constituted a great argument for most of Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel’s positions summarized in these footnotes, but is now out of date as of 2016, at least for the moment.) Hence Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel, when representing Tenant, would push hard to obtain exactly these drawing conditions and would expect to succeed. Landlord’s counsel would regard this language as an exercise in fantasy, creativity, and overly aggressive and off-market lawyering. “It’s off market” is always an interesting argument. As its subtext, it implies that the proponent of the “off market” position does not know what they’re doing and lacks experience.

Beneficiary represents, warrants, and certifies, under penalty of perjury, that: (a) Applicant has defaulted in performing these obligations under the _____ dated _____ between Applicant and Beneficiary (the “Agreement”): _____; (b) such default was not excused by any failure or nonperformance by Beneficiary under the Agreement; (c) Beneficiary has properly given notice of Applicant’s default¹⁰ to Applicant and all other parties entitled to such notice, at the addresses shown and in the forms attached as Exhibits hereto, all in full compliance with Lease requirements; (d) after the giving of such notice, any and all cure periods under the Lease have expired; (e) Beneficiary has given Applicant and _____ a copy of the form of this certification and notice that Beneficiary intends to submit Draw Documents; and (f) at least _____ business days has elapsed since such notice.¹¹

Pre-Existing Debt. An L/C delivered to back pre-existing debt may raise issues in Applicant’s insolvency or bankruptcy. Avoid accepting an L/C under those circumstances, at least not without fully considering bankruptcy issues. In some instances, the parties can structure the use of an L/C in a way that will minimize these issues.

Negotiation of L/C Forms. To Beneficiary, the purpose of an L/C is usually to provide cash-equivalent security. Beneficiary should not readily agree to bear even “small risks” in the name of compromise and accommodation. The L/C should remain airtight notwithstanding any negotiated changes. Beneficiary should always have the equivalent of a cash deposit, at least until L/C expiry.

10 If Applicant were subject to bankruptcy proceedings, any such notice to Applicant would violate the automatic stay. This does not limit the grounds on which Beneficiary should object to almost every line of the proposed language.

11 Beneficiary and its counsel assume that Applicant wants notice and a waiting period so Applicant can try to enjoin or otherwise prevent Issuer from honoring Beneficiary’s draw upon the L/C, or conceivably file bankruptcy in the hope that it might frustrate Landlord’s drawing upon the L/C. Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel argues that Issuer will notify Tenant of any draw anyway before paying Landlord’s sight draft, so requiring Landlord to give prior notice does not give Tenant anything it does not already get anyway. And it gives Tenant, with certainty, a short window of time in which to try to educate Landlord on why Landlord should not draw upon the L/C, enabling Tenant to prevent unjustified surprises and emergencies. Landlord would argue, among other things, that Tenant should rely on its understanding with Issuer about prior notice. Landlord will typically draw a line in the sand on the “prior notice” issue and expect to get away with it, subject always to market conditions.

Tenant Concerns. Any Tenant may worry that Landlord may draw upon the L/C wrongfully, or wrongfully apply the proceeds of a rightful draw on the L/C. Tenant's concerns track any Tenant's concerns when Landlord holds a large cash security deposit. To respond to those concerns, Tenant may insist that a third party, such as Landlord's lender ("Lender"), if a reliable institution, hold the proceeds of any L/C draw pending resolution of any dispute. Tenant may also demand the right to offset rent if Landlord misuses the L/C. Because that right loses value as the remaining Lease term diminishes, Tenant may insist that the amount of the L/C drop over time. Tenant may make this request anyway as a business matter. Tenant might also mitigate its concerns by asking that Lender hold and control the L/C even before Landlord (or Lender) makes any draw upon the L/C – a common Lender request for large L/Cs, and a deal structure that raises issues beyond the scope of this book. If Tenant seriously worries about Landlord's possible misuse of the L/C, Tenant may want to consider dealing with some other Landlord instead.

[37.2] III. INDUSTRY STANDARD PRACTICES FOR L/Cs

In 1998, the International Chamber of Commerce released a set of standards designed specifically for standby L/Cs, the International Standby Practices ("ISP"), offering a more tailored alternative to the earlier Uniform Customs and Practice for Documentary Credits, International Chamber of Commerce Publication No. 500 (as updated in 2007 in Publication No. 600, "UCP"). UCP relates to L/Cs generally, both standby and commercial.¹² ISP can be read in well under an hour. Unlike UCP, ISP is written in ordinary and straightforward English.

Footnotes in the model L/C highlight some consequences of using ISP rather than UCP. In addition to those consequences, ISP eliminates the need for some language often seen in L/Cs, and includes these provisions worth noting:¹³

12 Uniform Commercial Code Article 5 also governs L/Cs. UCP and ISP modify and supplement (and largely override) the legal provisions that would otherwise govern. The Official Comments to Article 5 play an unusually important role in its interpretation.

13 ISP also contains many other noteworthy provisions. Anyone who works with standby L/Cs should buy and read ISP. It is available at modest cost from its issuer, the International Chamber of Commerce, store.iccwbo.org (search for "Standby"). The fact that ISP eliminates the need for certain language does not mean that such language is harmful. Typically, the unnecessary verbiage, if reinstated, makes Beneficiaries comfortable and does no harm.

- Issuer's Funds. Some L/Cs say Issuer must pay from its own funds. ISP § 1.10(a)(iv) eliminates any need to say that.
- Irrevocable/Unconditional. Many L/Cs insert the word “irrevocably” to modify Issuer’s agreement to pay a drawing made upon an L/C. ISP eliminates the need for that word. ISP § 1.06(a). Similarly, ISP §§ 1.06(a) and 1.10(a) eliminate the need for an L/C to say it is “irrevocable and unconditional.”
- Bad Amendments. Some L/Cs include a statement like this, often just before the signature: “If any amendment adversely affects Beneficiary, it shall not become effective without Beneficiary’s written consent.” ISP §§ 1.06(b) and 2.06(c) eliminate the need for such a statement. ISP § 7.01 gives a Beneficiary similar protection for any possible L/C cancellation. Hence this model L/C does not mention these points.
- Partial Transfer. ISP § 6.02(b)(ii) says any L/C “may not be partially transferred,” eliminating the need for any such limitation in the L/C.
- Closed Office. If Issuer’s office for presentation of the L/C is closed on the last business day when Beneficiary can present the L/C, then the L/C will automatically remain in effect until 30 days after the office reopens. ISP § 3.14(a). Issuer need not, however, notify Beneficiary of the reopening. Beneficiary will need to figure out for itself.¹⁴

If an L/C “worked” for UCP, then switching to ISP requires no significant changes to the L/C text, though it allows some minor deletions. As the main change, one must replace references to UCP with references to ISP. Nothing in ISP requires any magic language that a well written UCP L/C would not already contain. ISP may matter more in administering, drawing upon, and otherwise living with L/Cs after issuance. ISP was 14 Beneficiary could, conceivably, ask Issuer to agree, in the L/C, to give notice of reopening, but such provisions typically do not appear in an L/C. Could Issuer remember to give that notice under all affected L/C’s?

[37.3] IV. POINTS NOT COVERED

This model L/C seeks to achieve minimalism and simplicity, consistent with the usual goal of keeping any L/C as short and simple as possible. Any party to an L/C transaction, or its counsel, can readily think of ways to complicate and lengthen any document, including any L/C, sometimes based on the circumstances of a particular transaction and other times driven by personal taste or bad experiences. Here are some examples of nonstandard provisions that the parties may want to add to an L/C for a particular transaction or to address particular concerns.

Changes in Amount. The parties may want to build into the L/C future reductions in its face amount. In a Lease, for example, the required security might drop over time.¹⁵ Beneficiary will want to assure that this reduction takes place in a way that does not imperil Beneficiary's security if problems arise. This entire issue is best addressed in the underlying documentation (e.g., the Lease) between the parties. That documentation should allow Applicant to amend the L/C to reduce its amount, but each amendment should still require Beneficiary's formal written consent. This way, Beneficiary can protect itself against "stealth" L/C reductions that no longer should occur, for which Applicant failed to satisfy all conditions, or for which Beneficiary failed to pay enough attention.

Tenant would argue that if the parties have negotiated a "burn-down" of the L/C over time, then it should happen automatically, and Tenant should not find itself at the mercy of an uncooperative, slow, or overly punctilious Landlord. As a practical matter, Tenant may very well have cash-collateralized its L/C, and if the business deal contemplates a partial release of the L/C, then Tenant should receive back some of its cash collateral automatically. Tenant would argue that the burden should rest on Landlord to take action to stop the automatic reduction of the L/C. The very notion of automatic reduction may worry Landlord.

Special Protections. Beneficiary may worry about some risks that an L/C creates, and might want to mitigate them by adding additional (nonstandard) provisions to the L/C or the underlying contract documents. These risks might include the possibilities of: (a) an injunction or temporary restraining order preventing a draw upon the L/C; (b) Issuer's insolvency or closure; (c) Applicant's insolvency; and (d) Applicant's payment of the L/C-backed obligation, after which Beneficiary releases the L/C, after which Applicant files bankruptcy and its estate seeks to claw back the payment. Though these risks have actually "hit" L/C Beneficiaries in various reported cases, they are generally not regarded as major risks and likely to recur. Provisions to address these risks have traditionally not appeared in L/Cs, and hence this model L/C does not include them. Counsel could craft them as appropriate or desired in particular cases. The author can provide sample language.

15 Tenant may, for example, worry about Landlord credit issues near the end of the term. Even part way through the term, Tenant can reasonably argue that Landlord's credit exposure has diminished over time, entitling Tenant to reduce the amount of the L/C. Having Lender hold the L/C can help solve this problem, if accompanied by appropriate protections.

Multiple Beneficiaries. If multiple parties have an interest in the proceeds of an L/C, they must agree how to protect their respective interests. As a common example in commercial real estate transactions, Landlord's Lender may want to control the drawing process and proceeds of an L/C that replaced a cash security deposit, particularly a large cash security deposit.¹⁶ Restrictions on assignability of L/Cs, the requirements for perfection of a security interest, Lender's general need to protect its security, Tenant's concerns about the use of the L/C and its proceeds, and the practical mechanics of any L/C create a robust three-party agenda among Tenant, Landlord, and Lender. Full and proper resolution of that agenda can require a complex and sophisticated (and tedious) three-party agreement, a matter beyond the scope of this Chapter.¹⁷

Notice of Transfer. Although a Beneficiary cannot transfer an L/C easily,¹⁸ this model L/C solves that problem by saying Beneficiary can freely transfer the L/C upon notice to Issuer, provided that Issuer can legally do business with the transferee.¹⁹ Should Beneficiary also notify Applicant of the transfer? If so, that point belongs in the Lease or other underlying agreement, not the L/C.

16 If an L/C replaces a large security deposit, Landlord and Lender would like to try to recharacterize an L/C as something other than a security deposit or a substitute for one. If they say it enough times, maybe it will be true. If the security deposit or L/C exceeds a year's rent, Landlord would be well advised to have the Guarantor (either a very creditworthy party or a single-purpose entity) rather than the Tenant deliver it.

17 The author can provide a sample agreement on request. As a "lite" solution to this problem, Landlord might give Lender the original L/C and a signed drawing certificate. Of course, Landlord could still terminate the signer's authority and notify Issuer of that termination. A Lender might mitigate that risk through a tailored nonrecourse carveout.

18 ISP § 6.02(a) states that a standby L/C "is not transferable unless it so states."

19 For example, anti-money-laundering law and the USA PATRIOT Act prohibit certain financial institutions (all likely Issuers) from doing business with certain persons.

Lost L/C. As a fundamental expectation in commercial real estate transactions, Beneficiary must present an original L/C to draw upon it.²⁰ If Beneficiary cannot locate the original, Beneficiary loses.²¹ The original L/C therefore matters far more than an original promissory note.²² Widespread awareness of the importance of original L/Cs means that any Beneficiary focuses very carefully on storing, tracking, and knowing where to find original L/Cs. The requirement for an original also facilitates the reliable transfer and collateral assignment of L/Cs, and the reliable perfection of security interests in L/Cs. But it also creates a huge pitfall for any Beneficiary.

A Beneficiary concerned about this pitfall could propose language in the L/C to address it. For example, Beneficiary might try to remove any requirement to deliver the original L/C when drawing upon it. Any such proposal would not be market standard, at least in commercial real estate, but Issuers do sometimes agree to it.²³

Without going as far as entirely removing the requirement for an original, this language (similar to the procedures for lost notes or lost cashier's checks) might help mitigate a Beneficiary's concern:

(a) Reissuance Package. At Beneficiary's request at any time before the Expiry Date or whenever this L/C requires Beneficiary to deliver to Issuer the original of this L/C (the "Original"), Beneficiary may deliver the following to Issuer (collectively, a "Reissuance Package"):

(1) Status of Original. Either (i) if the Original has been damaged or mutilated, then the damaged or mutilated

20 If Issuer has amended the L/C, the same requirements apply to any amendments.

21 ISP provides, for example: "If an original standby is lost, stolen, mutilated, or destroyed, the issuer need not replace it or waive any requirement that the original be presented under the standby." ISP § 3.12(a).

22 Mortgage lenders routinely misplace, destroy, or lose most promissory notes. The 2008 financial crisis and subsequent litigation demonstrated the prevalence of this problem and the delay and spurious issues it can cause.

23 Not requiring an original of the L/C may raise its own issues. For example, Beneficiary will want to prevent a fraudulent draw upon the L/C. As one solution, the L/C might specify the exact account into which Issuer will fund the proceeds of any draw. That might leave open the risk that someone could improperly request an amendment of the L/C to change the account number – a risk that might increase if that person didn't need to deliver the original L/C to obtain an amendment.

Original, or (ii) if the Original has been lost, misplaced, or destroyed, then Beneficiary's certification to that effect;

(2) Indemnity. Beneficiary's indemnity in ordinary and customary form against any claims or drawings that may be made against Issuer on account of the Original, expiring 60 days after the then-current Expiry Date (the "Indemnity"); and

(3) Bond. Unless Beneficiary's credit is reasonably satisfactory to Issuer, a bond or other security for the Indemnity.²⁴

(b) Effect of Reissuance Package. After Beneficiary delivers a Reissuance Package to Issuer:

(1) Drawing. If Beneficiary is otherwise entitled to draw upon the L/C, then Beneficiary may do so as if Beneficiary had submitted the Original; and

(2) Replacement Original. Issuer shall, upon request (except to the extent that Beneficiary simultaneously draws upon the L/C), reissue the Original simultaneously with receipt of, and in exchange for, the Reissuance Package. Any such reissued Original shall be deemed the Original L/C for all purposes.

Nonconforming Draw. General principles of entropy may cause: (a) any Beneficiary to wait until the last minute to draw upon an L/C; (b) that last-minute drawing to be defective, because drawing an L/C can turn out to be more difficult than Beneficiary expected; and (c) Beneficiary to lose out as a result, because Beneficiary does not have time for a "do over." To respond to that possibility, one could add this language, which can help a Beneficiary, but is utterly nonstandard:

If (a) Beneficiary attempts to draw upon this L/C in the last ____ Banking Days before the Expiry Date and (b) Beneficiary's Draw Documents are for any reason incomplete, ineffective, defective, or incorrect, or incorrectly presented, then the Expiry Date shall automatically be extended (but only once) until the date ____ Banking Days after Issuer first notified Beneficiary of occurrence of (b), including a reasonably detailed explanation of all deficiencies.

24 Consider deleting clause (3), at least as long as Beneficiary has not transferred the L/C. Any requirement for a bond will incur significant costs and create issues if Beneficiary ever actually must deliver a Reissuance Package.

Effect of Nonrenewal. This L/C includes “evergreen” language, so that the expiry date automatically renews every year. That structure has become quite common, eliminating the need to require annual renewals and the attendant risk of Issuer’s forgetting to monitor the renewals. In theory, this language allows Issuer to avoid incurring credit risk for more than a year at a time, thereby keeping bank regulators happy. But an evergreen structure also creates evidentiary issues: Beneficiary cannot easily prove (or satisfy itself) the L/C remains in effect after the stated initial expiry date. The model L/C accompanying this Chapter includes language to require Issuer to confirm the current expiry date of the L/C from time to time.²⁵ Beneficiary’s risk of missing a nonrenewal notice amounts to substantially the same risk as Beneficiary’s forgetting about the expiry date and letting the L/C expire without being drawn. Both represent any Beneficiary’s single largest pitfall in accepting an L/C.

Deemed Draw at Expiry. Beneficiary may want the L/C to say that if the L/C expires (especially an expiration because Issuer blocked an automatic “evergreen” renewal) and has not been drawn upon, then Beneficiary will be deemed automatically to have drawn upon the L/C the moment before it expired (much like the treatment of exchange-traded options). From Landlord’s perspective, this would seem a perfectly reasonable and appropriate way to eliminate the biggest pitfall in accepting any L/C – the risk that it will expire without being drawn upon when it should have been. Such measures rarely appear, though.²⁶ This language, which is entirely nonstandard, should adequately protect Beneficiary:²⁷

25 If Issuer fails to provide the confirmation, Beneficiary would want the right to draw upon the L/C. The Lease or other underlying agreement would need to cover this point.

Effective on any Expiry Date,²⁸ Beneficiary shall automatically be deemed to have validly presented to Issuer fully conforming Draw Documents for the entire remaining amount of this L/C. Issuer shall then, both before and after the Expiry Date:

(a) Obligation to Pay. Be irrevocably and unconditionally obligated to pay the entire amount of this L/C to Beneficiary;

(b) L/C Proceeds. Hold the proceeds of such deemed draw solely for Beneficiary's benefit, pending Beneficiary's written directions on disbursement, and promptly comply with such written directions;

(c) Required Documents. Be entitled to require, simultaneously with such disbursement (solely to complete Issuer's files), that Beneficiary present either (i) Draw Documents in the form this L/C would otherwise require; or, at Issuer's option, (ii) the original of this L/C and Beneficiary's consent to its cancellation.

26 Tenant might worry that an automatic draw upon expiration could create exposure for Tenant if, for example, Tenant has just delivered a replacement L/C but Issuer hasn't yet realized that this has occurred. If one wanted to provide for automatic draws on expiry, it would be easy enough to address Tenant's concern.

27 The author has never seen such language in an L/C. Anonymous Tenant's Counsel worries that the proposal in text may not be consistent with the fundamental theory of standby L/Cs; in other words, automatic draws under any circumstances are just not part of the vocabulary of L/Cs. But why not? The author would argue that any expiry of an L/C without a draw (unless Beneficiary has consented to termination of the L/C) will always correlate with circumstances where Beneficiary should receive a cash deposit, at least in temporary substitution for the L/C. Thus, the concept of automatic payment merely protects Beneficiary from falling into a trap, and nothing prevents the parties from agreeing to precisely such an arrangement.

28 An earlier version of this model L/C offered language deeming a draw to have occurred as soon as Issuer sends or Beneficiary receives any Nonrenewal Notice. Anonymous Tenant's Counsel described that concept as "just nuts" and argued "you can't do that." Anonymous Tenant's Counsel considered it elementary and obvious that Tenant should always get notice of nonrenewal and should have an opportunity to solve any problem before Landlord precipitously goes ahead and draws the L/C. Anonymous Tenant's Counsel says Tenant should not find itself in a position where Landlord holds Tenant's cash and Tenant has to "beg" to get it back. The author found those arguments persuasive, and thus the suggested language now defers any deemed draw until an actual Expiry Date has occurred (either because the L/C specifies a hard Expiry Date or because Issuer elects not to renew an "evergreen" L/C). Given industry standards and Issuer expectations, however, the entire debate remains academic.

Expiry Reminder. Along similar lines, and just as rare, the L/C might obligate Issuer to remind Beneficiary 30 days before the L/C expires that it is about to expire (for example, because of the impending outside Expiry Date of an evergreen L/C). Failure to deliver the reminder notice would extend the Expiry Date.²⁹

Transfer Fees. Issuer will typically expect to collect a transfer fee if Beneficiary ever transfers the L/C (for example, if Landlord sells or refinances the building). Beneficiary will want Applicant to bear this fee. If Applicant is willing to do so (perhaps subject to some limit on frequency), then the Lease or other underlying agreement would incorporate that concept and let Beneficiary draw upon the L/C if Applicant does not pay. As an alternative, Beneficiary might insist that Issuer address all fees in the reimbursement agreement with Applicant, and leave Beneficiary out of it. In that case, Beneficiary might request this language in the L/C:

Issuer shall look solely to Applicant to pay any fee for any transfer of this L/C. Such payment is not a condition to any transfer.

Beneficiary can solve this problem by saying in the Lease or other agreement that if the Issuer requires Beneficiary to pay a transfer fee and Applicant doesn't pay it, then Beneficiary can draw the L/C.

[37.4] V. SOME ISSUES TO CONSIDER

Beneficiary and its counsel will want to think about these issues when Beneficiary accepts an L/C.

Escrow. Try not to place any L/C in escrow. If a dispute arises about the underlying transaction, Applicant may try to direct the escrowee (sometimes called escrow agent) not to draw upon the L/C. In that case, the escrowee may “freeze” while the L/C expires. On the other hand, one can probably eliminate this risk through appropriate drafting in the escrow documentation, with a suitable acknowledgment from the escrowee and all other parties. One could also provide for a “deemed draw” upon expiry, as suggested above.

Expiry. The “expiry date” (not “expiration date” in L/C usage) of any L/C should be at least 30 days, preferably up to 90 days, after the last day by which Applicant must perform the obligation that the L/C backs. Give Beneficiary some time to draw upon the L/C if necessary – twice, if necessary, just in case the first draw doesn’t get it right. Depending on the circumstances, Beneficiary might need some time to calculate Tenant’s final rent bill under the Lease, or Tenant’s last rent check might bounce. Beneficiary will not want to feel pressured during that process, and Applicant will not want Beneficiary to “jump the gun” and submit a sight draft under the L/C. The L/C expiry date should give Beneficiary enough time to pull together a final bill that Landlord knows will be reliably final and confirm that any other loose ends have been fully tied up.

Signing Procedures. Make the drawing procedures particularly simple and direct so they do not create issues. For example, if Landlord is a joint venture with complicated signing authority, don’t require Landlord to sign Draw Documents. Instead, state that any designated venturer may sign them. Keep the Draw Documents as simple as possible – ideally just a sight draft and the L/C, without a drawing certificate or third-party evidence of anything. The more flexible the L/C offers about who may sign Draw Documents, and what they must include, the easier and quicker the L/C will be to draw upon if the need ever arises (and the less likely Beneficiary will need to try more than once to achieve a successful draw). This may make a great deal of difference when any Beneficiary actually tries to draw upon the L/C, often a few days before the expiry date. On the other hand, the easier an L/C is to draw upon, the more one must consider the risk of fraudulent diversion of the proceeds. As a fraud prevention measure, the L/C might designate exactly how Issuer must disburse the proceeds of any draw.³⁰

Beneficiary’s Address. If Issuer ever sends any Nonrenewal Notice, or other notice, Issuer will send it to Beneficiary at Beneficiary’s address stated in the L/C. Beneficiary must know when it has received such a notice, and act upon it. If Beneficiary is a large organization, any such notice may get lost. Therefore, Beneficiary’s address should include information that will help prevent this from happening. Particularly for a long-term L/C, Beneficiary should avoid having L/C notices go to specific individuals. Instead, the address of the notice recipient should refer to a position, such as “Attention: Director of West Coast Leasing,” and an identification number for the particular lease or contract.³¹ The L/C might also require any notices to go to two or more recipients, with a copy to designated counsel. If any notice recipient relocates, the parties must remember to correct the L/C notice address and make appropriate mail forwarding arrangements, and then remember to renew those arrangements when they expire. If Beneficiary replaces its counsel, Beneficiary should remember to tell Issuer, in compliance with any notice procedures under the L/C. These concerns become even more important than usual for notices under an evergreen L/C, with the risk of early and unexpected nonrenewal.

[37.5] VI. OTHER DOCUMENTATION

Anyone using this model L/C should also consider these documentation issues for the overall transaction, including items and exhibits they must attach to the L/C.

Underlying Obligation. An L/C merely secures an underlying obligation. The underlying documentation (e.g., the Lease) should clearly describe that underlying obligation and clearly allow the L/C beneficiary to draw upon the L/C under appropriate circumstances³² without satisfying burdensome conditions or drawing requirements. Applicant will want to be able to reduce or replace the L/C, and may want some flexibility about the form of future replacements. The author can provide standard contract language for use when an L/C backs any obligation. Some of these provisions are non-obvious. To avoid bankruptcy risks relating to Applicant, Beneficiary would in theory prefer a “direct pay” L/C, so that Beneficiary never accepts payment directly from Applicant, but instead only from Issuer (by drawing upon the L/C), even if Applicant would otherwise pay the obligation in the ordinary course without a default. Such an L/C might no longer be considered a “standby” L/C.

31 To avoid issues, the L/C should state that any notice will not be effective unless it contains all the required information.

32 Beneficiary would want those circumstances to include: (a) an Event of Default under the Lease or other agreement; (b) Issuer downgrade; (c) Issuer's failing to maintain an office in a particular place where the L/C can be drawn; (d) Applicant's failing to pay any cost of transferring or re-issuing the L/C when necessary; (e) other possible impairment of the L/C; (f) Applicant's or possibly some other person's (e.g., a guarantor's) bankruptcy (or similar event), even if not enforceable against Applicant as an Event of Default; and (g) upcoming L/C expiry (e.g., within 60 days) unless Applicant has satisfactorily renewed or replaced the L/C. Before Beneficiary draws upon the L/C, Applicant will seek notice and opportunity to cure at least some of these circumstances, many of which do not constitute a default under the Lease or otherwise reflect adversely on Applicant/Tenant. Beneficiary should resist, but should agree to release the L/C proceeds if Applicant somehow cures the problem and restores the L/C after Beneficiary drew upon the L/C.

Additional Exhibits to L/C. One could attach to any L/C exhibits setting forth the required forms of certain additional ancillary documents. Those could include: (a) drawing certificate, which would require Beneficiary to certify the circumstances that entitle Beneficiary to draw upon the L/C; and (b) termination certificate. This model L/C omits a form of drawing certificate because a Beneficiary should try to reject the entire concept of any drawing certificate. This model L/C omits a form of termination certificate because it rarely causes trouble. If anyone wants to include a termination certificate, they certainly can. It just creates some extra work and offers an easy opportunity to complicate and lengthen any document unnecessarily. The author can provide sample termination certificates. One might argue that even the two exhibits attached to this model L/C are neither crucial nor worth the time they might take to prepare and negotiate.

Where's the L/C? Counsel to Beneficiary must determine how best to hold the L/C (for example, in a vault). Establish a clear written record and a receipt showing who received the L/C after closing, and who will monitor it. Distribute that written record to everyone who might need to find the L/C. File a copy in each place where someone might look for the L/C, including the closing document set for the transaction. When Beneficiary assumes counsel holds the L/C, counsel should be ready to show, beyond question, that someone else dropped the hot potato.

Reimbursement Agreement. Issuer will confirm that its Reimbursement Agreement is in place before Issuer issues an L/C.³³ To the extent that the expiry date of an L/C does not coincide with the expiration/termination date of Applicant's revolving credit agreement, Issuer may find itself in a somewhat awkward position if an L/C remains outstanding at that point. When the credit agreement expires, it should require Applicant to cash collateralize any open L/Cs, or arrange replacement L/Cs from the new revolving lender.³⁴ The credit agreement might also excuse Issuer from issuing any L/C whose expiry date postdates the scheduled termination date of the credit agreement.

33 Beneficiary may sometimes want to be a party to the Reimbursement Agreement, or at least receive copies of notices under the Reimbursement Agreement or related revolving credit agreement. This might allow Beneficiary to monitor any possible problems involving Applicant. One might also describe the concept as an example of lawyers thinking too hard.

34 This assumes the absence of a credit crisis at that particular moment. If Applicant anticipates needing to replace an L/C because of a change in Applicant's revolving lender, the underlying document (e.g., the Lease) will need to give Applicant that right. Otherwise the outgoing revolving lender may need to leave its L/C outstanding, and then back that L/C with a new L/C in its favor issued by the incoming revolving lender.

Other Reimbursement Obligations. The Reimbursement Agreement between Issuer and Applicant does not exhaust the reimbursement issues that lurk behind any L/C. If Applicant reimburses Issuer for a draw, should Applicant have any rights against anyone else? For example, if Applicant constitutes only one of several partners of Tenant, should the other partners agree to reimburse some share of any reimbursement payment Applicant might make to Issuer? Are those partners creditworthy? Should the reimbursement obligation come from the other partners' ultimate owners or principals? And how should the partnership agreement treat any payments Applicant makes to Issuer, and any reimbursements of those payments? Does Applicant (if not actually Tenant) want any right to participate in negotiations that might precede a draw upon the L/C? The parties should negotiate and sign appropriate documents to deal these issues when Applicant obtains the L/C and gives it to Beneficiary.

Noncompliant L/C. The Lease might say that Landlord may accept an L/C that does not fully meet Landlord's requirements, with Tenant obligated to fix it quickly. If Tenant does not, then Landlord can draw. Such provisions may save time and trouble during the L/C issuance process for a closing. If Landlord accepts a noncompliant L/C, then Landlord must remember to follow through and fix it, often easier in theory than practice.³⁵ As a far superior alternative, Landlord should insist on seeing a draft of the L/C well before the Lease signing date, and all parties should encourage Issuer not to actually "issue" the final L/C until Landlord has actually approved the draft. (Premature issuance seems to be quite common, and sometimes leads to discussions about multiple issuance fees.)

Tickler File Entry. Place reminders of any upcoming expiry date(s) on a calendar and in an appropriate "tickler" file. Remind the client to do the same, preferably in writing. Allocate this responsibility in an unambiguous way, to avoid claims that counsel agreed to monitor the upcoming expiry date and the need to draw upon the L/C, unless counsel intends to assume such responsibility, usually inadvisable. If counsel does remind Landlord of an upcoming expiry date, counsel should also remind Landlord that counsel does not assume responsibility to remember future expiry dates.

LETTER OF CREDIT³⁶

Date: _____, 201_

_____ (“Beneficiary”)

Attention: _____

L/C No.: _____

Ladies and Gentlemen:

_____ (“Issuer”) establishes³⁷ in favor of Beneficiary the irrevocable³⁸ Letter of Credit numbered as identified above (as validly amended and extended from time to time, the “L/C”) for an aggregate amount of $_____, expiring at __:00 p.m. on _____ or, if that day is not a Banking Day, then the next succeeding Banking Day (that date, as extended from time to time, the “Expiry Date”). “Banking Day” means a weekday except a weekday when commercial banks in _____ are authorized or required to close.

Issuer authorizes Beneficiary to draw upon Issuer for the account of _____ (“Applicant”), under the terms and conditions of this L/C.

Funds under this L/C are available by presenting these documents (the “Draw Documents”): [(a) the original L/C and (b)]³⁹ a signed sight draft 36 This model L/C should be used only by attorneys familiar with L/C procedures and admitted to practice in the jurisdiction whose law governs this L/C. Any such attorney may obtain an editable version of this model L/C from the author. The author provides no assurances about the enforceability or sufficiency of this model L/C, either generally or for specific transactions.

37 Issuers often write *L/C*s in the first person plural, drifting into and out of the third person. Consistent use of the third person seems more appropriate.

38 ISP makes this word unnecessary, but Beneficiaries like it.

39 Almost every L/C requires Beneficiary to deliver the original L/C when drawing. Without such a requirement, one would want to add a statement like: “Beneficiary need not present the original of the L/C.” This approach could simplify Beneficiary’s life, but it is off market and could introduce potential for confusion or even fraud. See also the further introductory comments about lost *L/C*s.

[substantially]⁴⁰ in the form of Exhibit A, with blanks filled in and bracketed items provided as appropriate. Beneficiary need not provide any other evidence of authority, certificate, or documentation.⁴¹

Beneficiary must present Draw Documents at Issuer's office at _____⁴² on or before the Expiry Date by personal presentation, overnight courier such as FedEx, or messenger, Beneficiary may also present Draw Documents on or before the Expiry Date by fax to (____) ____-____. Issuer may change its fax number by written notice to Beneficiary identifying this L/C by number.⁴³

Beneficiary may also present Draw Documents on or before the Expiry Date by scanning such Draw Documents and submitting the entire scan image (in PDF, JPG, TIF or other widely accepted graphic format) as an attachment to an email message sent to _____@_____ or _____@_____,⁴⁴ with "read receipt" requested. Issuer may change its email address by written notice to Beneficiary identifying this L/C by number. If Beneficiary submits Draw Documents by email in accordance with this paragraph and all such email messages are returned

40 Unlike ordinary contract law, L/C practice typically does not tolerate "substantial compliance." Issuer may favor the standard of "strict compliance," which has traditionally governed L/C practice. There is, however, some movement from "strict" to "substantial" compliance, even in the world of L/C's. See, e.g., UCP Articles 14 and 16. As a compromise, the L/C could say: "Typographical errors shall not constitute discrepancies unless they refer to the date, amount, or identifying number of this L/C."

41 ISP negates any requirement for any "solemnity, officialization, or any other formality." ISP § 4.12(a). In general, if a signature looks like it complies with the L/C, then ISP treats it as compliant. ISP § 4.07. This eliminates any need to refer to the "purported" signature of Beneficiary. One might argue that the preceding sentence in the model L/C adds no value, but it may give comfort to Beneficiary.

42 Beneficiary wants to draw locally. The L/C should specify a street address. The underlying Lease will often require that any L/C must allow Beneficiary to draw upon the L/C within a specified geographical area. In practice, major Issuers move their letter of credit counters from time to time, and many L/C's cannot be drawn in New York. Beneficiaries will have to deal with this problem, although can reasonably demand that they can draw their L/C's within the Continental United States.

43 Beneficiary will at some point present an L/C by visiting a website and typing the L/C number and a password. That point (or any point close to it) has not yet been reached at time of writing. L/C practice favors adherence to market standards and custom — more so than almost any other area of banking or legal practice. Such adherence means that change comes slowly. One can still usually present an L/C by fax. But now that the rest of the business world has largely eliminated fax as a means of communication, this paragraph seems rather optional, particularly if the parties include the next paragraph.

as undeliverable (or Landlord fails to receive even one “read receipt” within two Banking Days), then: (a) the Expiry Date shall automatically be extended until the date ___ Banking Days after the attempted submission of Draw Documents, if the Expiry Date would otherwise occur within such extension period; (b) by any other means of submission this L/C allows, Beneficiary shall promptly resubmit Draw Documents and notify Issuer of the failed draw and any resulting extension of the Expiry Date;⁴⁵ and (c) Issuer shall promptly specify at least two valid email addresses for future submissions of Draw Documents.

After any electronic presentation, but not as a condition to its effectiveness, Beneficiary shall with reasonable promptness deliver original Draw Documents by any other means.⁴⁶

Issuer will on request issue a receipt for Draw Documents.

Issuer agrees, irrespective of any claim by any other person, to honor drafts drawn under and in conformity with this L/C, within the maximum amount of this L/C, presented to Issuer on or before the Expiry Date, provided Issuer also receives on or before the Expiry Date any other Draw Documents this L/C requires. Issuer shall pay this L/C [only] by [check or wire transfer] [wire transfer to this account: _____] [check payable to the order of Beneficiary and delivered to _____].⁴⁷

If Beneficiary presents proper Draw Documents to Issuer on or before the Expiry Date, then Issuer shall pay under this L/C at or before this time (the “Payment Deadline”): (a) if presentment is made at or before noon of any Banking Day, then the close of such Banking Day; and (b) otherwise, 45 This paragraph is entirely new, and the author has not actually used it in any L/C. It seems reasonable, however, to provide for submission of Draw Documents by email. The length of the paragraph suggests that email submissions are not issue-free.

46 This paragraph is optional.

47 Nothing in the preceding sentence is mandatory. Specificity about payment mechanisms can reduce risk of fraud. Beneficiary may want the right to change payment mechanisms, but this may increase the risk of fraud.

the close of the next Banking Day.⁴⁸ Issuer waives any right to delay payment beyond the Payment Deadline.

If Issuer determines that Draw Documents are not proper, then Issuer shall so advise Beneficiary in writing, within one Banking Day after the Payment Deadline.⁴⁹

Partial drawings are permitted. This L/C, as reduced, shall survive any partial drawings.⁵⁰

Issuer shall have no duty [or right] to inquire into the validity of or basis for any draw under this L/C or any Draw Documents. Issuer waives any defense based on (any claim of) fraud.⁵¹

[The Expiry Date shall automatically be extended by one year (but never beyond _____ [the “Outside Date”])⁵² unless, on or before the date 90 days before any Expiry Date, Issuer has given Beneficiary notice that the Expiry Date shall not be so extended (a “Nonrenewal Notice”). Issuer shall promptly upon request confirm any automatic extension of the Expiry Date under the preceding sentence by amending this L/C. Any 48 Tenant and Issuer may argue that the language in text establishes too short a deadline. A requirement for one-day turnaround is “nuts,” according to Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel. “It’s a bank; they don’t do my stinky standby L/C as their main piece of business.” Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel argues, saying that a short deadline does not give Landlord any meaningful practical benefit. Landlord would, of course, disagree. As of 2016, the author has noticed a trend toward longer Payment Deadlines, sometimes up to four Banking Days after presentation. This trend underscores the importance of drawing upon an L/C well before the Expiry Date.

49 This deadline seems short, but is it excessively so? ISP § 5.01(a) says Issuer must give notice of dishonor “within a time after presentation of documents which is not unreasonable.” Three business days meets the test; more than seven does not. ISP § 5.01(a)(i). Any notice of dishonor “shall state all discrepancies upon which the [dishonor] is based.” ISP § 5.02. Thus, the L/C need not state that requirement.

50 ISP § 3.08 makes this paragraph unnecessary. If Beneficiary might make partial draws, though, Beneficiary might not want to rely on ISP, and will probably want to see this language. It does no harm.

51 The preceding sentence is highly nonstandard, but not entirely beyond the realm of L/C practice. ISP leaves the matter to whatever law would otherwise govern. ISP § 1.05(c). Landlord would argue that most claims of “fraud” just relate to the validity of the draw – not genuine “fraud” at all – and should not involve Issuer or defer payment of the L/C. Anonymous Tenant’s Counsel argues that if in fact Issuer can determine that a draw is fraudulent, then Issuer should not pay it; Issuer should not waive that defense; and Landlord shouldn’t care because Landlord won’t do anything fraudulent anyway. The discussion ultimately may go back to the meaning of “fraud,” a term that can often mean whatever a creative lawyer wants it to mean, including any breach of contract or even just “not playing nice” if the creative lawyer can make it sound bad enough.

52 For a Lease, this date will occur perhaps 90 days after the scheduled expiration date of the Lease, so Landlord can calculate and bill any final escalations that Tenant might owe.

such amendment is not required for the automatic extension to be effective. Issuer need not give any notice of the Outside Date.]

[Beneficiary may from time to time transfer this L/C to any transferee (the “Transferee”), provided that such transfer does not violate any legal requirement that governs Issuer. Beneficiary or Transferee shall consummate such transfer by delivering to Issuer the original L/C and a Transfer Notice [substantially]⁵³ in the form of Exhibit B, signed by Beneficiary, designating Transferee.⁵⁴ Upon any transfer: (a) all references to Beneficiary shall automatically refer to Transferee, who may then exercise all rights of Beneficiary; and (b) if requested, Issuer shall promptly reissue or amend this L/C (simultaneously with the surrender of this L/C to Issuer) in favor of Transferee as Beneficiary.]

Any notice to Beneficiary shall be in writing and delivered by hand (or by overnight (one night)⁵⁵ delivery service such as FedEx), with proof of delivery, at the above address. [As a condition to the effectiveness of any notice, Issuer shall deliver a copy of it, by the same means, to: _____.]⁵⁶ Beneficiary may change any notice address or addressee by written notice to Issuer. Issuer will upon request confirm the change.

This L/C is subject to: (a) International Standby Practices, ISP98, International Chamber of Commerce Publication No. 590 (“ISP”); and (b) to the extent not inconsistent with ISP, the law of the State of [New York].

Very truly yours,

[Issuer Signature]

53 See earlier comments on not using this word in L/C practice.

54 The use of a transfer form is not strictly necessary, but will certainly simplify and speed along any future transfer. When Beneficiary wants to sell or refinance the building – often on an expedited basis — Beneficiary will be glad to see a sample transfer form attached to the L/C, rather than face the burden of tracking down Issuer’s requirements.

55 Courts have sometimes interpreted “overnight” to mean something other than just one night.

56 Issuers often object to giving copies of notices to counsel.

If Beneficiary or Lender wants the proceeds to go elsewhere, this would require, at a minimum, a document assigning the proceeds or at least an irrevocable designation of a Lender-controlled account to receive the L/C Proceeds. CHAPTER THIRTY-EIGHT

AN UPDATE ON THE BANKRUPTCY LAW OF LARGE LETTERS OF CREDIT FOR LEASES

Joshua Stein, Esq.*

* Earlier versions of this Chapter appeared in the first edition of this work and in The American College of Real Estate Lawyers Papers, March 2001. This Chapter appeared in substantially its present form as an article in 44 American Bar Association Real Property, Trust and Estate Law Journal, Summer 2009, at 299, and is reprinted here with consent. The author acknowledges with thanks the editorial contributions and comments of the editors of that Journal (particularly Professor James R. A tenant under any commercial lease will often deliver a letter of credit in place of a cash security deposit as a way to give the landlord comfort that the tenant will perform its obligations under the lease. If that letter of credit (L/C) exceeds a year's rent and the tenant (Tenant) later files bankruptcy, then the landlord (Landlord) may find to its surprise that the L/C does not give Landlord the security for Tenant's obligations that Landlord expected. And Landlord's mortgage lender (Lender) may share Landlord's concerns.

These issues took center stage during the dotcom boom and subsequent bust around the turn of the twenty-first century. But the same issues can arise whenever Landlord accepts an L/C that exceeds a year's rent. One might expect to see more such L/Cs, at least in some markets, as all participants in real estate transactions refocus on fundamentals such as credit quality and credit enhancement.

Landlord's problems with taking a large L/C all trace back to 11 U.S. Code § 502(b)(6) (U.S.C.). That section of the Bankruptcy Code applies only to Landlords under real property leases. It potentially limits the amount of any claim¹ that Landlord can assert in Tenant's bankruptcy "for damages resulting from the termination of a lease of real property"² (the Claim Cap). Absent the Claim Cap, Landlord could assert a claim in Tenant's bankruptcy for whatever damages Landlord could assert in state court. The Claim Cap disallows some part of those damages in bankruptcy—potentially a very substantial part.

If Landlord's damages do not exceed one year's rent, the Claim Cap creates no problem or issue, and bankruptcy law will typically allow Landlord to file a claim for the entire amount of Landlord's damages.³ If, however, Landlord's damages exceed that level, Landlord may find that the Claim Cap limits Landlord's claim. More specifically, Landlord's claim arising from Tenant's breach of the lease will be capped at whichever of these two alternatives is lower: (1) 15% of the remaining rent

1 Submission and acceptance of a claim does not, of course, in and of itself assure payment. It merely begins the discussion.

2 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6). Landlords may therefore try to characterize their claims as something else, a technique this Chapter explores later.

3 See § 502(b)(6)(A).

under the lease⁴ or (2) three years' rent.⁵ Landlord can also include in its claim any unpaid rent due before Tenant filed.⁶ The Claim Cap seeks to prevent Landlord's claim from excessively diluting or crowding out the claims of other unsecured creditors.⁷

After the Claim Cap shrinks Landlord's claim, Landlord then joins the throng of unsecured creditors who typically receive pennies on the dollar for their claims. Landlord potentially suffers four times: first, if the lease defines or limits Landlord's damages; second, if state law further limits Landlord's claim; third, if the Claim Cap then further diminishes Landlord's claim; and fourth, if Landlord, with its diminished claim, becomes an unsecured creditor and might get paid only partially, just like any other unsecured creditor. Maybe Congress does not like Landlords.

Can Landlord avoid these problems by taking a huge security deposit? Suppose, for example, that Tenant gave Landlord a cash security deposit of $5X, but the Claim Cap limited Landlord's claim in Tenant's bankruptcy to $2X. What happens? Tenant's bankruptcy estate could force Landlord to disgorge $3X, the excess cash security deposit above the Claim Cap.

Landlord might intuitively think it can solve that problem by taking an L/C instead of cash as Tenant's security deposit. Under the same facts, if Landlord held an L/C for $5X instead of cash in the same amount, could Tenant's bankruptcy estate force Landlord to hand over (or "disgorge"⁸) any L/C proceeds in excess of $2X? Recent case law compels precisely

4 This piece of the formula will go down over time. Thus, although an L/C for more than a year's rent may not at lease signing cause a Claim Cap Problem, see infra note 9 and accompanying text, such an L/C can start to create a Claim Cap Problem as the remaining lease term drops. Landlord will often agree, however, that Tenant can reduce the amount of the L/C over time as well, thus preventing a creeping Claim Cap Problem. (One problem for Landlord prevents a second problem.)

5 See § 502(b)(6)(A).

6 Bankruptcy law measures the Claim Cap as of the earlier of the date when Tenant filed bankruptcy or the date when Landlord repossessed the leased premises. See § 502(b)(6). The preceding summary of the Claim Cap ignores certain issues involving definitions and calculations not important in this Chapter.

8 Use of the word "disgorge" in this context demonstrates how word choices and labels can dictate outcomes. If Tenant or its trustee in bankruptcy were instead asking a court to require Landlord to forfeit the benefit of a freely negotiated security package, the use of the latter words to describe the relationship might help dictate the opposite result. Other words that can drive outcomes sometimes include fair, the public interest, greedy, progressive, reform, and change.

this result (from Landlord's perspective, the Claim Cap Problem).⁹ In other words, taking an L/C does not eliminate Landlord's risk of seeing the Claim Cap diminish Landlord's claim to $2X.

What if Landlord does not actually convert the $5X L/C into cash or at least has not done so when Tenant files bankruptcy? If and when Landlord eventually draws upon the L/C and converts it into cash, does the cash then become a security deposit subject to the Claim Cap? Could Tenant's estate then recover the excess cash proceeds beyond the Claim Cap?¹⁰ If Landlord has not yet drawn upon the L/C—has not yet converted the L/C into cash—can Landlord ignore the Claim Cap? Does the answer depend on whether Landlord draws upon the L/C before or after Tenant's bankruptcy filing?

Until 2001, Landlord would not have thought that the Claim Cap could prevent Landlord from retaining the full proceeds of Tenant's L/C. In the one case that considered the Claim Cap Problem before 2001,¹¹ the court easily ruled for Landlord. Although the court did not go into great detail about the facts or analysis or indicate whether it thought the Claim Cap even applied, the decision included these Landlord-friendly comments:

The letter of credit at issue is a tripartite agreement that gave the landlord upon demand the right to obtain payment from a third party for which the debtor may be ultimately liable, but which the trustee cannot recover. . . .

[N]either the letter of credit nor its proceeds were property of the debtor's estate, and therefore the trustee may not . . . recover them.¹²

Practitioners and commentators, including the author, considered the Farm Fresh result intuitively obvious and appropriate.¹³ They focused ostensibly on the “independence principle” underlying all L/Cs and concluded, logically enough, that no Landlord holding an L/C should need to worry about the Claim Cap Problem.¹⁴ The independence principle at the foundation of all L/C transactions should mean that when Landlord accepts an L/C, that L/C creates a two-party relationship purely between Landlord and the issuer of the L/C (Issuer), which does not involve Tenant in any way. Thus, any Claim Cap Problem should belong entirely to Issuer, not Landlord.

These practitioners believed that the Claim Cap should limit only Landlord’s claims against a debtor in bankruptcy—a topic with no relevance at all to a Landlord’s right to draw upon an L/C or to apply the proceeds of such a draw, because both take place outside Tenant’s bankruptcy and arise only under the Landlord-Issuer relationship.¹⁵ A minimally reported Delaware case reached exactly that conclusion in 2001.¹⁶

The world changed in 2000 and 2001 when dotcom Tenants began their famous meltdown. As part of that meltdown, many new dotcom companies found themselves in bankruptcy—soon after they had just signed large leases that were expensive and difficult to negotiate, and often required huge L/Cs, given the state of the market at the time.

The cases that arose out of the dotcom meltdown showed that the Claim Cap Problem is real. Perhaps unsurprisingly, the bankruptcy courts protected the dotcom debtors.¹⁷ In those cases, Landlords learned that the independence principle did not give them the armor they thought it gave them, and did not shift to L/C issuers the credit risk implied by the Claim Cap. Some Landlords learned they had to disgorge any “excess” L/C proceeds to the bankrupt estate—a most unwelcome surprise.¹⁸

The law in this area evolved quickly. Three circuit courts and a bankruptcy appellate panel took up the Claim Cap Problem. Some of the decisions were not necessarily bad for Landlords, but none was good for Landlords.

In 2003, the Third Circuit decided one of these cases, *In re PPI Enterprises, Inc.*¹⁹ Solow—Landlord—drew upon the L/C and wanted to keep all the proceeds.²⁰ Going beyond the L/C, Solow also tried to assert a claim, subject to the Claim Cap, for unpaid rent against Tenant—PPI Enterprises (PPIE).²¹ The court credited Landlord’s L/C proceeds against Landlord’s allowable claim.²² The court regarded the L/C as being identical to a cash security deposit and called Landlord’s position an attempt at an “end run around § 502(b)(6).”²³

The decision emphasized substance over form, focusing on the parties’ intent to use the L/C in place of a cash security deposit. The lease contained some language that invited the court to treat the L/C as being really a security deposit, just like a cash security deposit. For example, the lease described the L/C as being “in lieu of . . . cash security” that Tenant would replenish with cash if Landlord drew upon the L/C.²⁴ To the court, it was “clear the parties intended the [L/C] to operate as a security deposit.”²⁵ Therefore, the court treated the L/C proceeds as a security deposit and offset them against the Claim Cap.²⁶

The court feared that if it allowed Solow to keep the L/C proceeds and also make a bankruptcy claim up to the Claim Cap, that result could leave PPIE’s other creditors out in the cold—precisely the injury that Congress enacted 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6) to prevent.²⁷ Solow could achieve double payment and more. He could keep all the L/C proceeds—free of the Claim Cap—and Issuer could assert a claim in PPIE’s bankruptcy for that entire amount.²⁸ At the same time, Solow could file a claim, up to the Tonto Realty Corp.*, 143 F.2d 916 (2d Cir. 1944), half a century before. Oldden and some later legislative history support the notion that a debtor Tenant can reach its cash security deposit. Rather, his security deposit will be applied in satisfaction of the claim that is allowed under this paragraph.” H.R. Rep. No. 95-595, at 353–54 (1977); S. Rep. No. 95-989, at 63 (1978).

Claim Cap, in PPIE's bankruptcy.²⁹ The court stated, however, that it "need not decide the underlying question" regarding the interaction between L/Cs and the Claim Cap because of the parties' clear intent in this case.³⁰

Given the practical economic reality of the transaction and the words of the lease, the characterization of the L/C as a substitute for a cash security deposit in Solow hardly seems bizarre.

Although another court reached the same result, its approach suggested a somewhat more friendly view toward Landlord. In In re Mayan Networks Corp.,³¹ Landlord again received an L/C, in the amount of $648,966, "as security for the faithful performance by [Debtor] of all [Debtor's] obligations."³² This language, as in Solow, made the L/C sound like a substitute for a cash security deposit. To back the L/C, Tenant deposited with Issuer more than $650,000.³³ When Tenant defaulted, Landlord drew upon the L/C.³⁴

The bankruptcy court subtracted the L/C proceeds from Landlord's capped claim.³⁵ The Bankruptcy Appellate Panel for the Ninth Circuit agreed. The panel even went a step further, treating all L/C proceeds as a cash security deposit that the estate could recover from Landlord to the extent it exceeded the Claim Cap.³⁶

The court focused on how Landlord's L/C draw affected the debtor-Tenant's estate.³⁷ Even though the L/C itself was not property of Tenant's estate,³⁸ a draw triggered creation of an equivalent liability for the estate.³⁹ Thus the court found no difference between a cash security deposit and an L/C, the only actual distinction between them being the location of the money.⁴⁰

The decision turned almost entirely on the fact that Tenant had made a cash deposit with Issuer to back the L/C⁴¹—a line of inquiry that the independence principle would suggest should make no difference at all. To the contrary, the logic of the independence principle would suggest allowing Landlord to draw upon the entire L/C, with Issuer facing the burden of having to give up part of the cash deposit backing the L/C. It was Issuer, after all, who should have assumed all risks and burdens of Tenant’s creditworthiness and possible bankruptcy, and how any such bankruptcy might affect the L/C.

Two years later, the Ninth Circuit again focused on whether Tenant had posted a cash deposit to back its L/C. In In re AB Liquidating Corp.,⁴² Landlord accepted a $1 million L/C instead of a cash security deposit.⁴³ A year later, Tenant filed bankruptcy and rejected the lease.⁴⁴ Applying the Claim Cap, Landlord asserted a claim for $2 million against Tenant’s estate.⁴⁵ Landlord also drew upon the entire L/C.⁴⁶

Tenant tried to reduce Landlord’s claim by the $1 million that Landlord had drawn under the L/C.⁴⁷ Following the Mayan Networks logic, the Ninth Circuit agreed with the Bankruptcy Appellate Panel that when a debtor’s property fully collateralizes an L/C, as was the case here, the L/C is just like a cash security deposit and the court will reduce Landlord’s claim against the debtor-Tenant.⁴⁸

Mayan Networks and AB Liquidating Corp. leave open a crucial question: What if a debtor does not deliver cash collateral for the L/C? The Mayan Networks decision may offer Landlords some hope. The court said that if a debtor does not deliver cash security for an L/C, then the relationship among Landlord, Tenant, and Issuer more closely resembles a third-party guarantee.⁴⁹ Under that structure, if the guarantor (Issuer) paid the guaranteed obligation, the Claim Cap should not limit those payments by Issuer (treating Issuer as a guarantor).⁵⁰

The Mayan Networks decision focuses, at least in dicta, on how the L/C structure affects the debtor's estate. If an L/C draw does not hurt the debtor's estate, then the court might treat it like a "third-party guarantee" not subject to the Claim Cap.⁵¹ Conversely, as in Mayan Networks, if cash collateral backs an L/C and Landlord draws on the L/C, then the resulting use of cash collateral will reduce cash otherwise available to the debtor, thus hurting the estate and the other creditors, and supporting the court's adverse treatment of Landlord.⁵²

The same bankruptcy appellate court had reached much the same result in an earlier case, *In re Condor Systems, Inc.*⁵³ There, an employee held an L/C, but Issuer had no security.⁵⁴ When the employee drew upon the L/C, the court decided that a limit on employee claims in bankruptcy (similar to the Claim Cap) did not apply because the L/C draw did not diminish employer's estate.⁵⁵ This case, however, concerned an L/C in the employment context governed by § 502(b)(7), thus limiting its direct relevance to leases.⁵⁶

51 See id. An ordinary guarantee does not impair the debtor's estate, because it does not increase the debtor's total liabilities. It merely converts a debtor's direct liability (to a creditor who holds a guarantee) into a reimbursement liability (to the guarantor who paid the direct creditor).

The court stated: "we agree . . . that § 502(b)(6) provides an unreliable analogy for § 502(b)(7), and thus view security deposits on leases as distinguishable." Id. at 18. The court also stated, though: "[i]t does not follow, however, that every letter of credit or other third-party guarantee constitutes a security deposit. Rather, even in the landlord-tenant arena, parties must intend that it be a security deposit." Id. at 19. Thus, where the parties do not intend an L/C to operate as a security deposit, the logic of In re Condor may apply, so proceeds from such an L/C might not reduce the amount allowed under the Claim Cap.

The decision nevertheless suggests that the independence principle still lives, at least to some degree and in some contexts. The court stated that if an L/C is not intended to be a security deposit under a lease,⁵⁷ “the obligation to pay is direct and primary as between [Issuer] and [Landlord] and is . . . ‘independent’ of performance, or lack thereof, by anyone else” and that “settled letter of credit law requires [Issuer] to pay [Landlord], even if [Tenant] is broke.”⁵⁸

In 2005, the Fifth Circuit took up these issues and embarked on an entirely different analytical journey. In In re Stonebridge Technologies, Inc.,⁵⁹ Stonebridge, as Tenant, obtained an L/C for $1.5 million and backed it by pledging a certificate of deposit.⁶⁰ When Tenant filed bankruptcy and rejected the lease, EOP, as Landlord, drew upon the L/C.⁶¹ Content with the proceeds of the L/C because they exceeded EOP’s damages, EOP did not file a proof of claim for its actual-lease-rejection damages.⁶²

The bankruptcy court found for Tenant’s estate, characterizing the L/C proceeds as a security deposit subject to the Claim Cap.⁶³ The Fifth Circuit, however, decided that EOP could keep the L/C proceeds—regardless of the Claim Cap—because the Claim Cap plays no role if Landlord never files a claim against Tenant’s bankruptcy estate.⁶⁴ Section 502(b)(6) only caps claims against the bankruptcy estate, the court wrote.⁶⁵ In contrast, a draw upon an L/C does not involve a claim against the bankruptcy estate because it concerns contractual rights and duties separate from the relationship of the creditor and the debtor.⁶⁶

57 See id. The court noted that “[s]ecurity deposits are peculiar, term-of-art creatures of contract that have a rich history in the specialized field of landlord-tenant law,” and that “[w]here a letter of credit . . . is intended to be a security deposit under a lease, it may be appropriate to analyze the situation as involving a security deposit.” Id. at 18.

The Fifth Circuit mentioned the independence principle, treating the relations among the parties in a manner consistent with the independence principle and with intuitively obvious expectations about L/Cs outside bankruptcy.⁶⁷ The court suggested this approach when it said Issuer's obligations to Landlord, as beneficiary under the L/C, remain intact so long as Landlord does not alter the relationship with the debtor by filing a claim against the bankruptcy estate.⁶⁸ But the court avoided the more challenging question of what would happen if Landlord did make such a claim.⁶⁹

The travails of another EOP Landlord entity triggered another case in this area in 2007. In In re Connectix Corporation,⁷⁰ Landlord—another EOP entity—held an L/C in an amount less than the Claim Cap. Before Tenant filed bankruptcy, Landlord drew the L/C. The bankruptcy court required Landlord to credit the amount of that draw against Landlord's claim in bankruptcy.⁷¹ The court placed significant weight on the facts that: (a) the lease clearly treated the L/C as the equivalent of a security deposit; and (b) Tenant had deposited with Issuer a certificate of deposit (the equivalent of cash collateral) equal to the face amount of the L/C.

Though a significant amount of ink has been spilled recently (including by the author, here and elsewhere) on the Claim Cap Problem, the recent cases do seem to stand for three principles:

67 Likewise evidencing the Fifth Circuit's respect for the independence principle, the court had previously decided In re Compton Corp., 831 F.2d 586 (5th Cir. 1987). There, the Fifth Circuit stated "[i]t is well established that a letter of credit and the proceeds therefrom are not property of the debtor's estate" and that "the independence principle [is] the cornerstone of letter of credit law." Id. at 589–90.

68 See In re Stonebridge Techs., Inc., 430 F.3d at 271.

69 Two later L/C cases undercut the notion that Landlord's failure to file a claim somehow limits the court's ability to deal with L/C issues at a Tenant debtor's initiative. See In re Onecast Media, Inc., 439 F.3d 558 (9th Cir. 2006) (bankruptcy jurisdiction for dispute over whether L/C proceeds overcompensated Landlord for its actual damages); In re Builders Transp., Inc., 471 F.3d 1178 (11th Cir. 2006) (similar). Neither of these cases implicated the Claim Cap. Neither decision indicated that Landlord had filed a claim in Tenant's bankruptcy proceeding. Yet the bankruptcy courts were perfectly willing to hear Tenant's claims that Landlord should refund some part of the L/C proceeds. 71 Id. at 496, citing AB Liquidating Corp. and Mayan Networks Corp.

- (1) Whenever Landlord retains a cash security deposit, the bankruptcy courts will first apply the Claim Cap against Landlord's claim, then credit the cash security deposit against Landlord's remaining claim.⁷²
- (2) Courts will treat L/Cs as security deposits when Tenants give Issuer cash security. The presence of an actual cash deposit (even in Issuer's hands) makes the whole arrangement too much like a cash security deposit to treat it as anything else.
- (3) If the lease shows the parties intended to use an L/C in place of a cash security deposit, this increases the likelihood a court will apply the Claim Cap. Any suggestion that the L/C replaces or substitutes for a cash security deposit will raise a red flag.

The Mayan, AB Liquidating Corp., PPI, and Connectix decisions agree on all the points above.⁷³ Courts will not allow Landlords to end-run the Claim Cap by restructuring cash security deposits as L/Cs, or by having some third party (Issuer) hold Tenant's cash in a way that really just benefits Landlord. The courts have looked behind such arrangements, scrutinizing the overall relationship among the parties to see how the L/C operates in deciding whether to subject the L/C proceeds to the Claim Cap. Courts have done this based on the perceived congressional rationale that the Claim Cap was designed to prevent Landlords' claims from depleting Tenant debtors' estates to the detriment of other creditors.⁷⁴

These decisions leave open one major question: How will the courts treat non-collateralized L/Cs? Will the courts treat them as sufficiently remote from the debtor Tenant to establish a third-party guarantor relationship—as the Mayan court suggested? Or will the courts still view them as just another form of cash security deposit? (Those who argue that a security deposit is a security deposit—regardless of form, including an L/C—would also argue that the absence of collateral for the L/C should make no difference.) If courts choose the latter path and treat even an unsecured L/C as equivalent to a cash security deposit, the L/C, as a protective tool for Landlords, may well be irreparably injured, at least where Tenant provides the L/C and its amount causes a Claim Cap Problem.

Though today's state of the law seems unfavorable for L/C beneficiaries, Landlords should keep in mind a bit of history in the law of L/Cs. This area is marked by a history of occasional "weird" cases that produce unexpected results, usually because a court wants to "do justice" and finds a creative way to do so but does not sufficiently respect the fundamental principles of L/Cs. Such cases are ultimately ignored or discredited in many instances.⁷⁵ It is probably overoptimistic, however, to anticipate the same fate for the Claim Cap Problem cases this chapter discusses.

The Claim Cap Problem can drive the structuring of any lease transaction where the business deal contemplates that Landlord will obtain substantial protection—more than a year's rent—through a cash security deposit or an L/C.⁷⁶

If Landlord plans to obtain a large L/C, Landlord and its counsel should try to structure the transaction in a way that mitigates or even eliminates the Claim Cap Problem. To try to do that, Landlord can choose from a menu of possible techniques, many of them listed below. Some of these techniques overlap and may suggest other techniques or other problems.

None of these techniques is guaranteed to solve the Claim Cap Problem, but the following amount to a reasonably exhaustive (and perhaps exhausting) list of possibilities:⁷⁷

- Look Behind Reimbursement Arrangement. As noted above, the courts seem to look less favorably on L/Cs that are backed by cash deposits. Thus, Landlord should try to assure that Issuer has not received a cash deposit or other collateral.
- Do Not File Claim. The Stonebridge opinion suggests courts may be more willing to respect the independence of Issuer's payment to 75 See In re Twist Cap, Inc., 1 B.R. 284 (Bankr. M.D. Fla. 1979) (enjoining unsecured creditors from drawing upon L/Cs because it would indirectly hurt debtor); see also Celotex Corp. v. Edwards, 514 U.S. 300 (1995) (enjoining draws upon surety bonds much like L/Cs, to prevent financial chaos for debtor); In re Powerine Oil Co., 59 F.3d 969, 969–71 (9th Cir. 1995) (obligor paid an L/C-backed obligation; creditor released L/C; obligor filed bankruptcy; court required creditor to "disgorge" those payments as "preferences").

76 In addition to the Claim Cap Problem, Landlord may also need to consider state-law limitations on how Landlord can use L/C proceeds.

77 Lender may care a great deal about: (1) which technique Landlord chooses and (2) how Lender obtains a perfected and reliable security interest in, and practical ability to control, Landlord's rights. Any structure should consider Lender's agenda and might require a tri-party agreement among Landlord, Lender, and Tenant. For more on this topic and a sample document, see Chapter 39.

Landlord if Landlord does not file a claim, thus creating a relationship between itself and the bankruptcy proceeding.⁷⁸ Because Federal Rule of Bankruptcy Procedure 3004 authorizes a debtor to file a claim on behalf of a creditor, though, this theory of “Landlord uninvolvement” seems unlikely to have much practical impact.⁷⁹ Some post-Stonebridge cases also suggest Landlord cannot excuse itself from the bankruptcy process so easily.⁸⁰

- Guaranty Backed by L/C. The Mayan decision suggests that if an L/C draw will not diminish Tenant’s estate, then the L/C proceeds will not be subject to the Claim Cap because the L/C will, in effect, amount to a third-party guaranty relationship,⁸¹ which is exactly the result that the independence principle should have produced in any event.⁸² To accomplish this, the parties can agree to tie the L/C not to the lease, but instead to a totally independent third-party guaranty of the lease, issued by a third-party guarantor (the Guarantor). Guarantor’s general credit would not back the lease but would simply serve the purpose, Landlord hopes, of protecting the L/C from the Claim Cap.⁸³ If Guarantor itself were to file bankruptcy, then cases indicate that the Claim Cap would limit Landlord’s claim against Guarantor.⁸⁴ But if Tenant and only Tenant filed, it is generally believed that the Claim Cap would not protect the nonbankrupt Guarantor.⁸⁵ Landlord could then 83 As a rather obvious alternative, Guarantor’s general credit could replace the L/C (particularly if Guarantor’s general credit would alone support Issuer’s issuance of the L/C).

84 If Issuer took security from Guarantor for the L/C, Landlord would again find itself in a conundrum discussed in text.

85 In other words, if Tenant is in bankruptcy but Guarantor is not, then as a matter of state-law guaranty enforcement, the state court should not give the nonbankrupt Guarantor the benefit of the Claim Cap. This result seems logical, at least from Landlord’s perspective. The author has, however, been advised of occasional state-law cases that hold otherwise and apply Tenant’s Claim Cap to Landlord’s claim against a nonbankrupt Guarantor. Notwithstanding diligent research, the author has not been able to locate any such cases. If any reader is aware of them, a reward of one dollar will be paid for the correct citation(s). No security of any kind is being offered for the making of this payment. Any further discussion of how the Claim Cap applies to a nonbankrupt guarantor lies outside the present discussion. Anyone who proposes to use a guaranty in this context should at least consider this question.

draw upon the L/C based on the nonbankrupt Guarantor's failure to pay rather than because of anything related to Tenant or the lease. Landlord would say, with some basis, that the Claim Cap has no relevance to Landlord's rights against Guarantor or under the L/C. Under this structure, Guarantor would be either: (1) creditworthy enough that bankruptcy is unlikely; or (2) a bankruptcy-remote entity. In either case, Tenant and its principals need not have any interest in, or control of, Guarantor. Perhaps it is best if they do not. Guarantor might even be a third-party bonding company.⁸⁶ To avoid dragging Tenant's bankruptcy back into the picture, one could even require Guarantor to waive any right of reimbursement from Tenant if Landlord draws upon the L/C. In some permutations, this structure amounts to a miniaturized version of structured, off-balance-sheet financing. It may represent a very attractive and workable way to solve the Claim Cap Problem, although Landlord would need to consider the usual suretyship and related issues arising with any guaranty⁸⁷ and consider the vicissitudes that have started to befall similar structures in the larger financial world.

- No Cash Security. Landlord could plan to draw upon the L/C only to the extent necessary to cure defaults as and when they occur, never converting the L/C into a cash deposit to back the lease.⁸⁸ Under this strategy, Landlord would avoid creating an attractive pot of money in which Tenant's estate could claim an interest. Instead, the L/C would remain an L/C—undrawn upon to the extent possible—at all times. This approach requires no verbiage in the L/C beyond language that clearly allows partial draws.⁸⁹ It also requires enough flexibility in the lease to assure that whenever Landlord does decide to draw upon the L/C and the circumstances justify it, Landlord will be able to do so—and immediately disburse the L/C proceeds—without violating the lease.⁹⁰ Landlord then would plan to try to persuade the bankruptcy court that the undrawn L/C is something very different from a 86 The bonding company would bring to the transaction the fact that it is highly unlikely to go bankrupt. The L/C itself would not be backed by the bonding company's credit but probably by cash collateral from the bonding company.

cash security deposit (it isn't cash or anything like cash!) and should not be subject to disgorgement.⁹¹

- Do Not Draw. As a corollary to the preceding measure, Landlord should try very hard to defer any draw under the L/C until after Tenant has filed—and ideally until Tenant has exited—bankruptcy, recognizing that a draw before or during Tenant's bankruptcy creates a very attractive cash target and simply asks for trouble.⁹² Of course, if the L/C is about to expire, Landlord will have no choice but to draw upon it, even if Landlord must do so before Tenant files or during the bankruptcy. But if Landlord can wait until after Tenant files (or better yet until after the bankruptcy is over), this may place Landlord in a better position than if, at any time during the bankruptcy, Landlord held cash constituting the proceeds of a previous draw. A typical Landlord would, of course, want to draw first and ask questions later. Thus the suggestion in this paragraph would require Landlord to display an unusual and perhaps unrealistic level of restraint.⁹³
- Generous Expiry Date. To avoid the risk of being forced to draw upon an L/C that is about to expire and hence end up holding a pot of cash that might attract the interest of the bankruptcy court, Landlord might insist that the expiry date of the L/C be no earlier than ninety days or more after the scheduled expiration date of the lease.⁹⁴ In other words, Landlord would refuse to accept the more typical "evergreen" L/C, which creates an annual risk of nonrenewal and conversion to cash. Few Issuers are willing to issue such a long-term L/C, particularly for the types of Tenants that need to deliver these L/Cs.⁹⁵ If Landlord accepted such an L/C, Landlord might want to rethink the circumstances justifying a draw upon on the L/C, based on the wide 91 See supra note 8 and accompanying text.

92 See In re Mayan Networks, Inc., 306 B.R. at 298–99.

93 Before Landlord's counsel advises its client to resist its natural instinct, Landlord's counsel should reconfirm that once Tenant files, Landlord will still be able to draw upon the L/C, taking into account the specific lease and the effect of the automatic stay.

94 In Landlord's ideal world, any Tenant bankruptcy would toll the expiry date of the L/C. Few Issuers would accept such concept.

95 As a compromise measure, Issuer might issue a long-term L/C but have the right to replace the L/C at any time with a third-party surety bond or cash collateral at the account party's expense. Any such surety bond probably would be backed by Issuer's cash or credit, but the account party would be obligated to repay immediately any amounts drawn on the bond. This technique gives Issuer benefits equivalent to those of an evergreen L/C without burdening Landlord with a cash deposit. But how would the bankruptcy court treat the surety bond? Would it raise the Claim Cap Problem all over again?

variety of bad events that might occur over a very long lease term. Additional triggers might include Tenant bankruptcy (whether or not already a default under the lease); an Issuer downgrade; other issues relating to the L/C (such as Issuer's failure to maintain a convenient office to draw upon the L/C); or even Tenant's failure to meet certain financial tests. In the event of any such draw, what would Landlord do with the L/C proceeds? As suggested above, Landlord may prefer to hold an L/C that Landlord has not yet drawn upon but could draw upon at any time.

- Immediate Use of L/C Proceeds. If any default occurred under the lease, the lease could allow Landlord to draw upon the entire L/C, but use the proceeds first to cure Tenant's default and then only to prepay rent at the back end of the lease (and for no other purpose). Tenant would have no interest in such proceeds. After such prepayment of rent, Landlord might go a step further and require Tenant to restore the L/C, to restore its full amount as originally intended, but this may be excessive. Would a bankruptcy court treat such a prepayment of back-end rent as anything other than a cash security deposit? Probably not.
- No Interest in L/C Proceeds. The lease could include language in which Tenant purportedly disclaims any interest in the L/C proceeds and acknowledges that Landlord holds them free of any rights of Tenant. These words may be rather meaningless to the extent that the lease imposes specific obligations on Landlord regarding use of those proceeds, including an obligation to release L/C proceeds to Tenant under certain circumstances.
- L/C Independent of Tenant and Lease. Landlord could insist that the L/C come from anyone other than Tenant. For example, in the case of a dotcom Tenant, Landlord could insist that the L/C come from the venture capitalists behind Tenant, rather than from Tenant itself. Landlord could, as a matter of its own protection, look behind Issuer's reimbursement arrangements for the L/C and insist that the reimbursement obligation fall upon anyone other than Tenant, in a way that gives the reimbursing party no rights of any kind against Tenant.⁹⁶ As noted earlier, the application of the Claim Cap may vary depending on whether, and to what degree, Tenant must reimburse Issuer for any draw made under the L/C.

- Key Money and Back-End Free Rent. Tenant might deliver key money and be entitled to equivalent free rent at the end of the term, but only in the form of a refund for the last few months of rent at the end of the term and only if Tenant has not defaulted. A court would probably regard the structure as a slightly disguised cash security deposit.
- Separate Loan. The parties might eliminate the cash security deposit (or L/C security arrangements) and add to the transaction an independent tenant improvements loan from Landlord to Tenant, backed by a leasehold mortgage or an L/C, collaterally assigned, if necessary, the Lender.⁹⁷ That loan could even be unsecured, except by the L/C. In that case, the L/C might simply back a separate payment stream from Tenant to Landlord—a promissory note requiring certain payments fully secured by the L/C—having no relation at all to the lease and not secured except by the L/C.⁹⁸ The parties would expressly agree that the payment stream constitutes something other than “rent” and has no connection to the lease. (The Claim Cap applies to claims for “damages resulting from the termination of a lease of real property.”)⁹⁹ In this case, though, the lease and the note might need to be cross-defaulted. Other issues about the interaction of rights and remedies (see, e.g., the earlier discussion on Tenant’s right to a refund of prepaid rent) might ultimately force the parties to tie the two documents together. Any such linkage could reopen the Claim Cap Problem.

97 Any such structure creates its own pile of new issues. Does such a loan create usury problems? Can this loan and the lease safely be cross-defaulted? If so, will a bankruptcy court pay any attention (either in a “good” way or in a “bad” way) to the cross-default? Does such a loan create regulatory or reporting issues for publicly-traded real estate investment trusts (REITs)? “Bad income” for any REIT, public or private? Under income tax regulations, what interest rate must Landlord charge? Does such a loan work, more generally, as a tax and accounting matter? Should Landlord use a separate entity as the tenant-improvement financier, with completely separate documentation? Will a court look beyond the “loan” and treat the entire relationship as a “lease”? How does Lender perfect its position? What if the lease terminates other than because of a Tenant default, such as because of casualty or condemnation? These questions probably just scratch the surface.

98 Lender would, again, probably want to receive a collateral assignment of Tenant’s obligations.

99 11 U.S.C. § 502(b)(6).

- Do Not Call L/C a Security Deposit. Collectively, the courts that have considered this issue have emphasized substance over form.¹⁰⁰ If an L/C contains language that makes it look like a mere substitute for a cash security deposit, the courts will in all likelihood treat it as such.¹⁰¹ Therefore, all references to the L/C in the lease should make clear the L/C is something other than—and very different from—a cash security deposit.
- Other Recharacterization. One could try other ways to re-characterize the L/C and its proceeds as something other than a subterfuge to replace a cash security deposit. For example, Tenant could agree to reimburse Landlord’s leasing brokerage commissions, vacancy period losses, and tenant improvement costs for the lease—or the next lease of the same space—if the lease terminated early because of a default (the Leasing Expense Reimbursement). The Leasing Expense Reimbursement could formulaically drop over time. One would then treat the Leasing Expense Reimbursement as an obligation entirely independent of the lease and not constituting rent. A separate agreement would govern the Leasing Expense Reimbursement, saying the arrangement has nothing to do with compensation for use and occupancy of real estate, but merely protects Landlord regarding certain leasing expenses. Landlord would need to structure and document this arrangement in a way that negates any argument that it’s really “rent.” For example, Landlord should not characterize any Leasing Expense Reimbursement as “rent” in monthly bills, or have the right to collect it by enforcing the lease. If the lease provides for “rent” adjustments, the formula for those adjustments should disregard the Leasing Expense Reimbursement. The obligor for the Leasing Expense Reimbursement might be a party other than Tenant, such as Tenant’s principals or venture capital backers. In that case, the documents should make very clear that Tenant has no obligation to pay or reimburse this amount or any part of it. The parties undertaking the Leasing Expense Reimbursement would need to waive any indemnity or reimbursement claims against Tenant. Landlord would have no remedies under the lease for nonpayment of Leasing Expense Reimbursement, and the lease would not even mention it.¹⁰² Landlord might obtain a leasehold mortgage on the lease to secure the obligation to pay Leasing Expense Reimbursement. Although such a mortgage may, as a practical matter, induce payment of Leasing Expense Reimbursement, its value as credit support seems dubious at best, because of both the unreliable valuation of the collateral and the bankruptcy issues that travel with any secured obligation.

- Prohibit Cash Security. The lease could also affirmatively forbid Tenant from converting an L/C into a cash security deposit (such as by allowing the L/C to expire without being renewed). Any such conversion would be an event of default in and of itself. If the L/C expired, Landlord would not merely have the right to draw upon the L/C to create a cash security deposit, but also all remedies for an event of default. This prohibition on a cash security deposit would reflect the logic that because of the Claim Cap Problem, Landlord is better off with an L/C (which might suffer from the Claim Cap Problem)¹⁰³ than with a cash security deposit (which will definitely suffer from the Claim Cap Problem). If Landlord loses the benefits of holding an L/C, then Tenant loses the benefits of holding the lease. Of course, Landlord would then immediately face the Claim Cap Problem if Tenant filed bankruptcy.
- Personal Guaranty. Obtain a personal guaranty that simply indemnifies Landlord against any risks arising from the Claim Cap Problem.
- Limit L/C to One Year's Rent. As long as an L/C does not exceed one year's rent, no Claim Cap Problem should arise.¹⁰⁴ The Claim Cap formula also sometimes permits a higher maximum claim, though never more than three years rent.¹⁰⁵ Landlord can therefore avoid the whole issue simply by not structuring a transaction that requires an L/C exceeding the Claim Cap. An L/C for one year's rent should always be safe. Or, to the extent that the L/C would exceed the Claim Cap, one could substitute any of the mechanisms suggested above—a mix-and-match solution to the problem but a solution nevertheless. The hybrid nature of such a solution would probably create unnecessary issues, complexity, concerns, and drafting. Landlord and Lender should probably take one road or another, but not more than one. It all depends on context and circumstances, though.

- Take the Risk. As another possibility, Landlord might not worry about the Claim Cap Problem and simply take the risk and either (1) hope the L/C serves its purpose and Tenant stays out of bankruptcy; (2) hope the courts change their mind and decide that there is no such thing as a Claim Cap Problem for a Landlord that accepts a huge L/C; or (3) recognize that in bankruptcy the L/C will have given Landlord and Lender substantial comfort but not quite as much comfort as they really wanted. This possible response to the Claim Cap Problem ignores a risk (a substantial one) inherent in the structure of the transaction. It requires Tenant to bear the full cost and burden of obtaining an L/C without giving Landlord and Lender the absolute certainty of having the full corresponding benefit of a reliable L/C. In other words, it creates an economic absurdity, which usually implies that the parties can find some alternative and superior solution to the problem. That better solution should give Landlord, Lender, or both, an incremental benefit at no incremental cost to Tenant and should therefore be preferred. The concept of ignoring the problem is, however, by no means uncommon and might be viewed as Landlord's taking a business risk on the lease—a decision that Landlord's Lender might or might not second-guess—in an effort to “get the deal done” because of emergency circumstances that leave little time for consideration of legal niceties.¹⁰⁶ Although Landlord may be willing to tolerate some uncertainty because of these issues,¹⁰⁷ any Lender will probably find them particularly vexatious, because Lender may well want to control any L/C that Tenant delivers and will in any event probably demand more certainty than Landlord might.¹⁰⁸

The fundamental question that the Claim Cap Problem forces the parties to think about is simply the following: How can Landlord, Lender, and Tenant treat the L/C as the functional equivalent of a cash security deposit without actually calling it a security deposit or otherwise giving Tenant an interest in the L/C proceeds? The answer is not necessarily easy 106 As a matter of risk management, Lender's or Landlord's counsel should recognize that business decisions like this one often correlate with short memories. Later, when the risk actually hits, all fingers point to counsel. Therefore, counsel may want to keep a copy of counsel's memo warning of the bankruptcy risks of such a structure.

107 The author would argue, however, that Landlord should not accept such uncertainty any more than Lender should. An L/C should deliver security, not insecurity and issues. If it does not reliably deliver security, then it fails to achieve its central and single purpose. If Landlord is willing to accept a structure that infringes on Landlord's security in the one forum where security most matters, then Landlord did not really care about security in the first place.

108 The interplay between Landlord and Lender—Lender's control of the L/C and its proceeds—would go in a separate three-party agreement of the type presented in Chapter 39.

or straightforward. Similar questions and issues arise, and are regularly solved, throughout secured-lending transactions as a result of the need to consider bankruptcy law, which offers the ultimate test for every business transaction or deal structure.

Stepping back a bit from the details, Landlord may often find that the best solution to the Claim Cap Problem consists of having Guarantor obtain and deliver the L/C to back the guaranty. In many cases, this solution should simply do the job.

Some of the strategies described above hinge upon trying to separate the L/C from the lease, from Tenant, or from both, so Landlord can argue in Tenant's bankruptcy that the L/C has nothing to do with either. But wouldn't Tenant insist on having the right to require Landlord to return the undrawn L/C or prepaid rent under some circumstances? For example, Tenant would probably, and legitimately, want Landlord to return the L/C or its proceeds if: (1) Tenant cures its defaults; (2) Landlord defaults under the lease, and Tenant validly terminates it; (3) the building burns down, and Landlord elects not to restore; (4) the entire building is condemned; or (5) the lease expires under its terms, and Tenant performs all its obligations. In all these cases, Tenant would probably want the L/C returned even if the lease otherwise devotes seventeen pages to the propositions that Tenant has no interest of any kind in the L/C and the L/C has nothing to do with the lease or Tenant's rent.

Would Tenant's rights to the L/C under these circumstances give Tenant enough of an interest in the L/C and its proceeds for the bankruptcy court to say the L/C is really just like a cash security deposit and Tenant's delivery of an L/C doesn't solve the Claim Cap Problem? The answer may be that if Landlord has enough negotiating leverage, Landlord can insist that Tenant give up any right to the L/C or its proceeds under any circumstances and simply bear the risk of losing the L/C under the circumstances listed in the previous paragraph. In the dotcom leasing frenzy of the late 1990s, Landlords might have been able to get away with taking that position (or Tenants might have not noticed it because they were in too much of a hurry to sign their leases),¹⁰⁹ but the commercial leasing market of the early twenty-first century, particularly after mid-2007, seems rather different.

109 For some subsequent history about that marketplace, see, e.g., Joshua Stein, The Best Strategies for Extricating a Company From Its Long-Term Office Lease Obligations, Start-Up & Emerging Companies, June 2001, at 1.

Tenant may also insist that if Landlord converts an L/C to cash, then: (1) Landlord can use such cash only to cure Tenant's defaults under the lease, to pay damages for Tenant's default under the lease (precisely the obligation that is subject to the Claim Cap) or both; and (2) Tenant will receive any interest Landlord earns on the cash. Would such requirements also tend to support a claim by Tenant's bankruptcy estate to the L/C proceeds?

Also, if the L/C proceeds are intended to be a security deposit that is not a security deposit, what does state law say about those proceeds? For example, if state law imposes certain requirements about how Landlord holds and applies a security deposit, must Landlord comply with them? What happens if Landlord does not? Would state law recharacterize as a security deposit either the L/C or its proceeds or one of the creative alternative arrangements suggested above?

How do the answers to these questions change if Guarantor delivers the L/C solely to back its guaranty, all in such a way that the L/C has no direct connection to the lease?

When appropriate, Landlord's counsel may want to invest some additional time and effort thinking about these and other questions and otherwise trying to solve any possible Claim Cap Problem.

In the excitement of worrying about the Claim Cap Problem, though, Landlords, Lenders, and their counsel should not lose sight of some other issues that might limit Landlord's ability to draw upon an L/C if Tenant files bankruptcy.

First, Landlord will want to confirm that the lease, or other appropriate documentation, will in fact allow Landlord to draw upon the L/C in the event of a Tenant bankruptcy, even if Tenant is not otherwise in default under the lease.¹¹⁰ Of course, some comments earlier in this Chapter suggest that such a draw might not always be wise. But Landlord would prefer to retain the ability to make such a draw at any time after a Tenant bankruptcy filing.

110 If a lease defines Tenant bankruptcy as a default, such a provision will be unenforceable against a Tenant in bankruptcy. See 11 U.S.C. § 365(e). Could Landlord nevertheless rely on it to support a draw upon the L/C? In the alternative, if Landlord wants the ability to draw upon the L/C in the event of a Tenant bankruptcy, should Landlord document that right somewhere outside the lease? In the L/C itself? And should Tenant be a party to that agreement? If not, who should be? See Kimberly S. Winick, Tenant Letters of Credit; Bankruptcy Issues for Landlords and Their Lenders, 9 Am. Bankr. Inst. L. Rev. 733, 739 (2001) ("The landlord also needs to be able to draw under the letter of credit upon the . . . tenant's bankruptcy. . . . This condition must be stated in the letter of credit in order to be enforceable.").

Landlord should also consider the other conditions and requirements for making a draw, as stated in the lease.¹¹¹ Are those conditions flexible enough to cover every possible circumstance when Landlord might want to make a draw? Will Landlord be able to satisfy those conditions with no involvement or help by Tenant? Will the courts sustain the amount of Landlord's draw? Is the amount of the draw a penalty? Is Landlord's measure of damages enforceable?¹¹²

The use of an L/C makes it possible for Landlord to draw first and discuss later many of the interesting issues this Chapter covers. Landlord should, however, consider these issues when structuring and documenting the lease and the L/C, so the lease can help support a future argument for validity of the L/C and any draw upon the L/C—even aside from the Claim Cap Problem.

111 All drawing conditions and procedures for the L/C should appear in the lease alone and not in the L/C, at least from Landlord's perspective (subject to a possible exception for language allowing Landlord to draw upon the L/C if Tenant files bankruptcy). Once the lease allows a draw upon the L/C, Landlord should be able to draw upon the L/C by submitting the L/C and a sight draft, satisfying no other requirements in the L/C. Sometimes, though, Landlord cannot achieve this desired level of simplicity.

112 Recent developments in the larger financial world have created another set of questions for any Landlord to consider when accepting an L/C. What happens if Issuer fails, or is taken over by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation? Does Landlord still have a claim against Issuer? Does the lease require Tenant to replace the L/C under this circumstance? These issues lie beyond the present discussion.

CHAPTER THIRTY-NINE

THE ESSENTIAL GUIDE TO THE MOST IMPORTANT CLAUSE IN A COMMERCIAL LEASE: THE DEFAULT CLAUSE

Adam Leitman Bailey, Esq.
John M. Desiderio, Esq.

[39.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Commercial leases require an effective default clause that allows the landlord to force a tenant to comply with all lease obligations. The default clause commonly provides the procedure for obtaining an eviction or the threat of an eviction for a commercial tenant's violation of the lease. In addition, many default clauses include provisions requiring payments for unpaid rent or other damages, or for violations of non-monetary requirements in the lease, including, but not limited to, required landlord approvals for alterations and subleasing, or for failure to comply with the law and government regulations. A well-drafted default clause should incentivize a tenant to follow the protocols specified in the lease, knowing that an eviction and damages will result from a default. Because in many parts of the state, some more than others, commercial tenants are able to use the court system to delay and manipulate a landlord and its property, much time and money can be saved by negotiating a powerful and effective default clause—one that will motivate the tenant to comply with all of the terms and procedures of the lease, including the requirement for timely vacating the premises upon the expiration date of the lease.

The main objective of any default clause is to give the commercial landlord the legal means either (1) to cause the tenant to cure the breach in an expeditious manner; (2) to swiftly and efficiently obtain a judgment of eviction against a tenant in default of the lease and thus be able to re-let the premises to a new tenant ready and able to pay the rent; or (3) to minimize the landlord's out of pocket losses from the noncomplying tenant's breach of the lease. For these reasons, after the rent clause, the default clause is the most important clause in any commercial lease.

However, even the most frequently used "standard form" commercial leases permit a defaulting commercial tenant either (1) to procedurally stall a summary proceeding that would otherwise end in a swift eviction, or (2) to avoid a summary proceeding altogether by seeking equitable relief and applying for a so-called "Yellowstone" Injunction¹ or to use dozens of other defenses and tactics to keep the tenant in possession, often without paying rent. Since the authors started practicing law in commercial landlord-tenant court some decades ago, the courts have become less tolerant of tenant tricks, and many judges will follow the strict construction of the lease no matter how poorly written.

Simple cases can go on for years of debating or litigating a poorly written default clause. In many cases poorly drafted default clauses frustrate the ability of the landlord to take back the premises and to re-let to a new tenant who would pay rent for the leased space during what, in some cases, can be an unduly lengthy period of litigation. During this period, the tenant in default can take advantage of poorly drafted lease provisions and/or equitable judicial relief to continue in possession without, in some cases, paying any rent or other monies owed under the lease.

Nevertheless, while the consequences of poor drafting can hardly ever be avoided, the parties to a commercial lease may avoid intrusive judicial revision of their lease agreement by negotiating lease terms expressly intended to preclude such judicial activism.² New York courts have consistently enforced lease provisions that produce harsh results for one party to the lease “no matter how unwise it might appear to a third party.”³ Accordingly, attorneys representing landlords should strive to negotiate lease terms providing (1) that the lease shall be terminated for the chronic nonpayment of rent, (2) that all rents due during the lease term shall be accelerated upon one or more defaults in the payment of rent, (3) that the availability of a cure period, the trigger to seeking a Yellowstone Injunction, either be omitted from the lease entirely or that the lease contain agreed terms to be included in a Yellowstone injunction, should a court be inclined to grant one, such as the amount of the bond to be posted during the Yellowstone period, limitations on discovery, and a requirement for expedited litigation, and (4) that all monies due under the lease, other than the specified rent, shall be deemed “additional rent,” thus also making a default in payment of such “additional rent” subject to a summary non-payment proceeding.

2 Too many cases recite that it is not the job of the court to redraft a lease when that is precisely what the court is, in effect, doing.

3 “A lease agreement, like any other contract, essentially involves a bargained-for exchange between the parties. Absent some violation of law or transgression or a strong public policy, the parties to a contract are basically free to make whatever agreement they wish no matter how unwise it might appear to a third party.” *Rowe v. In properly drawn commercial leases, monetary defaults give rise both to summary nonpayment proceedings under Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law § 711(2) (RPAPL) and summary holdover proceedings under RPAPL § 711(1), at the landlord's election.⁴ We note in passing that since the Supreme Court Yellowstone action is already slower than the local court summary proceeding, many practitioners throughout the State opt to counterclaim in a tenant's Supreme Court action with an ejectment cause of action, so that once all Yellowstone issues in the case are adjudicated, the eviction can proceed apace in the same proceeding, if the landlord prevails.

[39.1] II. COMMON PROVISIONS OF THE DEFAULT CLAUSE

[39.2] A. Events of Default

The commercial lease should specify all of the foreseeable circumstances where the landlord would want to protect its property interests and regain possession and control of the leased premises in order to remedy or forestall any condition, caused by a material act or omission of the tenant, or by a third party to whom the tenant is indebted, that is prejudicial to the landlord's property interests. Therefore, the most essential part of the default clause is a provision listing all of the situations that will be deemed to be an event of default under the lease.

Every lease negotiation is sui generis and dependent upon facts and circumstances relevant only to the particular premises and the parties involved. Nevertheless, there are several categories or "events" of default, other than property-specific defaults, that are common to most commercial leases.

1. Failure to pay rent in a particular month or months;
2. Having a pattern of late rent payments;
3. Failure to comply with any other lease term;
4. Third party action against tenant under bankruptcy or insolvency laws;

⁴ See discussion infra about default clauses that appear to give a landlord a summary holdover proceeding (RPAPL art. 7), but actually only allow for the normally longer, slower ejectment action (RPAPL art. 6).

5. Tenant's failure to use premises for Permitted Uses;
6. Illegal use of the premises or nuisance at the premises;⁵
7. Tenant's abandonment of the premises prior to the lease expiration date;
8. Guarantor in breach of its obligations under its guaranty of tenant's obligations or the death or insolvency of the Guarantor and Tenant's failure to furnish a suitable substitute;
9. Tenant's failure to provide an estoppel certificate;
10. Tenant's failure to comply with assignment or subleasing provisions; and
11. Tenant's misrepresentation regarding USA Patriot Act certification.

Each of these events of default should be negotiated for inclusion in most commercial leases.

[39.3] B. Conditional Limitation and Condition Subsequent

A conditional limitation is a lease provision that, upon the nonpayment of rent⁶ or upon the occurrence of any other event of default specified in the lease, gives the landlord the contractual right, before the expiration date specified in the lease, to prematurely terminate the lease, on a specific date set forth in a written notice of termination. By exercising this right, the landlord effectively terminates the lease prior to the date on which it would otherwise expire, as if the new termination date were the expiration date otherwise specified in the lease.

It is not the particular conduct of the tenant constituting the event of default that acts to terminate the lease.

Rather, it is by the passage of time—the period of time specified in the termination notice—that the lease auto-

5 RPAPL § 715, the so called “Bawdy House Law,” gives the district attorney and a large variety of other persons (including the owner) the statutory right to bring a proceeding to cancel a tenancy, regardless of the legal rights of the parties to the tenancy, if the premises are notoriously used for any kind of illegal business.

6 In many leases, monetary defaults are specifically carved out of the conditional limitation clause. Such clauses disfavor landlords and favor tenants. Thus, whether the practitioner wants such a clause depends on who his client is.

matically comes to an end; without service of a notice specifying the date of expiration of the lease there can be no termination and the lease remains in effect.⁷

The following is one example of a conditional limitation provision:

If a Default occurs,⁸ this lease is subject to the conditional limitation that Landlord may, at any time during the continuance of the Default, give notice to Tenant that this lease shall terminate on the date specified in that notice, which date shall not be less than five (5) days after Landlord gives such notice to Tenant. If Landlord gives that notice, this lease and the Term shall expire and come to an end on the date set forth in that notice as if said date were the date originally fixed in this lease as the Expiration Date and Tenant shall quit and surrender the Premises to Landlord (but Tenant shall remain liable as provided in this lease).

The service of a notice of termination in accordance with the terms of a proper conditional limitation provision enables the landlord to maintain a summary holdover proceeding under RPAPL § 711(1) against a tenant who remains in possession beyond the expiration date specified in the notice of termination.⁹ The fact that the landlord, at its option, could bring a nonpayment proceeding in which tenant would have the right, under RPAPL § 751(1), to deposit the amount of the final judgment into court prior to the issuance of a warrant, does not preclude the landlord from ter-

Elota Realty Company*, 72 N.Y.2d 1024, 1027, 534 N.Y.S.2d 925, 926 (1988) (conditional limitation provision in commercial lease, which required the landlord to give written notice to the tenant specifying the default and stating that the lease shall expire and terminate on a prescribed date “which must be at least five days after the giving of the notice [of termination],” permitted the tenant to cure the default within a separate five-day grace period in which to pay the rent, as otherwise provided in the lease, and the landlord’s service of a notice of termination, after accepting the tenant’s rent payment within that separate five-day grace period, was “ineffective” because the termination notice was sent after the tenant had cured the default in accordance with the lease terms). See also Midco Nowash LLC v. #1 Travel, Inc., 29 Misc. 3d 254, 905 N.Y.S.2d 765 (Dist. Ct., Nassau Co. 2010).

8 In more conservatively drawn leases, conditional limitation clauses like this one rely on “Default” being a lease-defined situation that persists after the expiration of the cure period specified in the Notice to Cure. See Yellowstone discussion infra as to the advantages and disadvantages of this conservative drafting.

9 See Perrotta v. Western Regional Off-Track Betting Corp., 98 A.D.2d 1, 469 N.Y.S.2d 504 (4th Dep’t 1983).

minating the lease in accordance with its terms and maintaining the hold-over proceeding instead.¹⁰

Nevertheless, because a summary holdover proceeding is entirely statutory in origin, “there must be strict compliance with the statute to give the court jurisdiction.”¹¹ It is therefore important that the notice of termination be given in connection with an act or omission, for which the landlord may invoke the conditional limitation provision of the lease and specify the date on which the lease shall automatically expire, and not be given for an act or omission constituting a breach of a condition of the lease that subjects the lease to termination only at the option of the landlord, for which an action of ejectment against a holdover tenant would be required.¹²

In other words, if the commercial lease provision is deemed a “condition subsequent,”¹³ instead of a conditional limitation, a judge may dismiss the summary proceeding in the Commercial Part of landlord-tenant court or civil court and decide that the case must be brought in State Supreme Court in an ejectment action.¹⁴ Generally, summary proceedings in the Commercial Part of landlord-tenant court proceed more quickly

10 See Grand Liberte Coop v. Bilhaud, 126 Misc. 2d 961, 487 N.Y.S.2d 250 (Sup. Ct., App. Term, 1st Dep’t 1984). However, in residential proceedings, termination clauses based upon monetary defaults have been held to be void as against public policy.

13 The literature renders this all the more confusing by sometimes referring to conditions subsequent simply as “conditions.” A “condition subsequent” or “condition” (or even more rarely a “condition of the lease”) can be defined as a situation that gives the landlord the option to cancel the lease, but not until the landlord’s exercise of that option will the cancellation be actually effected. A condition subsequent may also be the unknown future occurrence of an event that will automatically cancel the lease, such as a clause which provides that, in the event of a Congressional declaration of war, the lease shall be automatically canceled. By contrast, in the event of the invocation of a “conditional limitation,” after a lease default, the expiration of the period of time specified in the notice of termination, automatically effects the cancellation of the lease. In such cases, the only question at issue may be whether the landlord’s notice of termination was given with or without first giving the tenant a notice of default specifying a time within which to cure the default. Some decisions have sought to cut through all the theory to hold that, where there is a notice to cure requirement, there is a conditional limitation, and, where there is no notice to cure requirement, there is a condition subsequent. See, e.g., VNO 100 W. 33rd St. LLC v. Square One Manhattan, Inc., 22 Misc. 3d 560, 874 N.Y.S.2d 683 (N.Y.C. Civ. Ct., N.Y. Co. 2008).

14 Some local courts, like the New York City Civil Court, actually do have jurisdiction to hear ejectment actions, but typically only if the assessed value of the real property is within the monetary jurisdiction of the Court. See N.Y.C. Civil Court Act § 203(j). Since such monetary values are so low, such ejectment actions are exceedingly rare.

than do landlord-tenant cases brought in State Supreme Court. In commercial lease cases brought in landlord-tenant court, discovery is rarely permitted, and in cases where no motions are made in the Commercial Part in New York City on the return date of the petition, those matters are immediately sent out to any judge who is available to hear or try the case. Most commercial landlord-tenant cases will be concluded in a number of months in New York City and weeks in some other parts of the State.¹⁵ By contrast, the proceedings in commercial landlord tenant actions brought in State Supreme Court can extend for several years. This highlights the importance of why a proper notice of termination should be deemed given for violation of a conditional limitation of the lease and not merely for a condition subsequent thereof.

[39.4] C. Notice Provisions

A landlord's notice of default¹⁶ is distinct from a landlord's notice of termination. A notice of default specifies the particular lease provision that the tenant has violated and the period, if any, within which the tenant is obliged to cure the default before the lease becomes subject to termination under its conditional limitation provision.

The notice of default "must be sufficiently specific to demonstrate what remedial action is being required and what lease provision requires it."¹⁷ Unless the landlord demonstrates what remedial action is required by the lease, "the omission in the notice must be considered a fatal defect."¹⁸

However, even where the notice of default is not sufficiently specific on its face, the landlord may still be able to demonstrate, from the correspondence and communications between the parties prior to the notice, that the 15 In some regions of the State, the greatest source for delay in summary proceedings is the limited number of days the Court is sitting to hear such proceedings in any given week. Practitioners should acquaint themselves with the appropriate calendar practice of the court where they are bringing their proceeding. Also, in most parts of the State, State Supreme Court sits in the County Seat while the courts hearing summary proceedings are local to the location of the property in question. In those many parts of the state where there is a Village or a City contained within the boundaries of a Town, there can be two local courts, each of which has statutory jurisdiction to hear a summary proceeding, but only one of which actually entertains them, typically the Town Court.

16 It is also commonly known as a "Notice to Cure."

tenant fully appreciated the nature of the breach stated in the notice of default. Therefore, in an appropriate case, “evidence extrinsic to the notice may be considered in assessing the notice’s sufficiency.”¹⁹ Nevertheless, attorneys should always strive to make the notice of default sufficiently specific on its face, to avoid ever having to persuade a court to admit evidence extrinsic to the notice to determine its sufficiency.

The lease usually specifies various permissible methods for landlord’s service of a notice of default upon the tenant—hand delivery, registered or certified mail, and/or recognized overnight courier. For each method of service, the lease should also specify how and when service is considered to have occurred.

The point of specifying methods by which a notice of default is to be given is, fundamentally, to ensure that the putative defaulter has actual notice and an opportunity to protest the claim of default or, if so provided, to avail itself of an opportunity to cure the default, if any.²⁰

Any ambiguity concerning the effective date on which the notice of default is deemed received by the tenant is resolved against the drafter of the lease.²¹

If the tenant wishes to preserve the right to cure a default under the lease by commencing a Yellowstone declaratory judgment action,²² the tenant must obtain a stay of the period within which the default may be cured by seeking an injunction in state supreme court. “The existence of a period in which a violation may be cured does not depend on the contents of the notice of default, but upon the terms of the lease.”²³ Thus, although the landlord’s failure to state a cure period in the notice of default may render the notice defective, “it does not vitiate the cure period itself.”²⁴ However, the failure of a tenant to toll the curative period specified in the lease divests a court of its power to grant a temporary stay under Yellowstone.²⁵ The period between a notice of termination and the lease expiration date specified in accordance with the conditional limitation provision is not one within which the tenant can cure a default.²⁶ Conditions subsequent do not give rise to Yellowstone actions, but they also do not give rise to summary holdover proceedings.

22 In form, a Yellowstone action is an action seeking a declaratory judgment declaring that the Tenant is not in default of the requirements of the lease. However, under the doctrine enunciated in the Yellowstone decision, if the action does not include an application for a Temporary Restraining Order and a motion for Preliminary Injunction against terminating the lease, the demand for the declaration will be rendered moot because the remedy will necessarily be too late to be effective. The standards for obtaining such a TRO and Preliminary Injunction in Yellowstone litigation are much more liberal than otherwise required in New York Civil Practice. Most courts require little more than a showing that there are a commercial lease and a notice to cure, the application made prior to the expiration of the notice to cure, and the formal requirement of a desire and ability to cure. Rarely are such applications denied, and if they are denied, but the denial is reversed on appeal, the appellate reversal is nunc pro tunc to the date of the application for the emergency relief.

[39.6] A. Additional Rent

It is important that all monies the lease requires the tenant to pay during the term of the lease, other than the rent itself, be expressly designated as “additional rent.” Additional rent can include late charges, taxes, various building expenses, attorney’s fees, letters of credit, insurance, and any other items specific to the particular premises involved that the landlord requires the tenant to pay. If such items are designated as “additional rent” in the lease, the landlord may initiate a summary proceeding to recover possession of the premises for the tenant’s failure to make a required payment of additional rent, whether or not the tenant has paid the requisite monthly base rent.²⁷

23 Empire State Bldg. Assocs. v. Trump Empire State Partners, 245 A.D.2d 225, 228, 667 N.Y.S.2d 31, 34 (1st Dep’t 1997).

If the lease requires the tenant to pay the particular charge but does not expressly designate the item as “additional rent,” it will not be deemed additional rent by the court.²⁸

Where the lease itself is “reasonably susceptible of more than one interpretation” as to how the additional rent is to be calculated, the court may properly consider evidence of the parties’ course of conduct, including the methodology used by the landlord in its annual billing for additional rent and the tenant’s payment of such additional rent since the beginning of the tenancy.²⁹ Nevertheless, attorneys should strive to eliminate all ambiguities concerning the calculations required to accurately determine the amounts that will become due as additional rent under the lease.

It should be noted that General Obligations Law § 7-103(1) (GOL) provides that a tenant’s security deposit, until repaid to the tenant at the termination of the lease or applied to payments due under the lease, shall continue to be the money of the person making such deposit or advance and shall be held in trust by the person with whom such deposit or advance shall be made and shall not be mingled with the personal moneys or become an asset of the person receiving the same.

It has been held, therefore, that the tenant’s security deposit itself is not “rent,” and it cannot be recovered in a nonpayment proceeding.³⁰ Nor does the New York City Civil Court or any Local Court have jurisdiction to order a tenant to replenish a security deposit that has been applied to payments due under the tenant’s lease obligations.³¹ However, the failure to maintain the security deposit is a breach of a substantial obligation of the lease and is therefore a proper basis for a conditional limitation and ensuing holdover proceeding.³²

[39.7] B. Rent Acceleration

As the most powerful weapon ever devised for a lease, aside from the guarantee provision, rent acceleration clauses provide a wonderful way to ensure that rent payments are not only made, but are made timely. Upon a default in the payment of rent, a properly drafted acceleration clause permits the landlord to seek recovery of the total balance of rent due under the lease without having to wait until the lease's expiration date. Without a properly drafted acceleration clause, the right of the landlord to sue for damages for the breach of the lease accrues, generally, upon the termination date of the lease.³³

[I]n rare cases, agreements providing for the acceleration of the entire debt upon the default of the obligor may be circumscribed or denied enforcement by utilization of equitable principles. In the vast majority of instances, however, these clauses have been enforced at law in accordance with their terms. * * * * Absent some element of fraud, exploitive overreaching or unconscionable conduct on the part of the landlord to exploit a technical breach, there is no warrant, either in law or equity, for a court to refuse enforcement of the agreement of the parties.³⁴

However, as discussed at length below, the Court of Appeals' recent decision in *172 Van Duzer Realty Corp. v. Globe Alumni Student Assistance Association*³⁵ casts some doubt on the full collectability of accelerated rent. In Van Duzer, the Court held that a hearing on the landlord's actual damages may be necessary to determine what portion of accelerated rent, undiscounted, will not constitute an otherwise forbidden penalty. Under "penalty" jurisprudence, a lease that provides for acceleration for breach of any of its terms, no matter how trivial or inconsequential, is likely to be considered an unconscionable penalty and will not be enforced by a court of equity.³⁶ For example, acceleration will not be permitted for a tenant's failure to comply with a covenant collateral to the primary obligation of the tenant. In such circumstances, acceleration will be held to constitute a forfeiture, as the damages reserved in the lease are likely to be disproportionate to any actual loss that could possibly accrue to the landlord from such breach.³⁷

However, a covenant to pay rent at a specified time “is an essential part of the bargain as it represents the consideration to be received for permitting the tenant to remain in possession of the property of the landlord.”³⁸ Therefore, acceleration is permitted as liquidated damages if the sum to be recovered is no greater than the amount the tenant would have paid had it fully performed and been entitled to possession upon payment.³⁹ Further, it has been held that a single default in the payment of rent is sufficient to effectuate an acceleration clause.⁴⁰ Moreover, where the lease terms can be construed to allow it, the tenant’s guarantor can also be held liable for the accelerated sum due under the lease.⁴¹

It should be noted that the Second Department has held that “accelerated rent” is not “rent due.”⁴² As the court explained, “accelerated rent” is “contractual damages not recoverable in a summary proceeding.” Accordingly, upon a default by the tenant, the landlord can use summary proceedings to regain possession of the premises with a judgment of eviction and a monetary judgment for past rent due. But, to recover the monies due upon the contractual claims for accelerated rent and other monetary obligations that survive the termination of the lease, the landlord must commence a plenary action.⁴³ The judgment entered for the landlord in the summary proceeding is neither res judicata nor an election of remedies and therefore does not bar the landlord from seeking contractual damages in the plenary action. As the Second Department further explained,

[r]es judicata is inapplicable where a party is unable to seek a certain remedy or form of relief in the first action because of limitations on the subject matter jurisdiction of the court or restrictions on its authority to entertain multiple remedies or form of relief in a single action.⁴⁴

[39.8] C. Late Charges

Commercial lease clauses that impose late charges for failing to pay rent or other additional rent obligations in a timely manner, and which specify that the late charges shall also be deemed additional rent, are generally enforced by the courts.⁴⁵ However, late charges, as additional rent, may be sought only for rent that is past due. At the time of a default, where a lease does not contain a rent acceleration clause, the landlord may sue only for the amount of late charges past due at the time the action or proceeding is commenced.⁴⁶ In such cases, the landlord's entitlement for damages for the remaining installments of rent will ripen and may be sued for at the end of the lease term.⁴⁷

Whether or not the particular late charge specified in any commercial lease, or the formula used to calculate such late charge, as negotiated between sophisticated business people, may be found to be "unconscionable" will depend upon whether there is evidence suggesting that the late charge was unreasonable or against public policy.⁴⁸ The late fee must bear some reasonable relationship to the landlord's additional administrative expense by reason of the lateness. If the late fee is too high, the courts regard it as an unenforceable penalty.⁴⁹

[39.9] D. Chronic Nonpayment

A necessary part of an effective default clause is a provision enabling the landlord to cancel the lease for the frequent delinquency of rent payments, commonly referred to as a "chronic nonpayment" of rent due termination clause. It often happens that a landlord who is forced to commence a nonpayment proceeding in New York City Civil Court, or other local court with summary jurisdiction, is faced with a tenant who is either chronically late in paying the rent or does not pay the rent at all, thus causing the landlord to have to institute repeated legal proceedings to procure the timely payment of rent.⁵⁰

Including the time it takes to obtain a court date, to request shortened adjournment periods, and a resolution by settlement, trial, or default in the case of a non-appearance, the earliest a landlord can expect to obtain an eviction will be no less than three to five months after commencement of the nonpayment process.⁵¹ Even after an eviction is scheduled, RPAPL § 751(1) mandates that the tenant be given ten days to pay the amount of rent owed to stay the issuance of a warrant and avoid eviction.

For many landlords, the cycle of late payments or nonpayment is repeated continuously and, in many cases, perennially. To further exacerbate their frustration, in addition to the wasted energy, time, and money they expend in participating in the process, many cases result in empty tenancies with thousands of uncollectible dollars. Accordingly, although “[a] history of repeated nonpayment proceedings brought to collect chronically late rental payments supports an eviction proceeding on the ground that the tenant has violated a ‘substantial obligation’ of the tenancy,”⁵² attorneys should strive to draft into any default clause a provision by which the tenancy is terminated for the chronic nonpayment of rent.

A chronic nonpayment provision terminates the tenancy upon the happening of multiple defaults in the timely payment of rent. A typical clause will terminate the tenancy once a tenant fails to timely pay the rent at least three times within a twelve consecutive month period. Even where the lease contains a grace period (typically five days) within which the tenant is normally permitted to cure a default for nonpayment after issuance of a notice of default, the chronic nonpayment provision can prescribe that, after two consecutive defaults, the landlord, prior to serving the notice of termination, is not required to serve the tenant with a notice of default for a third consecutive default, but may, after the expiration of the five-day grace period, immediately serve the notice of termination. Therefore, the third consecutive default triggers the termination of the lease automatically.⁵³ At this point the commercial tenant cannot ward off eviction by paying the rent in full. As a result of the chronic nonpayment clause, the landlord has the option of evicting the tenant, so long as the requirements of the chronic nonpayment provision have been followed and proven in court. This is one instance where the precedents are clear both that a summary holdover proceeding lies and that it does not require an antecedent notice to cure.⁵⁴

[39.10] E. Self-Help Evictions

Upon termination of the lease or upon the commercial tenant's defaulting on payment of rent or other lease terms, a landlord may reenter the leased premises peaceably without resort to court process, when the right to do so is expressly reserved in a commercial lease.⁵⁵ A commercial landlord's common law right to use "self-help" to reenter its property peaceably to evict a defaulting tenant or other person with no right to possession has been recognized from time immemorial.⁵⁶ Nevertheless, although the common law right of self-help reentry is not abrogated by the statutory remedy of summary proceedings,⁵⁷ it is a remedy that is rarely used and in many municipalities throughout the state abolished or restricted. The extent of self-help available also varies by Judicial Department.⁵⁸

58 Practitioners should be certain to know the local ordinances on the subject prior to expressing an opinion.

Attorneys who represent commercial landlords are often reluctant to advise their clients to use this neglected self-help remedy to regain possession of leased premises from defaulting commercial tenants.⁵⁹ This reluctance stems, in part, from the perception that courts are generally hostile to a commercial landlord's use of self-help, because self-help renders a forfeiture of the premises before a tenant can litigate its right to remain in possession.⁶⁰ In addition, because of the lack of use of self-help many attorneys are unfamiliar with this body of law and are hesitant to employ such an aggressive measure. Courts also refuse to approve use of self-help where there is ambiguity in the lease terms or factual questions concerning the expiration of the lease.⁶¹ Moreover, under RPAPL § 853, a tenant wrongfully ejected from real property by force or other unlawful means may sue to recover treble damages from the landlord and be restored to possession if ejected before the end of the lease term.⁶²

As a result of the combination of general court hostility and attorney reluctance to recommend the use of proper self-help measures, commercial tenants have been allowed to violate their leases or extend them based on technical or frivolous defenses, sometimes for months or years at a time, in blatant disregard of the lease terms.⁶³ In addition to the loss of rental income that often accompanies such disputes, landlords faced with this situation lose valuable time to repair, renovate, and re-let their premises to responsible tenants. These circumstances also adversely affect any effort by the landlord to sell the leased premises to potential buyers.

Landlords have every incentive to insist on including a proper and effective self-help provision in their commercial leases. With appropriate drafting and proper execution of the self-help measures provided in their leases, commercial landlords should be able to exercise their right to peaceable reentry whenever such action is warranted. With the availability of self-help written into the lease, tenants are likely to be more careful to avoid any action that will place themselves in default and thereby become subject to immediate peaceable eviction. Thus, commercial landlords may both (a) provide an incentive for their tenants to comply with the lease terms, and (b) be able, when compelled to use self-help, to timely re-let the premises without first having to await the outcome of costly and lengthy litigation before doing so.

59 Self-help is limited to the commercial context only. New York City Administrative Code § 26-521 prohibits the use of self-help in the residential context.

60 Courts created the so-called "Yellowstone" injunction to allow the parties to dispute their differences while the tenant remains in possession and to prevent forfeiture. See, e.g., Stuart v. D&D Assocs., 160 A.D.2d 547, 554 N.Y.S.2d 197 (1st Dep't 1990).

Nevertheless, landlords who use self-help will not necessarily be able to avoid all litigation. There is always a possibility that the landlord will be required to litigate (a) whether the tenant was in default at the time of the landlord's reentry, and/or (b) whether the self-help used was peaceable and otherwise lawful.⁶⁴ Therefore, landlords should (a) carefully document a tenant's default before reentering the leased premises and (b) ensure that reentry is accomplished peaceably. Where it is not crystal clear that the lease term has expired or that the tenant is in default, the landlord should not use self-help, but should resort only to summary proceedings or other legal process. However, recognizing that the outcome of any litigation is always uncertain, a landlord may view the possibility of a future, adverse treble damages judgment as a risk worth taking in order to obtain the real, current ability to re-let the premises to a responsible tenant who will pay rent during the litigation that ensues between the landlord and the evicted tenant. Also, it is wise to remember that three times zero is still zero. If there are no genuine damages, trebling them is not going to hurt the landlord.

In deciding whether or not to run that risk, the landlord should consider the kind of damages that the evicted tenant will have a right to claim, i.e., whether any injury caused by the reentry will be limited to property damage only or whether the evicted tenant will be able to claim and prove damages measured by the loss of the value of the leasehold.⁶⁵ Where the lease has expired or been terminated by reason of the default, the tenant is not entitled to possession.⁶⁶ In that situation, the tenant's damage is likely to be limited to such property damage as may occur during the course of the reentry only—the sum of which a landlord may be more than willing to bear—but a judgment that the landlord may also be able to avoid by taking care to see that the tenant's property is carefully removed from the premises by persons other than the landlord itself, such as a bonded moving company, and placed in a reputable storage facility.

Whether a landlord's reentry is deemed peaceable or not will depend on whether it is made in a "forcible" manner. For a reentry to be forcible, the force used:

must be unusual and tend to bring about a breach of the peace, such as an entry with a strong hand, or a multitude of people, or in a riotous manner or with personal violence, or with the threat and menace to life or limb, or under circumstances which would naturally inspire fear and lead one to apprehend danger or personal injury if he stood up in defense of his possession.⁶⁷

In the absence of force that tends to breach the peace, hiring trucks and workers and even a garbage company to evict a tenant does not constitute forcible entry,⁶⁸ even if, in the case of a municipal landlord, the eviction is performed with the assistance of armed police.⁶⁹ However, to ensure that its use of self-help is indeed "peaceable" and that there is no confrontation during the eviction, the landlord should arrange for the reentry to occur during late night/early morning hours when the tenant's business is closed and when the landlord's agents are certain that no one is present on the leased premises before entering. When conducting the eviction, if there is any conflict with the tenant or its representatives, the attempted eviction should be abandoned and accomplished at a later date or under court order.

Upon reentry, when the peaceable self-help eviction is successful, the landlord may then change the locks or padlock the doors. To thwart any potential damage claims, the entire reentry operation should be videotaped, and all items of tenant property removed from the property should be photographed and inventoried. The tenant's property should then be placed in storage, for a reasonable period of time,⁷⁰ in accordance with a lease provision that contemplates such action in the event of an eviction.

70 Universal custom supported by no case law whatsoever, deems "reasonable time" to be thirty days.

Ultimately, whether or not the landlord is permitted to use self-help to regain possession of the leased premises will depend on whether the landlord's right to do so is reserved in the lease. The lease should expressly provide (a) that, if the tenant defaults in the payment of rent or commits any other violation of the lease constituting a default, the lease shall terminate automatically, (b) that the landlord may thereafter recover possession in accordance with its common law rights, (c) that the landlord may do so without any duty, requirement, or necessity to provide due process or to seek prior court approval, through summary dispossess proceedings or any other action or proceeding at law, before evicting the tenant and removing tenant's property and/or any person from the premises, and (d) that the term "re-entry" is not used in its technical or narrow sense but in the sense that the landlord may effect physical entry of the premises.⁷¹ Such a provision does not preclude the landlord from initiating summary proceedings if it chooses to do so. However, the landlord should exercise its options carefully. If the landlord does not use self-help initially, but commences a summary proceeding in the first instance, the right to use self-help thereafter may be considered waived.⁷²

The lease terms should also obligate the tenant to pay the landlord all monies owed by the tenant up to the time of the landlord's recovery of possession, whether the landlord recovers possession through self-help or summary proceedings. In addition, the lease should reserve the landlord's right to sue after reentry for any damages incurred as a result of the tenant's actions, such as an unlawful holdover that causes the landlord to lose an opportunity for re-letting the premises. The lease should provide that the landlord need not assert such claims against the tenant in summary proceedings only, but may do so in a separate plenary action.

While there are decided risks involved in using self-help measures, the careful landlord and the careful landlord's attorney should generally be able to avoid the pitfalls that exist and make self-help work to the landlord's benefit in the long run.

71 This clause is essential because much case law continues to define "re-entry" simply as the right to bring a summary proceeding.

[39.11] IV. COMMON ISSUES WITH DEFAULT CLAUSES

[39.12] A. Attorney Fees

Commercial leases generally provide that the landlord may recover the attorney's fees the landlord incurs if the landlord prevails in a litigation with the tenant. However, unlike the situation in residential lease disputes, where a residential tenant who prevails over a residential landlord in an action or a summary proceeding, is enabled, by statute,⁷³ to recover the tenant's attorney fees from the landlord, the commercial tenant has no such reciprocal right to recover the tenant's attorney fees if it prevails over its commercial landlord.⁷⁴ While most attorney fees clauses allow the landlord to recover its attorney fees in the event the landlord sues the tenant under the lease, better drafted clauses also allow the landlord to recover its attorney fees for a successful defense of a suit brought by the tenant.

A reciprocal requirement for attorney fees will not be implied for the benefit of a tenant where a commercial lease does not contain a provision authorizing the tenant to recover its attorney's fees from a defeated landlord.⁷⁵ However, although a lease issued under the Loft Law⁷⁶ may be commercial in form, when, for example, it provides for limited occupancy of the premises as an artist's studio, it has nevertheless been held that "where the intent of the parties, or the effect of the lease or of applicable law, was to create or accede to a residential use, the attorney's fee recovery clause becomes a reciprocal, mutual obligation."⁷⁷

[39.13] B. Liquidated Damages Provisions: Avoiding the Penalty

Besides a guarantee, liquidated damages provisions provide the greatest incentive for commercial tenants to comply with the lease. Below, we attempt to guide the practitioner in drafting an enforceable clause that will

73 N.Y. Real Property Law § 234 (RPL).

74 See, e.g., Reade v. Stonybrook Realty, LLC, 63A.D.3d 433, 882 N.Y.S.2d 8 (1st Dep't 2009).

77 Feierstein v. Moser, 124 Misc. 2d 369, 371, 477 N.Y.S.2d 545, 548 (Special Term, N.Y. Co., 1984).

withstand the scrutiny of a judge. Liquidated damages provisions in commercial leases are enforceable if not deemed to be a penalty that renders a forfeiture. As the New York Court of Appeals has explained:

As a general matter parties are free to agree to a liquidated damages clause “provided that the clause is neither unconscionable nor contrary to public policy.” Liquidated damages that constitute a penalty, however, violate public policy, and are unenforceable. A provision which requires damages “grossly disproportionate to the amount of actual damages provides for a penalty and is unenforceable.”⁷⁸

A contractual provision fixing damages in the event of a breach will be sustained “if the amount liquidated bears a reasonable proportion to the probable loss and the amount of actual loss is incapable or difficult of precise estimation.”⁷⁹ Liquidated damages provisions have their basis in the principle of just compensation for loss, and “a clause which provides for an amount plainly disproportionate to real damages is not intended to provide fair compensation, but to secure performance by the compulsion of the very disproportion.”⁸⁰ The burden is on the party seeking to avoid liquidated damages to show that the stated liquidated damages are in fact a penalty.⁸¹

“Whether a provision in an agreement is ‘an enforceable liquidation of damages or an unenforceable penalty is a question of law, giving due consideration to the nature of the contract and the circumstances.’”⁸² Where there is doubt as to whether a liquidated damages provision constitutes an unenforceable penalty or a proper liquidated damages clause, it will be resolved in favor of a construction that holds the provision to be a penalty.⁸³ It is immaterial whether the parties have called the provision one for “liquidated damages.”⁸⁴ The provision is to be interpreted as of the date it was created, not as of the date of its breach.⁸⁵ Thus, courts “must look to the anticipated loss discernible at the time of contracting and not the actual loss incurred by the breach to determine whether the liquidated damages are reasonable or whether the damages are capable of calculation.”⁸⁶ Where one party establishes that the stated liquidated damages is a penalty, the other party’s proper recovery is the amount of that party’s actual provable damages.⁸⁷

In cases where an acceleration clause provides for recovery of all future rent due as liquidated damages, the New York Court of Appeals has distinguished between (a) cases where the tenant remains in possession after being compelled to pay the total accelerated rent (where the total amount of accelerated rent is no greater than the amount that would otherwise have been paid, if timely paid by the tenant over the term of the lease),⁸⁸ and (b) cases where the tenant has vacated the premises and the landlord remains in possession.⁸⁹

In the latter case, the Court held that, “on its face,” the tenant’s argument, that permitting the landlord “to hold possession and immediately collect all rent due,” gives the landlord a windfall, was “compelling” because:

arguably the ability to obtain all future rent due in one lump sum, undiscounted to present-day value, and also enjoy uninterrupted possession of the property provides the landowner with more than the compensation attendant to the losses flowing from the breach – even though such compensation is the recognized purpose of a liquidated damages provision.

Accordingly, the Court determined that the defaulting tenant “should have had the opportunity to present evidence that the undiscounted accelerated rent amount is disproportionate to [the landlord’s] actual losses, notwithstanding that the landowner had possession, and no obligation to mitigate.”⁹⁰ The Court did not hold that the landlord would not be entitled to recover any accelerated contractual damages. The Court acknowledged it had previously held, in Holy Properties Limited, L.P. v. Kenneth Cole Productions, Inc.,⁹¹ “that once a tenant abandons the property prior to expiration of the lease, a ‘landlord [is] within its rights under New York law to do nothing and collect the full rent due under the lease,’”⁹² where “the parties have freely agreed to bind [the tenant] to pay rent after termination of the landlord-tenant relationship.”⁹³ Nevertheless, after 172 Van Duzer Realty Corp., determining the measure of those damages in such cases (whether “discounted” or not) will be subject to case by case development.

[39.14] 1. Representative Cases Where the Liquidated Damages Provision Was Not Enforced

Pyramid Ctrs. & Co. v. Kinney Shoe Corp.

244 A.D.2d 625, 663 N.Y.S.2d 711 (3d Dep’t 1997)

- Default provision in the lease provided that if tenant vacated the premises, tenant still remained liable to pay rent for the remainder of the lease period. Additionally, if tenant ceased operation prior to termination date, landlord could require tenant to “pay as liquidated damages and not as a penalty. . . double the fixed minimum rent for the remainder or unexpired portion of the term.”
- The Court determined that the provision was disproportionate to any subsequent loss suffered by the landlord and thus it was intended to coerce tenant’s performance rather than compensate landlord for tenant’s breach, and, therefore, its purpose was not to provide just compensation.⁹⁴
- In the interest of justice, the Court afforded the landlord the opportunity to present evidence of actual damages as a result of tenant’s decision to close its store before the expiration of the lease.

94 Of course, such coercion is precisely what many landlords hope to achieve, but there is simply no way to draft a “coercive” provision in accordance with the law.

Vernitron Corp. v. CF 48 Associates104 A.D.2d 409, 478 N.Y.S.2d 933 (2d Dep't 1984)

- Lease had a clause which called for liquidated damages in a sum equivalent to one year's rent for a default under the lease. The lease defined the term "default" to include any breach of the covenants of the lease.
- The lease contained numerous covenants of varying degrees of importance.
- Because the court looked at the anticipated losses discernible at the time of contracting and not the actual loss incurred by the breach to determine whether the liquidated damages were reasonable, the provision was determined to be an unenforceable penalty.
- Loss attributable to certain defaults such as late payment of rent is clearly readily ascertainable and is inappropriate for application of liquidated damages.
- Loss which might occur as a result of certain minor defaults under the lease (i.e., for a two-day delay in payment of rent) would be disproportionate to the amount of liquidated damages. That is to say that where there is an obvious contrast in the seriousness of the breaches, there should be a concomitant contrast in the consequences thereof.

Irving Tire Co. v. Stage II Apparel Corp.230 A.D.2d 772, 646 N.Y.S.2d 528 (2d Dep't 1996)

- Prior to termination of the lease, tenant became dissatisfied and entered into negotiations with landlord for early termination.
- Tenant agreed to pay landlord $50,000 for early termination agreement, which included a provision authorizing the landlord, in the event of a default, to enter judgment against the tenant in the sum of $140,000.
- After paying landlord $37,500, tenant stopped making payments because landlord had leased the store to a new tenant.
- Landlord commenced action to recover $102,500 in damages under the liquidated damages clause of the early termination agreement.

- Provision was deemed unenforceable because the actual damages arising from tenant's breach of the early termination agreement was readily ascertainable and the $140,000 fixed sum was disproportionate to the landlord's loss.

[39.15] 2. Representative Cases Where the Liquidated Provision Was Enforced

New 24 W. 40th St. LLC v. XE Capital Management, LLC* 104 A.D.3d 513, 961 N.Y.S.2d 139 (1st Dep't 2013)

- Provision in lease stated that if the tenant breached its duties under the lease, the landlord was entitled to recover as liquidated damages "an amount equal to the rent reserved hereunder for the unexpired portion of the term demised."
- Court determined the provision did not constitute a penalty because the provision did not allow recoupment of damages disproportionate to any loss which could possibly accrue to the landlord.

Bates Adver. USA, Inc. v. 498 Seventh, LLC* 291 A.D.2d 179, 739 N.Y.S.2d 71 (1st Dep't 2002)

- Both parties were highly sophisticated business entities, represented by accomplished and experienced real estate attorneys.
- The lease provided that if certain renovation work to be done by the landlord was not completed by the time the tenant had taken full occupancy of the initial demised premises and was conducting its ordinary business therein, then the tenant would be entitled to either a one-half day or one full day delay in the occurrence of the rent Commencement Date for each day from January 2, 1999 until the landlord substantially completed the work.
- Testimony established that this was a situation where it would be difficult, if not impossible, to calculate plaintiff's damages resulting from a breach, since there would be no way of knowing whether tenant's loss of an advertising client had been caused by construction conditions in the building.
- The parties made every reasonable effort to provide appropriate compensation in the event the landlord breached its obligations by breaking down the contemplated nine improvements into two categories;

those which if not completed would entitle the plaintiff to a half-day rent abatement for each day and those which if not completed would entitle the plaintiff to a full day rent abatement for each day left uncompleted.

- “By imposing this one-to-one proportionality between the days the breach continued and the value of the compensation, the parties successfully avoided the possibility that the tenant would obtain a benefit in gross disproportion to the injury it suffered.”
- Although the trial court ruled the provision an unenforceable penalty because the half-day abatement was applied whether one item or all nine items were lacking, the First Department determined this reasoning takes the concept of proportionality to the extreme:
 - “To require that a liquidated damages amount be set for each individual work item with the type of specificity this ruling requires, would be contrary to the concept of liquidated damages.”

Feyer v. Reiss

154 A.D. 272, 138 N.Y.S. 964 (2d Dep’t 1912)

- Case involved a three-year lease of eight tenement houses that housed sixty different tenants.
- The contract provided that: “It being expressly understood and agreed that if the lessees surrender the said premises or are dispossessed therefrom prior to the expiration of this lease in 1914, then and in that event the said eight hundred ($800) dollars, together with any subsequent installments which shall be paid by the lessees as hereinbefore provided, shall belong to the lessor as liquidated and stipulated damages, and the parties hereto agree to stipulate such deposit as liquidated damages because they cannot ascertain the exact amount of damage which the lessor would sustain in the event of any breach or violation hereunder.”
- Court determined liquidated damages clause was valid because:
- Lease was clear and definite as to the character of the deposit.
- Formal expression that deposit was liquidated damages.

- Affirmative provision that the parties had agreed that deposit was liquidated damages because they could not ascertain the exact amount of damages that the landlord would sustain in the event of a breach.
- There was no excessive disproportion between the deposit and the possible damages.

Tenber Associates. v. Bloomberg L.P.

51 A.D.3d 573, 859 N.Y.S.2d 61 (1st Dep’t 2008)

- Landlord commenced a commercial holdover proceeding based upon tenant’s continued possession of office space following the expiration of the parties’ lease agreement.
- Liquidated damages clause, which provided for two times the existing rent in the event of a holdover, was not an unenforceable penalty.
- Tenant failed to establish that the actual amount of damages could have been anticipated in 1995, when the lease was executed.
- Tenant also failed to establish that the amount fixed was “plainly or grossly disproportionate to the probable loss.”

299 A.D.2d 156, 753 N.Y.S.2d 36 (1st Dep’t 2002)

- Lease provided that if the tenant did not vacate the property within two days after the expiration of the lease, the landlord was entitled to a sum equal to two times the average rent and additional rent which was payable per month under the lease during the last six months of the lease.
- Court determined that the liquidated damages clause was not an unenforceable penalty since the damages could not have been anticipated in 1983, when the lease was executed and the amount fixed is not plainly or grossly disproportionate to the probable loss.

Federal Realty Ltd. Partnership v. Choices Women’s Med. Ctr., Inc.

289 A.D.2d 439, 735 N.Y.S.2d 159 (2d Dep’t 2001)

- Provision in lease stated that in the event of a failure to timely surrender the premises, the tenant “shall pay to the Owner for each month and for each portion of any month during which Tenant holds over a sum equal to three times the aggregate of that portion of the fixed rent and additional rent which was payable under this lease during the last month of the term hereof.”

- Provision also stated that “the damage to the Owner resulting from any failure by Tenant to timely surrender possession of the demised premises will be substantial and will be impossible to accurately measure.”
- Court determined this was a valid liquidated damages provision because the parties’ lease contained provisions which clearly and unambiguously permitted the landlord to recover a reasonable amount of damages for any injuries which resulted from the failure to timely surrender the premises:
- Furthermore, the record was devoid of evidence that the amount of liquidated damages to which the parties agreed was grossly disproportionate to the landlord’s actual loss.

Thirty-Third Equities Co. v. Americo Group., Inc.
294 A.D.2d 222, 743 N.Y.S.2d 10 (1st Dep’t 2002)

- Provision in lease allowed landlord to collect two and one-half times the rent for each month that tenant was on the premises after the expiration of the lease.
- Court determined this was a valid liquidated damages clause since there was no evidence that the projection of a 250% increase in rent was unreasonable.
- Premises were in fact rented to a new tenant in an amount approximating a 250% increase.

Montgomery Trading Co. v. Cho
22 Misc. 3d 135(A), 2009 WL 400083 (Sup. Ct., App. Term, 1st Dep’t 2009)

- Provision in lease allowed landlord to collect 1.5 times the existing rent in the event of a holdover.
- Court determined this was a valid provision since tenants failed to establish that damages could be anticipated in 1998 when the lease was executed or that the amount fixed was plainly or grossly disproportionate to the probable loss.

319 Fifth Ave. Realty v. 319 Smile Corp.21 Misc. 3d 139(A), 875 N.Y.S.2d 824 (Sup. Ct., App. Term, 1st Dep't 2008)

- Liquidated damages clause providing for use and occupancy at two times the rent in the event of a holdover was not an unenforceable penalty because damages could not be anticipated in 1997 when the lease was executed and the amount fixed was not plainly or grossly disproportionate to the loss.

[39.16] C. Monetary and Non-Monetary Defaults

Monetary events of default, such as failure to pay the rent or any of the items designated as additional rent in the lease, clearly entitle the landlord to serve a notice of default and/or a notice of termination under a conditional limitation clause. However, landlords may also serve notices of default and/or notices of termination for any designated non-monetary event of default specified in the lease.⁹⁵

In a properly drawn commercial lease, the landlord's right to terminate a lease and seek to evict a defaulting tenant, for a non-monetary event of default, rests on equal ground with the right to terminate for a monetary event of default. As previously noted, (a) so long as the non-monetary event of default is expressly defined in the lease, and (b) so long as the notice of default has specified the particular lease provision that the tenant has violated and the period, if any, during which the tenant is obliged to cure the default, the landlord may then serve a notice of termination after the expiration of the cure period.

Non-monetary events of default can also provide the basis upon which a court may deny a tenant's application for a Yellowstone injunction. As noted infra, one of the prime factors that a commercial tenant must demonstrate, in order to be eligible for obtaining a Yellowstone injunction, is to show that the tenant "is prepared and maintains the ability to cure the alleged default by any means short of vacating the premises." However, in those unusual cases where the tenant is clearly not prepared or willing to cure the default, the courts will not grant a Yellowstone injunction.

In 330 Hudson Owner, LLC v. Rector, Church Wardens and Vestrymen of Trinity Church in the City of New York,⁹⁶ the Court found that the tenant had stopped construction on a mixed-use building it had contracted to build, as provided in its lease, and that the tenant had “no present intention to resume construction.” The Court said that “the evidence indicates that [tenant] is attempting to use its shutdown in construction as leverage to force Trinity to renegotiate its lease.” Accordingly, the Court held that a Yellowstone injunction was not warranted.

A similar situation occurred in Gristede’s Operating Corp./Namdor Inc. v. Centre Financial LLC,⁹⁷ where the Court found that the supermarket tenant’s primary interest was “in closing its store, selling its assets and assigning the lease” with no indication of “any interest, inter alia, in remaining at the premises and curing the alleged violation of the Continuous Operation provision” of the lease. Given the facts, there was no basis for granting a Yellowstone injunction after the expiration of the notice to cure and the service of the notice of termination.

[39.17] D. Notices to Cure and Avoiding the Yellowstone Injunction

The so-called “Yellowstone” injunction, or other similar relief, when obtained by a commercial tenant in a Supreme Court plenary action, prohibits a property owner from terminating a tenancy for a non-monetary event of default and freezes any eviction efforts that may have already commenced in a local court summary proceeding. The Yellowstone injunction also tolls any corrective period stated in the lease until the parties have fully litigated whether a non-monetary violation of the lease has occurred.⁹⁸ “The purpose of the Yellowstone injunction is to maintain the status quo so that the tenant served with a notice to cure an alleged non-monetary lease violation may challenge the propriety of the landlord’s notice while protecting a valuable leasehold interest.”⁹⁹

In order to obtain a Yellowstone injunction, the courts require the tenant to show (a) the existence of a commercial lease, (b) receipt from the landlord of a notice of default thereunder, a notice to cure such default, or a threat of termination of the lease, (c) application for the issuance of an injunction made prior to the termination of the cure period specified in the lease, and (d) the tenant's ability and desire to cure the alleged non-monetary default by any means short of vacating the premises.¹⁰⁰

The availability of the Yellowstone injunction provides an invaluable defensive tool to a commercial tenant. At the same time, it is one of the most paralyzing tenant weapons that the judiciary has ever created; first, because it permits tenants to cure any lease violations after the litigation is completed; second, the case is brought and tried in Supreme Court where it may take years before completion and permit an excessive period of time to cure any violation; and third, the tolling of the "cure" period gives tenants the opportunity to commit knowingly blatant transgressions of the lease during the pendency of the action.¹⁰¹

However, a cure period is not required in a commercial lease. In a case in which the commercial lease had no cure period, the tenant argued that the clause was unconscionable because the absence of a cure period precluded the tenant from seeking a Yellowstone injunction to stay the lease's forfeiture. The court held that a cure period was not required and noted that "while it might have precluded defensive tactics such as seeking a Yellowstone injunction prior to the expiration of the lease, it was part of the fully negotiated contract between represented parties. It would not be contrary to public policy to enforce the provisions of the lease under such circumstances."¹⁰²

In New Eagle, Inc. v. H.R. Neumann Associates, Inc.,¹⁰³ a case in which a commercial lease lacked a cure period, the Court determined that the tenant could not satisfy the elements necessary to invoke the protection of a Yellowstone injunction. As the Court explained:

Although the plaintiff has established that it held a commercial lease and that the thirty-day eviction notice served as a threat of termination of the lease, said notice is not susceptible to a cure. Even if its application for a temporary restraining order was made prior to the termination of the lease, the plaintiff does not have the ability to effect a cure in this case: it would appear that it has not. The purpose of a Yellowstone injunction is to toll the running of the cure period in the landlord's notice to cure so that, after determination of the merits, the tenant may cure the defect and avoid a forfeiture of the leasehold. In the case at hand, there is simply no "cure" period for this Court to toll or stay.

If the cure period is eliminated from a commercial lease, tenant transgressions will decrease as the tenant's contemplation of the reality of the possibility of a swift termination and eviction, in the event of a default, is ever present. Moreover, the basis for injunctive action in the Supreme Court is also eliminated, and, when injunctive relief is denied, the question of whether or not the lease has been violated will be tried in a Civil Court proceeding, without the time impediments of discovery and the lengthy time-line of a Supreme Court matter.

Nevertheless, the omission of a cure period may be resisted in lease negotiations, and, even where the omission of a cure period is successfully negotiated, it is still possible that some judges will seek ways to insert an equitable cure period into the lease agreement. Therefore, as an alternative to entirely omitting a cure period from the lease, we recommend devising a scenario whereby time limits and other handcuffs are placed on the Yellowstone action within the terms of commercial lease: First, the tenant should be required to place a substantial bond, in a specified amount upon the granting of the Yellowstone application; Second, the scope of discovery in any resulting litigation should be limited with specific procedures pre-agreed upon to foster an expedited hearing or trial; and Third, the parties should agree that all resulting proceedings should be placed on an expedited court schedule (presuming that the court will enforce such commercial lease provisions).

[39.18] V. LICENSES

The legal relationship established between the property owner-landlord and a tenant, by a lease, is entirely distinct from the legal relationship established, by a license, between the property-owner-licensor and a licensee. Under a bona fide license agreement, the tenant-licensor owns no estate in the premises and has no right to possession. Common law principles apply, and the owner-licensor has the absolute right to use peaceable self-help, at any time, to remove a licensee from the licensed premises for any reason or no reason.¹⁰⁴ The landlord thus avoids having to endure months or years of lengthy and frustrating litigation to regain possession of valuable real estate.

To obtain the benefit of a license agreement, the property owner must ensure that its agreement with the prospective user of the premises is indeed a license and not a lease. This is not necessarily an easy task to accomplish. Merely calling the agreement a “license” will not make it so. Whether an agreement is held to be a “license” and not a lease will depend on the presence or absence in the agreement of the three essential characteristics of a real estate license: (1) a clause allowing the licensor to revoke “at will,”¹⁰⁵ (2) the retention by the licensor of absolute control over the premises,¹⁰⁶ and (3) the licensor’s supplying to the licensee all of the essential services required for the licensee’s permitted use of the premises.¹⁰⁷

Courts have found “licenses” to be leases where any one or more of these characteristics is either missing from the agreement altogether or not sufficiently vested in the powers retained by the licensor.¹⁰⁸ However, the less control given the licensee, the more likely the agreement is to be held a license, because a license offers no autonomy, but merely allows a party “to render services within an enterprise conducted on premises owned or operated by another, who has supervisory power over the method of rendition of the services.”¹⁰⁹ Nevertheless, it has been held that the licensor’s retention of control over prices charged by the licensee, times of operation with the licensed space, and even the choice of the licensee’s employees, is no guarantee that the agreement will be held to be a license and not a lease, as such controls may be deemed “no more than 105 See Ark Bryant Park Corp. v. Bryant Park Restoration Corp., 285 A.D.2d 143, 730 N.Y.S.2d 48 (1st Dep’t 2001) upholding the license even though the at will revocation had a built in delay period.

106 See Karp v. Federated Dep’t Stores, 301 A.D.2d 574, 754 N.Y.S.2d 27 (2d Dep’t 2003).

107 See Nextel of N.Y. v. Time Mgmt. Corp., 297 A.D.2d 282, 746 N.Y.S.2d 169 (2d Dep’t 2002).

would reasonably be demanded by a careful owner as against a lessee for [any] business.”¹¹⁰

Therefore, careful drafting of appropriate license agreements will be required, and, for this purpose, there must be close cooperation between attorneys and their clients who wish to implement a license regime. Communications to the client of the risks, as well as the benefits, of utilizing a license agreement will be essential. In addition, attorneys will need to give close attention to the objectives of the client and determine how much initial cost the client is willing to accept in order to provide the kind of “full service” agreement that will pass a court’s “license” test.

Owners will also have to make judgments about the commercial feasibility of obtaining licensees who are willing to accept license agreements with “at will” revocation clauses. Whether potential licensees are willing to sign such agreements may depend upon the type of premises that the owner is making available for licensed use; whether the licensed space is a warehouse, an office suite for multiple users, or simple storage space. To attract licensees concerned about making a substantial investment in space subject to a revocable license, owners may create new financing incentives or build into the agreement a mechanism to compensate a non-defaulting licensee for the remaining unamortized value of its investment at such time as the licensor invokes the “at will” clause of the agreement.

At present, real estate license agreements appear to be utilized primarily by owners of properties licensed to short term users of office space and to users of certain types of storage. That there is a market for such agreements is clearly apparent. Whether there is a market for real estate license agreements for other types of occupancy may not be so apparent, but, given the need of landlords to be relieved of the onerous burdens and frustrations of traditional landlord-tenant litigation, the time is fast approaching when landlords may need to test the market by striving to transform the commercial rental landscape into a true license regime.

[39.19] VI. DRAFTING FOR THE COMMERCIAL TENANT

[39.20] A. Introduction

At common law, the doctrine of “caveat emptor” governed commercial leasing. By the 1970’s New York courts, relying on equitable principles, began to carve out exceptions to caveat emptor.¹¹¹ Equity gained greater currency and judicial decisions softened commercial lease provisions that potentially endangered or evicted tenants.¹¹² In recent years, courts at all levels have moved away from finding equitable solutions to prevent harsh results or evictions and have applied the terms of negotiated lease provisions. Past judicial activism by judges protecting commercial tenants’ rights has evolved into a consistent enforcement and implementation of commercial leases.¹¹³ In many cases, no matter how draconian the lease provision, New York courts have been enforcing the contents of commercial leases.¹¹⁴

In this judicial environment, many tenants have suffered severe financial consequences or lost their leases as a result of poorly drafted leases. Although temporary tenant victories providing endless delays resulting from technical mistakes and jurisdictional defect defenses are still used regularly, tenant attorneys have reason to be prudent and avoid overreliance upon such tactics. It is possible that, in a given case, their holdover commercial tenant client might be found liable, for damages suffered by the third-party incoming tenant, by reason of their client’s failure to vacate after its lease term expired.¹¹⁵

It is imperative, therefore, that commercial tenants negotiate better leases in order to protect their interests. The topics covered below contain suggestions on how commercial tenants should attempt to do so.

111 See David Frey, The Yellowstone Injunction, or How to Vex Your Landlord Without Really Trying, 58 Brooklyn L. Rev. 155, 161-162; see also Curtis J. Berger, Hard Leases Make Bad Law, 74 Columbia L. Rev. 791 (1974) (under subsection entitled “Doctrines Openly Hostile to the Landlord and the Lease”).

[39.21] B. Mitigation of Damages

Since the Court of Appeals decided the seminal case of Holy Properties v. Kenneth Cole Productions,¹¹⁶ in 1995, landlords have not been required to mitigate damages when a commercial tenant defaults on its lease and surrenders or is removed from the premises. As the tenant of record remains liable for all rents due during the remainder of its lease term, a landlord has no incentive to even attempt to re-rent or alleviate a defaulting tenant of its duty to pay rent. Landlords are not obligated to mitigate prospective losses in the event of default on rent payments.¹¹⁷ This has produced exceedingly harsh results.¹¹⁸

Therefore, from a tenant's interest, every commercial lease should contain a clause which provides that, upon a default in the lease that results in the surrender or eviction from the premises, the landlord agrees to mitigate its losses and to use reasonable efforts to re-lease the demised premises. If it can be negotiated, such a clause should include a requirement by the landlord to advertise weekly and to employ a qualified real estate broker to find a new tenant to whom to lease the premises. This clause should also include a duty by the landlord to attempt to rent the premises for at least the same rent, in order to reduce any remaining rent liability.

Negotiating a mitigation of damages clause may provide a commercial tenant with a life preserver in an ocean of financial devastation.

[39.22] C. Prevailing Party Clause

Most commercial leases include a provision that a tenant must pay a landlord's legal expenses and attorney's fees in connection with any default in the lease.

Although state law mandates that such an attorney's fees clause in a residential lease is deemed to be reciprocal, the statutory mandate in residential cases does not apply to commercial leases. Despite many failing arguments to the contrary, attorney's fees provisions providing payment to the landlord in connection with a legal proceeding will not provide the 117 See, e.g., Syndicate Bldg. Corp. v. Lorber, 128 A.D.2d 381, 512 N.Y.S.2d 674 (1st Dep't 1987).

118 Even Holy Properties acknowledged the results to be harsh, but held that it was better to have a reliable old rule than to break new precedential ground.

same rights to a commercial tenant unless specifically stated in the tenant's commercial lease.¹¹⁹

Accordingly, a prevailing party clause should be negotiated into the commercial lease agreement. The provision should require the losing party to any action to pay the prevailing party's legal fees and expenses. Such a clause should prevent, or at least lessen, the number of frivolous and harassing lawsuits initiated by both landlords and tenants. As neither party will be able to commence a legal action without the threat of being required to fund the victorious party's legal bill, parity should prevail and thereby preclude attempts to exploit any inequitable leveraging position.

[39.23] D. Right of Expansion Clause

An expansion clause is the right or option to lease a specific additional space in the demised premises for a defined term in the future. Such an option becomes significant when a company has outgrown its space and wishes to avoid having to move to a new location and save the cost and inconvenient time delays that relocation necessitates. Financially, it saves the tenant from being forced to lease additional space if its financial situation does not dictate growth when the option becomes available.

The expansion clause allows a tenant the flexibility of either (a) taking an entirely new and larger space in the building without any financial consequences for vacating its present space, or (b) permits the tenant to simply expand its tenancy taking additional floor space or additional square feet. The expansion option also benefits the landlord by allowing it the flexibility to deliver different floors or rental space to the tenant at different times. The expansion clause also requires communication between the landlord and the tenant at certain fixed times which might not otherwise occur without a lease provision dictating such contact.

As the landlord knows when existing leases expire, it will be able to determine vacancy dates before the execution of the initial lease. As such, the negotiated expansion clause should address different possibilities for potential expansion. The expansion clause should be expressly negotiated to include: (a) a detailed description of specific potential expansion spaces, (b) the yearly rent due or an agreement to use fair market rent, and (c) any increases in taxes and/or operating expenses. In addition, a provision requiring the landlord to sue reasonable efforts to recover possession from a holdover tenant in the chosen expansion space should be included. Commercial tenants should also attempt to negotiate a right of first refusal to protect their long term interests in the premises.

[39.24] E. The Option to Renew

The option to renew has been used in practice for hundreds of years.¹²⁰ The option permits a tenant to sign on for another five or ten years at a negotiated rent. The renewal rent negotiated at the time of the initial lease is often only three to five percent above the rent for the last year of the original lease period. Since the tenant is not required to exercise the option, it can vacate the space without any liability after the initial lease term. Furthermore, after investing heavily to turn raw space into an office or store, a tenant will be more comfortable signing a lease with a shorter term with the knowledge that, at its option, it can remain for one or more renewal periods. In fact, a shorter term with option periods may be beneficial for a smaller company without the ability to forecast financial success. Finally, if the market calls for a lower rent than the renewal option specifies, negotiation may result in a decreased rent when it is time to renew.

The option to renew is beneficial to the landlord as a result of the incentives supplied and its importance as a negotiating tool. By making the option contingent on the tenant's good standing with its lease obligations during the current term, the tenant shall have an important incentive to be on its best behavior, and to comply with all of its lease obligations, to avoid losing the right to renew. Granting the option can also give the landlord an important negotiating tool that may overcome any stalemate has impeded lease negotiations.

[39.25] F. Ownership and Use

The Internet has provided a cost efficient way to provide additional protection for a tenant for the most basic foundations of the tenancy. First, when receiving a draft of a landlord's lease, the ownership interests of the entity or person listed in the agreement should be investigated. Property ownership and tax information should be checked by visiting the appropriate governmental website. Second, determine whether the commercial tenant's anticipated use of the premises is permitted by law by also visiting the relevant government website. For example, in New York City, the legal use for the premises and the certificate of occupancy can be viewed by search the Department of Buildings website. In New York City, any premises constructed after 1938, or where significant renovations occurred in the interim, require a certificate of occupancy.

The certificate of occupancy will report the legal uses of the premises, and, if a tenant's proposed business is not listed, a competent expediter or architect should be able to determine whether legalization is possible. To legalize a new use for the premises, the architect or expediter must have all building violations corrected, and then proceed with an application for an amendment to the certificate of occupancy approving the new use.

Every tenant should attempt to include in the description of its business in the lease the catch-all phrase "any lawful use." However, obtaining a favorable use clause will not guarantee that the business will also be able to function as such. If there is any doubt about whether the premises can be lawfully used for the tenant's particular business, a provision should be negotiated giving the tenant the ability to cancel the lease upon a determination that the planned use of the premises cannot be legalized or that it cannot be made so within a reasonable time after submitting a proper application to the relevant governmental authority. During this waiting period, the lease should require that no rent become due. To facilitate the process, a provision requiring the landlord to complete any necessary forms to legalize the use or proposed alterations should be negotiated. If the lease is cancelled due to non-approval of the tenant's proposed use, the landlord should be required to return all monies forwarded to the landlord as well as to reimburse any expenses incurred by the tenant in attempting to legalize the premises.

A tenant should also retain the ability to cancel the lease if the tenant is unable to take possession on the move-in date or soon thereafter. A representation should be added whereby the landlord agrees to make a good faith effort to complete and legalize the premises, as well as to evict a holdover tenant. In an alternative to canceling the lease, the tenant should be granted a rent abatement for each day that the landlord fails to deliver possession. Upon the delayed commencement of the lease, the expiration dates of the lease should be extended, and the commencement date should be contingent on the issuance of the various approval and permits necessary to complete construction.

[39.26] G. Signage and Alterations

A disproportionate amount of commercial lease litigation derives from disputes over signs and alterations.¹²¹ In an attempt to decrease the amount of litigation involving such items, attorney should learn a tenant's business needs and carefully adapt the lease to them. In addition, before the lease signing, negotiate the advance or pre-approval of any alteration changes and signage requests as well as any foreseeable alteration changes during the term of the lease. Specific plans, measurements, drawings and pictures should be provided and attached to the lease agreement. If possible, obtain the right to make non-structural alterations without the landlord's approval, including any alterations that are insignificant or do not require building permits. Also, include a representation by the landlord that it will remove any existing violations against the premises, so that any permit applications needed to perform the work will not be rejected. For all other alterations requiring the landlord's permission, ensure that such authorization will not be unreasonably¹²² withheld.

[39.27] H. Repairs and Self-Help

Commercial tenants should attempt to make the landlord liable for all structural repairs to the demised space and to the building, as well as non-structural repairs occasioned by the landlord's negligence.¹²³

Commercial tenants should also strive to include a self-help provision. Such a provision allows the a tenant to complete any repairs that the landlord neglects to complete within an allotted time period after notification from the tenant. This clause should allow the tenant to seek reimbursement by obtaining a rent credit for the cost of repair or by obtaining reimbursement directly from the landlord. Besides eliminating the perennial tenant's dilemma of whether it can withhold rent until necessary repairs are done, the clause will also provide a mechanism that should assist in keeping the premises free of conditions requiring necessary repairs.¹²⁴ The self-help clause will also resolve the "independent covenant" dilemma, where any rental amounts due to the landlord are deemed independent of the landlord's obligation to do repairs. Any lease provision specifying that each provision is independent of every other provision should be modified to include the tenant self-help provision.

SAMPLE DEFAULT CLAUSES

Conditions of Limitation

1.01 This lease and the term and estate hereby granted are subject to the limitation that whenever Tenant, or any guarantor of Tenant's obligations under this lease, shall make an assignment for the benefit of creditors, or shall file a voluntary petition under any bankruptcy or insolvency law, or an involuntary petition alleging an act of bankruptcy or insolvency shall be filed against Tenant or such guarantor under any bankruptcy or insolvency law, or whenever a petition shall be filed by or against Tenant or such guarantor under the reorganization provisions of the United States Bankruptcy Code or under the provisions of any law of like import, or whenever a petition shall be filed by Tenant, or such guarantor, under the arrangement provisions of the United States Bankruptcy Code or under the provisions of any law of like import, or whenever a permanent receiver of Tenant, or such guarantor, or of or for the property of Tenant, or such guarantor, shall be appointed, then Landlord (a) if such event occurs without the acquiescence of Tenant, or such guarantor, as the case may be, at any time after the event continues for XXXX (XX) days, or (b) in any other case at any time after the occurrence of any such event, may give Tenant a notice of intention to end the term of this lease at the expiration of five (5) days from the date of service of such notice of intention, and upon the expiration of said five-day period this lease and the term and estate hereby granted, whether or not the term shall theretofore have commenced, shall terminate with the same effect as if that day were the expiration date of this lease, but Tenant shall remain liable for damages as provided in Article XXXX hereof.

1.02 This lease and the term and estate hereby granted are subject to the further limitations that:

- (a) if Tenant shall default in the payment of any Fixed Rent or Additional Charges, and such default shall continue for five (5) days after written notice thereof has been given to Tenant, or
- (b) if Tenant shall, whether by action or inaction, be in default of any of its obligations under this lease (other than a default in the payment of Fixed Rent or Additional Charges) and such default shall continue and not be remedied as soon as practicable and in any event within XXXX (XX) days after Landlord shall have given to Tenant a notice specifying the same, or, in the case of a default which cannot with due diligence be cured within a period of XXXX (XX) days and the continuance of which for the period required for cure will not (i) subject Landlord or any Superior Lessor or any Superior Mortgagee to prosecution for a crime or any other fine or charge, (ii) subject the Premises or any part thereof or the Building or Land, or any part thereof, to being condemned or vacated, (iii) subject the Building or Land, or any part thereof, to any lien or encumbrance which is not removed or bonded within the time period required under this Lease, or (iv) result in the termination of any Superior Lease or foreclosure of any Superior Mortgage, if Tenant shall not within said XXXX (XX) day period advise Landlord of Tenant's intention to take all steps reasonably necessary to remedy such default, (y) duly commence within said XXXX (XX) day period, and thereafter diligently prosecute to completion all steps reasonably necessary to remedy the default and (z) complete such remedy, or

(c) if any event shall occur or any contingency shall arise whereby this lease or the estate hereby granted or the unexpired balance of the term hereof would, by operation of law or otherwise, devolve upon or pass to any person, firm or corporation other than Tenant, except as expressly permitted by Article XXXX (xx) hereof, or

(d) if Tenant shall abandon the Premises, or

(e) if there shall be any default by Tenant under any other lease with Landlord (or any person which, directly or indirectly, controls, is controlled by, or is under common control with, Landlord) covering space in the Building which shall not be remedied within the applicable grace period, if any, provided therefor under such other lease, or if Tenant holds over in the premises demised under such other lease,

Then, in any of said cases in clauses (a) through (e) of this Section, Landlord may give to Tenant a notice of intention to end the term of this lease at the expiration of five (5) days from the date of the service of such notice of intention, and upon the expiration of said five days this lease and the term and estate hereby granted, whether or not the term shall theretofore have commenced, shall terminate with the same effect as if that day was the day herein definitely fixed for the end and expiration of this lease, but Tenant shall remain liable for damages as provided in Article XXXX hereof.

Chronic Nonpayment

1.03 Notwithstanding anything in this Lease to the contrary, and without limiting Landlord's other rights and remedies provided for in this Lease or at law or equity, if Tenant fails to pay by the due date any Base Rent, Additional Rent, or any other charges owing under this Lease more than [INSERT, e.g., two (2) times within any consecutive twelve (12) month period, then Landlord, at its sole election and in its sole discretion, may do one or more of the following:

- (a) If Landlord shall elect, Landlord shall have the right to terminate this Lease, in the manner provided in Section 1.02 hereof, and evict Tenant from the Premises;
- (b) Require that, beginning with the first monthly installment of Base Rent next due, the Base Rent shall no longer be paid in monthly installments, but shall be payable in advance, on a quarterly basis, on the first day of the first month of each following three-month period, with the first three-month period beginning when payment of the Base Rent is next due, in the total amount of all Base Rent due for each such three-month period;
- (c) Require Tenant to direct its bank or other financial institution or securities broker(s) to automatically and electronically transfer, in accordance with Section XXXX [INSERT AUTOMATIC TRANSFER LEASE CLAUSE] of this Lease, all Base Rent, Additional Rent, and/or other charges due under this Lease, to a bank account, or other financial or securities/brokerage account, chosen and identified by Landlord for such purpose. Landlord shall provide Tenant with written notice of the bank or other financial or securities/brokerage account information necessary to effectuate such transfers; and/or

(d) Increase the Security Deposit by an amount that Landlord determines, in its sole and absolute discretion, to be necessary to protect Landlord's interests, provided that such amount does not exceed [INSERT, e.g., an amount equal to three (3) months of the then-applicable monthly Base Rent. Such increase of the Security Deposit shall be paid by Tenant immediately upon demand by Landlord.

Bankruptcy

1.04 (a) If Tenant shall have assigned its interest in this lease, and this lease shall thereafter be disaffirmed or rejected in any proceeding under the United States Bankruptcy Code or under the provisions of any federal, state or foreign law of like import, or in the event of termination of this lease by reason of any such proceeding, the assignor or any of its predecessors in interest under this lease, upon request of Landlord given within XXXX (XX) days after such disaffirmance or rejection, Tenant shall (a) pay to Landlord all Fixed Rent and Additional Charges then due and payable to Landlord under this lease to and including the date of such disaffirmance or rejection and (b) enter into a new lease as lessee with Landlord of the Premises for a term commencing on the effective date of such disaffirmance or rejection and ending on the Expiration Date, unless sooner terminated as in such lease provided, at the same Fixed Rent and Additional Charges and upon the then executory terms, covenants and conditions as are contained in this lease, except that (i) the rights of the lessee under the new lease, shall be subject to any possessory rights of the assignee in question under this lease and any rights of persons claiming through or under such assignee, (ii) such new lease shall require all defaults existing under this lease to be cured by the lessee with reasonable diligence, and (iii) such new lease shall require the lessee to pay all Additional Charges which, had this lease not been disaffirmed or rejected, would have become due after the effective date of such disaffirmance or rejection with respect to any prior period. If the lessee shall fail or refuse to enter into the new lease within ten (10) days after Landlord's request to do so, then in addition to all other rights and remedies by reason of such default, under this lease, at law or in equity, Landlord shall have the same rights and remedies against the lessee as if the lessee had entered into such new lease and such new lease had thereafter been terminated at the beginning of its term by reason of the default of the lessee thereunder.

(b) If pursuant to the Bankruptcy Code Tenant is permitted to assign this lease in disregard of the restrictions contained in Article XXXX hereof (or if this lease shall be assumed by a trustee), the trustee or assignee shall cure any default under this lease and shall provide adequate assurance of future performance by the trustee or assignee including (a) the source of payment of rent and performance of other obligations under this lease (for which adequate assurance shall mean the deposit of cash security with Landlord in an amount equal to the sum of one year's Fixed Rent then reserved hereunder plus an amount equal to all Additional Charges payable under Article XXXX for the calendar year preceding the year in which such assignment is intended to become effective, which deposit shall be held by Landlord, without interest, for the balance of the term as security for the full and faithful performance of all of the obligations under this lease on the part of Tenant yet to be performed) and that any such assignee of this lease shall have a net worth exclusive of good will, computed in accordance with generally accepted accounting principles, equal to at least ten (10) times the aggregate of the annual Fixed Rent reserved hereunder plus all Additional Charges for the preceding calendar year as aforesaid, and (b) that the use of the Premises shall in no way diminish the reputation of the Building as a first-class office building or impose any additional burden upon the Building or increase the services to be provided by Landlord. If all defaults are not cured and such adequate assurance is not provided within sixty (60) days after there has been an order for relief under the Bankruptcy Code, then this lease shall be deemed rejected, Tenant or any other person in possession shall vacate the Premises, and Landlord shall be entitled to retain any rent or security deposit previously received from Tenant and shall have no further liability to Tenant or any person claiming through Tenant or any trustee. If Tenant receives or is to receive any valuable consideration for such an assignment of this lease, such consideration, after deducting therefrom (a) the brokerage commissions, if any, and other expenses reasonably incurred by Tenant for such assignment and (b) any portion of such consideration reasonably designed by the assignee as paid for the purchase of Tenant's Property in the Premises, shall be and become the sole exclusive property of Landlord and shall be paid over to Landlord directly by such assignee. If Tenant's trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession assumes this lease and proposes to assign the same (pursuant to Title 11 U.S.C. Section 365, as the same may be amended) to any person, including, without limitation, any individual, partnership or corporate entity, who shall have made a bona fide offer to accept an assignment of this lease on terms acceptable to the trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession, then notice of such proposed assignment, setting forth (x) the name and address of such person, (y) all of the terms and conditions of such offer, and (z) the adequate assurance to be provided Landlord to assure such person's future performance under this lease, including, without limitation, the assurances referred to in Title 11 U.S.C. Section 365(b)(3) (as the same may be amended), shall be given to Landlord by the trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession no later than twenty (20) days after receipt by the trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession of such offer, but in any event no later than ten (10) days prior to the date that the trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession shall make application to a court of competent jurisdiction for authority and approval to enter into such assignment and assumption, and Landlord shall thereupon have the prior right and option, to be exercised by notice to the trustee, Tenant or Tenant as debtor-in-possession, given at any time prior to the effective date of such proposed assignment, to accept an assignment of this lease upon the same terms and conditions and for the same consideration, if any, as the bona fide offer made by such person, less any brokerage commissions which may be payable out of the consideration to be paid by such person for the assignment of this lease.

Reentry by Landlord

1.05 If Tenant shall default in the payment of any Fixed Rent or Additional Charges, and such default shall continue for ten (10) days after written notice thereof has been given to Tenant, or if this lease shall terminate as provided in Article XXXX hereof, Landlord or Landlord's agents and employees may immediately or at any time thereafter reenter the Premises, or any part thereof, either by summary dispossession proceedings or by any suitable action or proceeding at law, or by force or otherwise, including self-help, without being liable to indictment, prosecution or damages therefor, and may repossess the same, and may remove any person therefrom, to the end that Landlord may have, hold and enjoy the Premises. The word "reenter," as used herein, is not restricted to the narrow sense of its technical or legal meaning, but instead in the sense that the Landlord may effect physical entry of the Premises in accordance with its common law rights.

1.06 In the event of a breach or threatened breach by Tenant of any of its obligations under this lease, Landlord shall also have the right of injunction. The special remedies to which Landlord may resort hereunder are cumulative and are not intended to be exclusive of any other remedies to which Landlord may lawfully be entitled at any time and Landlord may invoke any remedy allowed at law or in equity as if specific remedies were not provided for herein.

1.07 If this lease shall terminate under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, or if Landlord shall reenter the Premises under the provisions of this Article XXXX, or in the event of the termination of this lease, or of reentry, by or under any summary dispossession or other proceeding or action or any provision of law by reason of default hereunder on the part of Tenant, Landlord shall be entitled to retain all monies, if any, paid by Tenant to Landlord, whether as advance rent, security or otherwise, but such monies shall be credited by Landlord against any Fixed Rent or Additional Charges due from Tenant at the time of such termination or reentry or, at Landlord's option, against any damages payable by Tenant under Article XXXX hereof or pursuant to law.

Damages

2.01 If this lease is terminated under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, or if Landlord shall reenter the Premises under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, or in the event of the termination of this lease, or of reentry, by self-help or under any summary dispossession or other proceeding or action or any provision of law by reason of default hereunder on the part of Tenant, Tenant shall pay to Landlord as damages, at the election of Landlord, either:

- (a) a sum which at the time of such termination of this lease or at the time of any such reentry by Landlord, as the case may be, represents the then value of the excess, if any (assuming a discount at a rate per annum equal to the interest rate then applicable to 7-year Federal Treasury Bonds), of (i) the aggregate amount of the Fixed Rent and the Additional Charges under Article XXXX hereof which would have been payable by Tenant (conclusively presuming the average monthly Additional Charges under Article XXXX hereof to be the same as were payable for the last twelve (12) calendar months, or if less than twelve (12) calendar months have then elapsed since the Commencement Date, all of the calendar months immediately preceding such termination or reentry) for the period commencing with such earlier termination of this lease or the date of any such reentry, as the case may be, and ending with the date contemplated as the expiration date hereof if this lease had not so terminated or if Landlord had not so reentered the Premises, or (ii) the aggregate fair market rental value of the Premises for the same period, or

(b) sums equal to the Fixed Rent and the Additional Charges under Article XXXX hereof which would have been payable by Tenant had this lease not so terminated, or had Landlord not so reentered the Premises, payable upon the due dates therefor specified herein following such termination or such reentry and until the date contemplated as the expiration date hereof if this lease had not so terminated or if Landlord had not so reentered the Premises, provided, however, that if Landlord shall relet the Premises during said period, Landlord shall credit Tenant with the net rents received by Landlord from such reletting, such net rents to be determined by first deducting from the gross rents as and when received by Landlord from such reletting the expenses incurred or paid by Landlord in terminating this lease or in reentering the Premises and in securing possession thereof, as well as the expenses of reletting, including, without limitation, altering and preparing the Premises for new tenants, brokers' commissions, reasonable legal fees, and all other expenses properly chargeable against the Premises and the rental therefrom, it being understood that any such reletting may be for a period shorter or longer than the remaining term of this lease; but in no event shall Tenant be entitled to receive any excess of such net rents over the sums payable by Tenant to Landlord hereunder, nor shall Tenant be entitled in any suit for the collection of damages pursuant to this subdivision to a credit in respect of any net rents from a reletting, except to the extent that such net rents are actually received by Landlord. If the Premises or any part thereof should be relet in combination with other space, then proper apportionment on a square foot basis shall be made of the rent received from such reletting and of the expenses of reletting. If the Premises or any part thereof be relet by Landlord for the unexpired portion of the term of this lease, or any part thereof, before presentation of proof of such damages to any court, commission or tribunal, the amount of rent reserved upon such reletting shall, prima facie, be the fair and reasonable rental value for the Premises, or part thereof, so relet during the term of the reletting. Landlord shall not be liable in any way whatsoever for its failure or refusal to relet the Premises or any part thereof, or if the Premises or any part thereof are relet, for its failure to collect the rent under such reletting, and no such refusal or failure to relet or failure to collect rent shall release or affect Tenant's liability for damages or otherwise under this lease.

2.02 Suit or suits for the recovery of such damages, or any installments thereof, may be brought by Landlord from time to time at its election, and nothing contained herein shall be deemed to require Landlord to postpone suit until the date when the term of this lease would have expired if it had not been so terminated under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, or had Landlord not reentered the Premises. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit or preclude recovery by Landlord against Tenant of any sums or damages to which, in addition to the damages particularly provided above, Landlord may lawfully be entitled by reason of any default hereunder on the part of Tenant. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to limit or prejudice the right of Landlord to prove for and obtain as damages by reason of the termination of this lease or reentry on the Premises for the default of Tenant under this lease an amount equal to the maximum allowed by any statute or rule of law in effect at the time when, and governing the proceedings in which, such damages are to be proved whether or not such amount be greater than any of the sums referred to in Section XXXX hereof.

2.03 In addition, if this lease is terminated under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, or if Landlord shall, reenter the Premises under the provisions of Article XXXX hereof, Tenant agrees that:

(a) the Premises then shall be in the condition in which Tenant has agreed to surrender the same to Landlord at the expiration of the term hereof;

(b) Tenant shall have performed prior to any such termination any covenant of Tenant contained in this lease for the making of any Alterations or for restoring or rebuilding the Premises or the Building, or any part thereof; and

(c) for the breach of any covenant of Tenant set forth above in this Section XXXX, Landlord shall be entitled immediately, without notice or other action by Landlord, to recover, and Tenant shall pay, as and for liquidated damages therefor, the cost of performing such covenant (as estimated by an independent contractor selected by Landlord).

2.04 In addition to any other remedies Landlord may have under this lease, and without reducing or adversely affecting any of Landlord's rights and remedies under Article XXXX, if any Fixed Rent, Additional Charges or damages payable hereunder by Tenant to Landlord are not paid within seven (7) days after the due date thereof, the same shall bear interest at the rate of one and one-half percent (1½%) per month or the maximum rate permitted by law, whichever is less, from the due date thereof until paid, and the amount of such interest shall be an Additional Charge hereunder. For the purposes of this Section XXXX, a rent bill sent by first class mail, to the address to which notices are to be given under this lease, shall be deemed a proper demand for the payment of the amounts set forth therein (but nothing contained herein shall be deemed to require Landlord to send any rent bill or otherwise make any demand for the payment of rent except in those cases, if any, explicitly provided for in this Lease).

Affirmative Waivers

3.01 Tenant, on behalf of itself and any and all persons claiming through or under Tenant, does hereby waive and surrender all right and privilege which it, they or any of them might have under or by reason of any present or future law, to redeem the Premises or to have a continuance of this lease after being dispossessed or ejected therefrom by process of law or under the terms of this lease or after the termination of this lease as provided in this lease.

3.02 If Tenant is in arrears in payment of Fixed Rent or Additional Charges, Tenant waives Tenant's right, if any, to designate the items to which any payments made by Tenant are to be credited, and Tenant agrees that Landlord may apply any payments made by Tenant to such items as Landlord sees fit, irrespective of and notwithstanding any designation or request by Tenant as to the items which any such payments shall be credited.

3.03 Landlord and Tenant hereby waive trial by jury in any action, proceeding or counterclaim brought by either against the other on any matter whatsoever arising out of or in any way connected with this lease, the relationship of Landlord and Tenant, Tenant's use or occupancy of the Premises, including, without limitation, any claim of injury or damage, and any emergency and other statutory remedy with respect thereto.

3.04 Tenant shall not interpose any counterclaim of any kind in any action or proceeding commenced by Landlord to recover possession of the Premises (other than compulsory counterclaims).

No Waivers

4.01 The failure of either party to insist in any one or more instances upon the strict performance of any one or more of the obligations of this lease, or to exercise any election herein contained, shall not be construed as a waiver or relinquishment for the future of the performance of such one or more obligations of this lease or of the right to exercise such election, and such right to insist upon strict performance shall continue and remain in full force and effect with respect to any subsequent breach, act or omission. The receipt by Landlord of Fixed Rent or partial payments thereof or Additional Charges or partial payments thereof with knowledge of breach by Tenant of any obligation of this lease shall not be deemed a waiver of such breach.

4.02 If there be any agreement between Landlord and Tenant providing for the cancellation of this lease upon certain provisions or contingencies and/or an agreement for the renewal hereof at the expiration of the term, the right to such renewal or the execution of a renewal agreement between Landlord and Tenant prior to the expiration of the term shall not be considered an extension thereof or a vested right in Tenant to such further term so as to prevent Landlord from canceling this lease and any such extension thereof during the remainder of the original term; such privilege, if and when so exercised by Landlord, shall cancel and terminate this lease and any such renewal or extension; any right herein contained on the part of Landlord to cancel this lease shall continue during any extension or renewal hereof; any option on the part of Tenant herein contained for an extension or renewal hereof shall not be deemed to give Tenant any option for a further extension beyond the negotiated renewal or extended term continued therein.

Curing Tenant's Defaults

5.01 If Tenant shall default in the performance of any of Tenant's obligations under this lease, Landlord, any Superior Lessor or any Superior Mortgagee without thereby waiving such default, may (but shall not be obligated to) perform the same for the account and at the expense of Tenant, without notice in a case of emergency, and in any other case only if such default continues after the expiration of the applicable grace period, if any. If Landlord effects such cure by bonding any lien which Tenant is required to bond, Tenant shall obtain and substitute a bond for Landlord's bond at its sole cost and expense and reimburse Landlord for the cost of Landlord's bond.

5.02 Bills for any expenses incurred by Landlord or any Superior Lessor or any Superior Mortgagee in connection with any such performance by it for the account of Tenant, and bills for all costs, expenses and disbursements of every kind and nature whatsoever, including reasonable counsel fees, involved in collecting or endeavoring to collect the Fixed Rent or Additional Charges or any part thereof or enforcing or endeavoring to enforce any rights against Tenant or Tenant's obligations hereunder, under or in connection with this lease or pursuant to law, including any such cost, expense and disbursement involved in instituting and prosecuting summary proceedings or in recovering possession of the Premises after default by Tenant or upon the expiration or sooner termination of this lease, and interest on all sums advanced by Landlord or such Superior Lessor or Superior Mortgagee under this Section 27.02 and/or Section 27.01 (at the Interest Rate or the maximum rate permitted by law, whichever is less) may be sent by Landlord or such Superior Lessor or Superior Mortgagee to Tenant monthly, or immediately, at its option, and such amounts shall be due and payable as Additional Charges in accordance with the terms of such bills. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary contained in this Section, Tenant shall have no obligation to pay Landlord's costs, expenses, or disbursements in any proceeding in which there shall have been rendered a final judgment against Landlord, and the time for appealing such final judgment shall have expired.

Yellowstone Injunction

6.01 Landlord and Tenant, after due consideration and negotiation at arms length, and being fully advised by their respective counsel, hereby agree that the cure period for any event of default under this Lease shall not be the subject of any application or motion by the Tenant to a Court of law for a so-called "Yellowstone" injunction to enjoin Landlord from maintaining a summary proceeding against Tenant, and Tenant hereby expressly and knowingly waives and relinquishes all rights it might otherwise have to seek a "Yellowstone" injunction or other comparable equitable relief, if and when Landlord should have occasion to issue a Notice of Default and/or a Notice to Cure under the terms of this Lease after any Event of Default, as defined in this Lease.

6.02 In the event that a Court of law should (a) declare any part of this "Yellowstone Injunction" provision null and void, (b) issue a "Yellow- stone” injunction or other comparable equitable relief in contravention of Section “6.01” above, or (c) issue any other order inconsistent with Section “6.01” above, which results in a plenary proceeding to adjudicate whether an Event of Default has occurred under this Lease, then Landlord and Tenant hereby further agree:

- (a) That Tenant shall make current all of its Rent and/or Additional Rent obligations then due under this Lease;
- (b) That Tenant shall secure a bond in the amount of no less than One (1) Million ($1,000,000.00);
- (c) That both parties shall cooperate in seeking to have said plenary action placed on an expedited court schedule for the purpose of obtaining an early pre-trial hearing of the case;
- (d) That discovery in any such plenary action shall be limited to (i) production of copies of the Lease, any correspondence between the parties, and any other written, photographic, video and/or electronic evidence, and any expert reports and exhibits, relating to the claimed Event of Default, and (ii) no more than three depositions of party and/or non-party witnesses representing the Landlord’s interests and no more than three depositions of party and/or non-party witnesses representing the Tenant’s interests; and
- (e) That Tenant, within the time specified in this Lease for the payment of its monthly rent, shall pay all Rent and/or Additional Rent due each month, during the pendency of such plenary action.

CHAPTER FORTY

OVERVIEW OF LEASE ENFORCEMENT

Michelle A. Maratto Itkowitz, Esq.
Jay B. Itkowitz, Esq.

[40.0] I. INTRODUCTION TO LEASE ENFORCEMENT

Many transactional document drafters, who are not litigators, spend a lot of time working on commercial lease clauses without a clear conception of how such clauses can be enforced. They assume their work will be self-effectuating. It is not.

This chapter does two things: (1) it explains the actual nuts and bolts of how to practice commercial landlord and tenant litigation; and (2) it offers strategies that may be employed in this area to achieve expeditious and cost-effective results. Accordingly, the chapter serves two functions. First, it is a resource for the landlord and tenant litigator. Second, it provides much needed context for the drafter.

The draftsman should assume that every clause will at some time be violated. After all, we live in a very litigious environment in which, at some time or another, a party to a deal is going to test the limits of what has been written, either because of market forces, a business going bad, or just because they like to test.

Advice dispensed by this chapter often appears to be directed at landlord's counsel. This is so because the protagonist of much of the action examined is, indeed, the landlord. Tenant's counsel, both the litigator and the drafter, will, however, find an equal amount of value in every section. If a course of action is recommended for those seeking to enforce the lease on behalf of the landlord, then it can be inferred that the opposite protocol will work well for the tenant.

[40.1] A. Occupancy Relationships

We begin by defining what a landlord and tenant relationship is (and what it is not), and noting that "landlord and tenant law" often deals with evicting people and companies who are neither landlords nor tenants.

- Tenant: There is a written or oral contract between a landlord and a tenant that includes: (a) fixed term, (b) fixed rental amounts, (c) a clearly delineated premises, (d) a grant of exclusive use of the subject premises, and (e) a grant of exclusive control over the business conducted in the subject premises.¹

- Tenant at Sufferance: One holding over, with no privity to the landlord. But the wrongful holding is by the laches of the landlord because it is the folly of the owner to suffer him to continue in possession after the determination of the preceding estate. No liability for rent, not really a “tenant.” Nor can the owner maintain an action of trespass against such a person.²
- Tenant at Will: A tenancy at will is “One who enters upon lands by permission of the owner, without any term being prescribed or rent reserved.”³ The obligation to pay rent is not an absolute element of “tenancy at will.”⁴ Exclusive use and possession is sufficient to create a “tenant at will.”⁵ The dispositive test is whether “he who is in possession has, by some act or agreement, recognized the other as his lessor or landlord and taken upon himself the character of a tenant under him, so that he is not at liberty afterwards to dispute his title.”⁶ An example of a tenancy-at-will is when employee remained in possession after employment relationship ended.⁷
- Contract Vendee: Generally, a tenant’s exercise of an option to purchase contained in a lease merges the landlord-tenant relationship into a vendor/vendee relationship thereby serving to terminate the landlord-tenant relationship unless the parties intend otherwise. The same is true when a seller under a contract of sale of real property allows the purchaser into the space before the closing.⁸ Thus, if the closing falls apart, the former-contact-vendee-occupant-left-in-the-space is not a tenant. Again, there was no meeting of the minds creating a tenancy, setting a rent and a term, etc. The best you can hope for in this situation is to be able to get the occupant out using Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law § 713 (RPAPL) “Grounds where no landlord-tenant relationship exists.”⁹

2 Livingston v. Tanner, 14 N.Y. 64 (1856).

5 See Burns v. Bryant, 31 N.Y. 453 (1865) (“The defendant was in possession, holding for no particular time, paying no rent, making no compensation for the use of the land . . . He was clearly a tenant at will”).

Lind*, 203 A.D.2d 696, 610 N.Y.S.2d 347 (3d Dep’t 1994), holding that parties to a contract of sale do not have a landlord-tenant relationship, but there are exceptions to this rule, such as when the contract expressly avoids a merger by an express declaration in the contract that the relationship will remain that of landlord and tenant.

- Former Mortgagor in Possession after Foreclosure: After a property is conveyed at a foreclosure sale, the former mortgagor is not the new owner’s “tenant.” Again, as above, there was no meeting of the minds creating a tenancy, setting a rent and a term, etc. Once more, you need RPAPL § 713 “Grounds where no landlord-tenant relationship exists.”¹⁰
- Licensee in Commercial Context: Connotes use or occupancy of the grantor’s premises, not exclusive possession of designated space. Typically, license agreements are utilized for concession stands operated within other establishments;¹¹ agreements to place and maintain vending machines in certain areas;¹² agreements to sell particular merchandise on the floor space of department stores;¹³ signage on roof tops;¹⁴ and coin-operated laundries.¹⁵

[40.2] B. Summary Proceedings

In most instances when a landlord finds it necessary to sue a tenant to recover rent or possession of a premises, the proper vehicle is a summary proceeding for the recovery of real property. A summary proceeding for the recovery of real property (“summary proceeding”) is an expedited lawsuit, for the recovery of rent and possession of a premises, created by the New York State Legislature in 1820 and governed by Article 4 of the Civil Practice Law and Rules (CPLR) and Article 7 of the RPAPL. Summary proceedings are expeditious because the parties’ procedural rights and remedies are severely limited. Among other things, for example, the tenant’s time to answer the lawsuit is accelerated and, absent leave of court, there is no discovery.¹⁶

Due to the accelerated nature of a summary proceeding and the limits on pre-trial discovery, a landlord prosecuting such a proceeding is held to a higher standard with respect to complying with the technical requirements of the RPAPL. In general, even though courts have adopted more liberal standards in recent years, technical defects that might have no effect on a plenary action will mandate dismissal of a summary proceeding.¹⁷

For the most part, we are not concerned in these materials with a plenary lawsuit (i.e., a regular lawsuit filed in a non-landlord and tenant part of the Civil Court of the City of New York or in the Supreme Court of the State of New York). Sometimes, however, it is possible, desirable, or even necessary, for a landlord to sue to recover rent or possession of a premises in a plenary action. We will consider these less frequent occasions later in these materials.

[40.3] C. Nonpayment Vs. Holdover

There are two types of summary proceedings: nonpayment proceedings and holdover proceedings. A nonpayment is a lawsuit for the recovery of rent due and, in the absence of full and timely recovery of rent due, possession of the premises.¹⁸ A holdover is a lawsuit for recovery of possession of the premises, regardless of the payment of rent, although past due rent or a fee for using and occupying the subject premises may also be recovered in a holdover.¹⁹

The distinction between a nonpayment and a holdover, and the circumstances under which each may be initiated, are confusing to many people. The chart below compares the characteristics of a nonpayment and a holdover.

	Nonpayment	Holdover
Grounds for Lawsuit	Rent not paid.	Someone in possession who is not entitled to be.
Predicate Notice	Rent demand.	Various: 30-day Notice of Termination; Notice to Cure and Notice to Terminate; in some cases no notice required.
Relief Sought	Money judgment for past due rent and a judgment of possession.	Judgment of possession and possibly a money judgment for use and occupancy.
Is Payment of Rent a Defense?	Yes, if tenant pays prior to issuance of warrant of eviction (even after a money judgment is issued)—case over.	No.
Speed	Usually moves faster than a holdover.	Usually moves more slowly than a nonpayment.

18 RPAPL § 711(2).

19 RPAPL § 711(1).

	Nonpayment	Holdover
Complexity	Usually easier to prosecute than a holdover.	Usually more difficult to prosecute than a nonpayment.
First Court Date	Not scheduled until Respondent answers.	Scheduled when Petitioner purchases index number.
Default	If Respondent defaults, Petitioner may apply for a judgment of possession and a warrant of eviction via the Marshal's office.	If Respondent defaults, there must be an inquest before a judgment of possession is issued.

The only instance in which one can bring a nonpayment is when a tenant fails to pay the rent. In contrast, there are a greater variety of situations in which a landlord may institute a holdover. Interestingly, however, holdovers are actually commenced much less frequently than nonpayments.

[40.4] 1. What About a Holdover for the Non-Payment of Rent?

A question often asked at this point is: “Why can you not bring a holdover for the non-payment of rent? How can failing to pay the rent on time not be a violation of a provision of the lease that would cause the lease to end early?”

In the commercial context,²⁰ sometimes leases will allow the landlord to bring a holdover when the only provision of the lease being violated is the covenant to pay rent. However, whether a lease contains this provision is usually the result of market forces at the time of the lease negotiation.

20 In the residential context, there is a statute prohibiting as a matter of public policy any automatic forfeiture of residential tenancies for the non-payment of rent. Semans Family Ltd. Partnership v. Kennedy, 177 Misc. 2d 345, 675 N.Y.S.2d 489 (Civ. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1998) (conditional limitation in residential lease, which provided that, in the event of nonpayment of rent, lease would automatically expire on termination date fixed in notice of default, did not allow tenant to pay rent due in order to avoid forfeiture, violated public policy prohibiting automatic forfeitures of residential tenancies for nonpayment of rent).

[40.5] 2. Which Case Should I Bring—a Nonpayment or a Holdover?

If the landlord has the option of bringing either a nonpayment or a holdover, the following are some major advantages and disadvantages of each. A nonpayment usually moves faster than a holdover. However, if the tenant pays the rent, or is able to demonstrate why it does not owe the rent, the tenant wins the proceeding.²¹ A holdover is usually a bit more challenging to prosecute than a nonpayment and takes longer. Payment of rent, or disproving that rent is owed, is not a defense to a holdover, however, and if the proceeding is properly prosecuted, it may terminate the tenancy. Deciding which summary proceeding to institute really depends on the landlord's goals and the lawyer's or managing agent's strategy. Maybe a landlord really wants a tenant out because the market is such that the landlord can re-let the space for more money. Suppose the lease has expired and now the tenant is a month-to-month tenant, so a 30-day notice of termination is required as a predicate to initiating a holdover proceeding.²²

The litigator should ask the following questions:

- How much rent does the tenant owe?
- Can I prove it? and
- If I can prove it, can the tenant pay it?

If the tenant is in bad financial condition and will be unable to defend against a simple nonpayment, why bother bringing a holdover with its long predicate notice period? In that case, it might be best to do a nonpayment with its relatively short predicate notice period.

[40.6] II. VITAL PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS IN LEASE ENFORCEMENT LITIGATION

Landlord and tenant cases are often won (or lost) before the case is even filed. A myriad of factual issues need to be examined, understood legally, and dealt with in order to bring a winnable case on behalf of a landlord. This is so because, as we will explore in detail below, a landlord and tenant case depends on the service of a proper predicate notice, which is not amendable. Therefore, mistakes made at the predicate notice stage, even before a pleading is drafted, can destroy a landlord and tenant case. If a mistake is not discovered until trial, it can be devastatingly wasteful of a landlord-client's time and money.

21 See 89 N.Y. Jur. 2d Real Property Possessory Actions § 97.

22 See infra, § 39.33, "Termination of Month-to-Month Tenancies."

[40.7] A. Create a Lease Abstract

In order to do this work well, the authors strongly recommend that litigation counsel always prepare a "Lease Abstract," a short reference document that records and consolidates all the salient information about the particular case. This information is collected online, by speaking with the client, and by reading the lease and other information.

The Lease Abstract serves at least two purposes. One purpose of the Lease Abstract is that its preparation forces the practitioner to engage fully with the case, preventing careless errors with the many details that need to be considered and the many choices that need to be made when drafting a predicate notice or a pleading. The Lease Abstract is a kind of checklist. Another purpose of the Lease Abstract is to make life easy going forward. If the phone rings and the client wants to discuss the matter, the lawyer does not need to fumble to answer simple questions, such as, How much is the monthly rent? Is there a guaranty? How much security are we holding? Is there an attorney fee provision?

A Lease Abstract Should Include the Following:

- General information about the building and the case:
 - The building's zip code (If service copies are mailed to the wrong zip code the case can be dismissed for bad service).²³
 - Any a/k/a for the address
 - The block and lot numbers
 - The deed from the NYC Dept. of Finance ACRIS

²³ The general rule is that an incorrect address on a mailing must lead to dismissal, for the court will not have acquired personal jurisdiction. See Soils Eng'g Svcs., Inc. v. Donald, 258 A.D.2d 425, 685 N.Y.S.2d 723 (1st Dep't 1999.) (noting that court lacked personal jurisdiction over defendant because "Plaintiff ... failed to establish that the summons was mailed to the correct address"). The court will lack personal jurisdiction even when a plaintiff includes the wrong zip code in a summons and complaint in a plenary action. Avakian v. De Los Santos, 183 A.D.2d 687, 583 N.Y.S.2d 275 (2d Dep't 1992).

- The certificate of occupancy from the NYC Dept. of Buildings (DOB)
- Any relevant DOB or NYC Dept. of Environmental Protection violations
- The Multiple Dwelling Registration from the NYC Dept. of Housing Preservation and Development
- Check the NYS Dept. of State Division of Corporations website to see if the landlord and the tenant are authorized to do business in New York State
- Google the tenant and the address (one never knows what one will find)
- Look at the building on Google maps
- Ask the managing agent if he or she is aware of occupants in addition to the tenant
- Get the last six checks tenant paid with and note the name and address of payee
- For each document in the lease chain note:
 - Document date
 - Document name (i.e. “Standard Form of Loft Lease”)
 - Party of the First Part
 - Party of the Second Part
 - Exact Description of Premises
 - Term
- Note the status of the following (with citations to the controlling part of the lease chain):
 - Timing for a rent demand
 - Whether there is a conditional limitation for the nonpayment of rent

- Number of days required for a notice to cure for a rent default
- Number of days required for a notice to terminate for a rent default
- Number of days required for a notice to cure for a non-rent default
- Number of days required for a notice to terminate for a non-rent default
- Method of notice
- When a notice is deemed effective
- What the premises can be used for
- How much security is being held; how much left
- Whether there is a guaranty
- Whether the lease provides for attorney fees
- The monthly rent

Much of the balance of this chapter addresses how this information is utilized in litigation.

[40.8] B. Petitioner's Interest

At trial the petitioner (i.e., landlord) must prove its interest in the premises.²⁴

The lawyer must get his or her hands on and carefully examine the documents that prove landlord's interest in the premises before drafting any documents for the lawsuit.

A copy of the deed to the building in which the premises is located can be obtained online in New York City at the Department of Finance, ACRIS section of the site.

Or you can obtain a certified deed from the County Clerk's office of the county in which the property is located. Moreover, you will need a certified copy of the deed for trial. An original deed is admissible, but often the original deed is unavailable and it is not sensible to risk losing it by bringing it to court. Since a certified copy of the deed usually takes about a week to obtain, you should order a certified copy well in advance.

It should also be noted, however, that there are consistent holdings that “proof of ownership” is not a prerequisite to maintaining a proceeding pursuant to RPAPL § 721 which authorizes summary proceedings by “landlord or lessor,” and that introduction of the lease agreement is sufficient proof of petitioner’s right to maintain a summary proceeding.²⁵ Although it is probably less trouble to bring proof of ownership to trial, if for some reason such proof is not available and petitioner is the lessor named in the lease, this is an important line of cases to keep in mind.

Finally, sometimes a landlord-client will be a Limited Liability Company, but the deed will be in the name of a previous partnership. Not to worry—this is one of the few situations where it is not hazardous to a prima facie case for the deed to be in a different name than the petitioner. Limited Liability Company Law § 1007 (Effect of conversion) states:

- (a) A partnership or limited partnership that has been converted pursuant to this chapter is for all purposes the same entity that existed before the conversion.
- (b) When a conversion takes effect:
 - (i) all property, real and personal, tangible and intangible, of the converting partnership or limited partnership remains vested in the converted limited liability company;
 - (ii) all debts, obligations, liabilities and penalties of the converting partnership or limited partnership continue as debts, obligations, liabilities and penalties of the converted limited liability company;
 - (iii) any action, suit or proceeding, civil or criminal, then pending by or against the converting partnership or limited partnership may be continued as if the conversion had not occurred; and

(iv) to the extent provided in the agreement of conversion and in this chapter, the partners of a partnership or the general partners and limited partners of a limited partnership shall continue as members in the converted limited liability company.

[40.9] C. Lease

[40.10] 1. Get the Whole Lease

If there is a lease with the tenant, landlord's lawyer needs all of it when preparing the proceeding. A landlord's lawyer should not let his client get away with sending him only the cover page, the default paragraph and the signature page, no matter how long a fax or pdf it is. If the landlord's lawyer misses something because he did not properly review the lease, then the landlord will, rightfully, say, "Well, I could have sent you the whole lease; why didn't you ask for it?"

[40.11] 2. How to Get Around Problems with Petitioner's Interest in the Lease

What if a landlord who bought a building but no one bothered to assign the building's leases to the new owner?

Real Property Law § 223 (RPL) states that:

The grantee of leased real property . . . has the same remedies, by entry, action or otherwise, for the nonperformance of any agreement contained in the assigned lease for the recovery of rent, for the doing of any waste, or for other cause of forfeiture as his grantor or lessor had, or would have had, if the reversion had remained in him.

Therefore, when the petitioner becomes the owner of the fee, the petitioner takes the same subject to the existing lease, and there can be no question of the petitioner's right to institute summary proceedings to regain possession of the premises.²⁶

Therefore, when a landlord conveys the fee, and makes no reservation as to any unexpired leases (even though he does not formally assign these leases), he nevertheless transfers these leases to the grantee together with all of the grantor's rights in and under them. The conveyance does not terminate the lease. From the time of the conveyance of the fee to the grantee, the grantee becomes bound by, and entitled to the benefits of, all the covenants in the lease which run with the land. A privity of estate has been created between the grantee and the tenant by virtue of the conveyance, and the covenants that run with the land fix and define the tenure by which the parties hold the leased property. If it is a covenant running with the land, it will inure to the benefit of the original landlord's grantee, notwithstanding that the original agreement did not provide that it would be binding on or inure to the benefit of the assigns of the original parties.²⁷

[40.12] D. Arrears Report

In a nonpayment proceeding, as will be demonstrated later in this chapter, a landlord's attorney must be exact about the rent demanded. Therefore, it is important to look at the arrears report that the managing agent will use in court to refresh his or her recollection regarding the arrears and how additional rent, if any, was computed. If notices were sent to the tenant regarding the computation of additional rent, these should be examined before drafting the papers, and brought to court for trial as well.

If the tenant receives rent and/or additional rent bills or has received any correspondence or earlier notices from the landlord regarding what landlord claims is owed, tenant's attorney should compare those bills to the rent demand to see if they match.

[40.13] E. Corporate Status in New York

When a New York State corporation has been dissolved for neglecting to pay requisite franchise taxes, absent subsequent reinstatement (achievable by payment of unpaid franchise taxes, penalties, interest and charges pursuant to Tax Law § 203-a(7)) the corporation is essentially legally dead and has no de facto existence. Accordingly the corporation is no longer permitted to sue or be sued.²⁸ This is a great trick for a tenant to use to derail a landlord and tenant case. True, a landlord can simply pay the back taxes and then re-initiate the case, but that costs time and money (sometimes a lot) that the landlord was not planning on shelling out as a predicate to suing the tenant.²⁹

[40.14] F. Other Litigation

Sometimes it is just nice to know how much litigation your opponent is, or has been, tied up in. This information is not really relevant to the landlord's prima facie case, but the color commentary it provides might cause a judge to view the tenant in a less sympathetic light. Similarly, if you are representing the tenant, under certain circumstances, learning what other cases the landlord has brought can be vital. The bottom line is that knowledge is power. It also does not hurt to look up your opponents on the internet to try to figure out who they are.

[40.15] G. Correspondence

Obtain all correspondence between landlord and/or managing agent and the tenant.

[40.16] H. Chronology on Microsoft Excel

It is good to make a chronology of important events in an excel chart, where you can easily add a new event and then sort the events by date. Do not wait until the eve of trial to begin assembling the facts into a chronology. This exercise helps you to see patterns and to determine if you are missing any vital information.

[40.17] I. Evidence of Additional Occupants

It is important for a landlord's attorney to figure out who is in the space sought to be recovered, so that all proper parties can be served.

Questions Landlord's Attorney Should Ask Client:

- Does the landlord know who occupies the space?
- Has the lease been assigned?

²⁹ To determine the status of a New York corporation, the New York State Department of State, Division of Corporations, Corporation and Business Entity Database can be accessed for free at https://www.dos.ny.gov/corps/bus_entity_search.html.

- Did the landlord give permission to anyone else to be in the space, either written or oral?
- Has the landlord encountered anyone other than the tenant with respect to the premises?
- Have subtenants, authorized or unauthorized, moved into the premises?
- Are there names other than that of tenant on the door?
- What is the name of the store?

[40.18] J. Search the Tenant and the Building Online, and Look At Google Maps

The tenant and the building should be searched online, and the building's image checked on Google maps. One never knows what one will find.

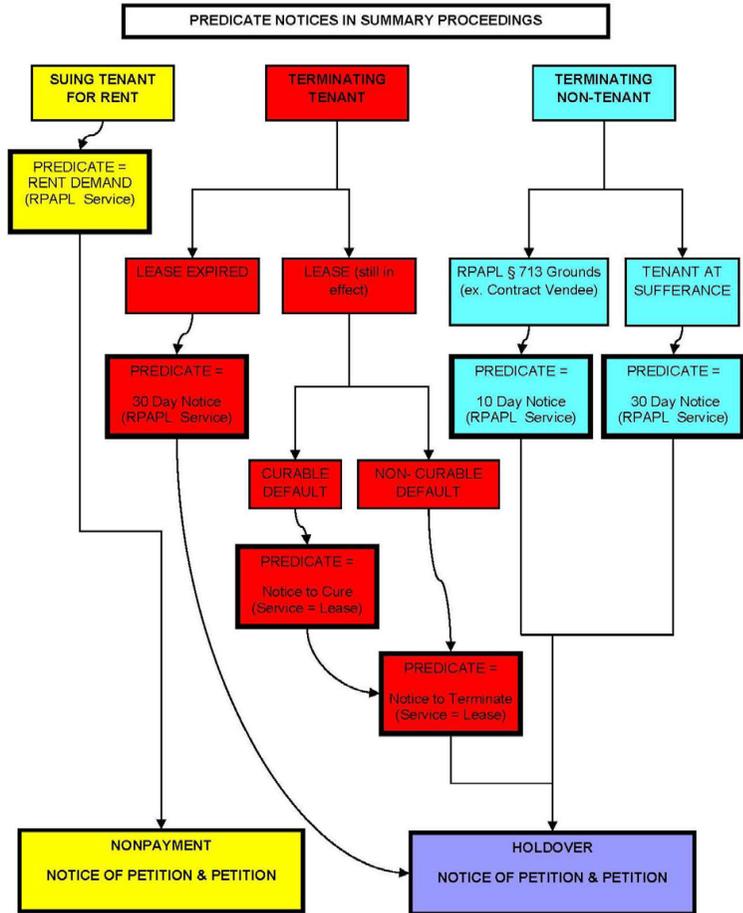

[40.19] K. Take a Field Trip—Go Visit the Premises

This last suggestion is not one to do for every case. In larger commercial litigations, however, we have found visiting the site of the dispute to be extremely helpful. For example, when considering what use and occupancy should be set at for a tenant in commercial strip mall, it is useful to walk around the mall. Are the stores upscale or downscale? Do the stores depend on one another to enhance one another's value? Yes, a broker will render an expert opinion in most use and occupancy disputes. Sometimes, however, there is no substitute for the understanding of a case that comes from seeing the subject of the litigation with one's own

[40.20] III. PREDICATE NOTICES IN GENERAL

Almost every summary proceeding requires service of a predicate notice before the lawsuit can be commenced. This can be a very confusing aspect of this area of law. On the next page is a chart designed to help one understand which predicate notices underlie which proceedings and how each are served.

Itkowitz PLLC Copyright Michelle Maratto Itkowitz 2014 34905 pub

[40.21] A. Predicate Notices Not Amendable

A predicate notice is not amendable.³⁰ Therefore, if a predicate notice is not clear and precise it is jurisdictionally defective, and the proceeding upon which it is based is subject to dismissal.³¹ Consequently, if mistakes are made at the predicate notice stage, the case must be started all over again. A tenant's attorney should look for defects—the opportunity for them abound! Although the courts overlook some of the most technical defects in predicate notices, motion practice occasioned by defects can cause delays while the court sorts out the issue.

[40.22] B. Who May Sign A Predicate Notice

Although conflicting authority exists, in order to be safe, a predicate notice should be signed by the landlord.³² Leases usually require that the landlord issue any notice under the lease. Therefore, the attorney should not sign a predicate notice.³³

In order to remain in compliance with the Fair Debt Collection Practices Act (FDCPA), the landlord, not the managing agent or the lawyers, should sign, because they may be considered a debt collector under the FDCPA. Essentially, anyone can collect a debt owed to themselves without being subject to the FDCPA. However, once a managing agent or a lawyer sends out five demands under their own signature in a one year period, they are deemed a debt collector and subject to the special requirements set forth in the FDCPA.

This advice is not always practical. Often, the landlord will want its managing agent to sign the predicate notice on behalf of the landlord because the managing agent is the one privy to the details of the situation. When the tenant can be shown to know that the managing agent is authorized to act on behalf of the landlord, either by formal notice or prior interaction between the tenant and managing agent, an objection as to the sufficiency of the managing agent's authority will not be a defense to the proceeding.³⁴ Nevertheless, the best practice is to have the landlord sign all predicate notices.

[40.23] IV. PREDICATE NOTICE WHEN SUING FOR RENT—RENT DEMANDS

[40.24] A. Rent Demands

A rent demand on at least three days' notice is a required predicate of a summary nonpayment proceeding.³⁵

[40.25] B. Lease Can Lengthen Time Requirement in Rent Demand

The three-day requirement may be lengthened by the lease.³⁶ In addition, the lease may require more stringent service requirements than those promulgated in the RPAPL.

[40.26] C. Oral Rent Demand

Pursuant to statute, a rent demand may be oral, unless the lease says otherwise (which it almost always does).³⁷ But even if the lease allows an oral rent demand, a demand in writing should be made because it is too difficult to prove the requisite elements of an oral demand at trial. The landlord will have to testify to exactly what he said to demonstrate that the demand was unequivocal,³⁸ and that the tenant was apprised of the particular time period for which rent is claimed to be in default and the approximate good faith amount alleged to be due.³⁹

[40.27] D. Good Faith Approximation of Arrears in Rent Demand

Under Brusco v. Miller,⁴⁰ a rent demand must set forth a good faith approximation of the rent believed to be due and owing. This contrasts with the often highly exaggerated damages asserted in a typical civil action. Furthermore, although much precedent supports a landlord's ability to rely upon a good faith approximation of the rent due, there are lower courts that have held that the arrears must be specifically itemized.⁴¹

[40.28] E. Payment or Surrender Options in Rent Demand

A rent demand must state that the tenant has the alternative of paying the arrears or surrendering the premises.⁴²

[40.29] F. Legal and Late Fees in Rent Demand

A rent demand may include legal fees, late fees and other "additional rent" if the lease allows such.⁴³

[40.30] G. Service of Rent Demand

Pursuant to RPAPL § 711(2), written rent demands must be served upon a tenant in the same manner set forth in RPAPL § 735 for service of process of summary proceedings for the recovery of real property. The requirements of RPAPL § 735 service are discussed in greater detail later in these materials. It is important to note that the lease itself may contain more stringent service requirements.

However, when serving a rent demand on a rent stabilized or rent controlled tenant, attorneys' fees should not be included. See, e.g., Silber v. Schwartzman, 150 Misc. 2d 1, 575 N.Y.S.2d 226 (App. Term, 1st Dep't 1991) ("in a proceeding such as this brought under RPAPL § 711(2) for nonpayment of rent by the landlord of residential, rent stabilized premises, attorneys' fees may not be considered 'rent' or be awarded as 'additional rent' in order to enable the landlord to obtain a possessory judgment, and a lease clause to that effect is unenforceable"); Crystal World Realty Corp. v. Sze, 2001 WL 1635430 (App. Term, 1st Dep't, Dec. 13, 2001).

[40.31] V. PREDICATE NOTICES IN HOLDOVERS[40.32] A. When No Predicate Notice Required

A landlord does not need to give a predicate notice prior to initiating a holdover proceeding, if and only if, no rent has been accepted beyond the date of expiration of the lease.

[40.33] B. Termination of Month-to-Month Tenancy

A month-to-month tenancy is automatically created when a tenant whose term is longer than one month holds over after the expiration of the term and the landlord accepts rent after the expiration of the term.⁴⁴ Note that this situation exists: (1) where a tenant never had a lease; or (2) where the lease expired and the landlord accepted rent after the expiration of the lease term. A landlord may terminate a month-to-month tenancy by service on the tenant of a written 30-day notice of termination.⁴⁵

In New York City, the 30 days must span the beginning of the month to the end of the month. For example, if on June 14th the landlord wants to terminate the tenancy of a month-to-month tenant whose rent is usually due, and who usually pays, on the 1st of the month, the landlord has to serve the tenant with a 30-day notice prior to July 1, terminating the tenancy effective July 31, and the earliest the holdover can begin is on or after August 1.⁴⁶

Please also note that if the rent is paid on the 15th of the month, then the term runs from the 15th of one month to the 14th of the next, and the 30-day notice of termination in such case would, at a minimum, also need to span the 15th to the 14th.

Watch out for the February Problem—February does not have 30 days, so 30 days from the 1st of February is usually March 3rd, not March 1st. In order to terminate a month-to-month tenancy on February 28, the notice must be served by January 29.

45 RPL § 232-a.

46 Id.; see also Clarke v. Shepard, 188 Misc. 588, 68 N.Y.S.2d 707 (App. Term, 1st Dep't 1947).

The 30-day notice of termination should be clear, definite and unequivocal, and it should set forth the date on which the tenancy will end. The 30-day notice should also advise the tenant that unless the premises are vacated the landlord will commence summary proceedings. However, the notice need not set forth any reason for the termination of tenancy.⁴⁷

A 30-day notice of termination must be served in the same manner as a notice of petition and petition for a summary proceeding. In other words, it must be served in accordance with RPAPL § 735, which governs service of process in summary proceedings.⁴⁸

[40.34] VI. CONDITIONAL LIMITATIONS

One of the landlord's most powerful remedies, a default subject to a conditional limitation pursuant to the lease, permits the landlord to terminate the lease by following certain procedures.

[40.35] A. Types of Defaults Subject to Conditional Limitations in a Lease

[40.36] 1. Non-Rent Defaults Subject to Conditional Limitations

The following are events of default subject to a conditional limitation under the Real Estate Board of New York, Inc.'s Standard Form of Store Lease ("the REBNY Lease"):

If the Tenant defaults in fulfilling any of the covenants of this lease other than the covenants for the payment of rent or additional rent; or if the demised premises becomes vacant or deserted; or if any execution or attachment shall be issued against Tenant or any of Tenant's property whereupon the demised premises shall be taken or occupied by someone other than Tenant; or if the lease be rejected under Section 365 of Title II of the U.S. Code (Bankruptcy Code); or if Tenant shall have failed, after five (5) days written notice, to redeposit with Owner any portion of the security deposit hereunder which Owner has applied to the payment of any rent and additional rent due and payable hereunder; or if Tenant shall be in default with respect to any other lease between Owner and Tenant; or if Tenant shall fail to move into or take possession of the premises within thirty (30) days after the commencement of the term of this lease. . . .

47 RPL § 232-a; see also Park Summit Realty Corp. v. Frank, 107 Misc.2d 318, 434 N.Y.S.2d 73 (App. Term, 1st Dep't 1980) aff'd, 84 A.D.2d 700, 448 N.Y.S.2d 414 (1st Dep't 1981) aff'd, 56 N.Y.2d 1025, 453 N.Y.S.2d 643 (1982); Hughes v. Lenox Hill Hospital, 226 A.D.2d 4, 651 N.Y.S.2d 418 (1st Dep't 1996).

48 RPL § 232-a; see also Texaco v. Weinberg, 13 A.D.2d 1002, 216 N.Y.S.2d 588 (2d Dep't 1961).

Other defaults which may be included in the lease as subject to a conditional limitation are: (a) assigning, mortgaging or encumbering the lease or subletting without the landlord's permission; (b) the filing of a mechanic's lien against the premises which is not discharged within a period of time after notification of the tenant by the landlord; (c) the failure to maintain insurance; and (d) the failure of any other lease obligation that the parties have deemed to be a substantial obligation of the lease.

Here is a sample email from my office to a landlord-client reviewing a lease and looking for possible areas where the commercial tenant might be in default:

We took a good hard look at the lease for TENANT. The lease does not expire until 2015.

Material Lease Breaches

- the tenant mortgages, pledges, hypothecates or otherwise encumbers the lease, by operation of law or otherwise, without the prior consent of the landlord, consent may be withheld for any reason or no reason. (§ 74 of Rider)
- tenant assigns the lease, or any interest in the lease, transfer ownership of the lease (§ 78 of the Rider, § 11 of the Lease)
- tenant sublets the premises (§ 78 of the Rider, § 11 Lease)
- tenant closed for a period of ten or more days not for landlord authorized renovations (§ 17 Lease)
- tenant doesn't maintain the proper insurance We should check this incurable default! (§ 45 lease)

Other Possible Breaches (Less Material)

- tenant fails to make repairs but not most structural repairs (§ 60 rider)

- tenant makes alterations without proper permits or LL written consent; (§ 3 Lease)
- sidewalks, hallways, entrances, vestibules, etc are obstructed or used for unauthorized purpose; (§ 37 lease)
- hand trucks without rubber tires and safeguards make deliveries to tenant; (§ 37 lease)
- sweepings, or other substances or rags left in water and wash closets (they must be doing this, right? (§ 37 lease)
- smoking or cigars in elevators of building? (§ 37 lease)
- no signs can be hung that are visible from outside of premises without the prior written consent of LL; (§ 37 lease)
- tenant marks, paints, or bores into any part of the premises or building without the LL's consent; (§ 37 lease)
- tenant uses other than the freight elevators for freight elevator stuff like merchandise; (§ 37 lease)
- Tenant uses additional locks or bolts or changes original locks and bolts; (§ 37 lease)
- landlord can prohibit tenants advertising if you don't like it by the way; (§ 37 lease)
- if central air, tenant has to keep all windows closed at all times; (§ 37 lease)
- tenant keeps flammable liquid or causes odors or moves machinery or safe in and out of the building without the LL's permission; (§ 37 lease)

[40.37] 2. Nonpayment of Rent as a Conditional Limitation

Although the REBNY Lease specifically excludes such, a lease can provide a mechanism whereby the landlord may terminate the lease, after default in the payment of rent, in the commercial context. Properly drafted, a conditional limitation clause for the nonpayment of rent in a commercial lease will be enforced by the courts and is, perhaps, the landlord's most powerful remedy, nonpayment being the most common default. This is particularly true where the market has quickly improved and the lease-rent has fallen "below market." A properly structured conditional limitation for the non-payment of rent should utilize the language cited approvingly by the court in Grand Liberte Co-op Inc. v. Billhaud,⁴⁹ expressly making the conditional limitation applicable to rent defaults and stating that "it [is] the intention of the parties hereto to create hereby a conditional limitation."⁵⁰

[40.38] B. Notice to Cure

Typically, as in ¶17 of the REBNY Lease, the landlord must first notify the tenant of the default and set forth a time period in which the tenant must cure the default; or, if it is impossible to cure within the time period, it must set forth a time period in which the tenant must begin curing the default. The time period in the current REBNY Lease is 15 days. This notice is commonly referred to as a "notice to cure" or "notice of default."

A notice to cure must "specifically apprise the tenant of the claimed default and of the forfeiture and termination of the lease if the default is not cured."⁵¹ It is a best practice to make notices to cure extremely detailed. That way the tenant and the tenant's representatives know that the landlord really did its homework and is prepared for a fight.

[40.39] C. "Yellowstone" and Tolling Time to Cure Defaults

Giving a notice to cure may force the commercial tenant to initiate a proceeding in Supreme Court commonly referred to as a "Yellowstone," so called after the case of First National Stores v. Yellowstone Shopping Center.⁵² The essence of a Yellowstone proceeding is a declaratory judgment complaint accompanied by a stay application (which is routinely granted, at least in the form of a temporary restraining order, pending a hearing on a preliminary injunction), which seeks a trial on the issue of 49 126 Misc. 2d 961, 487 N.Y.S.2d 250 (App. Term, 1st Dep't 1984).

50 Id. Note, however, that this strategy will not work in a residential context. A conditional limitation regarding the nonpayment of rent in a residential lease has been held to violate public policy as it would provoke a forfeiture, and the law disfavors automatic forfeitures of residential tenancies. Semans Family Ltd. Partnership v. Kennedy, 177 Misc. 2d 345, 675 N.Y.S.2d 489 (Civ. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1998).

51 Filmtrucks, Inc. v. Express Indus. & Term. Corp., 127 A.D.2d 509, 510, 511 N.Y.S.2d 862 (1st Dep't 1987).

whether the tenant is indeed in violation of the lease. This procedure is designed to toll the time the tenant would ordinarily have to cure a lease violation while the court resolves the issue of whether the tenant is indeed in violation and/or has cured the violation. If the court finds the tenant in violation, then by virtue of the stay of the notice to cure, the tenant still has the opportunity to cure the violation before the cure period ends. This process in itself can buy the tenant significant time as the resolution of the proceeding can take months, if not years.

The purpose of a Yellowstone injunction is to maintain the status quo by means of a temporary stay while the tenant challenges the landlord's notice to cure.⁵³ Thus, the Yellowstone injunction tolls the cure period set forth in the landlord's notice of default until there is a judicial determination of the parties' rights.⁵⁴

To demonstrate one's entitlement to a Yellowstone injunction, a tenant must demonstrate that he or she: (1) holds a valuable commercial lease; (2) has received a notice to cure; (3) has requested injunctive relief prior to the termination of the lease; and (4) is prepared and maintains the ability to cure the alleged default by any means short of vacating the premises.⁵⁵ "These standards reflect and reinforce the limited purpose of a Yellowstone injunction: to stop the running of the applicable cure period."⁵⁶

A Yellowstone injunction can provide a modicum of protection to landlords as well as tenants, because they are often conditioned upon the tenant's ongoing payment of rent and/or the posting of a bond to protect the landlord from a wrongfully issued injunction.

53 See, e.g., Jemaltown of 125th Street, Inc. v. Leon Betesh/Park Seen Realty Assocs., 115 A.D.2d 381, 496 N.Y.S.2d 16 (1st Dep't 1985); Fratto v. Red Barn Farmers Market Corp., 144 A.D.2d 635, 535 N.Y.S.2d 53 (2d Dep't 1988).

54 See Finley v. Park Ten Assocs., 83 A.D.2d 537, 441 N.Y.S.2d 475 (1st Dep't 1981); South Ferry Bldg. Co. v. Schroder Bank & Trust Co., 91 A.D.2d 963, 458 N.Y.S.2d 584 (1st Dep't 1983).

55 Garland v. Titan W. Assocs., 147 A.D.2d 304, 543 N.Y.S.2d 56 (1st Dep't 1989).

56 Graubard Mollen Horowitz Pomeranz & Shapiro v. 600 Third Avenue Assocs., 93 N.Y.2d 508, 693 N.Y.S.2d 91 (1999).

The First Department has held that commercial tenants have a right to a virtually automatic issuance of a Yellowstone injunction⁵⁷ and has held that in order to obtain a Yellowstone, rather than requiring the tenant to prove on his application that he can cure the alleged default, a tenant must merely state his desire and ability to cure the default by any means short of vacating the premises.⁵⁸ Furthermore, a tenant is entitled to a Yellowstone injunction when the tenant argues that he is not in violation of the lease, and that if he is, he concedes to cure any such violations.⁵⁹

If the tenant is successful in having the Yellowstone injunction implemented, then the landlord must answer the Supreme Court action and counterclaim for termination of the tenancy. This is an example of a landlord and tenant dispute being litigated in a forum other than civil court.

An invariable condition of a Yellowstone injunction is that the tenant is ordered to pay rent during the pendency of the action.

[40.40] D. Termination Notice

If no Yellowstone proceeding is commenced and the default is not cured or being cured by the date specified in the notice to cure or if the default is not curable (see below), then the landlord may notify the tenant that the lease will be terminated in a certain number of days. In such case, the REBNY Lease allows the lease to be terminated in five days. This notice is commonly referred to as a “notice to terminate.” After the expiration of the termination notice, the landlord may commence a summary holdover proceeding against the tenant to recover possession of the premises.

57 See Herzfeld & Stern v. Ironwood Realty Corp., 102 A.D.2d 737, 738, 477 N.Y.S.2d 7 (1st Dep’t 1984) (“where . . . a tenant denies any default and demonstrates that the landlord has given notice of default, and that a period of time remains within which to cure the tenant is entitled to a grant of preliminary relief. Since the tenant risks forfeiture of its leasehold, and ‘the law does not favor [such] forfeiture’ the tenant need not, as a prerequisite to the granting of a Yellowstone injunction, demonstrate a likelihood of success on the merits. Nor is a tenant required to prove its ability to cure prior to obtaining a Yellowstone injunction. The proper inquiry is whether a basis exists for believing that the tenant desires to cure and has the ability to do so through any means short of vacating the premises.”).

Trump Empire State Partners*, 245 A.D.2d 225, 667 N.Y.S.2d 31 (1st Dep’t 1997) (where a tenant can show that it is able and willing to bring itself into compliance with the lease absent vacating the premises, forfeiture is inappropriate); Garland, 147 A.D.2d at 308.

[40.41] E. Things to Keep in Mind When Terminating a Tenancy Pursuant to a Conditional Limitation[40.42] 1. Service of Notices to Cure and Notices of Termination Given Pursuant to a Lease

Notices to cure and notices to terminate pursuant to the terms of a lease are served on the tenant in accordance with the lease. No statute specifies other methods of service for notices given strictly pursuant to a lease.⁶⁰ If the lease is silent on a method of service, the method used must be “reasonable.”

[40.43] 2. Effect of Acceptance of Rent Post-Termination

If rent is accepted after service of a notice of termination but prior to the proceeding’s first court date, then the termination notice will be vitiated.⁶¹

Therefore, upon serving a notice of termination on a tenant, the lawyer for landlord must send IN WRITING to the client, SPECIFIC instructions about not accepting the rent until further notice because it places the proceeding in danger. It is not good enough to merely tell them orally.

Here is what often happens otherwise: The managing agent forgets OR the rent goes to a lock box and the managing agent forgets to return it, and then when the proceeding is thereby rendered defective the Managing Agent says, “_____ (YOUR NAME HERE) NEVER told me!”

Tenant’s attorneys should encourage tenant to send the rent in a timely and usual fashion, so perhaps landlord will make this mistake.

[40.45] G. Non-Curable Defaults

There are lease defaults of such a nature that curing the default is not possible. In such case, a necessary element for Yellowstone relief—that the tenant is prepared and maintains the ability to cure the alleged default by any means short of vacating the premises—is not present.

Therefore, in this section, we consider ways to terminate a commercial lease and avoid Yellowstone litigation by foregoing a cure period and going straight to lease termination on a non-curable default.

[40.46] 1. Insurance Defaults

Insurance defaults are not curable. Insurance is highly material and the tenant must have insurance in place during the times and in the amounts requisite in the lease, or else a lease can be terminated. The landlord deserves the benefit of their insurance bargain.⁶²

It has been held that even if the tenant wants to cure an insurance default, to do so is simply impossible. Tenant cannot cure by procuring, during the cure period, insurance coverage prospectively, as such policy will not protect landlord against the unknown universe of any claims arising during the period of no insurance coverage.⁶³

The landlord has no obligation to get the insurance for tenant and charge it back as additional rent. Furthermore, the sub-tenant's insurance does not satisfy the tenant's obligation.⁶⁴ Moreover, certificates of insurance, which were issued as a matter of information only, are insufficient to establish that it maintained the requisite insurance or was capable of curing its default.⁶⁵

62 Kel Kim Corp. v. Central Mkts., 70 N.Y.2d 900, 524 N.Y.S.2d 384 (1987); C & N Camera & Electronics, Inc. v. Farmore Realty, Inc., 178 A.D.2d 310, 577 N.Y.S.2d 613 (1st Dep't 1991). But see Khatari v. Shami, 35 Misc. 3d 1211(A), 950 N.Y.S.2d 723 (Sup. Ct., Kings Co. 2012) (waiver of the insurance default based on an earlier case between the parties).

63 Kyung Sik Kim v. Idylwood, N.Y., LLC, 66 A.D.3d 528, 529, 886 N.Y.S.2d 337 (1st Dep't 2009).

64 166 Enterprises Corp. v. I G Second Generation Partners, L.P., 81 A.D.3d 154, 917 N.Y.S.2d 143 (1st Dep't 2011).

[40.47] 2. Other Incurable Defaults

Courts have found other incurable lease defaults and therefore denied Yellowstone relief. Some examples are provided here:

- Tenant failed to maintain records required by the lease for the contractually mandated time period, with respect to a percentage payment requirement. This clause in the lease was an integral part of a lease agreement and plaintiff's breach of that provision was material. Tenant failed to establish that it was prepared and able to cure the defaults alleged in defendant's notice to cure by any means short of vacating the premises.⁶⁶
- Unauthorized assignment. Tenant represented that its principal owned 90 percent of tenant's stock. Tenant assigned, without prior written consent, "twenty-five (25%) percent of the issued and outstanding capital stock of tenant without principal continuing to retain and exercise operational control of tenant." Landlord asserted that principal, who had been in control of tenant, was central to the parties' lease.⁶⁷

[40.48] 3. Defaults the Tenant Refuses To Cure

To procure a Yellowstone injunction, a commercial tenant must demonstrate, inter alia, that it has the desire and ability to cure the alleged default by any means short of vacating the premises.⁶⁸

[40.49] VII. NOTICE OF PETITION AND PETITION[40.50] A. Elements of a Petition

There are many samples that can be followed to be sure you include all the necessary elements in a petition (i.e., Blumberg and McKinney's 66 Grenadeir Parking Corp. v. Landmark Assoc., 294 A.D.2d 313, 313–14, 743 N.Y.S.2d 95 (1st Dep't 2002).

68 Linmont Realty, Inc. v. Vitocarl, Inc., 147 A.D.2d 618 (2d Dep't 1989) ("To procure a Yellowstone injunction, a commercial tenant must demonstrate, inter alia, that it has the desire and ability to cure the alleged default by any means short of vacating the premises. The plaintiff herein has made no offer to cure any of the charged defaults, alleging instead that many of the alleged defaults listed in the Notice of Termination of Lease were not its responsibility, that various conditions did not exist as claimed by the defendants, and that the remainder of the defaults had been waived by the defendants acceptance of rent with knowledge of their existence." [(internal quotation marks and citation omitted)]).

forms). Therefore, we will not spend a lot of time on the obvious elements of a petition, other than to provide the checklist below of items to be included.

Items To Be Included In A Petition:

- Statement of Petitioner’s Interest
- Statement of Respondent’s Interest
- Description of Premises
- Facts upon which proceeding is based/Statements as to service of predicate notices
- Multiple Dwelling Registration
- Rent Regulatory Status
- Relief Sought

[40.51] B. Who to Name As a Respondent in the Petition

A very important and often overlooked aspect of drafting a petition is who to name as a respondent.

[40.52] 1. Subtenants

Subtenants—both authorized and unauthorized—should typically be named. In order to obtain complete relief (i.e., possession), any person or entity that claims an interest in the premises must be named. You can sail through an entire summary proceeding against tenant X (“X”) and be successful every step of the way, but on eviction day the marshal can show up to evict tenant X and finds subtenant Y (“Y”) in possession of the space. If the judgment and the warrant were not for Y, then Y does not get evicted. Moreover, Y can turn around and let X back in! Note, however, that a subtenant is not a legally necessary party.⁶⁹ The litigation can go forward without a subtenant, but in order to gain complete relief for your landlord-client, you must get a warrant against the subtenant.

[40.53] 2. Unidentified People or Business Entities Occupying the Premises

If there is, or you suspect there might be, an unidentified person or business using the premises, other than a member of the tenant's family, then you should: (a) name them using a fictitious name; and (b) try to figure out who they are and attempt to use their real name or amend the petition later. Examples of this are "John/Jane Does #1–#3 (if you suspect three unauthorized occupants because the super has seen three unidentified people coming and going recently) or "XYZ Corp."⁷⁰ After commencing litigation, once the unidentified occupants have been identified, you can move, either at trial or before the trial, to substitute the actual persons' and/or entities' names for the fictitious names.

[40.54] 3. Do Not Name Guarantors to the Lease

Do not name guarantors to the lease. Guarantors need to be sued separately in a plenary action.

It is a strategic best practice, however, to mail a copy of the predicate notices and notice of petition and petition to the guarantors by mail. The sooner a guarantor is aware of a default, the more likely they are to step in and remedy the situation.

[40.55] VIII. SERVICE OF PROCESS

As discussed in § 40.94, Strategy and Gamesmanship, infra, service of process is often the only real defense that a tenant may present, and is frequently raised as a defense in commercial landlord and tenant proceedings. This section examines how to get service of process correct, if you represent a landlord, and how to question service if you represent a tenant.

70 See CPLR 1024 ("A party who is ignorant, in whole or in part, of the name or identity of a person who may properly be made a party, may proceed against such person as an unknown party by designating so much of his name and identity as is known. If the name or remainder of the name becomes known all subsequent proceedings shall be taken under the true name and all prior proceedings shall be deemed amended accordingly.").

[40.56] A. Process Service—In General

A court cannot make a decision that applies to a person or company unless it has personal jurisdiction over that person or company. Personal jurisdiction is a courts' power to bring a person or company into its adjudicative process. One of the things that a person who wants to sue a person or company must do to cause the court to have personal jurisdiction over a person or company is serve the person or company with process.

“Process” is a legal document that directs an appearance or response to a legal action or proceeding. Process includes such documents as a notice of petition and petition, a summons and complaint, a rent demand, a 30-day notice of termination, or a subpoena.

A process server is one who “serves” process. With certain exceptions, a person must be licensed by the New York City Department of Consumer Affairs to serve process. One exception is that one who serves process less than five times in one year is exempt from needing a license.

RPAPL § 735 is the section that covers the service of rent demands, notices of petition and petitions. Lease provisions cannot alter or modify the § 735 service requirements. Service of process for non-landlord and tenant matters is governed by CPLR Article 3. Note that RPAPL § 735 service is somewhat different than regular CPLR service.

RPAPL § 735 states:

§ 735. Manner of service; filing; when service complete

1. Service of the notice of petition and petition shall be made by personally delivering them to the respondent; or by delivering to and leaving personally with a person of suitable age and discretion who resides or is employed at the property sought to be recovered, a copy of the notice of petition and petition, if upon reasonable application admittance can be obtained and such person found who will receive it; or if admittance cannot be obtained and such person found, by affixing a copy of the notice and petition upon a conspicuous part of the property sought to be recovered or placing a copy under the entrance door of such premises; and in addition, within one day after such delivering to such suitable person or such affixing or placement, by mailing to the respondent both by registered or certified mail and by regular first class mail,

- (a) if a natural person, as follows: at the property sought to be recovered, and if such property is not the place of residence of such person and if the petitioner shall have written information of the residence address of such person, at the last residence address as to which the petitioner has such information, or if the petitioner shall have no such information, but shall have written information of the place of business or employment of such person, to the last business or employment address as to which the petitioner has such information; and
 - (b) if a corporation, joint-stock or other unincorporated association, as follows: at the property sought to be recovered, and if the principal office or principal place of business of such corporation, joint stock or other unincorporated association is not located on the property sought to be recovered, and if the petitioner shall have written information of the principal office or principal place of business within the state, at the last place as to which petitioner has such information, or if the petitioner shall have no such information but shall have written information of any office or place of business within the state, to any such place as to which the petitioner has such information. Allegations as to such information as may affect the mailing address shall be set forth either in the petition, or in a separate affidavit and filed as part of the proof of service.
2. The notice of petition, or order to show cause, and petition together with proof of service thereof shall be filed with the court or clerk thereof within three days after;
 - (a) personal delivery to respondent, when service has been made by that means, and such service shall be complete immediately upon such personal delivery; or
 - (b) mailing to respondent, when service is made by the alternatives above provided, and such service shall be complete upon the filing of proof of service.

[40.57] B. Five Elements of Process Serving

There are FIVE elements to serving process:

1. Delivery of the papers
2. GPS-ing the service
3. Mailing the papers

4. Filing proof of service with the court
5. Completing and maintaining the process server log book

[40.58] 1. Delivery of the Papers

[40.59] a. Delivery Options Set Forth in RPAPL § 735

- Personal Service on an Individual. Personal delivery to respondent who is an individual.
- Personal Service on a Corporation. Personal service on a corporation must be made on an officer, director, managing or general agent, cashier or other person authorized to accept service on behalf of the corporation, in compliance with CPLR 311(a)(1). RPAPL does not permit service on a corporation via the secretary of state.
- Substituted Service (“Suitable Age and Discretion”). If respondent is not able to be personally served, a copy of the papers may be left with a person of suitable age and discretion who resides or is employed at the premises sought to be recovered. Substituted service must be made at the premises sought to be recovered.
- Conspicuous Place Service (“Nail and Mail”). Only after reasonable application to serve respondent(s) by personal or substituted service fail, a copy of the notice and petition may be “affixed” to the door or a conspicuous place on the premises. There is a plethora of law on this topic. The following is a good rule to follow: Unless the landlord has specific information about when the tenant is likely to be found in the premises (in which case, that is the time to attempt service), in commercial evictions, reasonable application means the process server makes at least two attempts to find the tenant at the premises, during two different times of day (or night) which encompass tenant’s regular business hours. For example, go to an office during regular business hours; go to a nightclub during the evening.

[40.60] b. An Important Note on Delivery Options

There are three types of delivery: (1) personal, (2) suitable age and discretion, and (3) conspicuous place. Numbers 1 & 2 are EQUALS. Number 3 is inferior in that you may NOT use #3 unless you have tried for either #1 or #2. But here’s the thing that people get a little confused about:

you do NOT have to attempt #1 before resorting to #2. They are equal. Suitable age and discretion service is as good as personal service.

Therefore, the author's policy is to SKIP personal service and go straight for suitable age and discretion. Why? Because personal is harder to get than suitable age and discretion. If it's a corporation, then personal service on a corporation requires reference to another statute. And that statute requires you to find an officer or director or person authorized to accept service. It is burdensome to have a traverse over whether someone was an officer or was authorized.

Under suitable age and discretion all a process server needs to find is a person of suitable age and discretion. It has nothing to do with "officer, director, authorized, etc." And it is just as good in the first instance as personal service.

BUT contrast this advice with the following. If a service is made on a tenant in a manner other than by personal service and the tenant never appears in the proceeding, then the landlord may get a possessory judgment against the tenant but not a money judgment.⁷¹ This is worth keeping in mind because occasionally a landlord is quite certain that a tenant will default. But note that at least a few judges have recently questioned this rule,⁷² and some judges will give you a money judgment on default.

[40.61] 2. GPS

[40.62] a. GPS Rule

As of November 11, 2011, all process servers licensed in New York City must carry a device (such as a telephone or digital assistant) that utilizes a global positioning system (GPS) technology or Assisted-Global Positioning System (A-GPS) technology and that utilizes the software necessary to establish electronically a record of the time, date, and location of a service or an attempted service. See Subchapter W of Chapter 2 of Title 6 of the Rules of the City of New York § 2-233b ("§ 2-233b").

71 In re McDonald, 225 A.D. 403, 233 N.Y.S. 368 (4th Dep't 1929); Ressa Family, LLC v. Dorfman, 193 Misc. 2d 315, 749 N.Y.S.2d 387 (Dist. Ct., Nassau Co. 2002); Arnold v. Lyons, 2003 WL 2004246 (Dist. Ct., Nassau Co. Mar. 31, 2003).

72 Dolan v. Linnen, 195 Misc. 2d 298, 753 N.Y.S.2d 682 (N.Y.C. Civ. Ct., Richmond Co. 2003); Guevera v. Cueva, 5 Misc. 3d 1024(A), 799 N.Y.S.2d 160 (Dist. Ct. 2004); Laskey v. Tillotson, 16 Misc. 3d 1124(A), 847 N.Y.S.2d 902 (Lockport City Ct. 2007); Avgush v. Berrahu, 17 Misc. 3d 85, 847 N.Y.S.2d 343 (App. Term, 9th & 10th Jud. Dists. 2007); Avgush v. Pascale, 25 Misc. 3d 139(A), 906 N.Y.S.2d 770 (9th and 10th Dist. 2009); Expressway Village v. Denman, 26 Misc. 3d 954, 893 N.Y.S.2d 736 (Cnty. Ct., Niagara Co. 2009).

Section 2-233b states, in pertinent part, as follows:

(a) General Requirements. A process server licensed pursuant to this subchapter must comply with the requirement of section 20-410 of the Code to carry at all times during the commission of his or her licensed activities, and operate at the time process is served or attempted, a device to establish electronically and record the time, date, and location of service or attempted service as follows:

(1) Equipment.

(i) The process server must obtain a mobile device, such as a telephone or personal digital assistant, that utilizes the software necessary to make an electronic record of the location where, and the time and date when, the record is made as determined by Global Positioning System (GPS) technology or Assisted-Global Positioning System (A-GPS) technology, and labels the record with the network date and time maintained by the mobile device, the DCA license number of the process server, . . . the name of the plaintiff or petitioner, the name of the defendant or respondent, the docket number (if any), the name of the person to whom process is delivered and a unique file identifier of the process being served.

(ii) The mobile device must be equipped with the software necessary to make an electronic record of the location where and time and date when the record is made, as determined by triangulated cell tower signals, in the event that at the time of the effected or attempted service of process a GPS signal is not available.

(iii) The mobile device software must automatically add that location, time and date information to the electronic record as soon as a GPS or cellular signal reaches the device if neither a GPS nor a cellular signal is present at the time the process server causes the electronic record to be made.

(2) Operation of Equipment.

(i) On every occasion that a process server attempts or effects service of process, the process server must ensure that the mobile device makes an electronic record of the GPS location, time and date of the attempted or effected service immediately after attempting or effecting service. In the event that no GPS signal is available at the time of attempted or effected service of process, the location, time and date will be determined by triangulated cell tower signals.

[40.63] b. Picture Still Worth 1000 Words

Do not get too excited over GPS. There ARE opportunities to dispute if visits happened, even in the age of GPS. Your GPS readings could say that you are at, for example, 1 Maple Street. That is great. But:

- Did the process server go INSIDE 1 Maple Street? Or just sit out front in his or her car drinking coffee?
- If the process server entered the building, did he or she go to the premises door, or simply hang out in the lobby reading the paper?
- If process server went to the premises door, did he or she knock loudly and remain there for a period of time—or did he or she just tape the papers to the door with no knock?

The authors defeated a landlord on a traverse (kind of, landlord discontinued the case when we raised these objections) because the server went to the door, but did not knock. Rather, the server just taped the papers to the door. How do we know? Because our tenant-client was inside and heard some scratching at her door. She opened it to find the process server (who admitted to her he did not knock) taping the papers. Now in that case, the GPS would read that the server was there. But that doesn't mean the server did what he was supposed to do to effectuate good service on the delivery of the papers.

[40.64] 3. Mailing Requirement

Within one day of delivery, a copy of the papers must be mailed to respondent. The attorney should tell the process server where and how to mail the papers. I do not like to leave my process servers any discretion about the mail and thus send them a “mailing list” pulled from my Lease Abstract (see above). Here is an example on the following page.

[40.65] 4. Filing the Petition and Filing Proof of Service for Petition[40.66] a. Commencing the Proceeding and Filing the Petition

Once the notice of petition and petition are prepared, but before they are served on the respondents, they are brought to court, where the index number is purchased and the clerk stamps the original notice of petition indicating it was issued by the court, and then returns it to you. Bring the original notice of petition back to the office.

The index number is then written on all copies of the notice of petition and petition, and the notice of petition and petition are served as one document. Now, you may serve the notice of petition and petition.

[40.67] b. Filing Proof of Service of Petition

Once service is complete, affidavits of service are affixed to the original notice of petition and filed with the court. The notice of petition with proof of service must be filed within three days of completing service. Service is officially complete upon filing proof of service. It is good practice to obtain a copy of the stamped notice of petition.

[40.68] 5. Log Book[40.69] a. Log Book In General

The process server must maintain a “log book.” This is a very specific kind of log book. This log book will be a vital record in any court proceeding in which the process server is called to testify.

Pursuant to General Business Law § 89-cc(1):

Each process server shall maintain a legible record of all service made by him as prescribed in this section. Such records shall be kept in chronological order in a bound, paginated volume. Corrections in records shall be made only by drawing a straight line through the inaccurate entry and clearly printing the accurate information directly above the inaccurate entry. All other methods of correction, including but not limited to erasing, opaquing, obliterating or redacting, are prohibited (emphasis added).

[40.70] b. What Must Go Into Log Book

The record to be maintained shall include the following information, where applicable:

- The title of the action or a reasonable abbreviation thereof;
- The name of the person served, if known;
- The date and approximate time service was effected;
- The address where service was effected;
- The nature of the papers served;
- The court in which the action has been commenced;
- The index number of the action, if known;
- If service is effectuated pursuant to subdivision four of section three hundred eight of the CPLR or subdivision one of section seven hundred thirty-five of the RPAPL, a description of the color of the door to which the summons is affixed;
- The process serving agency from whom the process served was received, if any;
- Type of service effected whether personal, substituted or conspicuous;
- If service is effected pursuant to subdivision one, two or three of section three hundred eight of the CPLR, the record shall also include the description of the person served, including, but not limited to, sex, color of skin, hair color, approximate age, height and weight, and other identifying features;
- If service is effected pursuant to subdivision four of section three hundred eight of the CPLR, the record shall also include the dates, addresses and time of attempted service pursuant to subdivision one, two or three of such section;
- If the process server files an affidavit of service with the court, his record shall include the date of such filing; and

- According to the Rules of the City of New York, Title 6 (Department of Consumer Affairs), Chapter 2 (Licenses), Subchapter W (Process Servers), § 2-233(b)(4): If service is effectuated pursuant to RPAPL § 735(1), a description of the area adjacent to the door to which the process is affixed including (a) the color and composition of the hallway walls, (b) the color and composition of the hallway floor or doorstep, and (c) the location of the premises in relation to the stairs, elevator or entranceway.

[40.71] c. Number of Log Book Entries

There should be one log book entry per person served per service OR attempt.

[40.72] d. Sample Log Book Pages

Next, the authors insert three sample Log Book pages (from our custom-made Log Book) so you can see exactly what we are talking about.

[40.73] IX. MOTION PRACTICE IN LANDLORD AND TENANT COURT

The Landlord and Tenant Parts of the Civil Court . . . are courts. The worst thing you can do is assume that motion practice should not be conducted with the utmost of professionalism and attention to detail just because “it’s only L&T Court.”

[40.74] A. Motion Practice in Summary Proceedings

Look in the following places for guidance when you are preparing to bring a motion, either on regular notice or in an expedited fashion by order to show cause.

[40.75] 1. CPLR Article 4

Article 4 of the CPLR governs Special Proceedings. CPLR 404 (Objections in point of law) states:

(a) By respondent. The respondent may raise an objection in point of law by setting it forth in his answer or by a motion to dismiss the petition, made upon notice within the time allowed for answer. If the motion is denied, the court may permit the respondent to answer, upon such terms as may be just; and unless the order specifies otherwise, such answer shall be served and filed within five days after service of the order with notice of entry; and the petitioner may re-notice the matter for hearing upon two days’ notice, or the respondent may re-notice the matter for hearing upon service of the answer upon seven days’ notice.

(b) By petitioner. The petitioner may raise an objection in point of law to new matter contained in the answer by setting it forth in his reply or by moving to strike such matter on the day the petition is noticed or re-noticed to be heard.

Thus, a pre-answer motion to dismiss (by Respondent) is allowed and a post-answer motion to strike affirmative defenses (by Petitioner) is allowed. These motions are staples in Landlord and Tenant Law.

CPLR 406 (Motions) states:

Motions in a special proceeding, made before the time at which the petition is noticed to be heard, shall be noticed to be heard at that time.

Thus, we see that the time periods for noticing a motion that we are used to in CPLR Article 22 are shortened.

[40.76] 2. Siegels on New York Practice

The authors love Siegels as an early place to look for guidance, after the statute, of course. It is not really so prolific on Summary Proceedings, but there is some good stuff in there on the higher art of things like impleader in summary proceedings at Chapter 20, Part III.

[40.77] 3. The Uniform Rules

The Uniform Civil Rules for the New York City Civil Court, Section 208.11 covers motion practice in Civil Court. Section 208.43 covers the Housing Part. These are worth reading.

[40.78] 4. The Judge's Rules

Judges have the option of making individual rules. Some judges make their own rules and some don't. The purpose of the Judge's rules is to make his or her life easier, so don't make his or her life harder by ignoring them.⁷³

Here are some examples of different rules posted by different Housing Court judges as of this writing, as examples of what you might find:

- Oral argument is required on all motions.
- All motions must be argued and may not be submitted on consent without first being heard by the judge. Parties should be prepared to resolve issues by stipulation if possible, particularly in discovery motions, and be prepared to argue the motion when all papers are before the court.
- All motions, including orders to show cause, should be made returnable at 9:30 a.m.

73 The Housing Part Judge's rules can be found online at: <https://www.nycourts.gov/courts/nyc/housing/profiles.shtml>.

[40.79] 5. The Law of the Case

To the extent that there is a conflict between the sources mentioned above, keep in mind that the more localized the source, the more authority it carries. For example, the parties may agree to a briefing schedule for motion practice, and such stipulation may be so-ordered by the judge. That order then governs the deadlines in the motion practice with more authority than the general rules of the judge the case is before.

[40.80] 6. If All Else Fails, Call the Clerk With an Intelligent Question

If you still are not sure what to do in a particular situation, call the judge's clerk. The judge's clerks will often be helpful if they are posed with a short and intelligent question about how to proceed before their judge.

[40.81] B. Use Memos of Law; Make Attorney Affirmations and Client Affidavits Very Short

There is a practice in Landlord and Tenant court of making motions without supporting memorandums of law. Rather, legal authority is included in attorney affirmations. This may be a ubiquitous practice, but it is a bad and sloppy one.

Attorney affirmations should be kept very, very short. They should only contain that which only the attorney can speak to, such as a concise procedural history of the case. For that matter, client affidavits should be kept short, and should contain only the facts within the exclusive personal knowledge of the deponent. Legal authority and arguments should be included in memoranda of law.

[40.82] C. Motion Practice Timing and Strategy

Frequently, motion practice is used as a vehicle for further tenant delay. The pre-answer motion to dismiss is a very effective tool for the tenant. It requires that the tenant find some arguable defect in the notice of petition, petition, the predicate notice, and/or the service thereof. Counsel should carefully interview the tenant regarding the circumstances of service of process and carefully review the rent demand or predicate notice and notice of petition and petition, searching for at least a few arguable defects. Failure by the tenant to include an objection to service of process

when making a pre-answer motion constitutes waiver of the claim of improper service.⁷⁴

Under the special proceeding rules that apply to a landlord-tenant proceeding, a pre-answer motion can be served as late as the return date of the petition or any adjourn date thereafter.⁷⁵ Serving a motion on the return date, or the day prior, makes it virtually impossible for the landlord to respond, thereby buying the tenant an automatic adjournment. Moreover, once the landlord does oppose the motion to dismiss, if the landlord delivers the papers too late for the tenant to respond before the next court date, the tenant can legitimately ask for another adjournment for the purpose of putting in reply papers. Therefore, if a landlord is sabotaged with a motion to dismiss served on the eleventh hour before a court date, at the court date landlord's counsel should be sure to get all parties to agree to a briefing schedule that leads up to the adjournment date so that tenant cannot ask for further adjournments.

Once the motion is fully briefed, the parties are ready to argue the motion. When the parties arrive in court to argue the motion, the judge may not be ready. There may be too many motions for the judge to hear at the appointed time, there may be a trial in progress, or the judge may simply have plans that do not include hearing you argue your motion. Usually, the judge will hear the motion even if the parties have to return to court to argue the motion after the lunch recess, or the judge may take the motion papers on submission and make a decision without oral argument. Frequently, after hearing arguments, the judge will "reserve" his or her decision and take up to and in excess of weeks or months to decide the motion. Depending on the Part and/or the Judge, motions can be sub judice for a number of months. All the while, the tenant is doing business and the landlord is not collecting rent. There may be too many motions for the judge to hear at the appointed time, there may be a trial in progress, or the judge may simply have plans that do not include hearing you argue your motion.

74 See CPLR 3211(11)(c).

[40.83] X. FREQUENTLY LITIGATED ISSUES IN COMMERCIAL LANDLORD AND TENANT LAW

[40.84] A. Actual Eviction and Constructive Eviction

Actual eviction occurs where there is a physical ouster of the tenant from the premises, whether it be in the form of physically barring the tenant from the premises, changing the locks, or depriving the tenant of essential elevator service.⁷⁶

In the case of actual eviction, even where the tenant is only partially evicted, liability for all rent can often be suspended, although the tenant remains in possession of the portion of the premises from which he is not evicted.⁷⁷

Constructive eviction, in contrast, results from a diminution in beneficial services to the premises, such as water leakage, inadequate heat or ventilation, etc., resulting in the tenant's abandonment of the premises.⁷⁸

To establish a constructive eviction, the tenant must abandon the premises or at least that portion of the premises affected by the condition and must notify the landlord of such abandonment. In a constructive eviction case, the issue at trial is usually whether it was reasonable for the tenant to abandon the premises (in whole or in part) based upon the existing condition. Minor or irritating conditions normally do not give rise to a rent abatement because a tenant's obligation to pay rent is independent of the landlord's obligation to maintain the building. Thus, a tenant who argues constructive eviction without abandoning the premises or who fails to prove that the conditions warranted abandonment is entitled to neither damages nor an abatement of rent.⁷⁹

Although see Eastside Exhibition Corp. v. 210 E. 86th Street Corp., 23 A.D.3d 100, 801 N.Y.S.2d 568 (1st Dep’t 2005), where partial, rather than total, abatement of rent was appropriate remedy for landlord’s unauthorized actual partial eviction of commercial tenant, due to landlord’s installation of steel cross-bracing on premises that deprived tenant of use of approximately 12 square feet of space out of stipulated total of between 15,000 and 19,000 square feet. The First Dep’t held: “In light of current landlord/tenant realities and policies, it appears particularly untoward automatically to apply harsh and oppressive strictures derived from feudal law that mirror the policies and concerns of that earlier society. Instead, we conclude that a more realistic remedy than total rent abatement should be imposed for a partial eviction of the minimal proportions here present.”

If only a portion of the premises is rendered uninhabitable, a partial constructive eviction occurs, thereby entitling the tenant to a rent abatement for the value of that portion of the premises which is abandoned.⁸⁰

Standard form leases typically include clauses tracking the applicable law and barring offsets of rent for claims of constructive eviction.⁸¹

Since a claim of actual eviction can result in a suspension of the entire obligation to pay rent and entitles the tenant to remain in possession of the premises, tenants often plead both actual and constructive eviction in defense of eviction. From the landlord's perspective, it is critically important to distinguish an actual eviction from a constructive eviction because of the extreme consequences that attach to an actual eviction.

[40.85] B. Refusal to Sublet

In the commercial context, restrictions against assignment and subletting are valid, although they are not looked upon with favor. "It is settled that, unless the lease provides that the lessor's consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, a provision against subleasing without the lessor's consent permits the lessor to refuse arbitrarily for any reason or no reason."⁸²

Little Luxuries*, 99 A.D.2d 734, 472 N.Y.S.2d 359 (1st Dep't 1984) (landlord's breach of duty does not suspend tenant's "independent obligation" to pay rent); see also 186-90 Joralemon Assocs. v. Dianzon, 161 A.D.2d 329, 555 N.Y.S.2d 94 (1st Dep't 1990) (dismissing defense of constructive eviction where tenant did not abandon premises and continued to use them for intended purpose); Bomze v. Corp., 169 A.D.2d 509, 564 N.Y.S.2d 729 (1st Dep't 1991) (tenant liable for unpaid rent, notwithstanding ongoing dispute concerning utility service and hookups, given lease provision requiring payment of rent "without any setoff or deduction whatsoever").

82 Dress Shirt Sales, Inc. v. Hotel Martinique Assocs., 12 N.Y.2d 339, 342, 239 N.Y.S.2d 660 (1963); Gladlitz, Inc. v. Castiron Court Corp., 177 Misc. 2d 392, 677 N.Y.S.2d 662 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1998) (stating, "an absolute restriction on assignment without the landlord's consent is clearly enforceable").

Typically, commercial leases provide for assignment and subletting, provided that: (1) the tenant obtains the landlord's prior written consent; (2) the assignee and/or sublessee meet adequate (and reasonable) financial criteria; (3) any sublease is subject to the same terms of the paramount lease; and (4) the tenant remains liable for the obligations under the lease. If the above criteria are met, commercial leases typically provide that the landlord will not "unreasonably withhold consent."

In the context of summary proceedings, a landlord's alleged breach of covenant by unreasonably withholding its consent to a sublease or assignment does not justify an abandonment of the premises on the part of the tenant and does not exonerate a refusal or failure to pay rent.⁸³ A tenant's remedy in such a situation is an action for a declaratory judgment action to compel consent, and/or for damages, and/or, if the lease permits, the interposition of a counterclaim in the landlord's action for rent.⁸⁴ Some leases will preclude damages and specifically limit tenant to a declaratory judgment action.

Again, various clauses in the Standard Form Lease arguably bar—as an offset and/or defense to rent—a tenant claim based upon an alleged unreasonable refusal to assign or sublet.⁸⁵

[40.86] C. No-Counterclaims Provision

Counterclaims interposed by a commercial tenant in a summary proceeding, alleging the breach of various covenants by a landlord (including unreasonable refusal to sublet, etc.), have been held to be barred by a "no counterclaim" provision in a lease.⁸⁶ However, the no-counterclaims provision will not apply if the tenant shows that the counterclaims are "inextricably intertwined" with landlord's claim for rent or possession.⁸⁷

Where the tenant's counterclaim is barred, tenant's sole remedy is to commence a separate action for damages for breach of contract.⁸⁸

[40.87] D. Surrender

A surrender is the giving up by a tenant of his lease term to his landlord; upon acceptance of the surrender, the term merges with the reversion and the relationship of the landlord and tenant is terminated. A tenant is thereby discharged from any further liability under the lease.⁸⁹ Thus, assuming there is a valid surrender of the lease by the tenant, and an acceptance by the landlord, all liability for rent will cease.

Landlords should be advised, therefore, that acceptance of a surrender of a lease, even orally, will terminate all future liability for rent unless the parties otherwise agree (preferably in writing).⁹⁰

The standard form lease typically includes a clause that any surrender be in writing, and that any surrender of keys be to the owner and/or landlord, not to his or her employee or agent.⁹¹

[40.88] E. Alleged Oral Agreements

Tenants often allege as a defense to eviction a purported "oral agreement" with the landlord concerning some provision of the lease, whether it be a reduction of rent, surrender, lease extension, etc.

To guard against the effectiveness of any such an argument, standard form leases typically contain a merger/no oral modification clause in the lease.⁹² The inclusion by the parties of an integration/merger clause in a lease precludes the introduction of any parol evidence.⁹³

Courts interpreting such merger clauses in conjunction with the Statute of Frauds have held that attempts at oral modifications of leases are unenforceable.⁹⁴

[40.89] F. No-Waiver Claims

Tenants often allege, in defense of eviction, that the landlord, by its conduct, has waived strict adherence with the lease terms, whether it be the timing of rent payment, a violation of the use clause of the lease, etc. The standard form lease includes a “no-waiver” clause to guard against such claims.⁹⁵

Generally, New York courts have held that “no-waiver” clauses in a lease should be enforced to preclude a finding of waiver, including in cases where the tenant alleges a waiver by conduct.⁹⁶

Only in the extreme case where there has been detrimental reliance by the tenant in a well-established course of conduct with the landlord, will courts hold that the “No-Waiver” clause has, in effect, been waived by the landlord.⁹⁷

[40.90] G. Use of Premises

Consider the case where a lease for a small, commercial building on a quaint, quiet, residential Upper East Side street stated that the “tenant shall use the premises as a counseling office and for no other purpose” (emphasis added). The drafter was orally informed that the tenant was a marriage counselor. Then the tenant moved in and, indeed, opened a counseling office—a psychic counseling office and sexual-surrogate-marriage counseling office. Other tenants of the building, residents of the street, and the block association complained to the landlord regarding signs posted by the tenant and the high volume of traffic generated.

Courts have upheld language in a lease that restricts the use of the premises that contain the key words “only” and “for no other purpose.”⁹⁸ In Qwakazi, the court held that a tenant was in default for selling video cassettes from the premises where a clause in the lease stated that “the tenant shall use and occupy the demised premises for the sale of comic books, toys, posters, books solely” and a rider to the lease stated that if the premises were used by the tenant for any other purpose that such use “shall be deemed a default . . . and as such, a material inducement for the landlord to terminate this lease.”⁹⁹

[40.91] H. Notice Was Not Issued By the Landlord With Whom Tenant Entered the Lease

Tenant may claim that the predicate notice is defective because the notice was not issued by the landlord originally on the lease.

and is entitled to collect the rent demanded in the notice to cure.¹⁰⁰ Examples of tenant's express acknowledgment and course of contact include:

- Tenant has previously and expressly recognized petitioner as the successor-in-interest to the landlord in the lease in a subsequent lease amendment.
- Tenant executed an estoppel letter.
- Tenant has paid rent checks to petitioner.

[40.92] I. Viability of Cross-Default Provisions

Cross-default provisions allow a party to terminate a contract based on a default by another party to the contract, where the default is made pursuant to a totally different contract made between the same parties.¹⁰¹ There are First Department cases in which cross default provisions in a lease are enforced; however, in both of those cases the companion contract was not another lease or license, as is the case here, but was a mortgage or a sale contract.¹⁰² Given the dearth of case law on the matter, the finer points of enforceability are unpredictable.

[40.93] J. Signage of Sidewalk Sheds

New York City has changed its regulations on the appearance of sidewalk sheds. Under most circumstances, storefront tenants underneath the shed may not affix a sign to the shed. This upsets the principals of many storefront tenants and can lead to legal disputes.

1 RCNY § 27-03, Signs on any Sidewalk Shed, Fence, Railing, Foot-bridge, Catch Platform, Builder's Sidewalk Shanty, and Over-the-Sidewalk Chute Erected at Demolition or Construction Sites, states:

(a) Applicability. These rules and regulations shall apply to all protective structures erected at demolition or construction sites, including but not limited to, sidewalk sheds, fences, railings, footbridges, catch platforms, builders sidewalk shanties, and over-the-sidewalk chutes as specified in Administrative Code § 26-252(a).

(b) Other than the signs required by 1 RCNY §§ 8-01 and 26-01 or as set forth below, there shall be no information, pictorial representations, or any business or advertising messages posted on such protective structures at demolition or construction sites.

(d) Signs. A sign may be posted on such protective structure when the structure is adjacent to any building and obscures from view a lawful and existing sign and shall comply with the following requirements:

Signs shall be securely fastened to the face of the protective structure at a location directly in front of such business storefront;

No projecting signs shall be permitted and all signs shall be limited to a maximum height of three feet six inches and when affixed to a sidewalk shed, shall not project above the parapet;

No signs shall be permitted on the ends of any protective structure, unless the lawful and existing sign would otherwise be obscured from view by a deck or parapet of a sidewalk shed or bridge; and

(4) No sign shall project below the deck of any sidewalk shed.

(e) Materials. Such signs shall be constructed of three-fourths inch plywood or sheet metal.

(f) Area and height limitations. The maximum height for the erection of such sign shall comply with the applicable zoning regulations, statutes and these rules, and in no event shall the height of such sign be greater than three feet six inches.

(g) Non-illumination. No illuminated signs shall be permitted on any protective structure subject to this rule.

[40.94] XI. STRATEGY AND GAMESMANSHIP

Litigation is gamesmanship. Most people do not like that. They view the litigation process as one that should yield the truth and result in justice. Alas, this is not the reality of what we deal with as lawyers or litigants. Truth and justice may be factors contributing to the outcome; however, there are many instances where the tactics utilized (or not utilized) dictate the final result. This is particularly true in summary proceedings.

Why are the results of summary proceedings more susceptible to a lawyer's strategizing and use of tactical gamesmanship than in other types of litigation? The answer is simple: speed (or delay) is of the essence in these proceedings. The tenant who is having trouble paying the rent, but needs some breathing space to get the rent, needs to delay the aggressive landlord. The landlord seeking to pressure a tenant to vacate where the lease is undervalued loses money each day the tenant occupies the space. The landlord seeking to evict a tenant who is judgment-proof, and who therefore will never pay the rent even after eviction, faces even greater time pressure. The tenant suffering a loss of services needs them restored today, not tomorrow, in order to conduct its business. The landlord seeking to vacate a building to commence a development project cannot begin construction until the tenant leaves. Sometimes hundreds of thousands of dollars, even more, may be at stake when a tenant's possession stands in the way of a development project. So, as you can see, the aphorism, "time is money" has particular application to these kinds of summary proceedings.

When analyzing summary proceedings as a game in which the object of the tenant is to delay as much as possible, and the object of the landlord is to obtain a judgment of possession and eviction as soon as possible, one must assume a worst-case scenario at every turn and be prepared for it. How do the landlord and his or her counsel protect themselves? This is accomplished by taking every effort to make sure that the case is procedurally correct, as discussed above. And what can the tenant do in response? Capitalize on any seeming procedural or substantive issue to place pressure on the landlord.

[40.95] A. When to Start Litigation

The first tactical decision a landlord makes is when to call counsel to initiate proceedings. Of course, the longer a landlord delays in commencing a proceeding, the more time it takes to evict. It is useful for a landlord to remember that each day of delay in commencing the proceeding gives the tenant a free day where the intent of the tenant is to utilize the space without paying rent until eviction, thus leaving the landlord with a money judgment, which quite possibly may be useless.

[40.96] B. Trial Readiness

As speed is of the essence, the appropriate stance of the aggressive landlord is to be ready to go to trial on each and every date the case comes before a judge, including the first date, with witnesses. Landlords and their agents sometimes do not like to testify. It is not unusual for them to be busy on the day the court has scheduled for a hearing. They sometimes need to have it explained to them, sometimes repeatedly, why it is that they have to be there, or on call, to testify on that date. Landlord's counsel should make certain that his process server is available on the first day of trial. If different process servers are used for the rent demand or predicate notice and notice of petition and petition, both process servers will need to be available on the day of trial, which is a very good reason to have the same process server fulfill both tasks.

Have the same process server serve the rent demand or predicate notices and the notice of petition and petition.

If the witness cannot be available on a court date, then landlord's counsel should know dates certain thereafter when his witnesses are available. Failure of the landlord's counsel to know for sure when his or her witnesses are available before a court date is scheduled can be significant, because if a date is selected and the landlord does not have his or her witnesses available that day, then he will have to adjourn the case again. This is another temporal victory for the tenant.

Landlord's counsel should be ready to go to trial on each and every date the case comes before a judge, including the first date, with witnesses on call.

[40.97] C. Adjournments

The landlord's counsel should not consent to any adjournment. Of course the tenant, or his counsel, should have a ready explanation to adjourn. The tenant's application for an adjournment should precipitate a demand by the landlord that no adjournment be granted without an interim rent payment. By law, "upon the second of two adjournments at the request of the respondent, or, upon the thirtieth day after the first appearance of the parties in court less any days that the proceeding has been adjourned upon the request of the petitioner, whichever occurs sooner, the court shall direct that the respondent" either pay interim rent to the landlord or deposit same with the court on an ongoing basis throughout the litigation.¹⁰³ Faced with a demand that the tenant pay rent, the counter-move for an aggressive tenant's counsel is to withdraw the request for an adjournment and state the tenant is ready for trial! So long as the tenant is not asking for any time, there is no basis for the court to order interim rent. This tactic is most useful when the tenant knows that either the landlord is not ready to proceed with witnesses and/or the court does not have a judge ready to try the case at that moment. In this situation, a landlord trying to bluff readiness in this situation to try and pressure the tenant to pay interim rent runs the risk of dismissal of the case in its entirety if the case is ordered to immediate trial and the landlord is unable to produce witnesses and/or requisite documentary evidence to demonstrate its prima facie case. On the other hand, if the landlord is truly ready with witnesses on call (or even better, in the courtroom), and the tenant insists he is ready (for the purposes of avoiding an interim rent order), then the landlord can get a quick trial and possible judgment if the case goes well.

Pursuant to RPAPL § 745(2), in a summary proceeding upon the second of two adjournments at the request of the tenant, or, upon the thirtieth day after the first appearance in court, less any days that the proceeding has been adjourned at the request of the petitioner, whichever is sooner, upon the landlord's application the court may direct that the tenant deposit with the court use and occupancy accrued as of the date of the petition and on an ongoing basis thereafter. Failure of a tenant to comply can lead to a default judgment. This is subject to the tenant not being able to establish a defense upon certain enumerated grounds.

[40.98] D. Traverse

A traverse is a hearing to determine whether a tenant was validly served process. From the landlord's standpoint, it should be assumed that the tenant will contest service of process of the rent demand or predicate notice and the notice of petition and petition. A factual hearing may be required in such a circumstance to determine if the process server delivered the rent demand and/or petition according to the exact specifications of the law, as fully discussed above. In order to merit a hearing on whether or not the papers were properly served, tenant's answer or pre-answer motion must list specific factual allegations that raise a genuine issue of fact as to the effectiveness of service.

A general denial of the receipt of pleadings will not be sufficient to overcome a general presumption of delivery.¹⁰⁴ If service of process is defective, the case must be dismissed, the landlord must start over. The tenant has "won" a delay and the landlord has lost the rent for the period of that delay, probably forever. There are all kinds of issues surrounding the hearing on service, known as a "traverse," which can defer the day of dismissal or judgment and eviction. Frequently, service of process is the only real defense that a tenant may present. Since proving effective service of process requires the testimony of witnesses, everyone has to be available on the hearing date. Therefore, from the tenant's perspective, the scheduling of the hearing becomes a further means for delay. Tenant's counsel is (or should be) invariably occupied on the first dates suggested by the judge, and since most practitioners have a busy schedule, you can be sure that he will have difficulty finding an "opening" in his or her schedule for a traverse.

For a detailed analysis of the elements of a valid service of process, see the preceding section of this chapter.

[40.99] E. Calling the Tenant As Your First Witness

There is no rule that says that Petitioner's counsel must call the landlord as his first witness. Counsel may call respondent-tenant as his first witness. This may surprise and possibly unsettle the tenant and his counsel.

104 Colon v. Beekman Downtown Hosp., 111 A.D.2d 841, 490 N.Y.S.2d 581 (2d Dep't 1985); Carli-no v. Cook, 126 A.D.2d 597, 511 N.Y.S.2d 38 (2d Dep't 1987).

The general rule under New York law is that “where a witness testifies as to a fact material to the case, the adverse party may, for the purpose of showing that the fact is otherwise, contradict the witness, either by cross-examination or by introducing other evidence.”¹⁰⁵ “[A] party has the right to impeach or discredit the testimony of an opponent, and such evidence is always competent.”¹⁰⁶

In any event, tenant may be a very useful witness for landlord. If landlord does not have anyone to testify as to tenant’s signature on the lease, often tenant will do so for him, readily admitting that this is the lease he signed. Or maybe landlord lacks documentation demonstrating that tenant is aware of the managing agent’s authority; in such case tenant may testify to interactions with the managing agent.

[40.100] XII. STIPULATIONS OF SETTLEMENT

The following provisions help create a robust stipulation.

[40.101] A. Judgment of Possession and Warrant of Eviction

A landlord’s attorney should always attempt to get a final judgment of possession in favor of landlord, granting legal possession of the premises sought to be recovered and the immediate issuance of a warrant of eviction with execution stayed through a certain date or pending any default by tenant as provided for in the stipulation, whichever shall occur earlier.

Where tenant is agreeing to leave, this is obvious. But even where tenant is intending to stay and pay out arrears over time, it is still prudent to get a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction so that the stipulation has real teeth if tenant does not pay or otherwise comply. Tenant’s attorney however, should resist giving a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction.

In a stipulation to pay arrears in a residential matter, Housing Court judges will not always allow a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction if it is the first stipulation between the parties. If Landlord cannot get a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction, he or she should insert a provision allowing Landlord to restore a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction in the event of default.

[40.102] B. Itemize Arrears—Money Judgment—Satisfaction of Money Judgment

Landlord's attorney should also make sure that if part of the settlement involves tenant paying arrears that tenant admits and concedes the exact amount tenant owes landlord, and includes a breakdown of how that number is reached. Lay out everything owed, even if part of the settlement involves waiving some of what is owed, itemize it, and then indicate that those items are waived, pending tenant's compliance. If possible, any waiver of rent or other concession to tenant should be conditional on full compliance with the terms of the stipulation.

Moreover, rather than merely stating in a stipulation that arrears are owed and setting up a payment schedule, a stipulation should contain a money judgment for the arrears owed. In that case, you can make a stay of enforcement of the money judgment contingent on tenant's compliance with the stipulation. This can be a very powerful tool.

It can take up to six weeks for a warrant of eviction to be issued from the Clerk of the Court. The money judgment, however, is immediately effective.

Jay B. Itkowitz, one of the authors of this chapter, once represented a commercial landlord against a restaurant tenant who made a stipulation consenting to a judgment of possession and warrant of eviction and a money judgment. Part of the stipulation required the tenant to give back possession of the premises almost immediately. The tenant did not, however. Instead, he preferred to stick around and stay in business as long as he could, probably anticipating staying open right up until the Marshal showed up, which this savvy tenant probably knew would not be for about a month. The landlord, however, desperately wanted immediate possession of the space. Unfortunately, the warrant had not yet been issued from the Clerk's office. What could the landlord do? Mr. Itkowitz showed up at the premises of this restaurant-tenant at lunchtime on a weekday with a City Marshal, and they began executing on the money judgment by impounding the tenant's tables and chairs, liquor, and cash in the cash register. The tenant agreed to leave if the landlord allowed him to keep his liquor and stereo system.

If a money judgment is going to be issued pursuant to a stipulation and there is a payment schedule in the stipulation that anticipates that tenant will pay the judgment amount, tenant's attorney should provide in the stipulation that landlord will give a satisfaction of judgment after tenant has made the last payment required.

[40.103] C. Payment Applied First to Current Rent Due

If tenant is promising to comply with a payment schedule for arrears, it is very important that he agree that all monies received by landlord are applied first to any current rent or additional rent due and that the balance is then applied to arrears.

Without this stipulation, the following situation may arise: Let us say that the rent is $1,000.00 per month. Landlord takes tenant to court in March, suing for rent due in January, February, and March. You, as landlord's attorney, make a stipulation calling for tenant to pay January's rent on April 1st, February's rent on May 1st, and March's rent on June 1st. Then in April, tenant pays $1,000.00, but does not pay the April rent. The same thing happens in May and June; tenant pays $1,000.00 each month but does not pay the rent due for May and June. If you take tenant back to court he can tell the Judge, "I kept up with the payment plan in the stipulation and the stipulation did not say anything about my future rent." And indeed, tenant would be right and the case would be dismissed. Landlord would then have to sue all over again for April, May, and June.

However, if tenant agrees that all monies received by landlord are applied first to any current rent (or additional rent) due, and only then applied to arrears, the above problem would be alleviated. In that case, the payment received in April would be applied to April rent, May to May rent, June to June, and tenant would, therefore, not be held to have met his obligations under the payment plan in the stipulation.

[40.104] D. Security Deposit

Landlord's attorney should state in the stipulation how much security Landlord is holding, especially if it has been diminished by a draw down at some point during the tenancy. The stipulation should also explain exactly what is happening to the security, i.e., maybe the security is being applied to arrears or it is still functioning as security, which case it does not hurt to specifically establish (although the lease already covers this) that the parties intend that the security will be returned 30 days after the premises are vacated and all terms of the stipulation have been complied with. If the issue is not specifically addressed, many tenants will try to “live out the security” at the end or claim that an arrears payment pursuant to the stipulation should be met by application of the security.

[40.105] E. Further Orders to Show Cause

Landlord cannot stop tenant from seeking an order to show cause; landlord can write whatever it wants in the stipulation, but the court ultimately retains the power to sign anything it wants to. What landlord can do, however, to guard against tenant making many orders to show cause, is to have tenant agree in the stipulation to indemnify landlord for any and all expenses incurred in connection with any such application, including but not limited to costs, disbursements, and reasonable attorney’s fees if landlord prevails. This obviously is not very meaningful against an insolvent tenant, but it is better than nothing.

For a vacating tenant, landlord can also include a per diem, week, or month charge if tenant remains beyond the vacate date. As long as the charge is not exorbitant—for example, many multiples of the rent—such charges will be upheld.¹⁰⁷

The stipulation should also make any application referable to the judge on the case and require tenant to give landlord’s attorney two business days’ prior notice before making an ex parte application, as well as the opportunity to be present at such application.

[40.106] F. “Broom Clean,” What to Do With the Keys, and Property Left Behind

If tenant is vacating, the stipulation should define exactly where tenant is to drop off the keys and with whom together with an acknowledgment of surrender. If the stipulation does not cover this information, then tenant is likely to leave without any goodbyes, leaving landlord unsure as to whether tenant has actually vacated. This can become a huge issue if tenant is expecting a payment for getting out by a certain date.

Moreover, although a tenant almost always agrees in the stipulation that he or she will leave premises in “broom clean” condition, many do not. In that case, there is not a lot a landlord can do, i.e., it is difficult to undo benefits given under the stipulation just because the floor was not swept. Landlord will, however, be glad to have a clear stipulation stating that the junk left behind shall be deemed abandoned by tenant and may be removed and disposed of by landlord at tenant's sole cost and expense, and that tenant further agrees that landlord shall bear no liability for any such removal or disposal of property which is deemed abandoned.

[40.107] G. Sole Possession

If tenant is vacating pursuant to the stipulation, it is very important that tenant represent in the stipulation that: (1) tenant is the only person or entity occupying the premises; (2) no sub-tenant, licensee, assignee, or any other individual or entity of any description who may claim any right to remain in the premises presently occupies the premises; and (3) tenant will not allow any such person or entity to occupy the premises between the date of the stipulation and vacatur.

[40.108] H. Holdover Period

If there is a holdover period—a period between tenant vacating pursuant to the stipulation and the date of the stipulation—especially if tenant is paying use and occupancy during the holdover period, tenant must agree that (1) acceptance of use and occupancy payments does not create a new landlord-tenant relationship and (2) during the holdover period, tenant shall comply with all obligations under the lease, although tenant acknowledges the lease is terminated.

[40.109] I. Guarantee

It may be possible in certain situations to get tenant's obligations in a stipulation personally guaranteed.

[40.110] J. General Releases

It is a good idea when the tenant is vacating, especially if the litigation has been complex, for all parties to exchange general releases. Such releases should be exchanged upon satisfactory compliance with the terms of the stipulation. If a tenant is remaining in occupancy there should be no general release as both parties remain in contractual obligation with each other and a general release would have the effect of releasing the parties from the continuing obligations of the Lease. At most, upon satisfactory compliance a limited release can be given for only those claims comprehended by past activities of the parties, which have been cured, but should make clear that the parties are not releasing each other from continuing obligations they have to each other per the Lease.

[40.111] K. Attorney Fees

The stipulation should explicitly mention the deal between the parties regarding attorney fees. If the intention is that no party should pay the other's attorney fees, then both parties should waive any right to such fees through the date of the stipulation. However, particularly for landlords, even if there is no legal fee provision in an applicable lease, attorney fees should be provided for fees arising from the breach of the stipulation. This is hard to argue with because at the time of the stipulation both sides should be in full agreement that each side will do that which they commit to do in the stipulation. In this respect, an attorney fees provision is an expression of good faith.

[40.112] L. Routine Matters

- In the stipulation, tenant should admit the validity of the allegations in the petition and waive any personal jurisdictional defenses with respect to the proceeding.
- If there are any outstanding motions when the stipulation is executed, the stipulation should mention them and how they are being disposed of.
- The stipulation should mention that it may be signed in counter-parts and that a facsimile signature will be deemed an original.
- The stipulation she specify that “No exchange of electronic correspondence between the parties shall operate to amend, modify or waive any term or provision of this stipulation.”

[40.113] XIII. MAKING EVICTION DAY HAPPEN[40.114] A. Obtaining the Warrant

With almost no exceptions, no one except for a New York City Marshal may physically evict someone from a space they occupy in the City of New York. A Marshal may not evict someone without a warrant of eviction, and a warrant of eviction may not be obtained without a judgment of possession. As these materials have discussed at length above, a judgment of possession may only be obtained if landlord has a lawsuit against tenant, which results in either tenant stipulating to give landlord a judgment of possession or the court awarding a judgment of possession.

The Marshal then deals with the Clerk of the Court, who eventually (it can take anywhere from two to six weeks and often involves solving a problem or two) issues the warrant.

[40.115] B. Scheduling the Marshal

Once a good warrant has been obtained, the Marshal will notify the lawyer or landlord who requested it by mail. Thereafter, the Marshal must be contacted to schedule the eviction and have available the index number and docket number for the case. The Marshal will provide a date for the eviction, which will usually be within two to three weeks.

The Marshals in the City of New York are supervised by the Department of Investigation and the regulations for evictions are set forth in the New York City Marshals Handbook of Regulations which can be accessed via the nyc.gov website.¹⁰⁸

[40.116] C. Marshal's Notice

The Marshal is required to serve tenant with a notice of eviction at least five days prior to the eviction if the notice is served personally ("Marshal's Notice"). If the Marshal's Notice is served by mail, there must be five (5) business days' notice. The Marshal's Notice does not begin to run until the day after it is served and weekends and holidays are not included in the time calculations. The eviction may take place at any time after the expiration of the Marshal's Notice.¹⁰⁹ It can only take place in the hours between sunrise and sunset.¹¹⁰

The eviction must take place within 30 days of the service of the Marshal's Notice or the notice must be reserved.¹¹¹ For example, if after the Marshal's Notice is served tenant gets an order to show cause staying the eviction, but the order to show cause is subsequently denied after 30 days from the earliest eviction date on the Marshal's Notice, the Marshal needs to re-serve the Marshal's Notice. One can request, however, that the Court mark the file "no new orders to show cause." While some judges may not honor that remark on the Court file or the order, it may discourage the tenant from attempting a new order to show cause or may result in quick disposal of any new application by the tenant.

[40.117] D. Meeting the Marshal

Arrangements must be made with landlord to have someone meet the Marshal (usually the building manager or the superintendent). The contact person's name and contact information will need to be provided to the Marshal. Sometimes an eviction is important enough that the attorney should attend, especially if last minute negotiations are expected.

Some Marshals will change the locks for an extra charge although landlord can have someone attend the eviction that has the skills and tools to change the locks. The authors of this chapter usually recommend that the superintendent of the building attend the eviction (whether an attorney comes or not) and change the locks. In that case, it is imperative that the superintendent understands that he or she must not be late.

After these arrangements are made, the Marshal should then be called or emailed to confirm that the eviction is still necessary. The Marshal will also usually call or email back the day before the eviction to give the scheduled time for the eviction. Landlord must be flexible with his/her schedule on eviction day, because the Marshal will sometimes need to rearrange the time of the eviction at the last minute.

Landlord should contact counsel immediately if anything happens—for example: Tenant attempts to communicate with landlord or pay landlord money, or if landlord receives any court papers, such as an order to show cause to stop the eviction.

[40.118] E. Two Options on Eviction Day

Landlord has two options on eviction day. Landlord can ask the Marshal to deliver either full possession (otherwise known as a “move out eviction”) or legal possession.

A full eviction is the removal of the tenant and the tenant's belongings, both of which the Marshal oversees and is considerably more expensive because the landlord has to retain a moving company. Move out evictions should be done where the landlord is very serious about removing the tenant as it will not only be more expensive for the owner but will be costly for the tenant too because the tenant will have to pay the moving company to move his or her possessions to any location where the tenant relocates.

Legal possession removes the occupant from the space but the personal property of the former tenant remains under the care and control of the landlord. Most “evictions” are actually the Marshal returning legal possession to the landlord even though the terms are commonly used interchangeably.

[40.119] 1. Legal Possession

If only legal possession is being given back to landlord, the Marshal will, and is required to, take an inventory of everything inside the premises; “[t]he inventory must be complete and accurate, given a description of all appliances, household furniture, goods, and properties present. Both the quantity and condition of the property must be noted.”¹¹² After the Marshal takes an inventory, landlord will have to sign a statement releasing the Marshal from all liability for any damage to tenant’s property. Landlord should make sure he or she gets a copy of the inventory.

Many people seem to think that landlord must keep the property in the apartment for 30 days. However, there is no statute that requires this. Many leases, however, do have something to say about the issue, and that is what controls in these situations.

It is still very prudent for landlord to maintain the tenant’s personal property in the premises for at least a short period of time so that if tenant comes to retrieve the property they can and no further litigation is engendered. There is nothing worse than being accused of stealing an evicted tenant’s Rembrandt. This is probably where the unofficial “30-Day-Rule” comes from. If tenant does come back to get his or her things, landlord must make sure tenant is supervised when entering the premises. Landlord must not give tenant a copy of the new keys. If landlord removes tenant’s belongings to a different location for storage, landlord can be exposed to liability for any damage to tenant’s belongings.

[40.120] 2. Move Out Eviction

Special moving/storage companies may be engaged to move tenant’s belongings to a warehouse at the time of eviction, thus immediately delivering full possession to landlord. Landlord is responsible for moving charges, and tenant is responsible for storage charges. Usually once the property is removed, the storage company will not release tenant's belongings until tenant pays for storage.

The following is from the Marshal's Handbook:

In the event the landlord demands that the premises be turned over in "broom clean" condition, the marshal must conduct an eviction. The marshal must hire a bonded moving company which is licensed by the New York State Department of Transportation. The marshal must also direct the moving company to deliver the items removed from the premises to a warehouse licensed by the Department of Consumer Affairs . . . the cost of removal of the tenant's property and its delivery to a bonded warehouse must be borne by the landlord.¹¹³

[40.121] 3. For Both Types of Evictions

[40.122] a. Take Pictures

Whether the Marshal is delivering legal possession or full possession, it is useful for the landlord to photograph the premises immediately after the eviction, to establish the exact state of the premises at that time.

[40.123] b. Marshal's Inventory

All marshals are required to prepare a written inventory of all items contained in the premises of any tenant to be evicted. The inventory shall be prepared regardless of whether the Marshal does an eviction or a legal possession.

[40.124] F. Preventing/Delaying the Eviction

[40.125] 1. Order to Show Cause

If tenant goes to a judge and can show a possible reason why he or she should not be evicted, the court in most instances will grant tenant's application by order to show cause to temporarily stay the eviction, pending a court hearing on why tenant should not be evicted.

113 New York City Marshals Handbook, Chapter IV, § 6-4.

[40.126] a. Service of An Order to Show Cause is Important

Service of the order to show cause will be required upon the Marshal and landlord's attorney. Often pro se, less sophisticated tenants botch the service of the order to show cause by serving it too late. A court will have to deny tenant's application for more time if the order to show cause is served late. However, it might not always be the best course of action for landlord to have an order to show cause that was untimely served denied on that basis, because there is a likely possibility that tenant will just go back to court seeking another order to show cause and further delay any possible eviction. This may not be the case, however, if tenant has done other orders to show cause and all the tenant's leeway with the court has been exhausted.

[40.127] b. Check Stays In Order To Show Cause Carefully

Landlord's attorney should carefully check what stays are provided for in an order to show cause and should not assume that the judge stayed the eviction. It is not typical, but also not unheard of, for a judge to allow tenant to make an application, but nevertheless to allow the eviction to go forward. If this is the case, it is important to point this out to the Marshal so the eviction is not canceled.

[40.128] c. Post-Eviction Order to Show Cause

Even after the eviction occurs, tenant may still have one last chance to regain possession. Tenant can go to the court and apply for a post-eviction order to show cause, showing a judge that he or she has some or all of the money or can present another reason why he or she was wrongfully evicted. If a judge signs a post-eviction order to show cause, the court will usually stay landlord from taking any further action in relation to the premises, such as efforts to re-let the space or conducting any further renovation/construction. A general rule is that the longer a tenant waits from the day of eviction to get the post-eviction order to show cause, the less likely it is to be granted. If the apartment gets rented immediately after eviction and the tenant seeks to be restored, the new tenant will have to be made a party to such application as the new tenant will be "in possession."

[40.129] 2. Marshal Is Uncomfortable Evicting

If conditions exist in the premises that the Marshal is unaware of, such as the presence of an elderly or disabled person, the Marshal will not conduct an eviction until those conditions can be remedied or the appropriate arrangements can be made.

[40.130] XIV. ATTORNEY FEES

[40.131] A. Landlord and Tenant Cases and Attorney Fees

Landlord and tenant law has yet another interesting aspect to it; unlike many other areas of law, attorney fees can often be awarded to the prevailing party. Generally, a litigant in New York State is not entitled to recover his or her attorney fees in the absence of a statute that establishes such entitlement (and very few do), or a contract wherein the parties to the contract have agreed as such. Leases, on the other hand, often do call for attorney fees under certain circumstances.

The REBNY Lease typically allows landlord—but not tenant—to recover attorney fees and costs if landlord is the prevailing party in the litigation.¹¹⁴

[40.132] B. Prevailing Party Status

The big question then becomes, Who is the prevailing party? This is an oft-litigated issue. The determination of which party should be accorded the status of “prevailing party,” thereby allowing recovery of attorney fees, requires a two-step analysis: (1) an initial consideration of the true scope of the dispute litigated, followed by, (2) a comparison of what was achieved within that scope.¹¹⁵ It is not necessary that a party prevail on

114 See REBNY Standard Form Lease, Article 19; see also Nestor v. McDowell, 81 N.Y.2d 410, 415–16, 599 N.Y.S.2d 507 (1993) (prevailing party entitled to fees and costs); Peachy v. Rosenzweig, 215 A.D.2d 301, 302, 626 N.Y.S.2d 784 (1st Dep’t. 1995). In the residential context, a reciprocal right to recover fees is implied by law in favor of Tenant even if it is not explicitly provided for in the lease. Real Property Law § 234 provides that

[w]henver a lease of residential property shall provide in any action or summary proceeding that the landlord may recover attorney’s fees and/or expenses incurred as the result of the failure to perform any covenant or agreement contained in such lease, there shall be implied in such lease a covenant by the landlord to pay to the tenant the reasonable attorney’s fees and/or expenses incurred by the tenant as the result of the failure of the landlord to perform any covenant or agreement on its part to be performed under the lease, or in the successful defense of any action or summary proceeding commenced by the landlord against the tenant arising out of the lease.

every contention to be determined a prevailing party.¹¹⁶ In Excelsior,¹¹⁷ the landlord was found to be the prevailing party when it was awarded 49.5 months of the 54 months of rent it sought. and in Peachy,¹¹⁸ the court found that the landlord had obtained the status of prevailing party after 10 days of trial during which time the tenant had imposed 13 affirmative defenses and all but one of those defenses had been defeated.

[40.133] C. How to Make a Motion for Attorney Fees

Going after attorney fees is a lot of work. It has been the experience of the authors of this chapter that even if you prevail, you do not always get 100 cents on the dollar from the court; indeed, the higher your fees, the less likely it becomes for you to recover all your fees. Moreover, before one invests in an attorney fees motion, one should be reasonably certain that the fees can be collected from the party they are sought from. It does not pay to seek fees from a defunct corporation. The following are some suggestions for winning fees if you decide to make an attorney fees motion.

[40.134] 1. Cite the Lease and the Relevant Statute

Begin an attorney fees motion by citing to the lease provision that calls for such fees.

[40.135] 2. Explain Why Your Fees Are Reasonable

Next, explain to the court why the fees sought are reasonable. What constitutes “reasonable” attorney fees is a discretionary determination by the court.¹¹⁹ Courts should be guided by, among other things, the hours reasonably expended and a reasonable hourly rate.¹²⁰

Present the biographies of the attorneys in the firm (including information such as bar admissions, years spent practicing in this area, education, teaching posts, professional associations, press, published writing) as well as the general accomplishments of the firm. Perhaps include a list of noteworthy institutional clients or mention particularly noteworthy victories. Then list the rates charged for each attorney and support staff person in the firm and inform the court that the rates charged are the same as those charged by the firm in the ordinary course of business.

[40.136] 3. Invoices

Annex the invoices reflecting the time that you spent litigating the case from its inception right through to the preparation of the attorney fees motion.

[40.137] a. Proper Invoicing

It is vital here to note that attorneys are required to maintain contemporaneous time entries. It is not acceptable for attorneys or support staff to go back and “recreate” time spent on a case after the day on which the task took place. A good attorney cross-examining the proponent of a motion for legal fees will ask the lawyer testifying in support of the fee application all about the firm’s timekeeping methods.

[40.138] b. Defending Your Bills

Before annexing the invoices to a legal fee motion, study the supporting invoices. Often times the attorney litigating for attorney fees is not involved in the firm’s actual invoicing process. The attorney preparing the motion should read every line critically, as opposing counsel and the court will at the hearing. Understand the story of what happened in the case and be able to tell it logically and consistently. Also perform this analysis on the expense section. If opposing counsel at the legal fee hearing asks, “What were these 300 photocopies for?” the testifying attorney should be able to say, “Those were for the brief of which we needed to file six copies with the court.”

[40.139] 4. Exhibits for Attorney Fees Hearing

A strategy for the attorney fee hearing is to arrive with multiple copies of pre-marked exhibits for each piece of important paperwork in the case, i.e., the pleadings, the motion practice, the memos, the briefs, even transcripts. By using these exhibits when testifying it is possible to demonstrate to the court how much work you did.

[40.140] XV. STAYS PENDING APPEAL[40.141] A. In General

The first question landlords are likely to ask when they engage a lawyer to evict a tenant is “How long is it going to take to get my space back?” Sounds like a simple question that should yield a simple answer, but it is not.

The question is really a two-part question: (1) How long does it take to get a judgment of possession and a warrant of eviction? and (2) How long does it take to get a tenant out if the tenant loses and appeals?

The first question is tricky enough to answer. It could be done as quickly as a month to six to nine months depending on a number of variables. Will the tenant concede possession? Or will the tenant agree to a stipulation for any number of reasons etc.?

The second question, however, is not so easily answered. An appeal can lengthen a summary proceeding by one to three years! How can that be?

It starts with the fact that CPLR 5519(a)(6) provides that when possession of real property is in dispute, the tenant is entitled to a stay of appeal provided the tenant applies to the court of original instance for the court to set a bond to prevent “waste” to the property pending appeal. So once the court sets a bond and/or undertaking pending appeal, the tenant is entitled to a stay pending the outcome of the appeal to the appellate court. A stay for preventing “waste” to property is to be contrasted with a stay on execution of a judgment of money which requires that the amount of the judgment be bonded.¹²¹

When it comes to real property assets, an appellant is entitled to a stay as of right; this stay is not discretionary and is available to any appellant who is willing to give the necessary undertaking. CPLR 5519(a)(6) states, in pertinent part:

[Where] the appellant or moving party is in possession or control of real property which the judgment or order directs be conveyed or delivered, and an undertaking in a sum fixed by the court of original instance is given that the appellant or moving party will not commit or suffer to be committed any waste and that if the judgment or order appealed from, or any part of it, is affirmed, or the appeal is dismissed, the appellant or moving party shall pay the value of the use and occupancy of such property, or the part of it as to which the judgment or order is affirmed, from the taking of the appeal until the delivery of possession of the property; if the judgment or order directs the sale of mortgaged property and the payment of any deficiency, the undertaking shall also provide that the appellant or moving party shall pay any such deficiency[.]

While the plain language of CPLR 5519(a)(6) indicates it should be applicable to summary proceedings, no appellate cases have directly so ruled.¹²² Nonetheless, many trial courts have held the statute directly applicable,¹²³ and that is undoubtedly because of the straightforward language of the provision. The statute has even been held applicable even where the appellant first sought a discretionary stay which was denied.¹²⁴ It has also been applied to the benefit of a landlord where the owner locked out a tenant, such lockout was upheld and the owner sought an undertaking to prevent the tenant from regaining occupancy during the pendency of the appeal.¹²⁵

Notwithstanding the direct language of 5519(a)(6), petitioners can be expected to argue that it should not automatically apply. However, it should be anticipated that most such arguments will be defeated and the absence of the appellate case law on the subject is a sign that such arguments have not gained traction in the lower courts. The real battleground of 55129(a)(6) tends to involve the undertaking with owners arguing for the biggest undertaking possible and tenants arguing for the lowest possible undertaking. Thus, in Andrada, which contains an excellent discussion of 5519(a)(6), the court declined to accept that Petitioner's argument in a case against a proprietary lessee that the undertaking should include payment of "fair market" rent instead of the maintenance because the purpose of the section would be met by requiring the tenant to pay the charges that were due under the applicable agreement. The court, however, held that a hearing would be required to set an undertaking for the attorney fees incurred by the Petitioner.¹²⁶

In summary proceedings prosecuted in the Civil Court of the City of New York, appeals are taken to the Appellate Term of the Supreme Court. Moreover, if the appeal is unsuccessful in the Term, the stay can be continued automatically if the appellant moves for leave to appeal to the Appellate Division.¹²⁷ From a tactical and strategic standpoint, that motion is first made in the Appellate Term and, if unsuccessful, it is made directly to the Appellate Division. If that motion is successful that leads to another round of briefing in the Appellate Division.

In sum, the package of rights provided for in 5519 can provide ample opportunities for a tenant to keep a litigation going for years while the case winds through the court system. This possibility must be kept in mind in particular where it is urgent for the landlord to get prompt possession merely because delay can provide powerful leverage to a tenant.

[40.142] B. Time Frames for Perfecting Appeals

The requirements vary depending on which Appellate Term you are in. In the Appellate Term First Department must obtain the Clerk's Return from the original court and perfect the appeal in the Appellate Term within 30 days after filing the Notice of Appeal.¹²⁸ Any appeal not perfected within the 30-day period is subject to dismissal on motion by opposing counsel. In practice, the Appellate Term will accept an appeal past this 30-day rule due to delays in ordering and settling the transcript. In fact, an appeal can be perfected almost any time, without limit, so long as the opposing party has not moved to dismiss the appeal. Even if the opposing party moves to dismiss the appeal, the appellant can oppose and cross move for an extension, which would be typically granted with a time limit imposed to perfect the appeal.

[40.143] C. Time Frames for Arguing Appeals

Pursuant to Section 640.6(a)(2) of the Appellate Term rules, each appeal shall be noticed for a certain term of the court. Upon filing the 128 Appellate Term, First Division Rules § 640.6(a)(1). (The Clerk's Return is obtained by presenting to the Appeals Clerk of the Civil Court five sets of the reproduced and bound Record on Appeal with proof of service, along with Transcript of proceedings).

Record on Appeal and the Appellant's Brief in the Appellate Term, First Department, the Appellant shall also file a Notice of Argument with proof of service. This form places the appeal on the court calendar for a specified term. The date of oral argument shall be published in the New York Law Journal, commencing two weeks before the first day of the term.

In the Appellate Term, Second Department, the appellant then has 90 days within which to perfect the appeal. A written notice is sent by the court to the appellant notifying him or her of the deadline and also telling him or her that if the deadline is not complied with the appeal will go on a specified dismissal calendar and will be dismissed for lack of prosecution.¹²⁹

As a practical matter, in both Departments, once you perfect and file your notice of argument, the parties can wait months for the matter to be scheduled for argument and then after argument can wait months for a decision.

[40.144] D. Further Appeals

In the event one of the parties is unhappy with a decision in the Appellate Term, such party can move for leave to appeal, usually first in the Term and, if unsuccessful, in the Appellate Division. Each of these motions can take a few months to decide. In the meantime, if the party facing dispossession moves promptly, the stay remains in place.¹³⁰

If a motion for leave to appeal is granted, unless the Court has specified a deadline for the filing of briefs and record, in the First Department, an appellant has nine months to perfect an appeal.¹³¹ Rule § 600.5(d) says that you have 30 days to perfect your appeal if there are no transcripts, however. In the Second Department, an appeal must be perfected within 6 months of the date of the notice of appeal or order granting leave to appeal.¹³²

In a situation where an automatic stay is not available or might be less desirable because the undertaking might be regarded as potentially onerous, the party seeking a stay may apply for a court-ordered stay with less strict requirements for an undertaking pursuant to 5519(c). Under CPLR 5519(c), the court also has the authority to grant a limited discretionary stay modifying the terms of a lower court stay or may be applied for directly to the Appellate Term. As seen in Andrada,¹³³ if unsuccessful, one still can seek an “as of right stay” in the lower court pursuant to 5519(a)(6).

[40.145] E. The Bond

The party seeking the stay must give something valuable in order to obtain the stay. For non-governmental entities, in order to secure an automatic stay, the losing party must post an undertaking in the amount of the judgment.¹³⁴ An undertaking “is in either the form of an obligation by a surety or an amount deposited with the Court.”¹³⁵ A “surety,” essentially a guarantor, is either a corporate entity or individual, who issues the bond or undertakes to guarantee the bonded persons promise.

Pursuant to CPLR 2505:

[a]n undertaking together with any affidavit required by [CPLR article 25] shall be filed with the clerk of the court in which the action is triable, or, upon an appeal, in the office where the judgment or order of the court of original instance is entered, and a copy shall be served upon the adverse party. The undertaking is effective when so served and filed.

Under CPLR 5519(a)(6), service of the notice of appeal alone is insufficient for an automatic stay to be granted. A court must set, either prior to or contemporaneously with the filing of the notice of appeal,¹³⁶ the amount of the undertaking, which the appellant is obligated to pay.¹³⁷

In the Landlord-Tenant nonpayment context, where a judgment in a summary eviction proceeding is rendered in favor of the petitioner, tenant can effect a stay under RPAPL § 751(1) by depositing the amount of rent due in court prior to the issuance of the warrant of eviction.¹³⁸ Alternatively, landlord's receipt of the monthly rent during the period from the taking of the appeal through its dismissal and until landlord obtains possession is also sufficient to satisfy the appellant's obligations under CPLR 5519(a)(6).¹³⁹

In the event that the order or decision appealed from directs the appellant to perform two or more of the acts specified in subparagraphs (a)(2)–(a)(6), then the appellant is directed, under CPLR 5519(a)(7), to comply with the provisions of each applicable subparagraph in order to obtain an automatic stay.

Generally speaking, once the bond or undertaking is given, it will only last for the pendency of a particular appeal and will dissolve if the appellant is successful in his or her appeal.

CHAPTER FORTY-ONE

HOW LENDER'S COUNSEL REVIEWS A LEASE

[41.0] I. WHY MORTGAGE LENDERS CARE ABOUT LEASES

Leases in place provide a major source of value for commercial real estate. The rent pays the owner's debt service and more. For those reasons, a mortgage lender wants to understand the space leases that affect—and are a crucial part of—any proposed real estate collateral.¹

When a mortgage lender begins to prepare for a commercial mortgage loan closing, the lender will often ask its counsel to review some or all of the leases.² That review will focus on a handful of concerns driven by the lender's basic assumptions and desires about the leases. Those concerns are:

- Confirmation of Income. Do the leases support and substantiate the rent roll that the lender reviewed in estimating the value and cash flow of the mortgaged property? Does the rent roll accurately describe the tenants' obligations to contribute to the property's operating expenses and real estate taxes?
- Constancy of Cash Flow. Does anything in the leases create a risk, or at least an atypical risk, of any interruption of cash flow to the borrower and hence loan payments?
- Continuation of Leases. Will the leases probably stay in place, so the value the lender saw in them is likely continue over the life of the loan and even after a possible foreclosure?
- Concerns of a Landlord. Recognizing that any mortgage lender is a landlord-in-waiting (or a possible seller of the property to a future investor), do the leases contain anything that a typical landlord would find unacceptable? Do they impose on the landlord any unusual,

1 This Chapter considers only "space leases," from the mortgage borrower as landlord to users of the real property for occupancy. These leases produce income to the borrower. In contrast, a "ground lease" runs from a third-party owner of the real property to a developer or investor that pays rent and often obtains a loan backed by a mortgage on those valuable leasehold rights. The negotiation and structuring of a ground lease is more a financing transaction than a leasing transaction. It lies outside this discussion. The author has written extensively on ground leases. For details, visit www.joshuastein.com.

2 Sometimes the lender will engage a due diligence contractor, perhaps overseas, for this purpose. In those cases, counsel may have no role at all, but should confirm that understanding early in the process. Otherwise, counsel's role may consist only of taking the blame or cleaning up the mess when something goes wrong. If the lender expects its counsel to review many leases, this can become a large and expensive job, which should be started early in the closing process.

unmeasurable, unexpected, or burdensome obligations? Do they create any other issues, such as inconsistencies in the landlord's obligations to different tenants?

Beyond those questions, a lender will also assess the likelihood that the income stream from a lease will vanish as the result of the tenant's default or financial distress—an underwriting risk inherent in any commercial real property that arises outside the terms of the leases themselves, which probably leads to more loan defaults than anything the leases or the loan documents do or do not say. The likelihood of tenant default represents a credit analysis and part of the lender's business underwriting of the loan. A lender will typically not rely on counsel to assess these business issues.³

The level of lease review that a lender will require for any particular loan will depend on the circumstances. As with most other issues that arise in commercial mortgage loan closings, much depends on the ratio between the loan amount and the value of the mortgaged property. A lower loan-to-value ratio makes it easier for a lender to make a business judgment and cut any number of corners, including the degree of scrutiny the lender applies to leases. If, on the other hand, a transaction is “stressed” from the beginning because of a high loan-to-value ratio, the lender and its counsel must approach leases—and everything else—that much more carefully.

If a single tenant occupies much or all of the landlord's building, that Lease will probably have been extensively negotiated by the tenant, and may be very tenant-friendly. A careful landlord will worry that the lender may review a lease of this type with special care and find problems that the lender might or might not otherwise have overlooked. Under this type of circumstance, it may make sense for the landlord to ask the lender to pre-approve the major lease before the landlord and the lender go any further down the road toward a closing. Otherwise, the lease could create problems along the way. Moreover, if the landlord makes this request early in the closing process, when the lender is still trying to get the business, the lender may be more flexible about major leases than if the lender knows it is already the only game in town and the borrower doesn't have alternatives.

3 If lender's counsel sees anything in a lease that increases the likelihood of tenant default or other issues beyond whatever is “typical,” counsel should try to mention it.

As another fundamental issue, the lender must decide and advise counsel whether the lender plans to rely on the particular leases presently in place, or whether the lender looks to present and future rental income of the building generally—the rental value of the space whether occupied by today's tenants or by any potential future replacement tenants. To the extent that a mortgage lender places weight on general rental value rather than actual leases in place, the terms of the current leases become less important.

Commercial mortgage lenders, though, usually care much more about actual rental income from leases in place than about hypothetical future rental income. In a frothy market, when lenders fight to get deals, they may place more weight on hypothetical future rents from hypothetical future tenants. That type of underwriting often drives a lending boom, often followed by a foreclosure boom. These things can change from month to month, from lender to lender, and from transaction to transaction.

Although any lender recognizes that today's leases will all eventually expire and today's tenants may all simply default or move out, a lender will also know that any effort to replace those tenants will take time and cost money, and even then may not replace the cash flow in place. If a property has significant short-term risk related to scheduled lease expirations and the need to find new tenants, a lender will regard the project as being not entirely stabilized, and will reassess the risk of the deal, perhaps restructuring the loan accordingly.⁴

The more important any particular lease is, the more carefully lender's counsel needs to review it. Anchor leases⁵ in a retail property or large office leases in particular will often require more careful review. First, those leases will often contribute a large share of the borrower's cash flow. Second, the tenants under those leases will have negotiated more heavily and the terms may have become more heavily tailored or tenant-friendly and correspondingly unfriendly to landlords and their lenders.

4 For a description of how a lender might view such a redevelopment project and restructure the loan, see Joshua Stein, "Retail Redevelopment Projects," Real Estate Review, Summer 1999, at 16. At a minimum, if the lender sees significant lease rollover ahead, the lender may want to establish reserves to pay for leasing commissions and tenant improvements, or allowances for future re-tenanting.

5 An anchor lease will drive an entire retail property by bringing in shoppers and hence other tenants. Without anchor(s), a project might drift or fail. Although a landlord can replace anchors, it takes time, costs money, and depends on whether alternative anchors like the particular space. Long vacancy periods for anchor tenants can create a domino effect for other tenants.

Particularly in retail projects, major tenants may have imposed their own forms of lease, rather than bothered with negotiating from the landlord's form.

On the other hand, to the extent that existing leases are below market, in default, or about to expire, or to the extent that the existing tenants are not creditworthy and hence are likely to vanish (or in any event cannot be relied upon), the lender may care more about hypothetical future rental value, on the assumption the space will soon need to be leased to new tenants, than about the details of the existing leases. In such cases, the lender may require only a minimal (if any) review of the terms of the leases—perhaps merely verifying the rent and term, and then checking for lease terms that are so bizarre and undesirable that they would, on their own, cause substantial concern for any lender or landlord, even if they will probably go away soon enough.

A lender's instructions to its counsel on lease review will also vary depending on whether the lender believes in the borrower's competence in negotiating leases and operating the property or in analyzing an existing property being acquired, and sharing the results. If the lender obtains meaningful representations and warranties on the leases, backed by credit beyond the borrowing entity, this would also be a good reason to cut back on the lender's lease review.

This chapter describes the items that a lender will usually want its counsel to consider in any lease review project. Because of the variety of issues any lease will address, many of which will make a difference under some circumstance or another (or the lease wouldn't need to cover them), one can easily find items to add to this list. More generally, anyone who thinks about it carefully can expand any lease review project, almost without limit, if a lender decides it wants to be as exhaustive as possible.

Nevertheless, the discussion in this chapter should cover the major "hot buttons" for a typical commercial mortgage lender in most transactions. Different lenders may, however, have different expectations for lease reviews in different transactions. Any lender's expectations will be completely different—and this list will be inadequate—for any credit tenant lease, bondable lease, synthetic lease, or ground lease.

This chapter begins by describing, in section II, some questions that counsel should answer before starting a lease review project, to define its scope and exactly what the lender wants its counsel to deliver.

Once counsel starts the lease review process, that process might identify problems and issues in the leases. Section III briefly discusses some common solutions to those problems and issues, and how the problem resolution process ties to the loan closing process more generally.

Section IV offers an overview of the basic general and financial questions that counsel should try to answer in any lease review, or questions whose answers counsel should confirm against the rent roll that the borrower provided. The latter approach will usually save time and cost less than having counsel undertake the lease review project without a reference point against which to check the leases.

Section V then turns to a broader group of issues of a less directly economic nature—issues where a lender's concerns are about the same as those of any other potential owner of the mortgaged property, and therefore the lender's and the borrower's interests are fairly well aligned, except that a borrower will usually have a greater appetite for risk even on these issues. A careful lender may want its lease review process to cover these issues as well.

Finally, section VI examines some issues that a lender will care about, but where a landlord (borrower) will probably have no direct interest. These issues relate to protecting the lender's interests, without particularly helping the landlord, when the lender does not (yet) own the mortgaged property.

Although this chapter addresses lease review in the context of a mortgage loan closing, many of the same issues arise when an investor considers acquiring the same property. And the same issues also arise when a landlord and its counsel negotiate new leases, thinking ahead to a future mortgage loan and ultimate sale.

[41.1] II. SOME PRELIMINARY QUESTIONS: DEFINING THE LEASE REVIEW

When lender's counsel begins to think about the existing leases in a building that will secure a new mortgage loan, he or she should ask some preliminary questions to help define the job to be done, even before anyone reads the first word of any lease.

[41.2] A. What Lease?

Landlords and tenants often amend leases. If amended more than three or four times, they readily become a confusing mess because of sloppiness and imprecision in drafting.⁶ Some amendments won't look like amendments. Instead, they'll take the form of letter agreements that, for example, confirmed the exercise of an option and added some space, perhaps adjusting the rent for that space. Sometimes landlords and tenants amend leases in other strange ways, such as through estoppel certificates.

It usually makes sense to read the most recent amendment first, then go backwards in time. The more recent amendments will often amend and restate the most important financial terms. In an extreme case, counsel may want the borrower to agree to try to amend and restate the entire lease after the loan has closed, to mitigate the risk of issues, inconsistencies, and uncertainty (which will produce issues and concerns if the lender ever tries to sell or securitize the loan) resulting from the messiness and complexity of the lease documents.⁷

As the first step in any lease review, lender's counsel should try to confirm that the borrower has provided not only the lease, but also every amendment that affects it. Any lease review should indicate exactly which amendments counsel received. This is true even if the lender has requested only the most minimal and abbreviated lease review.

Amendments will tend to address important issues. Any lease review must fully reflect them.

[41.3] B. Missing Documents

If documents appear to be missing (which usually happens, particularly as a result of disguised amendments as mentioned above), request copies from the borrower (or notify the lender client) immediately. As a common

6 See Joshua Stein, A Practical Guide to Real Estate Practice, "How to Amend Transactional Documents" (2001). Another chapter of this book addresses lease amendments and renewals in depth.

7 The borrower will rarely agree to undertake such a process. Even if they do agree to undertake it, they will rarely follow through. Therefore, if a lender genuinely wants to see a "lease mess" turned into a single amended and restated lease, the lender should build in some meaningful incentives to get the job done. One of the problems with amending and restating an existing lease mess is that it will often trigger renegotiation of the entire lease, so isn't as mechanical and straightforward as it may sound. As an intermediate approach, landlord and tenant could consolidate all the various amendments, side letters, certificates, etc., into a single lease amendment without touching the original lease.

example, if the lease gives the tenant options that the borrower treats as having been exercised, ask for some written confirmation of the exercise—at least the notice of exercise and ideally a letter agreement confirming the exercise and whatever economic adjustments it produced. Absent such documentation, the borrower can usually eliminate any uncertainty through an estoppel certificate, but one needs to identify the requirement early in the closing process, while the estoppel certificates are being prepared.

[41.4] C. What Deliverable?

A lender should decide early in the process exactly what form of lease review the lender wants its counsel to deliver for the particular transaction. At one extreme, the lender may want formal abstracts of each lease, a summary of the business terms and of any special lender issues the lease might create. Such abstracts often take more time than they justify, creating billing issues and delays. Summaries or charts, even handwritten, may suffice.

Lenders that desire to control costs instead often request an extremely abbreviated memorandum that summarizes only bullet points of concern on the leases, not a complete abstract of every lease. Such a memorandum can be informal and need not use complete sentences.

Sometimes, the right deliverable consists of nothing at all, beyond a confirmation that the leases reviewed seemed generally consistent with the rent roll, and that nothing jumped out as troublesome.

If lender's counsel provides anything less than a thorough review of every lease sufficient to identify all problems, then lender's counsel should think about what happens if counsel's review turns out to be wrong or incomplete. Did counsel clearly indicate the scope of the lease review conducted? If so, is that enough to protect the counsel from blame or even liability? Should counsel advise the lender of the risks of conducting a less-than-complete lease review?

In any event, the subject of deliverables represents a subject that the lender and its counsel should resolve before the lease review begins—so the lease review doesn't have to be done twice—and, in any case, before counsel responds to any request for an estimate of legal fees or timing for the closing. Large and open-ended lease review projects can cause billing problems, surprises, and delays. Changing the scope of the project once it has started will only make it worse.

Here are some more thoughts on techniques to control the lease review process:

- Existing Abstracts. If the borrower has already prepared abstracts of the leases, the lender may be willing to rely on them, particularly if competent counsel prepared them and lender's counsel can randomly spot-check them. But did the borrower sign any further lease amendments after preparing the abstracts?
- Shared Abstracts. Borrower and lender can engage a single law firm or due diligence contractor to prepare lease abstracts, taking into account the directions of both borrower and lender. Borrower's counsel may be willing to address its due diligence memos and lease reviews to the lender as well, although any such additional reliance will often create its own issues. When borrower's counsel learns that someone else may rely on its work product, the exercise sometimes attracts the same scrutiny as issuance of an opinion of counsel, whereas until that point it was just a routine due diligence process.
- Marked Copies. A borrower might have, or easily be able to prepare, copies of its leases marked to show changes from its standard form of lease. Those marked copies would let lender's counsel focus on deviations from the standard form rather than potentially considering every paragraph of every lease. Occasionally, property owners prepare their execution leases in the ordinary course in a way that highlights deviations from the standard form, just as a marked copy of the lease might.
- Compromise on Presentation. Instead of requiring beautifully word-processed abstracts, the lender might settle for lease review forms, filled in by hand and not thereafter edited or reformatted.

[41.5] III. DEALING WITH PROBLEMS

The lease review process exists to identify any problems or issues that might exist in the leases. Once a lender or its counsel identifies those issues, some may occasionally (rarely) rise to a level high enough that they would lead the lender not to close the transaction. Others may lead the lender to establish reserves, tailored covenants, or other measures to resolve or mitigate whatever risks the lease review process identifies. In other words, the lease review process does not occur in a vacuum. It represents part of the process of structuring and closing the larger transaction, and in extreme cases even defining some of its economic terms. For that reason, a lender and its counsel should keep these points in mind in any lease review process:

- Problems and Exceptions. Although the lease review process must in part confirm that the leases support the rent roll, the lender and its counsel should try to focus on exceptions and problems, and report them and act on them when found.
- Assumptions. Don't assume that the leases are correct. To the contrary, assume they hide mistakes and surprises, or at least might do so. That's the whole purpose of the exercise.⁸
- Early Identification. Try to identify any problems as early as possible in the process. They may require lease amendments or other cooperation by the tenant, all of which will take time and may drive the closing documentation. Because the importance of any problem will usually multiply for a larger or more important lease, start reviewing those leases first.
- Remedies. Any analysis of a problem in a lease is not complete without taking a look at the rights and remedies the lease creates if an issue ever arises. For example, a lease might grant a tenant an exclusive right to sell a particular type of product in its space. But the lease may also say that if landlord violates the exclusive, the tenant can only claim a nominal and meaningless credit against rent—with no right to terminate the lease. The limited nature of the tenant's remedy would probably make any lender less concerned about the exclusive clause. More generally, whenever any problem shows up in a lease, lender's counsel should also focus on: (a) what landlord might have already done to mitigate the problem; and (b) the parties' rights and remedies in the context of that particular problem.
- Sounding the Alarm. To the extent that a lease review discloses discrepancies or concerns, counsel should note and report them to the client, quickly, in a way that brings them to the appropriate people's attention. Don't mention them as footnotes or textual discussion buried in a voluminous report about the leases as a whole, most of no particular concern to the lender. Merely writing a little note somewhere, which someone else will have to notice, read, and think about, doesn't necessarily do the job of calling attention to the problem. Don't assume anyone will actually read or think about whatever report you write.

8 Even something as dumb as having missing pages may turn out to create issues. The author once worked on a transaction where a copy of a crucial retail lease was mysteriously missing a page. When the page turned up, it just happened to provide for a huge rent abatement until the landlord obtained a crucial zoning approval for the project, without which the tenant could not operate. The moral of the story: identify any missing pages early, and do something about them immediately.

In general, if lender's counsel discovers a problem with a lease, the lender will usually have only five choices, some of which may lead to changes in the loan documentation:

- Do Nothing. In most cases, the lender will decide to live with the problem and whatever risk it creates. If the risk later "hits," whoever reviewed the lease will simply need to show that he or she identified the problem and disclosed it.
- No Loan. Decline to make the loan. Although lenders occasionally do choose this option, it can damage relationships and sometimes conceivably lead to liability, or more often just threats of liability, if the documentation to date (application, term sheet, or commitment letter) does not give the lender adequate escapes. Lenders also sometimes use the possibility of not closing the loan as a mechanism to encourage borrowers to go solve the problem some other way—essentially a game of chicken between borrower and lender.
- Mitigating the Risk. Figure out a way to mitigate the problem and whatever risk it creates. For example, the lender might establish a reserve or tailor additional documents to give the lender further controls or protections tailored to the circumstances.
- Borrower Quick Fix. In rare cases, the borrower will be able to fix the problem before closing. When this option is available, it will usually be the lender's first choice. This could, for example, involve a lease amendment or waiver, or adding a paragraph to the estoppel certificate⁹ to be signed by the tenant. A tenant may and may not cooperate, though.¹⁰

9 Estoppel certificates are usually not the best way to solve lease problems. They don't necessarily benefit the next landlord or the next lender. They get lost. If they change the lease, this doesn't necessarily always work. A careful lender will use them only to remove uncertainty about factual matters that cannot be confirmed from the words of the lease.

10 Leases sometimes obligate the tenant to sign amendments if a lender requests. The conditions to that obligation are typically so extensive (if tenant's counsel is even minimally competent) that they dilute the obligation almost to nothing.

- Borrower Slow Fix. The borrower might conceivably be able to solve the problem after closing. In these cases, the loan documents will need to define the borrower's obligations. If the "fix" will require cooperation from third parties, as it usually will, the parties need to recognize that those third parties might not cooperate. Therefore, they need to deal with backup measures, instituted either at closing or if the borrower has not fixed the problem after a certain time.

To the extent that the lender and the borrower agree on measures to solve a problem in a lease, the lender will also usually want to satisfy itself that those measures will work not only for today's loan closing, but also for any future loan closing with some other lender that might later refinance this lender. Today's lender cares about future lenders because today's lender wants to make sure the borrower can later refinance the loan. Otherwise, this lender may find itself left holding the bag.

On the other hand, each possible future lender may have its own agenda and own concerns. Something that one lender cared about a lot, another lender may disregard. And tomorrow's lender may care about issues that today's lender never even considered. Still, the universe of concerns of a future lender seems relatively limited and predictable, and today's lender will want to consider them.

If a lease lacks some provision that today's lender regards as important, the borrower might suggest a mechanism that gets past the problem for today's closing but will not necessarily help for the next closing, the one that will refinance today's loan. For example, the tenant might issue a letter to the current lender that solves the problem, but the letter might not also benefit the next lender. In that case, although today's lender can go ahead, it may also look ahead and be concerned about a future refinancing, and insist that the borrower develop a longer-term solution to the problem, perhaps in this case as simple as having the letter addressed to the borrower and its present and future lenders.

Once lender's counsel identifies a problem and the lender decides borrower will need to solve it, the lender will need to fit that requirement into the larger closing. It will become part of the closing checklist. The lender and its counsel should track it and make sure it gets done and doesn't fall between the cracks.

[41.6] IV. GENERAL AND FINANCIAL QUESTIONS

This section offers a more specific checklist of the basic points that typically matter when counsel reviews any lease to confirm its basic financial terms. In each case, lender's counsel should check these points against the rent roll.¹¹ To the extent that any item does not match the rent roll, lender's counsel should mention the inconsistency in the lease summary and for significant matters bring it to the lender's attention immediately—whether it is “good” inconsistency (the facts are better than the rent roll suggests) or “bad” inconsistency (the opposite). Either type of inconsistency may affect the lender's decision process or even the ultimate business terms of the loan. At a minimum, “good” inconsistency may raise doubts about the reliability of the rent roll and the borrower's management.

[41.7] A. Tenant

In their zeal to uncover hidden issues or problems in a lease, anyone reviewing a lease should not lose sight of a dumb basic issue that will jump out from any lease for anyone who pays attention: Exactly what party signed the lease as tenant? If the lender assumes the tenant is a creditworthy chain or other large company, is that creditworthy entity in fact the tenant? Or is the tenant some less creditworthy affiliate with a confusingly similar name? Discrepancies and differences in the tenant's name may not jump off the page, but catching them may represent the most important issue—as well as the easiest issue to explain and the easiest one to miss—in any lease review project. Although courts sometimes look beyond confusingly similar names and find a parent company liable under a lease that a subsidiary signed, no lender wants to rely on any such result. No counsel wants to miss that issue.

[41.8] B. Space

The lease should identify the address of the building and the leased premises within the building. Uncertainty can lead to disputes, and not only because the tenant may claim more space than the landlord thought the tenant occupied. For example, an area might be burdensome to maintain or repair, and neither landlord nor tenant really wants responsibility for it. Larger premises are not always better premises for a tenant. Sometimes the lease will need to identify the size of the leased premises, though by no means always. Any lease review should indicate whether the tenant has exercised shed rights or expansion rights and should note the existence of any unexercised rights. Do any unresolved issues exist on the consequences of a tenant's exercise of those rights?

¹¹ Usually counsel should confirm the rent roll (or a pro forma summary of the rents over time), rather than collect and organize the same information from the leases. The first approach saves time and money and prevents mistakes. Counsel must take care to keep track of what has been checked and what still remains to be checked.

[41.9] C. Term

When does the lease expire and what extension options does it give the tenant? Flag the existence of any expired lease or informal month-to-month extensions, as these potentially impair reliability of income. Does the file suggest any ambiguity, uncertainty, or dispute on whether a tenant in fact exercised an option and, if so, how that affected rent, the tenant's other obligations under the lease, or the expiration date? To the extent that the tenant has renewal options, must the tenant make its decision far enough in advance so that if the tenant doesn't want to renew, the landlord (or the lender or other owner of the property after foreclosure) still has enough time to re-rent the premises without risk of an interruption in rent?

[41.10] D. Rent

Check the tenant's main rent obligations, which will typically consist of some combination of these: (1) fixed or base rent, payable based on a schedule (almost always monthly) in the lease; plus (2) escalations, whereby the tenant contributes to (i.e., protects the landlord and lender from increases in) real estate taxes, operating expenses, or other expenses of the building; and sometimes (3) percentage rent, a percentage of the tenant's gross sales.

Sometimes leases will allow the tenant to claim credits against some of these rent obligations. For example, if the lease requires the tenant to pay real estate taxes, the lease may allow the tenant to credit those payments against percentage rent above a certain level. Those credit rights may not appear in the percentage rent section of the lease. The lease reviewer will need to watch for them elsewhere, often at the very end just before the signatures or in an amendment.

Anything that allows the tenant to reduce rent or claim an offset against rent merits attention for two reasons. First, it could of course reduce rent. Second, this type of provision often tends to produce disputes because it is poorly written and the facts end up playing out differently than anything the parties imagined. So if the lease does provide for a reduction or offset, lender's counsel should watch for excessive complexity and make sure the clause works right.

Especially for leases signed relatively recently, the lease reviewer should look for any uncertainty on the base amounts that define the tenant's obligation to contribute to real estate taxes or operating expenses. If these base amounts have not yet been determined or finalized, the tenant may later be able to reduce its escalation rent by asserting a higher base amount than whatever the parties assumed. In these cases, the lease may set up a calculation or definition to determine, in the future, what the tenant's base amount will be. Like any other formula that directly affects payments, this represents particularly fertile ground for disputes and interpretational issues. If any lease raises this concern, counsel may simply want to note it for discussion. There may be ways to deal with it, or it may simply amount to a risk that the lender will need to understand and accept.

[41.11] E. Security Deposit

How much security deposit did the tenant provide? Watch particularly for any form of security deposit other than cash, such as a letter of credit. If these security deposits are substantial, the lender may want to hold—or at least control—them, particularly if the lender requires a lockbox or other cash-management measures for the mortgaged property. The measures to allow a lender to take control of unusual security deposits may require attention early in the closing process, particularly to the extent that they may require cooperation from third parties, starting with the tenant but also often including a bank or other financial institution.¹²

At a minimum, counsel may want to suggest that the lender confirm the landlord still has the security deposit. If the security deposit arrangements take the form of something other than cash, the lender will also want to know that they still exist and, for example, that any letter of credit has not expired and the original document has not been lost.

[41.12] F. Construction Obligations

If the building is still under construction, or if the lease for some other reason was signed only recently, it may still obligate the landlord or tenant to complete or pay for certain construction to prepare the space for the tenant's business. Any such obligations will typically concern a lender, ¹² Other chapters in this book focus on issues regarding letters of credit in leasing.

because they introduce construction-related risks that should not arise for a stabilized building. Lender's counsel will typically want to answer at least these questions:

- Landlord's Obligations. What construction must the landlord still perform, whether on the premises, in the common areas, or elsewhere, even potentially off site? Does the lease clearly define these obligations? Does the file suggest any sign of disputes, delays, or uncertainty about the landlord's completion of its work?
- Remedies for Late Delivery. If the landlord does not finish its construction on time, what can the tenant do? Can the tenant claim a rent credit? Can the tenant terminate the lease? May the tenant perform the work itself and offset rent?
- Monetary Obligations. If the landlord has agreed to make a cash contribution to the tenant's construction work, how much is that contribution and what conditions must the tenant meet in order to receive it? The lender will also want to understand how the landlord plans to fund the contribution and assure it will be available when required. Often, the loan will include a line item to fund these landlord obligations. In those cases, the lender and its counsel will want assurance that the lease requirements and the loan availability match up. If the lender does not anticipate making advances to fund any remaining landlord obligations, how can the lender obtain comfort that the money will be there when needed? Depending on the dollars involved, these issues may lead to changes in the loan documents.¹³
- Tenant's Remaining Work. How much work does the lease say the tenant will perform? Is there anything about the work that makes it appear uncertain or difficult? Must the landlord participate in the tenant's work in ways that may become expensive or complicated or cause delay? And, again, does anything in the file suggest disputes or problems have arisen about that work?

13 A thoughtful borrower/landlord will recognize these concerns before they actually arise, and make sure that the letter of intent or other preliminary documents for the loan already deal with them.

[41.13] V. LANDLORD AND LENDER SHARED CONCERNS

Beyond the basic economic issues listed above, a lease raises a wide range of issues about the relationship between landlord and tenant—every possible event or circumstance that can occur in a potentially complicated piece of real estate over a long period. For most of those issues, the lender’s concerns largely match the landlord’s. A lender will, however, often worry more than the borrower—particularly about any issue that might interfere with the reliability of cash flow—based on the lender’s more “downside” orientation.

A borrower may, for example, be willing to tolerate some small risk of an impairment of rental income if that is the price of getting the lease or if the borrower regards the risk as immaterial in the grand scheme of things. In making that decision, the borrower has probably identified both the downside and the upside in the project as a whole, and accepts the former as the price of the latter. A lender attaches less weight to the possible upside and cares more about preventing the downside. Hence it will weigh risks differently than might a borrower. A lender will care about small risks that a borrower might ignore. A borrower, innately more optimistic, will also be more likely than a lender to believe that it can control or mitigate any risk that the lease creates, whereas the lender may see only risk.

Because a routine space lease can potentially deal with hundreds of issues,¹⁴ the range of possible concerns to a lender is almost limitless. A lender could, if it wished, have its counsel review any lease—or selected leases in a building—with the same level of detail and concern as if the lender were negotiating the entire lease in the first instance. This approach is unusual and highly inefficient.

Instead, a lender will typically assume that most of the nonfundamental terms of an existing lease are commercially tolerable, because: (1) the lender isn’t really the landlord; (2) the lender’s loan-to-value ratio gives the lender a cushion to accept some imperfections in the leases, except potentially substantial direct threats to reliability of cash flow; (3) such imperfections will probably not lead the lender to walk from the deal, so they are not worth the time they would take to find; (4) the lender has some confidence in the borrower’s ability to negotiate and manage leases—a process that is fairly well-defined and manageable by most borrowers if they have any experience or competence; and (5) a full review of every term of every lease makes no practical or economic sense.¹⁵

The issues that lenders and landlords share tend to relate to hypothetical eventualities that are not directly economic, but certainly can have indirect economic consequences. As so often happens, the concerns that are fundamentally important to both landlords and lenders are also typically the same issues that any lender will probably place at the top of its agenda. Most affect possible interruption or loss of income, the lender's primary concern. Others affect a range of lender concerns not necessarily tied to loss of income.

[41.14] A. Casualty and Condemnation

A lender will want to assure that if the building burns down or a government acquires it for public use (however defined), the lender understands how that loss will affect rental income and the continuation of the leases in the building. The lender does not necessarily expect tenants to continue paying rent if they can't occupy their spaces. A lease that imposes such a requirement may create more problems than it solves.¹⁶ Here is a short summary of the lender's agenda in this area, when considering a routine space lease:¹⁷

- Rent Abatement. Understand and summarize, very briefly, when and how the lease allows the tenant to abate rent after a casualty or condemnation. Typically, a lender will accept reasonable rights to abate rent in proportion to the tenant's inability to use its premises. A lender will even usually tolerate provisions that allow a tenant to terminate its lease if the unusable condition continues for a certain period. As a practical matter, lenders and landlords do typically have 15 Practicality of this type often deviates from the mindset of nonrecourse lending, which in many ways assumes – at least as a starting point – that the borrower is incompetent and will default immediately after the closing. Reliance on the borrower's management skills represents a different mindset. As a practical matter, though, it is both common and reasonable when lenders think about existing leases.

16 Such a lease forces each tenant to insure a risk that in most cases is more efficiently (i.e., cost effectively) insured once, at the landlord level, with part or all of the cost potentially passed through to tenants. If a tenant fails to maintain that particular insurance, the landlord cannot look to its own insurance to fill the gap, but must instead look to the tenant's credit and the landlord's remedies under the lease. If, on the other hand, the landlord agreed to abate rent, the landlord's insurance carrier would probably give the landlord a simpler and more reliable mechanism (than claims against the tenant) to make up for the lost rental income.

17 For a ground lease, synthetic lease, or bondable lease, the lender's expectations will vary quite substantially from those described here. Such leases fall outside the scope of this Chapter.

to live with the risk of lease termination upon casualty or condemnation, and they simply need to do what they can to address the risk. A lender's tolerance for abatement and termination rights will be greater in small leases than in large leases. The lender also wants to confirm that the provisions allowing the tenant to abate rent and terminate the lease make sense and dovetail with the borrower's actual insurance coverage and the insurance requirements in the loan documents. This may require coordination with the borrower's insurance broker and the lender's insurance advisers, plus tailoring of the insurance provisions for the loan. If lender's advisers identify a disconnect between tenants' abatement rights and borrower's insurance program, the lender will want the borrower to adjust its insurance program—both for the closing and in the loan document requirements for future insurance. Here, as so often happens, the due diligence process and what it uncovers can drive changes in the loan documents.

- Where's the Cash? If a loss occurs, the lender will not want the tenant to take any of the insurance or condemnation money that would otherwise go to the lender—which would make these funds unavailable to repay the loan or restore—or to require the borrower to apply those funds in a manner inconsistent with the loan documents. A lender will therefore want to understand exactly what the lease, particularly a large lease, requires along these lines, and identify any inconsistencies or issues. Strong tenants will often insist on resolving any inconsistencies between their lease and the loan documents in favor of the former, though it's rare for a space tenant to claim any significant amount from casualty or condemnation proceeds. A lender will want to know that the lease allows the landlord to use insurance or condemnation proceeds to restore, with any excess going to the landlord and its lender, all under reasonable and typical terms and conditions that the lender can accept. As long as those terms and conditions are generally reasonable, a lender will probably not want its counsel to spend the time to confirm that they match perfectly the requirements of the loan documents.
- Restoration Procedures. If the lease does require the landlord to restore, the lender will want to confirm that nothing in those restoration procedures will create risks or concerns for the lender. As an extreme example, if the lease requires the landlord to restore but provides that a noncreditworthy (or potentially noncreditworthy) tenant will hold the restoration funds while the process goes forward, a lender would regard such a provision as troublesome. A lender will also want to satisfy itself that if the landlord actually does restore in a prompt manner, the tenant will remain in place under the lease, and the deadline to restore is not unrealistically short.

[41.15] B. Go Dark

If the lease covers retail space, particularly in a building with other retail tenancies or in a mixed-use project, the lender will want to confirm that, at a minimum, the lease requires the tenant to open for business by a certain date. The lender will then ideally want to ensure that the tenant must continue to operate after opening. This issue will matter particularly for large anchor stores, which typically pay a lower rent based on the assumption that by being open for business they will attract customers for the benefit of everyone else at the property.

If the lease allows one of these major tenants to close up its operations at whim, this undercuts the assumption that drove the economics of the lease and the property. Although the lease would require the anchor tenant to continue to pay rent after closing, major chain stores have been known to do exactly this (and gladly!) when they open a new location across the street and want to prevent a competitor from opening at their former location. Any such closure by an anchor tenant can imperil the viability of other tenants and hence, ultimately, viability of the entire property. Courts will occasionally infer an implied covenant of continuous operation, but no lender wants to rely on that possibility. Lenders and their counsel will, and should, therefore usually assume that unless a lease obligates the tenant to operate, the tenant can shut down at any time, a possibility that will and should raise concern for the lender.¹⁸

If a retail lease does not contain a covenant to operate, then counsel should flag that omission as an issue. But a lender will typically not be concerned about reasonable exclusions from the covenant to operate, such as temporary closures to take inventory, construct alterations, or the like, provided that the exceptions are not so broad that they consume the rule.

Although tenants will sometimes agree to remain open and continue operating without qualification, most tenants refuse to incur such open-18 As an underwriting matter, the lender may worry less if the tenant achieves a high sales volume at the leased location. To perform that analysis, though, the lender will want sales information, and will want to know that the lease requires the tenant to provide it. Not all leases do, particularly if the tenant does not pay percentage rent. Ultimately, a tenant's sales volume in proportion to rent offers a great—probably the best possible—predictor of the tenant's future at the property.

ended obligations, arguing that if it no longer makes business sense to remain open they should not be obligated to do so.

As a common compromise, major tenants often agree that if they shut down for a certain period, the landlord can terminate the lease and take back the vacant space. The details and mechanics of these landlord termination rights will vary widely from project to project. A lender will care a lot about them, particularly for anchor tenants or if the lender considers termination likely. Here are some examples of agreements landlords might make with major tenants, if the tenant “goes dark” and the landlord terminates the lease:

- Landlord’s Kickout Payment. The landlord might agree to pay the tenant some amount when terminating the lease, such as reimbursement of the tenant’s fixturing costs. But just how much will the landlord need to pay? Usually the lease will set up a formula, often not entirely clear. At a minimum, the lender may want to try to analyze how much the landlord would actually need to pay. The lender may want to go a step further, and obtain specific comfort from the tenant about the measure of the payment. As an example, these payments often take into account the tenant’s unamortized balance of its leasehold improvements. The lender may want the tenant to confirm in an estoppel certificate just how much the tenant spent on leasehold improvements, and how the tenant is amortizing that investment. That calculus represents an example of how the lease review process may drive the closing requirements, in this case through an estoppel certificate.
- Funding. If the tenant goes dark and the landlord decides to terminate the lease and make a termination payment, how will the landlord fund that payment? The lender will realize that if the borrower ever needs to make that payment and then find a replacement tenant, the borrower will probably try to persuade the lender to advance the necessary funds, which the lender may or may not want to do. For that reason, if the lender cares about the issue and sees a reasonable likelihood that it might arise, based on its assessment of the anchor tenant’s future at this location, the lender might want to establish a reserve or an additional line item in the loan to assure a funding source.
- Tenant’s Kickout Payment. Conversely (and less likely for going dark terminations of anchor leases), if the tenant must pay the landlord for any such termination, where does that money go and what will the landlord use it for? The landlord will probably incur costs to re-tenant the space. As a general question, whether or not the tenant must pay for the termination, how will the landlord cover its re-tenanting costs without coming to the lender looking for more money? And how will the landlord make up for lost rent while the borrower finds a replacement tenant? Usually a lender will agree to apply the termination payment to cover all these costs, provided they are bona fide and reasonable. But what if the costs exceed the termination payment? Who covers the shortfall?

- Timing. Does the timing of the termination right give the landlord a reasonable time to find a replacement tenant before the old tenant goes away?
- Control Over Termination. Look carefully at how the termination right actually works. Does the borrower control it to the exclusion of the lender? Would it survive a foreclosure? Could the borrower use its control over the termination right to create leverage against the lender? For example, if the termination right is a one-time-only event, the lender may fear that if the borrower and the lender are fighting when the termination right arises, the borrower might—simply to gain leverage in the dispute with the lender—refuse to exercise the termination right even though it makes economic sense for the building. The lender may prefer that the termination right remain in effect indefinitely, or at least arise periodically, so that once the borrower and the lender resolve their dispute and (hypothetically) the lender owns the building, the lender will still have some reasonable opportunity to terminate the lease if the anchor tenant stays closed.
- Lender Consent Right. Conversely, if the lender does not want to terminate the lease but the landlord does, does the lease (or a separate agreement) protect the lender by saying that the termination will not be effective without the lender's consent? Does that restriction bind the tenant? If the lender fears a termination without its consent, the lender may want to tailor the nondisturbance agreement with the tenant accordingly.
- Required Activity Level. What level of activity in the space must the tenant continue to show to protect itself from termination? Will that level of activity meet the lender's expectations for the space and the project? For example, operation of two subleased flea market booths in the back corner of the space should not suffice to protect a tenant from termination.

For any retail project, issues about the tenant's obligation to operate, and the possibility of closure, will often reside near the top of any lender's list. If lender's counsel does not remember to look for these issues, they are easy to miss because the concern arises more from what the lease doesn't say than from what it does.

[41.16] C. Abatement Rights

Does the lease allow the tenant to abate or offset rent? (Disregard casualty or condemnation abatements, which raise separate concerns, addressed above.) A tenant's rights to abate rent will often tie to the tenant's "self-help" rights—rights of the tenant to cure the landlord's defaults and offset the costs against rent. Major tenants will often negotiate these rights if the landlord fails to complete required construction or fails to deliver required services or utilities and the failure hurts tenant's business. In extreme (and rare) cases, the tenant may obtain these rights for any landlord default at all.

For a major tenant, a lender may simply have to live with abatement rights. But the lender should begin by understanding exactly what they are. At a certain point they become intolerable. At some earlier point, they may lead to tailored language and negotiations in the loan documents.

Ideally, the tenant will not be able to activate any self-help or abatement rights without giving the landlord and the lender plenty of notice and opportunity to correct the situation. Moreover, the tenant's self-help and abatement rights should apply to as few of the landlord's obligations as possible. For example, a lease that lets the tenant abate rent for delays in initial construction or for interference with the tenant's network control center is far more palatable than one that allows the tenant to self-help and abate whenever the landlord defaults in any way.

A practical lender may also recognize that a tenant rarely exercises any self-help or abatement rights, particularly if the landlord manages the property in a competent way. Over the whole universe of commercial leasing, the time and attorney fees spent negotiating these provisions probably far exceed their practical value.

[41.17] D. Assignment/Subletting

If a tenant is particularly desirable, the existence and continuation of that tenant may be a substantial element in the lender's approval of the loan, both because of the tenant's creditworthiness backing part of the rent stream and (for a retail lease) because of the traffic and visibility the particular tenant can bring to the property.

In those cases, the lender may care a great deal about whether and under what circumstances the lease allows the tenant to assign or sublet. Typically, even if the lease allows assignment or subletting, a lender will live with it as long as the original tenant remains liable under the lease. On the other hand, a lender might take a harder line, saying that the possibility of an assignment or sublet creates the possibility of an unexpected change in the character and use of the property. It all depends on the circumstances. A lender will often conclude that the borrower's equity cushion provides adequate comfort so the lender doesn't have to worry too much about the risks of assignment and subletting.

Unless a lender has instructed its counsel that special circumstances exist, any lease review should probably answer at most these questions on assignment and subletting under any major lease:

- Assignment/Subletting. Does the lease let the tenant assign or sublet, and if so to what degree and within what constraints? To the extent the lease grants the tenant flexibility, can the lender tolerate that level of flexibility and whatever long-term uncertainty it creates for the landlord and lender?
- Release of Liability? Does the lease contain any language that would allow the original tenant or its guarantor to be released from liability upon an assignment? Any such release from liability amounts to a red flag that counsel should bring to the lender's attention promptly. This issue will be important if the initial lease obligor is creditworthy, and less important or not important at all if that initial obligor has no meaningful credit.¹⁹
- Recapture Rights. Does the landlord have the right to terminate the lease (recapture the space) if the tenant wants to initiate certain types of assignment or subletting? Does the timing work and does the lender want to be involved in these decisions and any related re-leasing decisions? (Many loan documents restrict new leases and any lease amendments. Fewer require lender approval for assignments and subleases that require the borrower's approval.)

¹⁹ Lenders' and landlords' business personnel often seem to think that if the lease says nothing on these issues, then an assignment can terminate the original tenant's liability. As a matter of ordinary contract law, that proposition is just plain wrong. As a practical matter, of course, the original tenant (the assignor) will have no interest in staying in the space so may have little enthusiasm for covering any unpaid rent, and may seek every possible excuse for not doing so. Thus, the existence of an unreleased assignor will not entirely solve the problem for the lender. The lender will still be nervous even if counsel persuades them that a lease assignment, in and of itself, will not terminate anyone's liability.

- Change of Use. Does the lease offer any flexibility for a change of use if the tenant assigns or sublets? Does the flexibility create potential problems for the future economics and attractiveness of the property? Might the lender fear that a permitted change of use could create some intolerable situation from the lender's perspective?

[41.18] E. Termination/Cancellation Rights

If a lease allows the tenant to terminate under any circumstance beyond casualty and condemnation (as discussed above), this will probably create substantial concern for a lender. Here are some examples of termination rights that could concern a lender, or should at least be brought to the lender's attention:

- Sales-Based. Right to terminate for failure to achieve specified level of sales.
- Co-Tenancy. Right to terminate if some other tenant (or group of tenants) is no longer in occupancy, or never enters into occupancy.
- Landlord Default. Termination rights arising from a possible landlord default.²⁰
- General. Unilateral right of the tenant to terminate, even if the tenant must make a payment to the landlord.
- Bad Timing. Tenant right to terminate without giving enough notice for the landlord to find a replacement tenant.

In some types of projects, the lender may just need to live with these termination rights, as tenants typically obtain them. In those cases, the lender will need to assess the likelihood that any termination right will actually arise. If the project is somehow "on the edge," with a higher than normal risk that these rights might activate, the lender might insist on negotiating some backup mechanism to pay for retreating and repositioning should it become necessary. The lender might also mitigate these concerns based on the lender's comfort with the borrower's management skills, and ability to prevent problems. If the lender goes too far down that road, though, it stops being a traditional commercial real estate loan.

[41.19] F. Unreasonable Burdens

A lender will also worry about any lease that imposes unusual and atypical burdens on the landlord. In the short term, such burdens may produce unpredictable adverse effects on cash flow or increase the likelihood of mistakes, issues, or complexity. In the long term, the lender must see itself as a successor landlord, i.e., the most likely owner of the property after any hypothetical foreclosure. In that capacity, the lender will not want to bear obligations that vary dramatically from those of a typical passive landlord receiving a steady stream of real estate income. Any lender's counsel reviewing a lease should therefore look for unusual or burdensome obligations or restrictions affecting the landlord, such as:

- Transfer Restrictions. Beware of prohibitions on transfers by the landlord or by the ultimate owners of equity interests in the landlord. In assessing any such restriction, lender's counsel must ask whether it will significantly impair the lender's exit strategy (including, in the first instance, the lender's ability to conduct a foreclosure sale). In general, both lenders and landlords highly disfavor any restriction on transferability of the landlord's position. Rights of first refusal or first offer represent a particularly tedious and problem-prone variation on transfer restrictions. If possible, a lender would like to see them go away completely after any foreclosure.
- Restrictions on Other Property or Activities. Watch out for anything at all that restricts the landlord's operations, leasing, activities, construction, or use of—or anything else involving—the landlord's property outside the leased premises. Expansion options are the first and most traditional example of such provisions. Other examples would include restrictions on signage, exclusive rights for a particular tenant, restrictions on leasing to particular types of tenants, obligations to maintain particular parking, uses, standards, no-build areas, lines of visibility, circulation pathways, and the like. Strong tenants may even sometimes impose radius clauses on their landlords, prohibiting the landlords and their affiliates from leasing space to competitors in any other properties the landlord or its affiliate owns within the radius area. Any major retail lease will probably restrict at least some landlord flexibility within the same property where the leased premises are located. Lender's counsel should identify these restrictions—know what to look for—and then bring them to the client's attention. The lender must then decide whether they create a problem, for example because they conflict with other leases. To the extent that they merely restate what any reasonable landlord would or would not do in any way to maintain an economically viable property, a lender often won't care. But it is ultimately a decision for the lender to make in the context of the transaction as a whole. And if the landlord obligations relate to real property outside the scope of the lender's collateral, even reasonable provisions can create serious problems. If the lender were to foreclose on this particular property, could it control what happened elsewhere?

- Subtenant Recognition Traps. A substantial lease may allow the tenant to enter into subleases. To facilitate those future subleases, the lease may obligate the landlord to enter into agreements with subtenants (“recognition agreements” or “nondisturbance agreements”) by which the landlord agrees that if the landlord-tenant lease ever terminates, then the landlord will recognize the subtenant as a direct tenant. A tenant's and a subtenant's desire to obtain recognition agreements from the landlord makes perfect sense. But a landlord—and hence a lender—must remember that these agreements could force the landlord to become a direct landlord under whatever sublease the tenant negotiates. Therefore, before a landlord agrees to enter into recognition agreements with any subtenant, the landlord must know that the terms of the sublease will be tolerable to the landlord. One can develop scores of criteria to define what would be tolerable, but ultimately the lender may insist on having the right to reasonably approve any sublease before the subtenant is entitled to any protection.
- Unusual Obligations. Does the lease impose on the landlord any obligations that are difficult to perform, not capable of being quantified, or outside the scope of typical landlord obligations under a lease? As an example, a lender may be concerned if a lease allows the tenant to require future upgrades to building systems without defining what those upgrades are. Obligations to provide building security may also create concern.

[41.20] G. Options and Preemptive Rights

Although expansion and renewal options in and of themselves do not typically cause great concern, they can create serious problems if they are: (1) significantly below market; (2) conflicting; (3) on uncertain terms; or (4) scheduled in a way that denies the landlord sufficient time to find a replacement tenant if the tenant does not exercise an option. Any landlord also should consider how the options interact with the possibility that landlord might recover possession of leased space before the scheduled expiration date of an existing lease.

For a substantial property, parsing out the options and how they might interact over time can be a very large and difficult project, which someone else can do or has probably done, but whose work will still require checking. If the leases suggest the need for such an exercise, lender's counsel should try to recognize the possible problem as early as possible, and determine how to proceed. Counsel will typically want to advise the lender to insist on a complete analysis of all the options, to confirm that none potentially conflict under any circumstance.

Any purchase option, or even a right of first refusal or first offer to purchase, should raise an immediate red flag. Such options are very atypical in space leases, even the largest space leases, and can and should create substantial concern for a mortgage lender and its counsel. At a minimum, a lender will insist that they not apply to a foreclosure (or substitute) transfer, and no longer apply to any post-foreclosure owner.

[41.21] H. Exculpation

Does the lease say that, no matter what, the landlord's liability will always be limited to its interest in the premises? Any landlord and any lender will always want to see such a provision, although a lender that really wants to make a particular loan can usually figure out a way to live without such language. The lender can, after all, probably send a suitable subsidiary to bid at the foreclosure sale and take title to the asset if the need arises. That way, the lender may be able to get comfortable with the lack of an exculpation clause, although a conservative lender may worry about the risk of forgetting about the problem and taking title in its own name. Substantial institutional lenders have been known to make mistakes like this, at great expense.

[41.22] I. Protection on Alterations and Contest

Many leases give a tenant some flexibility in two areas that can produce direct economic loss to the landlord: alterations and the tenant's right to challenge the validity of legal requirements that apply to the building.

In the case of alterations, if the tenant does not pay for any construction work, the unpaid contractors and other parties may have the right to file a mechanic's lien. In some states, that lien attaches to both the tenant's leasehold and sometimes even the landlord's fee estate. In the worst case, a mechanic's lien may sometimes even obtain priority over the lender's mortgage. The landlord and sometimes even the lender may therefore find it needs to pay the tenant's construction bills to protect itself from a foreclosure under the mechanic's lien.

Similarly, if the lease allows the tenant to contest the application of particular legal requirements, the landlord and lender may find themselves stuck with the adverse consequences if the tenant's contest fails and the tenant chooses not to, or cannot, comply with the legal requirements as finally determined.

A landlord may mitigate each of these risks by requiring the tenant to post a bond if the lien or amount at issue in a legal contest exceeds a certain level, depending on the size of the lease and the landlord's comfort with the tenant. A lender will have similar concerns, but often more strongly felt than the landlord's. A landlord may be willing to waive any requirement for bonds, in the interest of getting the deal done, but a lender may not want to be as flexible and accommodating.

Therefore, if a lease does not require the tenant to post bonds under the circumstances described here, counsel will probably want to bring the issue to the lender's attention, so the lender can decide whether it creates a serious problem.

[41.23] J. Concessions to Creditworthy Tenants

Leases with unusually creditworthy tenants—such as a chain store that has not yet filed bankruptcy or has completed its latest round through bankruptcy and has not yet started to consider the next one—will often contain concessions to the tenant premised on the assumption that the tenant is creditworthy. For example, tenants of this type will often not be required to post bonds of the type suggested in the preceding section, because the landlord believes the tenant's credit is good enough to eliminate any need for bonds. The landlord may also dispense with a security deposit, loosen the "use" clause, agree to significant restrictions outside the leased premises, give the tenant extra flexibility on its activities in the space, and so on, all premised on the notion that the tenant is creditworthy and therefore these concessions make sense to "get the deal."

What happens though, if during the long life of the lease the premise for all these concessions turns out to be wrong? To the extent that the lease contains concessions to the tenant based on that tenant's credit quality, the landlord (and particularly the lender) may want those concessions to go away if the tenant's credit quality goes away. Any such concession clawback provisions are quite unusual, but recent history—particularly with chain retailers once regarded as having impeccable credit—demonstrates that such clawbacks may become quite important and relevant.

To the extent that (1) a lender is uncomfortable with any tenant-oriented concessions based on the assumption that the tenant is creditworthy; but (2) the lease does not provide for a "concession clawback" if the tenant becomes less creditworthy, a lender may regard that fact as a serious problem with the lease. It might also not care, or decide it can live with the risk. But this issue represents a business decision that cannot be made unless counsel identifies and raises it in the lease review process.

[41.24] VI. LENDER PROTECTION ISSUES

For most of the issues discussed so far in this chapter, the concerns of the borrower (landlord) and the lender (possible future landlord or seller to the next landlord) are quite similar. Both share each of these concerns, although a lender may care more than a borrower because of the lender's more conservative and downside orientation.

For another category of issues, though, a landlord or borrower will probably have no direct interest at all. Instead, the landlord or borrower will only have an indirect interest in making sure that a lender—today's or tomorrow's—will not object to the lease.

The issues in this latter category relate to the relationship between the tenant and the lender, and the effect of a loan default or other possible problems with the mortgaged property. Any lease review project may need to consider these issues, though their importance will vary depending primarily on the size and importance of the lease, as well as other circumstances.

[41.25] A. Estoppel Certificates

Does the lease require the tenant to provide estoppel certificates, i.e., certificates confirming the continued existence and status of the lease, that the tenant has no claims against the landlord, and similar matters? Does the lease establish any burdensome restrictions or limits on the landlord's right to obtain estoppel certificates? A lender will want the tenant to be unambiguously obligated to deliver an estoppel certificate for today's closing, as well as for any future closing. And the lender will be uncomfortable to the extent that anything in the estoppel certificate might limit the lender's (or a future lender's) ability to rely on it.

[41.26] B. Priorities

In a lender's perfect world, the lease will simply say that it is subordinate to all mortgages, with nothing more said. But leases with substantial tenants rarely contain such a provision. Instead, subordination will at a minimum be conditioned on the lender's entering into a nondisturbance agreement. These agreements and this relationship create a host of issues.²¹ For a typical lease review, lender's counsel just needs to make sure its client understands what the lease says about this issue. Specifically, the lender needs to know the answers to these questions:

- Subordination. Does the lease say it is subordinate to mortgages?
- Nondisturbance. If so, is subordination of the lease nevertheless conditioned on the lender's delivering a nondisturbance agreement?
- Conditions. What must that nondisturbance agreement say? Will this lender or a hypothetical future refinancing lender be willing and able to satisfy those requirements? Does the lease define the form of the nondisturbance agreement, and will a lender tolerate it? Can the landlord satisfy its nondisturbance obligations by providing whatever form of nondisturbance agreement a future lender might require?

A lender would prefer to see any subordination clause be as simple and straightforward as possible, with no need for the lender or landlord to remember to do anything at all. If the lease conditions subordination on the lender's entering into a nondisturbance agreement, then lender's counsel should note this fact, and the necessary agreement must then be entered into as part of the closing, another example of how the lease review process can drive closing requirements and why it helps to identify those requirements early in the process.

21 Other chapters of this book address nondisturbance issues and the issues they raise. Ordinarily, these issues and the related negotiations probably attract more attention than they merit, but once in a while nondisturbance really makes a difference.

If the lease requires a nondisturbance agreement that the tenant gets to approve, a careful lender's counsel will assume that the tenant will never approve the agreement, and therefore the subordination will never become effective. When a lease contains such a requirement, lender's counsel should regard it as a red flag that requires immediate attention. For a major tenant, the lender will probably want to resolve any such uncertainty at the time of the closing, as a condition to making the loan. Whatever resolution the parties craft, it should apply not only to today's loan closing but also to any future loan closing.

A lender may decide that it wants to use its own form of nondisturbance agreement, rather than any form of nondisturbance agreement required by any particular lease. For a large building with many tenants, a lender may decide that it is just more efficient to use its own form rather than create a tailored document for each tenant based on its lease. Especially in the case of large tenants, the lender should be prepared to negotiate the required nondisturbance terms and conditions into the lender's form. Of course, a lender's willingness to tolerate these terms may depend on the tenant's size and remaining lease term, and how badly the lender wants to make the loan. Lenders with a very low tolerance for any negotiation of a nondisturbance agreement might be willing to close without entering into such an agreement with tenants it deems immaterial to the real estate's value. This is especially true where a building is primarily leased to a single marquee tenant and the lender doesn't much care about the rest of the tenant base.

[41.27] C. Attornment

Does the lease require the tenant to attorn to anyone who purchases the property at a foreclosure sale, i.e., accept that person as the tenant's new landlord? In most cases, one assumes this new landlord would be the lender or its designee. What conditions and limitations apply to that attornment? Does the lease negate any possibility that a foreclosure sale might terminate the lease and with it the tenant's obligations to the foreclosed-out landlord or any subsequent landlord?

[41.28] D. Cure Rights

If the landlord ever defaults under the lease, particularly in a way that might entitle the tenant to terminate, a lender might want the right to receive notice of the default and to try to correct the situation. For that purpose, a lender might want some additional time, beyond whatever time the lease gives the landlord. Provisions of this sort are particularly important for leases with major tenants. Even there, though, they will usually give the lender only a fairly limited additional cure period—far from the degree of additional protection that a lender would expect to see in, for example, the leasehold mortgagee protections in a ground lease. In the author's experience, leases will often give a lender at most 30 extra days to cure the landlord's default, and very rarely much more time beyond that. In negotiating a subordination and nondisturbance agreement the lender will probably seek a longer cure period than whatever the lease provides. Unlike the case in a ground lease, though, a possible termination of a space lease would not deprive lender of its entire collateral—just some part of the rental income.²² And it is not reasonable to expect the tenant to wait around for very long while the lender tries to cure the landlord's default. The tenant needs to be able to operate a business in the leased premises. So, although a lender will often want a right to cure the landlord's default, the cure right may ultimately not be all that extensive. Whatever it is, lender's counsel should note it as part of the lease review.²³

[41.29] E. Direct Rent Payment

If the loan goes into default, a lender may obtain the appointment of a receiver to collect rental income from the property. A lender may, however, seek an extra level of flexibility long before that, by having the right to require the tenants to pay rent directly to the lender after a loan default, even if the lender has not yet obtained a receiver. In a lender's perfect world, the lease would contain provisions to this effect, so that the lender (and the borrower) would not need to obtain a separate agreement with the tenant. More typically, however, separate agreements of this type are required. The issue remains one that counsel may want to look for and mention in any lease review, particularly for a major lease.

22 One could argue that the lender's exposure is even less, at least if the lease is at market and the borrower could readily replace the tenant. Still, there will be a cost and delay.

23 As a practical matter, notice and cure rights are rather overrated, as few lenders will actually have any interest in curing defaults. They serve more as an early warning and monitoring device.

[41.30] F. Conditions to Lender Protections

To the extent that the lease builds in protections for a lender of the types suggested in this section, lender's counsel will want to scrutinize those protections to understand what conditions the lender must meet in order for these protections to be activated. For example, if the lease requires the tenant to receive notice before the lender will qualify for a particular protection, the lender will not want to rely on the landlord to remember to give that notice. Instead, the lender's counsel should update the closing checklist to include the notice to the tenant, and the lender and its counsel should make sure the notice is given. It represents yet another example of how lease review can drive closing documentation.

[41.31] G. One Last Category of Issues

In addition to all the lease-related issues this chapter specifically covers, a lender and its counsel should watch for any provisions in the leases that seem unusual or weird—anything that might create out-of-the-ordinary issues or problems. These provisions might include unusual tenant rights, unusual conditions to the tenant's obligations, evidence of a past dispute that may still fester, uncertainty about either party's obligations, evidence of possible zoning problems or disputes, unusual limitations on the landlord's remedies, or anything else that could undercut what the lender wants to see in the lease, as summarized earlier in this chapter. To identify anything of this type, whoever reviews the lease needs to avoid wearing blinders; instead, they should generally pay attention and keep their eyes open for unusual provisions beyond those discussed in this chapter.

MODEL LEASE REVIEW CHECKLIST

Description. This Model Document is a lease review checklist, written from a lender’s perspective. It seeks to distill the highlights and most common problems that might appear in any commercial space lease. Any lease review checklist can be as long or as short as one might wish. That’s because leases raise an endless array of issues—anything that could affect the leased space or the building over the next many years. This checklist draws a line toward the “shorter” end of the spectrum.

For thoughts on how to use this checklist, please see chapter 44 on how a lender reviews a lease. There is much more to a lease review than filling out a checklist.

This model lease review checklist starts with a blank form, followed by a sample form filled out for a hypothetical (but unlikely) sample lease.

[NOTE: The following is a sample of how one could fill out—and slightly modify—the issues grid for a specific anchor lease.]

The following is a brief summary of some major or noteworthy terms of the proposed Ultimate Electronics lease for Arcadia Crossing. Overall, this lease is within the normal range of “anchor tenant” leases, although it appears to be closer to the “tenant-oriented” side of the spectrum. It is not, however, as tenant-oriented as a typical Home Depot lease.

Item	Summary
Prepared By Date Prepared
Premises	42,000 square feet
Term	15 years, 3 months. Two 5-year options. Whether or not Tenant exercises any 5-year option(s), Tenant also has a 6-month option.
Commencement Date or Remaining Conditions	Earliest of July 1, 2015 or 150 days after building permit or Tenant’s opening for business. Either party can terminate if Commencement Date has not occurred a year after signing. (Timing may not work, given the July 1, 2015, alternative in defining Commencement Date.)
Delivery of Premises	January 4, 2015. For every day delay thereafter, 2 days free rent. After 30 days, Tenant can terminate.

MODEL LEASE REVIEW CHECKLIST

Item	Summary
Base Rent	$37,625/mo ($10.75/ft) for first 5 years, increasing by 10% starting year 6 and year 11. If Tenant obtains a judgment against Landlord, may offset up to 50% of base rent. If Tenant extends, then Base Rent rises to $50,955/mo. ($14.57/ft) starting year 16, then $61,180/mo. ($17.48/ft) starting year 21. If Tenant exercises its six-month renewal option, Base Rent rises by 10%.
Percentage Rent	None in most cases, but Tenant must report Gross Sales.
Escalations/Pass-Throughs	Tenant contributes its share, based on floor area, toward CAM (plus 10% overhead fee), insurance, utilities, and real estate taxes (excluding future special assessments). Tenant does not contribute to merchants' association.
Buildout	Landlord contributes $10/ft upon substantial completion.
Security Deposit	None
Use; CC&R Issues	Electronics, office equipment, computers, etc. Existing CC&Rs prohibit this use. Landlord has 60 days to obtain a CC&R amendment, or Tenant can terminate and recover up to $100,000 of its costs. What happened?
Exclusive	Retail and wholesale sale, distribution, installation and repair of televisions, video, home audio, mobile electronic equipment. If Landlord violates, Tenant's rent shifts to 2% of sales, but no termination rights for either party.

Item	Summary
Covenant to Operate	Tenant must open and must then operate for at least 5 days. Thereafter, if Tenant closes for 60 days and does not reopen within 60 days after notice (at any time) from Landlord, Landlord can terminate.
Radius Clause	Tenant cannot compete with itself within 2.5 miles in first 5 years.
Tenant Termination Right	In year 5 , if Tenant's sales are less than 90% of comparable stores in the chain, Tenant can terminate by paying $150,000.
Landlord Obligations	Landlord is responsible for latent defects for six months. Landlord must preserve specified access routes. Landlord must maintain and operate shopping center to a standard of similar properties. Abatement and termination rights if Landlord fails to perform, after cure periods.
Premises Maintenance and Repair	Landlord maintains shell and structure. Landlord warrants existing HVAC for 12 months from delivery of possession. Tenant maintains interior, tenant improvements, and building systems. If Tenant replaces any building systems during the last 3 years, Landlord must contribute based on relative useful life remaining after the term (but useful life is capped at 5 years).
Alterations	No requirement for Tenant to post a bond , even if Tenant's credit deteriorates.

MODEL LEASE REVIEW CHECKLIST

Item	Summary
Insurance	Tenant provides liability coverage of $3,000,000. Landlord can require increase per reasonable and customary practices for similar property. Tenant covenants to maintain its own casualty insurance (but no certificates, etc., for Landlord).
Off-Premises Restrictions	Lease restricts Landlord's expansion. Cannot evaluate without site plan, but the restrictions would appear to be of a type generally consistent with similar leases.
Casualty	Landlord must restore structure, but can terminate if work would take more than 120 days. If Tenant does not restore within a year, Tenant can give notice. If Landlord still has not restored after 90 days, Tenant can terminate. Rent abates to the extent Tenant cannot use the space.
Condemnation	First, Landlord receives up to $420,000 for unamortized contribution to buildout. Second, Tenant receives its unamortized buildout cost. Third, to Landlord.
Transfer of Lease	Landlord cannot unreasonably withhold, but may recapture. Tenant receives all net profit from sale of lease, but not from sale of business (a dispute waiting to happen). No release of Tenant upon assignment. Tenant may mortgage its lease and personalty (initially to XYZ).
Miscellaneous	Mutual obligation to reimburse attorney fees, if dispute arises.

Item	Summary
SNDA	Standard, with minimum tenant negotiations. Tenant can abate all rent until Landlord delivers initial SNDA. (Although such a clause is inadvisable from a Landlord's perspective, it does not cause great concern to a mortgagee, assuming (a) mortgagee can accomplish the SNDA without borrower help; or (b) only one mortgage.)

If you have any questions about this summary or the lease itself, please give us a call. In the meantime, assuming the Lease meets with your approval as a “business” matter, we see no reason to disapprove it as a legal matter, although it should be confirmed that the final lease tracks the draft.

Thank you and best regards.

[43.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Estoppel certificates are unusual and misused instruments. They start out being considered unimportant lease boilerplate during lease negotiations, progress to being critical documents immediately before a sale or financing, yet thereafter are ignored completely. Most leases contain an obligation by the tenant (and frequently by the landlord) to deliver an estoppel certificate within a specified period of time, certifying to the other party as to certain matters relating to the lease. Only in the context of leases are estoppel certificates critical documents. Further, lenders and purchasers frequently try to use them for purposes for which they were not intended.

Almost all important encumbrances on title are disclosed by the public record. A lender or purchaser can easily learn the amount of judgments, the size of mortgages, and the amounts claimed by mechanic's lienors. This is not so with leases. In most jurisdictions, a tenant, by having possession of premises, puts the world on notice as to the existence of all of its rights, whatever those rights may be. Moreover, a tenant is generally not required, absent a contractual obligation to do so, to disclose to anyone the nature and extent of its rights and obligations and a variety of facts relating to the lease.

Thus, the importance of the estoppel certificate becomes apparent. The definition of what constitutes the "lease agreement" is in a state of constant flux. Because the terms of a lease are not generally reflected on the public record, leases are frequently amended, and the landlord/tenant relationship is constantly "under construction." This explains the critical need for a lender or purchaser to confirm the lease's status—particularly with respect to a claim or defense of the tenant that cannot be independently identified by looking at the lease. Despite all of this, landlords themselves rarely use estoppel certificates to confirm the status of their leases. The tenant should request an estoppel certificate from the landlord at the time of lease negotiations as it may be helpful and necessary if the tenant later wants to assign its lease, either in the context of a real estate transaction or in a corporate transaction affecting the tenant and its assets.

Although the goal of any estoppel certificate is to "estop" a tenant from asserting claims inconsistent with the certificate, the tenant's mere signing of an estoppel certificate will not necessarily achieve that desired result.¹ The doctrine of estoppel is grounded in common-law principles of equity.² Before any party can claim an “estoppel” against another, that party (here the lender or purchaser) must be able to prove the following elements:³

- (i) lack of knowledge of the facts in question;
- (ii) lack of any means of obtaining such knowledge;
- (iii) reliance on the words or conduct of the party to be estopped;
- (iv) reasonableness and good faith in so relying; and
- (v) action, based on such reliance, resulting in a prejudicial change to the party’s position.

Estoppel is an equitable principle. Accordingly, the party seeking its benefit must be innocent and must act in good faith. A party cannot assert estoppel in good faith where it is charged with actual knowledge of the matters in the estoppel certificate.⁴ In some jurisdictions, ignorance of the truth of the matter in question is good enough to allow enforcement of an equitable estoppel.⁵ Other courts, though, will require the party relying on the estoppel certificate to exercise some degree of due diligence, reasonable care, and circumspection in ascertaining the underlying facts.⁶ Furthermore, a party that has been placed on “inquiry notice” as to the truth of the matter in question or who had the means and opportunity to discern the truth generally cannot assert an estoppel. Similarly, where both parties are equally informed of the matters at hand and have equal means of obtaining the necessary knowledge, an estoppel will not be given effect, and if the party seeking the estoppel has obtained knowledge that reveals information contrary to that stated in the estoppel certificate, reasonable reliance cannot be established.⁷

A party trying to claim estoppel also must experience a material and detrimental change in its position or status from that which it would otherwise have occupied and the alleged detriment or injury must arise from the denial of the estoppel.⁸ In other words, the court needs to conclude that an injury will result if the other party is not estopped from denying the truth of the statement previously made in the certificate.

This chapter will discuss the elements of, and the obligation to provide, an estoppel certificate; the effectiveness of estoppel certificates in achieving an actual estoppel; and some common problems and pitfalls practitioners encounter in negotiating, executing, and enforcing estoppel certificates in leasing transactions. It is important that the tenant understand that the request for execution and delivery of an estoppel certificate has potential legal and business implications and should be reviewed by in-house or outside counsel.

[43.1] II. ELEMENTS OF AN ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE

Estoppel certificates generally contain the following elements, some of which are more commonly encountered than others:

[43.2] A. Identification of the Lease and All Amendments and Related Documents

By identifying all documents that constitute the “lease agreement” package, the party receiving the estoppel certificate can satisfy itself that it has received and reviewed all relevant lease documents. Often a form of estoppel certificate will say that a true and correct copy of the lease is attached for purposes of identification. In other instances, parties do not attach such documents, partly because it can become unwieldy to do so.⁹ Nevertheless, attaching the full lease document is good practice, and could serve to raise any dormant disagreements that may exist between the parties regarding the status of the lease.¹⁰

The party delivering the certificate must be careful to confirm that all amendments and ancillary documents that could modify the lease are mentioned in the estoppel certificate. Documents that could potentially be included in defining the “lease agreement” include: commencement date agreements; alteration agreements and consents; the exercise (or waiver) of options; consents to prior assignments and sublettings; settlement agreements regarding disputes under the lease; subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment agreements; memoranda of lease; recognition agreements with ground lessors; change of address notices; material correspondence; and even prior estoppel certificates. Rarely, though, do the parties adequately consider such ancillary documents in defining the “lease package.”

In any sale transaction, purchaser’s counsel will want an estoppel certificate to cover as many issues and be as broad as possible. Seller’s counsel will want to keep things simple and will try to strictly construe the “lease package” to include only the lease and formal amendments. If all the potential lease documents described above are included in the “lease package,” a tenant may find it difficult to confirm documents it may have misplaced. When negotiating an obligation to deliver estoppel certificates from tenants, seller's counsel must be aware of the terms of the estoppel provisions in the existing leases. A tenant can only be required to give the information that its particular lease requires it to provide. Similarly, the seller can only agree to provide to the purchaser information that is set forth in the estoppel provisions of its existing leases with the tenants. It is therefore important when representing a landlord that the direct lease contemplate that a tenant be required to provide such further information as a lender or purchaser reasonably may request.

[43.3] B. Confirmation of Factual Matters Not Documented Within the Lease Itself

Once the lease document is defined, the next most important job the certificate performs is to require the party giving the estoppel to confirm (or in some cases, to establish) that certain elements of the landlord/tenant relationship that cannot be confirmed by reviewing the documents have occurred or, conversely, do not exist. These may include:

(A) setting forth key lease dates, such as the commencement date, the rent commencement date, and the expiration date, at least where these dates are not certain but depend upon the occurrence of certain events;

(B) determining that contingencies or conditions precedent referred to in the lease have been satisfied;

(C) confirming satisfactory performance by the landlord of any required work (or, if not, what loose ends remain), the payment of monies owed by the landlord to the tenant in connection with the initial construction or build-out of the premises, and the taking of occupancy of the premises by the tenant;¹¹

(D) confirming the current escalated rent where it cannot be determined within the four corners of the lease; and

(E) establishing whether any default exists. This can be worded in various ways relating to whether a present default exists and whether ¹¹ The request by landlord for its mortgagee or prospective purchaser to certify any amounts under a work allowance that are overdue, or whether other disputes exist that may cause unpaid amounts to be paid to tenant or disputes resolved so that landlord can obtain a clean estoppel certificate from the tenant. At a minimum, noting that a dispute exists when returning the estoppel certificate may preserve rights the tenant may want to litigate and arbitrate in the future, which rights might be prejudiced in the absence of some mention of the dispute.

notice has been given. Frequently this fact is confirmed only to the best of the knowledge of the signer, having made no specific inquiry. As a practical matter, such a qualification should be acceptable to the recipient as experienced counsel and its client know it is a true statement.

[43.4] C. Confirmation of Independent Facts Relating to the Tenant

Often a landlord (or purchaser or lender) may want to know about facts outside of the lease itself which affect the ability of the tenant to continue to perform its obligations under the lease. These could include:

(A) the financial condition of the tenant or guarantor delivering the certificate and its solvency;

(B) whether such party is involved in any litigation that could adversely affect its ability to perform;

(C) such party's net worth, especially where there is a net worth threshold for obligations under the lease such as posting security, delivering bonds for construction, or obtaining a release of liability upon an assignment; and

(D) composition of the ownership of such party, especially where the lease has been assigned or where the premises is sublet from a related party where there is an obligation that such relationship continue.

Frequently, the obligation of a party to certify as to any of the above matters may be outside the scope of the required certificate called for under the lease. Even if some of the information described above is contemplated by the lease, any tenant agreeing to provide sensitive or confidential information, should condition such obligation upon receiving a confidentiality agreement in form satisfactory to it. In such an instance, the tenant would be within its rights to refuse to provide any such information or confirmation.

[43.5] D. Confirmation of Matters Set Forth in the Lease

Many estoppel certificates repeat detailed information that is clearly set forth in the lease such as the rent, the premises, and key dates. For a lender or purchaser, it is often easier to verify lease information set forth in an offering memorandum, loan application, rent roll, or contract of sale by checking estoppel certificates rather than the leases themselves. To the extent that the information in the estoppel certificate matches the lease, no one is prejudiced and, indeed, the review process may be made simpler. But what if there are major discrepancies?¹² What if the tenant certified that it did not have a renewal option when it did?¹³ Would not the lease, rather than the estoppel certificate, govern in the event of a conflict since the lease constitutes the best evidence? Could the party receiving the certificate truly say that it relied upon the facts in the estoppel certificate?

[43.6] E. Attempts to Modify the Lease by the Landlord or, More Often, Its Lender

A lender will often try to use estoppel certificates to impose upon the tenant new and independent duties to the lender.¹⁴ These either (a) obligate the tenant to attorn to a lender or recognize an exercise of an assignment of rents to the lender or (b) grant the lender additional rights and time to perform in the event of the landlord's failure to perform. The purpose of these changes is to give the lender the benefits of a subordination and attornment agreement without having to grant the tenant nondisturbance protections.

Usually these are rights that a landlord could have anticipated and provided for in the initial lease. Had they been included in the original lease, they probably would have been acceptable to the tenant. But they were not. If it arises only in the estoppel certificate, does the obligation of the tenant to the lender continue to have a life of its own? If the landlord and the tenant amend the lease and ratify it without referring to the estoppel certificate, do the obligations undertaken for the benefit of the lender go away? If the tenant forgets about the estoppel certificate, does it have liability to the lender (or might its purported termination even be ineffective) if the tenant later terminates the lease because of the landlord's default without giving notice and a cure right to the lender? The better practice in these cases would be to amend the lease to add these rights and provide that it may not be further amended without the lender's consent except for ministerial amendments or amendments required to reflect the exercise of rights under the lease. The lender should not be able to prohibit these types of amendments. To amend the lease, though, the tenant must be willing to do so and may demand some consideration. Another possibility would be to accept the lender's concept if it splits the request into one for a separate estoppel certificate and one for a subordination, non-disturbance and attornment agreement (given that the latter agreement would provide the non-disturbance protection that lender had been trying to avoid by its request only for an estoppel certificate).

12 See id. (citing Travelers Ins. Co. v. Liljeberg Enters., Inc., 799 F. Supp. 641, 645 (E.D. La. 1992) (lease termination date changed from 10 years to 7 years after commencement based on ambiguous estoppel certificate)).

13 See Miner supra note 1 (where tenant failed to fill in blank for renewal rights, ambiguity between the lease and the estoppel certificate should be construed against the drafter of the lease and estoppel, here, the landlord's, predecessor); but see Plaza, supra note 1.

14 See generally Segal & Segal, supra note 9.

[43.7] III. OBLIGATION TO DELIVER ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE

Normally, a lease specifically sets forth what information may be required in the estoppel certificate. Some leases include a form of estoppel certificate as an exhibit to the original lease. Frequently there is an omnibus clause at the end of the lease provision covering estoppel certificates, which enables either the landlord or the lender to obtain such additional information as such party may reasonably request. This generally is intended to ensure that novel requirements of future lenders or purchasers can be satisfied.

Absent an express obligation to give an estoppel certificate, a tenant is not obligated to execute or deliver one.¹⁵ But a purchaser that acquires property accepts title subject to any and all rights that the tenant may have. For example, a tenant in occupancy might hold an unrecorded lease that includes an option to acquire the property. Such option will take priority over a subsequent lien, purchaser, or new lease with a new tenant. Therefore, absent delivery of an estoppel certificate, a purchaser of property has no assurance as to the rights of a tenant. Of course, a seller can represent as to the tenant's rights but such representations, if given, typically lapse after a stated survival period and might not be backed by meaningful credit.

Well-negotiated leases will also require the landlord to deliver its estoppel certificate upon the tenant's request. This is an especially useful tool which may be essential for the tenant in the event of an assignment or sublease or upon a sale of its assets.

¹⁵ In fact, some take the position that even if the tenant is contractually obligated to deliver an estoppel certificate, a landlord faced with a tenant's refusal to do so does not have an appropriate remedy. See John L. Opar, Estoppel Certificates: Handle With Care, N.Y.L.J., Sept. 19, 2005, p. 9, col. 4.

Attorneys representing purchasers not only negotiate what is included in the estoppel certificate, but they also negotiate the percentage of the tenants required to provide estoppel certificates, because generally it is very difficult to get all the tenants in a building to deliver estoppel certificates. The percentage can be based on a required aggregate square footage of the leases in the building, a specified percentage of tenants, or both. If less than all the tenants sign estoppel certificates, the seller/landlord may be required to give a seller's or landlord's estoppel certificate (more accurately, warranty certificate) upon which the purchaser can rely for a specified period to cover the leases for which estoppel certificates are not obtained, or until such estoppel certificates are obtained.

[43.8] IV. IS AN ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE EFFECTIVE?

Despite the importance and potential value of an estoppel certificate, it is a document that landlords generally do not require to be delivered in the ordinary course of business. While sophisticated landlords will go to the trouble and expense of having annual financial statements prepared and lenders will require their borrowers to submit financial information regarding their properties on a recurring basis, landlords, for the most part, do not require tenants to deliver estoppel certificates on any regular basis. Why is this? Probably the main reason is that landlords do not want to invest the effort necessary to obtain estoppel certificates. Landlords inadvertently may be making a good business judgment given the certificate would not “estop” a tenant from asserting a claim different than as set forth in the estoppel certificate unless the landlord relied upon it. Even if the estoppel certificate purports to (and does) amend the terms of the lease for the benefit of a new landlord or a lender, it is rarely thereafter treated as a “lease document” in defining what constitutes the lease (even if the lease is subsequently amended).¹⁶

Perhaps a mutual estoppel certificate between the landlord and the tenant would constitute adequate consideration and obviate the need for reliance upon the principle of estoppel. But, alas, it is often much easier for a landlord to point to the provision in the lease that requires the tenant to provide an estoppel certificate than to concede anything to the tenant. Perhaps lease drafters can solve the “detrimental reliance” problem by adding language to the lease to eliminate the problem. And perhaps not.

¹⁶ But see Miner, supra note 1, at 179.

Thus, unless the tenant could in fact be estopped, it may be argued that estoppel certificates are of fleeting relevance or importance. Nevertheless, in those few instances where there is a major discrepancy between a matter asserted in the estoppel certificate and a subsequent claim by a tenant, the estoppel certificate can be of great importance. Issues raised in estoppel certificates appear, however, to be rarely litigated.¹⁷

[43.9] V. PROBLEMS AND PITFALLS

Each party to a leasing transaction, from the tenant to the landlord to the lender, encounters various pitfalls and concerns in creating the most favorable and effective estoppel certificate. As discussed above, reliance is an essential element for the effectiveness of an estoppel certificate. However, estoppel certificates are frequently treated as post-closing items and a party receiving the benefit of an estoppel certificate cannot say it relied upon the estoppel certificate in acquiring the property or making a loan if the estoppel certificate is delivered after the closing of the acquisition or the loan. Additionally, an estoppel certificate should state that it is made as of a specific date and exactly who may rely upon it, so if a party is not an intended beneficiary, it would have no right to so rely.¹⁸

To a tenant, estoppel certificates are fraught with peril. Tenants often sign them without advice of counsel, sometimes without careful (or even any) thought or review. Commonly, they also are utilized as a “back door amendment” of the lease to create duties and obligations to lenders and other strangers. Similarly, language in an estoppel stating the tenant is delivering an estoppel to induce a lender to make its loan should be deleted.

To a landlord, estoppel certificates can be troublesome. For a closing, a landlord must play “middleman” between a tenant and a new purchaser or a lender that requires the tenant to sign a particular form of estoppel certificate. Even when a landlord obtains an estoppel certificate for its own benefit, the landlord may not be able to derive benefit from the estoppel certificate because it cannot show reliance. Whenever a lease attaches consequences to possible future facts relating to the tenant, landlord’s counsel negotiating that lease should think about how the landlord—and its possible lender and possible purchaser—will be able to monitor and stay fully informed about those future facts. It is a concern that landlord’s counsel should raise whenever the parties negotiate provisions of this type, and take into account when tailoring the estoppel certificate requirements in the lease.

¹⁷ See Opar, supra note 15.

¹⁸ Cf. Santaro, supra note 1 (estoppel certificate not enforced in landlord’s favor, in part because certificate was addressed to a third party and not to landlord).

It is typical that landlord's counsel will want the ability to obtain a tenant estoppel within a relatively short period of time. The lease may provide that if tenant does not respond in a timely manner, landlord may sign the estoppel as attorney-in-fact for tenant or tenant's failure to timely provide an estoppel is a default under the lease. This solution will likely be limited to any recourse the potential purchaser or lender can negotiate from the seller, as it is likely the tenant will be able to avoid being estopped with respect to such matters.¹⁹

[43.10] VI. CONCLUSION

Estoppel certificates are neglected progeny of leases.²⁰ Their enforceability relies upon basic principles of equity rather than principles of contract law that require the giving of consideration. As such, they are often misused because they seek to do more than they were intended to do and are often utilized in situations where reliance upon them is inappropriate. If practitioners better understood how, when, and to what extent estoppel certificates can effectively be relied upon, they would be easier to negotiate and might add more value for everyone involved.

19 See Shaffer, supra note 2 (citing Hunt v. Rousmainier's Adm'rs, 21 U.S. 174, 201-03 (1823)). Shaffer advises against lenders and purchasers relying on such estoppel certificates for these reasons.

CHAPTER FORTY-FOUR

MODEL TENANT ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE

Joshua Stein, Esq.

Whenever a commercial real estate Lender accepts a mortgage on income-producing real property, the Lender knows that the Leases of the property will deliver the cash flow that should enable the Borrower to pay the loan. The Leases really matter. Without the Leases, the Borrower may find itself unable to pay the loan, unless the Borrower's principals decide to dip into their pockets—something the Lender needs to assume will never happen. Therefore, every commercial mortgage lender will want to know that: (a) the Leases the Lender has reviewed accurately reflect “the deal” between the Borrower and its Tenants; (b) the Tenants are happily paying their rent without major issues; and (c) the Leases and the Tenants will not produce unpleasant surprises after the closing based on problems that existed when the closing occurred.¹ A Purchaser of the same type of real estate will have similar concerns.

For a typical commercial mortgage loan closing, whether for an acquisition loan or a refinancing, the Lender or Purchaser obtains the comfort it needs by insisting that the Borrower (or Seller, in the case of a purchase and sale) obtain estoppel certificates from Tenants. In these certificates, the Tenants confirm certain facts about their Leases that give comfort to the Lender or Purchaser to help close the loan or purchase.

In preparing to close any commercial mortgage loan, a Borrower and a Lender may negotiate (or play a game of “chicken”) regarding exactly how many estoppel certificates the Borrower must deliver, and from which Tenants. A Lender's requirements and expectations will vary, but a Lender will typically want estoppel certificates from all the “major” Tenants and enough other Tenants to cover some high percentage of the total square footage of the property. That percentage will typically be at least 5% to 10% above the loan-to-value ratio of the loan, although it is entirely a matter of the particular Lender's tastes and the circumstances of each particular loan.

The following model document consists of a tenant estoppel certificate, suitable for use in any commercial real estate financing transaction with existing tenancies (i.e., almost all such transactions). This document is prepared from the perspective of the Lender. It also includes provisions that accommodate a simultaneous purchase of the same real property, and considers the needs of the Purchaser (comparable to the needs of a Lender). For a refinancing, Tenants may object to having the estoppel certificate benefit the Landlord, so it may make sense to delete the Landlord as a party entitled to rely on the certificate (as discussed more fully below).

¹ Problems that first arise after closing are handled through different mechanisms, such as nondisturbance agreements. An estoppel certificate focuses on the condition of leases and tenancies only at the moment of closing. Sometimes Lender's counsel will try to expand an estoppel certificate to include post-closing obligations (for an example, see suggestions later in this Chapter). That approach may create issues and problems, hence is disfavored.

When a Landlord prepares a Lease, this model estoppel certificate or its equivalent can be attached as an exhibit, to avoid subsequent issues about what the Tenant must sign.² It can also be used in the same way as a standard estoppel certificate in loan documents. A careful Borrower will, however, insist that if a Lease provides for a particular form of estoppel certificate, then the Borrower never needs to deliver anything more than the Lease contemplates.

1. Substantive Comments

The following substantive issues arise in this document.

1.1 Trivial Leases. For minor Leases, a Lender might limit the estoppel certificate to a confirmation that the Lease, as defined in the estoppel certificate (including all amendments, etc.), has not been amended and is in full force and effect. The Lender might also want to include the Tenant's acknowledgment that the Lease has been assigned and Tenant's agreement to pay rent to Lender (or its designee) if directed to do so. Whether these assurances are necessary or sufficient depends on the circumstances.

1.2 Deal-Specific Assurances. Consider whether to obtain any assurances from the Tenant that may be specific to this particular Lease or project, such as: (a) the Tenant's option to cancel has expired without exercise; (b) the same is true for any similar option the Landlord might have; (c) the Tenant has taken possession of and approved the premises; and (d) similar matters. If review of the Lease discloses imperfections or ambiguities, an estoppel certificate may offer an opportunity to correct them. On the other hand, estoppel certificates may not be as reliable as full-blown Lease amendments, because of concerns about their binding effect, particularly on successors and assigns. Any deal-specific estoppel provisions will require early and thorough due diligence review of the Leases.

2 For added comfort, though, Landlord will also want to include a provision in the Lease in which Tenant agrees to sign any other reasonable form of estoppel certificate that a Lender or Purchaser later decides to require.

1.3 Scope. This model estoppel certificate offers a “base case” first, followed by a range of optional provisions that might apply based on the Lender’s tastes or the circumstances of the particular transaction. For a “typical” transaction, few if any of these optional provisions will make sense.

1.4 Effect on Lease. A careful Tenant may insist that an estoppel certificate state that nothing in it modifies or waives anything in the Lease. Depending on the wording, such a qualification may limit the utility of the estoppel certificate. It is, however, not unreasonable for a Tenant to insist that the Lender read and understand the Lease, so that the estoppel certificate addresses only factual circumstances that cannot be understood or confirmed merely by reading the Lease. This model contains no such limiting language of the type a Tenant might request.

1.5 Knowledge. Some Tenant assurances in this model estoppel certificate are limited by actual knowledge. These limitations are “market standard,” but a Lender might choose to take a more aggressive position.

1.6 SNDA Issues. One can add a few paragraphs to an estoppel certificate to try to give the Lender many benefits that it might achieve from a nondisturbance agreement (an SNDA).³ Sample language to that effect appears in the optional provisions after this model estoppel certificate. The first part of that language covers only the SNDA issues that tend not to create controversy: (a) pure “subordination”; (b) continuation of the Lease after foreclosure; and (c) protecting the successor owner from “Landlord-Tenant Conspiracies.” The last paragraph of that language covers SNDA issues that do tend to create controversy, which the writer has described as “Lender-Tenant Risk Shifting.” To the extent that one can cover these issues in an estoppel certificate, rather than an SNDA, this can certainly speed up loan closing. The use of an estoppel certificate as a general problem-solving device will not always work perfectly, however, for at least these reasons:

- Issues and Delays. If the Lease does not already obligate the Tenant to sign this particular form of estoppel certificate, inclusion of SNDA-type provisions in an estoppel certificate may create issues and delays that otherwise would not occur.

3 The issue of pure “subordination” rarely matters much. For more on SNDA’s, see Joshua Stein, Needless Disturbances: Do Nondisturbance Agreements Justify All the Time and Trouble?, 37 American Bar Association Real Property, Probate and Trust Journal, Winter 2003, at 703.

- Lender Obligations. To the extent that SNDA-type provisions impose obligations on the Lender (and give protections to the Tenant), the Tenant will want the Lender to agree to them. This can certainly be done in a number of ways without fully negotiating a traditional SNDA between the Lender and the Tenant (for example, the Lender can sign a one-paragraph letter agreeing to the Lender obligations and Tenant protections). It adds another piece of paper to the transaction, as well as a deviation from ordinary closing procedures.
- Understanding the File. After the loan closing, anyone trying to understand the Lease terms or the relationship between the Lender and the Tenant will not necessarily look in an estoppel certificate to find it, and will instead look for an SNDA. The estoppel certificate might simply get lost (a fate less likely to befall a Lease amendment), unless it has been recorded, which is rarely done for estoppel certificates.
- Future Refinancing. An estoppel certificate (or SNDA) delivered to the present Lender might not help a future Lender. There's no reason why this should necessarily always be the case, but it's the typical situation.
- Lease Modification. The estoppel certificate might be considered a Lease modification. The Tenant might later raise issues about whether the estoppel certificate truly could achieve a modification of the Lease.
- Tenant's Assignment. If the Tenant assigns its Lease, the estoppel certificate may not bind the Tenant's assignees.
- Successors and Assigns. Can the Lender's assignee also rely on the estoppel certificate? Probably yes, especially if the estoppel certificate says so. But what if the estoppel certificate is silent on that point? Will the estoppel certificate bind the Landlord's successors and assigns? Probably not, unless they knew about it.

- Future Estoppel Certificates. When the parties later amend the Lease (or issue a future estoppel certificate), they may not remember to list the estoppel certificate as one of the documents that constitute the Lease. If not, the future Lease amendment (or even some future estoppel certificate) may erase the lender-protection estoppel certificate from the record of Lease documents.
- Nonstandard. The entire arrangement is rather non-standard, hence may produce left-field objections and problems that one cannot envision in the abstract. The parties may prefer to use a full-blown SNDA just to be standard and customary, which is usually the preferred approach in any real estate transaction.

Despite all these limitations and issues, a Lender may still find that it makes sense to build limited SNDA provisions into an estoppel certificate. For those occasions, the sample language offered in this model estoppel certificate should do the job, allowing the Lender to easily dispose of all limitations and issues raised above. On the other hand, a Lender could also easily conclude that these limitations and issues represent serious obstacles to the way Lenders typically close loans. In that case, the Lender would decide to require a separate SNDA and not include the suggested language in the estoppel certificate.

1.7 Why Bother? Estoppel certificates assume the Seller or Borrower is lying to the Buyer or Lender. These documents require a significant amount of work to obtain. They give Tenants an opportunity to whine and try to exercise leverage. If a creditworthy guarantor is willing to give the Buyer or Lender assurances similar to those in an estoppel certificate, the parties might consider replacing the estoppel certificate with those creditworthy assurances.⁴ If the estoppel certificate arises in the context of a ground Lease (where an existing space lease will become a sublease), the ground lessor might provide representations and warranties and allow the ground lessee to offset against ground rent if those representations and warranties prove wrong.

1.8 Assignment of Existing SNDA. If a new Lender is refinancing a loan held by an existing Lender that previously entered into a satisfactory SNDA with this Tenant (very often the case), then the existing Lender could assign the SNDA to the new Lender (to avoid the need to negotiate and obtain Tenant signatures on a new SNDA). That approach makes particular sense in New York, where the existing Lender will typically assign the existing mortgage to the new Lender anyway. The assignment (or a separate assignment) just needs to extend to the SNDA that the existing Lender signed with the Tenant. If the parties do that, then this estoppel certificate could include language designed to give the new Lender comfort about the SNDA already in place and its assignment. Sample language to this effect appears within the optional provisions after the model estoppel certificate. A careful Tenant will ask the new Lender to confirm and agree to any Lender nondisturbance obligations in the SNDA being assigned. This could be achieved with an appropriate countersignature of the assignment, a one-paragraph letter from the new Lender or the addition of an appropriate statement to the loan documents.

2. Points Not Covered

An estoppel certificate could cover these points, but this one does not:

2.1 Estoppel for Acquisition. If this form of estoppel certificate is used for a simultaneous acquisition of the property, then the Purchaser/Borrower will want to confirm that the purchase and sale documents match up to the requirements for delivery of estoppel certificates in the loan commitment.

2.2 Economic Terms. Some Lenders like to restate the fundamental economic terms of the Lease in the estoppel certificate, reducing the more burdensome Lease review process to an estoppel certificate review process. Sophisticated Tenants typically reject that approach, as it shifts to them the risk of transcription errors. They will usually only confirm that the Lease has not been amended except as the estoppel certificate states, and then require the Lender to read the Lease. The form of estoppel certificate offered here requires Tenant to confirm the amount of Fixed Rent only if it has been subject to variable adjustments. It does not otherwise require Tenant to summarize or confirm financial terms of the Lease. If the Lender prefers a more exhaustive form of estoppel certificate, this one will need to be changed.

3. Checklist

Consider these issues when using this estoppel certificate:

3.1 Customization. Like any other document, an estoppel certificate will always need to be customized for the particular context and circumstances. Brackets, footnotes, and comments in this model indicate provisions particularly likely to need adjustment.

3.2 Fact Checking. When a Borrower/Landlord prepares estoppel certificates for execution by Tenants, the Borrower/Landlord should rigorously check the Lease files to identify and list all possible documents that modify the Lease. These could include side letters, correspondence, confirmation letters (e.g., regarding exercise of an option) or even emails.

3.3 Obtaining from Tenant. Tenants use requests for estoppel certificates as an opportunity to complain and raise issues. Even if a Tenant does not do so, at a minimum, the Tenant will want to assure the estoppel certificate is correct. For those reasons, the process of obtaining estoppel certificates from Tenants is typically slow and difficult. Therefore allow plenty of lead time. The more information the estoppel certificate requests, and the longer and more “off market” it is, the more time Tenants will take to respond. As a matter of strategy, Lenders will usually want to make it clear they will tolerate exceptions in the estoppel certificate rather than let Tenants believe that an “unclean” estoppel certificate will give any Tenant holdup value for a transaction. Typically, a Lender or Purchaser would prefer to receive an estoppel certificate with minor exceptions and issues than to receive no estoppel certificate at all.

3.4 Recordation. Ordinarily, a Tenant estoppel certificate will only be recorded if a memorandum of Lease was recorded, and not necessarily even then. Ideally, the estoppel certificate should be recorded whenever it modifies the Lease. An even tidier approach is to relabel the document as a Lease amendment, since it is modifying the Lease, and then record it or not depending on whether a memorandum of Lease was recorded. If an estoppel certificate will be recorded, think about any forms, affidavits, and tax returns that may be required to do so. Note that this model estoppel certificate is not in recordable form.

3.5 Execution. Ensure that all necessary parties sign the estoppel, including guarantors. This form of estoppel provides for a guarantor confirmation.

3.6 Exhibits. Update the list of exhibits to reflect which possible exhibits, if any, are being attached. For user convenience, Lender may prefer to collect in an exhibit (probably Exhibit A) all Lease-specific exceptions and variable items. This way, the text of the estoppel certificate would not vary much for individual Leases. This approach may save some work and coordination, if one person prepares the text of the estoppel certificate and another person prepares the Lease-specific exhibit. On the other hand, it is not too hard to tailor the form of estoppel certificate for the details of each particular Lease.

3.7 Signed Estoppel Certificates. As Tenants sign and return estoppel certificates, track them and maintain them in an organized fashion. Sometimes estoppel certificates disclose problems or issues. If one simply receives estoppel certificates, checks them off a list, and drops them in folders, then those problems or issues will often fall between the cracks. Hence, as obvious as it may sound, whoever required the estoppel certificate(s) should remember to read the signed estoppel certificate(s) as they arrive and, if they raise any concerns, address them quickly.

TENANT ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE⁵

THIS TENANT ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE (the “Certificate”) is delivered as of _____ (the “Effective Date”), by _____, a _____ (“Tenant”), to _____, a _____ (“Landlord”),⁶ to benefit Landlord and _____, a _____ (“Lender”).

Tenant delivers this Certificate based on these facts:

A. Landlord has advised Tenant that Landlord owns or is simultaneously acquiring the real property known as _____ (the “Building”).

B. Landlord or its predecessor in interest has leased to Tenant [the part of] the Building [commonly known as _____] (the “Premises”), under only these documents and agreements (collectively, the “Lease”):⁷

1. Lease dated as of _____, 20__;
2. [First Amendment of Lease] dated _____;
3. [Letter Agreement on Commencement Date] dated _____; and
4. _____.

5 Ideally, the Lease should: (a) attach a form of Certificate to avoid discussions and deliberations suggested in this Certificate and its cover notes and footnotes; and (b) also require Tenant to provide other assurances as a future Lender or Purchaser reasonably requests.

6 A Tenant may reasonably ask why this Certificate should bestow any rights or benefits on the Landlord or in any way alter the landlord-tenant relationship. The Certificate is being requested in favor of a third party dealing with Landlord. Why should that fortuitously give Landlord any benefit? The Tenant’s position is reasonable, especially in the case of a refinancing. On the other hand, if the Landlord simultaneously acquiring the Property, then the Landlord is fully entitled to receive and rely upon an estoppel certificate.

7 List all documents that define the Tenant’s rights and obligations. Include, for example, letter agreements, option exercise notices, previous estoppel certificates that modified the Lease (although such certificates are inadvisable), written waivers, arbitration awards, judgments, and other substantive documents that define the landlord-tenant relationship.

C. Landlord has advised Tenant that Landlord intends to mortgage the Building, and collaterally assign the Lease, to Lender.

NOW, THEREFORE, Tenant certifies, acknowledges, and agrees, in each case as of the Effective Date only (for purposes of which, any blank space means “NO EXCEPTIONS”):

1. Tenant Status. Tenant: (a) is tenant under the Lease; (b) has not assigned, encumbered or hypothecated the Lease, Tenant’s estate under the Lease or any part of it; and (c) has not agreed to do any of the foregoing.

2. Lease Status. The Lease: (a) is in full force and effect; (b) has not been amended, canceled, modified, supplemented, surrendered, terminated or waived, in whole or part, orally or in writing, except as the definition of “Lease” states and (c) represents the entire agreement between Tenant and Landlord on Tenant’s rights regarding the Premises and all related matters. All conditions to effectiveness of the Lease have been met.

3. No Offset. [Subject only to adjustments of escalation and percentage rents in the ordinary course for the current year,]⁸ Tenant has no claim, counterclaim, defense, offset, right to receive any refund or recoupment (whether of any overpayment or otherwise), setoff or any other basis to reduce any payment the Lease requires, including any base rent, additional rent or other charges payable under the Lease (collectively, the “Rent”).

4. Rent Commencement. All conditions to commencement of Tenant’s obligation to pay Rent have been met, except _____.

5. No Landlord Default. To Tenant’s knowledge: (a) Landlord is not in default under the Lease and (b) nothing has occurred that, with passage of time or giving of notice, would constitute such a default. Tenant has

8 What about refunds Landlord may owe for previous years’ overpayments of escalation rents and percentage rents? The references later in this sentence to refunds and overpayments may cover such refunds, but one might want more comfort. If a Seller/Landlord owes substantial refunds for many years but has “forgotten” to pay them over, this could create a major surprise later. A Purchaser of the Building may want to perform extra due diligence on this point, and even obtain post-closing credit support, particularly for a noninstitutional Landlord.

given Landlord no notice of any uncured default under the Lease. Tenant has commenced no legal proceeding against Landlord.⁹

6. Tenant's Funds. Landlord holds no security deposit, prepaid Rent or other funds of Tenant (or for which Tenant is entitled to credit) of any kind except _____. Tenant has paid no Rent more than 30 days before due except as the Lease expressly requires.

7. No Other Interest. Except under the Lease, Tenant has no right, title or interest (including any option to expand or renew) in or to the Building. Tenant has no option or right of first refusal to purchase the Building.

OPTIONAL PROVISIONS

For optional provisions to include in an estoppel certificate, see sample language after the signature blocks of this model estoppel certificate.

Tenant acknowledges that this Certificate will be relied upon, in accordance with its terms, as of the Effective Date only, by Landlord;¹⁰ Lender; any title insurance company insuring either; any future Lender to Landlord or a mezzanine Lender providing financing or preferred equity to Borrower's direct or indirect owners; any rating agency, issuer, trustee, or servicer in any securitization that includes any loan secured by a mortgage encumbering the Building; and the successors and assigns of (and counsel to) all the foregoing. This Certificate shall bind Tenant and its representatives, successors, and assigns.

GUARANTOR'S CONFIRMATION

The undersigned, Guarantor under the [Guaranty] dated _____ for the Lease (the "Guaranty"), agrees, confirms and certifies for the benefit of all persons entitled to rely on the preceding Certificate that, as of the Effective Date only: (a) Guarantor shall be estopped by and shall not assert any facts inconsistent with the foregoing Certificate, but makes no representations or warranties beyond any in the Guaranty; (b) all representations and warranties in the Guaranty are true and correct; (c) the Guaranty is in full force and effect and has not been amended, modified,

9 It would be "off market" but conceivable to add: "Tenant does not presently contemplate doing so. All statements in this paragraph were correct at all times in the last 12 months."

10 As noted above, a Tenant may argue that the Certificate should not benefit the Landlord.

waived or terminated, in whole or in part; (d) Guarantor has no offset, claim, counterclaim or defense to its obligations under the Guaranty and (e) Exhibit ___ is a true and correct copy of the Guaranty.¹¹

11 Include clause "e" only if circumstances dictate.

OPTIONAL PROVISIONS FOR AN ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE

Factual Confirmations. The next few paragraphs relate to factual matters that may arise for particular Tenants. When these matters do arise, it is entirely appropriate for a Lender to seek comfort on these matters through an estoppel certificate. A Tenant should have no problem providing the comfort suggested here, assuming the statements are factually correct.

8. Options. Tenant has exercised only these option(s) under the Lease: (a) option to extend through _____, under Section ____; (b) option to expand the Premises to include _____ under Section ____; and (c) option to _____ under Section ____.

9. Rent Adjustment. The [Fixed Rent] under the Lease: (a) was last adjusted on _____; (b) after taking into account that adjustment, is $_____ per month or $_____ per year; and (c) will next be adjusted on _____.¹²

10. Base Amounts. “Base Real Estate Taxes” are $_____. “Base Operating Expenses” are $_____. These amounts are final and not subject to audit or adjustment.

11. Dates. The “Commencement Date” of the Lease was _____. The “Rent Commencement Date” of the Lease was _____. The “Expiration Date” of the Lease (taking into account only any options Tenant has already exercised) will be _____.¹³

12. Notice Address. Tenant’s current notice address is:

13. Build-Out and Possession. Tenant has approved the plans and specifications for construction of the Premises listed in Exhibit B. Except as Exhibit B states: (a) Landlord has [commenced / completed] Land-

12 Use this paragraph only if either: (a) Lender plans to rely on the Certificate in place of Lease review or (b) because of escalation formulas, the actual current rent cannot be determined from the face of the Lease. The reliance mentioned in item “a” may be “unreasonable” if the estoppel certificate doesn’t match the Lease. This approach often triggers objections from both the Landlord and the Tenant because of the extra work it creates and the risk it may impose on the Tenant. In general, if anyone can identify a date or a number by reading the Lease, the Tenant may reasonably object to confirming it in this Certificate.

13 Add only if uncertainty exists. Use this provision to tie down other significant but otherwise uncertain dates.

lord's obligations, if any, to construct the Premises in a timely manner in compliance with the Lease; and (b) Tenant has taken possession of the Premises.

Nondisturbance Agreement Provisions. The next few paragraphs give Lender some protections more typically found in a nondisturbance agreement. For comments, see the cover notes for the preceding Model Estoppel Certificate.

14. Subordination. Tenant acknowledges that the Lease and Tenant's claims under the Lease are subject and subordinate to Lender's mortgage on Landlord's Premises.

15. Foreclosure Event. If Lender forecloses under its mortgage, or exercises any right or remedy similar to such a foreclosure, or accepts an assignment or conveyance in lieu of such foreclosure (any of the foregoing, a "Foreclosure Event"), then, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease, from and after the Foreclosure Event: (a) the Lease shall not terminate; (b) Tenant shall have no right to terminate the Lease; (c) the new owner of Landlord's Premises (with its successors and assigns, "Successor Landlord") shall not be bound by any amendment, modification, waiver, termination, cancellation or surrender of the Lease made without Lender's consent; (d) Successor Landlord shall not be bound by any prepayment of Rent for more than 30 days except as the Lease required (or if paid to a lockbox under Lender's or Successor Landlord's control); (e) Successor Landlord shall have no liability or responsibility for Tenant's security deposit except to the extent Successor Landlord actually received it and (f) Successor Landlord's liability arising from or relating to the Lease shall never extend beyond its interest in Landlord's Premises. Nothing in this paragraph limits Tenant's exercise of any unilateral termination right under the Lease, provided that: (x) such right does not arise from a Foreclosure Event; and (y) if such right arises from Landlord's default, then Tenant has first given Lender a reasonable opportunity to cure such default.

16. Successor Landlord's Liability. Any Successor Landlord shall not be: (a) subject to any abatement, claim, counterclaim, credit, deduction or setoff against Tenant's obligations under this Lease (an "Offset") arising from acts or omissions of the prior Landlord (except to the extent of an Offset for any actual direct damages that both: (i) this Lease would allow Tenant to assert against Landlord; and (ii) accrue after Tenant has given Lender notice of the matters giving rise to the Offset); or (b) obligated to pay or reimburse Tenant for any sum for which the Lease required the prior Landlord to pay or reimburse Tenant.¹⁴

NONSTANDARD PROVISIONS

The remaining numbered paragraphs contain more assurances that a Lender might want in an estoppel certificate. These assurances go beyond merely preventing the Tenant from asserting facts inconsistent with the Certificate. Instead, they ask the Tenant to provide affirmative assurances, and seem particularly likely to trigger objections. A Tenant would typically prefer not to cover any of these matters, characterizing them as unusual, noncustomary and overkill. Each of these provisions does, however, sometimes appear in estoppel certificates—as do a range of other provisions not included here, such as asking a Tenant to assume new environmental obligations to the Lender, a request that even the most aggressive Lender’s lawyer would probably consider inappropriate but nevertheless sometimes shows up in estoppel certificates. In some cases, however, these additional provisions may make sense.

17. Loss Proceeds. In the event of any inconsistency between Tenant’s and Lender’s rights regarding any condemnation award or insurance proceeds, that inconsistency shall be resolved in favor of Lender.

18. Notice of Default. If Tenant intends to terminate the Lease because of Landlord’s default, then Tenant shall first notify Lender of that default and give Lender a reasonable opportunity to cure it. This does not limit any other right or remedy of Tenant, except by deferring any right that Tenant may otherwise have to terminate the Lease for Landlord’s default.

19. Rent Redirection. If Lender gives Tenant written notice requiring Tenant to pay Rent to Lender (not Landlord) or any other party then, after Tenant receives that notice, Tenant shall pay to Lender (or as otherwise required) all Rent thereafter payable under the Lease, without regard to any contrary notice, instruction or direction from Landlord.¹⁵

14 This paragraph collects in one place the provisions in an SNDA that typically trigger Tenant objections. A Lender can certainly add more items to this list.

15 Tenant should insist that Landlord countersign this certificate, or otherwise approve and confirm the concept in this paragraph.

20. Existing SNDA. On _____, Tenant entered into a [Subordination, Nondisturbance, and Attornment Agreement] (the “SNDA”) with _____ (“Previous Lender”). Tenant has been advised that, on or about the Effective Date, Previous Lender is assigning the SNDA to Lender. [A copy of the SNDA (including all prior amendments, if any) is attached as Exhibit ____.] [The SNDA was recorded on _____ at Book _____, Page _____ in the Official Records of _____ County, _____.] The SNDA has not been amended or modified except as the definition of SNDA states. The SNDA is in full force and effect. Previous Lender is not in default under the SNDA. Tenant has received: (a) notice that Previous Lender has assigned the SNDA to Lender, and (b) no notice that Previous Lender has assigned the SNDA to anyone else. Wherever the SNDA refers to Previous Lender, it shall be deemed to refer instead to Lender.

21. Copy of Lease. Exhibit A is a true, correct and complete copy of the Lease.¹⁶

22. Repairs. Tenant knows of no condition in the Premises that the Lease requires Landlord to repair.¹⁷

23. Negotiations. Landlord and Tenant are not negotiating any Lease amendment.¹⁸

24. Payments. Tenant has received notice directing Tenant to make all payments under the Lease to _____. Tenant shall comply with that notice. Tenant acknowledges that Landlord may not revoke it without Lender’s consent.

25. No Tenant Default. To Tenant’s knowledge: (a) Tenant is not in default under the Lease and has received no notice of any such default that has not been cured; and (b) Landlord has not commenced any proceedings against Tenant and is not presently threatening to do so. [The statements in this paragraph were also correct at all times during the previous 12 months.]

16 Include this paragraph only if circumstances require, for example because the parties cannot locate a complete copy of the Lease and all amendments. This paragraph is particularly unlikely to be included if the parties plan to record the Certificate. If the parties need to use this paragraph, Landlord should also join in the Certificate to confirm Landlord concurs with Tenant’s identification of the entire Lease.

17 This and the next paragraph are unusual and rarely seen.

18 This sentence is nonstandard but seeks to ferret out pending Lease amendments, which could be material.

MODEL TENANT ESTOPPEL CERTIFICATE

26. Loans to Pay Rent. At no time [within the ___ months before the Effective Date] has Landlord, any predecessor in interest to Landlord or any person related to or affiliated with or otherwise acting for any of them directly or indirectly: (a) made any loan to Tenant or anyone related to Tenant; (b) waived, released or deferred any obligation of Tenant under the Lease, except scheduled rent abatements or (c) given or received any payment or other consideration as inducement to enter into the Lease or deliver this Certificate (including any so-called “key money” or “fixture fee” or any obligation to pay rent or modify or cancel any lease at any other location), except as the Lease discloses.¹⁹

27. Tenant’s Equity Ownership. All Equity Interests of Tenant are owned and held as follows: _____.

28. Binding and Enforceable. The Lease and this Certificate bind and are enforceable against Tenant in accordance with their terms.

29. Optional Priority. Lender may elect in writing at any time [by notice to Tenant] that all (or any part, as Lender designates) of Lender’s right, title and interest in Landlord’s Premises shall be subordinate to the Lease and Tenant’s rights and claims under the Lease.

30. Tenant’s Property. Exhibit ___ accurately identifies all personal property Tenant owns in or at the Premises.

¹⁹ This may be overkill, but the author knows of transactions where Sellers or Borrowers used strategic loans to tenants as a technique to mask chronic payment problems with tenants.

CHAPTER FORTY-FIVE

MODEL NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENT AND REPORT

Joshua Stein, Esq.

REPORT OF SUBCOMMITTEE ON NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENTS
COMMERCIAL LEASING COMMITTEE
REAL PROPERTY SECTION NEW YORK STATE BAR ASSOCIATION

NOTE: The following report was issued in 1993 and has not been updated, but remains relevant and timely. In the span of time since this report was issued, though, major tenants have become less accommodating of lenders, and minor tenants have tried to do the same though perhaps not as successfully. Against those trends, the model form of nondisturbance agreement offered here is probably more lender-oriented than the typical negotiated outcome. Indeed, critics have charged that this model is overly lender-oriented in any event, and does not meet its goal of providing a “reasonable” and “balanced” document. For that reason and others, the New York State Bar Association Commercial Leasing Committee is expected soon to revisit this report and model form and issue a Second Edition. That process has not yet started. Commercial leasing attorneys who would like to participate should communicate with the editor.

[45.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Most commercial leases provide that the tenant’s estate is “subordinate” to the landlord’s mortgage. This means that if the landlord’s mortgagee were to foreclose its mortgage and name the tenant as a party defendant in the foreclosure action, then the foreclosure would terminate the tenant’s lease and, with it, the tenant’s right to occupancy. Whoever purchased the collateral at the foreclosure sale would do so free and clear of the lease.

Most commercial tenants do not understand why, if their landlord defaults on its mortgage, the mortgagee or anyone else should have the right to terminate the tenant’s occupancy. As a result, any commercial tenant that leases a significant amount of space, intends to make a significant investment in tenant improvements, or otherwise has significant negotiating strength often will not allow its lease to simply be “subordinate” to the mortgage.

Instead, commercial tenants negotiating new leases commonly insist that the landlord obtain for them a “nondisturbance” agreement from the mortgagee. This agreement states that if the mortgagee forecloses, the mortgagee will honor and recognize the tenant’s lease and not disturb the tenant's rights under the lease. Such an agreement is often called a "Subordination, Nondisturbance and Attornment Agreement" or some variation thereof (an SNDA agreement).

In the 1980s, mortgagees generally "granted" SNDA agreements to few tenants, often only nationally recognized tenants or other tenants with significant leverage and creditworthiness, and then only after careful review of the proposed lease. Moreover, those agreements would generally limit the tenant's rights and protect the mortgagee's interests in every possible way. Mortgagees would also sometimes try to use SNDA agreements as an occasion to renegotiate leases, adding such provisions as environmental indemnities from the tenant.

In the real estate world of the 1990s, in which rent-paying tenants constitute the only meaningful source of value for real estate, mortgagees are more willing to "grant" nondisturbance. A tenant that might not have been able to obtain an SNDA agreement in 1986 will routinely ask for one, and is more likely to get it, in 1993. Moreover, mortgagees have learned that some of the provisions in SNDA agreements can serve the mortgagee's interests as well.

SNDA agreements typically address issues about the relationship between the mortgagee and the tenant, usually resolving those issues within a predictable range of outcomes. In some cases, however, a "strong" or "unreasonable" (prospective) mortgagee or a "strong" or "unreasonable" (prospective) tenant will propose an SNDA agreement that deals with the standard issues in ways outside the normal range of outcomes or raises issues outside the normal range of issues. In those cases, SNDA negotiations can evolve into a renegotiation of the lease. These aberrational approaches can produce negotiations that are complicated, time-consuming and not completely satisfactory to anyone.

To simplify and streamline negotiations of SNDA agreements and to define a "reasonable" baseline, the Commercial Leasing Committee of the New York State Bar Association Real Property Section decided in 1992 to assign to a subcommittee the responsibility to develop a model SNDA agreement. That model is attached to this report, followed by brief instructions regarding its use.

The following comments are intended, among other things, to guide the user of this model SNDA agreement, explain some judgments and decisions the subcommittee made, and call the user's attention to other commonly negotiated outcomes for some of these issues.

[45.1] II. OVERALL APPROACH AND PURPOSE

The model SNDA agreement is a complete agreement intended for cases where the parties want to minimize or eliminate negotiations and get the job done in a reasonable way. It is suitable for transactions of any size. It may be especially appealing for relatively small loans and relatively small tenancies that will not support significant transaction costs and negotiations. This form is also designed to be a flexible starting point or reference point for use in transactions where the parties customize their own SNDA agreement.

The model SNDA agreement seeks to resolve each of the usual SNDA agreement issues in a standard and reasonable manner, reflecting industry concerns. Based on the subcommittee's review of dozens of specimen SNDA agreements, the model also includes a few provisions that have begun to appear in some SNDA agreements but are not yet part of the basic issues covered in nearly every SNDA agreement. Additional issues are mentioned in these cover notes.

The model SNDA agreement reflects the subcommittee's view of how a well-represented mortgagee and a well-represented tenant could resolve the typical SNDA agreement issues without material prejudice. Some provisions in the model SNDA agreement can be characterized as "pro-mortgagee," others as "pro-tenant." As a whole, however, this model form represents an appropriate accommodation of the competing interests consistent with normal marketplace outcomes of negotiations between reasonably well-represented parties. In the aggregate, the subcommittee believes it is a "fair" and even-handed document.

Although an SNDA agreement plays an important role by defining the relationship between a mortgagee and a tenant, it is ancillary to the basic contract between the mortgagee and the mortgagor, which is the mortgage, and the basic contract between the landlord and the tenant, which is the lease. The parties should make sure the mortgage and the lease do what they need to do and give each party the protections it needs, rather than rely on the SNDA agreement to repair problems and plug gaps in the landlord-tenant or mortgagor-mortgagee relationship. The starting point should always be the mortgage and the lease.

[45.2] III. USE OF THE MODEL SNDA AGREEMENT

In addition to the instructions that follow the model SNDA Agreement, the matters listed below should be considered in preparing an SNDA Agreement based on the attached model.

[45.3] A. Recordation

The subcommittee believes every SNDA agreement should be recorded whether or not the lease or a memorandum thereof has been. The subcommittee disapproves of the common practice of not recording SNDA agreements. Of course, if the lease prohibits recording, tenant's counsel should consider whether recording an SNDA agreement might violate that prohibition. In arranging execution of a SNDA agreement, tenant's counsel should also prepare any ancillary affidavits, tax returns, a copy of the tenant's lease, and similar documentation that the recording office may require.

[45.4] B. Use Outside New York

The model SNDA agreement should not be used outside New York State without consulting local counsel. It is, however, a generic document. The only provisions deliberately tailored to reflect New York law and practice are the cover page and choice of law. Part of the rationale for how the model SNDA agreement treats security deposits (§ 4.3) derives from New York law on treatment of security deposits in a sale of a building. If that law varies in other states, the variation may suggest a different result on security deposits. Similarly, if the model SNDA agreement is used in an "automatic cut-off" state (one where a foreclosure automatically terminates subordinate leases regardless of what the parties agree), then the mortgagee may desire to make leases be "prior" to the mortgage, on all the same terms and conditions set forth in the model SNDA agreement.

[45.5] C. Estoppel Certificate

The estoppel certificate in the model SNDA Agreement (§ 7) will often need to be tailored for the particular lease, including: (a) whether the landlord has finished construction work and the tenant has taken possession; (b) identification of any presently determinable important dates, such as the "Commencement Date" or the "Rent Commencement Date"; (c) the status of any tenant termination options that may no longer exist if certain time periods lapse or certain conditions are satisfied; and (d) the extent of the tenant's obligations under the lease to deliver estoppel certificates.

[45.6] IV. NEGOTIABLE ISSUES

The following are some basic issues raised by any SNDA agreement, and a description of how those issues were resolved in the model SNDA agreement, and why. Most of these issues are of a nature such that one side will “win” on the issue and the other side will “lose”; both sides cannot be accommodated. Particularly for these “zero-sum” issues, it was necessary to draw reasonable lines in the belief that the package as a whole is reasonable and sensible. Every issue can be resolved in other ways.

[45.7] A. Basic Economic Terms of Lease

The subcommittee believes the tenant should be entitled to the basic economic and possessory benefits of the lease it negotiated with the landlord. The mortgagee should not be able to modify fundamental business terms or override extension options, expansion options, representations and warranties, or similar terms that the tenant was able to negotiate with the landlord. The favorable outcomes of these negotiations were presumably reflected in the rent the tenant agreed to pay, thereby creating the value to support the loan. Once the mortgagee approves the lease (or is required, under the loan documents, to live with the lease), the mortgagee should, as a starting point, honor the business terms the tenant negotiated with the landlord. This approach forces the mortgagee to carefully review the lease to identify specific objectionable provisions and try to renegotiate them with the tenant.

[45.8] B. Security Deposit

The model SNDA agreement places on the tenant the risk that the landlord will misapply the tenant's security deposit (§ 4.3). The mortgagee is not responsible for security deposits unless actually received by the mortgagee. It might be reasonable to require the mortgagee to be responsible for the security deposit—effectively forcing the mortgagee to hold all security deposits from the inception of the loan—but the subcommittee decided to place the risk on the tenant. This approach tracks the normal negotiated outcome in SNDA agreements and the New York statute requiring actual delivery of security deposits to a purchaser for the purchaser to incur liability for them (N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law § 7-105(2)).

[45.9] C. Construction Work

Many SNDA agreements categorically excuse the mortgagee from any obligation to complete construction that the landlord failed to complete (including even initial fixturing), yet permit the mortgagee to collect rent after foreclosure premised on the space being delivered in the condition required by the lease. The subcommittee believes this position is unreasonable. It is, however, the standard treatment of this issue in mortgagees' standard form SNDA agreements. It sometimes survives tenant negotiations. The subcommittee tried to formulate a single "standard" reasonable solution to this problem, but found it impossible to do so because leases reflect different business deals regarding construction. Therefore the subcommittee left the matter for negotiation between the actual mortgagee and the actual tenant (to be memorialized in each case in a separate "schedule" to the model SNDA agreement). If the parties do not specifically address the issue and the mortgagee names the tenant as a defendant in the foreclosure action, then the mortgagee will, after foreclosure, have no obligation to complete or pay for the tenant's construction and the tenant will have no recourse against the mortgagee (§ 4.6). As one way to resolve this issue, the subcommittee considered but ultimately did not adopt the following provision, which is presented here only as a sample starting point for consideration:

If Former Landlord has failed to perform Landlord's Construction-Related Obligation(s) with respect to Tenant's initial occupancy of Tenant's Premises and Successor Landlord does not agree in writing within 30 days after Tenant's demand after the date of attornment to complete such Construction-Related Obligation(s) within a reasonable period, then Tenant, as its sole remedy, shall have the right to elect either to terminate the Lease by written notice to Successor Landlord, or to complete and pay for such Construction-Related Obligations and offset all reasonable costs thereby incurred (the "Construction Cost"), together with interest on the unrecovered balance of Construction Cost, against any Rent thereafter payable, until Tenant shall have so recovered the entire Construction Cost.

[45.10] D. Casualty and Condemnation Repairs

The model SNDA agreement requires the mortgagee to perform casualty and condemnation repairs to the same extent that such repairs would be required of landlord (§§ 1.1, 3.2). The subcommittee considered limiting the mortgagee's obligation to the amount of insurance proceeds received, but concluded the mortgagee should not be entitled to a better deal than whatever the landlord and tenant negotiated. This approach prevents the mortgagee from seizing upon the building's misfortune as the basis for early prepayment, except to the extent expressly contemplated by corresponding provisions in the lease. The subcommittee believes that a mortgagee, by properly drafting and administering its mortgage, can control the level of insurance, the insurance adjustment process, and the application of insurance proceeds. If the mortgagee fails to do its job, this should not become the tenant's problem. A mortgagee may feel otherwise.

[45.11] E. Deed in Lieu of Foreclosure

Consistent with industry standards, the model SNDA agreement provides that its mortgagee protections are triggered not only by an actual foreclosure, but also by a deed in lieu of foreclosure (DILF) from the landlord to the mortgagee (or its designee or nominee) (§ 1.2). A tenant may argue that in accepting a DILF, a mortgagee should succeed to exactly the same rights and obligations as the landlord, and the landlord's delivery of a DILF should not be an occasion for any change in the landlord-tenant relationship. Regardless of any merits to the tenant's position, the industry normally accepts the mortgagee's position on this issue. Therefore, the model SNDA agreement does the same. The point is extremely negotiable.

[45.12] F. Options

Some SNDA agreements provide that the mortgagee takes free of options to purchase, expand, contract, renew, and so on. The subcommittee believes the tenant should be entitled to preserve any options expressly provided for in the lease, and the mortgagee should take free only of any options not set forth in the lease. This latter point can be fully addressed with general language stating that the lease is the entire agreement between landlord and tenant, and the only agreement by which the mortgagee will be bound (§§ D, 3.2, 7.1). No particular discussion of options is required. Tenant's counsel should make sure the SNDA agreement expressly recognizes (and defines as part of the "Lease") any side letters, option agreements, or other ancillary documentation giving the tenant valuable rights that should survive a foreclosure.

[45.13] G. Amendments and Modifications

The model SNDA agreement permits landlord and tenant to amend the lease as they wish, but states that the mortgagee will not be bound by any amendments made without the mortgagee's written consent (§ 4.4). The subcommittee believes this position is more reasonable than the mortgagee's common position prohibiting all amendments. As an intermediate position, the tenant might agree that any amendment reducing rent requires the mortgagee's consent, under the theory that such an amendment would impair cash flow and thus perhaps adversely affect the mortgagee even before foreclosure. (Likewise, the model SNDA does not prohibit rent prepayments but merely states that the mortgagee will take free of them [§ 4.2]. Some other issues receive similar treatment.)

[45.14] H. Offset Rights

The model SNDA agreement tracks normal practice by prohibiting offsets against the mortgagee based on events that occurred before the date of attornment (§§ 1.4, 4.1). This means that if a tenant negotiates an offset right in a lease, the tenant should assert that right promptly because it will not survive foreclosure as to offsets that accrued before foreclosure. After foreclosure, the model SNDA agreement requires the Successor Landlord to accept the lease according to its terms, including any express offset rights (but only as to matters occurring after foreclosure) (§§ 3.2, 4.1). A mortgagee reviewing a lease with express offset rights may want to insist that the tenant agree, in the SNDA agreement, that the tenant's offset rights will terminate after foreclosure, even as to post-foreclosure matters. The model SNDA agreement defines "Offset Right" broadly (§ 1.4). The parties may prefer to limit the term to any "offset, defense, or counterclaim."

[45.15] I. Estoppel Certificate

The model SNDA agreement includes a full estoppel certificate (§ 7). It may be slightly more customary to omit the estoppel provisions or put them in a separate document. Either way, tenant's counsel should carefully review with the tenant the accuracy of any "estoppel" provisions.

[45.16] J. Opportunity to Cure Landlord's Default

The model SNDA agreement gives the mortgagee a fairly generous cure period for landlord's defaults—longer than the norm in many SNDA agreements, and more like the mortgagee's cure period available under a ground lease (§§ 6.2, 6.3). This cure period is tempered somewhat by language stating that once a receiver is appointed, the mortgagee has the burden of causing the receiver to cure the landlord's default within a reasonable time (§ 6.3). This will not necessarily be easy, particularly as to nonemergency matters. A tenant may regard the mortgagee's cure period in the model SNDA agreement as excessive and may, for example, ask for the right to suspend or offset rent or exercise self-help during the cure period.

[45.17] K. Nonrecourse

The model SNDA agreement provides that any "Successor Landlord" is automatically exculpated from personal liability under the lease (§ 5). This provision is common but not completely standard. The subcommittee believes that any well-represented mortgagee will ask for it. Most tenants will accept it because they are accustomed to seeing such a clause run to the benefit of the landlord. In addition, even if a lease did not contain such a clause a mortgagee could always achieve the same result by having a shell corporation bid at the foreclosure sale.

[45.18] L. Landlord's Payment Obligations

If the lease requires the landlord to make payments relating to matters beyond the premises, such as "takeover payments" on a tenant's existing lease, tenant's counsel should modify the SNDA agreement to make sure this obligation will survive foreclosure.

[45.19] M. Future Advances

A tenant may prefer to "subordinate" (even with nondisturbance rights) only to a mortgage securing a known loan amount, and not to any future advances of future loans that the same mortgage might later secure. In this case tenant's counsel should limit the definition of "Mortgage" (and the subordination clause) to exclude future loan increases (§§ C and 2). Absent such a limitation, the "Mortgage" to which tenant will subordinate will include future increases. This result reflects industry standards.

[45.20] V. ADDITIONAL ISSUES TO CONSIDER

The following issues are not addressed in most SNDA agreements and thus do not appear in the model SNDA agreement. They may, however, be appropriate to consider in particular transactions and are discussed here for convenient reference.

[45.21] A. Payment of Rent to Mortgagee

Based on recent experiences with assignments of rents, receiverships, bankruptcy, and “cash collateral,” a mortgagee may want the tenant to agree, in the SNDA agreement, to pay rent directly to the mortgagee on request. The subcommittee decided not to include such provisions in the model SNDA agreement because (a) they are not (yet) industry practice and (b) the landlord and tenant can reasonably tell the mortgagee to rely on its ordinary legal rights and remedies in this area (e.g., appointment of a receiver; New York Real Prop. Law § 291-f). The following provisions could be included where desired:

[45.22] 1. Tenant’s Covenant

Add the following covenant by Tenant (breach of which would cause Tenant to lose nondisturbance rights or trigger other remedies):

Rent Payment Notices. From and after Tenant’s receipt of written notice from Mortgagee (a “Rent Payment Notice”), Tenant shall pay all Rent to Mortgagee or as Mortgagee shall direct in writing, until such time as Mortgagee directs otherwise in writing. Tenant shall comply with any Rent Payment Notice notwithstanding any contrary instruction, direction or assertion from Landlord. Mortgagee’s delivery to Tenant of a Rent Payment Notice, or Tenant’s compliance therewith, shall not be deemed to: (a) cause Mortgagee to succeed to or to assume any obligations or responsibilities as Landlord under the Lease, all of which shall continue to be performed and discharged solely by Landlord unless and until any attornment has occurred pursuant to this Agreement; or (b) relieve Landlord of any obligations under the Lease.

[45.23] 2. Landlord’s Acknowledgment

Add the following to Landlord’s acknowledgment at the end of the model SNDA agreement:

Landlord irrevocably directs Tenant to comply with any Rent Payment Notice, notwithstanding any contrary direction, instruction, or assertion by Landlord. Tenant shall be entitled to rely on any Rent Payment Notice.

Tenant shall be under no duty to controvert or challenge any Rent Payment Notice. Tenant's compliance with a Rent Payment Notice shall not be deemed to violate the Lease. Landlord hereby releases Tenant from, and shall indemnify and hold Tenant harmless from and against, any and all loss, claim, damage, liability, cost or expense (including payment of reasonable attorneys' fees and disbursements) arising from any claim based upon Tenant's compliance with any Rent Payment Notice. Landlord shall look solely to Mortgagee with respect to any claims Landlord may have on account of an incorrect or wrongful Rent Payment Notice. Tenant shall be entitled to full credit under the Lease for any Rent paid to Mortgagee pursuant to a Rent Payment Notice to the same extent as if such Rent were paid directly to Landlord.

[45.24] B. Tenant Exculpation

If the lease includes a nonrecourse clause, the tenant may wish to include the same nonrecourse clause, verbatim, in the SNDA agreement.

[45.25] C. Bankruptcy of Mortgagee

An SNDA agreement probably constitutes an executory contract that the mortgagee could reject in its own bankruptcy proceeding or similar proceedings for failed financial institutions. As part of the solution to this problem—at least in cases where the lease is being entered into before the mortgage—the tenant may insist on deleting the standard “subordination” clause in the lease and instead require that “subordination” be addressed only in the SNDA agreement, with a proviso stating that the “subordination” is effective only so long as the SNDA is effective against the mortgagee. This way, even if the SNDA agreement were rejected, the lease itself and Bankruptcy Code § 365(h) would, it is hoped, provide some protection, although the subcommittee found no case law directly supporting this proposition. Other solutions to the problem are available. Some are cumbersome, complex, and nonstandard. That does not mean every tenant should overlook the issue, which is otherwise outside the scope of the subcommittee's assignment.

[45.26] D. Bankruptcy of Landlord

Many SNDA agreements provide that a tenant's nondisturbance rights terminate if the lease terminates, without carving out a lease termination that occurs because the tenant's lease is rejected in the landlord's bankruptcy under 11 U.S.C. § 365(h). Although the Bankruptcy Code allows the tenant to remain in possession under these facts, the tenant's lease has probably still been "terminated."¹ This "termination" of the tenant's lease may allow the mortgagee, during or after foreclosure, to deny the tenant nondisturbance rights (because the lease has "terminated") and simply remove the tenant under the subordination clause of the SNDA agreement. Thus a mortgagee may be able to get around a nondisturbance covenant by manipulating the landlord's bankruptcy. The model SNDA agreement solves this problem by providing that the tenant loses nondisturbance rights only if the lease terminated because of an Event of Default by tenant.

[45.27] E. Miscellaneous

A mortgagee might want to be able to require the tenant to give the mortgagee the same periodic deliveries the landlord can require under the lease, such as updated financial information or updated estoppel certificates. A mortgagee might want the right to participate in legal proceedings relating to the determination of rights of parties to the lease, including arbitration. If the transaction involves out-of-state parties it may be appropriate to include a consent to jurisdiction. To prevent a desirable lease from terminating if a junior mortgagee forecloses, a first mortgagee may want the tenant to agree not to subordinate its estate to the lien of any junior mortgagee. None of these provisions are common in SNDA agreements. None are included here.

MODEL NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENT AND REPORT

The Subcommittee on Nondisturbance Agreements hopes that the above comments, and the model SNDA agreement that follows, will help standardize and streamline practice in this area. Subcommittee members will welcome comments and suggestions based on experience using the model SNDA agreement. If warranted, a second edition will be prepared and released.

SUBORDINATION, NONDISTURBANCE AND ATTORNMENMENT AGREEMENT

This SUBORDINATION, NONDISTURBANCE, AND ATTORNMENMENT AGREEMENT (this “Agreement”) is entered into as of _____, 20__ (the “Effective Date”), between _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (“Mortgagee”), and _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (“Tenant”), with reference to the following facts:

A. _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (“Landlord”), owns the real property located at _____ (such real property, including all buildings, improvements, structures and fixtures located thereon, “Landlord’s Premises”), as more particularly described in Schedule A.

B. Mortgagee has made a loan to Landlord in the original principal amount of $_____ (the “Loan”).

C. To secure the Loan, Landlord has encumbered Landlord’s Premises by entering into that certain Mortgage, Consolidation and Modification Agreement dated _____, 20__, in favor of Mortgagee (as amended, increased, renewed, extended, spread, consolidated, severed, restated, or otherwise changed from time to time, the “Mortgage”) [to be] recorded [on _____, at Book _____, Page _____,] in the Official Records of the County of _____, State of New York (the “Land Records”).

D. Pursuant to a Lease dated as of _____, 20__, as amended on _____, 20__, and _____, 20__ (the “Lease”), Landlord demised to Tenant [a portion of] Landlord’s Premises (“Tenant’s Premises”). Tenant’s Premises are commonly known as _____.

[E. A memorandum of the Lease [is to be recorded in the Land Records prior to the recording of this Agreement.] [was recorded in the Land Records on _____, at Book _____, Page _____.]

F. Tenant and Mortgagee desire to agree upon the relative priorities of their interests in Landlord’s Premises and their rights and obligations if certain events occur.

NOW, THEREFORE, for good and sufficient consideration, Tenant and Mortgagee agree:

1. Definitions

The following terms shall have the following meanings for purposes of this Agreement.

1.1 Construction-Related Obligation. A “Construction-Related Obligation” means any obligation of Landlord under the Lease to make, pay for, or reimburse Tenant for any alterations, demolition, or other improvements or work at Landlord’s Premises, including Tenant’s Premises. “Construction-Related Obligations” shall not include: (a) reconstruction or repair following fire, casualty or condemnation; or (b) day-to-day maintenance and repairs.

1.2 Foreclosure Event. A “Foreclosure Event” means: (a) foreclosure under the Mortgage; (b) any other exercise by Mortgagee of rights and remedies (whether under the Mortgage or under applicable law, including bankruptcy law) as holder of the Loan and/or the Mortgage, as a result of which Successor Landlord becomes owner of Landlord’s Premises; or (c) delivery by Landlord to Mortgagee (or its designee or nominee) of a deed or other conveyance of Landlord’s interest in Landlord’s Premises in lieu of any of the foregoing.

1.3 Former Landlord. A “Former Landlord” means Landlord and any other party that was landlord under the Lease at any time before the occurrence of any attornment under this Agreement.

1.4 Offset Right. An “Offset Right” means any right or alleged right of Tenant to any offset, defense (other than one arising from actual payment and performance, which payment and performance would bind a Successor Landlord pursuant to this Agreement), claim, counterclaim, reduction, deduction, or abatement against Tenant’s payment of Rent or performance of Tenant’s other obligations under the Lease, arising (whether under the Lease or under applicable law) from Landlord’s breach or default under the Lease.

1.5 Rent. The “Rent” means any fixed rent, base rent or additional rent under the Lease.

1.6 Successor Landlord. A “Successor Landlord” means any party that becomes owner of Landlord’s Premises as the result of a Foreclosure Event.

1.7 Termination Right. A “Termination Right” means any right of Tenant to cancel or terminate the Lease or to claim a partial or total eviction arising (whether under the Lease or under applicable law) from Landlord’s breach or default under the Lease.

2. Subordination

The Lease shall be, and shall at all times remain, subject and subordinate to the Mortgage, the lien imposed by the Mortgage, and all advances made under the Mortgage.

3. Nondisturbance, Recognition and Attornment

3.1 No Exercise of Mortgage Remedies Against Tenant. So long as the Lease has not been terminated on account of Tenant’s default that has continued beyond applicable cure periods (an “Event of Default”), Mortgagee shall not name or join Tenant as a defendant in any exercise of Mortgagee’s rights and remedies arising upon a default under the Mortgage unless applicable law requires Tenant to be made a party thereto as a condition to proceeding against Landlord or prosecuting such rights and remedies. In the latter case, Mortgagee may join Tenant as a defendant in such action only for such purpose and not to terminate the Lease or otherwise adversely affect Tenant’s rights under the Lease or this Agreement in such action.

3.2 Nondisturbance and Attornment. If the Lease has not been terminated on account of an Event of Default by Tenant, then, when Successor Landlord takes title to Landlord’s Premises: (a) Successor Landlord shall not terminate or disturb Tenant’s possession of Tenant’s Premises under the Lease, except in accordance with the terms of the Lease and this Agreement; (b) Successor Landlord shall be bound to Tenant under all the terms and conditions of the Lease (except as provided in this Agreement); (c) Tenant shall recognize and attorn to Successor Landlord as Tenant’s direct landlord under the Lease as affected by this Agreement; and (d) the Lease shall continue in full force and effect as a direct lease, in accordance with its terms (except as provided in this Agreement), between Successor Landlord and Tenant.

3.3 Further Documentation. The provisions of this Article shall be effective and self-operative without any need for Successor Landlord or Tenant to execute any further documents. Tenant and Successor Landlord shall, however, confirm the provisions of this Article in writing upon request by either of them.

4. Protection of Successor Landlord

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease or the Mortgage, Successor Landlord shall not be liable for or bound by any of the following matters:

4.1 Claims Against Former Landlord. Any Offset Right that Tenant may have against any Former Landlord relating to any event or occurrence before the date of attornment, including any claim for damages of any kind whatsoever as the result of any breach by Former Landlord that occurred before the date of attornment. (The foregoing shall not limit either (a) Tenant's right to exercise against Successor Landlord any Offset Right otherwise available to Tenant because of events occurring after the date of attornment or (b) Successor Landlord's obligation to correct any conditions that existed as of the date of attornment and violate Successor Landlord's obligations as landlord under the Lease.)

4.2 Prepayments. Any payment of Rent that Tenant may have made to Former Landlord more than thirty days before the date such Rent was first due and payable under the Lease with respect to any period after the date of attornment other than, and only to the extent that, the Lease expressly required such a prepayment.

4.3 Payment; Security Deposit. Any obligation: (a) to pay Tenant any sum(s) that any Former Landlord owed to Tenant or (b) with respect to any security deposited with Former Landlord, unless such security was actually delivered to Mortgagee. This paragraph is not intended to apply to Landlord's obligation to make any payment that constitutes a "Construction-Related Obligation."

4.4 Modification, Amendment, or Waiver. Any modification or amendment of the Lease, or any waiver of any terms of the Lease, made without Mortgagee's written consent.

4.5 Surrender, Etc. Any consensual or negotiated surrender, cancellation, or termination of the Lease, in whole or in part, agreed upon between Landlord and Tenant, unless effected unilaterally by Tenant pursuant to the express terms of the Lease.

4.6 Construction-Related Obligations. Any Construction-Related Obligation of Former Landlord, except as expressly provided for in Schedule B (if any) attached to this Agreement. [Note: Please see Paragraph 3 of Instructions following model SNDA agreement.]

5. Exculpation of Successor Landlord

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Agreement or the Lease, upon any attornment pursuant to this Agreement the Lease shall be deemed to have been automatically amended to provide that Successor Landlord's obligations and liability under the Lease shall never extend beyond Successor Landlord's (or its successors' or assigns') interest, if any, in Landlord's Premises from time to time, including insurance and condemnation proceeds, Successor Landlord's interest in the Lease, and the proceeds from any sale or other disposition of Landlord's Premises by Successor Landlord (collectively, "Successor Landlord's Interest"). Tenant shall look exclusively to Successor Landlord's Interest (or that of its successors and assigns) for payment or discharge of any obligations of Successor Landlord under the Lease as affected by this Agreement. If Tenant obtains any money judgment against Successor Landlord with respect to the Lease or the relationship between Successor Landlord and Tenant, then Tenant shall look solely to Successor Landlord's Interest (or that of its successors and assigns) to collect such judgment. Tenant shall not collect or attempt to collect any such judgment out of any other assets of Successor Landlord.

6. Mortgagee's Right to Cure

6.1 Notice to Mortgagee. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease or this Agreement, before exercising any Termination Right or Offset Right, Tenant shall provide Mortgagee with notice of the breach or default by Landlord giving rise to same (the "Default Notice") and, thereafter, the opportunity to cure such breach or default as provided for below.

6.2 Mortgagee's Cure Period. After Mortgagee receives a Default Notice, Mortgagee shall have a period of thirty days beyond the time available to Landlord under the Lease in which to cure the breach or default by Landlord. Mortgagee shall have no obligation to cure (and shall have no liability or obligation for not curing) any breach or default by Landlord, except to the extent that Mortgagee agrees or undertakes otherwise in writing.

6.3 Extended Cure Period. In addition, as to any breach or default by Landlord the cure of which requires possession and control of Landlord's Premises, provided only that Mortgagee undertakes to Tenant by written notice to Tenant within thirty days after receipt of the Default Notice to exercise reasonable efforts to cure or cause to be cured by a receiver such breach or default within the period permitted by this paragraph, Mortgagee's cure period shall continue for such additional time (the "Extended Cure Period") as Mortgagee may reasonably require to either (a) obtain possession and control of Landlord's Premises and thereafter cure the breach or default with reasonable diligence and continuity or (b) obtain the appointment of a receiver and give such receiver a reasonable period of time in which to cure the default.

7. Confirmation of Facts

Tenant represents to Mortgagee and to any Successor Landlord, in each case as of the Effective Date:

7.1 Effectiveness of Lease. The Lease is in full force and effect, has not been modified, and constitutes the entire agreement between Landlord and Tenant relating to Tenant's Premises. Tenant has no interest in Landlord's Premises except pursuant to the Lease. No unfulfilled conditions exist to Tenant's obligations under the Lease.

7.2 Rent. Tenant has not paid any Rent that is first due and payable under the Lease after the Effective Date.

7.3 No Landlord Default. To the best of Tenant's knowledge, no breach or default by Landlord exists and no event has occurred that, with the giving of notice, the passage of time or both, would constitute such a breach or default.

7.4 No Tenant Default. Tenant is not in default under the Lease and has not received any uncured notice of any default by Tenant under the Lease.

7.5 No Termination. Tenant has not commenced any action nor sent or received any notice to terminate the Lease. Tenant has no presently exercisable Termination Right(s) or Offset Right(s).

7.6 Commencement Date. The “Commencement Date” of the Lease was _____, 20___. [Note: Please see Paragraph 2 of Instructions following model SNDA agreement.]

7.7 Acceptance. Except as set forth in Schedule B (if any) attached to this Agreement: (a) Tenant has accepted possession of Tenant’s Premises; and (b) Landlord has performed all Construction-Related Obligations related to Tenant’s initial occupancy of Tenant’s Premises and Tenant has accepted such performance by Landlord. [Note: Please see Paragraph 3 of Instructions following model SNDA agreement.]

7.8 No Transfer. Tenant has not transferred, encumbered, mortgaged, assigned, conveyed or otherwise disposed of the Lease or any interest therein, other than sublease(s) made in compliance with the Lease.

7.9 Due Authorization. Tenant has full authority to enter into this Agreement, which has been duly authorized by all necessary actions.

8. Miscellaneous

8.1 Notices. All notices or other communications required or permitted under this Agreement shall be in writing and given by certified mail (return receipt requested) or by nationally recognized overnight courier service that regularly maintains records of items delivered. Each party’s address is as set forth in the opening paragraph of this Agreement, subject to change by notice under this paragraph. Notices shall be effective the next business day after being sent by overnight courier service, and five business days after being sent by certified mail (return receipt requested).

8.2 Successors and Assigns. This Agreement shall bind and benefit the parties, their successors and assigns, any Successor Landlord, and its successors and assigns. If Mortgagee assigns the Mortgage, then upon delivery to Tenant of written notice thereof accompanied by the assignee’s written assumption of all obligations under this Agreement, all liability of the assignor shall terminate.

8.3 Entire Agreement. This Agreement constitutes the entire agreement between Mortgagee and Tenant regarding the subordination of the Lease to the Mortgage and the rights and obligations of Tenant and Mortgagee as to the subject matter of this Agreement.

8.4 Interaction with Lease and with Mortgage. If this Agreement conflicts with the Lease, then this Agreement shall govern as between the parties and any Successor Landlord, including upon any attornment pursuant to this Agreement. This Agreement supersedes, and constitutes full compliance with, any provisions in the Lease that provide for subordination of the Lease to, or for delivery of nondisturbance agreements by the holder of, the Mortgage. Mortgagee confirms that Mortgagee has consented to Landlord's entering into the Lease.

8.5 Mortgagee's Rights and Obligations. Except as expressly provided for in this Agreement, Mortgagee shall have no obligations to Tenant with respect to the Lease. If an attornment occurs pursuant to this Agreement, then all rights and obligations of Mortgagee under this Agreement shall terminate, without thereby affecting in any way the rights and obligations of Successor Landlord provided for in this Agreement.

8.6 Interpretation; Governing Law. The interpretation, validity and enforcement of this Agreement shall be governed by and construed under the internal laws of the State of New York, excluding its principles of conflict of laws.

8.7 Amendments. This Agreement may be amended, discharged or terminated, or any of its provisions waived, only by a written instrument executed by the party to be charged.

8.8 Execution. This Agreement may be executed in any number of counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original and all of which together shall constitute one and the same instrument.

8.9 Mortgagee's Representation. Mortgagee represents that Mortgagee has full authority to enter into this Agreement, and Mortgagee's entry into this Agreement has been duly authorized by all necessary actions.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, this Agreement has been duly executed by Mortgagee and Tenant as of the Effective Date.

MODEL NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENT AND REPORT

Landlord consents and agrees to the foregoing Agreement, which was entered into at Landlord’s request. The foregoing Agreement shall not alter, waive or diminish any of Landlord’s obligations under the Mortgage or the Lease. The above Agreement discharges any obligations of Mortgagee under the Mortgage and related loan documents to enter into a non-disturbance agreement with Tenant. Landlord is not a party to the above Agreement.

Each of the undersigned, a guarantor of Tenant’s obligations under the Lease (a “Guarantor”), consents to Tenant’s execution, delivery and performance of the foregoing Agreement. From and after any attornment pursuant to the foregoing Agreement, that certain Guaranty dated _____, 20__ (the “Guaranty”) executed by Guarantor in favor of _____ shall automatically benefit and be enforceable by Successor Landlord with respect to Tenant’s obligations under the Lease as affected by the foregoing Agreement. Successor Landlord’s rights under the Guaranty shall not be subject to any defense, offset, claim, counterclaim, reduction or abatement of any kind resulting from any act, omission or waiver by any Former Landlord for which Successor Landlord would, pursuant to the foregoing Agreement, not be liable or answerable after an attornment. The foregoing does not limit any waivers or other provisions contained in the Guaranty. Guarantor confirms that the Guaranty is in full force and effect and Guarantor presently has no offset, defense (other than any arising from actual payment or performance by Tenant, which payment or performance would bind a Successor Landlord under the foregoing Agreement), claim, counterclaim, reduction, deduction or abatement against Guarantor’s obligations under the Guaranty.

INSTRUCTIONS FOR MODEL SNDA AGREEMENT

1. Overall. Modify as appropriate for the particular transaction. Fill in blanks. Consider deleting or editing bracketed language.

2. Important Dates. Modify or supplement Section 7.6 to tie down the Commencement Date and any other important dates referred to in the Lease, i.e., any dates that must be known in order to understand the lease term or calculation of rent.

3. Construction-Related Obligations. In Schedule B, summarize any “Construction-Related Obligations” of Landlord that remain unperformed as of the Effective Date, and describe the extent (if any) to which Successor Landlord has agreed to be obligated to perform such “Construction-Related Obligations” after any attornment. Edit Section 7.7 based on the status of construction.

4. Acknowledgments. Sample acknowledgments are provided at the end of the document. Duplicate and edit as necessary for all parties signing, including landlord and any guarantors.

5. Subleases. Although the subcommittee regards it as unnecessary, a mortgagee may desire a list of all subleases entered into by the tenant. This could be attached as another Schedule.

6. Non-Fee Estates. This SNDA agreement assumes Landlord holds a fee estate. If this is not the case, modify accordingly.

7. Lease Review. In preparing an SNDA agreement, mortgagee’s counsel should review the underlying lease; consider whether the mortgagee is willing to “nondisturb” the lease; and, if so, whether the mortgagee should insist on renegotiating any of the terms of the lease. The SNDA agreement can incorporate the outcome of such negotiations, in the form of an agreement between mortgagee and tenant that would come into effect only if and when landlord is out of the picture. It is beyond the scope of this report to list issues that mortgagee’s counsel should consider in reviewing a lease.

8. Loan Documents. Mortgagee’s counsel should consider the interaction between the SNDA agreement and the terms of the loan documents, so they work well together. Many provisions of the model SNDA agreement (or optional provisions discussed in this report) require conforming or implementing language in the loan documents. This area is outside the scope of the subcommittee’s responsibilities.

CHAPTER FORTY-SIX

JOURNEY THROUGH THE NINE CIRCLES OF HELL: A TENANT'S ODYSSEY IN NEGOTIATING NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENTS

Joel R. Hall, Esq.*

- * The author wishes to acknowledge the generous help of (1) Joshua Stein, Esq., of Joshua Stein PLLC, New York, NY, whose excellent article, Needless Disturbances? Do Nondisturbance Agreements Justify All The Time And Trouble? was the inspiration for the updating of this chapter, (2) Thomas C. Homburger, Esq., of counsel with K&L Gates, Chicago, IL, whose article, co-authored with Lawrence A. Eiben, Who's On First—Protecting the Commercial Mortgage Lender, provided instructive guidance on the nuances of mortgage subordination, (3) Dale Ahearn, Esq. whose insightful article, co-authored with his late partner, Jude Clark, of Frost Brown Todd, Louisville, KY, Between a Rock And A Hard Place—Representing Owners In SNDA Negotiations, was heavily quoted in these materials, (4) the several practitioners and scholars whose works are cited in these materials, and (5) the New York State Bar Association for making this possible.

[46.0] I. INTRODUCTION

An integral part of a commercial lease negotiation and the closing of a commercial mortgage loan has been the deliberation between the landlord, the tenant, and the mortgage lender with regard to the interrelationship between the lender and the tenant during the pendency of a loan and in the circumstance of a mortgage default and consequent foreclosure. The end game of such deliberations is the subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreement (SNDA).

It has been suggested by some attorneys practicing in the field that the endeavor to negotiate SNDAs in terms of the time, energy, thought, and cost expended may not be worth the effort. This view is predicated upon the belief that (1) the problems and risks an SNDA covers, although theoretically conceivable, do not arise all that often in the real world, and (2) some of the positions taken by all parties in SNDA negotiations may have questionable merit.

Indeed, this has frequently been the view of the client in this process. In their desire to close a deal, the question is asked, “How often does this happen, i.e., a default by the landlord on its loan and the termination of the lease of a AAA rent paying tenant by the foreclosing lender?” The very fact that the question is being asked demonstrates that the client’s support for this piece of the transaction may be wavering. It is the job of the attorney to instill the proper perspective and convince the client that it is important—stuff happens and it only needs to happen once.

As a practitioner who has represented numerous commercial tenants and has dealt with hundreds of SNDAs on their behalf in lease negotiations and interactions with lenders seeking to subordinate the tenant’s lease, these materials are intended as a response to that suggestion as seen from the tenant’s viewpoint. The rationale underlying the tenant’s position on the issues raised in SNDAs will be explained and suggestions for a middle ground will be offered in an effort to achieve balance.

[46.1] II. SUBORDINATION OF LEASE OR MORTGAGE

§1.1 The Lender’s Objectives. In making a loan secured by real property, a lender considers not only the appraised value of the land and buildings but will also carefully evaluate the existing leases which encumber that property and which will represent the primary income stream by which the loan will be repaid. As observed by two commentators:

In structuring and documenting a loan, a lender will want to ensure that favorable leases (whether existing at closing or later executed) remain in place and unmodified throughout the term of the loan and continue in effect following foreclosure. The lender will also want to ensure that below-market or unduly burdensome leases do not survive foreclosure and that the lender's right to control condemnation awards and insurance proceeds is not undercut by an inconsistent lease provision that is senior in priority to the lender's deed of trust. On the other hand, in entering into a lease transaction, a tenant will want to ensure that its lease remains intact throughout its term and that the landlord's obligations are performed, even if the identity of the landlord changes over time. The tenant will be particularly concerned (at least in the beginning) that its lease and any subsequent amendments survive a foreclosure by its landlord's mortgagee—an event over which the tenant has no control.¹

For the tenant, the consequences of a mortgage foreclosure could be disastrous. It faces the prospect of losing its lease or being permitted to remain in the premises only under terms and conditions dictated by the lender. The question of the survival of the lease upon a foreclosure will be determined by the relative priority of the mortgage lien and the lease. Absent an agreement to the contrary, those priorities will depend on the order in which the respective instruments were recorded or on whether a junior party otherwise had notice of the senior encumbrance.² If the lease is recorded prior to the mortgage or the tenant is in possession at the time of recordation, or if the lender otherwise is, or should be, aware of the existence of the lease, the lease will be senior to the mortgage lien. Conversely, a lien will be senior to a lease if the mortgage is recorded before the recordation of the lease and before the tenant takes possession, or if the tenant has actual or imputed knowledge of the existence of the lien when it executes the lease.³

1 Patricia J. Frobos and David S. Kitchen, The Priority of Liens and Leases, 15 Cal. Real Prop. J. 1 (Fall 1997) (hereinafter Priority of Liens and Leases).

2 In the absence of a subordination of positions by either the lender or the tenant, priority is determined by the established concept of "first in time, first in right." See Thomas C. Homburger & Lawrence A. Eiben, Who's On First, Protecting the Commercial Mortgage Lender, 36 Real Prop. Prob. & Tr. J. 412, 419 (2001) (hereinafter Homburger).

3 Priority of Liens and Leases, supra note 1, at p. 1.

In modern leasing practice, the question of the subordination of the lease is almost universally addressed in the landlord's form of lease by the "automatic subordination clause."

A comprehensive form of automatic subordination clause in a lease follows:

Figure 1

Subordination of Lease

This Lease and all rights of Tenant hereunder are and shall be subject and subordinate in all respects to all present and future:

(1) ground leases, operating leases, superior leases, overriding leases and underlying leases and grants of term of the land and buildings comprising the Shopping Center, or any portion thereof (collectively, the "Superior Lease"),

(2) mortgages, deeds of trust, deeds to secure debt and building loan agreements, including leasehold mortgages, and spreader and consolidation agreements, which may now or hereafter affect the land and buildings comprising the Shopping Center, or any portion thereof or the Superior Lease (collectively, the "Superior Mortgage"), and

(3) each advance made or to be made under the Superior Mortgage. All references in this Lease to the Superior Lease and Superior Mortgage shall be deemed, in each instance, to include all replacements thereof, and any renewals, modifications, substitutions, supplements and extensions thereof or of any such replacement.

"Superior Lessor" shall mean the lessor at the time of a Superior Lease. "Superior Mortgagee" shall mean the holder at the time of a Superior Mortgage.

The provisions of this Paragraph shall be self-operative and no further instrument of subordination shall be required. In confirmation of such subordination, Tenant shall promptly execute and deliver, at its own cost and expense, an instrument, in recordable form if requested, that Landlord, the Superior Lessor or the Superior Mortgagee may reasonably request to evidence such subordination; and if Tenant fails to execute, acknowledge or deliver any such instrument within ten (10) days after request therefor, Tenant hereby irrevocably constitutes and appoints Landlord as Tenant's attorney-in-fact, coupled with an interest, to execute, acknowledge and deliver any such instruments for and on behalf of Tenant.

Any Superior Mortgagee may, by giving notice of the same to the Tenant, elect that this Lease shall have priority over such Superior Mortgage, whether this Lease is dated prior to or subsequent to the date of such Superior Mortgage.

Under the foregoing provision, the superiority of a previously existing mortgage lien is simply confirmed since, as a matter of law this is already the case. With respect to future mortgages placed on the property after the lease was executed and which would otherwise be subordinate to the lease, the subordination clause reverses the priority of the two encumbrances in favor of the mortgage lien. Because this process places the tenant in a very vulnerable position, it is essential for the tenant to secure its lease by reaching an agreement with the lender ensuring the survival of the lease upon foreclosure and the assumption by the foreclosing party (or the purchaser at a foreclosure sale) of the landlord's obligations.

The "subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment agreement" (or simply the "nondisturbance agreement" or "SNDA") achieves this result in return for which the tenant confirms (in the case of a previously existing mortgage) the subordinate status of the lease to that mortgage and subordinates (in the case of a future loan) the leasehold interest to the subsequent mortgage. The manner in which, from a tenant's viewpoint, the nondisturbance agreement should be negotiated and drafted is extensively discussed in these materials.

However, absent a tenant's ability to secure the promise of a nondisturbance agreement in its lease or to secure one upon direct request from the lender, it is important that, at the very least, the tenant understands the process by which lenders work their superior position to their greatest advantage.

The enforceability of automatic subordination clauses in leases in California was tacitly confirmed in the case of Dover Mobile Estates v. Fiber Form Products, extensively discussed below. The California appellate court enforced the automatic subordination clause of the tenant's lease without discussion or analysis, despite the existing concerns of some commentators that such provisions were not enforceable.⁴

§1.2 Subordinating The Mortgage Lien To The Lease. Elevating the lease to a position superior to the mortgage gives the tenant the result it presumably always wanted but was unable to secure from the lender by means of an SNDA. However, since such alteration of priorities is the optional and unilateral choice of the lender, the protection the tenant receives is only fortuitous.

In Figure 1, above, and Figure 2, following, the lender is given the option to elevate the lease at its election by giving notice to the tenant of such choice.⁵

Subordination of Mortgage to Lease

Any Superior Mortgagee may, by giving notice of the same to the Tenant, elect that this Lease shall have priority over such Superior Mortgage, whether this Lease is dated prior to or subsequent to the date of such Superior Mortgage.

While this may appear beneficent on the lender's part, it is actually a very wise strategic option, as will be seen from the following discussion of a 1990 case in California.

4 Priority of Liens and Leases, supra note 1, at p. 4. The doubt stems from cases in California which require that in order for a superior lienor to be subordinated in status to a subsequent lien, the subordination clause must contain sufficient details disclosing the scope of the financial or other burdens to which the lienor is being subordinated. Also, if there are other conditions precedent to such subordination, those conditions must be met; otherwise, the superior lien remains superior.

5 In order for the lender to unilaterally subordinate the lien of its mortgage and elevate the encumbrance of the lease, the lease must expressly permit it. Patricia J. Frobes and David S. Kitchen, The Priority of Liens and Leases – An Update, 17 Cal. Real Prop. J. 1, 38 (Winter 1999) (hereinafter, Liens and Leases: An Update).

In the case of Dover Mobile Estates v. Fiber Form Products,⁶ a foreclosure purchaser brought an action to recover rent from a tenant who had been the lessee under a lease with the defaulting landlord. The mortgage lien had been created subsequent to the lease and would otherwise have been subordinate to it. However, the lease contained an automatic subordination clause which rendered the lease “subordinate to any mortgages or deeds of trust . . . that may hereafter be placed upon the premises.”⁷ In addition, the lease provided that the mortgagee could elect to render the lease superior to the mortgage, whether the lease was dated or recorded before or after the mortgage. When the landlord defaulted under its mortgage loan, the mortgagee foreclosed and the property was sold in a trustee’s sale. The tenant continued paying monthly rent for approximately six months and then after giving 30 days’ notice, vacated the premises.

The trial court found that the foreclosure sale extinguished the lease and entered judgment in favor of the tenant. The appellate court affirmed under the long-standing principle in California that the foreclosure of a superior mortgage extinguishes a subordinate lease, with the result that following foreclosure, neither the subordinate tenant nor the new owner is bound to perform under the lease. This result is automatic and is not dependant upon an election to do so by the mortgagee made after the foreclosure.⁸

In fact, the Court rejected the lender’s argument that the extinguishment of the lease is optional on the foreclosing purchaser’s part following foreclosure, without any concurrence needed from the tenant.⁹ The Court found “no reason to question the continued validity of this rule [i.e., automatic termination]” and observed that if the lender’s position were adopted

6 220 Cal. App. 3d 1494 (1990).

7 Id. at 1499.

8 This principle, referred to as the “automatic cut-off” rule, obtains in many other states as well. Other jurisdictions, applying what is referred to as a “pick and choose” rule, permit the lender to take title subject to certain leases while terminating others. See Morton P. Fisher, Jr. and Richard H. Goldman, The Ritual Dance Between Lessee and Lender—Subordination, Nondisturbance and Attornment, 30 Real Property Probate and Trust Journal, 355 (Fall 1995), at p. 358 (hereinafter, Fisher and Goldman).

9 The key phrase here is “following foreclosure.” The lender had failed to subordinate the mortgage to the lease prior to foreclosure (as it had the right to do pursuant to the Lease) but argued for the proposition that an automatic extinguishment was inconsistent with modern-day real property transactions (i.e., a “pick-and-choose” mechanism).

then the purchaser could evict the tenant if rent values increased or hold the tenant to the lease if rent values decreased. In other words, the purchaser could do whatever was most profitable. We decline to allow the purchaser this option. To the contrary, we think it more equitable to follow the rule that the trustee's sale automatically terminates the lease.¹⁰

Although Dover confirmed long-standing law, it was greeted by tenants in the depressed commercial real estate climate of the early 1990s as an unexpected boon—a means by which they could escape out from under leases whose rents could not now be supported by business conditions. Indeed, it was felt by some tenants that they were better off not to be locked into their leases by a nondisturbance agreement with the lender. However, as observed in Priority of Liens and Leases:

The outcome in Dover clearly favors tenants who find themselves burdened by above-market leases. In other economic circumstances, the Dover rule will please lenders or foreclosure sale purchasers who want to free their property of below-market leases. At the outset of a lease transaction, however, neither the lender nor the tenant will be able to predict whether the lease will be above or below market when the lender seeks to foreclose. Accordingly, unless the lender and tenant want to gamble on the future, it is in the best interests of both to enter into a subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment agreement that will preserve the lease following foreclosure.¹¹

Therefore, the perceived “boon” to the tenant does not really exist. In an “automatic cut-off” state, such as California, a lender is able to circumvent this affect and avoid the loss of the tenant by electing to subordinate the mortgage to the lease prior to foreclosure, thereby preventing its extinguishment. Nothing in the Dover decision suggested that the lender could not do just that.

However, in a case decided subsequent to Dover, a California Appellate Court held that a lender cannot unilaterally subordinate its lien to a lease where the lease contains no provision permitting such subordination.¹² The Restatement of Property supports this view.¹³ But even if the lease in an automatic cutoff state such as California lacked a mortgage subordination provision, the lender can achieve the same result by a refinance of the loan with a new (and now junior) mortgage.¹⁴ In a “pick and choose” jurisdiction such as New York, the lender can simply not name the tenant as a defendant its foreclosure action.¹⁵ Thus, it is the lender, and not the tenant, who can play the circumstances to its best advantage, based upon the market conditions at the time of (but prior to) foreclosure. However, this issue is almost universally rendered moot by the inclusion in the lease by the “election to subordinate” provisions noted above in Figure 2 and is part of the overall subordination provision of Figure 1. The lender’s failure to do so prior to foreclosure in Dover was its fatal error.

Thus, there is little a tenant can do to avoid being manipulated by the lender following a loan default unless the tenant was able to negotiate a nondisturbance agreement with the lender prior thereto.

§1.3 The Lender’s Election to Subordinate Its Lien to The Lease.

One large commercial lender in shopping center transactions had until recently ubiquitously employed the “Subordination of Mortgage” device at or near the time of execution of a subordinate lease to preserve that lease in the event foreclosure became necessary in the future.¹⁶ However, that lender’s form carves out from the operation of its subordination the damage and destruction, insurance, condemnation and condemnation award provisions of the mortgage. By doing so, the lender preserves the seniority of the casualty and condemnation provisions of the mortgage which will continue to remain superior to and prevail over corresponding provisions of the lease in the event of either occurrence.

This author has polled leasing experts in the field and they are split on whether partial subordination actually works, i.e., whether a lender who subordinates its mortgage to the lease must subordinate the whole mortgage and may not selectively retain the priority of those provisions it likes (unless the tenant so agrees) lest the subordination be ineffective. If this were correct an attempted unilateral “partial” subordination would be invalid with the result that the lease would be extinguished by the foreclosure anyway, just the opposite of the lender’s intent. Depending on the market conditions at the time, this may be a welcome result for the tenant.¹⁷

16 Teachers Ins. & Annuity Assoc. of America. This lender had decided as a matter of policy that it wanted all of the leases to survive foreclosure and preferred the use of this device rather than negotiating a lengthy (and potentially contentious) nondisturbance agreement.

The insurance and damage and destruction provisions of the lease are often extensively negotiated by the tenant¹⁸ and leases frequently grant rights to the tenant and impose obligations upon the landlord more favorable to the tenant than the provisions of the mortgage between the landlord and the lender. In a multi-tenanted property such as a shopping center, the lender can find himself burdened with wholly inconsistent provisions and varied obligations scattered throughout numerous leases governing damage and destruction and the disposition of insurance proceeds, all of which will be very troublesome in the face of the real hazards of fire, earthquake or hurricanes.

A lender not wishing to find itself in this position or to test the theory of “partial subordination” will always seek the joinder of the tenant in order to preserve the desired insurance, damage and destruction and condemnation provisions of the mortgage. The large commercial lender referred to above avoided this danger by requiring the tenant to execute the subordination of mortgage document, thereby consenting to the partial subordination.

An unanswered question remains as to whether a lender in a multi-tenanted property such as a shopping center and located in a automatic cut-off state like California can nevertheless “pick and choose” which leases to subordinate to (e.g., the credit leases) and which ones will remain inferior and terminated upon foreclosure (e.g., the non-credit leases). It is the opinion of this author that the lender can so selectively subordinate. If an individual lease permits the lender, at its option, to subordinate the mortgage to it (or partially subordinate it), then the result should be no different if the property contains multiple leases.

17 As it was for the tenant in the Dover case. In that case, however, the lender failed to subordinate the mortgage at all.

18 This is less true in the case of the eminent domain provisions unless the tenant is an out-parcel occupant or a large space user (in which case a nondisturbance agreement would be forthcoming anyway).

§1.4 Does Subordination Of The Mortgage Afford Sufficient Protection For The Lender or The Tenant? While the lender and the tenant may feel that each has achieved the functional equivalent of a nondisturbance agreement, this is not completely true. What is needed from the lender's viewpoint is an attornment (or agreement to attorn) of the now superior tenant to the lender. The basic concept of an attornment is that a tenant acknowledges its obligations under the lease owed to the new landlord. This establishes the privity of contract following the foreclosure before the parties can enforce the contractual undertakings which are contained in the lease (as opposed to enforcing those features of the leasehold relationship which automatically survive foreclosure, such as the right to possession and the obligation to pay rent). Following an attornment, the same privity of contract arises between the tenant and the new landlord by reason of the foreclosure as had existed under the original lease.¹⁹ Interestingly, in California, which is an automatic cut-off state, it has been held that an attornment clause in a subordinate lease which requires the tenant to attorn to a lender at the lender's request is enforceable notwithstanding that the lease itself (and presumably all of its terms) are extinguished by a foreclosure of the superior lien.²⁰

But this is only half of the story. From the tenant's viewpoint, what is needed is a reciprocal undertaking by the lender to perform all of the lease obligations of the landlord. Without a contractual agreement by which the new landlord following a foreclosure agrees to a continuation of the landlord's obligations under the original lease, the tenant under the surviving lease has the right to occupy its leasehold interest as long as it pays the agreed upon rent, but the tenant lacks the ability to enforce the specific terms of the lease which do not run with the land.²¹ A tenant with a leasehold which is prior in right to a mortgage should seek an attornment agreement with the lender to ensure the continuation landlord's obligations under the lease beyond the prior tenant's mere right to retain possession.²²

§1.5 Plan B: Another Tenant Protection—Curing The Landlord's Default. If the instrument subordinating the mortgage lien to the lease does not have an express reciprocal undertaking by the lender to perform the landlord's obligations, there is another method available to the tenant who was unable to secure nondisturbance protection from an existing lender (or who obtains nondisturbance protection but without the reciprocal undertaking). The landlord can grant the tenant the right to cure the landlord's default under the mortgage with the companion right to recover reimbursement from the landlord (and if necessary, as a rent offset) for the amount expended to cure. However, in order for this remedy to be effective it will also be necessary to secure the lender's agreement to accept the cure tendered by the tenant (the lender is not otherwise obligated to do so). The lender should have little objection to this procedure as it would be more palatable than granting a nondisturbance agreement or being pressured into subordinating the mortgage lien prematurely or allowing the loan to go into default. The only situation in which the lender would resist this approach would be if it desired to get out of the loan altogether for a variety of reasons (such as rising interest rates). This process also works in the case of a subordinate lease where the tenant does not have the protection of an SNDA.

Section 2924.b of the California Civil Code provides a procedure whereby certain parties in interest may be entitled to receive copies of a notice of default filed by the lender. A party entitled to receive such notice is granted a statutory right to cure the landlord's default and acquires a right of reimbursement from the landlord for the sums so expended. This idea is also supported by Priority of Liens and Leases.²³

While the tenant may not be enthusiastic about the prospect of resurrecting defaulted mortgages, it is a way out of its dilemma. This procedure would be unduly burdensome to a shopping center tenant but in the case of a street deal where the cost or amount of the delinquent performance may not be very great in relation to the property, this may be a workable solution for the tenant.

²³ Priority of Liens and Leases, supra note 1, at p. 13.

§1.6 The Tenant's Interest. So far we have examined the mechanics of how a lender maintains or achieves a superior position vis-à-vis the tenant and to control the fate of the tenant's lease upon foreclosure. From the tenant's side of the table, however, it stands to lose its entire investment in the premises and the loss of its business upon a foreclosure, regardless of the mechanism employed by the lender or the landlord—a dramatic consequence. Subordination of the mortgage to the lease may afford limited protection to the tenant's occupancy but without all of the benefits it bargained for. The right to resurrect a defaulted mortgage in §1.5 will protect the status quo but at possibly considerable expense to the tenant. The best protection for the tenant of its occupancy and for the lender in the continuation of the rent stream upon a foreclosure is the nondisturbance agreement discussed in the following sections.

[46.2] III. NEGOTIATING THE SUBORDINATION CLAUSE OF THE LEASE

§2.1 Conditional Subordination. The above discussion explored the options available to a tenant who does not initially have the stature to condition the deal on getting an SNDA from an existing lender²⁴ or to require the landlord to require nondisturbance protection for the tenant from a future lender in return for the subordination of the lease to the future mortgage. In the sections that follow, we shall examine (1) the concept of conditional subordination on the assumption that the tenant has sufficient importance to demand it from the landlord, and (2) strategies for the tenant to follow in negotiating the SNDA with the lender. Although it's possible that a tenant with clout may still not be able to convince an existing lender to grant nondisturbance protection, the tenant's relationship to a future lender is quite different.

a. The Present Mortgage. If a lease is already subsequent in time to the mortgage, then subordination is not technically required but all subordination clauses in leases provide language of subordination of the lease to all mortgages, "presently existing or hereafter made." The effect of this language in the context of a presently existing mortgage is to merely confirm in writing what is already the case at law.

b. Future Mortgages. With respect to future mortgages, the tenant must demand that its obligation to subordinate be expressly conditioned

24 This is because the loan is already in place and funded. There is little incentive for the lender to cooperate. However, it will ultimately be in the lender's interest to grant an SNDA to a major tenant whose lease is a significant pillar supporting the security of its loan.

upon receiving written assurance of non-disturbance protection from the future lender should the landlord default under its mortgage (“conditional subordination”). Otherwise, to a tenant who has spent considerable sums for investment, is enjoying a profitable business and is faithfully performing its obligations under the lease would be dispossessed and lose everything. Any tenant, regardless of whether its lease is a credit lease, is entitled to enjoy the sanctity of continued possession and to attorn to the foreclosing lender as its new landlord. This is especially true where the mortgage was executed after the tenant signed its lease and where the tenant was relegated to a subordinate status by virtue of an automatic subordination clause.

For a credit tenant, it constitutes the crowning irony to have its lease counted as a credit lease on the one hand—entitling the landlord to derive the benefits of a loan and allowing the lender to enjoy the security of the tenant’s financial strength—and on the other hand to permit the tenant to be dispossessed and its huge investment forfeited at the whim of that lender whose own interest was created subsequent to that of the tenant.

Many landlords assert that the smaller, non-credit tenant is not entitled to this protection, reserving it only for the large national chains. This undervalues and belittles the small tenant, especially in the case of a shopping center. The landlord was anxious enough to have that tenant in the mall in the first instance to fill up those empty, less attractive spaces and to add synergy to the shopping center. In addition, it is far more burdensome for a smaller tenant to make the investment necessary to build out a store, stock it and assume inherently greater risks than it is for the large, wealthy chains. To lose all of that when it has been faithfully observing its lease covenant would be a financial disaster. It is the duty of both the landlord and the lender to respect every tenant and its lease, provided that such lease is in good standing.

c. “Built-In” Nondisturbance Protection. There are a minority of shopping center developers in this country who support this principle and build non-disturbance protection right into their lease form. All that is left is to negotiate the terms of that SNDA with the future lender. As will be seen hereafter, this is no easy task. By and large however, tenants, including the national chain credit tenants, must still endure the burden of negotiating this protection into the lease on every occasion. Resistance from landlords’ lawyers still exists.²⁵ The landlord’s lawyer, for his or her part, is trying to make it easy on the client when closing a loan in the future and will be arguing for a lender that does not then exist when, in many cases, a future lender will accept the existing tenant and its lease as a fait accompli and enter into a nondisturbance agreement.²⁶ Experience has shown that a lender will be far more reasonable when dealing with an existing tenant (with respect to whom the lender desires to acquire priority) than with respect to a tenant who is already subordinate by virtue of having signed a lease after the loan was recorded.

d. Landlord's Arguments Against Conditional Subordination—Addition to the "SNDA Tapes." Joshua Stein, in his masterful article, sets forth a list of excuses (the "SNDA Tapes") offered by lenders and landlords for why a tenant should not bother to ask for an SNDA from an existing lender or to condition its automatic subordination upon getting an SNDA from a future lender.²⁷ To those humorous but woeful excuses the following additional examples are offered:

1. I'll Never Get a Loan! Some landlord lawyers have argued that to impose this condition in the subordination clause will endanger the landlord's ability to get financing in the future. They then scare their clients with this advice which makes it that much more difficult to get over the issue given the backdrop of a landlord's traditional fear of bankers.²⁸ However, this is simply not borne out in the real world. Lenders are in the business of closing loans and no lender—certainly not one intending to loan out $50, $100 or $200 million on a shopping center property—is going walk away from a deal because one of the satellite tenants, and perhaps a credit one at that, is insisting on nondisturbance protection in return for the subordination of the lease. If there are lenders out there with that disposition and the landlord's lender unfortunately turns out to be one of them, the risk, such as it is, will have to assumed by the landlord, not the tenant.

One approach in dealing with this "lender from Hell" argument in a lease negotiation with the landlord is the following.

26 Prudent leasing practice in this area suggests that the tenant attach a nondisturbance form that it is comfortable with that it will agree to sign with a future lender. See the discussion infra "Attaching a Form SNDA to the Lease" as an exhibit.

27 Stein, supra note 14, at p. 774.

28 One New York City landlord posed the question to its loan broker who replied that the landlord would never get a loan if the tenant required an SNDA. That was outstandingly bad advice (and didn't succeed).

- If the hypothetical lender grants an SNDA to none of the tenants in the complex, then none shall be required with respect to the tenant negotiating the subject lease. The automatic subordination will be effective only if, and so long as the lender does not enter into an SNDA with anyone else in the project.
- If the lender does grant an SNDA to any other tenant in the project, no matter how large that other tenant may be (either in terms of space occupied or financial net worth) and regardless of whether that SNDA is granted at the time of loan closing or thereafter, then in such case the subordination is nullified unless such lender enters into an acceptable SNDA with the tenant.

Such a suggested approach should be sufficient to silence any argument from landlord's counsel that the landlord will never be able to get an SNDA from a future lender.²⁹

2. Don't Worry About It! Other landlords or their lawyers argue with a different slant: "A credit tenant like yourself shouldn't worry about and insist on a nondisturbance agreement because no lender in its right mind would ever terminate your lease upon foreclosure since in such a distress situation the lender will want good rent paying tenants in place." Then the obvious answer here is that such lender will have no problem giving the tenant nondisturbance protection at the outset. In other words, the landlord's argument is true, until its not. If there is a foreclosure, there is simply no guarantee that lenders will act in this fashion. They may want to amend the lease to their liking, with termination as the ultimate threat. In the New York City market lenders are interested in vacant possession and will want to foreclose to the ground, regardless of who the tenant is, for no other reason than a rapidly rising rental market. Or, the purchaser at foreclosure may wish to install an even more desirable tenant in the space or it may have different development plans for the building. Without nondisturbance protection a tenant is in serious jeopardy.

3. I'll Indemnify You! The suggestion here is that if there is a foreclosure and the tenant's lease is terminated by the lender, the landlord will indemnify the tenant for its loss. To persons of ordinary intelligence one immediately realizes that if the landlord has defaulted under its loan and has precipitated a foreclosure, its obligation of indemnity is of no value. Furthermore, most leases contain an “exculpation” clause or a “non-recourse” clause which limits the tenant’s recovery source for monetary claims to the landlord’s “interest in the Property.” Following a foreclosure, the landlord no longer has an interest in the real estate, so there is no one to pursue and no judgment recovery source to attach. Lastly, the potential indemnification obligations would be enormous for the landlord—economic loss to the tenant—well beyond the “interest in the Property.” For this scheme to work a landlord would have to guarantee a huge obligation personally, including loss of future sales and profits, the cost of leasehold improvements and put up significant assets to secure it; this will never happen. A tenant should dismiss such a proposal as non-credible.

4. You’re Too Small. The suggestion here is that the tenant’s space will fall below the size threshold of the future lender for granting nondisturbance protection. There is no way a landlord can know this, despite its counsel’s professed experience in real estate financing transactions. The lawyer is simply trying to make life easier for its client in its negotiations with a future lender. A future lender will not be deterred from approving a loan or a lease simply because an existing tenant requires the protection of a nondisturbance agreement. Such a dismissive argument is not an effective negotiating technique. If, however, a loan commitment is already made with known parameters, then it will be the landlord’s job to make it happen lest it lose a leasing prospect assuming the tenant doesn’t blink first.

5. You Can Terminate The Lease! Some landlords suggest that if, at the time of closing the loan, the future lender refuses to sign a nondisturbance agreement, the tenant will have the right to cancel the lease! The defect in this argument should be obvious. If nondisturbance protection and quiet possession, i.e., the ability to remain in the premises following a mortgage foreclosure, is what the tenant is looking for, then why would it want the right to cancel the lease, especially at the very moment of the loan closing, long before there is even an issue of a landlord default and mortgage foreclosure and indeed, which issue may never even arise? The tenant’s business may be doing very well at the time and the tenant would have no desire to terminate the lease. Such a clause would force the tenant to make a dramatic decision at the time of the closing of a future loan when vacating the premises may be the furthest thing from its mind. What the tenant is seeking is not a cancellation right, but rather, the reverse - quiet enjoyment of the premises and the preservation of its lease. Lastly, it seems unlikely that the future lender would favor such a clause.

During the initial negotiation of a lease, a tenant may seek the right to terminate the lease if the landlord doesn't produce an SNDA from an existing lender. This is a threat that may or may not be wise for the tenant to exercise, given its interest in the premises in the first place, but should it elect to do so, it has not (presumably) invested significant sums which it might otherwise forfeit. There are more effective incentives for a landlord and existing lender to agree to extend nondisturbance protection to the tenant, without forcing the tenant to make the drastic decision to cancel, such as conditioning the delivery of possession upon getting an SNDA or abating (or deferring) the rent until one is received.

As against a future lender who is seeking to achieve priority by virtue of an automatic subordination clause, this approach is a sorry substitute for the automatic subordination to be conditioned upon receiving nondisturbance protection.

Subordination to Future Encumbrance Conditioned Upon Nondisturbance Protection

This Lease shall not become subordinate to the lien of any mortgage, deed of trust, ground or master lease, sale-leaseback transaction or other security instrument (any one or more of the foregoing individually or collectively called an "Encumbrance") which shall hereafter be placed on the Premises, unless and until Landlord obtains from the holder of the Encumbrance placed against the Premises, a non-disturbance agreement in recordable form which provides that in the event of any foreclosure, sale under a power of sale, ground or master lease termination or transfer in lieu of any of the foregoing or the exercise of any other remedy pursuant to any such Encumbrance:

(a) Tenant's use, possession and enjoyment of the Premises shall not be disturbed and this Lease shall continue in full force and effect so long as Tenant is not in default hereunder, and

(b) this Lease shall automatically and unconditionally become a direct lease, upon its terms, between any successor to Landlord's interest, as landlord, and Tenant as if such successor were the Landlord originally named hereunder. (Emphasis Added).

The provisions of subparagraph (b) are quite definite and fixed. To the extent a proposed SNDA from a future lender contains extraneous and burdensome provisions of the type hereinafter discussed, those provisions are beyond the scope of that language and the tenant is still in the driver's seat. If the tenant and lender cannot work it out, the tenant's lease will not be subordinate to the mortgage. And the landlord will not be in a position to claim that the tenant is in default by refusing to sign the lender's form SNDA.

DRAFTING POINT—Conditional Subordination—Tenant's Subordination Must Be "Conditioned Upon" Nondisturbance Protection. Some leases contain the provision that "this Lease will continue notwithstanding a foreclosure of the mortgage." This has no effect on a superior lender. The lender is not a party to the lease and by virtue of its superior lien, is not subject to the terms of the lease.³⁰ Furthermore, if the clause obligates the tenant to subordinate to a future lender in one sentence and in a separate sentence declares that the lease will continue notwithstanding foreclosure, it is highly doubtful that, without the interdependency of the two sentences, this language would be sufficient to protect the tenant. The lender, as a third party beneficiary, enjoys the benefit of the tenant's covenant in the lease to subordinate but arguably would not have the obligation to honor the nondisturbance provisions of the clause. In the words of one commentator:

A tenant should not accept the "wooden nickel" lease provision that purportedly obligates any purchaser at a foreclosure sale to recognize and not disturb the tenant. The provision probably would be binding on a junior lienholder (who would take subject to the lease anyway) but would not bind a senior lienholder. Under Dover, a foreclosure sale purchaser will not be bound by any provision of the [subordinated] lease, and that presumably includes a provision of the lease purportedly obligating the purchaser to recognize the lease.³¹

31 Id. at p. 13.

Unless the tenant's obligation to subordinate is directly and expressly conditioned upon getting a non-disturbance agreement, the tenant is not really protected.

§2.2 Attornment by Tenant. Attornment clauses in leases operate in tandem with subordination provisions to ensure that the lease, at the successor's option, shall continue³². The printed attornment clauses appearing in leases are written on the assumption that the subordination clause is also unchanged, i.e., that the tenant is subordinate to present and future mortgages without non-disturbance protection. Thus, these attornment clauses provide that while the tenant is obligated to attorn to the foreclosing lender or purchaser at foreclosure sale, this will be only effected if such party accepts the tenant's attornment at its option. These clauses need only to be changed, deleting the italicized phrase above, to be consistent with the lender's obligation to recognize the lease, become the new landlord under it and assume all of the landlord's obligations.

Attornment clauses can be enforced by the lender as a third party beneficiary of the tenant's covenant to attorn.³³ This is fine so long as this result is not the unilateral choice on the lender's part only.

Figure 4 below is an extract from an actual lease. The portions relevant to this discussion have been underlined. Figure 5 denotes the necessary changes.

§2.3 Tenant to Execute “All Necessary Documents”—The Blank Check

Most subordination clauses contain provisions such as the following:

Figure 6

Tenant to Sign All Necessary Documents

Tenant agrees to execute any and all documents reasonably required by any mortgagee to effectuate the foregoing provisions (i.e., automatic or conditional subordination, Ed.). If Tenant fails to execute any such document within ten (10) days after request therefor, the same shall be deemed a material default under the Lease. In the alternative, Tenant hereby irrevocably constitutes and appoints Landlord as Tenant’s attorney-in-fact, coupled with an interest, to execute and deliver such document for and on behalf of Tenant.

To agree to such broad language without any limiting provisions will yield totally unhappy results for the tenant and should be completely unacceptable. Given the imagination of lender’s counsel, a tenant cannot predict or minimize the possibilities of what may appear in such a document in the future, regardless of the tenant's knowledge of present day financing practice. The potential magnitude of such unexpected issues is extensively discussed in Part III of this article. As an example of the kind of surprises a tenant might encounter, lenders have recently included the following provisions in such "reasonably required" documents (which were not otherwise contained in the lease):³⁴

- (a) a disclaimer of any obligation to pay a construction allowance;
- (b) a disclaimer of any obligation to perform any construction or restoration work at the Premises;
- (c) an exculpation clause whereby the tenant is limited to recovery against the real estate for the landlord's defaults (where the lease had no provision or one that was more equitable); and
- (d) an exculpation clause disclaiming all responsibility whatsoever with respect to hazardous materials.

The tenant must know exactly what these documents say before the tenant agrees in advance to sign them, or, if such documents are unavailable, then at least the content of the clause must be severely limited to ensure that the tenant has not agreed in advance to material modifications of the leases.³⁵ The following clause is a suggested solution:

Figure 7

Limitation Upon Tenant's Obligation to Sign Documents

... provided however that:

(1) such documents shall be strictly limited in its wording or tenor to a confirmation by the parties (a) of the subordination of this Lease to such mortgage, and (b)

35 In Hartwig Transit Inc. v. Menolascino, 113 Ill. App.3d 165 (Ill. App. Ct. 1st Dist. 1983), the landlord asked the tenant to sign a "confirmation of subordination," which really turned to be a lease amendment, imposing additional obligations upon the tenant. When the tenant refused to sign it, the landlord tried to default the lease. The court held for the tenant, finding that the "confirmation" was much more—an amendment that the tenant was not obliged to sign. See also Stein, supra note 14, at p. 716.

of the mortgagee's covenant not to disturb Tenant's possession and to recognize this Lease and be unconditionally bound by the provisions hereunder, and

(2) no such documents may increase any of Tenant's obligations hereunder or decrease any of Tenant's rights or Landlord's obligations under this Lease (or that of a Successor Landlord should it succeed to Landlord's position hereunder. (Emphasis Added).

[46.3] IV. NEGOTIATING THE NONDISTURBANCE AGREEMENT

§3.1 In General. In the following sections it is assumed that the lender has agreed, in the case of a subordinate lease, to negotiate an SNDA with the tenant or, in the case of a superior lease, the tenant has a conditional subordination clause and is now confronting the subsequent lender. The manner in which the SNDA should be modified will be explored.

a. The Present Lender. In dealing with the present lender's SNDA form, the tenant has very little leverage. The loan is already funded and the lender is under no compulsion to even grant an SNDA, let alone negotiate its provisions. A case in which a lender may be motivated, however, is if it is persuaded by the landlord that signing a credit lease with a nationally known tenant will substantially benefit the property and enhance the value of the lender's security and that it is better to settle the matter now rather than to play the market at the time of foreclosure. The lender will certainly care if the tenant - presumably a credit tenant - has conditioned the lease upon obtaining an SNDA. In any case, the tenant must use its powers of persuasion to spell out the fairness of its comments to the lender's form. Many existing lenders will be open-minded and will discuss and negotiate their form to a degree because they want the present security of knowing that upon foreclosure they will have rent paying tenants ready to attorn to them and maintain the integrity of the income stream without the pitfalls of ensuring lease survival at the time of foreclosure.³⁶

b. The Future Lender. In dealing with future lenders and their SNDA forms, the situation is quite different. Here the tenant's lease is a superior encumbrance and the tenant's obligation to subordinate is conditioned upon getting nondisturbance protection from the lender upon terms and conditions acceptable to the tenant. Such future lenders, with a few exceptions, will accept the tenant and its lease as a fait accompli and will accept the tenant's modifications to their SNDA form (so long as the tenant, on its part, is not overreaching). It is unlikely that such a lender would decline to loan funds because of the necessity of negotiating an SNDA. Not surprisingly, a future lender is eminently more reasonable to deal with.

§3.2 Use of The Lender's "Customary" Form. If the nondisturbance clause of the lease contains the language of Figure 3 supra, which describes the substance of the nondisturbance agreement, then attaching a pre-approved SNDA form is not strictly necessary:

To guard against the possibility of an impasse with the future lender, many landlords insist on a provision that the nondisturbance agreement described in the lease will be on "the lender's then customary form". This is should be unacceptable to the tenant as it is placed at the mercy of the future lender where the fairness or egregiousness of a particular form is purely a function of the creativity of lender's counsel.³⁷ Whatever happens to be fashionable in nondisturbance agreements at the time, no matter how inconsistent with the basic notion of nondisturbance protection as respecting the terms and conditions of the tenant's lease, would have to be accepted by the tenant. One example of such a clause follows:

Tenant to Execute "Customary" Form of SNDA

This Lease shall become subject and subordinate to all future mortgages provided that Landlord shall deliver to Tenant from the holder of any such mortgage or superior lease an agreement in recordable form (i) whereby any such holder shall agree that as long as Tenant is not in default under any obligations under this Lease beyond any applicable notice and grace period, such holder shall not disturb Tenant's possession if such mortgage is foreclosed or superior lease terminated and (ii) containing such additional provisions as are customarily included in a subordination, attornment and non-disturbance agreement ("SNDA") issued by such holder in form reasonably acceptable to the holder of such mortgage or superior lease and Tenant. (Emphasis added).

What is "customary" is a relevant term, depending a lender's or a tenant's respective experience. To a lender, landlord or counsel for either, their experience may be that tenants acquiesced when asked to sign the lender's SNDA without substantial modification on any of the significant issues such as responsibility for prior obligations or recognizing rent offsets in self-help provisions. This practice stems from earlier custom where tenants were preconditioned to low expectations while high expectations were baked into the mindset of lenders. Thus, a lot of precedent has been set for tenants to fail in this effort. However, this is not true of the credit tenants, whether leasing a lot of space or a little.

§3.3 Attaching a Form SNDA to the Lease. Other landlords (and tenants) attempt to resolve the issue by attaching a pre-negotiated SNDA form to the lease. There are conflicting opinions on the wisdom of using a pre-negotiated form as an exhibit to the lease. Strictly speaking from the tenant's viewpoint, using a form previously negotiated between the landlord and tenant would be the safest practice for the tenant to follow. Having negotiated an acceptable form at the time of lease execution, the tenant avoids having something unknown thrust upon it later. However, the landlord will be concerned that even a pre-approved form, including one that the landlord has aggressively negotiated with the tenant to make it as "lender friendly" as possible, will not be acceptable to the future lender. Although they follow a general conceptual format, each lender's SNDA is different from another's and the one attached to the lease may not address that future lender's needs. As two commentators have noted:

There is sometimes the temptation to try to pre-negotiate an SNDA and attach a form to the lease, which the tenant agrees to execute in connection with the landlord's loan transactions. Owner's counsel may seek the input of the lender the owner anticipates using at the time, or counsel may draw upon his or her own experience to draft what is believed will be a reasonable form. This approach can lead to disaster if the lender at the next refinance proves to be unreasonable, inflexible or married to its own form.

It is virtually impossible to predict all of the issues that a future lender may see in a tenant's lease. A lender will seek to use a modified SNDA to address lease issues and tenant related issues with respect to declarations, easements, covenants or restrictions. If the Owner and tenant have agreed upon a particular form of SNDA which is attached to the lease, the Owner has denied any subsequent lender flexibility in having its own particular needs met in an SNDA. The tenant, who probably negotiated vigorously and feels that they [sic] compromised extensively, will not be willing to renegotiate an already agreed upon SNDA form. It is almost better to have basic subordination, non-disturbance and attornment language in the lease and to otherwise start from scratch with each lender in an attempt to have the lender and the tenant agree to an SNDA.³⁸

The same may be said of the tenant who may feel a prior form was negotiated very effectively in its favor and is not interested in re-visiting those issues with a new lender who thinks it can do better.

Attaching a Form Previously Negotiated with a Particular Lender. Although this may be helpful in a great number of cases, it is also dependent upon whether the previous SNDA was negotiated in a situation where the lease was prior to or junior to the mortgage. An SNDA negotiated with a lender under an existing loan may not be as favorable to the tenant as one negotiated where the tenant is dealing with a future lender. In the former case, the circumstances may have required some hard concessions from the tenant in order to secure the agreement in the first place. Thus, it will not be that helpful to the tenant in the latter case. From the lender's side, this author recently encountered the following provision in an SNDA from a loan servicer for a major lender:

38 Dale E. Ahearn, Esq. and L. Jude Clark Jr., Esq., Between a Rock And A Hard Place—Representing Owners In SNDA Negotiations, Crafting Lease Clauses, Vol. III. International Council of Shopping Centers (ICSC), Selections From ICSC U.S. Shopping Center Law Conferences, 1999–2001, p. 187, 192 et seq. (hereinafter Ahearn and Clark).

Prior Form Not a Precedent

Landlord and Tenant acknowledge that Bank enters into numerous agreements of this type on a regular basis, both in its own capacity and as a commercial mortgage servicer on behalf of other lenders, and that the specific provisions contained in any agreement of this type entered into by Bank will vary depending on numerous transaction-specific factors, including, without limitation, the borrowers, loan documents, tenants, leases, servicers, servicing agreements and property and market conditions involved in the transaction. Accordingly, Landlord and Tenant further acknowledge that the specific provisions contained in this Agreement will not necessarily be acceptable to Bank in connection with any other transaction.

To give the future lender some flexibility, landlords often propose that the tenant agree to sign a form “substantially similar” to the pre-approved form. Or they ask that the tenant sign the future lender’s form provided the same is “reasonably acceptable” to the tenant. A tenant’s response would be that the subsequent SNDA be the same in all material respects to the previously negotiated form.

Such language, while appearing quite reasonable on its face, opens the door to all manner of mischief by the lender’s counsel and the possibility of a wide area of disagreement. Experience has shown that lender’s counsel are disposed to create SNDA forms which seriously erode some of tenant’s fundamental rights under the lease. If the future lender feels that the tenant’s position with respect to a particular issue in the SNDA is not reasonable, a dilemma for the tenant is created. The landlord, faced with the possibility that its loan will be jeopardized, may be compelled to allege that the tenant is in default of the lease in refusing to sign the SNDA and send the tenant a default notice. The tenant will then be faced with defending the reasonableness of its position in an eviction proceeding. The tenant should not place itself in such jeopardy where in this case the landlord is worried about the sensitivity of a future (and as yet unknown) lender.

A tenant has little motivation in exacting unreasonable demands from the lender or from the landlord because all it really wants, in return for subordinating its lease, is nondisturbance protection and recognition of the lease upon the terms and conditions that were negotiated, without dilution by the lender. If the tenant does harbor bad faith motives and attempts to better the lease deal, the lender and the landlord can waive the necessity of subordinating the lease to the mortgage and proceed to close the loan without the tenant's subordination. What the tenant will gain from this tactic is the eternal enmity of its landlord and will likely have to pay dearly for it later on when the tenant needs the landlord's cooperation.

One possible compromise may be where (1) the lease has basic subordination, non-disturbance and attornment language in it,³⁹ and (2) the tenant additionally is required to sign a future lender's form that is "reasonably acceptable" to the tenant provided that certain conditions and prerequisites to the tenant's obligation to be "reasonable" are clearly set forth. Such a suggested clause follows:

Limitations On Agreement to Use Lender's Form SNDA

. . . provided however that any such subordination shall be conditioned upon Landlord delivering to Tenant a nondisturbance agreement in the form then customarily used by such Mortgagee, which form shall be subject to Tenant's approval which shall not be unreasonably withheld or delayed upon condition that such form:

(a) provides that so long as Tenant is not in default under this Lease beyond any grace period:

- (i) Tenant shall not be joined in any action to foreclose the Mortgage in connection with the Mortgagee's enforcement of its rights under such Mortgage (unless as a purely procedural matter such joinder is required in the jurisdiction in which the Premises is located, so long as Mortgagee does not seek the termination of the Lease, Tenant's rights under such nondisturbance agreement are not altered or diminished), this Lease shall remain in full force and effect and Tenant's possession of the Premises and its rights under this Lease shall not be disturbed or terminated,

39 Id. at p. 193.

- (ii) that this Lease shall automatically and unconditionally become a direct lease, upon its terms, between such Mortgagee, as landlord, and Tenant herein as if such party was originally named as landlord hereunder.

(b)does not increase any of Tenant's obligations under this Lease (other than (i) a requirement to give notices of Landlord's defaults to such Mortgagee and affording such party an opportunity to cure, or (ii) to deliver rent to such party in accordance with a direction to do so),

(c)does not reduce any of Tenant's rights under this Lease or any of Landlord's obligations hereunder (or that of the Mortgagee should it succeed to the Landlord's interest under the Lease. (Emphasis Added).

Such a provision would allow the lender's counsel little latitude for roguishness in attempting to alter the tenant's deal.

The New York State Bar Association Model Form. To simplify and streamline negotiations of SNDA agreements and to define a "reasonable" baseline, the Commercial Leasing Committee of the New York State Bar Association Real Property Section decided in 1992 to assign to a subcommittee the responsibility to develop a model SNDA agreement.⁴⁰ While those from the lenders side may have criticized it as going too far, those from the tenant's viewpoint complained that it did not go far enough.

40 Report of Subcommittee on Nondisturbance Agreements, with Model Agreement, NYSBA Real Property Law Section Newsletter No. 2, Spring 1994, at p 2.

Nevertheless, it was some movement toward a balance.⁴¹ The Model SNDA is attached as Exhibit A at the end of this chapter.

§3.4 The Act of Subordination—What Interest is Being Subordinated? The initial component of the SNDA is the act by which the tenant subordinates its leasehold interest to the mortgage. In SNDAs, the interest made superior is described as “the mortgage,” the “lien of the mortgage,” or both.⁴² The safest practice for the tenant to follow is to agree to subordinate its lease to the lien of the mortgage, as a statement of its relative priority vis-à-vis the recording statutes. Use of the broader phrase where the lease is subordinate to the mortgage or the terms thereof may create a presumption that the terms of the mortgage with respect to issues such as damage and destruction and condemnation will prevail over corresponding provisions of the lease where the subject is not otherwise dealt with in the SNDA. Where the subject is (typically) covered in the SNDA, this initial “subordinating” language may introduce inconsistencies or ambiguities regarding many issues that are best avoided by restricting the subordination to the mortgage lien only.

The granting clauses of mortgages are all encompassing in the extent of property subject to the mortgage lien and often extends to “all personal property appliances and goods of every nature whatsoever now or hereafter located in, or on, or used, or intended to be used in connection with the Mortgaged Property.” To the extent the landlord has granted such a blanket lien on the real and personal property located on the mortgaged premises, it is advisable for the tenant in the SNDA to insulate any its personal property from the lien of the mortgage as well as any “brand specific” leasehold improvements which under the lease it is permitted to remove and to seek confirmation by the mortgagee. Following is a suggested clause:

41 In the words of Joshua Stein: “The model SNDA agreement reflects the subcommittee’s view of how a well-represented mortgagee and a well-represented tenant could resolve the typical SNDA agreement issues without material prejudice. Some provisions in the model SNDA agreement can be characterized as “pro-mortgagee,” others as “pro-tenant.” As a whole, however, this model form represents an appropriate accommodation of the competing interests consistent with normal marketplace outcomes of negotiations between reasonably well-represented parties. In the aggregate, the subcommittee believes it is a “fair” and even-handed document.” Report of Subcommittee on Nondisturbance Agreements, with Model Agreement, NYSBA Real Property Law Section Newsletter, Spring 1994, at 42.

Mortgage Lien Does Not Apply to Tenant's Property Or Brand Specific Items

Subordination. The Lease, the leasehold estate created thereby, and all rights and privileges of Tenant thereunder shall be subject and subordinate to the lien of the Mortgage and to any renewals, modifications, consolidations, replacements and extensions of the Mortgage to the full extent of the obligations now or hereafter secured by the Mortgage.

The foregoing notwithstanding, in no event shall any of (i) Tenant's trade fixtures, inventory, equipment, furniture and furnishings, accounts, books or records or other assets ("Tenant's Property"), or (ii) any improvements or fixtures of Tenant which are Tenant's tradeness (i.e., floor covering or lighting fixtures) or which incorporate the trademarks or reproductions of copyrights by or licensed to Tenant or any of its affiliates (the "Brand Specific Improvements") be or become subject or subordinate to the lien in favor of Bank. Tenant or its lender, if applicable, shall have the right to remove Tenant's Property and Brand Specific Improvements at any reasonable time or times; provided that Tenant or its lender promptly repairs the Property to its condition prior to the removal at no expense to Bank.

§3.5 "Naked Nondisturbance" vs. Full Assumption. Although a lender may accept the concept of nondisturbance protection, there are many who are reluctant to assume the full array of landlord obligations under the lease. A practice still commonly encountered today in SNDA's is where lender lawyers continue to cling to the medieval notion that while the lender may have privity of estate and contract with the tenant and may have to suffer the presence of the tenant upon foreclosure, it doesn't have to assume any of the landlord's obligations under the lease other than those that run with the land.⁴³ For the privilege of occupying the land the tenant must attorn to the lender, pay the rents and perform the other obligations but get little back in the way of the performance of the landlord's material obligations that the tenant bargained for. At common law, the question of which obligations a lender would be required to honor upon foreclosure where the lender merely agreed not to disturb the tenant's possession, without more, would depend upon whether the covenants of the landlord in the lease run with the land or were personal in nature. The foreclosing lender would have privity of estate but not privity of contract with the tenant remaining on the premises and would be bound only by covenants in the lease which run with the land and not by personal covenants. The covenant of quiet enjoyment and those of a well maintained premises are covenants running with the land. On the other hand maintenance and repairs clauses, utility provisions, exclusives, restrictive covenants and co-tenancy clauses may or may not be personal covenants. The answer will turn on factual determinations in each case that may not be predictable.⁴⁴ This philosophy is reflected in the following provision found in nondisturbance agreements:

"Naked" Nondisturbance

So long as Tenant is not in default under the Lease (beyond any period given Tenant to cure such default) as would entitle Landlord to terminate the Lease or would cause, without any further action of Landlord, the termination of the Lease or would entitle Landlord to dispossess Tenant thereunder, Mortgagee agrees with Tenant that Mortgagee will not disturb the peaceful and quiet possession of the Premises by Tenant by reason of any Foreclosure (as hereinafter defined) or otherwise, nor join Tenant as a party in any action or proceeding brought pursuant to the Mortgage. (Emphasis Added).

Additionally, attornment clauses work in tandem with subordination clauses to ensure that with respect to leases that the lender wants to preserve, that the lease obligations run mainly in one direction – from the tenant to the foreclosing lender. Following is an example.

In the event of Foreclosure (as defined herein), Tenant shall be bound to Mortgagee under all of the provisions of the Lease for the balance of the term thereof (including any extensions or renewals thereof which may be effected in accordance with any options contained in the Lease) with the same force and effect as if Mortgagee was the Landlord under the Lease, and Tenant hereby agrees to attorn to Mortgagee as its landlord, such attornment to be effective and self operative, without the execution of any further instruments on the part of either of the parties hereto, immediately upon the succession by Mortgagee to the interest of Landlord in the Premises. (Emphasis added).

The tenant is not interested in merely having a partial landlord as its contracting party—the part that collects the rent—but rather, expects to have a party responsible for operating the property and performing the other landlord obligations the tenant originally bargained for. What is needed is to remedy Figure 13 is an attornment clause which is more expansive. The attornment clause must involve a full affirmation by the tenant to render performance of its obligations to the foreclosing lender and full assumption by the lender of the landlord’s obligations under the lease. The additional required language follows:

“ . . . and further, in such event, Mortgagee shall be automatically and unconditionally bound to the Tenant under all of the provisions of the Lease, and Tenant shall, from and after such event, have the same remedies against Mortgagee for the breach of any agreement contained in the Lease that the Tenant might have had under the Lease against Landlord thereunder . . .” (emphasis added).

The extent to which the lender will be bound to the tenant, particularly with respect to prior claims arising out of uncured defaults of the departed landlord, is the subject of contentious negotiation between the lender and the tenant.

§3.6 The Lender's "Carve-Outs." Lenders are extremely uneasy about being held accountable for outstanding defaults of the landlord which arose prior to foreclosure nor do they wish to be held to actions taken by the landlord which may be prejudicial to their position. Lenders are only willing to assume lease obligations which arise during their watch, i.e., only after they have succeeded to the landlord's interest following foreclosure (despite the fact that landlord defaults may be mounting while a lender is attempting to gain possession and title). Even more disconcerting to the tenant is the fact that lenders often try to limit or avoid certain other material obligations altogether, even after their succession to the landlord's interest.⁴⁵

Accordingly, customary lender forms of nondisturbance agreements have evolved a list of limitations (called "carve-outs") from their assumption of lease obligations upon foreclosure. A sampling of the list of carve-outs is set forth below:

The Lender "Carve Outs"

. . . and further, in such event, Successor Landlord shall be bound to the tenant under all of the provisions of the Lease, and Tenant shall, from and after such Succession, have the same remedies against Successor Landlord for the breach of any agreement contained in the Lease that the Tenant might have had under the Lease against Landlord thereunder provided, however, that Successor Landlord shall not be:

- (a) liable for any act or omission of any prior landlord (including Landlord); [See § 3.7 infra]

- (b) subject to any offsets or defenses which Tenant might have against any prior landlord (including Landlord); or [See § 3.8 infra]

⁴⁵ Or what Joshua Stein calls "Lender-Tenant Risk Shifting" and "Post-Foreclosure Lease Improvement." Stein, supra, note 14, at p. 711-712, 714.

(c) bound by any rent or additional rent which Tenant might have paid to any prior landlord (including Landlord) more than one month in advance; [See § 3.9 infra]

(d) bound by any security deposit which Tenant may have paid to any prior landlord (including Landlord), unless such deposit is available to the party who was the holder of the Mortgage at the time of a Foreclosure; or

(e) bound by any amendment, modification or termination made without the Mortgagee's consent." [See § 3.10 infra]

(f) bound by any termination of the Lease or surrender of the Premises made without the Mortgagee's consent;" [See § 3.11 infra]

(g) bound by assignments or subleases made without the lender's consent [See § 3.12 infra]

(h) liable for the performance of any construction work at or restoration of the Premises or liable for the payment of any construction allowance or contribution towards the cost of work performed by Tenant in the Premises; [See § 3.13 infra]

(i) liable for "representations and warranties" of the Landlord; [See §3.14 infra]

(j) liable for the cleanup of or damages resulting from hazardous materials in the Premises or Shopping Center; [See §3.15 infra]

(k) liable beyond the Successor Landlord's interest in the Premises [Shopping Center] for the performance of any obligation of the Landlord under the Lease. [See § 3.16 infra]

In response, the tenant will endeavor to modify the SNDA "carve-outs" in the manner discussed in the following sections. Often, when negotiating the lease it is the landlord's lawyer, and not the lender, who is insisting on the carve-out language within the lease itself. The landlord is simply trying to make it easier on itself at some future time, to the tenant's detriment, when it is seeking to re-finance the property by giving the future lender a form it will be readily happy with. This is an unwise idea for the tenant; the landlord should allow the future lender fend for itself, a task for which it is entirely capable.

§3.7 Acts or Omissions. This, together with its companion carve-out, Offsets and Defenses (see § 3.8 infra) are the most contentious of the lender carve-outs. The tenant would modify the clause as follows:

Figure 16

Lender Not Exempt From Prior Acts, Omissions, Offsets or Defenses

(Modified By Tenant)

. . . and further, in such event, Successor Landlord shall be bound to the Tenant under all of the provisions of the Lease . . . provided, however, that Successor Landlord shall not be:

- (a) liable for any act or omission of any prior landlord (including Landlord) unless Tenant shall have given notice (pursuant to Paragraph 2 hereof) of such act or omission to the party who was the then holder of the Mortgage (whether or not such holder elected to cure or remedy such act or omission); or
- (b) subject to any offsets (except those expressly permitted under the Lease) or defenses which Tenant might have against any prior landlord (including Landlord) unless Tenant shall have given notice (pursuant to Paragraph 2 hereof) of the state of facts or circumstances under which such offset or defense arose to the party who was the then holder of the Mortgage (whether or not such holder elected to cure or remedy such condition).⁴⁶

While some lenders hold to the traditional practice, others agree to a middle ground. In the words of two commentators:

⁴⁶ See Exhibit A at the end of this chapter, § 4.1.

State law varies greatly regarding a successor landlord's liability for acts and omissions, of its predecessor. In some states, a foreclosing lender is not liable for the acts or omissions of prior landlords unless they continue after foreclosure. In other states, the determination depends upon whether liability for such acts or omissions runs with the land or is personal in nature. Such determinations are often fact specific.⁴⁷

a. The Tenant's Dilemma. Most leases contain an "exculpation clause" or "non-recourse" provision which restricts all claims of the tenant for monetary damages to the landlord's "interest in the property."⁴⁸ However, following a foreclosure, the defaulting landlord no longer has an interest in the real estate. The party who does have the interest is the lender, the one who did not commit the defaults. Therefore, there is no one nor any real estate interest remaining against which the tenant might pursue its claim—a claim which has now been left behind. Further, while injunctive relief is exempt from the exculpation and might still have been an option against the new owner-lender, the new owner's position is that in any event it doesn't inherit past defaults of its predecessor and has no liability to the tenant with respect to them, whether in the nature of injunctive relief or otherwise. The tenant is left in a quandary.

This problem is further exacerbated by another clause in the lease. Many leases provide that upon a sale, the landlord is relieved of any lease obligations which arise thereafter, it being intended that each "landlord" is responsible only for those obligations that arise during its period of ownership. Tenants often modify this clause to provide that the new owner is deemed to have assumed all of such obligations and that the lease is burdened accordingly. While this may help preserve those claims for the tenant as against a future landlord who purchases the center in a bargain and sale purchase, it is of no value against a foreclosing lender or its successors who purchase the property in or following foreclosure because by virtue of the carve-out in the nondisturbance agreement; neither it nor subsequent owners will be subject to prior claims.⁴⁹

47 Ahearn and Clark, supra note 38, at p. 190.

48 This limitation would not apply to claims for injunctive relief.

49 Pursuant to the nondisturbance agreement, all "Successor Landlords" are exempt from prior claims, whether that party is the original lender or a subsequent purchaser.

Further, the lender's position is not one of complete helplessness in the matter. Although the lender did not commit the default, it was in a position to do something about it. Under the SNDA the tenant is required to notify the lender of any defaults of the landlord. The lender then has the right, but not the obligation, to cure those defaults. Since the lender has been made aware of the landlord's defaults, the lender is not without notice of the situation nor responsibility in the matter. It may take steps to force the borrower to cure the default. Barring that, such inaction result in the tenant being without a remedy upon a foreclosure when the lender has been on notice of a problem.

b. The Lender's Position. Lenders will view the tenant as having taken the risk that the original landlord might not perform its lease obligations. Accordingly, the foreclosing lender should not be looked upon as a guarantor of the prior landlord's performance, something the tenant did not have before.⁵⁰ Further, despite the myriad of covenants in the loan documents, the lender has no real effective or expeditious control over the borrower, let alone the awareness of the borrower's defaults.⁵¹

In the tenant's view, however, it had available at one time, a party or a resource (the real estate) to pursue for those claims, even if that party's solvency or the adequacy of the real estate interest was not guaranteed. Because of the non-recourse provision and the fact that the interest in the real estate has passed to the lender, the tenant loses both its right and its remedy.

Ahearn and Clark suggest that the tenant can still pursue its claim against the landlord unless the tenant "has unwisely agreed to overly restrictive exculpation language." This underestimates the difficulty encountered by tenants, including national chain credit tenants, when attempting to negotiate any changes to the non-recourse provision, let alone preserving any personal recourse against the landlord. It also overlooks the point that even with a moderate non-recourse provision, the real estate is no longer answerable for the prior claim since the lender, as the new owner of the real estate, denies liability for the very claim itself.⁵²

c. "Continuing Defaults." In an attempt to resolve the issue some lenders will propose that "continuing" defaults in the nature of mainte- nance and repairs will survive foreclosure and the lender will respond to them. To a tenant, this provision, while helpful, may be viewed as still too limiting. The category of “continuing” defaults should not be limited to repair and maintenance obligations although this is the area in which most of the problems arise. An example of another continuing default would be one where the landlord defaults in its obligation to pay the taxes on the property and the tenant, in order to prevent a tax sale and protect its position, pays them on the landlord’s behalf and has a legitimate claim for reimbursement. It is no less accurate to state that other claims for reimbursement which flow from other landlord defaults “continue” as well. The answer should not turn on the distinction between judicial concepts of covenants which run with the land and those which are “personal,” a distinction that would not exist if the lease were viewed in a contractual context.

50 Ahearn and Clark, supra note 38, at p. 190.

51 Id. at p. 190.

Additionally, even in the case of a repair obligation it is not always clear what is a continuing default and what is not. If the tenant’s roof is leaking and it has not been fixed, clearly that is a continuing default and the lender is responsible for not only the repair of the roof but also for damages suffered by the tenant (assuming the landlord was similarly liable under the lease). But what if the tenant exercises self-help (assuming the lease permits it) and fixes the roof at great expense in order to mitigate further damage to its property and loss of its business. The landlord’s failure to perform would be said to have been “cured” by the tenant who has now converted that failure into a claim for reimbursement in a liquidated amount. Does the “default”—the failure to repair—continue? Does its transformation into a liquidated claim for a sum certain destroy its character as a “continuing” default? A tenant should not be put in a worse position when it attempted to mitigate its losses than if it sat back and did nothing.

*Ahearn and Clark*⁵³ propose that the foreclosing lender assume liability for continuing acts or omissions of a prior landlord with respect to the use and enjoyment of the premises. This would mean that the successor landlord would be responsible for repair, maintenance, quiet enjoyment and lease renewal obligations. However, the foreclosing lender or foreclosure purchaser would not be liable for common area maintenance overpayments or unpaid construction allowances (except to the extent tenant’s construction constituted reusable capital improvements to the property) or other monetary obligations. They suggest that the Restatement of Prop-erty⁵⁴ also supports this view in that monetary obligations that arose from past breaches of covenants under a lease cannot be asserted against successor landlords.⁵⁵ The authors concede, however, that the extent to which the lender would have liability to the tenant for monetary amounts that flowed from an obligation that runs with the land (e.g. a repair obligation) is unclear. This is the very problem discussed in the preceding paragraph.

Other lenders offer the “continuing default” exception without expressly limiting its application to the repairs category; however, one still is left with the uncertainty of identifying which defaults are “continuing.” In one sense, all prior uncured defaults are continuing. The extent to which a tenant is willing to entertain this language is a judgment call in the context of its negotiation with the lender.

d. A Better Solution—Lender or Tenant May Cure. A satisfactory resolution for both parties is a procedure whereby the lender, upon taking possession, has a choice. It can elect to respond to the prior claim itself. Or, it can permit the tenant to effect the cure (if feasible) and to recover its costs out of the rent. The procedure would work as follows:

1. The lender must have received notice of all such claims pursuant to the notice provisions of the SNDA at the time notice thereof was sent to the landlord, with the right, but not the obligation to cure;
2. Upon foreclosure, the lender has the following choices:
 - a. cure the default itself, or
 - b. permit the tenant to cure the default and recover its costs out of the rent by way of offset. Under this option, the lender does not have to perform the obligation nor pay any money to the tenant.
3. Rights of rent offset which had accrued prior to foreclosure (assuming they were permitted in the lease in the first place) would be continued;

54 Restatement of Property (Second) § 16.1(3) (1977).

55 Ahearn and Clark, supra note 38, at p. 197.

4. Any rights of the tenant which have accrued by reason of a material breach by the landlord which is incapable of being cured are not lost upon a foreclosure. For example, if the landlord had constructively evicted the tenant by an unreasonable and permanent denial of access and/or visibility, giving rise to a termination right on the tenant's part, that right is not lost upon a foreclosure. Also, any damages the tenant has experienced are collectible as a rent offset;
5. The lender would have no liability for (nor would offset rights would extend to) consequential damages, the tenant waiving all claims for such damages as against the lender (whether or not it had the right to pursue such damages against the landlord in the first place).

While lenders do not like rent offsets, they dislike doing things even more. They would prefer to let the tenant cure the default and recover its expenses and damages out of the rent; in this way lenders do not have to lay out any money nor supervise the action. Where the tenant has already negotiated a "cure and deduct" remedy in the lease for landlord defaults, the lender will be less inclined to protest. But even where a tenant has no offset right in the lease, offering the lender this option is more palatable than requiring it to address the default directly. Lenders still may object that the tenant has now given itself, by virtue of this provision, an offset right it did not have previously against the landlord. However, as noted above, because of the non-recourse provision in the lease and the fact that the interest in the real estate has passed to the lender, the tenant would otherwise loses both its right and its remedy. Therefore, an offset right is appropriate to compensate the tenant for the loss of its traditional remedy.

Present Lender. While an existing lender has no incentive to make any concessions at all, let alone those that are perceived as an unreasonable risk, many of such lenders, recognizing the tenant's dilemma and the value of protecting their security with an SNDA with a desirable tenant, have willingly accepted this compromise solution.

Future Lenders. The tenant is in a stronger position with respect to a future lender because its lease and its subordination/nondisturbance clause is already in place and. Lenders are interested in closing loans and they are more willing to deal with an existing credit lease as a fait accompli; consequently they tend to be more accommodating on this point. Even where the lease requires that a future lender assume the lease automatically and unconditionally, it is reasonable for the tenant to agree to this solution in an attempt to add more balance to the SNDA. As the solution is fundamentally a fair one, the response among future lenders has been one of cooperation. In some cases a monetary limit on the lender's exposure to insulate it from catastrophic damage claims may be appropriate. Following is a clause that embodies this solution:

Prior Claims Preserved

. . . and further, in such event, Successor Landlord shall . . . be bound to the Tenant under all of the provisions of the Lease . . . subject, however, to the following:

a.in the case of any act or omission of any prior landlord, including Landlord, or a failure of such prior landlord, including Landlord, to observe or perform its obligations under the Lease, which arose or occurred prior to the Succession or a claim of offset arising out of any of the foregoing (such prior acts, omissions or failure to observe or perform an obligation or offsets arising therefrom being collectively referred to as "Prior Claim(s)") and provided Tenant shall have given notice of and an opportunity to cure (pursuant to Paragraph 2 hereof) such Prior Claim to the party who was the then holder of the Mortgage or to any successor thereto prior to the Succession:

1. To the extent the Prior Claim is still unperformed, Successor Landlord, by notice to Tenant within ten (10) days after Tenant's demand for performance, shall either (A) complete performance of the Prior Claim and reimburse Tenant for any Direct Damages (as defined herein) suffered by Tenant by reason of such Prior Claim, or (B) permit Tenant to perform or complete such Prior Claim and Tenant shall be granted a right of offset against Rent due or to become due hereunder in the amount of the sums so expended by or owed to Tenant and to recover Direct Damages (as defined herein) suffered by Tenant by reason of such Prior Claim.

2. With respect to Prior Claims in the nature of a right of offset against Rent which Tenant had, pursuant to the Lease, perfected prior to the Succession, Tenant shall continue to have the right to execute such offset until fully reimbursed, notwithstanding the Succession.

3. With respect to Prior Claims which materially interfere with Tenant's use and enjoyment of the Premises, Tenant shall have the right to assert such Prior Claim against Successor Landlord notwithstanding the Succession and, in addition, Tenant shall be granted a right of offset against Rent due or to become due hereunder to recover any Direct Damages suffered by Tenant by reason of the Prior Claim.

4. "Direct Damages" shall be those damages which Tenant has suffered by reason of the Prior Claim and which are reasonably foreseeable and a direct result of the Prior Claim (including, without limitation, physical damage to the Premises, leasehold improvements and Tenant's personal property), as distinguished from indirect or consequential damages (by way of example, but without limitation, lost sales or lost profits). Successor Landlord shall in no manner be liable for indirect or consequential damages which allegedly result from such Prior Claim.

b. Successor Landlord shall not be subject to any defenses except a defense (i) expressly permitted under the Lease, (ii) susceptible of application pursuant to subparagraph (a), and (iii) to the payment of a monetary obligation, and provided that, where applicable, the Mortgagee or its successor has prior to Succession been given notice of and accorded an opportunity to cure or address the circumstances giving rise to the defense pursuant to Paragraph 2 hereof.

§3.8 Offsets and Defenses. This carve-out is usually stated separately from “acts and omissions” (see §3.7 above) although both are similar in determining whether the lender is immune from them. See subparagraph (b) of Figure 17 above. This carve-out in its primordial form completely sheltered the lender from prior defenses of the tenant, resulting in a fundamental inequity.

- a. Monetary Obligations. In a situation where a Landlord-Tenant Conspiracy is not present, a claim by the landlord that the tenant underpaid an item of rent where the tenant claims that it overpaid it or it was not due,⁵⁶ presents an affirmative defense to which the tenant would otherwise be entitled. It would be an indisputable unfairness to deny the tenant this defense and require it to pay an amount twice or to pay it when it was not owed;⁵⁷
- b. Defenses Permitted Under The Lease. In cases where a condition to an obligation (although not technically a “defense” in the litigation sense) is expressly set forth in the Lease, the tenant should be permitted to assert it against the succeeding lender provided that notice of the circumstances and claim were given to the lender prior to foreclosure;
- c. Lender Self-Help Provisions of SNDA. Where the circumstances of the defense or claim were capable of being addressed under the lender’s opportunity to cure under subparagraph (a) of Figure 17 but the lender failed or elected not to do so.

§3.9 Payment of Rent in Advance. In Joshua Stein’s article, the author discusses a form of the Landlord-Tenant Conspiracy⁵⁸ in which the tenant pays a substantial amount of rent in advance, often at a discount, with the result that a significant portion of the rental value has been advanced to the landlord to the detriment of the later foreclosing lender. The tenant doesn’t want to pay this amount twice and the lender doesn’t want to be bound by a possibly fraudulent transaction.⁵⁹ However, in many leases reimbursements for common area maintenance or real estate taxes are structured in monthly installments, frequently on the basis of estimates either in advance of the actual accounting period to which they relate (real estate tax reimbursements billed on a calendar year basis for taxes applicable for an ensuing tax fiscal year on a fiscal, July 1–June 30 basis) or until the actual amount of a cost is determined. The simple solution is to revise the carve-out in the SNDA to provide that the tenant will not pay rental in advance of its due date under the Lease. The lender will have reviewed and approved the lease on the basis of the customary practice of installment payments based upon estimates; a Landlord-Tenant Conspiracy effected after the lease was signed would thus be thwarted.

56 For example, a dispute with respect to the calculation of percentage rent or a failure of a co-tenancy condition, a pre-payment of additional rent as required by the Lease (installments of real estate tax reimbursements on a calendar year basis when taxes are assessed of a fiscal year basis).

57 The Model SNDA takes a similar view. See Exhibit A at the end of this chapter, § 4.1.

58 For an explanation of this concept, see Stein, supra note 14, at p. 711.

§3.10 Amendments and Modifications. A standard carve-out in SNDA forms is the one in which the lender is not bound by modifications or amendments of the lease to which it did not consent. Generally, there is no disagreement as to the fairness of this principle, but there are exceptions and limitations to this concept. To the extent that modifications and amendments are contemplated by and provided for in the lease, the lender should be bound by them. Examples would be (a) a provision in the lease for the readjustment of the rent to fair market value upon the exercise of an extension option (or at some other predetermined time), (b) a recalculation of rent due to consumer price increases, or (c) a readjustment of the rent and construction allowance by reason of a remeasurement clause.

Lender or Successor Landlord Bound By Amendments, Provision For Which Is Contained In Lease

Successor Landlord shall not be bound by any amendment, modification or extension of the Lease made without the consent of the party who was the holder of the Mortgage at the time of such amendment or modification, except for those amendments, modifications or extensions, provision for which is expressly contained in the Lease) or unless such amendment or modification was subsequently affirmed by an intervening holder. (Emphasis Added).

⁵⁹ Stein, supra, note 14 at p. 712.

As a stylistic point, the italicized language is inserted to make it clear that subsequent successors in the chain of title did not literally have to consent to the amendment themselves so long as the then holder of the mortgage at the time of the amendment did so (or in the absence thereof, so long as an intervening holder affirmed or ratified the prior amendment).

Some SNDAs go further to describe what type of amendments would be specifically proscribed.

Lender Not Bound By Material Amendments

Lender shall not be bound by any Material Amendment of the Lease or any waiver of any term of the Lease made without Lender's written consent (which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld or delayed). The term "Material Amendment" shall mean any modification or amendment to the Lease, other than one expressly provided for in the Lease which (i) reduces or postpones the rental amount or any other amounts payable under the Lease by Tenant, (ii) increases or decreases the term of the Lease, (iii) increases or decreases the size of the Premises (as defined in the Lease), (iii) imposes new financial obligations upon Landlord in excess of $10,000.00, (iv) grants Tenant a termination option not expressly provided by the Lease as of the date hereof, or (v) grants Tenant a purchase option or right of first refusal to acquire all or any portion of the Property not expressly provided by the Lease as of the date hereof. (Emphasis Added).⁶⁰

See also the discussion under § 3.11, infra, on the rights of landlords and tenants in New York to effect amendments and terminations of the lease.

60 The underlined phrase is intended to also capture (i) abatements, i.e., actual reductions in rent, e.g., due to damage and destruction, condemnation, utility interruptions, co-tenancy failures (including the payment of alternate rent in lieu of regular rent), violations of exclusives, and (ii) postponements or deferral of rent, e.g., postponement of the rent commencement date under various circumstances, pending delivery of an SNDA. In some cases a lender may request that each possible occasion of an abatement or postponement be specifically listed in the SNDA.

a. Affirmative Obligation of Tenant to Consult Lender In Advance? Virtually all loan documents provide that the landlord-borrower may not do certain things with respect to the tenant leases without the lender's consent—such as effecting amendments, terminations, permitting assignments, releasing the tenant from liability, to name a few. Many lenders seek to enforce those provisions against the landlord by conscripting the tenant into the lender's service. Thus, nondisturbance agreements (and estoppel certificates) are often framed as an express undertaking on the tenant's part not to engage in such agreements.

Tenant May Not Amend, Etc. The Lease

... the Tenant may not, without the Mortgagee's consent:

- (a) modify, alter or amend the lease.
- (b) terminate the lease, surrender the premises or accept a cancellation of the lease by the landlord;
- (c) assign the lease or sublet the Premises without the Mortgagee's consent; (Emphasis Added)
- (d) prepay any rent more than thirty (30) days in advance.

Amendments or cancellations of the lease by the landlord are restricted by the terms of loan documents. If the tenant and the landlord enter into an amendment or the landlord cancels the lease pursuant to a right to do so in the lease, it is the landlord's duty, not the tenant's, to notify the lender and get its consent. Accordingly, it should not be the tenant's duty to insist that the lender be a signatory to every amendment or indicate its consent thereto in writing. While neither the landlord nor the tenant want to bring a third party into their deal with the power to veto it,⁶¹ it was the landlord that made the covenant and it the landlord's duty to honor it.

Also, if the tenant agrees to consult with the lender and then forgets to do so when amending the lease with the landlord, then the tenant has breached the nondisturbance agreement and the lender is not bound to recognize the lease—everything that the tenant bargained for has been voided by this simple oversight.

To protect the tenant from losing the nondisturbance protection completely while at the same time protecting the lender from being held to amendments it never knew about, the language of Figure 20 above must be rewritten into a format whereby the lender shall not be bound by certain actions of the tenant which are done without the lender's consent. In this way, although the tenant may fail to consult the lender, if there is never a loan default, the lender will never know about it and the landlord and the tenant have the benefit of their bargain. However, if there is a foreclosure, the lender isn't bound if it had never approved the transaction.

§3.11 Termination or Surrender. Leases contain numerous instances where one party or the other may cancel the lease. Both parties may have a termination right in the case of casualty or eminent domain. The tenant may have a termination right based on insufficient sales or the failure of a co-tenancy requirement. The landlord may have a termination right if the tenant goes dark. Both parties have such right if the other is in material default.

The tenant must be able to exercise the termination rights it enjoys under the lease which it negotiated. Further, if the landlord terminates the lease pursuant to some right to do so, it is wholly inappropriate for the tenant to have to check with the lender to ensure that it's also OK with it. The tenant must be able to rely upon the validity of the landlord's exercise of that right—and to change its position in that reliance—with the presumption that the landlord is empowered to do so under its loan documents or has secured the necessary permission to do so. However, see the discussion infra involving leases and mortgages in New York.

If the lease is terminated pursuant to some existing right to do so and the lender's consent was not sought or obtained, it is impractical and burdensome if, following a foreclosure years after the termination, the lender requires the tenant to return or pay the rent for the interim period. Therefore, termination rights expressly provided for in the lease must be exempted from the lender's carve-outs. However, the lender should not be bound by voluntary terminations made outside of the provisions of the lease. Some lenders require to set out the express termination rights provided by the Lease.

a. Voluntary Surrender Agreements. The tenant can agree that it will not enter into voluntary termination agreements with the landlord, which are not otherwise expressly provided for in the lease, without the lender's consent.

b. New York Real Property Law, § 291(f). In New York State, protection for the lender is achieved by virtue of a statutory provision. New York Real Property Law, Section 291 (f) provides as follows:

New York Real Property Law, § 291(f)

An agreement, referring to this section, contained in a recorded mortgage of real property, or in a recorded instrument relating to such mortgage, restricting the right or power, as against the holder of the mortgage without his [sic] consent, of the owner of the mortgaged real property to cancel, abridge or otherwise modify tenancies, subtenancies, leases or subleases of the mortgaged real property in existence at the time of the agreement, or to accept prepayments of instalments of rent to become due thereunder, shall become binding on a tenant or subtenant after written notice of such agreement, accompanied by a copy of the text thereof; and any such cancellation, abridgement, modification or prepayment made by such tenant or subtenant, after such written notice, without the consent of the holder of such mortgage, shall be voidable as against the holder, at his [sic] option. The recording on or after July first, nineteen hundred sixty, of any such mortgage or instrument relating thereto shall for the purposes of this section be in itself a sufficient notice of the restrictive agreement to any tenant or subtenant who, after such recording, acquires by assignment, whether the assignment is by instrument or by operation of law, a leasehold estate in existence at the time of the restrictive agreement. This section shall not apply (1) to any tenancy, subtenancy, lease or sublease primarily for the residential purposes of the owner of the leasehold estate, or (2) to any tenancy, subtenancy, lease or sublease having at the time of the restrictive agreement an unexpired term of less than five years.

(Emphasis Added).⁶²

The lender must furnish the tenant copies of the actual restrictions; in practice, such notice is almost always accompanied by a copy of § 291(f) itself. For example, what if the landlord terminates a tenant's lease pursuant to a provision which was contained in the lease prior to the existence of the mortgage? Where a tenant under a prior lease may not have constructive notice of the existence of subsequent mortgage, the statute requires the lender to give the tenant actual notice before the tenant is bound by it.⁶³

Section 291-f does not address leases entered into after the mortgage. Sending the tenant a 291-f notice will provide the certainty that the tenant has actual notice in addition to the constructive notice afforded by the prior recorded mortgage (where the terms of that mortgage restrict these activities). Also, with respect to states outside New York which do not have a statutory equivalent to Section 291-f, lenders have attempted to mimic the procedure by including in an estoppel certificate or other form of notice a copy of the actual restrictions that the landlord has agreed to in the mortgage in the hope that the tenant will be estopped from entering into lease amendments or taking any other adverse action without the lender's consent. However, absent privity of contract with the lender, it is doubtful that this procedure will be effective.⁶⁴ Prudence would also dictate that the tenant notify the lender or insist on the joinder of the lender in the termination notice. Thus, the lender's goal in policing the behavior of its borrower (the landlord) is achieved, albeit at some inconvenience to the tenant.

62 N.Y. Real Prop. Law § 291-f. For a full discussion of the effect of Section 291-f, see Stein, supra note 14, at p. 763 et seq.

63 Stein, supra note 14, at p. 763 et seq.

64 See Priority of Liens and Leases, supra note 1, at p. 9:

In the author's view, however, these steps are not adequate for a mortgagee relying on credit leases. The notion that a tenant is "estopped" from accepting a waiver or surrendering its lease without the mortgagee's consent simply because it knows consent is required provides a slim foundation on which to build a successful argument. What if the mortgagor represents it has obtained the mortgagee's consent; how much due diligence must the tenant perform, if any, to verify the mortgagor's representation? Because there is no privity of contract between the mortgagee and the tenant, it is far from clear that the tenant owes the mortgagee a duty to verify independently that the mortgagee's consent has, in fact, been obtained. The only adequate protection is to enter into a nondisturbance agreement that creates a binding contract between the tenant and mortgagee.

Figure 22

Lender Not Bound By Assignments or Subleases

Successor Landlord shall not be bound by an assignment of the Lease or sublease of the Premises which was made without its consent.

A provision such as this may be totally inconsistent with the lease terms. Assignments and subleases effected in accordance with the lease must be binding upon the lender. In the case of an assignment or sublease which requires the landlord's consent, it must be conclusively presumed in the tenant's favor that the landlord's consent is being given with the prior knowledge and acquiescence of the lender. Otherwise, the tenant is put into the position of having to police the landlord and the loan on the lender's behalf.

If the lease required the landlord's consent and the tenant secured it, it certainly does not want to have to convince the lender as well. If the landlord's consent to the assignment was not required at all, then this would present a serious degradation of the tenant's rights under the lease. Further, if the tenant was entitled to be released from liability upon an assignment pursuant to the terms of the assignment clause, the lender could still bind the tenant as an assignor-guarantor of the lease—an equally unacceptable result.

Assignments or subleases which can be effected without the landlord's consent must be equally binding upon the lender. All lenders will agree to this. Therefore, everything depends upon how extensively the tenant negotiated the assignment clause of the lease. Further, if the landlord is bound by a reasonable consent standard, the lender should be similarly bound. What if the landlord is ready to approve the assignment or sublease but the lender objects on reasonable grounds, e.g., a certain net worth requirement was not met? The only alternative for the tenant would be to complete the assignment but it could not guarantee the assignee or subtenant nondisturbance protection if the landlord defaults under its mortgage because the tenant's completion of the transfer would also void the SNDA (if the tenant has affirmatively agreed to secure the lender's consent first), or the lender would not be bound to recognize the assignment. This could expose the assignee-tenant to substantial losses.

Many assignment clauses grant the landlord a right of recapture when requested to consent to an assignment. If the landlord's choice is to terminate the lease or permit the assignment to proceed without any further right of consent on its part, then are we dealing with (1) a "termination" question, which may or may not require the lender's consent if the landlord is inclined to terminate, or (2) an "assignment" question (which, under these facts do not require landlord's consent) if the landlord does not elect to terminate?

Similarly, an offer to surrender procedure is a provision in an assignment clause of a lease which allows the landlord to elect to accept an offer of the surrender from the tenant and terminate the lease before the tenant ever finds an assignee or subtenant in the first place. The acceptance of the tenant's offer to surrender may be one of those already "expressly provided for in the lease," for which no lender consent is required. If the landlord declines to accept a surrender and the tenant is thereafter free to find an assignee or subtenant and effect a transfer without the landlord's consent, does the lender have to be consulted?

Lender Not Required to Perform Construction

Successor Landlord shall not be obligated to undertake or complete construction nor to reimburse Tenant for any construction allowance or contribution provided for in the Lease nor to undertake or complete reconstruction of the Premises or the Shopping Center following damage or destruction thereof.

This is problematic to a tenant. It is particularly surprising when it is a construction lender that is raising this issue. Construction lenders are in the business of funding construction and are experienced in completing projects following a foreclosure. Since their security is of greater value as a completed project than as a partially completed one, there is little compelling reason for the lender to be excused from this obligation.

Further, this provision is additionally burdensome where the landlord has agreed to pay the tenant a cash construction allowance (or grant a rent abatement) in consideration for the performance by the tenant of certain leasehold improvements at the tenant's expense.

A solution would be a provision in which the lender: (i) elects not to proceed with construction so long it has made a decision to abandon the project and demonstrates that by agreeing not to proceed with construction anywhere on the project or for anyone else; (ii) upon lender's election not to proceed, Tenant may elect to cancel the lease or proceed with the landlord's work and the tenant's work at the tenant's cost; (iii) notwithstanding such election to withdraw, it has proceeded with construction anywhere else in the project, then it is required to proceed with construction at the premises; and (iv) agrees to pay the construction allowance (if earned by the tenant) whether or not the lender proceeds with construction.

§3.14 Representations and Warranties. Another carve-out is the one that proclaims that the lender is not liable for any "representations and warranties" of the landlord under the lease that do not run with the land. Among the bundle of landlord obligations under the lease are affirmative performance obligations, obligations to refrain from doing things, obligations of indemnity, etc. Many of the aforementioned obligations are couched in terms of "representations and warranties". Others may be representations and warranties in the narrow, classic sense: "Landlord warrants and represents that there are no structural defects or hazardous materials in the building."

But if there are structural defects or hazardous materials in the building, should the lender refuse to cure the problem? Or, will the lender fix the problem but disclaim liability for the "breach of the warranty," i.e., liability to the tenant for the damages that result from the breach of the representation?

What about the representation of title which is usually framed in the following language?

Landlord represents and warrants that it is the fee simple owner of said Premises, that it has full right, power and authority to make, execute and deliver this Lease and that there are no agreements, restrictions, covenants, encumbrances or easements which will increase any of Tenant's obligations under this Lease or diminish any of Tenant's rights hereunder. (Emphasis Added).

If the landlord had failed to inform the tenant that another party had an exclusive as to some of the tenant's goods, does this mean that the lender has no responsibility? Then what happens if the protected party has secured an injunction against the tenant? If the landlord failed to inform the tenant of an unrecorded easement running over a portion of the premises, what happens then?

A lender wants the assurance that when it succeeds to landlord's position, it should have no liability for a past or future breach of the original landlord's personal covenants which the successor landlord has no power to perform.⁶⁵

Ahearn and Clark acknowledge that the repair and quiet enjoyment obligations are covenants that run with the land;⁶⁶ therefore they should be binding upon the lender. Most lenders will expressly acknowledge, at a minimum, that repair and maintenance obligations survive foreclosure. And the SNDA itself is the tenant's covenant of quiet enjoyment. However, covenants such as exclusives, restrictive covenants and co-tenancy clauses may or may not be personal covenants.⁶⁷ Aside from questions of whether an obligation is a personal covenant or one that runs with the land, the liability of the lender should not turn on whether these covenants are couched in language of "representations or warranties" as distinguished from "covenants or agreements"; rather, it should stand or fall depending upon whether it is impossible (not just inconvenient) for the lender to honor them. The adverse impact on the tenant is equally severe.

The disclaimer language may so materially affect fundamental rights of the tenant under the lease that should be modified accordingly.

§3.15 Hazardous Materials Indemnities and Cleanup. Lenders are particularly sensitive about this problem. Because of the liability federal and state environmental statutes impose upon the landowner as an ownership risk, lenders aggressively avoid this liability. However, it must also be remembered that the lender obtained a Phase I and Phase II survey before the loan was closed and it should rely on its own due diligence. Landlord itself was aware of the contents of those surveys (and usually the tenant also) and the risks will be allocated in the lease negotiation process. If the landlord had undertaken some of the risk of contamination (or if the lease was silent on the matter altogether), the lender should not lessen that responsibility (or require the tenant to absolve the lender if the lease was silent) when it succeeds to the landlord's position through foreclosure.

§3.16 Exculpation ("Non-Recourse") Provision. Although most leases already provide for one, many SNDA forms add one of their own. The one appearing in the SNDA must be made consistent with the lease. The way to accomplish this is as follows:

Lender's Liability For (Its Own) Defaults

In the event of a default by Mortgagee or Successor Landlord of the obligations of Landlord under the Lease, the scope of Mortgagee's or Successor Landlord's liability will not exceed that as set forth in Section __ [Exculpation Provision] of the Lease.

OR

Tenant's recourse shall be limited to the Successor Landlord's interest (as that term is defined in the Lease) in the Property (Emphasis Added).

§3.17 Priority of Mortgage Provisions Re Damage and Destruction and Eminent Domain.

a. Priority of Mortgage Provisions. A tenant will have bargained for provisions in the lease obligating the landlord to reconstruct the premises in the event of a casualty or condemnation except when particular circumstances have occurred that will justify a landlord's cancellation of the lease. Unless the landlord had negotiated reasonable provisions in its loan documents providing for the release of insurance proceeds in the event of a casualty, there will be an inconsistency between the mortgage document and the lease provisions.

Lenders want the loan provisions to prevail in the event of a casualty or condemnation, regardless of whether the casualty or condemnation occurs pre-foreclosure or post-foreclosure and so provide in their form SNDA or subordination of mortgage instrument. A tenant will argue that following a foreclosure, the lender, as the successor landlord who has recognized the lease, should be obligated to perform all of the landlord's obligations, including those the tenant has negotiated under the casualty and condemnation clauses of the lease. The lender should not be able to pick-and-choose which clauses it likes better in an exercise of Post-Foreclosure Lease Improvement.⁶⁸ In addition, the lease will provide that the landlord's obligation to restore will be dependent upon the proceeds it receives, undiminished by their appropriation by the lender to pay down the loan.

b. Fire Insurance Proceeds. All form mortgages initially permit the lender, at its option, to either appropriate the landlord's insurance proceeds to pay off or to reduce the loan or to release the funds for restoration of the damage. While many landlords successfully negotiate an agreement from the lender to release the proceeds upon a destruction,⁶⁹ others do not. Unfortunately, this is a negotiation in which the tenant is rarely invited to participate.

Many leases require that the tenant pays for the cost of the landlord's insurance covering the building shell in addition to the cost of the tenant's own insurance covering the leasehold improvements installed by the tenant. Landlords often retain great flexibility in the types and amount of insurance they will be required to carry. They often do not undertake to carry 100% replacement cost coverage (80% to 90% of replacement cost being more common) and retain wide discretion as to amount of the deductible (or self-insurance) they will maintain. Some landlords still do not even undertake to carry insurance at all. Although the lender will always require that the landlord-borrower carry sufficient insurance to protect the lender's security, the landlord seldom mirrors that obligation in the lease.⁷⁰

Upon a destruction, those leases allow the landlord to appropriate all or any part of such proceeds whether or not the lease is terminated. If the lender has exercised its rights under the mortgage to confiscate the proceeds, the tenant finds itself in the unhappy position of having paid the premium for a fund which is simply used to pay off the landlord's loan while the tenant's lease (1) may be terminated with no opportunity to 68 Stein, supra note 14, at p. 711.

69 Often through an escrow mechanism of an "insurance depository."

70 This should always be unacceptable to the tenant. A specific provision requiring the landlord to carry insurance of the same type and scope of coverage as that required of the tenant should be included in the lease.

recover its costs, or (2) is continued but without funds to pay for restoration.⁷¹

Following a foreclosure, in which the lender is bound to recognize the lease, it is unseemly to appropriate the proceeds of available insurance, especially the tenant's insurance and still expect the lease to otherwise continue. For a casualty or condemnation which occurs prior to foreclosure, the result is the same since the parties will be denied the funds with which to restore. To abrogate these often heavily negotiated casualty and condemnation provisions altogether and to render the insurance proceeds as a convenient fund with which to pay down the loan while the lease nevertheless continues would not be acceptable to a tenant. In response, a powerful tenant should insist upon (and will usually obtain) a provision in the SNDA that in the event of an occurrence, the damage and destruction, insurance and condemnation clauses of the lease will govern and prevail over the corresponding provisions of the mortgage, whether or not there has been a default under the mortgage and whether the occurrence took place before or after foreclosure.

Figure 25

Lease Provisions Re Casualty and Condemnation Prevail Release of Interest in Insurance Proceeds and Condemnation Awards

Notwithstanding the provisions of anything in the Lease or the Mortgage to the contrary, Mortgagee agrees:

(i) to the damage and destruction and insurance provisions of Article _____ of the Lease, and

(ii) that provided the Lease is not terminated by reason of a Casualty (as defined in the Lease) and that notwithstanding that Mortgagee may be named under the Tenant's insurance policies as loss payee thereunder, Mortgagee shall:

71 The situation can be even worse where the lease was still in effect because the tenant had no right to terminate and the landlord had limited its own obligation to restore to the amount of the insurance proceeds available to it.

- (x) release its interest in the proceeds payable under Tenant's AllRisk insurance policies ("Tenant's Proceeds"), and
- (y) if Landlord is also carrying All-Risk Insurance covering the Premises, shall release its interest in the proceeds payable under Landlord's All-Risk insurance policies ("Landlord's Proceeds"), all in accordance with the provisions of Article ___ of the Lease.

Tenant's Proceeds (and Landlord's Proceeds, if any) shall be used for the restoration of any Casualty damage to the Premises to the extent required by the provisions of Article ___ of the Lease. If the Lease is terminated pursuant to Section ___ thereof, Mortgagee shall nevertheless release to Tenant that portion of Tenant's Proceeds to which Tenant may be entitled pursuant to Section ___ of the Lease.

Further, and notwithstanding the provisions of anything in the Lease or the Mortgage to the contrary, Mortgagee agrees (a) to the eminent domain provisions of Section ___ of the Lease, and (b) the disposition of the condemnation award pursuant to the provisions of Section ___.

c. Enclosed Mall Leases. As a practical matter, however, this point will be difficult to achieve in shopping center leases simply because the tenant is but one satellite store out of many pushing up against the lender's position on the disposition of insurance proceeds already negotiated into the shopping center's mortgage.

d. Strip or Street Deals. However, in street or strip center deals the tenant is able to more effectively convince the lender to release its grip on those proceeds. Often, the landlord itself has negotiated for the release of the proceeds. The tenant only requires the lender to acknowledge that obligation as well as the restoration obligations of the landlord and the tenant under the damage and destruction clause.

Barring any success in obtaining such as provision, the tenant might secure some protection in the lease to obligate the landlord to restore, regardless of lender appropriation, if the restoration cost is below a certain threshold amount. See Figure 26 below.

e. Landlord to Undertake a Limited Obligation When Lender Appropriates Proceeds. In the absence of securing a provision like Figure 25, a possible approach to this problem would be as follows. If the lender appropriates the proceeds to the extent that the landlord would be forced to spend out-of-pocket in excess of a certain threshold amount, the landlord would be relieved of its obligation to restore unless the tenant elected to supply the excess. This approach is similar to the way in which the parties deal with uninsurable casualties—a certain level of risk is assumed with the obligation to spend monies out-of-pocket so long as it is below a certain threshold level of required expenditure. It is critical however for the lender to agree to this in the SNDA for it to be effective. Following is a suggested clause:

Figure 26

Appropriation of Insurance Proceeds by Landlord's Lender

Notwithstanding the foregoing, in the event of an insured casualty and in the further event that Landlord's lender appropriates all or any portion of the Landlord's insurance proceeds and as a result thereof, the cost to Landlord would be less than twenty-five percent (25%) of the replacement cost that Landlord would incur in discharging its restoration obligations in the event there was a total destruction of the Premises (the "Landlord's Threshold Amount"), then Landlord shall nevertheless be obligated to restore the damage. If such after such appropriation by the lender the cost to Landlord would be more than the Landlord's Threshold Amount, then Landlord may, within forty-five (45) days after such damage or destruction, notify Tenant of its intention not to repair its portion and terminate this Lease. If Landlord has given Tenant such notice of intention not to repair or restore, this Lease shall terminate upon the expiration of thirty (30) days after receipt by Tenant of such notice unless Tenant shall elect, by notice to Landlord within such 30-day period, to repair or restore the Landlord's portion of such damage or destruction at Tenant's cost and expense. If the Tenant so elects, this Lease shall continue in full force and effect and the Tenant shall proceed to make such repairs and restoration as soon as reasonably possible. Upon completion of the Tenant's repair or restoration work, the Landlord shall reimburse Tenant an amount equal to the Landlord's Threshold Amount.

f. Loan Disbursement Procedures—Waiver of Certain Requirements. Mortgages will contain a number of procedural requirements or preconditions for the release of proceeds, including the placement of all funds into an “insurance depository.” Some mortgages simply state that proceeds will be disbursed “pursuant to the lender’s loan disbursement procedures which are then applicable.”

If feasible, the tenant should ask to review what those procedures are to determine if there are any unduly burdensome impediments to the release of the proceeds. Usually (but not always) the tenant can do little about them; on some occasions the lender can be convinced to release the proceeds under circumstances that the landlord was unable to obtain for itself. Generally, however, the tenant should only seek to get the lender’s agreement to waive certain nuisance provisions, such as the posting of a performance bond or the furnishing of lien waivers as a precondition to payment in the case of a credit tenant. If a lender agrees to these, such provisions could be made personal to the specific tenant. The SNDA would provide that the insurance proceeds, when being disbursed by the lender, depository or holder of the funds (“Holder”) would not be conditioned upon the following:

- (i) Approval by the landlord, or the Holder of any of the tenant’s contractors or subcontractors;
- (ii) Delivery to the Holder of lien waivers in advance of any restoration work performed at the premises;
- (iii) Previous payment by the tenant for the work or any portion thereof when the tenant requests a full or partial payment, so long as evidence of obligations actually incurred are presented;
- (iv) Delivery to the Holder of lien waivers after completion of the work or partial lien waivers at any intermediate stage of the work from any contractor or subcontractor other than the tenant's general contractor retained for the performance of such work provided that the tenant reaffirms its obligation to cause to be discharged any lien against the property filed by any contractor or materialman and to indemnify the landlord and the Holder with respect thereto;

- (v) The furnishing of a payment or performance bond in connection with such restoration work.

§3.18 Eminent Domain. The situation is even more problematic for the tenant in the case of a condemnation. Most leases contain fairly liberal provisions for the landlord and rather limited protection for the tenant with respect to the cancellation of the lease following a partial condemnation.⁷² Just about every lease permits the landlord to appropriate all of the damages for a taking including those relating to all leasehold improvements on the real estate regardless of whether the tenant paid for them, as well as damages applicable to the value of the leasehold estate, i.e., the bonus value of the rent under the lease (which would otherwise be a tenant damage item). What is left for the tenant are only those special damages specifically awarded to it such as relocation costs, trade fixtures etc., provided such tenant damages do not reduce the landlord's award.⁷³

Larger tenants can obtain an agreement from the landlord that if the lease is terminated, the tenant can recover from the award the remaining unamortized portion of its leasehold improvement costs (exclusive of any construction allowance paid to the tenant) even though those sums would normally be included in the landlord's award for the taking of the bricks and mortar. If the lease is not terminated, those tenants will negotiate for the release from the award sufficient to cover the cost of restoring the leasehold improvements if they have been affected by the taking and are not part of the landlord's obligation to restore.

72 In the case of a total condemnation of the premises, the lease automatically terminates and the only residual question is the apportionment of damages.

73 It's difficult to understand how such damages could reduce the landlord's award if they are truly specifically awarded to the tenant. Even if a court makes one award for the total amount of all property interests taken and the damage suffered by both landlord and tenant, does the answer turn on (a) whether each element of damage is identifiable as a "landlord damage item" or a "tenant damage item," or (b) whether the award is embodied in a one party check (i.e., where the landlord is the sole payee) or a two-party check?

Unlike a casualty however, once the taking has occurred the property taken is gone forever and the damages stand in place of the improvements. The lender is worried that there will not be enough to go around in a total taking or that in a partial taking it will not receive a sufficient share reflective of the security taken. However, if the arithmetic is correct and compensation is awarded for the whole bundle of rights taken,⁷⁴ there should be sufficient funds for everyone. Provision should be made in the SNDA, as in Figure 25 above, for the lender to honor the negotiated eminent domain provisions of the lease.

Nevertheless, most tenants accept a clause which is unfavorable to them simply because the risk of a condemnation (especially one affecting an interior premises in a shopping center) is extremely rare and the sensitivity of the lender is extremely high. Regardless of the outcome of the eminent domain clause in a lease negotiation, a lender who is willing to sign a nondisturbance agreement should respect the rights and obligations of the parties. Again, this point is not pursued by many tenants, for reasons of practicality.

§3.19 Opportunity of Lender to Cure. Most SNDAs (as well as leases and estoppels) contain a “mortgagee protection clause,” i.e., a provision which extends to the lender an opportunity to cure the landlord’s failure of performance before the tenant can declare a default and/or claim a forfeiture. A typical clause is as follows:

Landlord’s Default. Tenant agrees with Mortgagee that, from and after the date Tenant receives a fully executed copy of this Agreement, Tenant will not seek to terminate the Lease by reason of any act or omission of the Landlord until Tenant shall have given written notice of such act or omission to the holder of the Mortgage (at such holder’s last address furnished to Tenant) and following the expiration of the period accorded to the Landlord in the Lease to cure such default the holder shall have an additional reasonable period of time (but not less than thirty (30) days after the expiration of the Landlord's cure period for such default) during which period such holder shall have the right, but not the obligation, to remedy such act or omission.

74 That is, the bricks and mortar, the rent stream, the value of the reversion, the value of the leasehold estate as well as the special tenant damages.

This is less than optimum protection for the tenant. A lender will have to have a receiver appointed or foreclose on the property to even put itself in a position to cure the default (and the landlord defaults may be mounting while a lender is attempting to get possession and title). Such proceedings could take an unacceptably long period of time. How long the tenant will have to wait for a cure while this is going on is an issue, especially if the lender's cure period does not even begin until the landlord's has expired. If the landlord has an open-ended period to cure non-monetary defaults, then it unclear when the lender's duty arises. The nature of the default should determine the period in which the lender must cure. The lender should (i) give the tenant prompt notice after receipt of tenant's default notice [10 days?] of its intention to cure the default, failing which the tenant may proceed with its remedies, (ii) have 10 days to cure monetary defaults and 30 days for non-monetary defaults (or longer if reasonably necessary), which periods run concurrently with the landlord's cure period.

§3.20 Tenant to Honor Lender's Notice of Landlord Default. When the landlord defaults under its mortgage, the most immediate summary remedy available to the lender is to invoke its rights as an assignee under the collateral assignment of rents and leases which the landlord gave to the lender as additional security for the loan.⁷⁵ Consequently, it will send a notice to the tenant and demand that future rent payments be sent directly to the lender. All nondisturbance agreements require the tenant to honor this demand.

However, the tenant does not want to be caught in the middle between the lender and the landlord, especially where the landlord denies that it is in default under the mortgage and is disputing the lender's demand as inappropriate and premature. It is essential, therefore, that the landlord be made a party to the SNDA and release the tenant from the duty to inquire as to the appropriateness of the lender's notice and from liability for any rents paid to the lender at the lender's direction.

⁷⁵ When the lender takes a collateral assignment of rents and leases as additional security, the assignment is conditional or contingent in nature. The landlord is permitted to collect the rents under the leases so long as the landlord is free of default under the mortgage. If the landlord does default, the lender perfects its status as the "assignee" and is immediately entitled to collect and retain the rents payable under the tenant's lease.

[46.4] V. CONCLUSION

To those who suggest that negotiating an SNDA is a “needless disturbance” in pursuit of protection against improbable events, it was the goal of this article to serve as a counterpoint to that assertion, stressing the importance to a tenant in obtaining one from a lender against the possibility of a landlord default. While SNDAs are still resisted by lenders and landlords with a stubbornness grounded in a tradition of presumed submission on the part of tenants, its value to a tenant (and the lender) justifies setting about on this odyssey to protect its investment and a thriving business. The article expressed the legitimate concerns of the tenant in this process and suggested areas of compromise in which the lender can be engaged in a constructive dialog to a reasonable solution, satisfactory to both parties. The more these compromises are forcefully pursued by a greater number of tenants, the greater the likelihood that the existing practices throughout the leasing industry will begin to shift to a more balanced state of shared risk.

SUBORDINATION, NONDISTURBANCE AND ATTORNMENT AGREEMENT

This SUBORDINATION, NONDISTURBANCE, AND ATTORNMENT AGREEMENT (this "Agreement") is entered into as of _____, 201__ (the "Effective Date"), between _____, a _____, whose address is _____ ("Mortgagee"), and _____, a _____, whose address is _____ ("Tenant"), with reference to the following facts:

A. _____, a _____, whose address is _____ ("Landlord"), owns the real property located at _____ (such real property, including all buildings, improvements, structures and fixtures located thereon, "Landlord's Premises"), as more particularly described in Schedule A.

B. Mortgagee has made a loan to Landlord in the original principal amount of $_____ (the "Loan").

C. To secure the Loan, Landlord has encumbered Landlord's Premises by entering into that certain _____ Mortgage, Consolidation and Modification Agreement dated _____, 200__, in favor of Mortgagee (as amended, increased, renewed, extended, spread, consolidated, severed, restated, or otherwise changed from time to time, the "Mortgage") to be recorded in the Official Records of the County of _____, State of New York (the "Land Records").

D. Pursuant to a _____ Lease dated as of _____, _____, as amended on _____, _____, and _____, _____ (the "Lease"), Landlord demised to Tenant [part of] Landlord's Premises ("Tenant's Premises"). Tenant's Premises are commonly known as _____.

E. Tenant and Mortgagee desire to agree upon the relative priorities of their interests in Landlord's Premises and their rights and obligations if certain events occur.

NOW, THEREFORE, for good and sufficient consideration, Tenant and Mortgagee agree:

1. Definitions.

The following terms shall have the following meanings for purposes of this Agreement.

1.1 Construction-Related Obligation. A “Construction-Related Obligation” means any obligation of Landlord under the Lease to make, pay for, or reimburse Tenant for any alterations, demolition, or other improvements or work at Landlord’s Premises, including Tenant’s Premises. “Construction-Related Obligations” shall not include: (a) reconstruction or repair following fire, casualty or condemnation; or (b) day-to-day maintenance and repairs.

1.2 Foreclosure Event. A “Foreclosure Event” means: (a) foreclosure under the Mortgage; (b) any other exercise by Mortgagee of rights and remedies (whether under the Mortgage or under applicable law, including bankruptcy law) as holder of the Loan and/or the Mortgage, as a result of which Successor Landlord becomes owner of Landlord’s Premises; or (c) delivery by Landlord to Mortgagee (or its designee or nominee) of a deed or other conveyance of Landlord’s interest in Landlord’s Premises in lieu of any of the foregoing.

1.3 Former Landlord. A “Former Landlord” means Landlord and any other party that was landlord under the Lease at any time before the occurrence of any attornment under this Agreement.

1.4 Offset Right. An “Offset Right” means any right or alleged right of Tenant to any offset, defense (other than one arising from actual payment and performance, which payment and performance would bind a Successor Landlord pursuant to this Agreement), claim, counterclaim, reduction, deduction, or abatement against Tenant’s payment of Rent or performance of Tenant’s other obligations under the Lease, arising (whether under the Lease or under applicable law) from Landlord’s breach or default under the Lease.

1.5 Rent. The “Rent” means any fixed rent, base rent or additional rent under the Lease.

1.6 Successor Landlord. A “Successor Landlord” means any party that becomes owner of Landlord’s Premises as the result of a Foreclosure Event.

1.7 Termination Right. A “Termination Right” means any right of Tenant to cancel or terminate the Lease or to claim a partial or total eviction arising (whether under the Lease or under applicable law) from Landlord’s breach or default under the Lease.

2. Subordination.

The Lease shall be, and shall at all times remain, subject and subordinate to the Mortgage, the lien imposed by the Mortgage, and all advances made under the Mortgage.

3. Nondisturbance, Recognition and Attornment.

3.1 No Exercise of Mortgage Remedies Against Tenant. So long as the Lease has not been terminated on account of Tenant's default that has continued beyond applicable cure periods (an "Event of Default"), Mortgagee shall not name or join Tenant as a defendant in any exercise of Mortgagee's rights and remedies arising upon a default under the Mortgage unless applicable law requires Tenant to be made a party thereto as a condition to proceeding against Landlord or prosecuting such rights and remedies. In the latter case, Mortgagee may join Tenant as a defendant in such action only for such purpose and not to terminate the Lease or otherwise adversely affect Tenant's rights under the Lease or this Agreement in such action.

3.2 Nondisturbance and Attornment. If the Lease has not been terminated on account of an Event of Default by Tenant, then, when Successor Landlord takes title to Landlord's Premises: (a) Successor Landlord shall not terminate or disturb Tenant's possession of Tenant's Premises under the Lease, except in accordance with the terms of the Lease and this Agreement; (b) Successor Landlord shall be bound to Tenant under all the terms and conditions of the Lease (except as provided in this Agreement); (c) Tenant shall recognize and attorn to Successor Landlord as Tenant's direct landlord under the Lease as affected by this Agreement; and (d) the Lease shall continue in full force and effect as a direct lease, in accordance with its terms (except as provided in this Agreement), between Successor Landlord and Tenant.

3.3 Further Documentation. The provisions of this Article shall be effective and self-operative without any need for Successor Landlord or Tenant to execute any further documents. Tenant and Successor Landlord shall, however, confirm the provisions of this Article in writing upon request by either of them.

4. Protection of Successor Landlord.

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease or the Mortgage, Successor Landlord shall not be liable for or bound by any of the following matters:

4.1 Claims Against Former Landlord. Any Offset Right that Tenant may have against any Former Landlord relating to any event or occurrence before the date of attornment, including any claim for damages of any kind whatsoever as the result of any breach by Former Landlord that occurred before the date of attornment. (The foregoing shall not limit either (a) Tenant's right to exercise against Successor Landlord any Offset Right otherwise available to Tenant because of events occurring after the date of attornment or (b) Successor Landlord's obligation to correct any conditions that existed as of the date of attornment and violate Successor Landlord's obligations as landlord under the Lease.)

4.2 Prepayments. Any payment of Rent that Tenant may have made to Former Landlord more than thirty days before the date such Rent was first due and payable under the Lease with respect to any period after the date of attornment other than, and only to the extent that, the Lease expressly required such a prepayment.

4.3 Payment; Security Deposit. Any obligation: (a) to pay Tenant any sum(s) that any Former Landlord owed to Tenant or (b) with respect to any security deposited with Former Landlord, unless such security was actually delivered to Mortgagee.

4.4 Modification, Amendment, or Waiver. Any modification or amendment of the Lease, or any waiver of any terms of the Lease, made without Mortgagee's written consent.

4.5 Surrender, Etc. Any consensual or negotiated surrender, cancellation, or termination of the Lease, in whole or in part, agreed upon between Landlord and Tenant, unless effected unilaterally by Tenant pursuant to the express terms of the Lease.

4.6 Construction-Related Obligations. Any Construction-Related Obligation of Former Landlord.

5. Exculpation of Successor Landlord.

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Agreement or the Lease, upon any attornment pursuant to this Agreement the Lease shall be deemed to have been automatically amended to provide that Successor Landlord's obligations and liability under the Lease shall never extend beyond Successor Landlord's (or its successors' or assigns') interest, if any, in Landlord's Premises from time to time, including insurance and condemnation proceeds, Successor Landlord's interest in the Lease, and the proceeds from any sale or other disposition of Landlord's Premises by Successor Landlord (collectively, "Successor Landlord's Interest"). Tenant shall look exclusively to Successor Landlord's Interest (or that of its successors and assigns) for payment or discharge of any obligations of Successor Landlord under the Lease as affected by this Agreement. If Tenant obtains any money judgment against Successor Landlord with respect to the Lease or the relationship between Successor Landlord and Tenant, then Tenant shall look solely to Successor Landlord's Interest (or that of its successors and assigns) to collect such judgment. Tenant shall not collect or attempt to collect any such judgment out of any other assets of Successor Landlord.

6. Mortgagee's Right to Cure.

6.1 Notice to Mortgagee. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in the Lease or this Agreement, before exercising any Termination Right or Offset Right, Tenant shall provide Mortgagee with notice of the breach or default by Landlord giving rise to same (the "Default Notice") and, thereafter, the opportunity to cure such breach or default as provided for below.

6.2 Mortgagee's Cure Period. After Mortgagee receives a Default Notice, Mortgagee shall have a period of thirty days beyond the time available to Landlord under the Lease in which to cure the breach or default by Landlord. Mortgagee shall have no obligation to cure (and shall have no liability or obligation for not curing) any breach or default by Landlord, except to the extent that Mortgagee agrees or undertakes otherwise in writing.

6.3 Extended Cure Period. In addition, as to any breach or default by Landlord the cure of which requires possession and control of Landlord's Premises, provided only that Mortgagee undertakes to Tenant by written notice to Tenant within thirty days after receipt of the Default Notice to exercise reasonable efforts to cure or cause to be cured by a receiver such breach or default within the period permitted by this paragraph, Mortgagee's cure period shall continue for such additional time (the "Extended Cure Period") as Mortgagee may reasonably require to either (a) obtain possession and control of Landlord's Premises and thereafter cure the breach or default with reasonable diligence and continuity or (b) obtain the appointment of a receiver and give such receiver a reasonable period of time in which to cure the default.

7. Confirmation of Facts.⁷⁶

Tenant represents to Mortgagee and to any Successor Landlord, in each case as of the Effective Date:

7.1 Effectiveness of Lease. The Lease is in full force and effect, has not been modified, and constitutes the entire agreement between Landlord and Tenant relating to Tenant's Premises. Tenant has no interest in Landlord's Premises except pursuant to the Lease. No unfulfilled conditions exist to Tenant's obligations under the Lease.

7.2 Rent. Tenant has not paid any Rent that is first due and payable under the Lease after the Effective Date.

7.3 No Landlord Default. To the best of Tenant's knowledge, no breach or default by Landlord exists and no event has occurred that, with the giving of notice, the passage of time or both, would constitute such a breach or default.

7.4 No Tenant Default. Tenant is not in default under the Lease and has not received any uncured notice of any default by Tenant under the Lease.

7.5 No Termination. Tenant has not commenced any action nor sent or received any notice to terminate the Lease. Tenant has no presently exercisable Termination Right(s) or Offset Right(s).

7.6 Commencement Date. The "Commencement Date" of the Lease was _____.

7.7 Acceptance. Subject to any exceptions set forth following this paragraph: (a) Tenant has accepted possession of Tenant's Premises; and (b) Landlord has performed all Construction-Related Obligations related to Tenant's initial occupancy of Tenant's Premises and Tenant has accepted such performance by Landlord. The only exceptions are as follows:

⁷⁶ This section overlaps with an estoppel certificate. If you include this section, you don't need an estoppel certificate. If you get an estoppel certificate, you don't need this section (except the last paragraph).

7.8 No Transfer. Tenant has not transferred, encumbered, mortgaged, assigned, conveyed or otherwise disposed of the Lease or any interest therein, other than sublease(s) made in compliance with the Lease.

7.9 Due Authorization. Tenant has full authority to enter into this Agreement, which has been duly authorized by all necessary actions.

8. Miscellaneous.

8.1 Rent Payment Notices. From and after Tenant's receipt of written notice from Mortgagee (a "Rent Payment Notice"), Tenant shall pay all Rent to Mortgagee or as Mortgagee shall direct in writing, until such time as Mortgagee directs otherwise in writing. Tenant shall comply with any Rent Payment Notice notwithstanding any contrary instruction, direction or assertion from Landlord. Mortgagee's delivery to Tenant of a Rent Payment Notice, or Tenant's compliance therewith, shall not be deemed to: (a) cause Mortgagee to succeed to or to assume any obligations or responsibilities as Landlord under the Lease, all of which shall continue to be performed and discharged solely by Landlord unless and until any attornment has occurred pursuant to this Agreement; or (b) relieve Landlord of any obligations under the Lease.

8.2 Notices. All notices or other communications required or permitted under this Agreement shall be in writing and given by certified mail (return receipt requested) or by nationally recognized overnight courier service that regularly maintains records of items delivered. Each party's address is as set forth in the opening paragraph of this Agreement, subject to change by notice under this paragraph. Notices shall be effective the next business day after being sent by overnight courier service, and five business days after being sent by certified mail (return receipt requested).

8.3 Successors and Assigns. This Agreement shall bind and benefit the parties, their successors and assigns, any Successor Landlord, and its successors and assigns. If Mortgagee assigns the Mortgage, then upon delivery to Tenant of written notice thereof accompanied by the assignee's written assumption of all obligations under this Agreement, all liability of the assignor shall terminate.

8.4 Entire Agreement. This Agreement constitutes the entire agreement between Mortgagee and Tenant regarding the subordination of the Lease to the Mortgage and the rights and obligations of Tenant and Mortgagee as to the subject matter of this Agreement.

8.5 Interaction with Lease and with Mortgage. If this Agreement conflicts with the Lease, then this Agreement shall govern as between the parties and any Successor Landlord, including upon any attornment pursuant to this Agreement. This Agreement supersedes, and constitutes full compliance with, any provisions in the Lease that provide for subordination of the Lease to, or for delivery of nondisturbance agreements by the holder of, the Mortgage. Mortgagee confirms that Mortgagee has consented to Landlord's entering into the Lease.

8.6 Mortgagee's Rights and Obligations. Except as expressly provided for in this Agreement, Mortgagee shall have no obligations to Tenant with respect to the Lease. If an attornment occurs pursuant to this Agreement, then all rights and obligations of Mortgagee under this Agreement shall terminate, without thereby affecting in any way the rights and obligations of Successor Landlord provided for in this Agreement.

8.7 Interpretation; Governing Law. The interpretation, validity and enforcement of this Agreement shall be governed by and construed under the internal laws of the State where Landlord's Premises are located, excluding its principles of conflict of laws.

8.8 Amendments. This Agreement may be amended, discharged or terminated, or any of its provisions waived, only by a written instrument executed by the party to be charged.

8.9 Execution. This Agreement may be executed in any number of counterparts, each of which shall be deemed an original and all of which together shall constitute one and the same instrument.

8.10 Mortgagee's Representation. Mortgagee represents that Mortgagee has full authority to enter into this Agreement, and Mortgagee's entry into this Agreement has been duly authorized by all necessary actions.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, this Agreement has been duly executed by Mortgagee and Tenant as of the Effective Date.

Landlord consents and agrees to the foregoing Agreement, which was entered into at Landlord's request. The foregoing Agreement shall not alter, waive or diminish any of Landlord's obligations under the Mortgage or the Lease. The above Agreement discharges any obligations of Mortgagee under the Mortgage and related loan documents to enter into a non-disturbance agreement with Tenant. Landlord is not a party to the above Agreement. Landlord irrevocably directs Tenant to comply with any Rent Payment Notice, notwithstanding any contrary direction, instruction, or assertion by Landlord. Tenant shall be entitled to rely on any Rent Payment Notice. Tenant shall be under no duty to controvert or challenge any Rent Payment Notice. Tenant's compliance with a Rent Payment Notice shall not be deemed to violate the Lease. Landlord hereby releases Tenant from, and shall indemnify and hold Tenant harmless from and against, any and all loss, claim, damage, liability, cost or expense (including payment of reasonable attorneys' fees and disbursements) arising from any claim based upon Tenant's compliance with any Rent Payment Notice. Landlord shall look solely to Mortgagee with respect to any claims Landlord may have on account of an incorrect or wrongful Rent Payment Notice. Tenant shall be entitled to full credit under the Lease for any Rent paid to Mortgagee pursuant to a Rent Payment Notice to the same extent as if such Rent were paid directly to Landlord.

CHAPTER FORTY-SEVEN

NEW YORK STATUTES ON COMMERCIAL LEASING

Joshua Stein, Esq.*

* The author acknowledges with thanks the research and editorial assistance for earlier editions provided by Alejandro Chico, Andrea David-Vega, Marisa Fries Crasper, Robert J. Gorrie, and Jeanye Kwack. Further assistance and commentary was provided by: Steve P. Kalson; Peter Labuza; Alfredo R. Lagamon, Jr., of Ernst & Young; Donald H. Oppenheim, formerly of Meyers Nave PC; David Ortner, of Advance Realty Development; and Elizabeth T. Power, of the author's staff. A slightly different version of this statutory compendium appears in each edition of Mark A. Senn's multi-volume "State-by-State Guide to Commercial Real Estate Leases," published by Wolters Kluwer Legal & Regulatory U.S. If a reader notices any error, omission, misinterpretation, or can suggest any important comment on any statute (particularly one that politely challenges the reporter's comments), please email joshua@joshuastein.com.

[47.0] OVERVIEW

This chapter collects extracts from New York statutes, and from the New York City Administrative Code and only certain city regulations, that directly affect commercial leasing in New York State and New York City. Each statute has been limited to matters that affect current commercial leasing transactions. Provisions that do not relate to commercial leasing, or no longer apply but remain in the statute, are omitted. Most landlord-tenant procedural law beyond initiation of an action is not covered. This collection modifies most references to dates, numbers above nine, and statutes to make them as simple and short as possible (e.g., “Universal Law § 704(b)(2)”), even though the Legislature’s practice seems to be to make them all rather complicated and long-winded (e.g., “subsection two of section b of section seven hundred and four of the universal law”). Spelling errors and inconsistencies (such as regarding capitalization) have been corrected. This collection therefore does not provide the complete precise text of each statute, but only the part(s) normally relevant. These and other deletions and changes are marked. This is a “simplified” collection of statutory language and should not be relied upon as a more general reference source, particularly when quoting or citing a statute in any papers to be filed with any court. Any user should check for updates and changes to any statute before relying upon it.

This chapter is not intended to constitute an authoritative source for any statute, but merely a practical handbook with the relevant portions of each statute, in a readily comprehensible format, followed by commentary. Some of these commentaries (and these introductory notes) include expressions of opinion rather than explications of law. It is assumed that anyone reading a work of this type knows how to tell the difference. Therefore, disclosure notices are not provided for every expression of opinion.

Statutes that indirectly affect commercial leasing, such as those relating to construction, are not included. Almost any New York statute could, under some circumstance, affect some commercial lease. Building and other codes are excluded. This collection seeks to identify only statutes specifically relevant to commercial leasing and reasonably likely to be encountered in a typical commercial leasing practice.

In some cases, sample lease language is provided, set off as block quotations and italicized for clarity. Terms used in that sample language will often need to be defined elsewhere in the lease. No representation or warranty is made on the efficacy or validity of any proposed lease language, particularly where it is noted as unusual or “cutting edge.”

This collection makes no effort to include any of New York’s vast array of statutory and regulatory provisions on residential leases. Those provisions are so extensive that anyone participating in any way in a transaction involving New York residential rental property should not proceed without consulting counsel who practices primarily in that area. Entire volumes of New York’s statutes and regulations are devoted to protecting residential tenants from their landlords. Much of this tension, and the related permanent “housing crisis,” arises from half a century of rent regulation (both “rent control” and “rent stabilization”), itself an encyclopedic body of law and regulations that applies in New York City and a few urban areas outside the city. New York politicians do occasionally call for regulation of commercial rents or for indirect market burdens such as “arbitration” for renewal rents. Those proposals generally go nowhere. As a result, market forces eventually correct imbalances of supply and demand in the commercial market. The body of New York law governing commercial leases, though perhaps large when compared against other states, remains only a fraction of the size of the body of New York law on governing residential leases.

The statutes presented here can also be found in any New York law library, through online research services, or on the internet.¹

Actions Against Landowner by Invitees, Licensees, and Trespassers

[GOL § 9-103] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

1. Except as provided in [GOL § 9-103(2)]
 - a. an owner, lessee or occupant of premises, whether or not posted as provided in [ECL § 11-2111], owes no duty to keep the premises safe for entry or use by others for hunting, fishing, organized gleaning as defined in [Agriculture and Markets Law § 71-y], canoeing, boating, trapping, hiking, cross-country skiing, tobogganing, sledding, speleological activities, horseback riding, bicycle riding, hang gliding, motorized vehicle operation for recreational purposes, snowmobile operation, cutting or gathering of wood for non-commercial purposes or training of dogs, or to give warning of any hazardous condition or use of or structure or activity on such premises to persons entering for such purposes;
 - b. an owner, lessee or occupant of premises who gives permission to another to pursue any such activities upon such premises does not thereby (1) extend any assurance that the premises are safe for such purpose, or (2) constitute the person to whom permission is granted an invitee to whom a duty of care is owed, or (3) assume responsibility for or incur liability for any injury to person or property caused by any act of persons to whom the permission is granted.

c. an owner, lessee or occupant of a farm, as defined in [LAB § 671], whether or not posted as provided in [ECL § 11-2111], owes no duty to keep such farm safe for entry or use by a person who enters or remains in or upon such farm without consent or privilege, or to give warning of any hazardous condition or use of or structure or activity on such farm to persons so entering or remaining. This shall not be interpreted, or construed, as a limit on liability for acts of gross negligence in addition to those other acts referred to in [GOL § 9-103(2)].

2. This [GOL § 9-103] does not limit the liability which would otherwise exist

a. for willful or malicious failure to guard, or to warn against, a dangerous condition, use, structure or activity; or

b. for injury suffered in any case where permission to pursue any of the activities enumerated in this [GOL § 9-103] was granted for a consideration other than the consideration, if any, paid to said landowner by the state or federal government, or permission to train dogs was granted for a consideration other than that provided for in [ECL § 11-0925]; or

c. for injury caused, by acts of persons to whom permission to pursue any of the activities enumerated in this [GOL § 9-103] was granted, to other persons as to whom the person granting permission, or the owner, lessee or occupant of the premises, owed a duty to keep the premises safe or to warn of danger.

3. Nothing in this [GOL § 9-103] creates a duty of care or ground of liability for injury to person or property.

COMMENTARY

This statute does not address an owner's or a lessee's more general liability to trespassers, a matter of common law.

[47.1] Adverse Possession

[RPAPL § 531] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Adverse possession, how affected by relation of landlord and tenant.

Where the relation of landlord and tenant has existed, the possession of the tenant is deemed the possession of the landlord until the expiration of [10] years after the termination of the tenancy; or, where there has been no written lease, until the expiration of [10] years after the last payment of rent; notwithstanding that the tenant has acquired another title or has claimed to hold adversely to his landlord. But this presumption shall cease after the periods prescribed in this [RPAPL § 531] and such tenant may then commence to hold adversely to his landlord.

COMMENTARY

Certain types of landlords or tenants also require certain internal or court approvals. See “Contract or Conveyance.”

[RPAPL § 1901] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Release of rents reserved by leases in perpetuity.

1. Any person interested in lands held under a lease in perpetuity, upon which no rent has been paid for at least [20] years, may present his petition to the courts mentioned in this [RPAPL § 1901] asking that it be declared that the rents and reversion have been released to the owner of the fee. Such petition shall be verified, shall describe the lease and allege that the rents and reversion have been released, and shall state such facts as the petitioner can ascertain relative to the execution of a release and the identity of the persons who would otherwise be the present owners of the rents and reversion and the last known owner thereof.

2. Such petition may be presented to the supreme court or to the county court of the county where the lands are situated. The court may thereupon order all persons interested to show cause at a certain time and place why the rents and reversion should not be declared to have been released. A description of the lease and lands affected thereby and the name of the last known owner of the rents and reversion shall be specified in such order, and the order shall be published in such newspaper or newspapers and for such time as the court shall direct. The court may also direct the order to be personally served upon such persons as it shall designate.

3. The court may issue commissions to take the testimony of witnesses and may refer the petition to a referee to take and report proofs of the facts stated in the petition. Upon being satisfied that the matters alleged in the petition are true, the court may make an order declaring that the rents and reversion have been released to the owner of the fee. The nonpayment of rent under any such lease for [20] years shall be presumptive evidence of such a release.

4. The entry of such order in the office of the clerk of the county where such lands are situated shall have the same effect as a release of such rents and reversion to such owner then duly executed and recorded. The county clerk shall note on the margin of the record of the original lease a minute of the entry of such order.

[47.2] Agency

[CPLR § 318] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Designation of agent for service.

A person may be designated by a natural person, corporation or partnership as an agent for service in a writing, executed and acknowledged in the same manner as a deed, with the consent of the agent endorsed thereon. The writing shall be filed in the office of the clerk of the county in which the principal to be served resides or has its principal office. The designation shall remain in effect for three years from such filing unless it has been revoked by the filing of a revocation, or by the death, judicial declaration of incompetency or legal termination of the agent or principal.

COMMENTARY

Failure to record the designation of an agent does not seem to make the designation ineffective. This statute is not well known in the commercial real estate bar. Does the three-year time limit apply to all designations of agents for service?

Arbitration—Other

[CPLR §§ 7501–7514]

COMMENTARY

New York has not adopted the Uniform Arbitration Act. Arbitration is addressed primarily in CPLR art. 75 (§§ 7501–7514). New York law generally favors arbitration.

[CPLR § 7601] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Special proceeding to enforce agreement that issue or controversy be determined by a person named or to be selected

A special proceeding may be commenced to specifically enforce an agreement that a question of valuation, appraisal or other issue or controversy be determined by a person named or to be selected. The court may enforce such an agreement as if it were an arbitration agreement, in which case the proceeding shall be conducted as if brought under [CPLR art. 75 (Arbitration)]. Where there is a defense which would require dismissal of an action for breach of the agreement, the proceeding shall be dismissed. Provided, however, that this section shall not apply to any agreement contained in the standard fire insurance policy of the state with the exception of an action to enforce the appraisal clause pursuant to [ISL § 3408,] which shall not be enforced as an arbitration agreement.

[47.3] Assignment of Rents[RPL § 291-f] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Rights where recorded mortgage restricts landlord's action in respect to leases.

An agreement, referring to this [RPL § 291-f], contained in a recorded mortgage of real property, or in a recorded instrument relating to such mortgage, restricting the right or power, as against the holder of the mortgage without his consent, of the owner of the mortgaged real property to cancel, abridge or otherwise modify tenancies, subtenancies, leases or subleases of the mortgaged real property in existence at the time of the agreement, or to accept prepayments of [installments] of rent to become due thereunder, shall become binding on a tenant or subtenant after written notice of such agreement, accompanied by a copy of the text thereof; and any such cancellation, abridgement, modification or prepayment made by such tenant or subtenant, after such written notice, without the consent of the holder of such mortgage, shall be voidable as against the holder, at his option. The recording on or after [July 1, 1960], of any such mortgage or instrument relating thereto shall for the purposes of this [RPL § 291-f] be in itself a sufficient notice of the restrictive agreement to any tenant or subtenant who, after such recording, acquires by assignment, whether the assignment is by instrument or by operation of law, a leasehold estate in existence at the time of the restrictive agreement. This [RPL § 291-f] shall not apply (1) to any tenancy, subtenancy, lease or sublease primarily for the residential purposes of the owner of the leasehold estate, or (2) to any tenancy, subtenancy, lease or sublease having at the time of the restrictive agreement an unexpired term of less than five years.

COMMENTARY

Mortgagees often fear that when a mortgagor is in distress, the mortgagor may (a) enter into a scheme to pull money out of the collateral by making agreements with tenants of the types described in RPL § 291-f, and then (b) leave the mortgagee as the bagholder after the foreclosure. Such concerns motivate some of the mortgagee protections commonly included in nondisturbance agreements. The quoted statute gives mortgagees a convenient mechanism to protect themselves from the same bad-faith schemes (involving commercial leases with a remaining term of at least five years) without having to negotiate nondisturbance agreements. The statute does not, however, go as far as a typical lender-friendly nondisturbance agreement would. The statute does not, for example, protect mortgagees (after foreclosure) from any claims the tenants might have been able to assert based on the prior landlord's default. Although lenders often do take the steps that RPL § 291-f contemplates, lenders also often use nonrecourse carveouts toward the same end.

For more on this statute and a sample notice to tenants, see Joshua Stein, Stein on New York Commercial Mortgage Transactions, Ch. 12.

[RPL § 294-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Recording assignments of rent.

1. An assignment of rent to accrue from tenancies, subtenancies, leases or subleases of real property, irrespective of the term of their duration, in existence at the time of the assignment, made, subscribed and acknowledged or proved, and certified in a manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded may be recorded in the office of the recording officer of any county in which any of the real property to which the tenancies, subtenancies, leases or subleases relate is situated, and such recording officer shall, upon the request of any party, on tender of the lawful fees therefor, record the same in his said office.
2. Every such assignment not so recorded shall be void as against any person who subsequently purchases or acquires by exchange, or contracts to purchase or acquire by exchange, the same real property, or any portion thereof, or acquires by assignment the rent to accrue therefrom as provided in this [RPL § 294-a], in good faith and for a valuable consideration, from the same vendor or assignor, his distributees or devisees, and whose conveyance, contract or assignment is first duly recorded.
3. The recording of such assignment shall not be in itself a notice of the assignment to a lessee or tenant, his distributees or devisees, so as to invalidate a payment of rent made by the lessee or tenant, his distributees or devisees, to the assignor or a prior assignee of the rent.

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

A mortgagee will typically obtain and record an assignment of rents in addition to the mortgage. The recording of an assignment of rents (unless ancillary to a mortgage) may trigger New York's mortgage recording tax. See Tax Law §§ 250 et seq. and Joshua Stein, New York Commercial Mortgage Transactions, chapters 6–9.

[47.4] Assignments and Subleases[RPL § 226] Statutory Excerpt or SummaryEffect of Renewal on Sub-lease*

The surrender of an under-lease is not requisite to the validity of the surrender of the original lease, where a new lease is given by the chief landlord. Such a surrender and renewal do not impair any right or interest of the chief landlord, his lessee or the holder of an under-lease, under the original lease; including the chief landlord's remedy by entry, for the rent or duties secured by the new lease, not exceeding the rent and duties reserved in the original lease surrendered.

COMMENTARY

Does this imply that if a tenant surrenders a lease but does not obtain a new lease, and the subtenant does not surrender its estate, then the landlord (property owner) can enforce the sublease directly against the subtenant? Can the subtenant claim any rights under this statute? No reported case seems to have interpreted this statute.

[47.5] Attorneys—Unauthorized Practice of Law[JUD § 476-a] Statutory Excerpt or SummaryAction for Unlawful Practice of the Law*

1. The attorney-general may maintain an action upon his or her own information or upon the complaint of a private person or of a bar association organized and existing under the laws of this state against any person, partnership, corporation, or association, and any employee, agent, director, or officer thereof who commits any act or engages in any conduct prohibited by law as constituting the unlawful practice of the law. The term “action” as used in [JUD § 476-a(1)] shall be construed to include both civil actions and criminal actions.

The term “unlawful practice of the law” as used in this article shall include, but is not limited to,

(a) any act prohibited by [JUD §§ 478, 479, 483, 484, 489, 490, 491, 495 or GBL § 337],² or

(b) any other act forbidden by law to be done by any person not regularly licensed and admitted to practice law in this state, or

(c) any act punishable by the supreme court as a criminal contempt of court under [JUD § 750(B)].³

2. Such a civil action may also be maintained by a bar association organized and existing under the laws of [NYS], upon an application to the supreme court of the state of New York, or a justice thereof, for leave to bring the same by such bar association on good cause shown therefor and proof that a written request was made upon the attorney-general to bring such an action and that more than [20] days have elapsed since the making of such request and he or she has failed or refused to bring such an action.

[JUD § 478] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Practicing or appearing as attorney-at-law without being admitted and registered.

It shall be unlawful for any natural person to practice or appear as an attorney-at-law or as an attorney and counselor-at-law for a person other than himself or herself in a court of record in this state, or to furnish attorneys or counsel or an attorney and counsel to render legal services, or to hold himself or herself out to the public as being entitled to practice law as aforesaid,

2 The statute actually cites PL §§ 270, 270-a, 270-e, 271, 275, 275-a, 276, 280, and 1452. These statutes were repealed by PL § 500.05. The same subject matter is now covered by Judiciary Law §§ 478, 479, 483, 484, 491 and 495, which describe unlawful practices of attorneys and appearances as attorneys; Judiciary Law §§ 489 and 490, which forbid corporations and collection agencies from purchasing claims to bring an action or proceeding on such claims; and GBL § 337, which prohibits certain advertising to procure divorces and dissolutions of marriages. See Judiciary Law §§ 478, 479, 484 and 495, which are excerpted below or in any other manner, or to assume to be an attorney or counselor-at-law, or to assume, use, or advertise the title of lawyer, or attorney and counselor-at-law, or attorney-at-law or counselor-at-law, or attorney, or counselor, or attorney and counselor, or equivalent terms in any language, in such manner as to convey the impression that he or she is a legal practitioner of law or in any manner to advertise that he or she either alone or together with any other persons or person has, owns, conducts or maintains a law office or law and collection office, or office of any kind for the practice of law, without having first been duly and regularly licensed and admitted to practice law in the courts of record of this state, and without having taken the constitutional oath.

[JUD § 479] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Soliciting business on behalf of an attorney.

It shall be unlawful for any person or his agent, employee or any person acting on his behalf, to solicit or procure through solicitation either directly or indirectly legal business, or to solicit or procure through solicitation a retainer, written or oral, or any agreement authorizing an attorney to perform or render legal services, or to make it a business so to solicit or procure such business, retainers or agreements.

COMMENTARY

The language of this statute seems rather broad. Would it, for example, prohibit efforts to have a third party “find a good plaintiff,” once an attorney has identified some malfeasance by someone sufficient to support a lawsuit? Might it also be broad enough to prohibit constitutionally protected communications?

[JUD § 484] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

None but attorneys to practice in the state.

No natural person shall ask or receive, directly or indirectly, compensation for appearing for a person other than himself as attorney in any court or before any magistrate, or for preparing deeds, mortgages, assignments, discharges, leases or any other instruments affecting real estate, wills, codicils, or any other instrument affecting the disposition of property after death, or decedents' estates, or pleadings of any kind in any action brought before any court of record in this state, or make it a business to practice for another as an attorney in any court or before any magistrate unless he has been regularly admitted to practice, as an attorney or counselor, in the courts of record in the state. . . .

[JUD § 495] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Corporations and voluntary associations not to practice law.

1. No corporation or voluntary association shall

(a) practice or appear as an attorney-at-law for any person in any court in this state or before any judicial body, nor

(b) make it a business to practice as an attorney-at-law, for any person, in any of said courts, nor

(c) hold itself out to the public as being entitled to practice law, or to render legal services or advice, nor

(d) furnish attorneys or counsel, nor

(e) render legal services of any kind in actions or proceedings of any nature or in any other way or manner, nor

(f) assume in any other manner to be entitled to practice law, nor

(g) assume, use or advertise the title of lawyer or attorney, attorney-at-law, or equivalent terms in any language in such manner as to convey the impression that it is entitled to practice law or to furnish legal advice, services or counsel, nor

(h) advertise that either alone or together with or by or through any person whether or not a duly and regularly admitted attorney-at-law, it has, owns, conducts or maintains a law office or an office for the practice of law, or for furnishing legal advice, services or counsel.

[§§ 495(3)–(7)]

3. No voluntary association or corporation shall ask or receive directly or indirectly, compensation for preparing deeds, mortgages, assignments, discharges, leases, or any other instruments affecting real estate, wills, codicils, or any other instruments affecting disposition of property after death or decedents' estates, or pleadings of any kind in actions or proceedings of any nature. Any association or corporation violating the provisions of this [JUD § 495(3)] is guilty of a misdemeanor.

4. [JUD § 495(1) and (2)] shall not apply to any corporation or voluntary association lawfully engaged in a business authorized by the provisions of any existing statute.

5. [JUD § 495] shall not apply to a corporation or voluntary association lawfully engaged in the examination and insuring of titles to real property, in the preparation of any deeds, mortgages, assignments, discharges, leases or any other instruments affecting real property insofar as such instruments are necessary to the examination and insuring of titles, and necessary or incidental to loans made by any such corporation or association; nor shall it prohibit a corporation or voluntary association from employing an attorney or attorneys in and about its own immediate affairs or in any litigation to which it is or may be a party. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent a corporation or association from furnishing to any person, lawfully engaged in the practice of law, such information or such clerical services in and about his professional work as, except for the provisions of this [JUD § 495], may be lawful, provided that at all times the lawyer receiving such information or such services shall maintain full professional and direct responsibility to his clients for the information and services so received. But no corporation shall be permitted to render any services which cannot lawfully be rendered by a person not admitted to practice law in this state nor to solicit directly or indirectly professional employment for a lawyer.

6. [JUD § 495] shall not apply to a corporation organized under [BCL art. 15 (§§ 1501 to 1516)], or authorized to do business in this state under [BCL art. 15-A (§§ 1525 to 1533)].⁴

7. [JUD § 495] does not apply to organizations which offer prepaid legal services; to non-profit organizations whether incorporated or unincorporated, organized and operating primarily for a purpose other than the provision of legal services and which furnish legal services as an incidental activity in furtherance of their primary purpose; or to organizations which have as their primary purpose the furnishing of legal services to indigent persons.

[JUD § 750] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Power of courts to punish for criminal contempts.

[§ 750(b)]

B. In addition to the power to punish for a criminal contempt as set forth in [JUD § 750(A)], the supreme court has power under this [JUD § 750(B)] to punish for a criminal contempt any person who unlawfully practices or assumes to practice law; and a proceeding under [JUD § 750(B)] may be instituted on the court's own motion or on the motion of any officer charged with the duty of investigating or prosecuting unlawful practice of law, or by any bar association incorporated under the laws of this state.

[47.6] Attorneys' Fees

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

Absent a statute or contract to the contrary, New York generally requires each party to any commercial litigation to bear its own attorneys' fees. Some exceptions to the rule that may affect commercial leasing include: (1) if a property owner fails to file a copy of any bond the owner obtained, see GOL § 5-322.3 ("Mechanics Liens"); (2) if a conveyance is determined to be fraudulent, see DCL § 276-a ("Fraudulent Conveyances"); and (3) if a property owner signs a statutorily prohibited lease with a banking entity, see BNK § 674-a (“Discrimination in Leasing”). Other New York statutes may authorize attorneys’ fees in other circumstances relevant to commercial leasing.

⁴ These statutory sections relate to professional service corporations and foreign professional service corporations.

[47.7] Attornment

[RPL § 224] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Attornment by tenant

The attornment of a tenant to a stranger is absolutely void and does not in any way affect the possession of the landlord unless made either:

1. With the consent of the landlord; or
2. Pursuant to or in consequence of a judgment, order, or decree of a court of competent jurisdiction; or
3. To a purchaser at foreclosure sale.

[47.8] Common Interest Communities—[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

New York has a large body of law and regulations on common interest communities (and the sales of real estate within them), but nothing specific to commercial leasing. See “Condominium Leaseholds.”

[47.9] Condemnation

[EDPL § 103] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

As used in this law:

[§ 103(C), (D) and (F)]

(C) “Condemnee” means the holder of any right, title, interest, lien, charge or encumbrance in real property subject to an acquisition or proposed acquisition.

(D) “Condemnor” means any entity vested with the power of eminent domain.

(F) “Real property” includes all land and improvements, lands under water, waterfront property, the water of any lake, pond or stream, all easements and hereditaments, corporeal or incorporeal, and every estate, interest and right, legal or equitable, in lands or water, and right, interest, privilege, easement and franchise relating to the same, including terms for years and liens by way of mortgage or otherwise.

COMMENTARY

Although the Eminent Domain Procedure law would treat a tenant as a condemnee, most leases require the tenant to relinquish to the landlord any rights to participate in a condemnation award.

Landlord’s counsel may want to include this language: “The entire Condemnation award shall belong to Landlord, except any sum expressly awarded to Tenant for trade fixtures, goodwill, and moving costs, provided it does not reduce any payments to Landlord (or Landlord’s underlying ground lessor or mortgagee) and Tenant has cured any Default.”

The proviso language represents a common concession to a tenant.

A ground lease will trigger an entirely different conversation between Landlord and Tenant.

[EDPL § 405] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Possession.

[§ 405(A)]

(A) If the condemnor has a right to possession of real property as provided for in this law, and the condemnor shall deem it necessary to cause the removal of a condemnee or other occupant[,] it may cause such condemnee or other occupant to be removed therefrom and possession to be delivered to it, pursuant to the procedures of landlord and tenant law, or by application to the supreme court in which the proceeding is pending for a writ of assistance for possession or pursuant to other law, except that no condemnee shall be required to surrender possession prior to the condemnor's payment to him of its advance payment or the deposit of such amount in accordance with [EDPL art. 3 (§§ 301 to 305)], unless the condemnee has not complied with [EDPL §302].

[EDPL § 702] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Incidental expenses.

[§ 702(A)(2)]

(A) The condemnor shall reimburse a condemnee an amount separately computed and stated, representing the following incidental expenses: ...

(2) any penalty incurred by the condemnee for prepayment of any preexisting recorded mortgage entered into in good faith, encumbering such property[.]

COMMENTARY

Assuming the courts apply this statute as written, it should address a leasehold borrower's concern about possible application of a prepayment premium in the event of a condemnation. No reported case seems to interpret or apply this case in the context of leasehold mortgages.

[47.10] Condominium Leaseholds

[RPL § 339-e] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

[§§ 339-e(11) and (12)]

11. "Property" means and includes the land, the building and all other improvements thereon, (i) owned in fee simple absolute, or (ii) in the case of a condominium devoted exclusively to non-residential purposes, held under a lease or sublease, or separate unit leases or subleases, the unexpired term or terms of which on the date of recording of the declaration shall not be less than [30] years, or (iii) in the case of a qualified leasehold condominium, held under a lease or sublease, or separate unit leases or subleases, the unexpired term or terms of which on the date of recording of the declaration shall not be less than [50] years, and all easements, rights and appurtenances belonging thereto, and all other property, personal or mixed, intended for use in connection therewith, which have been or are intended to be submitted to the provisions of this [RPL art. 9-B (§§ 339-d to 339-kk)].

12. “Qualified leasehold condominium” means any leasehold interest in real property intended to be used for either residential purposes, commercial purposes, industrial purposes or any combination of such purposes, together with any fee simple absolute or leasehold interest in the buildings and all other improvements which have been or at any time hereafter may be erected upon such real property, which has been or is intended to be submitted to the provisions of this article, provided that, on the date of the recording of the declaration: (i) the battery park city authority or the Roosevelt Island operating corporation is the holder of the tenant’s interest in such leasehold interest (ii) the Queens West development corporation is the holder of the landlord’s interest in such leasehold interest or (iii) the Brooklyn bridge park development corporation is the holder of the landlord’s interest in such leasehold interest, or (iv) [NYC] educational construction fund is the holder of the landlord’s interest in such leasehold interest for property located in the borough of Manhattan, in [NYC], bounded on the east by Second Avenue on the west by Third Avenue to the north by East [57th] Street, and to the south by East [56th] Street [commonly known as 250 East 57th Street, the Whole Foods Market Project].

COMMENTARY

As in so many other contexts, the Legislature decides to prohibit something or make it impossible (in this case leasehold condominiums), but then decides to allow it for specific projects that are deemed “desirable.” Similar dynamics apply to bond financing, tax exemptions and abatements, extra development rights, and other “goodies.” This approach to facilitating development maximizes the importance of political connections, discourages new entrants, helps perpetuate the “housing crisis” in NYC, and thus helps maintain the value of existing improvements.

New York law allows cooperative apartment buildings structured on leaseholds. The New York State Attorney General tends, quite appropriately, to view any leasehold-based coops (and the occasional condo, as indicated above) with skepticism and requires particularly full disclosure of the risks they create.

[RPL § 339-y] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Separate taxation.

[RPL § 339-y(2)(a)]

2. With respect only to qualified leasehold condominiums:

(a) Each unit, its common interest, not including any personal property, and the proportionate undivided part of the real property which is the subject of a qualified leasehold condominium and is allocated to such unit (as expressed in the declaration), shall be deemed to be a parcel, shall be subject to separate assessment to the unit owner and shall be subject to taxation by each assessing unit, school district, special district, county or other taxing unit for all types of taxes authorized by law including, but not limited to, special ad valorem levies and special assessments. Neither the real property which is the subject of a qualified leasehold condominium, the building, the property nor any of the common elements shall be deemed to be a parcel. In no event shall the aggregate of the assessment of the units plus their common interests plus their proportionate undivided parts (as expressed in the declaration) of said real property exceed the total valuation of the property and said real property assessed as a single parcel owned in fee. No provision of this [RPL § 339-y(2)(a)] shall be deemed to subject to taxation any parcel or part thereof which, pursuant to applicable law, is either exempt from taxation or with respect to which no taxes are payable.

[47.11] Covenants of Good Faith and Fair Dealing

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

New York common law recognizes an implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing. This “tort” theory may give creative tenants a neat technique to persuade courts to ignore limitations on a landlord’s liability under a lease. See, e.g., Tapps of Nassau Supermarkets, Inc. v. Linden Blvd. L.P., 269 A.D.2d 306 (1st Dep’t 2000). Similar strategies might be available for nonrecourse mortgages.

[47.12] Covenants Running With the Land

[RPL § 223] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Rights where property or lease is transferred.

The grantee of leased real property, or of a reversion thereof, or of any rent, the devisee or assignee of the lessor of such a lease, or the heir or personal representative of either of them, has the same remedies, by entry, action or otherwise, for the nonperformance of any agreement contained in the assigned lease for the recovery of rent, for the doing of any waste, or for other cause of forfeiture as his grantor or lessor had, or would have had, if the reversion had remained in him. A lessee of real property, his assignee or personal representative, has the same remedy against the lessor, his grantee or assignee, or the representative of either, for the breach of an agreement contained in the lease, that the lessee might have had against his immediate lessor, except a covenant against incumbrances or relating to the title or possession of the premises leased. This [RPL § 223] applies as well to a grant or lease in fee, reserving rent, as to a lease for life or for years; but not to a deed of conveyance in fee, made [before April 9, 1805], or after [April 14, 1860].

COMMENTARY

Would this language apply to and protect a foreclosure purchaser of the fee estate? One would think so, because the statute refers to any grantee or assignee of the lessor without excluding a grant or assignment that might take place through foreclosure.

[47.13] Damage or Destruction

[RPL § 227] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

When tenant may surrender premises.

Where any building, which is leased or occupied, is destroyed or so injured by the elements, or any other cause as to be untenable, and unfit for occupancy, and no express agreement to the contrary has been made in writing, the lessee or occupant may, if the destruction or injury occurred without his or her fault or neglect, quit and surrender possession of the leasehold premises, and of the land so leased or occupied; and he or she is not liable to pay to the lessor or owner, rent for the time subsequent to the surrender. Any rent paid in advance or which may have accrued by the terms of a lease or any other hiring shall be adjusted to the date of such surrender.

COMMENTARY

Most leases require the tenant to waive any rights under this statute, for example as follows:

The provisions of this Lease on casualty constitutes an express agreement on damage or destruction of the Premises by fire or other casualty. Therefore, Real Property Law § 227, providing for this contingency absent express agreement, shall not apply in such case.

[47.14] Discrimination in Leasing

[RPL § 235-d] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Harassment.

1. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, within a city having a population of [1,000,000] or more, it shall be unlawful and shall constitute harassment for any landlord of a building which at any time was occupied for manufacturing or warehouse purposes, or other person acting on his behalf, to engage in any course of conduct, including, but not limited to intentional interruption or discontinuance or willful failure to restore services customarily provided or required by written lease or other rental agreement, which interferes with or disturbs the comfort, repose, peace or quiet of a tenant in the tenant's use or occupancy of rental space if such conduct is intended to cause the tenant (i) to vacate a building or part thereof; or (ii) to surrender or waive any rights of such tenant under the tenant's written lease or other rental agreement.

2. The lawful termination of a tenancy or lawful refusal to renew or extend a written lease or other rental agreement shall not constitute harassment for purposes of this [RPL § 235-d].

3. As used in this [RPL § 235-d], the term “tenant” means only a person or business occupying or residing at the premises pursuant to a written lease or other rental agreement, if such premises are located in a building which at any time was occupied for manufacturing or warehouse purposes and a certificate of occupancy for residential use of such building is not in effect at the time of the last alleged acts or incidents upon which the harassment claim is based.

4. A tenant may apply to the supreme court for an order enjoining acts or practices which constitute harassment under this [RPL § 235-d(1)]; and upon sufficient showing, the supreme court may issue a temporary or permanent injunction, restraining order or other order, all of which may, as the court determines in the exercise of its sound discretion, be granted without bond. In the event the court issues a preliminary injunction it shall make provision for an expeditious trial of the underlying action.

5. The powers and remedies set forth in this [RPL § 235-d] shall be in addition to all other powers and remedies in relation to harassment including the award of damages. Nothing contained herein shall be construed to amend, repeal, modify or affect any existing local law or ordinance, or provision of the charter or administrative code of [NYC], or to limit or restrict the power of the city to amend or modify any existing local law, ordinance or provision of the charter or administrative code, or to restrict or limit any power otherwise conferred by law with respect to harassment.

6. Any agreement by a tenant in a written lease or other rental agreement waiving or modifying his rights as set forth in this [RPL § 235-d] shall be void as contrary to public policy.

COMMENTARY

This statute protects tenants in buildings that are undergoing a change of use from manufacturing or warehouse use to other uses (generally residential). Under the statute, mere failure to renew a lease does not constitute “harassment.” The fact that the Legislature needed to say this tells a great deal about the overall attitude of the New York courts toward owners of commercial investment property.

[BNK § 674-a]

Unlawful undertakings.

1. Every undertaking, whether written or oral, express or implied, constituting or contained in a contract heretofore or hereafter entered into, directly or indirectly, between a banking organization, bank holding company, national banking association, federal savings and loan association or foreign banking corporation and the owner of an interest in real property located in the state, which bars such owner from leasing, selling or otherwise disposing of any interest in real property to any other banking organization, bank holding company, national banking association, federal savings and loan association or foreign banking corporation shall be null and void.

2. Any banking organization, bank holding company, national banking association, federal savings and loan association, foreign banking corporation or any other entity or person injured in his business or property by reason of an undertaking which violates [BNK § 674-a(1)] may sue on account thereof and be entitled to recover three times the amount of the damages sustained, and the cost of suit, including reasonable attorneys’ fees.

3. If any provision of [BNK § 674-a], or the application of such provision to any individual, company or circumstance, shall be held invalid, the remainder of [BNK § 674-a], and the application of [BNK § 674-a] to individuals, companies or circumstances other than those to which it is held invalid, shall not be affected thereby.

COMMENTARY

Would federal law supersede this statute for federally chartered institutions?

[47.15] Distraint

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

New York does not, by either statute or common law, give a landlord any lien on a tenant's personal property. A landlord that wants such a lien must obtain it under the Uniform Commercial Code. The parties would typically not mention the landlord's lien in any memorandum of the lease, for fear of attracting a mortgage recording tax. A nervous tenant might ask the landlord to agree in advance to waive or subordinate any "landlord lien" the legislature might decide to create in the future. Any such legislative measures would seem highly unlikely, though.

[47.16] Ejectment

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

In New York, ejectment is generally a common law remedy and statutes are not particularly useful. But see "Landlord's Remedies."

[47.17] Electronic Transactions[ESRA § 301[STL § 301]]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Short title.

This [ESRA §§ 301-309] shall be known and may be cited as the "electronic signatures and records act."

[ESRA § 302 [STL § 302]]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

For the purpose of [ESRA §§ 301-309]:

1. "Electronic" shall mean of or relating to technology having electrical, digital, magnetic, wireless, optical, electromagnetic, or similar capabilities.
2. "Electronic record" shall mean information, evidencing any act, transaction, occurrence, event, or other activity, produced or stored by electronic means and capable of being accurately reproduced in forms perceptible by human sensory capabilities.

3. “Electronic signature” shall mean an electronic sound, symbol, or process, attached to or logically associated with an electronic record and executed or adopted by a person with the intent to sign the record.
4. “Person” shall mean a natural person, corporation, trust, estate, partnership, incorporated or unincorporated association or any other legal entity, and also includes any department, agency, authority, or instrumentality of the state or its political subdivisions.
5. “Governmental entity” shall mean any state department, board, bureau, division, commission, committee, public authority, public benefit corporation, council, office, or other governmental entity or officer of the state having statewide authority, except the state legislature, and any political subdivision of the state.

[ESRA § 303 [STL § 303]]

Electronic facilitator.

1. The office of information technology services shall be the electronic facilitator and administer this [STL art. III (§§ 301 to 309)]. In addition to the authority, duties and responsibilities set forth in [STL art. I (§§ 101 to 109)], the electronic facilitator shall have the authority, duties and responsibilities granted in [STL art. III (§§ 301 to 309)].
2. The electronic facilitator shall have the following functions, powers, and duties:
 - (a) To promulgate rules and regulations consistent with the provisions of [STL art. III (§§ 301-309)]. In developing rules and regulations, the electronic facilitator shall seek the advice of the attorney general, the state comptroller, the director of budget, government and private entities and individuals as the electronic facilitator deems appropriate.
 - (b) To cooperate with government and private entities and individuals in order to assist in the development and implementation of [STL art. III (§§ 301-309)].

I To develop guidelines for the improvement of business and commerce by electronic means. Such guidelines shall identify preferred technology standards relating to security, confidentiality and privacy of electronic signatures and electronic records.

[ESRA § 304 [STL § 304]]

Use of electronic signatures.

1. The electronic facilitator shall establish rules and regulations governing the use of electronic signatures and authentication. The electronic facilitator shall not establish rules or regulations that seek to apportion fault or impose or limit liability relating to the use of electronic signatures.
2. In accordance with [ESRA § 304] unless specifically provided otherwise by law, an electronic signature may be used by a person in lieu of a signature affixed by hand. The use of an electronic signature shall have the same validity and effect as the use of a signature affixed by hand.

[ESRA § 305 [STL § 305]]

Use of electronic records.

1. In accordance with rules and regulations promulgated by the electronic facilitator, government entities are authorized and empowered to produce, receive, accept, acquire, record, file, transmit, forward, and store information by use of electronic means. If any such government entity uses electronic records, it must also ensure that anyone who uses the services of such government entity may obtain access to records as permitted by statute, and receive copies of such records in paper form in accordance with fees prescribed by statute. No person shall be required to submit or file any record electronically to any government entity except as otherwise provided by law. Government entities that obtain, store, or utilize electronic records shall not refuse to accept hard copy, non-electronic forms, reports, and other paper documents for submission or filing except as otherwise provided by law.

2. A government entity shall have the authority to dispose of or destroy a record in accordance with the arts and cultural affairs law, regardless of format or media.
3. An electronic record shall have the same force and effect as those records not produced by electronic means.

[ESRA § 306 [STL § 306]]

Admissibility into evidence.

In any legal proceeding where the provisions of the [CPLR] are applicable, an electronic record or electronic signature may be admitted into evidence pursuant to the provisions of [CPLR art. 45 (§§ 4501 to 4548)] including, but not limited to [CPLR § 4539].

[ESRA § 307 [STL § 307]]

Exceptions.

This [STL art. III (§§ 301-309)] shall not apply:

1. To any document providing for the disposition of an individual's person or property upon death or incompetence, or appointing a fiduciary of an individual's person or property, including, without limitation, wills, trusts, decisions consenting to orders not to resuscitate, powers of attorney and health care proxies, with the exception of:
 - (a) contractual beneficiary designations; and (b) the registration of making, amending, or revoking an anatomical gift under [Public Health Law § 4310].
2. To any negotiable instruments and other instruments of title wherein possession of the instrument is deemed to confer title, unless an electronic version of such record is created, stored or transferred pursuant to [STL art. III (§§ 301 to 309)] in a manner that allows for the existence of only one unique, identifiable and unalterable version which cannot be copied except in a form that is readily identifiable as a copy.

3. To any other document that the electronic facilitator has specifically excepted, pursuant to the rules and regulations of the electronic facilitator, from the application of [STL art. III (§§ 301-309)].

COMMENTARY

Until 2012, New York's electronic signature law expressly excluded recordable documents. As of 2014, some counties have implemented electronic recording.

[ESRA § 308 [STL § 308]]

Personal privacy protection.

1. Any information reported to the electronic facilitator by a government entity in connection with the authorization of an electronic signature shall continue to be withheld from public disclosure if such information was withheld from public disclosure by such government entity. Electronic records shall be considered and treated as any other records for the purposes of the [F]reedom of [I]nformation [L]aw as set forth in [N.Y. Public Officers Law art. 6 (§§ 84 to 90)] and the [P]ersonal [P]rivacy [P]rotection [L]aw as set forth in [N.Y. Public Officers Law art. 6-A (§§ 91 to 99)].

2. A person or an entity that acts as an authenticator of electronic signatures shall not disclose to a third party any personal information reported to it by the electronic signatory other than the information necessary to authenticate the signature unless the disclosure is made pursuant to a court order or statute, or if the information or data is used solely for statistical purposes in aggregate form. For purposes of [Electronic Signatures and Records Act § 308], "personal information" shall mean data that identifies a specific person, including but not limited to home and work addresses, telephone number, e-mail address, social security number, birth date, gender, marital status, mother's maiden name, and health data.

[ESRA § 309 [STL § 309]]

Use of electronic records and signatures to be voluntary.

Nothing in [STL art III. (§§ 301-309)] shall require any entity or person to use an electronic record or an electronic signature unless otherwise provided by law.

[47.18] Electronic Transactions—Uniform Electronic Transactions Act

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

New York has not adopted the Uniform Electronic Transactions Act and instead has adopted requirements described in Electronic Signatures and Records Act §§ 301 – 309. See “Electronic Transactions.” Those provisions were amended in 2012 to remove the exception for recordable documents.

[47.19] Enforcement of Judgments

[CPLR § 5102] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Enforcement of judgment or order awarding possession of real property or a chattel.

A judgment or order, or a part thereof, awarding possession of real property or a chattel may be enforced by an execution, which shall particularly describe the property and designate the party to whom the judgment or order awards its possession. The execution shall comply with the provisions of [CPLR § 5230], except that it shall direct the sheriff to deliver possession of the property to the party designated.

CROSS-REFERENCES

See “Landlord’s Remedies,” relating to enforcement of judgments in landlord-tenant summary proceedings.

[CPLR § 5103] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Enforcement of judgment or order directing sale of real property.

[CPLR § 5103(a)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

(a) Entry in county where real property situated. Where real property directed by a judgment or order to be sold is not situated in the county in which the judgment or order is entered, the judgment or order shall also be entered by the clerk of the county in which the property is situated upon filing with him a certified copy of the judgment or order. A purchaser of the property is not required to pay the purchase money or accept a deed until the judgment or order is so entered.

[47.20] Environmental

[ECL § 27-2405] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Tenant notification of indoor air contamination.

1. For purposes of this [ECL § 27-2405]:

a. “test results” shall include the results of any tests conducted on indoor air, subslab air, ambient air, subslab groundwater samples, and subslab soil samples; and

b. “issuer” means:

(i) a person subject to an order issued pursuant to [ECL §§ 27-1301–27-1323], [Navigation Law art. 12 (§§ 170–197)], or [Public Health Law §§ 1389-a–1389-e)].

(ii) a participant as defined in [ECL § 27-1405(1)] subject to an agreement entered into pursuant to [ECL §§ 27-1401–27-1435], or

(iii) by a municipality subject to a contract entered into pursuant to [ECL §§ 56-0501–56-0515]; or

(iv) by the [DEC].

2. Any owner of real property or any owner's agent to whom indoor air contamination test results have been provided by an issuer shall, in cases where test results exceed [Department of Health] indoor air guidelines or the [Occupational Safety and Health Administration] guidelines for indoor air quality, provide a fact sheet and timely notice of any public meetings required to be held to discuss such results to all tenants and occupants and upon request such test results and any closure letter, within [15] days of receipt of such results. Generic fact sheets shall be prepared by the [Department of Health] and shall identify at a minimum the compound or contaminant of concern, reportable detection levels established by the [Department of Health] indoor air guidelines or the [Occupational Safety and Health Administration] guidelines for indoor air quality and health risks associated with exposure to such compound or contaminant and a means to obtain more information on the compound or contaminant.

3. For real property for which an engineering control is in place to mitigate indoor air contamination, or if the real property is subject to ongoing monitoring pursuant to an ongoing remedial program, the owner or owner's agent of real property to whom indoor air contamination test results have been provided by an issuer shall provide, or cause to be provided, fact sheets, and upon request any test results, or closure letter received by such owner or owner's agent to any prospective tenant prior to the signing of a binding lease or rental agreement. Generic fact sheets shall be prepared by the [Department of Health] and shall identify at a minimum the compound or contaminant of concern, reportable detection levels established by the [Department of Health] indoor air guidelines or the occupational safety and health administration guidelines for indoor air quality and health risks associated with exposure to such compound or contaminant and a means to obtain more information on the compound or contaminant. Such notice shall be included in the rental or lease agreement and shall contain the following in at least [12] point type in bold face on the first page:

“NOTIFICATION OF TEST RESULTS The property has been tested for contamination of indoor air: test results and additional information are available upon request.”

COMMENTARY

If a property tests positive for some forms of air contamination, this statute requires the property owner to notify tenants and prospective tenants of the issue, i.e., perhaps stop signing new leases. Thus a statute that nominally requires disclosure in fact incentivizes the landlord to act quickly to solve whatever problems exist, a dynamic common in many “disclosure” statutes. In addition to the quoted statute, which specifically relates to leasing, New York has a large body of environmental law, much of it sometimes relevant to commercial leasing transactions, especially with contaminated property. Also see “Government Leases.”

[47.21] Fixtures

[RPL § 226-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Effect of new lease on tenant’s right to remove fixtures or improvements.

Unless otherwise expressly agreed, where a tenant has a right to remove fixtures or improvements, such right shall not be lost or impaired by reason of his acceptance of a new lease of the same premises without any surrender of possession between terms.

Under the circumstances where this statute applies, it creates a possible small trap for the unwary landlord’s counsel: If the new lease fails to address this issue, then the terms of the old lease will continue to apply. That will often—but not always—be the correct result.

[47.22] Foreign Ownership

[RPL § 10] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Capacity to hold real property.

[RPL § 10(2)]

Aliens are empowered to take, hold, transmit, and dispose of real property within this state in the same manner as native-born citizens and their heirs and devisees take in the same manner as citizens’.

COMMENTARY

These statutory provisions have not been highly controversial. As home to the United Nations, numerous foreign embassies and consulates, and other international organizations, the New York commercial leasing market is uniquely affected by principles of diplomatic immunity and other limits on the liability of foreign governments and their instrumentalities. That body of law is a matter of federal and international law, not NYS or NYC law, hence it lies outside the scope of this collection. For a discussion of these matters, see the separate chapter in this work.⁵

[RPL § 15]

Title through alien.

The right, title or interest in or to real property in this state now held or hereafter acquired by any person entitled to hold the same can not be questioned or impeached by reason of the alienage of any person through whom such title may have been derived. Nothing in this [RPL §15] affects or impairs the right of any heir, devisee, mortgagee, or creditor by judgment or otherwise.

[47.23] Formalities of Execution

Conveyances by certain corporations executed and acknowledged by attorneys in fact entitled to recordation.

A conveyance of real property, within the state, or of any interest therein, including an instrument discharging or satisfying a lien created by any such conveyance, executed and acknowledged by an attorney in fact of any corporation wholly owned, directly or indirectly, by the United States of America, or any other corporation which has so filed a power of attorney, whether heretofore or hereafter so executed and acknowledged, shall be entitled to recordation under this article on tender of the lawful fees therefor, even though the corporate seal of such corporation be not annexed or affixed, if the power of attorney pursuant to which such attorney in fact has executed such conveyance, duly acknowledged or proved by such corporation, and certified, as required by [RPL § 294], is filed or recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where the real property, which is the subject of such conveyance, is located.

5 CHAPTER

COMMENTARY

This statute should eliminate any of the doubt sometimes expressed about whether a corporation can act through a power of attorney. As a practical matter, of course, one should always check in advance. This statute also eliminates any requirement for a corporate seal where an instrument is signed by an attorney in fact under a recorded power of attorney. The reporter is not aware of a statute that expressly eliminates the need for a seal where a corporation merely acts through one of its officers. Nevertheless, under New York practice, corporate seals are not required and are rarely seen, at least in real estate. The use of a corporate seal does constitute prima facie evidence that the instrument was executed by appropriate corporate authority. See BCL § 107.

[RPL § 298] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Acknowledgments and proofs within the state.

The acknowledgment or proof, within this state, of a conveyance of real property situate in this state may be made:

1. At any place within the state, before (a) a justice of the supreme court; (b) an official examiner of title; (c) an official referee; or (d) a notary public.
2. Within the district wherein such officer is authorized to perform official duties, before (a) a judge or clerk of any court of record; (b) a commissioner of deeds outside of [NYC], or a commissioner of deeds of [NYC] within the five counties comprising [NYC]; (c) the mayor or recorder of a city; (d) a surrogate, special surrogate, or special county judge; or I the county clerk or other recording officer of a county.
3. Before a justice of the peace, town councilman, village police justice or a judge of any court of inferior local jurisdiction, anywhere within the county containing the town, village or city in which he is authorized to perform official duties.

COMMENTARY

New York has not adopted the Uniform Recognition of Acknowledgments Act and has instead adopted requirements described in RPL §§ 298 et seq. The Legislature has almost succeeded in making acknowledgments as simple and straightforward as they should be. New York leases are usually not acknowledged, unless they will be recorded. New York law and practice do not require the use of “Attest” signatures, “Witness” signatures, or any particular number of signers for any particular entity type.

[RPL § 299] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Acknowledgments and proofs without the state, but within the United States or any territory, possession, or dependency thereof.

The acknowledgment or proof of a conveyance of real property situate in this state, if made (a) without the state but within the United States, (b) within any territory, possession, or dependency of the United States, or (c) within any place over which the United States, at the time when such acknowledgment or proof is taken, has or exercises jurisdiction, sovereignty, control, or a protectorate, may be made before any of the following officers acting within his territorial jurisdiction or within that of the court of which he is an officer:

1. A judge or other presiding officer of any court having a seal, or the clerk or other certifying officer thereof.
2. A mayor or other chief civil officer of any city or other political subdivision.
3. A notary public.
4. A commissioner of deeds appointed pursuant to the laws of this state to take acknowledgments or proofs without this state.
5. Any person authorized, by the laws of the state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place where the acknowledgment or proof is made, to take the acknowledgment or proof of deeds to be recorded therein.

[RPL § 299-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Acknowledgment to conform to law of New York or of place where taken; certificate of conformity.

1. An acknowledgment or proof made pursuant to the provisions of [RPL § 299] may be taken in the manner prescribed either by the laws of [NYS] or by the laws of the state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place where the acknowledgment or proof is taken. The acknowledgment or proof, if taken in the manner prescribed by such state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place, must be accompanied by a certificate to the effect that it conforms with such laws. Such certificate may be made by

(a) An attorney-at-law admitted to practice in [NYS], resident in the place where the acknowledgment or proof is taken, or by

(b) An attorney-at-law admitted to practice in the state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place where the acknowledgment or proof is taken, or by

I Any other person deemed qualified by any court of [NYS], if, in any action, proceeding, or other matter pending before such court, it be necessary to determine that such acknowledgment or proof conforms with the laws of such state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place; or by the supreme court of [NYS], on application for such determination. The justice, judge, surrogate, or other presiding judicial officer shall append to the instrument so acknowledged or proved his signed statement that he deemed such person qualified to make such certificate.

2. (a) The signature to such a certificate of conformity shall be presumptively genuine, and the qualification of the person whose name is so signed as a person authorized to make such certificate shall be presumptively established by the recital thereof in the certificate.

(b) The statement of a judicial officer appended to the instrument that he deemed the person making such certificate qualified shall establish the qualification of the person designated therein to make such certificate; and the recording, filing, registering or use as evidence of the instrument shall not depend on the power of the court to make the statement and proof shall not be required of any action, proceeding, matter or application in which or in connection with which the statement is made.

I When an instrument so acknowledged or proved is accompanied by the certificate of conformity and the statement of a judicial officer, if any be required, the acknowledgment or proof of the instrument, for the purpose of recording, filing or registering in any recording or filing office in this state or for use as evidence, shall be equivalent to one taken or made in the form prescribed by law for use in this state; and if the acknowledgment or proof is properly authenticated, where authentication is required by law, and if the instrument be otherwise entitled to record, filing or registering, such instrument, together with the acknowledgment or proof, the certificate of conformity and any certificate of authentication or statement of a judicial officer, may be recorded, filed or registered in any recording or filing office in this state, and shall be so recorded, filed or registered upon payment or tender of lawful fees therefor. In fixing the fees of a recording, filing or registering officer, the certificate of conformity and the statement of a judicial officer appended, if any, shall be treated as certificates of authentication required by other provisions of [RPL ch. 50].

Acknowledgments and proofs in foreign countries.

The acknowledgment or proof of a conveyance of real property situate in this state may be made in foreign countries before any of the following officers acting within his territorial jurisdiction or within that of the court of which he is an officer:

1. An ambassador, envoy, minister, charge d'affaires, secretary of legation, consul-general, consul, vice-consul, consular agent, vice-consular agent, or any other diplomatic or consular agent or representative of the United States, appointed or accredited to, and residing within, the country where the acknowledgment or proof is taken.
2. A judge or other presiding officer of any court having a seal, or the clerk or other certifying officer thereof.

3. A mayor or other chief civil officer of any city or other political subdivision.
4. A notary public.
5. A commissioner of deeds appointed pursuant to the laws of this state to take acknowledgments or proofs without this state.
6. A person residing in, or going to, the country where the acknowledgment or proof is to be taken, and specially authorized for that purpose by a commission issued to him under the seal of the supreme court of [NYS].
7. Any person authorized, by the laws of the country where the acknowledgment or proof is made, to take acknowledgments of conveyances of real estate or to administer oaths in proof of the execution thereof.

[RPL § 301-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Acknowledgment to conform to law of New York or of foreign country; certificate of conformity.

1. An acknowledgment or proof made pursuant to the provisions of [RPL § 301] may be taken in the manner prescribed either by the laws of [NYS] or by the laws of the country where the acknowledgment or proof is taken. The acknowledgment or proof, if taken in the manner prescribed by the laws of such foreign country, must be accompanied by a certificate to the effect that it conforms with such laws. Such certificate may be made by

(a) An attorney-at-law admitted to practice in [NYS], resident in such foreign country, or by

(b) A consular officer of the United States, resident in such foreign country, under the seal of his office, or by

I A consular officer of such foreign country, resident in [NYS], under the seal of his office, or by

(d) Any other person deemed qualified by any court of [NYS], if, in any action, proceeding, or other matter pending before such court, it be necessary to determine that such acknowledgment or proof conforms with the laws of such foreign country; or by the supreme court of [NYS], on application for such determination.

The justice, judge, surrogate, or other presiding judicial officer shall append to the instrument so acknowledged or proved his signed statement that he deemed such person qualified to make such certificate.

2. (a) The signature to such a certificate of conformity shall be presumptively genuine, and the qualification of the person whose name is so signed as a person authorized to make such certificate shall be presumptively established by the recital thereof in the certificate.

(b) The statement of a judicial officer appended to the instrument that he deemed the person making such certificate qualified shall establish the qualification of the person designated therein to make such certificate; and the recording, filing, registering or use as evidence of the instrument shall not depend on the power of the court to make the statement and proof shall not be required of any action, proceeding, matter or application in which or in connection with which the statement is made.

I When an instrument so acknowledged or proved is accompanied by the certificate of conformity and the statement of a judicial officer, if any be required, the acknowledgment or proof of the instrument, for the purpose of recording, filing or registering in any recording or filing office in this state or for use as evidence, shall be equivalent to one taken or made in the form prescribed by law for use in this state; and if the acknowledgment or proof is properly authenticated, where authentication is required by law, and if the instrument be otherwise entitled to record, filing or registering, such instrument, together with the acknowledgment or proof, the certificate of conformity and any certificate of authentication or statement of a judicial officer, may be recorded, filed or registered in any recording or filing office in this state, and shall be so recorded, filed or registered upon payment or tender of lawful fees therefor. In fixing the fees of a recording, filing or registering officer, the certificate of conformity and the statement of a judicial officer appended, if any, shall be treated as certificates of authentication required by other provisions of this [RPL §§ 290 to 602].

[RPL § 303] Statutory Excerpt or Summar

Requisites of acknowledgment.

An acknowledgment must not be taken by any officer unless he knows or has satisfactory evidence, that the person making it is the person described in and who executed such instrument.

[RPL § 306] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Certificate of acknowledgment or proof.

A person taking the acknowledgment or proof of a conveyance must indorse thereupon or attach thereto, a certificate, signed by himself, stating all the matters required to be done, known, or proved on the taking of such acknowledgment or proof; together with the name and substance of the testimony of each witness examined before him, and if a subscribing witness, his place of residence.

Any conveyance which has heretofore been recorded, or which may hereafter be recorded, shall be deemed to have been duly acknowledged or proved and properly authenticated, when [10] years have elapsed since such recording; saving, however, the rights of every purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration deriving title from the same vendor or grantor, his heirs or devisees, to the same property or any portion thereof, whose conveyance shall have been duly recorded before the said period of [10] years shall have elapsed.

[RPL § 307] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

When certificate to state time and place.

When the acknowledgment or proof is taken by a commissioner of deeds appointed pursuant to the laws of this state to take acknowledgments or proofs without this state, whether within or without the United States, the certificate must also state the day on which, and the city or other political subdivision, and the state or country or other place in which, the same was taken.

[RPL § 308] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

When certificate must be under seal.

1. When a certificate of acknowledgment or proof is made without this state, whether within or without the United States, (a) if made by a judge or other presiding officer of a court having a seal, or by the clerk or other certifying officer thereof, such certificate must be under the seal of such court; (b) if made by a commissioner of deeds appointed pursuant to the laws of this state to take acknowledgments or proofs without this state, such certificate must be under his seal of office; [and] (c) if made by any officer specified in [RPL § 301(1)], such certificate must be under the seal of the legation or consulate to which such officer is attached.

2. Any certificate, required by the provisions of [RPL § 311] to be authenticated, must be so authenticated, in addition to being under seal as provided in this [RPL § 308].

[RPL § 309] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Acknowledgment by corporation and form of certificate.

1. The acknowledgment of a conveyance or other instrument by a corporation, must be made by an officer or attorney in fact duly appointed, or in case of a dissolved corporation, by an officer, director or attorney in fact duly appointed thereof authorized to execute the same by the board of directors of said corporation.

3. [RPL § 309(2)] shall be inapplicable to the acknowledgment, within this state, of a conveyance or other instrument in respect to real property situate in this state executed on or after [September 1, 1999]. A certificate of such an acknowledgment shall be subject to the provisions of [RPL § 309-a].

COMMENTARY

When the Legislature simplified the form of New York acknowledgment in 1997, some confusion remained for corporate acknowledgments. So with the result that the form of corporate acknowledgment still varies depending on whether the instrument relates to real property within the state or relates to something else RPL § 309 offers two forms of corporate acknowledgment, but RPL § 309(3) says those forms must not be used for conveyances or other instruments affecting real property. The reference to a corporation's signing by an attorney in fact further demonstrates the lack of any issue in that regard.

[RPL § 309-a]

Uniform forms of certificates of acknowledgment or proof within this state.

1. The certificate of an acknowledgment, within this state, of a conveyance or other instrument in respect to real property situate in this state, by a person, must conform substantially with the following form, the blanks being properly filled:

State of New York)

) ss.:

County of _____)

On the _____ day of _____ in the year _____ before me, the undersigned, personally appeared _____, personally known to me or proved to me on the basis of satisfactory evidence to be the individual(s) whose name(s) is (are) subscribed to the within instrument and acknowledged to me that he/she/they executed the same in his/her/their capacity(ies), and that by his/her/their signature(s) on the instrument, the individual(s), or the person upon behalf of which the individual(s) acted, executed the instrument.

(Signature and office of individual taking acknowledgment.)

2. The certificate for a proof of execution by a subscribing witness, within this state, of a conveyance or other instrument made by any person in respect to real property situate in this state, must conform substantially with the following form, the blanks being properly filled:

State of New York)

) ss.:

County of _____)

On the _____ day of _____ in the year _____ before me, the undersigned, personally appeared _____, the subscribing witness to the foregoing instrument, with whom I am personally acquainted, who, being by me duly sworn, did depose and say that he/she/they reside(s) in _____ (if the place of residence is in a city, include the street and street number, if any, thereof); that he/she/they know(s) _____ to be the individual described in and who executed the foregoing instrument; that said subscribing witness was present and saw said _____ execute the same; and that said witness at the same time subscribed his/her/their name(s) as a witness thereto.

(Signature and office of individual taking proof.)

3. A certificate of an [acknowledgment] or proof taken under [RPL § 300]⁶ shall include the additional information required by [RPL § 300].

4. For the purposes of this [RPL § 309-a], the term “person” means any corporation, joint stock company, estate, general partnership (including any registered limited liability partnership or foreign limited liability partnership), limited liability company (including a professional service limited liability company), foreign limited liability company (including a foreign professional service limited liability company), joint venture, limited partnership, natural person, attorney in fact, real estate investment trust, business trust or other trust, custodian, nominee or any other individual or entity in its own or any representative capacity.

COMMENTARY

The statute defines “person” to include an attorney in fact. That should counter occasional efforts to complicate acknowledgments when the signer is an attorney in fact.

11 RPL § 300 requires more information when an acknowledgment or proof of conveyance of real property is made by a person in the armed forces.

1. When a certificate of acknowledgment or proof is made, within this state, by a commissioner of deeds, a justice of the peace, town councilman, village police justice, or a judge of any court of inferior local jurisdiction, such certificate does not entitle the conveyance so acknowledged or proved to be read in evidence or recorded in any county of this state except a county in which the officer making such certificate is authorized to act at the time of making the same, unless such certificate is authenticated by a certificate of the clerk of such county; provided, however, that all certificates of acknowledgment or proof, made by a commissioner of deeds of [NYC] residing in any part therein, shall be authenticated by the clerk of any county within said city, in whose office such commissioner of deeds shall have filed a certificate under the hand and seal of the city clerk of said city, showing the appointment and term of office of such commissioner; and no other certificates shall be required from any other officer to entitle such conveyance to be read in evidence or recorded in any county of this state.

2. Except as provided in [RPL § 310], no certificate of authentication shall be required to entitle a conveyance to be read in evidence or recorded in this state when acknowledged or proved before any officer designated in [RPL § 298] to take such acknowledgment or proof, nor shall such authentication be required for recording in the office of the city register of [NYC] of such acknowledgment or proof by a commissioner of deeds of [NYC].

[RPL § 311] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Authentication of acknowledgments and proofs made without the state.

1. When a certificate of acknowledgment or proof is made, either within or without the United States, by a commissioner of deeds appointed pursuant to the laws of this state to take acknowledgments or proofs without this state, the conveyance so acknowledged or proved is not entitled to be read in evidence or recorded in this state, except as provided in [Executive Law § 108(5)], unless such certificate is authenticated by the certificate of the secretary of state of [NYS].

2. When a certificate of acknowledgment or proof is made by a notary public in a foreign country other than Canada, the conveyance so acknowledged or proved is not entitled to be read in evidence or recorded in this state unless such certificate is authenticated (a) by the certificate of the clerk or other certifying officer of a court in the district in which such acknowledgment or proof was made, under the seal of such court, or (b) by the certificate of the clerk, register, recorder, or other recording officer of the district in which such acknowledgment or proof was made, or (c) by the certificate of the officer having charge of the official records of the appointment of such notary, or having a record of the signature of such notary, or (d) by the certificate of a consular officer of the United States resident in such country.

3. When a certificate of acknowledgment or proof, made by the mayor or other chief civil officer of a city or other political subdivision, is not under the seal of such city or other political subdivision, the conveyance so acknowledged or proved is not entitled to be read in evidence or recorded in this state unless such certificate is authenticated by the certificate of the clerk of such city or other political subdivision, or by the certificate of a consular officer of the United States resident in the country where the acknowledgment or proof was made.

4. When a certificate of acknowledgement or proof is made pursuant to the provisions of [RPL § 299(5) or 301(7)] by an officer or person not elsewhere in either of said [RPL § 299(5) or 301(7)] specifically designated to take acknowledgements or proofs, the conveyance so acknowledged or proved is not entitled to be read in evidence or recorded within this state unless such certificate is authenticated (a) by the certificate of the secretary of state of a state, or of the secretary of a territory, of the United States, or (b) by the certificate of any officer designated in [RPL § 311(3)] to authenticate certificates of acknowledgment or proof, or (c) by the certificate of any officer designated in [RPL § 311(2)(a) or (b)] to authenticate certificates of acknowledgment or proof, or (d) by the certificate of the officer having charge of the official records showing that the person taking the acknowledgment or proof is such officer as he purports to be, or having a record of the signature of such person.

5. Except as provided in [RPL § 311(5)], no certificate of authentication shall be required to entitle a conveyance to be read in evidence or recorded in this state when acknowledged or proved before any officer designated in [RPL § 299 or 301] to take such acknowledgment or proof.

3. When such original certificate is made pursuant to [RPL § 299(5)], such certificate of authentication must also specify that the person making such original certificate, at the time when it purports to have been made, was authorized, by the laws of the state, District of Columbia, territory, possession, dependency, or other place where the acknowledgment or proof was made, to take the acknowledgment or proof of deeds to be recorded therein.

4. When such original certificate is made pursuant to [RPL § 301(7)], such certificate of authentication must also specify that the person making such original certificate, at the time when it purports to have been made, was authorized, by the laws of the country where the acknowledgment or proof was made, to take acknowledgments of conveyances of real estate or to administer oaths in proof of the execution thereof.

Fraudulent Conveyances

[DCL § 270] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definition of terms.

In this [DCL art. 10 (§§ 270 to 281)] “assets” of a debtor means property not exempt from liability for his debts. To the extent that any property is liable for any debts of the debtor, such property shall be included in his assets.

“Conveyance” includes every payment of money, assignment, release, transfer, lease, mortgage or pledge of tangible or intangible property, and also the creation of any lien or incumbrance.

“Creditor” is a person having any claim, whether matured or unmatured, liquidated or unliquidated, absolute, fixed or contingent.

“Debt” includes any legal liability, whether matured or unmatured, liquidated or unliquidated, absolute, fixed or contingent.

[DCL § 271] Statutory Excerpt or Summar

Insolvency.

1. A person is insolvent when the present fair salable value of his assets is less than the amount that will be required to pay his probable liability on his existing debts as they become absolute and matured.
2. In determining whether a partnership is insolvent there shall be added to the partnership property the present fair salable value of the separate assets of each general partner in excess of the amount probably sufficient to meet the claims of his separate creditors, and also the amount of any unpaid subscription to the partnership of each limited partner, provided the present fair salable value of the assets of such limited partner is probably sufficient to pay his debts, including such unpaid subscription.

[DCL § 272] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Fair consideration.*

Fair consideration is given for property, or obligation,

- a. When in exchange for such property, or obligation, as a fair equivalent therefor, and in good faith, property is conveyed or an antecedent debt is satisfied, or
- b. When such property, or obligation is received in good faith to secure a present advance or antecedent debt in amount not disproportionately small as compared with the value of the property, or obligation obtained.

[DCL § 273] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Conveyances by insolvent.*

Every conveyance made and every obligation incurred by a person who is or will be thereby rendered insolvent is fraudulent as to creditors without regard to his actual intent if the conveyance is made or the obligation is incurred without a fair consideration.

[DCL § 273-a]

Conveyances by defendants.

Every conveyance made without fair consideration when the person making it is a defendant in an action for money damages or a judgment in such an action has been docketed against him, is fraudulent as to the plaintiff in that action without regard to the actual intent of the defendant if, after final judgment for the plaintiff, the defendant fails to satisfy the judgment.

[DCL § 274] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Conveyances by persons in business.*

Every conveyance made without fair consideration when the person making it is engaged or is about to engage in a business or transaction for which the property remaining in his hands after the conveyance is an unreasonably small capital, is fraudulent as to creditors and as to other persons who become creditors during the continuance of such business or transaction without regard to his actual intent.

[DCL § 275] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Conveyances by a person about to incur debts.*

Every conveyance made and every obligation incurred without fair consideration when the person making the conveyance or entering into the obligation intends or believes that he will incur debts beyond his ability to pay as they mature, is fraudulent as to both present and future creditors.

[DCL § 276] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Conveyance made with intent to defraud.*

Every conveyance made and every obligation incurred with actual intent, as distinguished from intent presumed in law, to hinder, delay, or defraud either present or future creditors, is fraudulent as to both present and future creditors.

[DCL § 276-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Attorneys' fees in action or special proceeding to set aside a conveyance made with intent to defraud.

In an action or special proceeding brought by a creditor, receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for the benefit of creditors to set aside a conveyance by a debtor, where such conveyance is found to have been made by the debtor and received by the transferee with actual intent, as distinguished from intent presumed in law, to hinder, delay or defraud either present or future creditors, in which action or special proceeding the creditor, receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for the benefit of creditors shall recover judgment, the justice or surrogate presiding at the trial shall fix the reasonable attorney's fees of the creditor, receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for the benefit of creditors in such action or special proceeding, and the creditor, receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for the benefit of creditors shall have judgment therefor against the debtor and the transferee who are defendants in addition to the other relief granted by the judgment. The fee so fixed shall be without prejudice to any agreement, express or implied, between the creditor, receiver, trustee in bankruptcy, or assignee for the benefit of creditors and his attorney with respect to the compensation of such attorney.

[DCL § 277] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Conveyance of partnership property.

Every conveyance of partnership property and every partnership obligation incurred when the partnership is or will be thereby rendered insolvent, is fraudulent as to partnership creditors, if the conveyance is made or obligation is incurred,

- a. To a partner, whether with or without a promise by him to pay partnership debts, or
- b. To a person not a partner without fair consideration to the partnership as distinguished from consideration to the individual partners.

[DCL § 278] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Rights of creditors whose claims have matured.

1. Where a conveyance or obligation is fraudulent as to a creditor, such creditor, when his claim has matured, may, as against any person except a purchaser for fair consideration without knowledge of the fraud at the time of the purchase, or one who has derived title immediately or mediately from such a purchaser,

a. Have the conveyance set aside or obligation annulled to the extent necessary to satisfy his claim, or

b. Disregard the conveyance and attach or levy execution upon the property conveyed.

2. A purchaser who without actual fraudulent intent has given less than a fair consideration for the conveyance or obligation, may retain the property or obligation as security for repayment.

[DCL § 279] Statutory Summary or Excerpt

Rights of creditors whose claims have not matured.

Where a conveyance made or obligation incurred is fraudulent as to a creditor whose claim has not matured he may proceed in a court of competent jurisdiction against any person against whom he could have proceeded had his claim matured, and the court may,

a. Restrain the defendant from disposing of his property.

b. Appoint a receiver to take charge of the property,

c. Set aside the conveyance or annul the obligation, or

d. Make any order which the circumstances of the case may require.

[DCL § 280]

Cases not provided for in article.

In any case not provided for in this [DCL art. 10 (§§ 270 to 281)] the rules of law and equity including the law merchant, and in particular the rules relating to the law of principal and agent, and the effect of fraud, misrepresentation, duress or coercion, mistake, bankruptcy or other invalidating cause shall govern.

Government Leases

[NYC Charter, § 197-c] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Uniform land use review procedure.

[NYC Charter § 197-c(a)(10) and (11)]

a. Except as otherwise provided in this charter, applications by any person or agency for changes, approvals, contracts, consents, permits or authorization thereof, respecting the use, development or improvement of real property subject to city regulation shall be reviewed pursuant to a uniform review procedure in the following categories:

(10) Sale, lease (other than the lease of office space), exchange, or other disposition of the real property of the city, including the sale or lease of land under water pursuant to . . . applicable provisions of law;

(11) Acquisition by the city of real property (other than the acquisition of office space for office use or a building for office use), including acquisition by purchase, condemnation, exchange or lease and including the acquisition of land under water pursuant to . . . applicable provisions of law[.]

COMMENTARY

The quoted statute (a reference to NYC's uniform land use review procedure) is only the tip of the iceberg. New York has a wide range of municipalities, public benefit corporations, and other public and quasi-public entities. Each entity, or entity type, is governed by its own body of law, creating certain powers, procedures, and in some cases oversight requirements. State leases have their own procedures. Environmental and other statutes may require additional procedural steps and clearances. Anyone entering into a lease with any such entity must review the entity's governing statutes and consider obtaining appropriate evidence confirming compliance. In some cases, an opinion of counsel might be appropriate. Even if the entity complies with all applicable procedures, opponents of any substantial lease or other transaction will often still sue, alleging some form of noncompliance with the rules. The resulting uncertainty, risk, delay, and expense often must be allocated between the parties to the transaction as part of the business negotiations.

[SFL § 138] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

State contracts not to be assigned without consent.

A clause shall be inserted in all specifications or contracts hereafter made or awarded by the state, or any public department or official thereof, prohibiting any contractor, to whom any contract shall be let, granted or awarded, as required by law, from assigning, transferring, conveying, sub-letting or otherwise disposing of the same, or of his right, title or interest therein, or his power to execute such contract to any other person, company or corporation, without the previous consent in writing of the department or official awarding the same.

If any contractor, to whom any contract is hereafter let, granted or awarded, as required by law, by the state, or by any public department or official thereof, shall, without the previous written consent specified in the first paragraph of [SFL § 138], assign, transfer, convey, sublet or otherwise dispose of the same, or his right, title or interest therein, or his power to execute such contract, to any other person, company or other corporation, the state, public department or official, as the case may be, which let, made, granted or awarded said contract, shall revoke and annul such contract, and the state, public department or officer, as the case may be, shall be relieved and discharged from any and all liability and obligations growing out of said contract to such contract, and to the person, company, or corporation to whom he shall assign, transfer, convey, sublet or otherwise dispose of the same, and said contractor, and his assignee, transferee, or sub-lessee, shall forfeit and lose all moneys, theretofore earned under said contract except so much as may be required to pay his employees; provided that nothing herein contained shall be construed to hinder, prevent or affect an assignment by such contract for the benefit of his creditors, made pursuant to the statutes of this state.

Notwithstanding the provisions of this [SFL § 138], the commissioner of general services and state agencies may, with concurrence of the office of state comptroller when the original contract was subject to the office of state comptroller approval, waive prior written consent of an assignment, transfer, conveyance, sublease or other disposition of contracts or monies under a contract let pursuant to article eleven of this chapter. Such waiver may be granted under circumstances where the contractor verifies to the commissioner of general services or state agency, as applicable, that the assignment, transfer, conveyance, sublease or other disposition is due to but not necessarily limited to, a reorganization, merger or consolidation of the contractor's business entity or enterprise. The commissioner of general services and state agencies retain the right, as provided herein, to accept or reject an assignment, transfer, conveyance, sublease or other disposition by the contractor.

COMMENTARY

By its terms, and by NYS's interpretation of those terms, this statute is entirely incompatible with modern commercial real estate financing transactions, because N.Y SFL § 138 limits the assignability of leases with the state. Somehow developers nevertheless manage to finance these projects.

[Court of Claims Act § 8] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Waiver of immunity from liability. The state hereby waives its immunity from liability and action and hereby assumes liability and consents to have the same determined in accordance with the same rules of law as applied to actions in the supreme court against individuals or corporations, provided the claimant complies with the limitations of this article. Nothing herein contained shall be construed to affect, alter or repeal any provision of the workmen's compensation law.

COMMENTARY

This statute should mean a state lease need not include a waiver of immunity. The wording of this statute is slightly different on the Court of Claims website, part of www.nycourts.gov.

Guaranty—General

[CPLR 3213] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Motion for summary judgment in lieu of complaint.

When an action is based upon an instrument for the payment of money only or upon any judgment, the plaintiff may serve with the summons a notice of motion for summary judgment and the supporting papers in lieu of a complaint. The summons served with such motion papers shall require the defendant to submit answering papers on the motion within the time provided in the notice of motion. The minimum time such motion shall be noticed to be heard shall be as provided by [CPLR 320(a)] for making an appearance, depending upon the method of service. If the plaintiff sets the hearing date of the motion later than the minimum time therefor, he may require the defendant to serve a copy of his answering papers upon him within such extended period of time, not exceeding [10] days, prior to such hearing date. No default judgment may be entered pursuant to [CPLR 3215(a)] prior to the hearing date of the motion. If the motion is denied, the moving and answering papers shall be deemed the complaint and answer, respectively, unless the court orders otherwise.

COMMENTARY

The holder of “an instrument for the payment of money” qualifies for an expedited proceeding, in which the complaint may also include a motion for summary judgment. A typical guaranty of payment should qualify. If a guaranty contains nonmonetary elements, those may raise issues. Landlord’s counsel may want to cover them in a separate document. Landlord’s counsel may want to include language like this in a guaranty:

“Guarantor acknowledges this Guaranty is an “instrument for the payment of money only,” within the meaning of Civil Practice Law and Rules 3213.”

[SCPA § 1802] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Effect of failure to present claim*

If any claim [against an estate] is not presented . . . within 7 months from the date of issue of letters [testamentary], the fiduciary [executor] shall not be chargeable for any assets or moneys that he may have paid in good faith in satisfaction of any lawful claims or of any legacies or distributions to the leg-tees or distributes of the decedent before such claim was presented. Such 7 month period shall begin on the date letters were first issued to any fiduciary, including a temporary administrator or a preliminary executor, and shall not be interrupted by any subsequent issue of letters, except that the time during which there is no fiduciary in office shall not be counted as part of such period.

COMMENTARY

The statute provides elsewhere for the treatment of contingent and unliquidated claims, such as those under a typical guaranty. Failure to file within seven months does not necessarily vitiate the claim entirely, but prevents the landlord from objecting to any distributions made from the estate before the landlord presented the claim. Moral of the story: landlords and other beneficiaries of guaranties should monitor the continued survival of their guarantors and act quickly if a guarantor dies. Similar concerns arise if a guarantor becomes disabled, files bankruptcy, or encounters other difficulties. These concerns are not unique to guaranties or New York commercial leasing.

Guaranty—Statute of Frauds

[GOL § 5-701] Statutory Excerpt of Summary

Agreements required to be in writing.

[GOL § 5-701(a)(2)]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

a. Every agreement, promise or undertaking is void, unless it or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his lawful agent, if such agreement, promise or undertaking:

2. Is a special promise to answer for the debt, default or miscarriage of another person;

Guardians or Conservators

[SCPA § 1715] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Authority of guardian to sell, lease, exchange or mortgage.

[SCPA § 1715(1)]

1. The surrogate's court of the county from which letters were issued to the guardian of the property of an infant may, in accordance with this [SCPA § 1715], authorize the guardian in the name of the infant to sell, lease, exchange or mortgage any interest of the infant in real property.

Holding Over

[RPL § 229] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Liability of tenant holding over after giving notice of intention to quit.

If a tenant gives notice of his intention to quit the premises held by him, and does not accordingly deliver up the possession thereof, at the time specified in such notice, he or his personal representatives must, so long as he continue in possession, pay to the landlord, his heirs or assigns, double the rent which he should otherwise have paid, to be recovered at the same time, and in the same manner, as the single rent.

COMMENTARY

In negotiated commercial leases, holdover rent is often lower than the statutory double rent provided for here, at least during the first few months of holding over. The statutory double rent applies only to certain holdovers, though. The statute does not indicate whether the double rent is prorated daily or imposed on a month-to-month basis. The latter is typical in landlords' forms of commercial lease. Given recent rulings by New York courts, any commercial tenant should think carefully before holding over beyond the term of its lease. In one case, a New York court found the holdover tenant liable not only to the landlord for holdover rent but also to the new tenant for trespass damages. See Kronish Lieb Weiner & Hellman LLP v. Tahari, Ltd., 35 A.D.3d 317, 829 N.Y.S.2d 7 (1st Dep't 2006). When a tenant negotiates a new lease, it should keep in mind the issues in this paragraph.

Indemnification

[GOL § 5-321] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Agreements exempting lessors from liability for negligence void and unenforceable.

Every covenant, agreement or understanding in or in connection with or collateral to any lease of real property exempting the lessor from liability for damages for injuries to person or property caused by or resulting from the negligence of the lessor, his agents, servants or employees, in the operation or maintenance of the demised premises or the real property containing the demised premises shall be deemed to be void as against public policy and wholly unenforceable.

COMMENTARY

Even though such agreements are statutorily void, they appear in most landlords' leases, and the parties can spend time negotiating them. The statutory language sounds broad enough to invalidate routine lease provisions by which landlord and tenant mutually waive rights of recovery against each other based on the existence of waivers of subrogation by their insurance carriers, but a few reported cases suggest that this interpretation would be wrong. Also, this statute may arguably prevent a large tenant from carrying insurance (protecting the landlord) with "high deductibles" or to self-insure these risks. Apparently the risks can be shifted to an insurance company but not a tenant. The parties might try to resolve that tension with language like this, which is nonstandard and arose only in a particular transaction where the parties were very concerned about this issue:

"To the extent that Landlord suffers a loss (or incurs liability to third parties) that Tenant's insurance carrier would have covered, but for Tenant's use of a deductible in an amount exceeding $_____ (a "High Deductible") instead of a lower deductible (a "Low Deductible"), then, Tenant shall pay the amount of such loss (or liability). The previous sentence is not intended to exempt Landlord from liability for its own negligence, or to require Tenant to indemnify Landlord against Landlord's negligence, but merely to protect Landlord from Tenant's decision to carry insurance with High Deductibles rather than Low Deductibles, and to shift from Landlord to Tenant the consequences of that decision."

If landlord's or tenant's counsel issues an enforceability opinion on the lease (which happens only very occasionally), should the opinion raise an exception for this statute?

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

Extensive statutes and regulations address issues of this type (see, e.g., ISL §§ 3426, 3427, and 3429), but any statutory or regulatory issues in this area do not commonly drive any debate, discussion, or drafting in commercial lease negotiations.

Interest

[BNK § 14-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Rate of interest; banking board to adopt regulations.

1. The maximum rate of interest provided for in [GOL § 5-501] shall be [16%] per annum.
2. The rate of interest as so prescribed under this [BNK § 14-a] shall include as interest any and all amounts paid or payable, directly or indirectly, by any person, to or for the account of the lender in consideration for the making of a loan or forbearance as defined by the superintendent pursuant to [BNK § 14-a(3)].
3. The superintendent to adopt such regulations as the superintendent shall deem necessary or proper to implement the provisions of this [BNK § 14-a]. The superintendent shall make available to the public copies of all regulations adopted pursuant to this [BNK § 14-a].

5. Whenever reference is made in this [BNK ch.2] or in any other law, contract or document to the rate of interest prescribed or to be prescribed by the banking board or the superintendent [of Banks] pursuant to this [BNK § 14-a] or any former [BNK § 14-a], such reference shall be deemed a reference to the rate of interest prescribed in [BNK § 14-a(1)].

COMMENTARY

New York's usury statutes are confusing and almost never affect substantial commercial transactions. For more on these statutes, see Joshua Stein, New York Commercial Mortgage Transactions, ch. 2 (2008).

[GOL § 5-501] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Rate of interest; usury forbidden.

1. The rate of interest, as computed pursuant to this [GOL §§ 5-501 to 5-531], upon the loan or forbearance of any money, goods, or things in action, except as provided in [GOL § 5-501(5) and (6)] or as otherwise provided by law, shall be [6%] per annum unless a different rate is prescribed in [BNK § 14-a].

2. No person or corporation shall, directly or indirectly, charge, take or receive any money, goods or things in action as interest on the loan or forbearance of any money, goods or things in action at a rate exceeding the rate above prescribed. The amount charged, taken or received as interest shall include any and all amounts paid or payable, directly or indirectly, by any person, to or for the account of the lender in consideration for making the loan or forbearance as defined by the superintendent of financial services pursuant to [BNK § 14-a(3)] except such fee as may be fixed by the commissioner of taxation and finance as the cost of servicing loans made by the property and liability insurance security fund.

[GOL § 5-501(4)–(7)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

4. Except as otherwise provided by law, interest shall not be charged, taken or received on any loan or forbearance at a rate exceeding such rate of interest as may be authorized by law at the time the loan or forbearance is made, whether or not the loan or forbearance is made pursuant to a prior contract or commitment providing for a greater rate of interest, provided, however, that no change in the rate of interest prescribed in [BNK § 14-a] shall affect (a) the validity of a loan or forbearance made before the date such rate becomes effective or (b) the enforceability of such loan or forbearance in accordance with its terms, except that if any loan or forbearance provides for an increase in the rate of interest during the term of such loan or forbearance, the increased rate shall not exceed such rate of interest as may have been authorized by law at the time such loan or forbearance was made.

4-a. Notwithstanding the provisions of [GOL § 5-501(4)], a loan or forbearance repayable on demand may provide for changes, reflecting variations in lending rates, from time to time in the rate of interest payable on such loan or forbearance up to the rate of interest authorized by law at the time of such change and in such case the rate of interest may be so changed in accordance with the terms of the contract or loan commitment relating thereto; provided, however, that the rate of interest charged, taken or received on such a loan or forbearance shall not exceed the rate of interest authorized by law as it may subsequently be reduced from time to time; and further provided, however, that in no event shall such a loan or forbearance [be] subject to an authorized rate of interest less than that applicable at the time such loan or forbearance was made. The provisions of this [GOL § 5-501(4-a)] shall apply only to a loan or forbearance repayable on demand which has an initial principal of more than [$5000] and which the borrower has the right to repay at any time in whole or in part, together with accrued interest on the principal so repaid, without any penalty. With respect to a loan or forbearance covered by this [GOL § 5-501(4-a)], the lender shall disclose to the borrower in writing not less often than annually the amount of interest accrued or payable as of the date of such disclosure and the manner by which such amount was computed.

5. No law regulating the maximum rate of interest which may be charged, taken or received shall apply to any loan or forbearance insured by the federal housing commissioner or for which a commitment to insure has been made by the federal housing commissioner or to any loan or forbearance insured or guaranteed pursuant to the provisions of an act of congress entitled "Servicemen's Readjustment Act of 1944."

6-a. No law regulating the maximum rate of interest which may be charged, taken or received, except [PL §§ 190.40 and 190.42], shall apply to any loan or forbearance in the amount of [$250,000] or more, other than a loan or a forbearance secured primarily by an interest in real property improved by a one or two family residence. A loan of [$250,000] or more which is to be advanced in installments pursuant to a written agreement by a lender shall be deemed to be a single loan for the total amount which the lender has agreed to advance pursuant to such agreement on the terms and conditions provided therein.

b. No law regulating the maximum rate of interest which may be charged, taken or received, including [PL §§ 190.40 and 190.42], shall apply to any loan or forbearance in the amount of [$2,500,000] or more. Loans or forbearances aggregating [$2,500,000] or more which are to be made or advanced to any one borrower in one or more installments pursuant to a written agreement by one or more lenders shall be deemed to be a single loan or forbearance for the total amount which the lender or lenders have agreed to advance or make pursuant to such agreement on the terms and conditions provided therein.

7. Except as otherwise expressly provided by law, in the event of prepayment in full of a loan, any refund of unearned interest to which the borrower may be entitled may not be computed by a sum of the balances or similar method but must be determined according to a generally accepted actuarial method.

[GOL § 5-511] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Usurious contracts void.

1. All bonds, bills, notes, assurances, conveyances, all other contracts or securities whatsoever, except bottomry and respondentia bonds and contracts, and all deposits of goods or other things whatsoever, whereupon or whereby there shall be reserved or taken, or secured or agreed to be reserved or taken, any greater sum, or greater value, for the loan or forbearance of any money, goods or other things in action, than is prescribed in [GOL § 5-501], shall be void, except that the knowingly taking, receiving, reserving or charging such a greater sum or greater value by a savings bank, a savings and loan association or a federal savings and loan association shall only be held and adjudged a forfeiture of the entire interest which the loan or obligation carries with it or which has been agreed to be paid thereon. If a greater sum or greater value has been paid, the person paying the same or his legal representative may recover from the savings bank, the savings and loan association or the federal savings and loan association twice the entire amount of the interest thus paid.

2. Except as provided in [GOL § 5-511(1)], whenever it shall satisfactorily appear by the admissions of the defendant, or by proof, that any bond, bill, note, assurance, pledge, conveyance, contract, security or any evidence of debt, has been taken or received in violation of the foregoing provisions, the court shall declare the same to be void, and enjoin any prosecution thereon, and order the same to be surrendered and cancelled.

COMMENTARY

The statute provides an especially light usury penalty for savings banks and savings and loan associations, to the extent that any still exist.

[GOL § 5-513] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Recovery of excess.

Every person who, for any such loan or forbearance, shall pay or deliver any greater sum or value than is allowed to be received pursuant to [GOL § 5-501], and his personal representatives, may recover in an action against the person who shall have taken or received the same, and his personal representatives, the amount of the money so paid or value delivered, above the rate aforesaid.

[GOL § 5-515] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Borrower bringing an action need not offer to repay.

Whenever any borrower of money, goods or things in action, shall begin an action for the recovery of the money, goods or things in action taken in violation of the foregoing provisions of this [GOL §§ 5-501 to 5-531], it shall not be necessary for him to pay or offer to pay any interest or principal on the sum or thing loaned; nor shall any court require or compel the payment or deposit of the principal sum or interest, or any portion thereof, as a condition of granting relief to the borrower in any case of usurious loans forbidden by the foregoing provisions of this [GOL §§ 5-501 to 5-531].

[GOL § 5-519] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Return of excess a bar to further penalties.

Every person who shall repay or return the money, goods or other things so taken, accepted or received, or the value thereof, shall be discharged from any other or further forfeiture or penalty which he may have incurred under [GOL § 5-511 or 5-513], by taking or receiving the money, goods or other things so repaid, or returned, as aforesaid.

[GOL § 5-521] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Corporations prohibited from interposing defense of usury.

1. No corporation shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action. The term corporation, as used in this [GOL § 5-521], shall be construed to include all associations, and joint-stock companies having any of the powers and privileges of corporations not possessed by individuals or partnerships.

2. The provisions of [GOL § 5-521(1)] shall not apply to a corporation, the principal asset of which shall be the ownership of a one or two family dwelling, where it appears either that the said corporation was organized and created, or that the controlling interest therein was acquired, within a period of six months prior to the execution, by said corporation of a bond or note evidencing indebtedness, and a mortgage creating a lien for said indebtedness on the said one or two family dwelling . . .

Any provision of any contract, or any separate written instrument executed prior to, simultaneously with or within [60] days after the delivery of any moneys to any borrower in connection with such indebtedness, whereby the defense of usury is waived or any such corporation is estopped from asserting it, is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy and absolutely void.

3. The provisions of [GOL § 5-521(1)] shall not apply to any action in which a corporation interposes a defense of criminal usury as described in [PL § 190.40].

COMMENTARY

If the borrower signs an estoppel certificate confirming the validity of the loan more than 60 days after closing, that may eliminate a usury defense.

[GOL § 5-527] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Enforceability of compound interest.

[GOL § 5-527(1) and (3)]

1. A loan or other agreement providing for compound interest shall be enforceable notwithstanding the date that such loan or other agreement providing for such compound interest shall have been executed; provided, however, that such compound interest shall begin to accrue and become due and payable on the later to occur of (a) [June 24, 1989] or (b) the date that any obligation to pay such compound interest may have arisen, including, but not limited to, the date of any default or event of default under such loan or other agreement. For purposes of this [GOL § 5-527(1)], the term “compound interest” shall mean the accruing of interest upon unpaid interest irrespective of whether such unpaid interest is added to the principal debt.

3. [N]othing in this [GOL § 5-527] shall affect the maximum rate of interest which may be charged, taken or received as provided by law, or be construed to limit, impair or otherwise affect any loan or other agreement which is, or would be, enforceable without reference to this [GOL § 5-527], including but not limited to an agreement made pursuant to [BNK § 6-f].

COMMENTARY

This statute, which solved the problem that resulted from a series of unfortunate cases that made compound interest unenforceable in New York, was instigated by Martin E. Gold, former Director of Corporate Law for the NYC Law Department and now with Sidley Austin LLP in Manhattan.

[GOL § 5-1301] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

How interest calculated.

Whenever, in any statute, act, deed, written or verbal contract, or in any public or private instrument whatever, any certain rate of interest is or shall be mentioned, and no period of time is stated for which such rate is to be calculated, interest shall be calculated at the rate mentioned, by the year, in the same manner as if the words “per annum” or “by the year” had been added to such rate.

COMMENTARY

This statute corrects an occasional drafting error.

[LLC § 1104] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Limited liability companies prohibited from interposing defense of usury.

(a) No domestic or foreign limited liability company shall hereafter interpose the defense of usury in any action.

(b) The provisions of [LLC § 1104(a)] shall not apply to a domestic or foreign limited liability company, the principal asset of which is the ownership of a one or two family dwelling, where it appears either that such limited liability company was formed, or that the controlling interest therein was acquired, within a period of six months prior to the execution by such limited liability company of a bond or note evidencing indebtedness, and a mortgage creating a lien for such indebtedness on such one or two family dwelling. Any provision of any contract, or any separate written instrument executed prior to, simultaneously with or within [60] days after the delivery of any moneys to any borrower in connection with such indebtedness, whereby the defense of usury is waived or any such limited liability company [is] estopped from asserting it, is hereby declared to be contrary to public policy and absolutely void.

The provisions of [LLC § 1104(a)] shall not apply to any action in which a limited liability company interposes a defense of criminal usury as described in [PL § 190.40].

[PL § 190.40] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Criminal usury in the second degree.

A person is guilty of criminal usury in the second degree when, not being authorized or permitted by law to do so, he knowingly charges, takes or receives any money or other property as interest on the loan or forbearance of any money or other property, at a rate exceeding [25%] per annum or the equivalent rate for a longer or shorter period.

Criminal usury in the second degree is a class E felony.

[PL § 190.42] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Criminal usury in the first degree.

A person is guilty of criminal usury in the first degree when, not being authorized or permitted by law to do so, he knowingly charges, takes or receives any money or other property as interest on the loan or forbearance of any money or other property, at a rate exceeding [25%] per annum or the equivalent rate for a longer or shorter period and either the actor had previously been convicted of the crime of criminal usury or of the attempt to commit such crime, or the actor's conduct was part of a scheme or business of making or collecting usurious loans.

Criminal usury in the first degree is a class C felony.

Landlord's Remedies

[RPAPL § 711] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Grounds where landlord-tenant relationship exists.

A special [summary eviction] proceeding may be maintained under this [RPAPL art. 7 (§§ 701 to 767)] upon the following grounds:

1. The tenant continues in possession of any portion of the premises after the expiration of his term, without the permission of the landlord or, in a case where a new lessee is entitled to possession, without the permission of the new lessee. Acceptance of rent after commencement of the special proceeding upon this ground shall not terminate such proceeding nor effect any award of possession to the landlord or to the new lessee, as the case may be. A proceeding seeking to recover possession of real property by reason of the termination of the term fixed in the lease pursuant to a provision contained therein giving the landlord the right to terminate the time fixed for occupancy under such agreement if he deem the tenant objectionable, shall not be maintainable unless the landlord shall by competent evidence establish to the satisfaction of the court that the tenant is objectionable.

2. The tenant has defaulted in the payment of rent, pursuant to the agreement under which the premises are held, and a demand of the rent has been made, or at least three days' notice in writing requiring, in the alternative, the payment of the rent, or the possession of the premises, has been served upon him as prescribed in [RPAPL § 735]. The landlord may waive his right to proceed upon this ground only by an express consent in writing to permit the tenant to continue in possession, which consent shall be revocable at will, in which event the landlord shall be deemed to have waived his right to summary dispossession for nonpayment of rent accruing during the time said consent remains unrevoked. Any person succeeding to the landlord's interest in the premises may proceed under this [RPAPL § 711] for rent due his predecessor in interest if he has a right thereto. Where a tenant dies during the term of the lease and rent due has not been paid and no representative or person has taken possession of the premises and no administrator or executor has been appointed, the proceeding may be commenced after three months from the date of death of the tenant by joining the surviving spouse or if there is none, then one of the surviving issue or if there is none, then any one of the distributees.

3. The tenant, in a city defaults in the payment, for [60] days after the same shall be payable, of any taxes or assessments levied on the premises which he has agreed in writing to pay pursuant to the agreement under which the premises are held, and a demand for payment has been made, or at least three days' notice in writing, requiring in the alternative the payment thereof and of any interest and penalty thereon, or the possession of the premises, has been served upon him, as prescribed in [RPAPL § 735]. An acceptance of any rent shall not be construed as a waiver of the agreement to pay taxes or assessments.

4. The tenant, under a lease for a term of three years or less, has during the term taken the benefit of an insolvency statute or has been adjudicated a bankrupt.

COMMENTARY

Many landlord's remedies appear in RPAPL Art. 7 (§§ 701–767). These extracts may not be exhaustive.

RPAPL § 711(1) allows a landlord to initiate summary dispossess proceedings (expedited eviction proceedings) when a tenant's lease has expired. What does that mean? The lease might say that if the tenant defaults, then the landlord can give a notice terminating the lease. At that point, one might think the lease has expired and therefore the landlord can commence a summary dispossess proceeding under RPAPL § 711(1). But one would be wrong. Under New York law, that sequence of events does not amount to an "expiration" of the lease sufficient to proceed under RPAPL § 711(1). Instead, the courts treat it as a volitional termination of the lease by the landlord, not an expiration of the lease by its terms. It's not good enough.

For a landlord to bring a summary dispossess proceeding, the lease needs to say that it expires, automatically, a specified amount of time after both (a) the tenant has defaulted and (b) the landlord has given a notice that the lease will terminate after the passage of some time—not merely when the landlord has given a notice of immediate termination. If the lease provides for the passage of some time after the landlord gives a notice of termination, then the courts call the lease termination a “conditional limitation” and will allow the landlord to start a summary proceeding. In contrast, an immediate termination upon notice by landlord constitutes a “condition subsequent” and does not support a summary proceeding; in that case the landlord’s only remedy is a cumbersome action for “ejectment.” This is but one example of the hypertechnical and sometimes illogical (or perhaps goal-oriented) line-drawing that runs throughout New York landlord-tenant procedure. As a result, virtually any tenant, commercial or residential, can drag out eviction proceedings for months. In response to these judicial principles (assuming “principles” is the right word), New York landlords sometimes include language like this in their leases:

If an Event of Default¹³ exists, then without limiting Landlord’s other remedies, Landlord may serve on Tenant a written five-day¹⁴ notice of cancellation and termination of this Lease (that five-day period, the “Conditional Limitation Period”). When the Conditional Limitation expires, this Lease and the Term shall automatically and without any further action by anyone terminate, expire and come to an end, by the mere lapse of time, as fully and completely as if the last day of the Conditional Limitation Period were the Expiration Date. After the Conditional Limitation Period, Tenant’s tenancy no longer exists. Tenant shall then quit and surrender the Premises to Landlord but remain liable as this Lease provides. This paragraph establishes a conditional limitation, not a condition subsequent.

RPAPL § 711(2) provides for summary dispossess proceedings if a tenant has failed to pay rent and the landlord has met certain conditions. Tenant-oriented judges have been known to apply a rather low threshold in deciding that a landlord has waived its right to proceed under this statute. Accordingly, landlord’s counsel may wish to respond to this statute (as the courts have interpreted it) by including language like this in the lease (which is not guaranteed to work, but should not hurt):

13 The document should say, once, that an Event of Default exists only until Tenant has cured it and maybe Landlord has accepted the cure. This avoids the need to refer repeatedly to an “uncured Event of Default.”

14 Tenant will often negotiate for more than five days.

If, after Tenant's default in payment of Rent or under any notice from Landlord demanding payment of rent or possession of the Premises, Landlord accepts any Rent payment, partial or complete, that shall not constitute Landlord's "express consent in writing to permit the tenant to continue in possession" within the meaning of New York Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law § 711(2). Landlord shall not be deemed to have waived its right to commence and prosecute summary proceedings against Tenant under the real Property Actions and Proceedings Law on that basis.

As another pitfall for New York landlords under RPAPL § 711, the courts sometimes limit the period for which a landlord can claim unpaid rent under RPAPL § 711. If the landlord tries to look back too far, the courts may say that the landlord is trying to collect "stale rent" and should not be allowed to do so through a summary proceeding. This limitation does not appear in the statute but appears to be judge-made. Although the problem is more likely to arise in a residential eviction than a commercial one, a New York commercial landlord may want to try to avoid it by including in the lease language like this:

Tenant waives any right it might have to assert or claim a limit on the amount (or accrual period) of unpaid Rent that Landlord may seek to collect in a summary proceeding under Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law Article 7. If Tenant has failed to pay Rent for more than one month and believes or intends to assert that Tenant may suffer prejudice because of Landlord's failure to promptly exercise its remedies under this Lease for that nonpayment, Tenant shall Notify Landlord and ask Landlord to promptly exercise those remedies. Tenant assumes responsibility to fund appropriate reserves to prevent any surprise or prejudice that Tenant might otherwise suffer from any accumulation of unpaid Rent. Nothing in this paragraph limits Landlord's rights or remedies.

Manner of service; filing; when service complete.

1. Service of the notice of petition and petition shall be made by personally delivering them to the respondent; or by delivering to and leaving personally with a person of suitable age and discretion who resides or is employed at the property sought to be recovered, a copy of the notice of petition and petition, if upon reasonable application admittance can be obtained and such person found who will receive it; or if admittance cannot be obtained and such person found, by affixing a copy of the notice and petition upon a conspicuous part of the property sought to be recovered or placing a copy under the entrance door of such premises; and in addition, within one day after such delivering to such suitable person or such affixing or placement, by mailing to the respondent both by registered or certified mail and by regular first class mail,

(a) if a natural person, as follows: at the property sought to be recovered, and if such property is not the place of residence of such person and if the petitioner shall have written information of the residence address of such person, at the last residence address as to which the petitioner has such information, or if the petitioner shall have no such information, but shall have written information of the place of business or employment of such person, to the last business or employment address as to which the petitioner has such information; and

(b) if a corporation, joint-stock or other unincorporated association, as follows: at the property sought to be recovered, and if the principal office or principal place of business of such corporation, joint stock or other unincorporated association is not located on the property sought to be recovered, and if the petitioner shall have written information of the principal office or principal place of business within the state, at the last place as to which petitioner has such information, or if the petitioner shall have no such information but shall have written information of any office or place of business within the state, to any such place as to which the petitioner has such information. Allegations as to such information as may affect the mailing address shall be set forth either in the petition, or in a separate affidavit and filed as part of the proof of service.

COMMENTARY

These service requirements are quite technical and specific, creating ample opportunities for mistake. The courts have traditionally applied and interpreted them in the same spirit.

[RPAPL § 747] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Judgment.

1. The court shall direct that a final judgment be entered determining the rights of the parties. The judgment shall award to the successful party the costs of the special proceeding.
2. The judgment shall not bar an action to recover the possession of real property. The judgment shall not bar an action, proceeding or counterclaim, commenced or interposed within [60] days of entry of the judgment, for affirmative equitable relief which was not sought by counterclaim in the proceeding because of the limited jurisdiction of the court.
3. If the proceeding is founded upon an allegation of forcible entry or forcible holding out the court may award to the successful party a fixed sum as costs, not exceeding [$50], in addition to his disbursements.
4. The judgment, including such money as it may award for rent or otherwise, may be docketed in such books as the court maintains for recording the steps in a summary proceeding; unless a rule of the court, or the court by order in a given case, otherwise provides, such judgment need not be recorded or docketed in the books, if separately maintained, in which are docketed money judgments in an action.

[RPAPL § 749] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Warrant.*

1. Upon rendering a final judgment for petitioner, the court shall issue a warrant directed to the sheriff of the county or to any constable or marshal of the city in which the property, or a portion thereof, is situated, or, if it is not situated in a city, to any constable of any town in the county, describing the property, and commanding the officer to remove all persons, and, except where the case is within [RPAPL § 715],¹⁵ to put the petitioner into full possession.

15 RPAPL § 715 addresses the grounds and procedures to remove persons unlawfully using or occupying premises as a bawdy-house, for prostitution, or for any illegal trade, business, or manufacture.

2. The officer to whom the warrant is directed and delivered shall give at least [72] hours notice, excluding any period which occurs on a Saturday, Sunday or a public holiday, in writing and in the manner prescribed in this [RPAPL art. 7 (§§ 701 to 767)] for the service of a notice of petition, to the person or persons to be evicted or dispossessed and shall execute the warrant between the hours of sunrise and sunset.

3. The issuing of a warrant for the removal of a tenant cancels the agreement under which the person removed held the premises, and annuls the relation of landlord and tenant, but nothing contained herein shall deprive the court of the power to vacate such warrant for good cause shown prior to the execution thereof. Petitioner may recover by action any sum of money which was payable at the time when the special proceeding was commenced and the reasonable value of the use and occupation to the time when the warrant was issued, for any period of time with respect to which the agreement does not make any provision for payment of rent.

[RPAPL § 751] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Stay upon paying rent or giving undertaking; discretionary stay outside [NYC].

The respondent [tenant being evicted] may, at any time before a warrant is issued, stay the issuing thereof and also stay an execution to collect the costs, as follows:

1. Where the lessee or tenant holds over after a default in the payment of rent, or of taxes or assessments, he may effect a stay by depositing the amount of the rent due or of such taxes or assessments, and interest and penalty, if any thereon due, and the costs of the special proceeding, with the clerk of the court, or where the office of clerk is not provided for, with the court, who shall thereupon, upon demand, pay the amount deposited to the petitioner or his duly authorized agent; or by delivering to the court or clerk his undertaking to the petitioner in such sum as the court approves to the effect that he will pay the rent, or such taxes or assessments, and interest and penalty and costs within [10] days, at the expiration of which time a warrant may issue, unless he produces to the court satisfactory evidence of the payment.

COMMENTARY

This statute means that even when a court is ready to issue a warrant of eviction—in other words, when the tenant has lost the eviction proceeding and is about to be evicted—the tenant can still obtain a final 10-day cure period, a last chance to prevent eviction. That final cure period applies, however, only if the lease terminated because the tenant did not pay rent, taxes, or assessments. The statute creates no comparable final cure period if the lease terminated because of a nonmonetary default or a default in some monetary obligation that might not be characterized as “rent, taxes, or assessments.” As a result of that gap, if a landlord has given a tenant notice of a nonmonetary default but the tenant disagrees, wants more time to cure the default, or has some other reason why the landlord should not be allowed to terminate the lease, the tenant routinely obtains a temporary restraining order (often soon converted into a preliminary injunction) to prevent the landlord from giving a notice of termination.

These actions, known as “Yellowstone” injunctions in honor of the case that spawned them,¹⁶ take landlord-tenant disputes out of landlord-tenant court and into “Supreme Court,” the general trial court of first jurisdiction in NYS, converting routine landlord-tenant disputes into full-blown emergency judicial proceedings with attendant excitement and expense. The law of “Yellowstone” injunctions is complex and quite extensive. It is designed, among other things, to let the tenant have its day in court—and let the court determine, for example, whether the tenant is or is not obligated to take particular actions under the lease—before the landlord can take the draconian step of terminating the lease. The concern is not so much that the landlord might purport to terminate the lease when the landlord had no right to do so, because any such improper termination would presumably be a nullity. Instead, the concern is that the landlord might terminate the lease rightfully but under circumstances where the tenant should have had an opportunity to let a court decide the underlying dispute between the parties, or where a court might want to give the tenant more time to cure its default.

Although the logical basis for “Yellowstone” actions (as discussed at the beginning of this paragraph) implies that they should never be available for any disputes about nonpayment (unless the amount at issue falls outside the categories of rent, taxes, and assessments), that limitation does not always apply. “Yellowstone” injunctions have been part of the New York landlord-tenant landscape for about half a century, but the Legislature has not plugged the statutory gap that drives them (i.e., the lack of a final cure period for nonmonetary and certain monetary defaults just before issuance of a warrant of eviction). Only a handful of commercial landlords have added language to their leases to mitigate the risk of these injunctions. This might be because commercial landlords: (a) regard the problem as “background noise” when they negotiate any particular lease; (b) fear (probably legitimately) that anything they try to do about the “Yellowstone” problem can and will be used against them in some other way by the landlord-tenant courts; and (c) can avoid the problem, where appropriate, by tailoring any future notice of default to disclaim any intention to terminate the lease absent a judicial determination of the landlord’s right to do so. Proposals for anti-Yellowstone language often lead to complex negotiations that verge on the philosophical, so the parties throw up their hands. If tenant has no negotiating leverage or is seeking to minimize its legal fees, landlord might include language like this in the lease:

If Tenant asserts in any action or proceeding that it has the capability to cure any default under this Lease, then as the sole means of demonstrating that capability, Tenant shall, within five days after Landlord’s demand, deposit with Landlord an amount equal to [110% of] Landlord’s reasonable estimate of the cost to cure Tenant’s default. Failure to timely make that deposit constitutes a monetary default under this Lease.

Many other variations are possible, most of them much more complicated. The New York courts seem to regard Yellowstone injunctions with the same reverence as the Constitution and grant them rather easily, so the courts may laugh at the suggested language. It should, however, do no harm.

Stay.

Except where otherwise prescribed by law, the court in which an action is pending may grant a stay of proceedings in a proper case, upon such terms as may be just.

COMMENTARY

CPLR § 2201 empowers a court to stay any proceedings, including eviction proceedings. As a result, tenants can remain in possession, sometimes without paying rent, for periods that landlords consider unreasonably long. Landlords try to protect themselves by adding language such as this to their leases:

Tenant expressly waives, for itself and anyone claiming through Tenant, any rights under Civil Practice Law and Rules 2201, for any holdover proceeding or other action or proceeding on this Lease or Tenant's rights in the Premises.

This statutory language incentivizes landlords not to experiment with self-help remedies in New York.

Landmarks

[NYC Admin. Code § 25-322] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Notification; lease notification.

[NYC Admin. Code § 25-322(b)–(d)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

b. It shall be the duty of the owner or person in charge of an improvement or property that is a [designated] landmark, interior landmark or is located on a landmark site or within an historic district to ensure that every lease or sublease, or renewal thereof, between the owner or such other person in charge as lessor and a nonresidential tenant as lessee and concerning such improvement or property shall contain a notice, conspicuously set forth therein, stating that in accordance with [NYC Admin. Code §§ 25-305, 25-306, 25-309, or 25-310] the lessee must obtain a permit from the [landmarks preservation] commission before commencing any exterior or interior work on the improvement or property, except for ordinary repair and maintenance as that term is defined in [NYC Admin. Code § 25-302I]. When an improvement or property is designated a landmark, interior landmark or as part of an historic district during the term of a lease [or] sublease of all or a portion of such improvement or property, the lessor of such lease or sublease shall, within [30] days after being notified in writing of such designation by the [landmark preservation] commission or a person in charge, send a written notice as described above to all nonresidential lessees of such lessor. Such notice shall be sent by certified or registered mail, return receipt requested to all nonresidential lessees on the first two floors of the improvement or property, and shall be sent to all other nonresidential lessees by any means reasonably designed to ensure that notice is given.

c. The [landmarks preservation] commission shall promulgate such regulations as it deems necessary to comply with the provisions of this [NYC Admin. Code § 25-322I], with respect to notice requirements in all nonresidential leases for buildings under its jurisdiction.

d. Any person who violates [NYC Admin. Code § 25-322(b)], or the regulations promulgated hereunder, shall be subject to a civil penalty of not more than [$500] per violation which shall be returnable to the environmental control board.

COMMENTARY

The NYC Landmarks Preservation Commission can designate old buildings (or components of old buildings), or even entire districts, as landmarks, thus limiting their demolition and development and often imposing on owners substantial unreimbursed costs. This process has sometimes been used as a technique (one of many) to try to block development projects. Landmark designation affects a significant percentage of buildings in New York City, especially Manhattan. Landmark designation of the interior of a building can change the relative leverage of commercial landlords and tenants in subsequent lease renewal negotiations. For that reason, commercial landlords may want the tenant to agree not to seek or support landmark designation for the premises or any part of the building. That issue is not unique to New York.

[RCNY, tit. 63, § 10-02]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Notice to Tenant of Landmarks Designation.

The language set forth below shall satisfy the notification requirements set forth in [NYC Admin. Code § 25-322].

“The tenant [lessee] is hereby notified that the leased premises are subject to the jurisdiction of the Landmarks Preservation Commission. In accordance with [NYC Admin. Code §§ 25-305, 25-306, 25-309 and 25-310] and the [RCNY, tit. 63, (§§ 1-01 to 13-05)] any demolition, construction, reconstruction, alteration or minor work as described in such sections and such rules may not be commenced within or at the leased premises without the prior written approval of the Landmarks Preservation Commission. Tenant is notified that such demolition, construction, reconstruction, alterations or minor work includes, but is not limited to, (a) work to the exterior of the leased premises involving windows, signs, awnings, flagpoles, banners and storefront alterations and (b) interior work to the leased premises that (i) requires a permit from the Department of Buildings or (ii) changes, destroys or affects an interior architectural feature of an interior landmark or an exterior architectural feature of an improvement that is a landmark or located on a landmark site or in a historic district.”

COMMENTARY

This statute recognizes that once a lease has been signed, a landlord has no unilateral power to modify the lease or to require the tenant to do anything. Any future leases must contain the required disclosure notice, though.

[RCNY, tit. 63, § 10-03]Statutory Excerpt or Excerpt

Notification.

(a) Lease notification: Any nonresidential lease or sublease (including any renewal thereof) executed after December 13, 1996 for property or an improvement that is a landmark, interior landmark or located on a landmark site or in a historic district shall include the notice set forth in [RCNY, tit. 63, § 10-02] above. Such notification shall be highlighted in bold or underscored or otherwise highlighted so that it is conspicuously set forth.

(b) Letter notification: If an improvement or property is designated as a landmark or an interior landmark or included as part of a landmark site or historic district during the term of a nonresidential lease or a sublease of all or a portion of such improvement or property, the lessor of such lease or sublease shall within 30 days after being notified of such designation by the Landmarks Preservation Commission or person in charge, send the written notice set forth in [RCNY, tit. 63, § 10-02] to the nonresidential lessee or sublessee. Such notice shall be highlighted in bold or underscored or otherwise highlighted so that it is conspicuously set forth. Such notice shall be sent by certified or registered mail, return receipt requested to all nonresidential lessees on the first two floors (excluding the basement or cellar) and shall be sent to all other nonresidential lessees by any means reasonably designed to ensure that notice is given.

Landowner's Duties—Maintenance of Property

[New York City Admin. Code § 7-210] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Liability of real property owner for failure to maintain sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition.

- a. It shall be the duty of the owner of real property abutting any sidewalk, including, but not limited to, the intersection quadrant for corner property, to maintain such sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition.
- b. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the owner of real property abutting any sidewalk, including, but not limited to, the intersection quadrant for corner property, shall be liable for any injury to property or personal injury, including death, proximately caused by the failure of such owner to maintain such sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition. Failure to maintain such sidewalk in a reasonably safe condition shall include, but not be limited to, the negligent failure to install, construct, reconstruct, repave, repair or replace defective sidewalk flags and the negligent failure to remove snow, ice, dirt or other material from the sidewalk. This [NYC Admin. Code § 7-210(b)] shall not apply to one-, two- or three-family residential real property that is (i) in whole or in part, owner occupied, and (ii) used exclusively for residential purposes.

c. Notwithstanding any other provision of law, the city shall not be liable for any injury to property or personal injury, including death, proximately caused by the failure to maintain sidewalks (other than sidewalks abutting one-, two- or three-family residential real property that is (i) in whole or in part, owner occupied, and (ii) used exclusively for residential purposes) in a reasonably safe condition. This [NYC Admin. Code § 7-210I] shall not be construed to apply to the liability of the city as a property owner pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 7-210 (b)].

d. Nothing in this [NYC Admin. Code § 7-210] shall in any way affect the provisions of this [NYC Admin. Code tit. 7, ch. 2 (§§ 7-201–7-209)] or of any other law or rule governing the manner in which an action or proceeding against the city is commenced, including any provisions requiring prior notice to the city of defective conditions.

COMMENTARY

The NYC Admin. Code makes property owners responsible for sidewalks by their property. If a commercial lease otherwise makes a tenant responsible for adjacent sidewalks (e.g., a ground floor retail lease), the landlord may want to shift to the tenant the Administrative Code obligations on sidewalk maintenance and liability. The lease could include language like this:

For any sidewalk this Lease requires Tenant to maintain or repair, Tenant shall perform Landlord's obligations (and shall Indemnify Landlord against any liability) under New York City Administrative Code §§ 7-210 and 7-211. Tenant shall maintain all insurance the cited sections require, naming Landlord as an additional insured.

The preceding language assumes the lease has already defined the word “Indemnify” somewhere once, so one does not need to repeat the usual long paragraph of standard language.

See “Actions Against Landowner by Invitees, Licensees, and Trespassers.”

Personal injury and property damage liability insurance.

An owner of real property, other than a public corporation as defined in [General Construction Law § 66] or a state or federal agency or instrumentality, to which [NYC Admin. Code § 7-210(b)] applies, shall be required to have a policy of personal injury and property damage liability insurance for such property for liability for any injury to property or personal injury, including death, proximately caused by the failure of such owner to maintain the sidewalk abutting such property in a reasonably safe condition. The city shall not be liable for any injury to property or personal injury, including death, as a result of the failure of an owner to comply with this [NYC Admin. Code § 7-211].

Investment of funds.

[BNK § 235(6)(i)]

(6)(i) A mortgage loan upon a leasehold estate shall not be made unless such leasehold estate shall have an unexpired term of not less than [21] years, which term may include the term provided by an option of renewal enforceable at the exclusive discretion of the savings bank. No mortgage loan upon a leasehold estate shall be made or acquired by a savings bank unless the terms thereof shall provide, regardless of the period of the loan, for payments to be made by the borrower on the principal thereof at least once in each year in amounts which would be sufficient to completely amortize a loan whose period extended for [4/5] of the unexpired term of the lease, which term may include the term provided by an option of renewal enforceable at the exclusive discretion of the savings bank; or, in the case of a mortgage loan upon a leasehold estate in real property upon which there is a building in process of construction, such payments of principal need not be required during the period of construction or the first three years of the mortgage, whichever is shorter. The provisions of [BNK § 235(6)]I, (d), I, (f), (g), and (h) shall be applicable to loans made upon leasehold estates.

[ISL § 1404] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Types of reserve investments permitted for non-life insurers.

(a) In addition to the investments specified in [ISL § 1404(b)], but excluding any investment prohibited by the provisions of [ISL § 1407(a)(1), (3), (4), (6), (8), (9) or (10)],¹⁷ the reserve investments of a domestic insurer authorized to make investments under the authority of [ISL § 1404] shall consist of the following:

[ISL § 1404(a)(4)(A)]

(4) Loans secured by real property. (A) Loans secured by first or second mortgages which are liens on improved real property in the United States (including leasehold estates having an unexpired term of not less than [20] years, inclusive of the term or terms which may be provided by enforceable terms of renewal) meeting the following requirements:

(i) Priority of mortgages. The mortgaged property shall be subject to no prior lien, except a first mortgage and liens for non-delinquent ground rents, taxes, assessments and similar charges. There shall be no condition or right of re-entry or forfeiture not insured against under which the mortgage can be cut off, subordinated or otherwise disturbed. No loan secured by a second mortgage shall be made if the principal amount secured by a prior first mortgage can be increased without the insurer's consent unless the amount of increase is applied to reduce the second mortgage.

(ii) Leaseholds. If the mortgaged property is a leasehold:

(I) the lease shall provide for a term of at least [21] years,

(II) the property underlying the leasehold shall be subject to no prior lien except for liens for non-delinquent ground rents, taxes, assessments and similar charges and there shall be no condition or right of re-entry or forfeiture not insured against under which the insurer is unable to continue the lease in force for the duration of the loan, and

(III) the loan shall provide for such payments that at any time during the period of the loan the aggregate payments of principal to be made will be sufficient to repay the loan within the lesser of [40] years or a period equal to [80%] of the term of the lease, through payments of interest only for five years and equal payments applicable first to interest and then to principal at the end of each year thereafter. "Term," as used in [ISL § 1404(a)(4)(A)]¹⁸ with reference to a lease, means its unexpired term at the date of the loan, plus any term which may be provided by options of the lessee to renew.

Sale, lease, exchange or other disposition of assets.

[BCL § 909(a)]

¹⁸ The actual language of the statute refers to "paragraph 6." This appears to be a mistake or a vestige. The reference should probably instead be to paragraph (A), i.e., ISL § 1404(a)(4)(A).

(a) A sale, lease, exchange or other disposition of all or substantially all the assets of a corporation, if not made in the usual or regular course of the business actually conducted by such corporation, shall be authorized only in accordance with the following procedure:

(1) The board shall authorize the proposed sale, lease, exchange or other disposition and direct its submission to a vote of shareholders.

(2) Notice of meeting shall be given to each shareholder of record, whether or not entitled to vote.

(3) The shareholders shall approve such sale, lease, exchange or other disposition and may fix, or may authorize the board to fix, any of the terms and conditions thereof and the consideration to be received by the corporation therefor, which may consist in whole or in part of cash or other property, real or personal, including shares, bonds or other securities of any other domestic or foreign corporation or corporations, by vote at a meeting of shareholders of (A) for corporations in existence on [September 1, 1965],¹⁹ the certificate of incorporation of which expressly provides such or corporations incorporated after [September 1, 1965],²⁰ a majority of the votes of all outstanding shares entitled to vote thereon or (B) for other corporations in existence on [September 1, 1965],²¹ [2/3] of the votes of all outstanding shares entitled to vote thereon.

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

This requirement applies where a NY corporation enters into certain transactions. If the corporation is just a partner or member of the transacting party, or was formed in another state, then the statute does not apply.

Power to take and hold real estate; restrictions.

[BNK § 98(1)(a)–(d)]

1. A bank or trust company may purchase, hold, lease and convey real property as follows:

(a) A plot whereon there is or may be erected a building suitable for the convenient transaction of its business, from portions of which not required for its own use a revenue may be derived, and a plot whereon parking accommodations are, or are to be, provided, with or without charge, primarily for its customers or employees or both, and a building or a portion or portions thereof for use by the bank or trust company in its business, provided that the aggregate of all investments of any bank or trust company in such plots and buildings and in a leased building or a portion or portions thereof or in the stock, debentures or other obligations of any corporation holding such plots or buildings and of all loans to or upon the security of the stock of any such corporation shall not exceed [40%] of the aggregate of the capital stock, surplus fund and undivided profits of such bank or trust company, except with the approval of the superintendent. . . .

(b) Such as shall be conveyed to it in satisfaction of debts previously contracted in the course of its business.

(c) Such as it shall purchase at sales under judgments, decrees or mortgages held by it.

(d) Such purchase, lease, conveyance or other acquisition or sale of real property which is located outside the United States, its territories and possessions, and which is used principally as the residence of one or more directors, officers or employees of the bank or trust company as may be specifically approved by the superintendent.

[ECL § 27-2401]

Definitions.

As used in this [ECL §§ 27-2401–27-2405]:

1. “Owner” shall mean any person or persons who owns a dwelling unit or commercial space located on real property.
2. “Real property” shall mean lands, tenements and hereditaments.

[ECL § 27-2403]Notification requirements.

1. A person identified as a responsible party pursuant to [ECL §§ 27-1301–27-1323] or a participant as defined in [ECL § 27-1405(1)(a)] shall provide within [30] days of validation of any test undertaken pursuant to this [ECL art. 27 (§§ 0101–2713)] or [Navigation Law art. 12 (§§ 170–197)] the results of any such test to any identifiable owner of real property that has been tested. In the event that such a test is undertaken by the [DEC], the [DEC] shall provide, within [30] days of validation of such test, the results of such test to any identifiable owner of real property that has been tested.
2. Such person identified as a responsible party pursuant to [ECL §§ 27-1301–27-1323] or a participant as defined in [ECL § 27-1405(1)(a)] knowingly failing to provide test results as required in [ECL § 27-2403(1)] shall be considered a violation of any order on consent or a breach of any agreement entered into with the [DEC].

[RCO § 12] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Sale, mortgage and lease of real property of religious corporations.*

1. A religious corporation shall not sell, mortgage or lease for a term exceeding five years any of its real property without applying for and obtaining leave of the court therefor pursuant to [NPC § 511] as that section is modified by [RCO § 2-b (1)(d-1)] . . .

8. Except as otherwise provided in this [RCO § 12] in respect to a religious corporation of a specified denomination, any solvent religious corporation may, by order of the court, obtained as above provided in proceedings to sell, mortgage or lease real property, convey the whole or any part of its real property to another religious corporation, or to a membership, educational, municipal or other nonprofit [corporation, for] a consideration of [$1.00] or other nominal consideration, and for the purpose of applying the provisions of [BCL art. 1 (§§ 101–112)], a proposed conveyance for such consideration shall be treated as a sale, but it shall not be necessary to show, in the petition or otherwise, nor for the court to find that the pecuniary or proprietary interest of the grantor corporation will be promoted thereby; and the interests of such grantor shall be deemed to be promoted if it appears that religious or charitable objects generally are conserved by such conveyance, provided, however, that such an order shall not be made if tending to impair the claim or remedy of any creditor.

9. If a sale, mortgage or lease for a term exceeding five years of any real property of any such religious corporation has been heretofore or shall be hereafter made and a conveyance or mortgage executed and delivered without the authority of a court of competent jurisdiction, obtained as required by law, or not in accordance with its directions, the court may, thereafter, upon the application of the corporation, or of the grantee or mortgagee in any such conveyance or mortgage or of any person claiming through or under any such grantee or mortgagee upon such notice to such corporation, or its successor, and such other person or persons as may be interested in such property, as the court may prescribe, confirm said previously executed conveyance or mortgage, and order and direct the execution and delivery of a confirmatory deed or mortgage, or the recording of such confirmatory order in the office where deeds and mortgages are recorded in the county in which the property is located; and upon compliance with the said order such original conveyance or mortgage shall be as valid and of the same force and effect as if it had been executed and delivered after due proceedings had in accordance with the statute and the direction of the court. But no confirmatory order may be granted unless the consents required in [RCO § 12(1)] for a Protestant Episcopal, Roman Catholic, Presbyterian church or an incorporated African Methodist Episcopal Zion church or an incorporated United Methodist church have first been given by the prescribed authority thereof, either upon the original application or upon the application for the confirmatory order.

COMMENTARY

The statutes quoted here often arise in transactions with certain entity types. Other entity types not addressed here may face similar limitations. Seven categories of Christian church must also, by statute, satisfy certain internal approval procedures within the particular church. They are, in turn, exempted from requirements to notify the Attorney General of any proposed transaction. Because the editor is not an expert in constitutional law or the meaning of the First Amendment, he expresses no view on whether it is appropriate for New York statutes to establish different rules for different religious groups.

[EDL § 2853] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Charter school organization; oversight; facilities.

[EDL § 2853(3)(a) and 4(c)]

3. Facilities.

(a) A charter school may be located in part of an existing public school building, in space provided on a private work site, in a public building or in any other suitable location. Provided, however, before a charter school may be located in part of an existing public school building, the charter entity shall provide notice to the parents or guardians of the students then enrolled in the existing school building and shall hold a public hearing for purposes of discussing the location of the charter school. A charter school may own, lease or rent its space.

4. Public and private assistance to charter schools.

(c) A charter school may contract with a school district or the governing body of a public college or university for the use of a school building and grounds, the operation and maintenance thereof. Any such contract shall provide such services or facilities at cost.

COMMENTARY

Any consideration of statutes that appear favorable to charter schools in NYC must take into account the political environment in NYC since the 2014 mayoral election, in which the voter selected as mayor an opponent of charter schools and friend of the public school teachers' unions. This has led to efforts, large and small, to thwart the charter schools in NYC.

[NPC § 509] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Purchase, sale, mortgage and lease of real property.

(a) No corporation shall purchase real property unless such purchase is authorized by the vote of a majority of directors of the board or of a majority of a committee authorized by the board, provided that if such property would, upon purchase thereof, constitute all, or substantially all, of the assets of the corporation, then the vote of two-thirds of the entire board shall be required, or if there are twenty-one or more directors, the vote of a majority of the entire board shall be sufficient.

(b) No corporation shall sell, mortgage, lease, exchange or otherwise dispose of its real property unless authorized by the vote of a majority of directors of the board or of a majority of a committee authorized by the board; provided that if such property constitutes all, or substantially all, of the assets of the corporation, then the vote of two-thirds of the entire board shall be required, or, if there are twenty-one or more directors, the vote of a majority of the entire board shall be sufficient.

(c) If a corporation authorizes a committee to act pursuant to paragraphs (a) and (b) of this section, the committee shall promptly report any actions taken to the board, and in no event after the next regularly scheduled meeting of the board.

[SFL § 41] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Indebtedness not to be contracted without appropriation.

No state officer, employee, board, department or commission shall contract indebtedness on behalf of the state, nor assume to bind the state, in an amount in excess of money appropriated or otherwise lawfully available. This [SFL § 41] shall not apply to a case where a statute expressly authorizes the making of a contract or contracts for a stated maximum amount which exceeds the money [appropriated] or otherwise available for payments thereon.

[NYC Admin. Code § 6-101] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Contracts; certificate of comptroller.

[NYC Admin. Code § 6-101(a) and (c)]

a. Any contract, except as otherwise provided in [N.Y.C. Admin. Code § 6-101], shall not be binding or of any force, unless the comptroller shall indorse thereon the comptroller's certificate that there remains unexpended and unapplied a balance of the appropriation or fund applicable thereto, sufficient to pay the estimated expense of executing such contract, as certified by the officer making the same.

c. It shall be the duty of the comptroller to make such indorsement upon every contract so presented to him or her, if there remains unapplied and unexpended the amount so specified by the officer making the contract, and thereafter to hold and retain such sum to pay the expense incurred until such contract shall be fully performed. Such indorsement shall be sufficient evidence of such appropriation or fund in any action.

[ABC Law § 105] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Provisions governing licensees to sell at retail for consumption off the premises.

[ABC Law § 105(1)–(3)(b), (6) and (7)]

1. No retail license to sell liquors and/or wines for consumption off the premises shall be granted for any premises, unless the applicant shall be the owner thereof, or shall be in possession of said premises under a lease, management agreement or other agreement giving the applicant control over the food and beverage service at the premises, in writing, for a term not less than the license period except, however, that such license may thereafter be renewed without the requirement of a lease, management agreement or other agreement giving the applicant control over the food and beverage service at the premises, as herein provided. This [ABC Law § 105(1)] shall not apply to premises leased from government agencies, as defined under [ABC Law § 3(12-c)]; provided, however, that the appropriate administrator of such government agency provides some form of written documentation regarding the terms of occupancy under which the applicant is leasing said premises from the government agency for presentation to the state liquor authority at the time of the license application. Such documentation shall include the terms of occupancy between the applicant and the government agency, including, but not limited to, any short-term leasing agreements or written occupancy agreements.

2. No premises shall be licensed to sell liquors and/or wines at retail for off premises consumption, unless said premises shall be located in a store, the principal entrance to which shall be from the street level and located on a public thoroughfare in premises which may be occupied, operated or conducted for business, trade or industry or on an arcade or sub-surface thoroughfare leading to a railroad terminal. There may be not more than one additional entrance which shall be from the street level and located on and giving access to and from a public or private parking lot or parking area having space for not less than five automobiles.

3(a). No retail license to sell liquor and/or wine for off-premises consumption shall be granted for any premises which shall be located on the same street or avenue, and within [200] feet of a building occupied exclusively as a school, church, synagogue or other place of worship; the measurements to be taken in a straight line from the center of the nearest entrance to the building used for such school, church, synagogue or other place of worship to the center of the nearest entrance of the premises to be licensed; except, however, that no license shall be denied to any premises at which a license under this [ABC Law § 105] has been in existence continuously from a date prior to the date when a building on the same street or avenue and within [200] feet of said premises has been occupied exclusively as a school, church, synagogue or other place of worship.

(b) Within the context of this [ABC Law § 105(3)], the word “entrance” shall mean a door of a school, of a house of worship, or of the premises sought to be licensed, regularly used to give ingress to students of the school, to the general public attending the place of worship, and to patrons or guests of the premises proposed to be licensed, except that where a school or house of worship is set back from a public thoroughfare, the walkway or stairs leading to any such door shall be deemed an entrance; and the measurement shall be taken to the center of the walkway or stairs at the point where it meets the building line or public thoroughfare. A door which has no exterior hardware, or which is used solely as an emergency or fire exit, or for maintenance purposes, or which leads directly to a part of a building not regularly used by the general public or patrons, is not deemed an “entrance.”

COMMENTARY

In addition to these statutory requirements, if a landlord will receive a percentage of a tenant’s sales proceeds from alcoholic beverages, then the State Liquor Authority may require the tenant’s liquor license application to cover the landlord as if the landlord were a partner of the licensed entity. This may entail a background check, fingerprinting, and subjecting the landlord to “tied house” restrictions—extensive SLA rules designed to protect society from the terrifying possibility that a retail licensee may also own an interest in a manufacturer or distributor of alcoholic beverages.

Maintenance of Property

[LAB § 202] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Protection of the public and of persons engaged at window cleaning and cleaning of exterior surfaces of buildings.

The owner, lessee, agent and manager of every public building and every contractor involved shall provide such safe means for the cleaning of the windows and of exterior surfaces of such building as may be required and approved by the [Industrial Board of Appeals]. The owner, lessee, agent, manager or superintendent of any such public building and every contractor involved shall not require, permit, suffer or allow any window or exterior surface of such building to be cleaned unless such means are provided to enable such work to be done in a safe manner for the prevention of accidents and for the protection of the public and of persons engaged in such work in conformity with the requirements of this [LAB §§ 1 to 1200] and the rules of the [Industrial Board of Appeals]. A person engaged at cleaning windows or exterior surfaces of a public building shall use the safety devices provided for his protection. Every employer and contractor involved shall comply with this [LAB § 202] and the rules of the board and shall require his employee, while engaged in cleaning any window or exterior surface of a public building, to use the equipment and safety devices required by this [LAB §§ 1–1200] and rules of the [Industrial Board of Appeals].

The provisions of this [LAB § 202] shall not apply to (1) multiple dwellings six stories or less in height located anywhere in this state; nor to (2) any building three stories or less in height in cities, towns or villages having a population of less than [40,000]; nor to (3) the windows or exterior surfaces of any building which may be exempted under any rule adopted by the [Industrial Board of Appeals].

The [Industrial Board of Appeals] may grant variations pursuant to [LAB § 30]. All existing variations heretofore made by the board relating to the cleaning of windows are hereby validated and continued in full force and effect until amended or terminated by the board.

[Industrial Board of Appeals] may make rules to effectuate the purposes of this [LAB § 202].

Notwithstanding any other law or regulation, local or general, the provisions of this [LAB § 202] and the rules issued thereunder shall be applicable exclusively throughout the state and the commissioner shall have exclusive authority to enforce this [LAB § 202] and the rules issued thereunder.

COMMENTARY

Every commercial lease already requires the tenant to comply with all applicable law. Nevertheless, as a result of LAB § 202, most New York commercial leases include a covenant like this:

Tenant shall not clean, nor require, permit, suffer, or allow anyone else to clean, any window from the outside in violation of Law.

New York also has numerous other health and safety statutes and regulations that could affect commercial leases and tenants, but for some reason LAB § 202 has achieved special prominence in lease documents.

[RPAPL § 881] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Access to adjoining property to make improvements or repairs.

When an owner or lessee seeks to make improvements or repairs to real property so situated that such improvements or repairs cannot be made by the owner or lessee without entering the premises of an adjoining owner or his lessee, and permission so to enter has been refused, the owner or lessee seeking to make such improvements or repairs may commence a special proceeding for a license so to enter pursuant to [CPLR art. 4 (§§ 401 to Rule 411)]. The petition and affidavits, if any, shall state the facts making such entry necessary and the date or dates on which entry is sought. Such license shall be granted by the court in an appropriate case upon such terms as justice requires. The licensee shall be liable to the adjoining owner or his lessee for actual damages occurring as a result of the entry.

COMMENTARY

To respond to the quoted statute, a commercial lease may include language like this:

Tenant shall comply with any Law on access to the Premises for any excavation on adjacent land. Any such excavation shall not give Tenant any claim against Landlord for damages, indemnity, or abatement, diminution, reduction, or suspension of Rent. Any payment for any such excavation shall belong to Landlord.

[LAB § 240] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Scaffolding and other devices for use of employees.

1. All contractors and owners and their agents, except owners of one and two-family dwellings who contract for but do not direct or control the work, in the erection, demolition, repairing, altering, painting, cleaning or pointing of a building or structure shall furnish or erect, or cause to be furnished or erected for the performance of such labor, scaffolding, hoists, stays, ladders, slings, hangers, blocks, pulleys, braces, irons, ropes, and other devices which shall be so constructed, placed and operated as to give proper protection to a person so employed.

COMMENTARY

NYS's notorious (and unique or almost unique to NYS) "scaffold law" establishes strict liability if a worker falls from a height – sometimes as low as 16 inches – without regard to whether the worker is contributorily negligent or even drunk. Among other things, this law is said to produce very high insurance rates for New York construction projects.

Mechanic's Lien

[LIE § 2] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

[LIE § 2(3)]

Owner.

The term "owner," when used in this chapter, includes the owner in fee of real property, or of a [lesser] estate therein, [or] a lessee for a term of years.

COMMENTARY

These extracts from LIE cannot possibly do justice to this statute, whose intricacies complicate every construction loan closing and potentially enable lien claimants to torment landlords, tenants, and parties to other commercial real estate transactions in the state. A prominent construction lawyer once said he could, if asked, always figure out a way that every construction lender had violated the LIE and hence lost priority to mechanics' liens. Lien claimants and their advocates, on the other hand, regard the LIE as woefully inadequate. For more on mechanics' liens, see Joshua Stein, Stein on New York Commercial Mortgage Transactions, Ch. 5 (2008).

[LIE § 2(4)]

Improvement.

The term “improvement,” when used in this [LIE §§ 1–251], includes . . . the performance of real estate brokerage services in obtaining a lessee for a term of more than three years of all or any part of real property to be used for other than residential purposes pursuant to a written contract of brokerage employment or compensation.

COMMENTARY

A real estate broker can claim a mechanic's lien for negotiating certain commercial leases. The broker's engagement must be in writing. Compare RPL § 294-b(1), which allows a broker to file an affidavit claiming a commission based on an oral or written contract. See “Real Estate Brokers—Lien.” In other contexts, NYS generally allows oral agreements with licensed brokers. Real estate brokers of an institutional caliber rarely assert mechanics' liens, because they hope to obtain future business from their landlord clients.

[LIE § 3]

Mechanic's lien on real property.

A contractor, subcontractor, laborer, materialman, landscape gardener, nurseryman or person or corporation selling fruit or ornamental trees, roses, shrubbery, vines and small fruits, who performs labor or furnishes materials for the improvement of real property with the consent or at the request of the owner thereof, or of his agent, contractor or subcontractor, and any trust fund to which benefits and wage supplements are due or payable for the benefit of such laborers, shall have a lien for the principal and interest, of the value, or the agreed price, of such labor, including benefits and wage supplements due or payable for the benefit of any laborer, or materials upon the real property improved or to be improved and upon such improvement, from the time of filing a notice of such lien as prescribed in this [LIE §§ 1–251]....Within the meaning of the provisions of this [LIE §§ 1–251], materials actually manufactured for but not delivered to the real property, shall also be deemed to be materials furnished.

COMMENTARY

Many words used in this and other sections of the LIE are the subject of complex statutory definitions that have spawned extensive (and sometimes rather odd) state-specific jurisprudence but do not merit reprinting here. The reference to “consent” by the owner to a tenant’s work can sometimes make the owner’s interest in the property subject to liens from that work, though consent usually requires something more than mere lease language allowing alterations. Instead, there needs to be some kind of contractual relationship between the owner and the lien claimant, although courts can infer that relationship. Landlords sometimes worry about this statute. New York provides no statutory mechanism (of the type available in, for example, California) for a landlord to disclaim responsibility for liens arising from its tenants’ construction projects.

Landlords sometimes try to protect themselves by including language in their leases saying that nothing in the lease constitutes the landlord’s consent to any lienable work. Of course, the typical lien claimant will never see any such provisions. The lien claimant will argue that any such self-serving (and undisclosed) provisions cannot possibly affect the lien claimant’s right to assert a lien against the fee estate. The landlord might argue that the lien claimant has some implied obligation to search title, see that he is not dealing with the fee owner, and ask to see the lease. The theory sounds good but may bear no relation to reality. Does the landlord improve its position by including the same language in a recorded memorandum of lease? Conceivably, maybe. And it should do no harm except perhaps by creating an unwarranted sense of comfort and safety. Here is a sample of language a landlord might use in a lease and in a memorandum of lease:

Nothing in this Lease constitutes Landlord’s consent or request, express or implied, by inference or otherwise: (a) to any contractor, subcontractor, laborer, or material supplier to perform any labor or furnish any materials for any improvement, alteration or repair of the Premises; or (b) to subject Landlord's property to any mechanic's lien.

No assurance can be provided that this language will work. Landlords often use ALL CAPITAL LETTERS for language of this type.

[LIE § 10] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Filing of notice of lien.

[LIE § 10(1)]

1. Notice of lien may be filed at any time during the progress of the work and the furnishing of the materials, or, within eight months after the completion of the contract, or the final performance of the work, or the final furnishing of the materials, dating from the last item of work performed or materials furnished; provided, however, . . . that in the case of a lien by a real estate broker, the notice of lien may be filed only after the performance of the brokerage services and execution of lease by both lessor and lessee and only if a copy of the alleged written agreement of employment or compensation is annexed to the notice of lien, provided that where the payment pursuant to the written agreement of employment or compensation is to be made in installments, then a notice of lien may be filed within eight months after the final payment is due, but in no event later than a date five years after the first payment was made. . . . The notice of lien must be filed in the clerk's office of the county where the property is situated.

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

The LIE allows commercial leasing brokers to file liens if their efforts led to the mutual signing of a lease. See LIE § 2(4), above. See LIE § 3 for comments on liens arising from tenant work. Shorter filing deadlines apply to residential construction projects.

[LIE § 13] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Priority of liens.

[LIE § 13(1)]

(1) A lien for materials furnished or labor performed in the improvement of real property shall have priority over a conveyance, mortgage, judgment or other claim against such property not recorded, docketed or filed at the time of the filing of the notice of such lien, except as hereinafter in this [LIE §§ 1 to 251] provided; over advances made upon any mortgage or other encumbrance thereon after such filing, except as hereinafter in this [LIE art. 2 (§§ 3 to 39-c)] provided; and over the claim of a creditor who has not furnished materials or performed labor upon such property, if such property has been assigned by the owner by a general assignment for the benefit of creditors, within [30] days before the filing of either of such notices; and also over an attachment hereafter issued or a money judgment hereafter recovered upon a claim, which, in whole or in part, was not for materials furnished, labor performed or moneys advanced for the improvement of such real property; and over any claim or lien acquired in any proceedings upon such judgment. Such liens shall also have priority over advances made upon a contract by an owner for an improvement of real property which contains an option to the contractor, his successor or assigns to purchase the property, if such advances were made after the time when the labor began or the first item of material was furnished, as stated in the notice of lien. If several buildings are demolished, erected, altered or repaired, or several pieces or parcels of real property are improved, under one contract, and there are conflicting liens thereon, each lienor shall have priority upon the particular part of the real property or upon the particular building or premises where his labor is performed or his materials are used. Persons shall have no priority on account of the time of filing their respective notices of liens, but all liens shall be on a parity except as hereinafter in [LIE §56] provided; and except that in all cases laborers for daily or weekly wages shall have preference over all other claimants under this [LIE art. 2 (§§ 3 to 39-c)].

COMMENTARY

Displaying the same elegance and transparency as the rest of the LIE, this section clearly states that all liens from the same construction job have the same priority, probably relating back only to the date when the first such lien was filed.

[LIE § 34] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Waiver of lien.

Notwithstanding the provisions of any other law, any contract, agreement or understanding whereby the right to file or enforce any lien created under [LIE art.2 (§§ 3 to 39-c)] is waived, shall be void as against public policy and wholly unenforceable. This [LIE § 34] shall not preclude a requirement for a written waiver of the right to file a mechanic's lien executed and delivered by a contractor, subcontractor, material supplier or laborer simultaneously with or after payment for the labor performed or the materials furnished has been made to such contractor, subcontractor, material man or laborer nor shall this [LIE § 34] be applicable to a written agreement to subordinate, release or satisfy all or part of such a lien made after a notice of lien has been filed.

COMMENTARY

Progress lien waivers are enforceable only to the extent of payments made. They are often required in New York practice. To the extent that they are not justified by actual payment, they are generally thought to run afoul of LIE § 34. Recent cases suggest that courts will stretch to find a basis to set aside (or make meaningless) even progress lien waivers delivered in exchange for payments made.

[GBL § 756] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions

[GBL § 756(1) and (3)]

As used in this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)]:

1. “Construction contract” means a written or oral agreement for the construction, reconstruction, alteration, maintenance, moving or demolition of any building, structure or improvement, or relating to the excavation of or other development or improvement to land, and where the aggregate cost of the construction project including all labor, services, materials and equipment to be furnished, equals or exceeds [$150,000]. For the purposes of this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756 to 758)] a construction contract shall not include any such contract made and awarded by the state, any public department, any public benefit corporation, any public corporation or official thereof, or a municipal corporation or official thereof for construction, reconstruction, alteration, repair, maintenance, moving or demolition of any public works project nor any contract with a contractor or subcontractor which is part of such project . . .

3. “Owner” means any person, firm, partnership, corporation, company, association or other organization or other entity, or a combination of any thereof, (with an ownership interest, whether the interest or estate is in fee, as vendee under a contract to purchase, as lessee or another interest or estate less than fee) that causes a building, structure or improvement, new or existing, to be constructed, altered, repaired, maintained, moved or demolished or that causes land to be excavated or otherwise developed or improved.

[GBL § 756-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Obligations.

It is the policy and purpose of this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)] to expedite payment of all monies owed to those who perform contracting services pursuant to construction contracts. Except as otherwise provided in this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)], the terms and conditions of a construction contract shall supersede the provisions of this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)] and govern the conduct of the parties thereto.

3. Payment. (a) The owner’s payment of a contractor’s interim and final invoices shall be made on the basis of a duly approved invoice of work performed and the material supplied during the billing cycle.

(i) Unless the provisions of this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)] provide otherwise, the owner shall pay the contractor strictly in accordance with the terms of the construction contract.

(ii) Payment of an interim or final invoice shall be due from the owner not later than [30] days after approval of the invoice.

(iii) If payment by the owner is contingent upon lender approval, payment of a contractor’s interim or final invoice or the amount of loan proceeds disbursed by the lender for payment of the contractor’s interim or final invoice shall be due from the owner seven days after receipt by the owner of good funds except where the provisions of [GBL § 756-d] applies.

(iv) An owner may withhold from an interim payment only an amount that is sufficient to pay the costs and expenses the owner reasonably expects to incur in order to cure the defect or correct any items set forth in writing pursuant to [GBL § 756-a(2)(a)(i)] or in the alternative, to withhold an amount not to exceed the line item amount appearing in the agreed schedule of values together with any change orders, additions and/or deletions, if such schedule has been previously submitted, and/or an amount sufficient to cover liquidated damages as established in an agreed upon schedule in the construction contract.

COMMENTARY

GBL art. 35E, known as the “Prompt Payment” law, is an exceedingly long statute that attempts to teach owners and contractors how to behave. Only a small part is reprinted here. The single most important provision appears in the introductory paragraph to § 756-a, which confirms parties remain free to contract around almost everything in the statute. Any construction lender should require a borrower to do just that. A diligent landlord or tenant should have the same agenda, to avoid being stuck with the somewhat arcane and unrealistic provisions of the Prompt Payment law.

[GBL § 757] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Void Provisions.

The following provisions of construction contracts shall be void and unenforceable:

1. A provision, covenant, clause or understanding in, collateral to or affecting a construction contract, with the exception of a contract with a material supplier, that makes the contract subject to the laws of another state or that requires any litigation, arbitration or other dispute resolution proceeding arising from the contract to be conducted in another state.
2. A provision, covenant, clause or understanding in, collateral to or affecting a construction contract stating that a party to the contract cannot suspend performance under the contract if another party to the contract fails to make prompt payments under the contract.
3. A provision, covenant, clause or understanding in, collateral to or affecting a construction contract stating that expedited arbitration as expressly provided for and in the manner established by [GBL § 756-b] of this [GBL art. 35-E (§§ 756–758)] is unavailable to one or both parties.
4. A provision, covenant, clause or understanding in, collateral to or affecting a construction contract establishing payment provisions which differ from those established in [GBL § 756-a(3)] and [GBL § 756-b] as applicable.

COMMENTARY

Except as listed here, it seems the parties can contract around all provisions of the law. They will often want to do that. Section 756(2) invalidates common provisions that would obligate contractors to keep working notwithstanding a payment dispute. Section 756(4) invalidates any payment provisions that vary from Sections 756-a(3) and 756-b.

[GOL § 5-322.1] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Agreements exempting owners and contractors from liability for negligence void and unenforceable; certain cases.

[GOL § 5-322.1(1) and (2)]

tive to the construction, alteration, repair or maintenance of a building, structure, appurtenances and appliances including moving, demolition and excavating connected therewith, purporting to indemnify or hold harmless the promisee against liability for damage arising out of bodily injury to persons or damage to property contributed to, caused by or resulting from the negligence of the promisee, his agents or employees, or indemnitee, whether such negligence be in whole or in part, is against public policy and is void and unenforceable; provided that this [GOL § 5-322.1] shall not affect the validity of any insurance contract, workers' compensation agreement or other agreement issued by an admitted insurer. This [GOL § 5-322.1(1)] shall not preclude a promisee requiring indemnification for damages arising out of bodily injury to persons or damage to property caused by or resulting from the negligence of a party other than the promisee, whether or not the promisor is partially negligent.

2. A covenant, promise, agreement or understanding in, or in connection with or collateral to a contract or agreement relative to the construction, alteration, repair or maintenance of a building, structure, appurtenances and appliances including moving, demolition and excavating connected therewith, purporting to condition a subcontractor's or materialman's right to file a claim and/or commence an action on a payment bond on exhaustion of another legal remedy is against public policy and is void and unenforceable; provided that this [GOL § 5-322.1(2)] shall not affect the validity of any insurance contract, workers' compensation agreement or other agreement issued by an admitted insurer.

COMMENTARY

Like many other states, New York, as a matter of public policy, disfavors contracts that seek to limit or indemnify one party against the other for negligence. The legislature enacted GOL § 5-322.1 specifically to prevent owners (and contractors) from requiring subcontractors, as a prerequisite to being awarded the work, to assume liability for negligence of others.

[GOL § 5-322.2] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Contents of certain construction contracts.

[GOL § 5-322.2(1) and (4)]

1. Every written contract or agreement executed by an owner providing for the building, construction, repair or renovation of buildings, structures, or improvements upon real property owned by him other than contracts involving public improvements as defined in [LIE] and contracts involving residential property with housing accommodations for less than five families, shall contain a clause requiring such owner to set forth in said contract the following information:

(a) the full name and address of the owner or owners;

(b) the full name and address of the owner of the land and the owner of the building or improvements if the owner of the land and the owner of the building or improvements shall be different persons or entities; and

(c) a description by street address; or section, block, and lot numbers; or reference to a deed book and page number;

In the event the names required to be set forth as hereinabove provided shall be changed after the execution of any such contract or agreement and during the period of such construction, the owner shall within five days notify the contractor of such change in writing sent to the contractor by certified mail to the address of the contractor as set forth in said contract.

4. Any failure to comply with the provisions of this [GOL § 5-322.2] shall not render any agreement or contract hereof, enumerated in [GOL § 5-322.2(1)], void or voidable nor shall it otherwise impair any obligations or rights under any such agreement or contract.

COMMENTARY

GOL § 5-322.2 requires a tenant to include in any construction contract the property owner's name and contact information. If the property owner changes during construction, the tenant is supposed to tell the contractor within five days. Will the tenant always know about any such transfer, particularly within five days? If a tenant has delivered a security deposit, then GOL § 7-105 already requires owners to notify tenants of a transfer. See “Security Deposits.” But some tenants don’t deliver security deposits and some landlords don’t perform all their obligations regarding security deposits. For that and other reasons, any tenant may want their landlord to agree to notify them immediately of any change in the property’s ownership. Will the landlord remember?

Why would contractors need to know about a change of ownership of the fee estate? Presumably to help them file mechanics’ liens against the fee estate.

[GOL § 5-322.3]

Payment bonds to be filed.

A copy of any payment bond executed in connection with a contract for the improvement of real property other than a contract for a public improvement, shall be filed within [30] days of such execution by the owner of the improvement in the office of the county clerk in the county in which the improvement is to be undertaken; provided, however, that such filing shall be required only where the contract for the improvement of real property is for an amount in excess of [$100,000]. Any owner failing to file such payment bond as provided herein shall be liable for the reasonable attorney's fees, as determined by the court, of any claimant successfully bringing an action or proceeding on the bond.

Memorandum of Lease

[RPL § 291-c] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Recording memoranda of leases.

In lieu of the recording of a lease for a term exceeding three years, pursuant to [RPL §291], there may be recorded with like effect a memorandum of such lease, executed by all persons who are parties to the lease, and acknowledged or proved, and certified, in the manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded. A memorandum of lease thus entitled to be recorded shall contain at least the following information with respect to the lease: the name of the lessor and the name of the lessee and the addresses, if any, set forth in the lease as addresses of such parties; a reference to the lease, with its date of execution; a description of the leased premises in the form contained in the lease; the term of the lease, with the date of commencement and the date of termination of such term, and if there is a right of extension or renewal, the maximum period for which or date to which the lease may be extended or the number of times or date to which it may be renewed, and the date or dates on which such rights of extension or renewal are exercisable.

Whenever a memorandum of lease is presented for recording, the lease shall also be submitted to the recording officer for the purpose of examination to determine whether or not such memorandum of lease is subject to the tax on mortgages provided by [TAX art. 11 (§§ 250–267)].

COMMENTARY

In addition to the items listed in the statute, the parties may wish to mention in any memorandum of lease: any restrictions that affect the landlord's property other than the demised premises (e.g., expansion options, exclusive uses, construction restrictions, other use restrictions); landlord's disclaimer (or at least purported disclaimer) of responsibility for mechanics' liens; and transfer restrictions. The last sentence of this statute offers a brief glimpse of the state's weird and wonderful mortgage recording tax, which inflicts endless layers of complexity on real estate finance transactions that would be routine anywhere else. That tax is otherwise outside the scope of this work. See Joshua Stein, Stein on New York Commercial Mortgage Transactions, ch. 6-9 (2008). When the parties record a memorandum of lease, the recording office will collect the applicable transfer taxes, as more fully described elsewhere in this chapter. The taxes are, however, triggered in the first instance as soon as the parties enter into certain leases or lease-related transactions. Recording a memorandum of such a transaction does not trigger the tax. It just alerts the tax collectors.

[RPL § 291-cc]

Recording modifications of leases.

1. Where a lease or memorandum of such lease has been recorded, an unrecorded agreement modifying such lease or memorandum is void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, and the possession of the tenant shall not be deemed notice of the modification, unless the agreement of modification or a memorandum thereof is recorded prior to the recording of the instrument by which the subsequent purchaser acquires his estate or interest.

2. A memorandum of an agreement modifying a lease shall contain at least the following information with respect to the agreement: the names of the parties and the addresses, if any, set forth in the agreement; a reference to the agreement with its date of execution; a brief description of the leased premises in form sufficient to identify the same; any changes made by the agreement in the term of the lease and the date of the termination of the lease as modified[;] and any changes in the provisions of the lease as to the rights of extension or renewal.

3. For the purpose of this [RPL § 291-cc] the word “purchaser” includes a person who purchases or acquires by exchange or contracts to purchase or acquire by exchange the leased premises or the real property of which the leased premises are part or any estate or interest therein, or acquires by assignment the rent to accrue from tenancies or subtenancies thereof in existence at the time of the assignment.

COMMENTARY

Under New York law, if the parties record a memorandum of lease they must record an amendment of it whenever they amend their lease, even if the amendment affects nothing disclosed in the memorandum. The requirement seems burdensome but actually makes some sense. To avoid the need to comply with it, the parties might agree that once Tenant is in possession they will terminate the memorandum of lease, so Tenant's possession will give the world constructive notice of Tenant's rights. This is a nonstandard approach and creates certain risks (e.g., what happens if Tenant temporarily moves out). It may, however, make sense in some cases.

See “Recording.”

Mitigation of Damages

No applicable statute.

COMMENTARY

New York remains in the minority of states that do not require a commercial landlord to mitigate damages. The courts seem to show no sign of any interest in changing that rule, or maybe they display a healthy inclination to leave legislation to legislators. On the other hand, it is sometimes suggested that if a lease is silent on the issue, New York courts may infer an obligation to mitigate. Therefore it might help, and it can't hurt, for landlord's counsel to negate expressly any obligation to mitigate. If landlord sues for a single award of damages for breach of the lease, the ordinary formula in any lease gives tenant credit for the fair market rental value of the leased premises, which indirectly incentivizes landlord to re-rent at market and could be considered something like an obligation to mitigate damages. When leasing lawyers debate mitigation of damages, they often forget that dynamic.

Notarial Acts—Uniform Law on Notarial Acts

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

New York has not adopted the Uniform Law on Notarial Acts. See “Formalities of Execution.”

Options

[GOL § 5-334]

Option or right to acquire interest in property.

1. An option or right to acquire an equity or other ownership interest in property or in a partnership, corporation, trust or other entity that owns property shall not be unenforceable because the owner of such interest grants such option or right to the holder of a mortgage which is a lien on such property or to the holder of a security interest in such property, simultaneously with or in connection with any loan or forbearance of money secured by such mortgage or security interest, if (a) the power to exercise such option or right is not dependent upon the occurrence of a default with respect to such loan, forbearance, mortgage or security interest, and (b) such loan or forbearance is for the principal sum of [$2,500,000] or more when the option or right is granted. Loans or forbearances aggregating [$2,500,000] or more which are to be made or advanced to any one borrower in one or more installments pursuant to a written agreement by one or more lenders shall be deemed a single loan or forbearance for the total amount which the lender or lenders have agreed to make or advance pursuant to such agreement.

2. This [GOL § 5-334] shall not be construed to limit, impair or otherwise affect the power of the holder of any option or right to acquire an equity or other ownership interest in property or in a partnership, corporation, trust or other entity that owns property, if such option or right is or would be enforceable without reference to this [GOL § 5-334].

3. This [GOL § 5-334] shall apply to all options or rights which are exercised on or after [June 11, 1985],²² notwithstanding the date when such options or rights were granted.

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

See “Recording.” If the mortgagee obtained an option to acquire 100 percent of the borrower's equity for $1 as of any time on or after a specified date that happened to be one week after the scheduled maturity date of the loan, would this statute validate that arrangement?

Power of Attorney

[GOL § 5-1501C] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Powers of attorney excluded from this title.

The provisions of this [GOL §§ 5-1501–5-1512] shall not apply to the following powers of attorney:

1. a power of attorney given primarily for a business or commercial purpose, including without limitation:

²² This date is the effective date of GOL § 5-334.

- (a) a power to the extent it is coupled with an interest in the subject of the power;
 - (b) a power given to or for the benefit of a creditor in connection with a loan or other credit transaction;
 - (c) a power given to facilitate transfer or disposition of one or more specific stocks, bonds or other assets, whether real, personal, tangible or intangible;
2. a proxy or other delegation to exercise voting rights or management rights with respect to an entity;
 3. a power created on a form prescribed by a government or governmental subdivision, agency or instrumentality for a governmental purpose;
 4. a power authorizing a third party to prepare, execute, deliver, submit and/or file a document or instrument with a government or governmental subdivision, agency or instrumentality or other third party;
 5. a power authorizing a financial institution or employee of a financial institution to take action relating to an account in which the financial institution holds cash, securities, commodities or other financial assets on behalf of the person giving the power;
 6. a power given by an individual who is or is seeking to become a director, officer, shareholder, employee, partner, limited partner, member, unit owner or manager of a corporation, partnership, limited liability company, condominium or other legal or commercial entity in his or her capacity as such;
 7. a power contained in a partnership agreement, limited liability company operating agreement, declaration of trust, declaration of condominium, condominium bylaws, condominium offering plan or other agreement or instrument governing the internal affairs of an entity authorizing a director, officer, shareholder, employee, partner, limited partner, member, unit owner, manager or other person to take lawful action relating to such entity;

8. a power given to a condominium managing agent to take action in connection with the use, management and operation of a condominium unit;

9. a power given to a licensed real estate broker to take action in connection with a listing of real property, mortgage loan, lease or management agreement;

10. a power authorizing acceptance of service of process on behalf of the principal; and

11. a power created pursuant to authorization provided by a federal or state statute, other than this [GOL §§ 5-1501 to 5-1512], that specifically contemplates creation of the power, including without limitation a power to make health care decisions or decisions involving the disposition of remains.

Nothing in this [GOL § 5-1501C] shall be deemed to prohibit use of a statutory short form power of attorney or a non-statutory power of attorney in connection with any of the transactions described in this [GOL § 5-1501C].

COMMENTARY

In September 1, 2009, the Legislature rewrote New York's power of attorney statute, GOL § 5-1501, in response to perceived abuses involving powers of attorney that elderly property owners granted to their relatives. As an unintended consequence of that statute—which was longer than the United States Constitution—it became temporarily infeasible to grant any power of attorney in New York for commercial transactions. The Legislature took a year to recognize the practical needs of commercial transactions and to repair the statute, which remains extraordinarily long and complex. For commercial transactions, the only part that matters is the exceptions quoted here. As a result, for most commercial transactions New York law seems to impose no state-specific requirements for the form of a power of attorney. Any power that will affect real property should, in any event, be acknowledged in recordable form, recorded and circulated for review and sign-off well before closing.

Property Affidavit

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

Although NYS has no specific statute on affidavits, they commonly appear in New York transactions, particularly in the machinations required to mitigate the mortgage recording tax.

Real Estate Brokers

[RPL § 440] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

[RPL § 440(1)]

1. Whenever used in this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)] “real estate broker” means any person, firm, limited liability company or corporation, who, for another and for a fee, commission or other valuable consideration, lists for sale, sells, at auction or otherwise, exchanges, buys or rents, or offers or attempts to negotiate a sale, at auction or otherwise, exchange, purchase or rental of an estate or interest in real estate, or collects or offers or attempts to collect rent for the use of real estate, or negotiates or offers or attempts to negotiate, a loan secured or to be secured by a mortgage, other than a residential mortgage loan, as defined in [BNK § 590], or other incumbrance upon or transfer of real estate, or is engaged in the business of a tenant relocater, or who, notwithstanding any other provision of law, performs any of the above stated functions with respect to the resale of condominium property originally sold pursuant to the provisions of [GBL §§ 352–359-h]. In the sale of lots pursuant to the provisions of [RPL art. 9-A (§§ 337–339-c)], the term “real estate broker” shall also include any person, partnership, association or corporation employed by or on behalf of the owner or owners of lots or other parcels of real estate, at a stated salary, or upon a commission, or upon a salary and commission, or otherwise, to sell such real estate, or any parts thereof, in lots or other parcels, and who shall sell or exchange, or offer or attempt or agree to negotiate the sale or exchange, of any such lot or parcel of real estate. For purposes of this [RPL §440(1)], the term “interest in real estate” shall include the sale of a business wherein the value of the real estate transferred as part of the business is not merely incidental to the transaction, and shall not include the assignment of a lease, and further, the transaction itself is not otherwise subject to regulation under state or federal laws governing the sale of securities. In connection with the sale of a business[,], the term “real estate broker” shall not include a person, firm or corporation registered pursuant to the provisions of [GBL §§ 352–359-h)] or federal securities laws.

3. “Real estate salesman” means a person associated with a licensed real estate broker to list for sale, sell or offer for sale, at auction or otherwise, to buy or offer to buy or to negotiate the purchase or sale or exchange of real estate, or to negotiate a loan on real estate other than a mortgage loan as defined in [BNK § 590], or to lease or rent or offer to lease, rent or place for rent any real estate, or collects or offers or attempts to collect rent for the use of real estate for or in behalf of such real estate broker, or who, notwithstanding any other provision of law, performs any of the above stated functions with respect to the resale of a condominium property originally sold pursuant to the provisions of the [GBL §§ 352-e–352-h].

COMMENTARY

The reference to anyone who “collects or attempts to collect rent for the use of real estate” would cover most property managers, even if affiliated with the owner. RPL § 440-a (see below) expressly excludes certain “white knight” property managers from New York’s brokerage/licensing requirements.

[RPL § 440-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

License required for real estate brokers and salesmen.

No person, co-partnership, limited liability company or corporation shall engage in or follow the business or occupation of, or hold himself or itself out or act temporarily or otherwise as a real estate broker or real estate salesman in this state without first procuring a license therefor as provided in this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)]. No person shall be entitled to a license as a real estate broker under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)], either as an individual or as a member of a co-partnership, or as a member or manager of a limited liability company or as an officer of a corporation, unless he or she is [20] years of age or over, a citizen of the United States or an alien lawfully admitted for permanent residence in the United States. No person shall be entitled to a license as a real estate salesman under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)] unless he or she is over the age of [18] years. No person shall be entitled to a license as a real estate broker or real estate salesman under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)] who has been convicted in this state or elsewhere of a felony, of a sex offense, as defined in [Correction Law § 168-a] or any offense committed outside of this state which would constitute a sex offense, or a sexually violent offense, as defined in [Correction Law § 168-a] or any offense committed outside this state which would constitute a sexually violent offense, and who has not subsequent to such conviction received executive pardon therefor or a certificate of relief from disabilities or a certificate of good conduct pursuant to [Correction Law art. 23 (§§ 700–706)], to remove the disability under this [RPL § 440-a] because of such conviction. No person shall be entitled to a license as a real estate broker or real estate salesman under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)] who does not meet the requirements of [GOL § 3-503].

Notwithstanding the above, tenant associations, and not-for-profit corporations authorized in writing by the [Commissioner of the NYC Department] charged with enforcement of the housing maintenance code of such city to manage residential property owned by such city or appointed by a court of competent jurisdiction to manage residential property owned by such city shall be exempt from the licensing provisions of this [RPL § 440-a] with respect to the properties so managed.

[RPL § 442] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Splitting commissions.

1. No real estate broker shall pay any part of a fee, commission or other compensation received by the broker to any person for any service, help or aid rendered in any place in which this article is applicable, by such person to the broker in buying, selling, exchanging, leasing, renting or negotiating a loan upon any real estate including the resale of a condominium unless such a person be a duly licensed real estate salesman regularly associated with such broker or a duly licensed real estate broker or a person regularly engaged in the real estate brokerage business in a state outside of New York; provided, however, that notwithstanding any other provision of this [RPL § 442], it shall be permissible for a real estate broker to pay any part of a fee, commission, or other compensation received to an unlicensed corporation or an unlicensed limited liability company if each of its shareholders or members, respectively, is associated as an individual with the broker as a duly licensed associate broker or salesman.

2. Furthermore, notwithstanding any other provision of law, it shall be permissible for a broker properly registered pursuant to the provisions of [GBL 352–359-h] who earns a commission on the original sale of a cooperative or homeowners association interest in real estate, including condominium units to pay any part of a fee, commission or other compensation received for bringing about such sale to a person whose principal business is not the sale or offering of cooperatives or homeowners association interests in real property, including condominium units in this state but who is either: (i) a real estate salesman duly licensed under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)] who is regularly associated with such broker; (ii) a broker duly licensed under this [RPL art. 12-A (§§ 440–443-a)]; or [(iii)] a person regularly engaged in the real estate brokerage business in a state outside of New York.

Except when permitted pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this [RPL §442], no real estate broker shall pay or agree to pay any part of a fee, commission, or other compensation received by the broker, or due, or to become due to the broker to any person, firm or corporation who or which is or is to be a party to the transaction in which such fee, commission or other compensation shall be or become due to the broker; provided, however, that nothing in this section shall prohibit a real estate broker from offering any part of a fee, commission, or other compensation received by the broker to the seller, buyer, landlord or tenant who is buying, selling, exchanging, leasing, renting or negotiating a loan upon any real estate including the resale of a condominium or cooperative apartment. Such fee, commission, or other compensation must not be made to the seller, buyer, landlord or tenant for performing any activity requiring a license under this article.

COMMENTARY

The proviso in the second half of the last paragraph was added relatively recently. It confirms brokers can “split” part of their commission with their clients, but only if the clients don’t do any work that requires a real estate license. This conforms to the informal position previously expressed by the Department of State, which regulates brokers. The change should now make it impossible for brokers to assert (as they previously often did) that any such fee-sharing is illegal.

Real Estate Brokers—Lien

[RPL § 294-b] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

COMMENTARY

RPL § 294-b allows only residential brokers to record or file affidavits claiming an entitlement to a commission. Commercial leasing brokers can claim mechanics’ liens for unpaid brokerage commissions, but they must have been engaged under a written (not oral) contract. This technique does more than create nuisance value. See “Mechanic’s Liens” (LIE § 2(4)). Licensed brokers can claim commissions even without written agreements. See “Statute of Frauds” (GOL § 5-701).

Recording

[RPL § 290] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions; effect of article.

1. The term “real property,” as used in this [RPL art. 9 (§§ 290–336)], includes lands, tenements and hereditaments and chattels real, except a lease for a term not exceeding three years.

2. The term “purchaser” includes every person to whom any estate or interest in real property is conveyed for a valuable consideration, and every assignee of a mortgage, lease or other conditional estate.

3. The term “conveyance” includes every written instrument, by which any estate or interest in real property is created, transferred, mortgaged or assigned, or by which the title to any real property may be affected, including an instrument in execution of a power, although the power be one of revocation only, and an instrument postponing or subordinating a mortgage lien; except a will, a lease for a term not exceeding three years, an executory contract for the sale or purchase of lands, and an instrument containing a power to convey real property as the agent or attorney for the owner of such property.

4. The term “recording officer” means the county clerk of the county, except in a county having a register, where it means the register of the county.

5. “Recording” or “recorded” means the entry, at length, upon the pages of the proper record books in a plain and legible hand writing, or in print or in symbols of drawing or by photographic process or partly in writing, partly in printing, partly in symbols of drawing or partly by photographic process or by any combination of writing, printing, drawing or photography or either or any two of them, or by an electronic process by which a record or instrument affecting real property, after delivery is incorporated into the public record.. “Recording” or “recorded” also means the reproduction of instruments by microphotography or other photographic process on film, which is kept in appropriate files.

6. This [RPL art. 9 (§§ 290–336)] does not apply to leases for life or lives, or for years, heretofore made, of lands in any of the counties of Albany, Ulster, Sullivan, Herkimer, Dutchess, Columbia, Delaware or Schenectady.

COMMENTARY AND CROSS-REFERENCES

Rules on the form of conveyancing instruments, or instruments that otherwise affect estates in real property, can be counterintuitive. For example, in one case the parties used a “fence line affidavit” to resolve minor questions about the proper location of a fence and a property boundary. This approach tracked local practice (“everyone does it this way”). A court later decided, though, that if the signer of the “fence line affidavit” had as a matter of law already acquired title by adverse possession to the strip of land at issue, then a “fence line affidavit” could not divest such title, only a deed. Although many question the result, after this decision real estate lawyers may hesitate to use a “fence line affidavit” ever again. Decisions like these drive the ever increasing complexity and paper-intensity of New York closings, as well as the popularity of the New York courts for creative claims of all types.

See “Memorandum of Lease.”

See “Taxation—Transfer Tax” regarding leases, the fees imposed, and exemptions. In addition, the recording offices impose nominal fees and occasional extra fees to record documents. See, e.g., RPL § 316-a(10) (extra fee of $1.00 for every additional town after the first where the affected real property is located).

[RPL § 291] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Recording of conveyances.

A conveyance of real property, within the state, on being duly acknowledged by the person executing the same, or proved as required by this [RPL §§ 1 to 602], and such acknowledgment or proof duly certified when required by this [RPL §§ 1 to 602] may be recorded in the office of the clerk of the county where such real property is situated, and such county clerk shall, upon the request of any party, on tender of the lawful fees therefor, record the same in his said office. Every such conveyance not so recorded is void as against any person who subsequently purchases or acquires by exchange or contracts to purchase or acquire by exchange, the same real property or any portion thereof, or acquires by assignment the rent to accrue therefrom as provided in [RPL § 294-a], in good faith and for a valuable consideration, from the same vendor or assignor, his distributees or devisees, and whose conveyance, contract or assignment is first duly recorded, and is void as against the lien upon the same real property or any portion thereof arising from payments made upon the execution of or pursuant to the terms of a contract with the same vendor, his distributees or devisees, if such contract is made in good faith and is first duly recorded.

Notwithstanding the foregoing, any increase in the principal balance of a mortgage lien by virtue of the addition thereto of unpaid interest in accordance with the terms of the mortgage shall retain the priority of the original mortgage lien as so increased provided that any such mortgage instrument sets forth its terms of repayment.

COMMENTARY

Recording of a document in New York entails preparing and submitting a variety of tax returns and sometimes affidavits, depending on what is being recorded. See, e.g., RPL § 333. In some cases, New York law imposes a fee for the privilege of filing one of these tax returns. If a memorandum of lease is recorded, then notice of any future amendment must be recorded. For these and other reasons, the parties do not always record memoranda of leases, especially for leases affecting smaller premises or shorter terms, or where the tenant takes possession immediately. Failure to record does not eliminate any transfer tax that would otherwise apply, though.) For more, see “Memorandum of Lease.”

[RPL § 291-i] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Validity of electronic recording.

1. Notwithstanding any law to the contrary,

(a) where a law, rule or regulation requires, as a condition for recording, that an instrument affecting real property be an original, be on paper or another tangible medium or be in writing, the requirement is satisfied by a digitized paper document or an electronic record of such instrument;

(b) where a law, rule or regulation requires, as a condition for recording, that an instrument affecting real property be signed, the requirement is satisfied, where the instrument exists as a digitized paper document, if the digitized image of a wet signature of the person executing such instrument appears on such digitized paper document or, where the instrument exists as an electronic record, if the instrument is signed by use of an electronic signature;

(c) where a law, rule or regulation requires, as a condition of recording, that an instrument affecting real property or a signature associated with such an instrument be notarized, acknowledged, verified, witnessed or made under oath, the signature requirement is satisfied if: (i) the digitized image of a wet signature of the person authorized to perform that act and any stamp, impression or seal required by law to be included, appears on a digitized paper document of such instrument; or (ii) the electronic signature of the person authorized to perform that act, and all other information required to be included, is attached to or logically associated with an electronic record of such instrument, provided, however that no physical or electronic image of a stamp, impression or seal shall be required to accompany such electronic signature.

(d) where a law, rule or regulation requires, as a condition of recording an instrument affecting real property, that any accompanying document be filed therewith, the requirement is satisfied if, in the case of recording by electronic means, a digitized paper document or electronic record of any such accompanying document is presented to the recording officer at the same time as such instrument is recorded by electronic means; provided that each such document or record shall be presented to the recording officer as a separate digitized paper document or electronic record unto itself.

2. A digitized paper document or documents shall be created using a software application or other electronic process which stores an image of the original paper document or documents, and which does not permit additions, deletions or other changes to the digitized image, or if additions, deletions or changes are permitted, a media trail exists which creates an electronic record which makes it possible to identify these changes.

3. Nothing in this section or any other provision of law shall be construed to require the recording by electronic means of instruments affecting real property. The decision by each county clerk to participate in electronic recording is discretionary. Once a county clerk permits electronic recording, the county shall accept such electronic recordings.

4. Where any recording officer permits instruments affecting real property and any accompanying documents to be presented for recording or filing as digitized paper documents or electronic records pursuant to this section, such recording by electronic means shall be in accordance with the rules and regulations established by the electronic facilitator pursuant to subdivision five of this section.

5. In order to ensure consistency in the standards and practices of, and the technology used by recording officers in the state, the electronic facilitator, as described in section three hundred three of the state technology law, shall, consistent with the provisions of article three of the state technology law, promulgate rules and regulations, and amendments thereto, as appropriate governing the use and acceptance of digitized paper documents, electronic records and electronic signatures under this article. Such authority shall address and be limited to standards requiring adequate information security protection to ensure that electronic records of instruments affecting real property documents are accurate, authentic, adequately preserved for long-term electronic storage and resistant to tampering. When promulgating rules and regulations, the electronic facilitator may take into consideration: (a) the most recent standards promulgated by national standard-setting bodies such as, without limitation, the property records industry association; (b) the views of interested persons and governmental officials and entities, including but not limited to recording officers and representatives of the state title, legal and banking industries; and (c) the needs of counties of varying size, population, and resources.

6. Nothing contained in this section shall be construed to authorize a recording officer to furnish digitized paper documents of the reports required by section five hundred seventy-four of the real property tax law. Such reports shall be furnished as paper documents with the requisite notations thereon, except where the state board of real property services has agreed to accept data submissions in lieu thereof or has provided for the electronic transmission of such data pursuant to law.

[RPL § 294] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Recording executory contracts and powers of attorney.

1. An executory contract for the sale, purchase or exchange of real property, or an instrument canceling such a contract, or an instrument containing a power to convey real property, as the agent or attorney for the owner of the property, acknowledged or proved, and certified, in the manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded, may be recorded in the office of the recording officer of any county in which any of the real property to which it relates is situated, and such recording officer shall, upon the request of any party, on tender of the lawful fees therefor, record the same in his said office.

2. In lieu of the recording of an executory contract, there may be recorded a memorandum thereof, executed by the parties, and acknowledged or proved, and certified, in the manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded, containing at least the following information with respect to the contract: the names of the parties to the contract, the time fixed by the contract for the conveyance of title, and a description of the property. The executory contract shall be deemed duly recorded upon the recording of a memorandum in conformity with this [RPL § 294(2)].

If the purchaser is entitled to possession of the property under the terms of the contract, the memorandum must so state. The provisions of [TAX art. 11 (§§ 250 to 267)] shall not be applicable to an executory contract for the sale, purchase or exchange of real property, or memorandum thereof, unless the contract provides that the purchaser is entitled to possession of the property.

3. Every executory contract for the sale, purchase or exchange of real property not recorded as provided in this [RPL § 294] shall be void as against any person who subsequently purchases or acquires by exchange or contracts to purchase or acquire by exchange, the same real property or any portion thereof, or acquires by assignment the rent to accrue therefrom as provided in [RPL § 294-a], in good faith and for a valuable consideration, from the same vendor or assignor, his distributees or devisees, and whose conveyance, contract or assignment is first duly recorded, and shall be void as against the lien upon the same real property or any portion thereof arising from payments made upon the execution of or pursuant to the terms of a contract with the same vendor, his distributees or devisees, if such contract is made in good faith and is first duly recorded.

4. (a) Where an executory contract is duly recorded as provided in this [RPL § 294] the right of the purchaser to performance of the contract is enforceable against a person who, subsequent to the recording and while the recording is effective as provided in this [RPL § 294], purchases or acquires by exchange the same real property or any part thereof, from the same vendor, his distributees or devisees.

(b) If the recorded contract provides for payments made or to be made by the purchaser before conveyance of title, including payments made at the execution of the contract, or if the recorded memorandum states that the contract so provides, the lien of the purchaser arising from any such payments actually made is enforceable against any such person described in [RPL § 294(4)(a),] to the extent of such payments, not exceeding the total amount specified in the recorded contract or memorandum, and is so enforceable without regard to any notice of the estate or interest of such person.

5. The recording of the executory contract or memorandum shall be effective for the purposes of [RPL § 294(4)] up to and including the [30th] day after the day fixed by the contract for the conveyance of title. An agreement extending the time for the conveyance of title, acknowledged or proved, and certified, in the manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded, may be recorded, and the recording shall be effective up to and including the [30th] day after the day fixed by such agreement for the conveyance of title.

6. An executory contract or memorandum thereof shall not be deemed recorded as provided in this [RPL § 294] if it is recorded more than one year previous to the date on which the vendor acquired title to the real property to which the contract relates. An executory contract recorded before the date when the vendor acquired title shall not be deemed recorded as provided in this [RPL § 294] as against a person to whom the real property is conveyed or contracted to be sold or exchanged, by a conveyance or contract which is part of the transaction in which the vendor acquired title.

7. An option to purchase or lease real property shall be deemed an executory contract within the meaning of this [RPL § 294], except that the recording of the option agreement shall be effective only up to and including the [30th] day after the last day fixed by the agreement for the exercise of the option. If the option is exercised in accordance with the terms of the option agreement, the optionee may extend the effectiveness of the recording of the option agreement to and including the [30th] day after the day fixed pursuant to the option agreement for the conveyance of title or the execution and delivery of the lease, as the case may be, by recording, within [30] days after the last day fixed by the option agreement for the exercise of the option, a written declaration executed by the optionor and the optionee, or by the optionee alone, and acknowledged or proved and certified in the manner to entitle a conveyance to be recorded, stating that the said option has been duly exercised and setting forth the day fixed pursuant to the option agreement for the conveyance of title or the execution and delivery of the lease, as the case may be. In the event that such declaration is executed by the optionee alone, it shall be verified by the optionee and shall also set forth the time and manner in which such option was exercised and, if the last day for the conveyance of title or the execution and delivery of the lease is not specified in the option agreement, the extension of the effectiveness of the recording of the option agreement shall in no event exceed [90] days from the date of the recording of such declaration.

8. (a) After the recording of an executory contract or memorandum has ceased to be effective as provided in [RPL § 294(5)] or the recording of an option to purchase or lease real property has ceased to be effective as provided in [RPL § 294(7)], such executory contract, memorandum or option shall be (1) void as against a subsequent purchaser in good faith and for a valuable consideration, who has no other notice of an estate or interest of the contract vendee or optionee in the premises to which such contract, memorandum or option refers, or of any claim thereof, and (2) ineffective to give notice to such subsequent purchaser of any estate or interest of the contract vendee or optionee in such premises, or of any claim thereof, or to create any duty of inquiry with respect thereto.

(b) For the purposes of this [RPL § 294(8)(b)], “purchaser” includes a person who purchases or acquires by exchange or contracts to purchase or acquire by exchange the same premises or any portion thereof or estate or interest therein, or acquires by assignment the rent to accrue from tenancies or subtenancies thereof in existence at the time of the assignment.

COMMENTARY

If the parties record a contract (or memorandum thereof), this does not change its “executory” character for bankruptcy purposes.

A memorandum of contract will typically not mention the vendee's lien for the down payment, for fear of attracting a mortgage recording tax.

Although the statute says a memorandum of contract (or option) remains effective for a stated period, attorneys sometimes worry that a court might extend its effectiveness. Thus, property owners sometimes hesitate to use this mechanism.

Redemption

[RPAPL § 761] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Redemption by lessee.

Where the special [summary eviction] proceeding is founded upon an allegation that a lessee holds over after a default in the payment of rent, and the unexpired term of the lease under which the premises are held exceeds five years at the time when the warrant is issued the lessee, his executor, administrator or assignee, at any time within one year after the execution of the warrant, unless by the terms of the lease such lessee shall have waived his right to redeem, or such lessee, executor, administrator or assignee shall have subsequently waived the right to redeem by a written instrument filed and recorded in the office in which the lease is recorded, or if not so recorded, in the office in which deeds are required to be recorded of the county in which the leased premises are located, may pay or tender to the petitioner, his heir, executor, administrator or assignee, or if, within five days before the expiration of the year he cannot be found with reasonable diligence within the city or town wherein the property or a portion thereof is situated, then to the court which issued the warrant, all rent in arrears at the time of the payment or tender with interest thereupon and the costs and charges incurred by the petitioner.

Thereupon the person making the payment or tender shall be entitled to the possession of the demised premises under the lease and may hold and enjoy the same according to the terms of the original demise, except as otherwise prescribed in [RPAPL § 765].

COMMENTARY

Any New York commercial lease typically includes a waiver of the tenant's right of redemption. Without such a waiver, the tenant's redemption right can extend for one year. In addition to a generic waiver of any right of redemption the tenant might have, landlord's counsel may want to include in a New York commercial lease language like this:

Tenant waives any right of redemption under Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law § 761.

Subsequent sections of RPAPL flesh out the redemption process. These sections say, among other things, that a leasehold mortgagee can also exercise the lessee's redemption right—but must do so by 2 p.m. on the day after the lessee's redemption right expires, excluding Sundays and public holidays. See RPAPL § 763.

Renewal

[GOL § 5-905]

Certain provisions of leases to be inoperative unless express notice thereof is given to tenant.

No provision of a lease of any real property or premises which states that the term thereof shall be deemed renewed for a specified additional period of time unless the tenant gives notice to the lessor of his intention to quit the premises at the expiration of such term shall be operative unless the lessor, at least [15] days and not more than [30] days previous to the time specified for the furnishing of such notice to him, shall give to the tenant written notice, served personally or by registered or certified mail, calling the attention of the tenant to the existence of such provision in the lease.

The Legislature has determined that consenting adults who enter into leases (including commercial leases) in NYS should never reliably be able to negotiate and enforce lease provisions that say the lease renews automatically, unless the tenant gives notice to the contrary. On the other hand, the requirement that landlord remind tenant of the automatic renewal is not bizarre or burdensome— especially if one assumes an average typical commercial landlord is better-equipped than an average typical commercial tenant to maintain reliable long-term calendaring systems for leases. What happens if the landlord forgets (or deliberately fails) to send the reminder notice? Does the tenant become a tenant at will? What if the tenant didn't want to be protected from the automatic renewal? If one were arguing against the adoption of this statute, one would argue that unanswered questions like these would open the floodgates of litigation. In fact, the statute has produced relatively little reported litigation, yielding somewhat inconsistent answers to the questions just asked. If landlord's or tenant's counsel issues an opinion on the enforceability of lease with automatic renewals, the opinion should perhaps mention this statute. Landlords and tenants concerned about this statute may be able to restructure their transaction as a long-term lease with early cancellation options, which may be a more transparent and appropriate way to reach the same result.

Rent

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

Most of the statutes collected here affect or relate to rent in some way, direct or indirect.

Rent Control

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

Although NYC suffers the consequences of 50 years of residential rent control, occasional efforts to extend those rules to commercial leases always fail. After the 2014 NYC elections, some observers expected new efforts to enact commercial rent control. It didn't happen. As of early 2017, retail rents in Manhattan are declining, after having experienced dramatic increases since the Financial Crisis. Markets adjust.

Rule Against Perpetuities

[EPTL § 9-1.1]

Rule against perpetuities.

(a)(1) The absolute power of alienation is suspended when there are no persons in being by whom an absolute fee or estate in possession can be conveyed or transferred.

(2) Every present or future estate shall be void in its creation which shall suspend the absolute power of alienation by any limitation or condition for a longer period than lives in being at the creation of the estate and a term of not more than [21] years. Lives in being shall include a child conceived before the creation of the estate but born thereafter. In no case shall the lives measuring the permissible period be so designated or so numerous as to make proof of their end unreasonably difficult.

(b) No estate in property shall be valid unless it must vest, if at all, not later than [21] years after one or more lives in being at the creation of the estate and any period of gestation involved. In no case shall lives measuring the permissible period of vesting be so designated or so numerous as to make proof of their end unreasonably difficult.

[EPTL § 9-1.2]

Reduction of age contingency.

Where an estate would, except for this [EPTL § 9-1.2], be invalid because made to depend, for its vesting or its duration, upon any person attaining or failing to attain an age in excess of [21] years, the age contingency shall be reduced to [21] years as to any or all persons subject to such contingency.

[EPTL § 9-1.3]

Rules of construction.

(a) Unless a contrary intention appears, the rules of construction provided in [EPTL § 9-1.3] govern with respect to any matter affecting the rule against perpetuities.

(b) It shall be presumed that the creator intended the estate to be valid.

(c) Where an estate would, except for this [EPTL § 9-1.3(c)], be invalid because of the possibility that the person to whom it is given or limited may be a person not in being at the time of the creation of the estate, and such person is referred to in the instrument creating such estate as the spouse of another without other identification, it shall be presumed that such reference is to a person in being on the effective date of the instrument.

(d) Where the duration or vesting of an estate is contingent upon the probate of a will, the appointment of a fiduciary, the location of a distributee, the payment of debts, the sale of assets, the settlement of an estate, the determination of questions relating to an estate or transfer tax or the occurrence of any specified contingency, it shall be presumed that the creator of such estate intended such contingency to occur, if at all, within [21] years from the effective date of the instrument creating such estate.

(e)(1) Where the validity of a disposition depends upon the ability of a person to have a child at some future time, it shall be presumed, subject to [EPTL § 9-1.3(e)(2)], that a male can have a child at [14] years of age or over, but not under that age, and that a female can have a child at [12] years of age or over, but not under that age or over the age of [55] years.

(2) In the case of a living person, evidence may be given to establish whether he or she is able to have a child at the time in question.

(3) Where the validity of a disposition depends upon the ability of a person to have a child at some future time, the possibility that such person may have a child by adoption shall be disregarded.

(4) The provisions of [EPTL § 9-1.3(e)(1), (e)(2), and (e)(3)] shall not apply for any purpose other than that of determining the validity of a disposition under the rule against perpetuities where such validity depends on the ability of a person to have a child at some future time. A determination of validity or inva-lidity of a disposition under the rule against perpetuities by the application of [EPTL § 9-1.3(e)(1), (e)(2), or (e)(3)] shall not be affected by the later occurrence of facts in contradiction to the facts presumed or determined or the possibility of adoption disregarded under [EPTL § 9-1.3(e)(1), (e)(2), or (e)(3)].

COMMENTARY

New York's rule against perpetuities is chronically the subject of proposals for reform. In one recent case, the courts used the rule against perpetuities to invalidate a purchase option in a lease. The option structure had been created in favor of a commercial lessee so a private developer could benefit from the tax exemption of a community-based not-for-profit performance hall. If the court had let the developer exercise the option, the performance hall might have been rendered homeless. The Rule Against Perpetuities resurfaced in Bleecker St. Tenants Corp. v. Bleecker Jones, LLC, 16 N.Y.3d 272 (2011). There, a 14-year lease had nine nine renewal options, each for ten years. Based on a very technical interpretation of prior law, an intermediate appellate court decided most of these options violated the Rule and unreasonably restrained alienation. (Here, the beneficiary of the decision was a residential cooperative corporation rather than a community-based not-for-profit performance hall.) The Court of Appeals, the state's highest court, reversed, holding that the Rule does not apply to options to renew a lease. Despite the reversal, the case reminds New York real estate lawyers that the Rule remains alive and well, potentially waiting to frustrate the parties' expectations for any long-term transaction.

[RPAPL § 1901] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Release of rents reserved by leases in perpetuity.

1. Any person interested in lands held under a lease in perpetuity, upon which no rent has been paid for at least [20] years, may present his petition to the courts mentioned in this section asking that it be declared that the rents and reversion have been released to the owner of the fee. Such petition shall be verified, shall describe the lease and allege that the rents and reversion have been released, and shall state such facts as the petitioner can ascertain relative to the execution of a release and the identity of the persons who would otherwise be the present owners of the rents and reversion and the last known owner thereof.

2. Such petition may be presented to the supreme court or to the county court of the county where the lands are situated. The court may thereupon order all persons interested to show cause at a certain time and place why the rents and reversion should not be declared to have been released. A description of the lease and lands affected thereby and the name of the last known owner of the rents and reversion shall be specified in such order, and the order shall be published in such newspaper or newspapers and for such time as the court shall direct. The court may also direct the order to be personally served upon such persons as it shall designate.

3. The court may issue commissions to take the testimony of witnesses and may refer the petition to a referee to take and report proofs of the facts stated in the petition. Upon being satisfied that the matters alleged in the petition are true, the court may make an order declaring that the rents and reversion have been released to the owner of the fee. The nonpayment of rent under any such lease for [20] years shall be presumptive evidence of such a release.

4. The entry of such order in the office of the clerk of the county where such lands are situated shall have the same effect as a release of such rents and reversion to such owner then duly executed and recorded. The county clerk shall note on the margin of the record of the original lease a minute of the entry of such order.

COMMENTARY

RPAPL § 1901 in effect allows fee owners under dormant perpetual leases to extinguish the interests of third parties in the rents and reversions. Limited research disclosed no reported cases on this statute.

Rules Against Perpetuities—Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities

New York has not adopted the Uniform Statutory Rule Against Perpetuities and has instead adopted the language in EPTL § 9-1.1. See “Rule Against Perpetuities.”

Rules of Construction

COMMENTARY

Nothing specific to commercial leases.

Security Deposits

[GOL § 7-103]

Money deposited or advanced for use or rental of real property; waiver void; administration expenses.

1. Whenever money shall be deposited or advanced on a contract or license agreement for the use or rental of real property as security for performance of the contract or agreement or to be applied to payments upon such contract or agreement when due, such money, with interest accruing thereon, if any, until repaid or so applied, shall continue to be the money of the person making such deposit or advance and shall be held in trust by the person with whom such deposit or advance shall be made and shall not be mingled with the personal moneys or become an asset of the person receiving the same, but may be disposed of as provided in [GOL § 7-105].

2. Whenever the person receiving money so deposited or advanced shall deposit such money in a banking organization, such person shall thereupon notify in writing each of the persons making such security deposit or advance, giving the name and address of the banking organization in which the deposit of security money is made, and the amount of such deposit. Deposits in a banking organization pursuant to the provisions of this [GOL § 7-103(2)] shall be made in a banking organization having a place of business within the state. If the person depositing such security money in a banking organization shall deposit same in an interest bearing account, he shall be entitled to receive, as administration expenses, a sum equivalent to [1%] per annum upon the security money so deposited, which shall be in lieu of all other administrative and custodial expenses. The balance of the interest paid by the banking organization shall be the money of the person making the deposit or advance and shall either be held in trust by the person with whom such deposit or advance shall be made, until repaid or applied for the use or rental of the leased premises, or annually paid to the person making the deposit of security money.

2-a. Whenever the money so deposited or advanced is for the rental of property containing six or more family dwelling units, the person receiving such money shall, subject to the provisions of this [GOL § 7-103], deposit it in an interest bearing account in a banking organization within the state which account shall earn interest at a rate which shall be the prevailing rate earned by other such deposits made with banking organizations in such area.

2-b. In the event that a lease terminates other than at the time that a banking organization in such area regularly pays interest, the person depositing such security money shall pay over to his tenant such interest as he is able to collect at the date of such lease termination.

3. Any provision of such a contract or agreement whereby a person who so deposits or advances money waives any provision of this [GOL § 7-103] is absolutely void.

4. The term “real property” as used in this [GOL § 7-103] is co-extensive in meaning with lands, tenements and hereditaments.

COMMENTARY

The state’s general statute on security deposits requires the landlord to maintain security deposits separately from other funds, but does not (except in the case of apartment buildings with six or more units) otherwise obligate the landlord to do anything in particular with security deposits. Perhaps the commercial landlord can keep the security deposits in a mattress as long as it is a separate mattress. If the landlord deposits such funds in a “banking organization,” which almost all landlords do, then certain consequences follow. Among other things, the landlord must “thereupon notify” the tenant of the name and address of the bank and the amount of the security deposit. Landlords should take care to satisfy the notice provisions of GOL § 7-103, a statute strictly construed in favor of tenants. Notification in the lease of the depository bank may not suffice. Instead, to satisfy the statutory notice provisions, a landlord must notify the tenant of the depository bank name and address, and the amount of the deposit, after making the deposit. (The statute says the landlord must deposit the funds and “thereupon” notify the tenant. That's what it says. And the courts tend to interpret landlord-tenant statutes strictly against the landlord.) Although “improper” (i.e., early) notice will not by itself necessarily cause a court to require the landlord to “disgorge” the deposit, it does create an adverse inference of commingling and conversion that the landlord must affirmatively rebut. See McMaster v. Pearse, 804 N.Y.S.2d 640 (Civ. Ct. 2005). New York landlords should and typically do take the statutory requirements quite seriously. In New York, landlords cannot use security deposits as “found money” to avoid the need to borrow elsewhere—a financing technique that is a cornerstone for some major real estate investment trusts whose leases are not generally governed by New York law.

A landlord may want to include the following language in a lease, which may not satisfy the statute for the reasons stated earlier. This paragraph just restates New York law, so it doesn't seem strictly necessary, but many tenants ask for it and it's a good reminder for landlords:

To the extent General Obligations Law § 7-103 requires: (a) Landlord shall deposit the Security in an account at a bank with a place of business in the State; (b) if the Building contains six or more family dwelling units, then that account shall earn interest at the prevailing rate earned by similar deposits with banks in the State; (c) Tenant acknowledges that Landlord has Notified²³ Tenant that Landlord shall deposit the Security at _____ Bank located at _____; (d) if the Security is deposited in an interest-bearing account, then Landlord shall be entitled to receive, as administration expenses, 1% per annum of the Security; and (e) any other interest paid by the bank shall belong to Tenant and Landlord shall hold it in trust until repaid, applied to Rent, or annually paid to Tenant.

In today's interest rate environment, interest earnings rarely exceed the landlord's 1% administrative fee. Most landlords keep the interest earnings and call it a day.

[GOL § 7-105] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

23 The statute may require Landlord to give this Notice only after the Security has been deposited. If so, Landlord must remember to give a separate Notice after the fact. N.Y. Gen. Oblig. Law § 7-103 (McKinney 2016).

Landlord failing to turn over deposits made by tenants or licensees and to notify tenants or licensees thereof in certain cases.

1. Any person, firm or corporation and the employers, officers or agents thereof, whether the owner or lessee of the property leased, who or which has or hereafter shall have received from a tenant or licensee a sum of money or any other thing of value as a deposit or advance of rental as security for the full performance by such tenant or licensee of the terms of his lease or license agreement, or who or which has or shall have received the same from a former owner or lessee, shall, upon conveying such property or assigning his or its lease to another, or upon the judicial appointment and qualifying of a receiver in an action to foreclose a mortgage or other lien of record affecting the property leased, or upon the conveyance of such property to another person, firm or corporation by a referee in an action to foreclose a mortgage or other lien of record affecting the property leased if a receiver shall not have been appointed and qualified in such action, at the time of the delivery of the deed or instrument or assignment or within five days thereafter, or within five days after the receiver shall have qualified, deal with the security deposit as follows: Turn over to his or its grantee or assignee, or to the receiver in the foreclosure action, or to the purchaser at the foreclosure sale if a receiver shall not have been appointed and qualified the sum so deposited, and notify the tenant or licensee by registered or certified mail of such turning over and the name and address of such grantee, assignee, purchaser or receiver.

2. Any owner or lessee turning over to his or its grantee, assignee, to a purchaser of the leased premises at a foreclosure sale, or to the receiver in the foreclosure action the amount of such security deposit is hereby relieved of and from liability to the tenant or licensee for the repayment thereof; and the transferee of such security deposit is hereby made responsible for the return thereof to the tenant or licensee, unless he or it shall thereafter and before the expiration of the term of the tenant's lease or licensee's agreement, transfer such security deposit to another, pursuant to [GOL § 7-105(1)] and give the requisite notice in connection therewith as provided thereby. A receiver shall hold the security subject to such disposition thereof as shall be provided in an order of the court to be made and entered in the foreclosure action. The provisions of this [GOL § 7-105] shall not apply if the agreement between the landlord and tenant or licensee is inconsistent herewith.

3. Any failure to comply with this [GOL § 7-105] is a misdemeanor.

COMMENTARY

This statute obligates a landlord to turn over security deposits to the new owner of the property, including a receiver or a foreclosure sale purchaser, upon theoretical threat of criminal prosecution. GOL § 7-105(1) requires the transferor to give prompt notice to the tenant of the disposition of the security deposit, whereupon the transferor is relieved of liability. The statute does not expressly excuse the grantee from any liability if the grantee failed to receive the security deposit from the grantor, but such a result can reasonably be inferred. No available reported case confirms that result. If that inference is correct, then foreclosing lenders are already protected against liability for security deposits they did not actually receive, and hence (arguably) it may be duplicative to address the issue in nondisturbance agreements. Different rules apply for residential leases, depending on whether the tenant is protected by New York's rent regulation schemes. See GOL §§ 7-107 and 7-108.

Security Interests in Rents

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

As in most other states, New York commercial mortgage lenders obtain and record an "assignment of rents" in addition to a mortgage. See "Assignment of Rents."

Statute of Frauds

[GOL § 5-701]

Agreements required to be in writing.

[GOL § 5-701(a)(1) and (a)(10)]

a. Every agreement, promise or undertaking is void, unless it or some note or memorandum thereof be in writing, and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his lawful agent, if such agreement, promise or undertaking:

1. By its terms is not to be performed within one year from the making thereof or the performance of which is not to be completed before the end of a lifetime;

10. Is a contract to pay compensation for services rendered in negotiating a loan, or in negotiating the purchase, sale, exchange, renting or leasing of any real estate or interest therein, or of a business opportunity, business, its good will, inventory, fixtures or an interest therein, including a majority of the voting stock interest in a corporation and including the creating of a partnership interest. "Negotiating" includes procuring an introduction to a party to the transaction or assisting in the negotiation or consummation of the transaction. This [GOL § 5-701(a)(10)] shall apply to a contract implied in fact or in law to pay reasonable compensation but shall not apply to a contract to pay compensation to an auctioneer, an attorney at law, or a duly licensed real estate broker or real estate salesman.

[GOL § 5-701(b)(4)]

4. For purposes of this subdivision,²⁴ the tangible, written text produced by telex, telefacsimile, computer retrieval or other process by which electronic signals are transmitted by telephone or otherwise shall constitute a writing and any symbol executed or adopted by a party with the present intention to authenticate a writing shall constitute a signing. The confirmation and notice of objection referred to in subparagraph (b) of paragraph three of this subdivision may be communicated by means of telex, telefacsimile, computer or other similar process by which electronic signals are transmitted by telephone or otherwise, provided that a party claiming to have communicated in such a manner shall, unless the parties have otherwise agreed in writing, have the burden of establishing actual or constructive receipt by the other party as set forth in subparagraph (b) of paragraph three of this subdivision.

COMMENTARY

Under this statute, licensed real estate brokers—and attorneys (who generally do not need a brokerage license to perform brokerage services)—can claim compensation without a written agreement. See “Guaranty—Statute of Frauds.”

GOL § 701(b)(4) by its terms seems to refer only to GOL § 701(b), which relates to “qualified financial contracts.” For better or worse, at least one appellate court seems to have applied GOL § 701(b)(4) to real estate brokerage contracts. Newmark & Co. Real Estate Inc. v. 2615 East 17 St. Realty LLC, 914 N.Y.S.2d 162, 80 A.D.3d 476 (N.Y. App. Div. 2011). Even if such application was incorrect, GOL § 701(b)(4) does set out reasonable principles, which a court might well follow as a matter of common law or judicial discretion.

As in other states, anyone considering the statute of frauds should also consider the effect of recent state and federal legislation on electronic signatures.

[GOL § 5-703] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Conveyances and contracts concerning real property required to be in writing.

1. An estate or interest in real property, other than a lease for a term not exceeding one year, or any trust or power, over or concerning real property, or in any manner relating thereto, cannot be created, granted, assigned, surrendered or declared, unless by act or operation of law, or by a deed or conveyance in writing, subscribed by the person creating, granting, assigning, surrendering or declaring the same, or by his lawful agent, thereunto authorized by writing. But this [GOL § 5-703(1)] does not affect the power of a testator in the disposition of his real property by will; nor prevent any trust from arising or being extinguished by implication or operation of law, nor any declaration of trust from being proved by a writing subscribed by the person declaring the same.

2. A contract for the leasing for a longer period than one year, or for the sale, of any real property, or an interest therein, is void unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof, expressing the consideration, is in writing, subscribed by the party to be charged, or by his lawful agent thereunto authorized by writing.

3. A contract to devise real property or establish a trust of real property, or any interest therein or right with reference thereto, is void unless the contract or some note or memorandum thereof is in writing and subscribed by the party to be charged therewith, or by his lawfully authorized agent.

4. Nothing contained in this [GOL § 5-703] abridges the powers of courts of equity to compel the specific performance of agreements in cases of part performance.

[GOL § 5-1103] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Written agreement for modification or discharge. An agreement, promise or undertaking to change or modify, or to discharge in whole or in part, any contract, obligation, or lease, or any mortgage or other security interest in personal or real property, shall not be invalid because of the absence of consideration, provided that the agreement, promise or undertaking changing, modifying, or discharging such contract, obligation, lease, mortgage or security interest, shall be in writing and signed by the party against whom it is sought to enforce the change, modification or discharge, or by his agent.

COMMENTARY

Notwithstanding this statute, the parties usually recite delivery of consideration for any written modification of a contract.

[GOL § 5-1111] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Execution by agent in real property transactions; written authorization required.

If executed by an agent, any agreement, promise, undertaking, assignment or offer required by [GOL § 5-1103]...to be in writing, which affects or relates to real property or an interest therein in any manner stated in [GOL § 5-703(1) or (2)], shall be void unless such agent was thereunto authorized in writing.

[GOL § 15-301] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

When written agreement or other instrument cannot be changed by oral executory agreement, or discharged or terminated by oral executory agreement or oral consent or by oral notice.

1. A written agreement or other written instrument which contains a provision to the effect that it cannot be changed orally, cannot be changed by an executory agreement unless such executory agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement of the change is sought or by his agent.

2. A written agreement or other written instrument which contains a provision to the effect that it cannot be terminated orally, cannot be discharged by an executory agreement unless such executory agreement is in writing and signed by the party against whom enforcement of the discharge is sought, or by his agent, and cannot be terminated by mutual consent unless such termination is effected by an executed accord and satisfaction other than the substitution of one executory contract for another, or is evidenced by a writing signed by the party against whom is sought to enforce the termination, or by his agent.

3. a. A discharge or partial discharge of obligations under a written agreement or other written instrument is a change of the agreement or instrument for the purpose of [GOL § 15-301(1)] and is not a discharge or termination for the purpose of [GOL § 15-301(2)], unless all executory obligations under the agreement or instrument are discharged or terminated.

b. A discharge or termination of all executory obligations under a written agreement or other written instrument is a discharge or termination for the purpose of [GOL § 15-301(2)] even though accrued obligations remaining unperformed at the date of the discharge or termination are not affected by it.

c. If a written agreement or other written instrument containing a provision that it cannot be terminated orally also provides for termination or discharge on notice by one or either party, both [GOL § 15-301(2) and (4)] apply whether or not the agreement or other instrument states specifically that the notice must be in writing.

4. If a written agreement or other written instrument contains a provision for termination or discharge on written notice by one or either party, the requirement that such notice be in writing cannot be waived except by a writing signed by the party against whom enforcement of the waiver is sought or by his agent.

5. If executed by an agent, any agreement, evidence of termination, notice of termination or waiver, required by this [GOL § 15-301] to be in writing, which affects or relates to real property or an interest therein as defined in [GOL § 5-101] in any manner stated in [GOL § 5-703(1) or (2)] shall be void unless such agent was thereunto authorized in writing.

6. As used in this [GOL § 15-301], the term “agreement” includes promise and undertaking.

COMMENTARY

Notwithstanding GOL § 15-301, New York courts sometimes recognize oral or implied waivers.

Statutes of Limitation

[CPLR § 212]

Actions to be commenced within [10] years.

[CPLR § 212(a) and (c)]

(a) Possession necessary to recover real property. An action to recover real property or its possession cannot be commenced unless the plaintiff, or his predecessor in interest, was seized or possessed of the premises within [10] years before the commencement of the action.

(c) To redeem from a mortgage. An action to redeem real property from a mortgage with or without an account of rents and profits may be commenced by the mortgagor or his successors in interest, against the mortgagee in possession, or against the purchaser of the mortgaged premises at a foreclosure sale in an action in which the mortgagor or his successors in interest were not excluded from their interest in the mortgaged premises, or against a successor in interest of either, unless the mortgagee, purchaser or successor was continuously possessed of the premises for [10] years after the breach or non-fulfillment of a condition or covenant of the mortgage, or the date of recording of the deed of the premises to the purchaser.

[CPLR § 213] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Actions to be commenced within six years: where not otherwise provided for; on contract;

The following actions must be commenced within six years:

[CPLR § 213(1) and (2)]

1. an action for which no limitation is specifically prescribed by law;
2. an action upon a contractual obligation or liability, express or implied, except as provided in [CPLR § 213(a)], [Uniform Commercial Code art. 2 (§§ 2-701–2-725)], or [GBL §§ 777–777-b];

Subdivisions

[GML § 239-1] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Coordination of certain municipal zoning and planning actions; legislative intent and policy.

[GML § 239-1(a)–(c)]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

2. Intent. The purposes of [GML §§ 239-l, 239-m, and 239-n] shall be to bring pertinent inter-community and county-wide planning, zoning, site plan and subdivision considerations to the attention of neighboring municipalities and agencies having jurisdiction. Such review may include inter-community and county-wide considerations in respect to the following:

- (a) compatibility of various land uses with one another;
- (b) traffic generating characteristics of various land uses in relation to the effect of such traffic on other land uses and to the adequacy of existing and proposed thoroughfare facilities;
- (c) impact of proposed land uses on existing and proposed county or state institutional or other uses;

COMMENTARY

Other statutes and municipal ordinances also deal with subdivision approvals, but there is no single integrated statewide subdivision procedure of the type that has become, in California, a massive body of law in its own right. See, e.g., Public Health Law §§ 1115 et seq. (approval of water supply); General Municipal Law §§ 239-f and 239-g (approval of subdivision plats by municipal bodies); and ECL §§ 17-1501–17-1515 (approval of sewage systems). The state environmental quality review act (ECL §§ 8-0101–8-0117) and city uniform land use review procedure (see NYC Charter § 197-c) may also apply. Regardless of which subdivision law, if any, applies, the process of breaking one tax lot into multiple tax lots will entail multiple interactions with the municipal authorities. In NYC, the recording office will not accept a deed conveying any partial tax lot.

[GML § 239-m] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Referral of certain proposed city, town and village planning and zoning actions to the county planning agency or regional planning council; report thereon; final action.

[GML § 239-m(4)(a)]

4. County planning agency or regional planning council review of proposed actions; recommendation, report.

(a) The county planning agency or regional planning council shall review any proposed action referred for inter-community or countywide considerations, including but not limited to those considerations identified in [GML § 239-1]. Such county planning agency or regional planning council shall recommend approval, modification, or disapproval, of the proposed action, or report that the proposed action has no significant county-wide or inter-community impact.

[Town Law§ 276]

Subdivision review; approval of plats; development of filed plats.

[Town Law§ 276(1) and (4)(a)]

1. Purpose. For the purpose of providing for the future growth and development of the town and affording adequate facilities for the housing, transportation, distribution, comfort, convenience, safety, health and welfare of its population, the town board may, by resolution, authorize and empower the planning board to approve preliminary and final plats of subdivisions showing lots, blocks or sites, with or without streets or highways, within that part of the town outside the limits of any incorporated village.

4. Definitions. When used in this [Town Law art. 16 (§§ 261 to 285)] the following terms shall have the respective meanings set forth herein except where the context shows otherwise:

(a) “Subdivision” means the division of any parcel of land into a number of lots, blocks or sites as specified in a local ordinance, law, rule or regulation, with or without streets or highways, for the purpose of sale, transfer of ownership, or development. The term “subdivision” may include any alteration of lot lines or dimensions of any lots or sites shown on a plat previously approved and filed in the office of the county clerk or register of the county in which such plat is located. Subdivisions may be defined and delineated by local regulation, as either “major” or “minor,” with the review procedures and criteria for each set forth in such local regulations.

[Village Law § 7-728] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Subdivision review; approval of plats; development of filed plats.

[Village Law § 7-728(1) and (4)(a)]

1. Purpose. For the purpose of providing for the future growth and development of the village and affording adequate facilities for the housing, transportation, distribution, comfort, convenience, safety, health and welfare of its population, the village board of trustees, may by resolution, authorize and empower the planning board to approve preliminary and final plats of subdivisions showing lots, blocks or sites, with or without streets or highways.

4. Definitions. When used in this article the following terms shall have the respective meanings set forth herein except where the context shows otherwise:

(a) “Subdivision” means the division of any parcel of land into a number of lots, blocks or sites as specified in a law, rule or regulation, with or without streets or highways, for the purpose of sale, transfer of ownership, or development. The term “subdivision” may include any alteration of lot lines or dimensions of any lots or sites shown on a plat previously approved and filed in the office of the county clerk or register of the county in which such plat is located. Subdivisions may be defined and delineated by local regulation, as either “major” or “minor,” with the review procedures and criteria for each set forth in such local regulations.

[RPL § 337-b] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Offering statement; contents; prohibitions.

1. Contents. The offering statement shall contain (a) the names, addresses, business background of the subdivider, and if such subdivider is a partnership or corporation, the names, addresses and business background of each of the partners, officers and principal stockholders, the nature of their fiduciary relationship and their financial relationship, past, present and future, to the subdivider; (b) a duly certified financial statement of the assets and liabilities of the subdivider, as of a date not more than three months prior to the date of the filing, in such detail as the Department [of State] may require; (c) a description of the subdivision and each unit or lot into which it has or will be divided, in such detail as the Department [of State] may require; (d) the material terms of any encumbrances, liens and restrictions upon the subdivision and each such unit or lot; (e) data and information concerning improvements, including streets, water supply and sewerage disposal facilities, in existence on the subdivision, and the estimated cost, date of completion and responsibility for construction of improvements to be made which are referred to in connection with the sale or lease or offering for sale or lease of the subdivision or any unit or lot thereon; (f) each of the terms and conditions under which each such unit or lot is offered for sale; and (g) such additional data and information as the Department [of State] may require as being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of purchasers or lessees.

2. There may be omitted from any offering statement any of the information required under [RPL § 337-b(1)] which the Department [of State] may by rules and regulations designate as not being necessary or appropriate in the public interest or for the protection of purchasers.

3. Limitations. No offer to sell or lease subdivided lands by means of advertisements in periodicals or newspapers, or on television or radio, or by motion picture or otherwise shall be made unless each such advertisement contains reference to the fact that an offering statement has been filed with the Department [of State] and that a copy of such statement is available, upon request, from the subdivider.

4. Except as provided in [RPL § 337-b(3)], no offer of sale or lease of subdivided lands shall be made unless such offer is accompanied by a copy of the current offering statement filed pursuant to this [RPL art. 9-A (§§ 337–339-c)].

[RPL § 337-b(6)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

6. No sale or lease of subdivided lands shall be made unless accompanied or preceded by the delivery to the prospective purchaser of an offering statement complying with the provisions of this [RPL § 337-b].

[RPL § 337-b(9)]

9. The offering statement shall include the following statement in easily readable capital letters of not less than nine-point type: “THE OFFEROR HAS FILED ADDITIONAL INFORMATION ON THIS LAND OFFERING WITH THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE PURSUANT TO SECTION 337-A OF THE REAL PROPERTY LAW. THIS INFORMATION INCLUDES A DESCRIPTION AND MAPS OF THE PROPERTIES BEING OFFERED; A CERTIFICATE STATING IN DETAIL ALL LIENS, ENCUMBRANCES OR CLOUDS UPON THE TITLE TO THE LAND; AND STATEMENTS OF ANY PRIOR CRIMINAL CONVICTIONS OF THE PRINCIPALS MAKING THIS OFFERING WHICH INVOLVED THE SALE OR OFFERING FOR SALE OF SUBDIVIDED LANDS. INFORMATION FILED PURSUANT TO SECTION 337-A OF THE REAL PROPERTY LAW IS AVAILABLE PURSUANT TO THE FREEDOM OF INFORMATION LAW FROM THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE AT THE FOLLOWING ADDRESS: THE DEPARTMENT OF STATE, SUBDIVIDED LANDS SECTION, ALBANY, NEW YORK 12231-0001.”

COMMENTARY

Use at least 10-point type.

[RPL § 337-c] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Right to cancel.

Every contract or agreement for the sale or lease of subdivided lands shall expressly grant to the purchaser or lessee the absolute right to cancel the contract or agreement within seven days following the signing of the contract or agreement, by giving the subdivider notice of cancellation at the address listed in the offering statement filed by the subdivider, by registered or certified mail return receipt requested. Within [10] days of receipt of such a notice of cancellation the subdivider shall return to the purchaser or lessee all consideration paid or delivered on account of such contract or agreement.

Subdivision—Application to Leased Lands

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

“Subdivisions” typically do not include the leasing of part of a legal lot, even on a very long term and triple-net basis.

Taxation

[RPT § 499-c]

[RPT § 499-C(5)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Eligibility Requirements.

[RPTL § 499-C(5)]

5. The lease for the eligible premises shall contain the following provisions:

- (a) a statement of the tenant’s percentage share;
- (b) a statement informing the tenant in at least [12]-point type that:
 - (1) an application for abatement of real property taxes pursuant to this [RPTL §§ 499-A to 499-H] will be made for the premises;

(2) the rent, including amounts payable by the tenant for real property taxes, will accurately reflect any abatement of real property taxes granted pursuant to this [RPTL §§ 499-A to 499-H] for the premises;

(3) at least [$10] per square foot or [$35] per square foot must be spent on improvements to the premises and the common areas, the amount being dependent upon the length of the lease and whether it is a new or a renewal lease, provided, however, that with respect to a lease commencing on or after [April 1, 1997], if, by the [60th] day following the rent commencement date, the tenant employs [125] or fewer employees in the relevant premises, at least [$5] per square foot must be spent on improvements to the premises and the common areas; and

(4) all abatements granted with respect to a building pursuant to this [RPTL §§ 499-A to 499-H] will be revoked if, during the benefit period, real estate taxes or water or sewer charges or other lienable charges are unpaid for more than one year, unless such delinquent amounts are paid as provided in [RPT § 499-F(4)].

COMMENTARY

New York's real property tax law contains a variety of tax abatements intended to motivate owners to undertake certain forms of development or redevelopment, which it is thought would not otherwise be feasible given New York's high taxes. Real property tax law provisions starting with Section 499-A award these benefits for redevelopment of certain properties in Lower Manhattan. Unlike most tax abatements, this particular tax abatement requires property owners to "pass through" to tenants any real estate tax savings and to include certain language in leases. Owners remain free to negotiate all other elements of the tenant's rent. A cynic would argue that the net effect of these abatements merely places money in the property owner's pocket and increases the importance of knowing how to file successful abatement applications as a means of creating incremental land value in any area where the tax benefits were available. And anyone who owns a developable site in that area will ultimately price the value of these benefits into the selling price when a developer comes along. So ultimately the value of the benefits gets "baked into" land values—which may be a good thing if it incentivizes owners of development sites to sell for development. The city could achieve the same goal more directly by increasing real estate taxes on underutilized land. to avoid problems with present and future tax abatement filings, a landlord may want to include language like this in a commercial lease:

Tenant shall cooperate as Landlord reasonably requests, including by providing any information in Tenant's possession that Landlord must submit, to enable Landlord to qualify for any otherwise available tax incentive, abatement, deferral, subsidy, or other benefit program.

The tenant may request reciprocal language to accommodate any tax benefits the tenant may be able to claim.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-208.1] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Income and expense statements.

a. Where real property is income-producing property, the owner shall be required to submit annually to the department [of finance] not later than [September 1], a statement of all income derived from and all expenses attributable to the operation of such property as follows:

(1) Where the owner's books and records reflecting the operation of the property are maintained on a calendar year basis, the statement shall be for the calendar year preceding the date the statement shall be filed.

(2) Where the owner's books and records reflecting the operation of the property are maintained on a fiscal year basis for federal income tax purposes, the statement shall be for the last fiscal year concluded as of the [August 1] preceding the date the statement shall be filed.

(3) Notwithstanding the provision[s] of [NYC Admin. Code § 11-208.1(1) and (2)], where the owner of the property has not operated the property and is without knowledge of the income and expenses of the operation of the property for a consecutive [12] month period concluded as of the [August 1] preceding the date the statement shall be filed, then the statement shall be for the period of ownership.

(4) The commissioner may for good cause shown extend the time for filing an income and expense statement by a period not to exceed [30] days.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-208.1(e)]

e. As used in this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-208], the term “income-producing property” means property owned for the purpose of securing an income from the property itself, but shall not include property with an assessed value of [$40,000] or less, or residential property containing [10] or fewer dwelling units or property classified in class one or class two as defined in [RPTL art. 18 (§§ 1801 to 1806)] containing six or fewer dwelling units and one retail store.

COMMENTARY

For some categories of real property, real estate tax assessments depend on income and expenses., so real estate taxes become a roundabout form of additional income taxes. For multifamily rental property, NYC tries to collect real estate taxes equal to 25% to 33% of gross revenue. These are extraordinary numbers. They allow NYC to impose unusually low real estate taxes on single-family residences, occupied by voters. Tenants also vote, but they don’t feel the direct pain of real estate taxes. For NYC to administer this system, it needs to collect income and expense information ever year from landlords, much like another income tax filing. In recent years, NYC has become more aggressive about fining landlords who fail to file. This becomes an issue upon sale of the property.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-701]Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Definitions.*

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-701(5)–(7)]

5. “Taxable premises.” Any premises in the city occupied, used or intended to be occupied or used for the purpose of carrying on or exercising any trade, business, profession, vocation or commercial activity, including any premises so used even though it is used solely for the purpose of renting, or granting the right to occupy or use, the same premises in whole or in part to tenants;

6. "Rent." The consideration paid or required to be paid by a tenant for the use or occupancy of premises, valued in money, whether received in money or otherwise, including all credits and property or services of any kind and including any payment required to be made by a tenant on behalf of his or her landlord for real estate taxes, water rents or charges, sewer rents or any other expenses (including insurance) normally payable by a landlord who owns the realty other than expenses for the improvement, repair or maintenance of the tenant's premises.

7. "Base rent." The rent paid for each taxable premises by a tenant to his or her landlord for a period, less the amounts received by or due such tenant for the same period from any tenant of any part of such premises:

(i) as rent for premises which constitute taxable premises of such tenant except where such tenant is exempt from tax thereon pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b) or (c)(6)]; provided, however, that for tax periods beginning on and after [June 1, 1985], rent received or due from a tenant exempt from tax thereon pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)], as such [paragraph] was in effect immediately prior to its amendment by [Local Law 57 of 1993], may be deducted if such tenant occupies or uses the premises pursuant to a written agreement made prior to [June 1, 1984], the terms and conditions of which have not been changed or amended; and provided, further, that for tax periods beginning on and after [June 1, 1985], with respect to a tenant exempt from tax pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)] as such [paragraph] was in effect immediately prior to its amendment by [Local Law 57 of 1993], because of the reduction in base rent provided for in [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(h)], rent received or due from such tenant may be deducted if such tenant occupies or uses the premises pursuant to a written agreement made prior to [June 1, 1985], the terms and conditions of which have not been changed or amended; and provided, further, that for tax periods beginning on and after [June 1, 1994], with respect to a tenant exempt from tax pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)] as a result of the amendment of such [paragraph] [by] Local Law 57 of 1993], whether or not such exemption is due to the reduction in base rent provided for in [NYC Admin.

Code § 11-704(h)], rent received or due from such tenant may be deducted if such tenant occupies or uses the premises pursuant to a written agreement made prior to [June 1, 1993], the terms and conditions of which have not been changed or amended; and provided, further, that for tax periods beginning on and after [July 29, 1987], with respect to a tenant exempt from tax pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)] because of the reduction in base rent provided for in [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(f)], rent received or due from such tenant may be deducted; and provided, further, that, notwithstanding anything in [N.Y.C. Admin. Code § 11-701(7)(i)] to the contrary, for tax periods beginning on and after [June 1, 1995], with respect to a tenant exempt from tax pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)], rents received or due from such tenant may be deducted;

(ii) as rent for premises which do not constitute taxable premises and which are used by such tenant as lodging or residential premises (including such residential premises in hotels, apartment hotels or lodging houses as defined in former title V of chapter [46] of the code);

(iii) who is exempt from tax under [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(a)];

(iv) as rent for premises which do not constitute taxable premises where such rent is, or to the extent that such rent is, deductible from the base rent of such tenant by reason of [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(c)(5)]; and

(v) as rent for premises which do not constitute taxable premises, pursuant to a common law relationship of landlord and tenant (notwithstanding the definition given to those terms by [NYC Admin. Code § 11-701(2) and (3)]) except where it is received as rent, whether or not such landlord-tenant relationship exists, for premises which are occupied as or constitute:

(a) a locker, safe deposit box or beach cabana;

(b) storage space in part of a warehouse or in part of any other structure or area in which goods are stored;

(c) garage space or parking space in any part of a garage, of a parking lot or of a parking area where the entire garage, entire parking lot or entire parking area [accommodates] more than two motor vehicles;

(d) an occupancy of the type which customarily has not been the subject of such a common law relationship of landlord and tenant.

Nothing contained in this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] shall be construed to permit a tenant to deduct the same rent from his or her base rent more than once.

COMMENTARY

The commercial rent tax is one of several taxes unique or almost unique to NYC or NYS. The extracts set forth here represent only the highlights (lowlights?) of this tax. The commercial rent tax statute includes a municipal “bulk sales” notification requirement (see NYC Admin. Code § 11-712(c)), piled on top of the state’s sales tax enforcement bulk sales requirements (TAX §§ 1141(c) et seq.).²⁵ The definition of rent is quite broad. This statute is often amended, such as to change the tax rate or to broaden or the scope of exemptions, usually based on the location of the leased premises. At this time, the tax applies only in parts of Manhattan. The city imposes this tax on the tenant rather than the landlord but (perhaps surprisingly) does not obligate the landlord to collect the tax from tenants on the city’s behalf. Landlords must, however, maintain certain records and make them available “at any time upon demand” to the taxing authorities. In calculating City transfer tax on the creation of long-term ground leases, the City disregards any rent that would be subject to the commercial rent tax, even if that tax does not actually apply, given the location of the property.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-702]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Imposition of tax.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-702(a)(2)–(b)]

²⁵ In contrast, New York amended its version of the UCC to eliminate art. 6, which covered bulk sales as a matter of private debtor-creditor law.

a. (2) For each tax year commencing on or after, [June 1, 1970], every tenant shall pay a tax at the rates shown in the following tables:

When the annual rent is:	But not more than:	The rate shall be:
0	$2,499	2 ½ %
$2,500 or over	$4,999	5 %
$5,000 or over	$7,999	6 ¼ %
$8,000 or over	$10,999	7 %
$11,000 and over		7 ½ %

For tax years beginning after [May 31, 1981], the tax shall be imposed at rates equal to [80%] of the rates shown in the foregoing table.

Where the rent is for a period of less than one year, the rate shall be determined by assuming that the rent is on an equivalent basis for the entire year.

b. Nothing contained in this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] shall be deemed to require payment of a double or multiple tax pursuant to this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] on any part of any taxable premises.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-702(e)]

e. Nothing contained in this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-702] shall be construed as permitting base rent of a tenant for one taxable premises to be reduced by deducting rents received by him or her for another taxable premises of which he or she is also a tenant.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-703]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Presumption and burden of proof.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-703(a)]

a. For the purpose of the proper administration of this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] and to prevent evasion of the tax hereby imposed[,] it shall be presumed that all premises are taxable premises and that all rent paid or required to be paid by a tenant is base rent until the contrary is established, and the burden of proving that such presumptive base rent or any portion thereof is not included in the measure of the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] shall be on the tenant.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Exemptions and deductions from base rent.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(a) and (b)]

a. The following shall be exempt from the payment of the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718]:

1. The [NYS], or any public corporation (including a public corporation created pursuant to agreement or compact with another state or the Dominion of Canada), improvement district or other political subdivision of the state;

2. The United States of America, insofar as it is immune from taxation;

3. The United Nations or other world-wide international organizations of which the United States of America is a member;

4. Any corporation, or association, or trust, or community chest, fund or foundation, organized and operated exclusively for religious, charitable, or educational purposes, or for the prevention of cruelty to children or animals, and no part of the net earnings of which inures to the benefit of any private shareholder or individual and no substantial part of the activities of which is carrying on propaganda, or otherwise attempting to influence legislation; provided, however, that nothing in this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(a)(4)] shall include an organization operated for the primary purpose of carrying on a trade or business for profit, whether or not all of its profits are payable to one or more organizations described in this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(a)(4)]; and

5. Any tenant who would be subject to taxes under this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] aggregating not more than [$1.00] for a tax year with respect to all taxable premises used by the tenant; and b.²⁶ (1) A tenant who uses premises for no more than [14] days in a tax year whether or not consecutive, where his or her agreement with his or her landlord does not require him or her to pay rent for a longer period shall be exempt from the payment of the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] in respect to the rent paid by him or her for such premises.

(2) . . . for tax years beginning on or after [June 1, 2001] is not in excess of [$249,999]²⁷ per year, calculated without regard to any reduction in base rent allowed by [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(h)(2)] shall be exempt from the payment of the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] with respect to such rent, provided, however, that where the base rent of such tenant is for a period of less than one year, such base rent shall, for purposes of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(b)(2)], be determined as if it had been on an equivalent basis for the entire year . . .

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(d)]

d. A tenant who uses taxable premises for renting to others for residential purposes to the extent of [75%] or more of the rentable floor space shall be exempt from the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704] in respect to the rent paid for such premises from the time that construction thereof commences, provided, however, that this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(d)] shall not be applicable to hotels, apartment hotels or lodging houses as defined in former title V of chapter forty-six of the code.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(h)]

h. (1) In the case of any taxable premises located in the borough of Manhattan north of the center line of [96th] street or in the boroughs of the Bronx, Brooklyn, Queens and Staten Island,...a tenant of taxable premises...shall be exempt from the payment of the tax imposed by this chapter with respect to the rent for such taxable premises.

(2) In the case of any taxable premises located in the borough of Manhattan south of the center line of [96th] street, the base rent for such premises shall be reduced by...[35%]... such reduction to be made after all other exemptions and deductions authorized by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] have been taken.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704.3]

Tax credit.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-704.3(a)(6) and (b)(1)]

(6) For each tax year beginning on or after [June 1, 2001] a credit shall be allowed against the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] as follows: a tenant whose base rent is at least [$250,000] but not more than [$300,000] shall be allowed a credit in an amount determined by multiplying [3.9%] of base rent by a fraction the numerator of which is [$300,000] minus the amount of base rent and the denominator of which is [$50,000]. If the tenant's base rent is over [$300,000] no credit shall be allowed under this [NYC Admin. Code § 11.704.3(a)(6)]. For purposes of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704.3(a)(6)], 'base rent' shall be calculated without regard to any reduction in base rent allowed by [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(h)(2)].

(b)(1) Where the base rent of a tenant is for a period of less than one year, such base rent shall, for purposes of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704.3], be determined as if it had been on an equivalent basis for the entire year . . .

Does this credit create an incentive for tenants to enter into many small leases instead of a single large one?

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-705]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Returns.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-705(a) and (b)]

a. Every tenant subject to tax under this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] shall file with the commissioner of finance a return with respect to the taxes payable for the three month periods ending on [August 31], [November 31] and [February 28] of each year and a final return with respect to the taxes payable for the tax year ending on [May 31] of each year. Such returns shall be filed within [20] days from the expiration of the period covered thereby.... For tax years beginning on or after [June 1, 2001], no such final return shall be required from such exempt tenant with respect to any taxable premises if (1) the tenant's rent for such premises, determined without regard to any deduction from or reduction in rent or base rent allowed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718], does not exceed [$200,000] for the tax year and (2) the amount of rent received or due from any subtenant of such exempt tenant with respect to such premises does not exceed [$200,000] for the tax year. Notwithstanding anything in this subdivision to the contrary... no return shall be required pursuant to this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-705(a)] with respect to any taxable premises located in that part of the city specified in [NYC Admin. Code § 11-704(h)(1)] and no such taxable premises shall be taken into account for purposes of clause two of the preceding sentence. The commissioner of finance may permit or require returns (including final returns) to be made for other periods and upon such dates as the commissioner may specify and if he or she deems it necessary in order to insure the payment of the tax imposed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718], the commissioner may require such returns to be made for shorter periods than those prescribed by the foregoing provisions of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-705], and upon such dates as he or she may specify.

b. The commissioner of finance may by regulation require the filing of information returns and supplemental information returns by landlords and by tenants of taxable premises, whether or not they are required to pay the tax imposed by this chapter, upon such dates or at such times as the commissioner may specify if he or she deems the filing of such information returns necessary for proper administration of this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718].

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-706] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Payment of tax.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-706(a)]

a. The tax imposed by this chapter shall be due and payable on or before the [20th] day of the calendar month following the end of each tax period and shall be paid to the commissioner of finance, as follows: The tax to be paid at such time shall be based on the base rent for such tax period and the rate of tax shall be the one which would be applicable if the base rent for such period were the same for each tax period during the tax year, except that the payment required to be made together with the final return or at the time that the final return should be filed shall be the amount by which the actual tax for the tax year exceeds the amounts previously paid for the tax year.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-707]

Records to be kept.

Every landlord of taxable premises and every tenant of taxable premises shall keep records of rent paid and received by him or her in such form as the commissioner of finance may by regulation require, all leases or agreements which fix the rents or rights of tenants of taxable premises, and such other records, receipts and other papers relevant to the ascertainment of the tax due under this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718] as the commissioner of finance may by regulation require. Such records shall be offered for inspection and examination at any time upon demand by the commissioner of finance. Such records, unless the commissioner of finance consents to a sooner destruction or requires that they be kept for a longer time, shall be preserved for a period of three years except that leases or agreements which fix the rents or rights of a tenant shall be kept for a period of three years after the expiration of the tenancy thereunder.

Refunds.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-709(a)]

a. In the manner provided in this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-709], the commissioner of finance shall refund or credit, without interest, any tax, penalty or interest erroneously, illegally or unconstitutionally collected or paid, if written application to the commissioner of finance for such refund shall be made within [18] months from the date fixed by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–11-718] for filing the return on which such payment was based or within six months of the payment thereof, whichever of such periods expire the later. Whenever a refund or credit is made or denied, the commissioner of finance shall state his or her reason therefor and give notice thereof to the taxpayer in writing. The commissioner of finance may, in lieu of any refund required to be made, allow credit therefore on payments due from the applicant.

Proceedings to recover tax.

(c) Whenever there is made a sale, transfer or assignment in bulk of any part or the whole of a stock of merchandise or of fixtures, or merchandise and of fixtures pertaining to the conducting of the business of the seller, transferor or assignor, otherwise than in the ordinary course of trade and in the regular prosecution of said business, the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall at least [10] days before taking possession of such merchandise, fixtures, or merchandise and fixtures, or paying therefor, [notify] the commissioner of finance by registered mail of the proposed sale and of the price, terms and conditions thereof whether or not the seller, transferor or assignor, has represented to, or informed the purchaser, transferee or assignee that it owes any tax pursuant to this chapter and whether or not the purchaser, transferee or assignee has the knowledge that such taxes are owing, and whether any such taxes are in fact owing.

Whenever the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall fail to give notice to the commissioner of finance..., or whenever the commissioner of finance shall inform the purchaser, transferee or assignee that a possible claim for such tax or taxes exists, any sums of money, property or choses in action, or other consideration, which the purchaser, transferee or assignee is required to transfer over to the seller, transferor or assignor shall be subject to a first priority right and lien for any such taxes theretofore or thereafter determined to be due from the seller, transferor or assignor to the city, and the purchaser, transferee or assignee is forbidden to transfer to the seller, transferor or assignor any such sums of money, property or choses in action to the extent of the amount of the city's claim. For failure to comply with the provisions of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-712(c)], the purchaser, transferee or assignee, ... shall be personally liable for the payment to the city of any such taxes theretofore or thereafter determined to be due to the city from the seller, transferor or assignor, and such liability may be assessed and enforced in the same manner as the liability for tax under this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718].

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-715]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Interest and penalties.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(a) and (b)]

(a) Interest on underpayment; quarterly return. If any amount of tax required to be paid together with a return, other than the final return for a tax year, is not paid on or before the last date prescribed for payment (without regard to any extension of time granted for payment), interest on such amount at the rate set by the commissioner of finance pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)], or, if no rate is set, at the rate of [7.5%] per annum, shall be paid for the period from such last date until [20] days after the end of the tax year during which such payments were due or until such prior time as the tax paid for the tax year equals [75%] of the full tax required to be paid for the tax year. Such interest shall be paid with the final return for the tax year to which it relates. In computing the amount of interest to be paid, such interest shall be compounded daily. Interest under this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(a)] shall not be paid if the amount thereof is less than [$1.00].

(b) Interest on underpayment; final return. If any amount of tax required to be paid together with the final return for a tax year is not paid on or before the last day prescribed for payment (without regard to any extension of time granted for payment), interest on such amount at the rate set by the commissioner of finance pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)], or, if no rate is set, at the rate of [7.5%] per annum, shall be paid for the period from such last date to the date of payment. In computing the amount of interest to be paid, such interest shall be compounded daily. Interest under this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(b)] shall not be paid if the amount thereof is less than [$1.00].

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)]

(h)(1) Authority to set interest rates. The commissioner of finance shall set the rate of interest to be paid pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(a) and (b)], but if no such rate of interest is set, such rate shall be deemed to be set at [7.5%] per annum. Such rate shall be the same for [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(a) and (b)] and shall be the rate prescribed in [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)(2)] but shall not be less than [7.5%] per annum. Any such rate set by the commissioner of finance shall apply to taxes, or any portion thereof, which remain or become due on or after the date on which such rate becomes effective and shall apply only with respect to interest computed or computable for periods or portions of periods [occurring] in the period in which such rate is in effect.

(2) General rule. The rate of interest set under this [N.Y.C. Admin. Code § 11-715(h)(2)] shall be the sum of (i) the federal short-term rate as provided under [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)(3)], plus (ii) [7%].

(3) Federal short-term rate. For purposes of this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)]:

(A) The federal short-term rate for any month shall be the federal short-term rate determined by the United States secretary of the treasury during such month in accordance with [Internal Revenue Code § 1274(d)] for use in connection with [Internal Revenue Code § 6621]. Any such rate shall be rounded to the nearest full percent (or, if a multiple of [1/2] of [1%], such rate shall be increased to the next highest full percent).²⁸

(B) Period during which rate applies.

i) In general...[T]he federal short-term rate for the first month in each calendar quarter shall apply during the first calendar quarter beginning after such month.

(4) Publication of interest rate. The commissioner of finance shall cause to be published in the city record, and give other appropriate general notice of, the interest rate to be set under this [NYC Admin. Code § 11-715(h)] no later than [20] days preceding the first day of the calendar quarter during which such interest rate applies....

²⁸ The reference to “a multiple of” 1/2 of 1% presumably means only an “odd” multiple. Otherwise, 3% (which is an even multiple of 1/2%, i.e., 6 times 1/2% would be converted to 4%.

Notices and limitation of time.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-717(b)]

b. The provisions of the [CPLR] or any other law relative to limitations of time for the enforcement of a civil remedy shall not apply to any [proceeding] or action taken by the city to levy, appraise, assess, determine or enforce the collection of any tax or penalty provided by this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701–718]. However, except in the case of a willfully false or fraudulent return with intent to evade the tax, no assessment of additional tax shall be made after the expiration of more than three years from the date of the final return for the tax year to which the assessment relates; provided, however, that where no return has been made as provided by law, the tax may be assessed at any time.

[TAX § 1105(b)]

Imposition of sales tax.

On and after [June 1, 1971], there is hereby imposed and there shall be paid a tax of [4%] upon:

(b)

(1) The receipts from every sale, other than sales for resale, of the following: (A) gas, electricity, refrigeration and steam, and gas, electric, refrigeration and steam service of whatever nature; [and] (B) telephony and telegraphy and telephone and telegraph service of whatever nature except interstate and international telephony and telegraphy and telephone and telegraph service and except any [mobile] telecommunications service . . .

COMMENTARY

New York's sales and other taxes have a very broad scope, matched only by the creativity and aggressiveness of the tax collectors. This often produces surprises. Provisions beyond those quoted here could also apply.

[TAX § 1141(c)] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Proceedings to Recover Tax.

[TAX 1141(c)]

(c) Whenever a person required to collect tax shall make a sale, transfer, or assignment in bulk of any part or the whole of his business assets, otherwise than in the ordinary course of business, the purchaser, transferee or assignee shall at least [10] days before taking possession of the subject of said sale, transfer or assignment, or paying therefor, notify the [Tax Commission] by registered mail of the proposed sale and of the price, terms and conditions thereof whether or not the seller, transferor or assignor, has represented to, or informed the purchaser, transferee or assignee that he owes any tax pursuant to this [TAX art. 28 (§§ 1101 to 1150)] and whether or not the purchaser, transferee, or assignee has knowledge that such taxes are owing, and whether any such taxes are in fact owing.

COMMENTARY

This statute is commonly referred to as New York's bulk sales law, a bulky provision too long to quote in its entirety here. Recent cases have made clear that the bulk sales law counterintuitively applies to transfers of property other than inventory, equipment, and other business property, e.g., it applies to the assignment of a lease. Assignees should comply with the statute or face personal liability for their assignor's sales taxes. As a practical matter, many contracts dispense with bulk sales compliance, partly because the bulk sales filing requires the parties to submit a copy of their contract to the tax authorities. Instead, the buyer requires an indemnity from the seller, sometimes without rigorously considering creditworthiness.

[TAX § 19] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Green building credit.

[TAX § 19(a)(1)]

(a) Allowance of credit.

(1) General.

(A) Green building credit. A taxpayer subject to tax under [TAX article 9, 9-A, 22, 32, or 33] shall be allowed a green building credit against such tax, pursuant to the provisions referenced in [TAX § 19(f)]. Provided, however, no credit shall be allowed under this [TAX § 19] unless the taxpayer has complied with the applicable requirements of [TAX § 19(d)(2)] (relating to reports to DEC). The amount of the credit shall be the sum of the credit components specified in [TAX § 19(a)2 through (7)]. Provided, however, the amount of each such credit component shall not exceed the limit set forth in the initial credit component certificate obtained pursuant to [TAX § 19(c)]. In the determination of such credit components, no cost paid or incurred by the taxpayer shall be the basis for more than one such component.

(B) Credit to successor owner. If a credit is allowed to a building owner pursuant to this [TAX § 19(a)] with respect to property, and such property (or an interest therein) is sold, the credit for the period after the sale which would have been allowable under this [TAX § 19(a)] to the prior owner had the property not been sold shall be allowable to the new owner. Credit for the year of sale shall be allocated between the parties on the basis of the number of days during such year that the property or interest was held by each.

(C) Credit to successor tenant. If a credit is allowed to a tenant pursuant to this [TAX § 19(a)] with respect to property, and if such tenancy is terminated but such property remains in use in the building by a successor tenant, the credit for the period after such termination which would have been allowable under this [TAX § 19(a)] to the prior tenant had the tenancy not been terminated shall be allowable to the successor tenant. Credit for the year of termination shall be allocated between the parties on the basis of the number of days during such year that the property was used by each.

(D) Notwithstanding any other provision of law to the contrary, in the case of allowance of credit under this [TAX § 19] to a successor owner or tenant, as provided in [TAX § 19(a)(1)(B) or (C)], the commissioner shall have the authority to reveal to the successor owner or tenant any information, with respect to the credit of the prior owner or tenant, which is the basis for the denial in whole or in part of the credit claimed by such successor owner or tenant.

(b) Definitions. As used in this section, the following terms shall have the following meanings:

(1) “Allowable costs” means amounts properly chargeable to capital account (other than for land), which are paid or incurred on or after [June 1, 1999], for: construction or rehabilitation; commissioning costs; interest paid or incurred during the construction or rehabilitation period; legal, architectural, engineering and other professional fees allocable to construction or rehabilitation; closing costs for construction, rehabilitation or mortgage loans; recording taxes and filing fees incurred with respect to construction or rehabilitation; site costs (such as temporary electric wiring, scaffolding, demolition costs, and fencing and security facilities); and costs of furniture, carpeting, partitions, walls and wall coverings, ceilings, drapes, blinds, lighting, plumbing, electrical wiring and ventilation; provided that such costs shall not include the cost of telephone systems and computers (other than electrical wiring costs) and shall not include the cost of fuel cells or photovoltaic modules (including installation) or the cost of new air conditioning equipment using an EPA-approved non-ozone depleting refrigerant or other EPA-approved refrigerant approved by the commissioner of environmental conservation (excluding installation).

(2) “Base building” means all areas of a building not intended for occupancy by a tenant or owner . . .

(2-a) “Credit allowance year” means the later of (a) the taxable year during which the property, construction, completion or rehabilitation referred to [TAX § 19(a)(2) through (7)] has been placed in service or has received a final certificate of occupancy or (b) the first taxable year with respect to which the credit may be claimed pursuant to the initial credit component certificate issued pursuant to [TAX § 19(c)].

(3) “Commissioning” means the testing and fine-tuning of heat, ventilating and air conditioning and other systems to assure proper functioning and adherence to design criteria and the preparation of system operation manuals and instruction of maintenance personnel.

(5) “Economic development area” means an area which is designated (A) an empire zone pursuant to [GML Art. 18B (§§ 955 to 969)] or (B) an empowerment zone or enterprise community pursuant to [Internal Revenue Code § 1391].

(6) “Eligible building” means a building located in this state which is:

(A) classified B2, B3, B4, C1, C2, C5, or C6 for purposes of the [NYS] uniform fire prevention and building code or similarly classified under any subsequent code; provided that any such building contains at least [20,000] square feet of interior space, or

(B) a residential multi-family building with at least twelve dwelling units that contain at least [20,000] square feet of interior space, or

(C) one or more residential multi-family buildings with at least two dwelling units that are part of a single or phased construction project that contains, in the aggregate, at least [20,000] square feet of interior space; provided that in any single phase of such project at least [10,000] square feet of interior space is under construction or rehabilitation, or

(D) any combination of buildings described in [TAX § 19(b)(6)(A), (B), (C)], and

(E) is not a building located on freshwater wetlands or tidal wetlands the construction of which requires a permit under [ECL § 24-0701 or § 25-0403], respectively, of the [ECL], or on wetlands such that the construction thereof requires a permit pursuant to [Federal Clean Water Act § 404] (33 U.S.C. § 1344).

(7) “Energy Code” means the [NYS] Energy Conservation Construction Code.

(8) “Fuel cell” means a device that produces electricity directly from hydrogen or hydrocarbon fuel through a non-combustive electro-chemical process.

(9) “Green base building” means a base building which is part of an eligible building and which meets the following standards:

(A) Energy and energy efficiency.

(i) Energy use is no more than [65%] (in the case of new construction of a base building) or [75%] (in the case of rehabilitation of a base building) of the use permitted under the energy code or, in the event such standard is revised or superseded, energy use shall meet such other energy efficiency standards that DEC, in consultation with NYSERDA, shall establish in regulations promulgated pursuant to [TAX § 19(e)(1)], in effect at the time the base building or rehabilitation thereof is placed in service.

(ii) All appliances and any heating, cooling and water heating equipment used in the base building and subject to the regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with NYSERDA, pursuant to [Tax Law § 19(e)(1)], shall meet the standards established by such regulations in effect at the time the base building or rehabilitation thereof is placed in service.

(B) Zoning, indoor air quality, building materials, finishes and furnishings.

(i) The base building shall comply with all applicable zoning, land use and erosion control requirements, stormwater management ordinances, building code requirements and environmental regulations. In the case of the rehabilitation of an existing building, all existing environmental hazards shall be identified and managed in accordance with applicable laws, regulations and industry guidelines.

(ii) Buildings classified B2, B3, B4, C1, C2, C5, or C6, for purposes of the [NYS] Uniform Fire Prevention and Building Code, or similarly classified under any subsequent code, shall meet the following indoor air quality requirements:

(I) ventilation and exchange of indoor/outdoor air shall meet the standards established by regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with DOH and NYSERDA, pursuant to [TAX § 19(e)(2)];

(II) if smoking is permitted in specific areas of the building, separate air ventilation and circulation shall be provided for smoking and non-smoking areas;

(III) the ventilation system shall include an air purging system that is capable of replacing [100%] of the air on any floor, on a minimum of two floors at a time. The air shall be purged for a period of one week on every floor immediately prior to initial occupancy and on any floor that undergoes renovation immediately prior to re-occupancy; provided that, if a taxpayer obtains certification from a licensed architect, engineer, certified industrial hygienist, or other licensed or certified professional whom the commissioner of environmental conservation shall approve, pursuant to regulations, verifying that off-gassing and any other contamination can be reduced to comparable levels in less than one week, the period of purging may be shortened. The taxpayer shall maintain a copy of such certification in accordance with the provisions of [TAX § 19(d)].

(C) Building fresh air intake shall be located a minimum of [25] feet away from loading areas, building exhaust fans, cooling towers and other point sources of contamination.

(D) During construction or rehabilitation, the ventilation system components and pathways shall be protected from contamination in accordance with an indoor air quality management plan for the construction or rehabilitation process that meets the standards established in regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with DOH and NYSERDA, pursuant to [TAX § 19(e)(2)]. In the event that such areas are not protected from contamination in accordance with such standards, they shall be cleaned prior to occupancy.

(E) A licensed engineer, certified industrial hygienist, or other licensed or certified professional whom the commissioner of environmental conservation shall approve, pursuant to regulations, shall conduct indoor air quality testing with respect to the entire building immediately following occupancy, if any, and on an annual basis, to monitor supply and return air and ambient air for carbon monoxide, carbon dioxide, total volatile organic compounds, radon, and particulate matter. Provided, however, once radon measurements have been found to be satisfactory, subsequent annual testing is not required. The taxpayer shall record baseline readings immediately following occupancy, if any, and annually thereafter. In the event that the taxpayer does not establish that during a taxable year during which any part of the building is occupied, indoor air quality met the standards established in regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with DOH and NYSERDA, pursuant [TAX § 19(e)(2)], the base building shall not constitute a green base building.

(F) The mechanical plant of the building shall be commissioned in accordance with the standards established in regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with NYSERDA, pursuant to [TAX § 19(e)(1)(D)], which standards shall be informed by documents such as ASHRAE G-1 and the United States General Services Administration “Model Commissioning Plan and Guide Specifications]. For purposes of [TAX § 19(b)(9)(F)] the term “ASHRAE” means the American Society of Heating, Refrigerating and Air Conditioning Engineers.

(G) Separate waste disposal chutes or a carousel compactor system for recyclable materials shall be provided for the recycling of waste by occupants, or recycling shall be otherwise facilitated by, at a minimum, providing a readily accessible designated collection area or areas with sufficient space to store recyclable materials separately between collection dates.

(H) All plumbing fixtures in the public areas of the building shall meet the plumbing fixture requirements of the energy policy act of 1992 or any successor provision in effect at the time the building or rehabilitation is placed in service.

(I) Prior to initial occupancy and upon request, the owner of the building shall provide each tenant with (1) written notification of the opportunity to apply for a tax credit pursuant to [TAX § 19] and (2) written guidelines regarding opportunities to improve the energy efficiency and air quality of tenant space and to reduce and recycle waste streams.

(J) All building materials, finishes and furnishings used in the base building and subject to the regulations promulgated by DEC, in consultation with NYSERDA, pursuant to [TAX § 19(e)(3)(A)], shall meet the standards established by such regulations in effect at the time the building or rehabilitation is placed in service; provided further that with respect to furnishings, this requirement shall apply only to newly purchased items.

(K) All tenant space in the building occupied by the owner must be green tenant space.

(10) “Green building” means a building wherein the base building is a green base building and all tenant space is green tenant space.

(11) “Green tenant space” means tenant space in a building if such building is an eligible building and if such tenant space complies with the following requirements: ...

COMMENTARY

The green tenant space requirements have been omitted because for the most part they conform to the “green base building” standards. See TAX § 19(b)(9).

(B) Code requirements, indoor air quality, building materials, finishes and furnishings.

(i) The tenant space shall comply with all applicable building code requirements and environmental regulations and, with respect to projects other than new construction, all existing environmental hazards shall be identified and managed in accordance with applicable laws, regulations and industry guidelines.

(12) “Incremental cost of building-integrated photovoltaic modules” means:

(A) the cost of building-integrated photovoltaic modules and any associated inverter, additional wiring or other electrical equipment or additional mounting or structural materials, less the cost of spandrel glass or other building material that would have been used in the event that building-integrated photovoltaic modules were not installed,

(B) incremental labor costs properly allocable to on-site preparation, assembly and original installation of photovoltaic modules, and

(C) incremental architectural and engineering services and designs and plans directly related to the construction or installation of photovoltaic modules.

(13) “NYSERDA” means the [NYS] Energy Research and Development Authority.

(14) “Qualifying alternate energy sources” means building-integrated and non-building-integrated photovoltaic modules and fuel cells installed to serve the base building or tenant space which have the capability to monitor their ac output, and which are validated upon installation, and annually thereafter, to ensure that such systems meet their design specifications.

(15) “Tenant improvements” means improvements which are necessary or appropriate to support or conduct the business of a tenant or occupying owner.

(16) “Tenant space” means the portion of a building intended for occupancy by a tenant or occupying owner.

[TAX § 19(d)]

(d) Other requirements; miscellaneous.

(1) Record keeping. Each taxpayer shall, for any taxable year for which the green building credit provided for under this [TAX § 19] is claimed, maintain records of the following information:

(A) annual energy consumption for building, base building or tenant space;

(B) annual results of air monitoring;

(C) annual confirmation that the building, base building or tenant space continues to meet requirements regarding smoking areas, if provided;

(D) tenant guidelines referred to in [TAX § 19(b)(9)(I)], if applicable;

(E) all written notification of tenants and requests to remedy any indoor air quality problems;

(F) initial and annual (by month) results of validation of performance of photovoltaic modules and fuel cells; and

(G) certifications as to off-gassing and other contamination, as prescribed in [TAX § 19(b)(9)(B)(ii)(III)], where applicable.

(2) Reporting to DEC. Each taxpayer shall also provide to DEC the information described in [TAX § 19(d)(1)], in the form and at the time prescribed by DEC, such time to be determined in consultation with the commissioner. Such information shall be provided to DEC with respect to each taxable year with respect to which the taxpayer claims a credit under this [TAX § 19].

Taxation—Documentary Tax Stamps

TAX § 1401 Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

[TAX § 1401(c) through (d)(ii)]

(c) “Real property” means every estate or right, legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, in lands, tenements or hereditaments, including buildings, structures and other improvements thereon, which are located in whole or in part within [NYS] . . .

(d) “Consideration” means the price actually paid or required to be paid for the real property or interest therein, including payment for an option or contract to purchase real property, whether or not expressed in the deed and whether paid or required to be paid by money, property, or any other thing of value. It shall include the cancellation or discharge of an indebtedness or obligation. It shall also include the amount of any mortgage, purchase money mortgage, lien or other encumbrance, whether or not the underlying indebtedness is assumed or taken subject to.

(i) In the case of a creation of a leasehold interest or the granting of an option with use and occupancy of real property, consideration shall include but not be limited to the value of the rental and other payments attributable to the use and occupancy of the real property or interest therein, the value of any amount paid for an option to purchase or renew and the value of rental or other payments attributable to the exercise of any option to renew.

(ii) In the case of a creation of a subleasehold interest, consideration shall include but not be limited to the value of the sublease rental payments attributable to the use and occupancy of the real property, the value of any amount paid for an option to renew and the value of rental or other payments attributable to the exercise of any option to renew less the value of the remaining prime lease rental payments required to be made.

[TAX § 1401(d)(iv)]

(iv) In the case of an assignment or surrender of a leasehold interest or the assignment or surrender of an option or contract to purchase real property, consideration shall not include the value of the remaining rental payments required to be made pursuant to the terms of such lease or the amount to be paid for the real property pursuant to the terms of the option or contract being assigned or surrendered.

[TAX § 1401(e) through (h)]

(e) . . . transfer of an interest in real property shall include the creation of a leasehold or sublease only where (i) the sum of the term of the lease or sublease and any options for renewal exceeds [49] years, (ii) substantial capital improvements are or may be made by or for the benefit of the lessee or sublessee and (iii) the lease or sublease is for substantially all of the premises constituting the real property. . . .

(f) “Interest in the real property” includes title in fee, a leasehold interest, a beneficial interest, an encumbrance, development rights, air space and air rights, or any other interest with the right to use or occupancy of real property or the right to receive rents, profits or other income derived from real property. It shall also include an option or contract to purchase real property. It shall not include a right of first refusal to purchase real property.

(g) “Grantor” means the person making the conveyance of real property or interest therein. . . .

(h) “Grantee” means the person who obtains real property or interest therein as a result of a conveyance.

COMMENTARY

NYS imposes its real estate transfer tax on the creation of certain long-term leases but not routine commercial space leases. Where a lease is taxable, the regulations provide for a formula that reflects the net present value of the future rent stream. Net result: the transfer tax on the creation of a long-term ground lease is comparable to the transfer tax on an outright sale, which is a rational result. Leasing-related transactions (assignments, surrenders, buy-outs, etc) often attract a separate tax, and often do not, without regard to the remaining term of the lease. The lines drawn and calculations required are not at all intuitive. Anyone considering one of these transactions should consider the possible transfer tax implications (both NYS and NYC) before becoming legally bound. Those taxes are relatively well documented as compared against some other NYS and NYC taxes. The creative strategist who decides to avoid transfer taxes by recharacterizing payments as purchase price or rent for furniture may succeed—but at the cost of incurring a sales tax, which is even higher.

NYC imposes its own real property transfer tax, which varies significantly from the NYS real estate transfer tax. The NYC tax is discussed below. See NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-2101 and 11-2102. Erie County (Buffalo) imposes a real estate transfer tax very similar to the NYS real estate transfer tax. See TAX art. 31-A, §§ 1424–1437. From approximately August to December of 1999, Nassau County had its own real estate transfer tax. Effective July 1, 1998, and expiring December 31, 2010 (later extended to 2030), five townships in Suffolk County became subject to their own special real estate transfer tax. See Tax art. 31-D, §§ 1449-aa–1449pp. Similar enactments apply in some other metropolitan areas within NYS. See, e.g., TAX §§ (1438-A through 1449-00000) (special transfer taxes for various municipalities and counties, each repeating definitions from the NYS transfer tax and imposing a separate tax with its own expiration date). Chronic budget crises throughout the State will probably produce more such enactments. The preceding discussion does not purport to summarize all nonstatewide transfer taxes presently in effect or anything else about NYS or NYC transfer taxes. Those two taxes add up to a massive body of law requiring special expertise for all but the most straightforward transactions.

[TAX § 1402] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Imposition of tax.

[TAX § 1402(a)]

(a) A tax is hereby imposed on each conveyance of real property or interest therein when the consideration exceeds [$500], at the rate of [$2.00] for each [$500] or fractional part thereof; provided, however, that with respect to...conveyances where the consideration is less than [$500,000], the consideration for the interest conveyed shall exclude the value of any lien or encumbrance remaining thereon at the time of conveyance.

[TAX § 1405-A] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Credit.*

A grantor shall be allowed a credit against the tax due on a conveyance of real property to the extent tax was paid by such grantor on a prior creation of a leasehold of all or a portion of the same real property or on the granting of an option or contract to purchase all or a portion of the same real property, by such grantor. Such credit shall be computed by multiplying the tax paid on the creation of the leasehold or on the granting of the option or contract by a fraction, the numerator of which is the value of the consideration used to compute such tax paid which is not yet due to such grantor on the date of the subsequent conveyance (and which such grantor will not be entitled to receive after such date), and the denominator of which is the total value of the consideration used to compute such tax paid.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2101] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Definitions.*

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2101(2)]

2. "Deed." Any document or writing (other than a will), regardless of where made, executed or delivered, whereby any real property or interest therein is created, vested, granted, bargained, sold, transferred, assigned or otherwise conveyed, including any such document or writing whereby any leasehold interest in real property is granted, assigned or surrendered.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2101(5)]

5. "Real property." Every estate or right, legal or equitable, present or future, vested or contingent, in lands, tenements or hereditaments, which are located in whole or in part within [NYC]....

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2101(9)]

9. "Consideration." The price actually paid or required to be paid for the real property or economic interest therein, without deduction for mortgages, liens and encumbrances, whether or not expressed in the deed or instrument and whether paid or required to be paid by money, property, or any other thing of value. It shall include the cancellation or discharge of an indebtedness or obligation. It shall also include the amount of any mortgage, lien or other encumbrance, whether or not the underlying indebtedness is assumed.

COMMENTARY

The NYC transfer tax varies substantially from the NYS transfer tax. In general, the NYC tax is more burdensome, but it also has some additional exceptions, particularly in the treatment of leases.

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2102] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Imposition of tax.*

[NYC Admin. Code § 11-2102(a)(10)(ii) and (iii)]

a. A tax is hereby imposed on each deed at the time of delivery by a grantor to a grantee when the consideration for the real property and any improvement thereon (whether or not included in the same deed) exceed[s] [$25,000]. The tax shall be:

10. With respect to a grant, assignment or surrender of a leasehold interest in real property made on or after [August 1, 1989], the tax shall be at the following rates:

(ii) at the rate of [1.425%] of the consideration for the granting, assignment or surrender of a leasehold interest in all...[non-residential] real property where the consideration is [$500,000] or less, and at the rate of [2.625%] of the consideration where the consideration for the granting, assignment or surrender of such a leasehold interest is more than [$500,000];

(iii) provided, however, that for purposes of [NYC Admin. Code § 11-2102(ii)], the amount subject to tax in the case of a grant of a leasehold interest shall be only such amount as is not considered rent for purposes of the tax imposed by [NYC Admin. Code §§ 11-701 to 11-718].

COMMENTARY

NYC's real property transfer tax and related filing requirements apply to a wide range of lease-related transactions—including some where no one is making any money and nothing is being recorded and it is intuitively obvious that no transfer tax should apply—and must be considered when taking any action regarding a commercial lease. Secondary resources, such as regulations and (particularly) the tax forms themselves, provide surprisingly extensive guidance on how this tax applies to lease-related transactions. The last quoted paragraph of the statute substantially mitigates the burden this tax creates. (That mitigation applies only for the NYC transfer tax, not the NYS tax, but it apparently applies even for the creation of leases that are exempt from the NYC commercial rent tax.) Some other metropolitan areas in the state also have their own real estate transfer taxes, as noted above.

Tenancy—At Will and Holdovers

[RPL § 232] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Duration of certain agreements in New York.

An agreement for the occupation of real estate in [NYC], which shall not particularly specify the duration of the occupation, shall be deemed to continue until the [October 1] next after the possession commences under the agreement.

COMMENTARY

This statute rarely applies to modern commercial leasing transactions. When it does apply, it means that the parties may be stuck with each other for up to a year, rather than the month-to-month tenancy that they might intuitively expect under these circumstances. Landlords and tenants can avoid these problems by including an expiration date in their leases.

Tenant's Remedies

[RPL § 223-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Remedies of lessee when possession is not delivered.*

In the absence of an express provision to the contrary, there shall be implied in every lease of real property a condition that the lessor will deliver possession at the beginning of the term. In the event of breach of such implied condition the lessee shall have the right to rescind the lease and to recover the consideration paid. Such right shall not be deemed inconsistent with any right of action he may have to recover damages.

COMMENTARY

In addition to statutory provisions on the routine termination of leases and provisions that motivate particular standard language in commercial leases, this section of the New York summary also includes a few statutory provisions on the eviction and lease enforcement process. These statutes are only the tip of the iceberg. Anyone who considers seeking to evict a tenant or to enforce a lease should not proceed without consulting attorneys who toil in those fields every day.

RPL § 223-a bears little relation to the reality of modern commercial leasing, in which a landlord often cannot be sure about when the premises will be available and ready for the tenant. One way to solve the problem is to state in the lease that the term does not begin until the premises are delivered. Even then, counsel is well advised to include an express waiver of this statute, such as:

Tenant waives any right it might have under Real Property Law § 223-a, Landlord's obligates under this Lease on delivery of the Premises constitute "an express provision to the contrary" as Real Property Law § 223-a contemplates.

[RPL § 223-b (5-a)]

5-a. Any lease provision which seeks to assess a fee, penalty or dollar charge, in addition to the stated rent, against a tenant because such tenant files a bona fide complaint with a building code officer regarding the condition of such tenant's leased premises shall be null and void as being against public policy. A landlord who seeks to enforce such a fee, penalty or charge shall be liable to the tenant for triple the amount of such fee, penalty or charge.

COMMENTARY

This recently enacted statute solves a problem that, to the author's knowledge, does not exist, at least in the world of commercial leases. The statute applies to all leases, not just residential ones.

[RPL § 230] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Right of tenants to form, join or participate in tenants' groups.

1. No landlord shall interfere with the right of a tenant to form, join or participate in the lawful activities of any group, committee or other organization formed to protect the rights of tenants; nor shall any landlord harass, punish, penalize, diminish, or withhold any right, benefit or privilege of a tenant under his tenancy for exercising such right.

2. Tenants' groups, committees or other tenants' organizations shall have the right to meet without being required to pay a fee in any location on the premises including a community or social room where use is normally subject to a fee which is devoted to the common use of all tenants in a peaceful manner, at reasonable hours and without obstructing access to the premises or facilities. No landlord shall deny such right.

COMMENTARY

Nothing in this statute indicates it applies only to residential leasing, but commercial tenants are not known to meet regularly in reliance on this statute.

[NYC Admin. Code § 22-901] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

§ 22-901 Definitions. As used in this chapter, the following terms have the following meanings:

Commercial tenant. The term "commercial tenant" means a person or entity lawfully occupying a covered property pursuant to a lease or other rental agreement.

Covered property. The term "covered property" means any building or portion of a building (i) that is lawfully used for buying, selling or otherwise providing goods or services, or for other lawful business, commercial, professional services or manufacturing activities, and (ii) for which a certificate of occupancy authorizing residential use of such building or such portion of a building has not been issued.

Essential service. The term "essential service" means a service that a landlord must furnish to a commercial tenant pursuant to a lease or other rental agreement between such commercial tenant and landlord, or pursuant to applicable law.

Landlord. The term "landlord" means an owner of covered property or such owner's agent.

§ 22-902 Commercial tenant harassment. a. A landlord shall not engage in commercial tenant harassment. Except as provided in [§ 22-902(b)], commercial tenant harassment is any act or omission by or on behalf of a landlord that (i) is intended to cause a commercial tenant to vacate covered property, or to surrender or waive any rights under a lease or other rental agreement or under applicable law in relation to such covered property, and (ii) includes one or more of the following:

1. using force against or making express or implied threats that force will be used against a commercial tenant or such tenant's invitee;
2. causing repeated interruptions or discontinuances of one or more essential services;
3. causing an interruption or discontinuance of an essential service for an extended period of time;
4. causing an interruption or discontinuance of an essential service where such interruption or discontinuance substantially interferes with a commercial tenant's business;

5. repeatedly commencing frivolous court proceedings against a commercial tenant;
6. removing from a covered property any personal property belonging to a commercial tenant or such tenant's invitee;
7. removing the door at the entrance to a covered property occupied by a commercial tenant; removing, plugging or otherwise rendering the lock on such entrance door inoperable; or changing the lock on such entrance door without supplying a key to the new lock to the commercial tenant occupying the covered property;
8. preventing a commercial tenant or such tenant's invitee from entering a covered property occupied by such tenant;
9. substantially interfering with a commercial tenant's business by commencing unnecessary construction or repairs on or near covered property; or
10. engaging in any other repeated or enduring acts or omissions that substantially interfere with the operation of a commercial tenant's business.

b. A landlord's lawful termination of a tenancy, lawful refusal to renew or extend a lease or other rental agreement, or lawful reentry and repossession of the covered property shall not constitute commercial tenant harassment for purposes of this chapter.

§ 22-903 Private right of action. a. A commercial tenant may bring an action in any court of competent jurisdiction for a claim of commercial tenant harassment. If a court of competent jurisdiction finds that a landlord has engaged in commercial tenant harassment in relation to such commercial tenant, the court shall impose a civil penalty in an amount not less than [$1,000] and not more than [$10,000] for each covered property in which such commercial tenant has been the subject of commercial tenant harassment and may further:

1. issue an order restraining the landlord from engaging in commercial tenant harassment and directing the landlord to ensure that no further violation occurs; and

2. award such other relief as the court deems appropriate, including but not limited to injunctive relief, equitable relief, compensatory damages, punitive damages and reasonable attorneys' fees and court costs.

b. The commercial tenant shall not be relieved of the obligation to pay any rent for which the commercial tenant is otherwise liable. Any monetary remedy awarded to a commercial tenant pursuant to subdivision a of this section shall be reduced by any amount of delinquent rent or other sum for which a court finds such commercial tenant is liable to the landlord.

c. This section does not limit or abrogate any claim or cause of action a person has under common law or by statute. The provisions of this section are in addition to any such common law and statutory remedies.

d. Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed as creating any cause of action for a commercial tenant's invitee.

e. Nothing contained in this chapter shall be construed as creating any private right of action against the city or any agency or employee thereof.

§ 22-904 Affirmative defenses. It is an affirmative defense to an allegation of commercial tenant harassment of the kind described in [§ 22-902(a)] 2, 3, 4, 6, 7, 8, 9 and 10 that (i) such condition or service interruption was not intended to cause any commercial tenant to vacate a covered property or waive or surrender any rights in relation to such covered property, and (ii) the landlord acted in good faith in a reasonable manner to promptly correct such condition or service interruption, including providing notice to all affected lawful tenants in a covered property of such efforts, where appropriate.

Commentary

This statute, enacted in 2016, is based on a similar statute to protect residential tenants. In its wisdom, the City Council did not see fit to enact a statute to protect commercial landlords from harassment by commercial tenants through strategic use of the court system. In general, this new statute gives commercial tenants even more ammunition against their landlords. It was very kind of the City Council to acknowledge that a commercial landlord would not be charged with “harassment” as a result of refusing to renew an expiring lease. And, of course, even when the City acts as a commercial landlord, it’s exempt from the statute.

Termination of Tenancies

[RPL § 227]

CROSS-REFERENCE

See “Damage and Destruction.”

[RPL § 228] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Termination of tenancies at will or by sufferance, by notice.

A tenancy at will or by sufferance, however created, may be terminated by a written notice of not less than [30] days given in behalf of the landlord, to the tenant, requiring him to remove from the premises; which notice must be served, either by delivering to the tenant or to a person of suitable age and discretion, residing upon the premises, or if neither the tenant nor such a person can be found, by affixing it upon a conspicuous part of the premises, where it may be conveniently read. At the expiration of [30] days after the service of such notice, the landlord may re-enter, maintain an action to recover possession, or proceed, in the manner prescribed by law, to remove the tenant, without further or other notice to quit.

COMMENTARY

This statute means that a tenant at will or by sufferance will receive the same notice as a tenant from month to month. Only when that notice expires may the landlord commence an action to evict the tenant. The eviction action may itself take a long time to resolve, particularly in NYC. Given the very technical requirements of landlord-tenant law, a landlord should not even give the RPL § 228 notice without consulting New York landlord-tenant counsel.

[RPL § 232-a] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Notice to terminate monthly tenancy or tenancy from month to month in [NYC].

No monthly tenant, or tenant from month to month, shall hereafter be removed from any lands or buildings in [NYC] on the grounds of holding over his term unless at least [30] days before the expiration of the term the landlord or his agent serve upon the tenant, in the same manner in which a notice of petition in summary proceedings is now allowed to be served by law, a notice in writing to the effect that the landlord elects to terminate the tenancy and that unless the tenant removes from such premises on the day on which his term expires the landlord will commence summary proceedings under the statute to remove such tenant therefrom.

COMMENTARY

In NYC, this statute requires any landlord under a month-to-month tenancy to serve any notice of termination as if it were a “notice of petition in summary proceedings.” See “Landlord’s Remedies.”

[RPL § 232-b]

Notification to terminate monthly tenancy or tenancy from month to month outside [NYC].

A monthly tenancy or tenancy from month to month of any lands or buildings located outside of [NYC] may be terminated by the landlord or the tenant upon his notifying the other at least one month before the expiration of the term of his election to terminate; provided, however, that no notification shall be necessary to terminate a tenancy for a definite term.

COMMENTARY

Under this statute, a landlord outside NYC does not need to comply with the very specific and technical service requirements for a summary proceeding against the tenant. The landlord must merely give notice.

[RPL § 232-c]

Holding over by a tenant after expiration of a term longer than one month; effect of acceptance of rent.

Where a tenant whose term is longer than one month holds over after the expiration of such term, such holding over shall not give to the landlord the option to hold the tenant for a new term solely by virtue of the tenant's holding over. In the case of such a holding over by the tenant, the landlord may proceed, in any manner permitted by law, to remove the tenant, or, if the landlord shall accept rent for any period subsequent to the expiration of such term, then, unless an agreement either express or implied is made providing otherwise, the tenancy created by the acceptance of such rent shall be a tenancy from month to month commencing on the first day after the expiration of such term.

COMMENTARY

Absent this statute, the common law rule may say that if the tenant stays and pays, and the landlord accepts the payment, then the lease is automatically renewed for the same term as its original term. This statute instead creates a month-to-month tenancy, which presumably must be terminated according to the same procedures as any other month-to-month tenancy. This statute also leaves open the possibility for landlord and tenant to reach “an agreement either express or implied” inconsistent with the quoted language.

Torrens System

[RPL § 436] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Termination of title registration procedures.

[RPL § 436(4) through (6)]

4. On and after [January 1, 1997],²⁹ the registrar shall refuse to accept for registration any instrument that is a voluntary instrument. Instead of accepting such instruments for registration, the registrar shall upon payment of the statutory recording fee, deliver to the county clerk, or in the counties of Bronx, Kings, Queens and New York, the register for recording each current certificate of title to all lands affected by that voluntary or adverse instrument. Before delivering the certificate, the registrar shall memorialize or note on the certificate any instruments relating to incumbrances, charges, trusts, liens and transfers that have been filed with the registrar that have not been memorialized or noted. A certificate of title shall be delivered in the form required for recording.

5. On or before [January 1, 2000], the registrar shall deliver to the county clerk, or in the counties of Bronx, Kings, Queens and New York, the register for recording the certificates of title of all remaining land which was previously registered under this article. Before delivering those certificates, the registrar shall memorialize or note on the certificates any instruments relating to incumbrances, charges, trusts, liens and transfers that have been filed with the registrar and that have not yet been memorialized or noted. A certificate of title shall be delivered in the form required for recording.

6. As of the date of recording of certificates delivered pursuant to [RPL § 436(4) or (5)], the recorded certificates shall be subject only to incumbrances, charges, trusts, liens and transfers as may be memorialized or noted on the certificate, and free from all others except those set forth in [RPL § 400].

After the recording of certificates which are delivered under [RPL § 436(4) and (5)], title to lands shall be conveyed or encumbered in the same manner as set forth in [RPL art. 9 (§§ 290–336)]. All instruments noted or memorialized on the certificates of title so recorded shall have the same force and effect as if they were filed with the county clerk, or in the counties of Bronx, Kings, Queens and New York, the register at the time they were noted or were otherwise memorialized on the certificates of title. No instrument, however, that was filed, docketed or recorded by the county clerk, or in the counties of Bronx, Kings, Queens and New York, the register, but that was not duly registered, shall become a lien, incumbrance, trust or charge against any title which was delivered pursuant to [RPL § 436(4) and (5)], unless such instrument was filed, recorded or docketed after the date such title was recorded, provided, however, that a [judgment] docketed by the county clerk prior to the time a certificate of title was recorded shall be valid as against such land if the landowner received notice of such judgment.

COMMENTARY

RPL §§ 370–435 established a system for Torrens registration of title to real property. That system was used only to a rather limited degree. Under the quoted statute, NYS was to have terminated its Torrens system.

Transfers—Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act

[No applicable statute]

COMMENTARY

New York has not adopted the Uniform Fraudulent Transfer Act and instead has adopted requirements described in DCL §§ 270–281. See “Fraudulent Conveyances.”

Trustee as Owner of Property

[EPTL § 11-1.1] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Fiduciaries’ powers.

[EPTL § 11-1.1(b)(5)]

(b) In the absence of contrary or limiting provisions in the court order or decree appointing a fiduciary, or in a subsequent order or decree, or in the will, deed or other instrument, every fiduciary is authorized:

5. With respect to any property or any estate therein owned by an estate or trust, except where such property or any estate therein is specifically disposed of:

(A) To take possession of, collect the rents from and manage the same.

(B) To sell the same at public or private sale, and on such terms as in the opinion of the fiduciary will be most advantageous to those interested therein.

(C) With respect to fiduciaries other than a trustee, to lease the same for a term not exceeding three years and, in the case of a trustee, to lease the same for a term not exceeding [10] years although such term extends beyond the duration of the trust and, in either of such cases, including the right to explore for and remove mineral or other natural resources, and in connection with mineral leases to enter into pooling and unitization agreements.

(D) To mortgage the same.

(E) Any power to take possession of, collect the rent from, manage, sell, lease or mortgage, granted by this [EPTL § 11-1.1(b)(5)], which is prohibited by the terms of the will, deed or other instrument or by the provisions of this [EPTL § 11-1.1(b)(5)], nonetheless exists, upon the approval of the surrogate, where such power is necessary for the purposes set forth in [Surrogate Court Procedure Act § 1902].

(F) A fiduciary acting under a will may exercise all of the powers granted by this [EPTL § 11-1.1(b)(5)] notwithstanding the effect upon such will of the birth of a child after its execution or of any election by a surviving spouse.

[SCPA § 1507] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Authority to mortgage, sell, lease[,] or exchange.

[SCPA §1507(1)]

1. In any case in which the power to mortgage, sell, lease or exchange real property does not exist under the provisions of [EPTL § 11-1.1] or for other reasons it is for the best interests of the trust, the court of the county having jurisdiction of the trust may on such terms and conditions as seem just and proper authorize any testamentary trustee to mortgage, sell, lease or exchange real property or any part thereof belonging to the trust.

[RPAPL § 1601] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Application by trustee for court authorization to mortgage, to lease, to sell, to acquire or to exchange real property or for confirmation of a lease of real property.

[RPAPL § 1601(1)]

1. When the assets of a trust include an interest in real property, the trustee may apply to the court designated in [RPAPL § 1603], and in the case of a testamentary trust, to the court having jurisdiction thereof, for an order authorizing such trustee to mortgage, to lease or to sell such real property or a part thereof; or to acquire land adjacent to such real property or to exchange a portion of such real property for lands adjacent to such real property when either such acquisition or exchange would tend to improve the boundary lines of such real property; or to confirm a lease for a term longer than [10] years made by a trustee of such real property without obtaining prior authorization by a court.

Unconscionability

[RPL § 235-c] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Unconscionable lease or clause.*

1. If the court as a matter of law finds a lease or any clause of the lease to have been unconscionable at the time it was made the court may refuse to enforce the lease, or it may enforce the remainder of the lease without the unconscionable clause, or it may so limit the application of any unconscionable clause as to avoid any unconscionable result.

2. When it is claimed or appears to the court that a lease or any clause thereof may be unconscionable the parties shall be afforded a reasonable opportunity to present evidence as to its setting, purpose and effect to aid the court in making the determination.

COMMENTARY

This statute has spawned a reasonable number of reported cases, mostly (though not entirely) relating to residential leases. In the reported cases courts have, for example, invalidated these ordinary lease clauses: (a) an attorneys' fees clause (because the type was too small); (b) a commercial tenant's waiver of counterclaims and defenses against an eviction action; and (c) a clause saying that landlord's acceptance of keys would not be deemed a surrender. A court also applied this statute in a case where a commercial lease allowed the landlord to discontinue furnishing electricity—but the landlord had exercised that right against only one tenant, apparently to retaliate against that tenant for something. The statute does not, however, seem to have opened the floodgates of litigation on commercial leases.

[NYC Admin. Code § 22-505] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Displaced Building Service Workers.

a. For purposes of this section, the following terms have the following meanings:

Building service. The term “building service” means work performed in connection with the care or maintenance of an existing building and includes, but is not limited to, work performed by a watchman, guard, security officer, fire safety director, doorman, building cleaner, porter, handyman, janitor, gardener, groundskeeper, stationary fireman, elevator operator and starter, window cleaner, and superintendent.

Building service contract. The term “building service contract” means a contract for the furnishing of building services, and includes any subcontracts for such services.

Building service employee. The term “building service employee” means any person employed to perform a building service who has been regularly assigned to a building on a full or part-time basis for at least ninety days immediately preceding any transition in employment subject to this section except for (i) persons who are managerial, supervisory, or confidential employees, provided that this exemption shall not apply to building superintendents or resident managers; (ii) persons earning in excess of thirty-five dollars per hour from a covered employer, provided that this amount shall be adjusted on January 1, 2017 and annually thereafter by the mayor's office of labor standards based upon the preceding twelve-month percentage increase, if any, in the consumer price index for all urban consumers for all items, as published by the bureau of labor statistics of the United States Department of Labor; and (iii) persons regularly scheduled to work fewer than eight hours per week at a building.

City of New York. The term “city of New York” means any city, county or borough, administration, department, division, bureau, board or commission, or a corporation, institution or agency of government the expenses of which are paid in whole or in part from the city treasury.

Covered employer. The term “covered employer” means any person who hires or retains building service employees or a building service contractor, including, but not limited to, a lessee of commercial space, housing cooperative, condominium association, building managing agent, or any other person who owns, leases or manages real property, either on its own behalf or for another person, within the city of New York, provided, however, that the requirements of this section shall not apply (i) to residential buildings of less than 50 units, (ii) to commercial office, institutional or retail buildings of less than 100,000 square feet, (iii) to any lessee of commercial office space whose leasehold is less than 35,000 square feet, or (iv) to the extent that such requirements conflict with section 162 of the state finance law.

Former building service contractor. The term “former building service contractor” means any person who furnishes building services pursuant to a building service contract prior to a termination of such contract.

Person. The term “person” means any individual, proprietorship, partnership, joint venture, corporation, limited liability company, trust, association, or other entity that may employ persons or enter into service contracts, but does not include the city of New York, the state of New York, and the federal government or any other governmental entity, or any individual or entity managing real property for a governmental entity.

“Successor employer” means a covered employer that (i) has been awarded a building service contract to provide, in whole or in part, building services that are substantially similar to those provided under a service contract that has recently been terminated, or (ii) has purchased or acquired control of a property in which building service employees were employed.

Successor building service contractor. The term “successor building service contractor” means any person who, pursuant to a contract, furnishes building services that are substantially similar to those that were provided under a terminated building service contract or to those that were provided by building service employees previously employed by a covered employer.

b. Terminated Building Service Contract.

1. No less than 15 calendar days before terminating any building service contract or, in the situation where such contract covers multiple buildings, terminating such contractor as to one or more buildings, any covered employer shall request the former building service contractor to provide, any covered employer or the successor building service contractor, whichever person intends to furnish substantially similar services to those that were provided under the terminated building service contract, a full and accurate list containing the name, address, date of hire and employment classification of each building service employee employed at the buildings covered by the terminated contract. The former building service contractor shall provide such list within 72 hours of receipt of the request from the covered employer. At the same time that the former building service contractor provides such list, the former building service contractor shall post the list in a notice to the building service employees that also sets forth the rights provided by this section, in the same location and manner that other statutorily required notices to employees are posted at the affected building. Such notice shall also be provided to the employees’ collective bargaining representative, if any.

2. Upon termination of a building service contract, any covered employer or the successor building service contractor, whichever person intends to furnish substantially similar building services to those that were provided under the terminated building service contract, shall retain those building service employees employed at the buildings covered by the terminated building service contract for a 90-day transition period.

3. If at any time the covered employer or successor building service contractor, whichever person intends to furnish substantially similar building services to those that were provided under the terminated building service contract, determines that fewer building service employees are required to perform building services at the affected buildings than had been performing such services by the former building service contractor, the covered employer or the successor building service contractor shall retain the building service employees by seniority within job classification; provided, that during the 90-day transition period, the successor employer shall maintain a preferential hiring list of those building service employees not retained at the building(s) who shall be given a right of first refusal to any jobs within their classifications that become available during that period.

4. Except as provided in paragraph 3 of this subdivision during the 90-day transition period, the covered employer or successor building service contractor, whichever person intends to furnish substantially similar building services to those that were provided under the terminated building service contract, shall not discharge without cause a building service employee retained pursuant to this section.

5. At the end of the 90-day transition period, the covered employer or successor building service contractor, whichever person intends to furnish substantially similar building services to those that were provided under the terminated building service contract, shall perform a written performance evaluation for each building service employee retained pursuant to this section. If such employee's performance during such 90-day transition period is satisfactory, the covered employer or successor building service contractor shall offer such employee continued employment under the terms and conditions established by the covered employer or successor building service contractor

6. For purposes of this subdivision, "covered employer" includes any person to which a controlling interest in the affected building has been or is being transferred.

c. Transfer of Controlling Interest

1. No less than 15 calendar days before transferring a controlling interest in any building in which building services employees are employed, the covered employer who is transferring the controlling interest in such building shall provide to the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred a full and accurate list containing the name, address, date of hire and employment classification of each building service employee employed at the buildings covered by the transfer of such controlling interest. At the same time, the covered employer who is transferring the controlling interest in such building shall post such list in a notice to its building service employees that also sets forth the rights provided by this section, in the same location and manner that other statutorily required notices to employees are posted at the affected building. Such notice shall also be provided to the employees' collective bargaining representative, if any.

2. The covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred shall retain those building service employees employed at the buildings covered by the transfer of the controlling interest for a 90-day transition employment period.

3. If at any time the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred determines that fewer building service employees are required to perform building services at the affected buildings than had been performing such services for the covered employer who is transferring the controlling interest, the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred shall retain the building service employees by seniority within job classification; provided, that during the 90-day transition period, such covered employer maintain a preferential hiring list of those building service employees not retained at the buildings who shall be given a right of first refusal to any jobs within their classifications that become available during that period.

4. Except as provided in paragraph 3 of this subdivision, during the 90-day transition period, the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred shall not discharge without cause a building service employee retained pursuant to this section.

5. At the end of the 90-day transition period, the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred shall perform a written performance evaluation for each employee retained pursuant to this section. If such employee's performance during such 90-day transition period is satisfactory, the covered employer to which the controlling interest is being transferred shall offer such employee continued employment under the terms and conditions established by the covered employer.

d. Entering into a Building Service Contract.

1. No less than 15 calendar days before entering into a building service contract, the covered employer that will enter into such contract shall provide to the successor building service contractor a full and accurate list containing the name, address, date of hire, and employment classification of each building service employee who is currently performing those services. At the same time the covered employer that will enter into such contract provides such list, such employer shall post a notice to the building service employees that also sets forth the rights provided by this section in the same location and manner that other statutorily required notices to employees are posted at the affected building. Such notice shall also be provided to the employees' collective bargaining representative, if any.

2. The successor building service contractor shall retain those building service employees who were providing those services for a covered employer for a 90-day transition employment period.

3. If at any time the successor building service contractor determines that fewer building service employees are required to perform building services at the affected building than had been performing such services for the covered employer, the successor building service contractor shall retain the building service employees by seniority within job classification; provided, that during the 90-day transition period, the successor building service contractor shall maintain a preferential hiring list of those building service employees not retained at the buildings who shall be given a right of first refusal to any jobs within their classifications that become available during that period.

4. Except as provided in paragraph 3 of this subdivision, during the 90-day transition period, the successor building service contractor shall not discharge without cause an employee retained pursuant to this section.

5. At the end of the 90-day transition period, the successor building service contractor shall perform a written performance evaluation for each building service employee retained pursuant to this section. If such employee's performance during such 90-day transition period is satisfactory, the successor building service contractor shall offer such employee continued employment under the terms and conditions established by such contractor.

e. Remedies

1. A building service employee who has been discharged or not retained in violation of this section may bring an action in supreme court against a former building service contractor, covered employer or successor building service contractor for violation of any obligation imposed pursuant to this section.

2. The court shall have authority to order preliminary and permanent equitable relief, including, but not limited to, reinstatement of any employee who has been discharged or not retained in violation of this section.

3. If the court finds that by reason of a violation of any obligation imposed pursuant to subdivision b, c, or d of this section a building service employee has been discharged or not retained in violation of this section, it shall award:

(a) Back pay, and an equal amount as liquidated damages, for each day during which the violation continues, which shall be calculated at a rate of compensation not less than the higher of (1) the average regular rate of pay received by the employee during the last three years of the employee's employment in the same occupation classification; or (2) the final regular rate received by the employee. Back pay shall apply to the period commencing with the date of the discharge or refusal-to-retain by the covered employer or successor building service contractor through the effective date of any offer of reinstatement or reinstatement of the employee.

(b) Costs of benefits the covered employer or successor building service contractor would have incurred for the employee under such employee's benefits plan.

(c) The building service employee's reasonable attorney's fees and costs.

4. In any such action, the court shall have authority to order the covered employer or the former building service contractor, as applicable, to provide any information required pursuant to subdivision b, c or d of this section.

f. The provisions of this section shall not apply to the following:

1. any covered employer or successor building service contractor that, on or before the effective date of a termination of a building service contract, agrees to assume, or to be bound by, the collective bargaining agreement of the former building service contractors, provided that the collective bargaining agreement provides terms and conditions for the discharge or laying off of employees;

2. any covered employer to which a controlling interest in a building is being transferred that, on or before the effective date of the transfer of such controlling interest, agrees to assume, or to be bound by, the collective bargaining agreement of the covered employer that is transferring the controlling interest, provided that the collective bargaining agreement provides terms and conditions for the discharge or laying off of employees;

3. any successor building service contractor that, on or before the effective date of the entering into a building service contract by a covered employer, agrees to assume or to be bound by, the collective bargaining agreement of the covered employer, provided that the collective bargaining agreement provides terms and conditions for the discharge or laying off of employees;

4. if there was no existing collective bargaining agreement as described in paragraphs 1, 2, or 3 of this subdivision, any covered employer or successor building service contractor that agrees, on or before the effective date of the termination of the contract, transfer of a controlling interest, or entering into a building service contract, to enter into a new collective bargaining agreement covering its building service employees, provided that the collective bargaining agreement provides terms and conditions for the discharge or laying off of employees;

5. any covered employer or successor building service contractors (iii) to any successor employer whose building service employees will be accreted to a bargaining unit with a pre-existing collective bargaining agreement, provided that the collective bargaining agreement provides terms and conditions for the discharge or laying off of employees; or

6. any covered employer or former building service contractor that obtains a written commitment from a covered employer or successor building service contractor that the covered employer or successor building service contractor's building service employees will be covered by a collective bargaining agreement falling within paragraphs (1) through (5) of this subdivision.

COMMENTARY

After the attacks of September 11th, NYC enacted this legislation for the stated purpose of preserving low wage maintenance and janitorial jobs in a then temporarily dipping real estate market. The statute achieves this by, in essence, giving building staff the right to travel with the real estate upon a sale, just like a prior encumbrance (though the right lasts only 90 days) The statute says an owner can prevent that result only by signing up with the janitors' union. In 2016, the City Council extended the statute to reach more job categories; to broaden the definition of employer to include tenants that hire building service employees; and to provide for liquidated damages and reinstatement of wronged employees. Although this statute does not directly affect leases themselves, it is an important recent addition to the legal environment for landlords and might best be categorized here.

Use

[RPL § 231]

Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Lease, when void; liability of landlord where premises are occupied for unlawful purpose.

1. Whenever the lessee or occupant other than the owner of any building or premises, shall use or occupy the same, or any part thereof, for any illegal trade, manufacture or other business, the lease or agreement for the letting or occupancy of such building or premises, or any part thereof shall thereupon become void, and the landlord of such lessee or occupant may enter upon the premises so let or occupied.

2. The owner of real property, knowingly leasing or giving possession of the same to be used or occupied, wholly or partly, for any unlawful trade, manufacture or business, or knowingly permitting the same to be so used, is liable severally, and also jointly with one or more of the tenants or occupants thereof, for any damage resulting from such unlawful use, occupancy, trade, manufacture or business.

3. For the purposes of this [RPL § 231], two or more convictions of any person or persons had, within a period of one year, for any of the offenses described in [PL §§ 230.00, 230.05, 230.20, 230.25, 230.30, or 230.40], arising out of conduct engaged in at the same premises consisting of a dwelling as that term is defined in [MDL § 4(4)], shall be presumptive evidence of unlawful use of such premises and of the owner's knowledge of the same.

4. Any lease or agreement hereafter executed for the letting or occupancy of real property or any portion thereof, to be used by the lessee as a residence, which contains therein a provision pledging personal property exempt by law from levy and sale by virtue of an execution, as security for the payment of rent due or to become due thereunder, is void as to such provision.

5. The attorney general may commence an action or proceeding in the supreme court to enjoin the continued unlawful trade, manufacture or business in such premises.

6. For the purposes of this [RPL § 231], two or more convictions of any person or persons had, within a period of one year, for any of the offenses described in [PL § 225.00, 225.05, 225.10, 225.15, 225.20, 225.30, 225.32, 225.35, or 225.40], arising out of conduct engaged in at the same premises consisting of a dwelling as that term is defined in [MDL § 4(4)] shall be presumptive evidence of unlawful use of such premises and of the owner's knowledge of the same.

7. Any owner or tenant, including a tenant of one or more rooms of an apartment house, tenement house or multiple dwelling of any premises within [200] feet of the demised real property, may commence an action or proceeding in supreme court to enjoin the continued unlawful trade, manufacture or other business in such premises.

[RPL § 235] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Wilful violations.

[RPL § 235(1)]

1. Any lessor, agent, manager, superintendent or janitor of any building, or part thereof, the lease or rental agreement whereof by its terms, expressed or implied, requires the furnishing of hot or cold water, heat, light, power, elevator service, telephone service or any other service or facility to any occupant of said building, who wilfully or intentionally fails to furnish such water, heat, light, power, elevator service, telephone service or other service or facility at any time when the same are necessary to the proper or customary use of such building, or part thereof, or any lessor, agent, manager, superintendent or janitor who wilfully and intentionally interferes with the quiet enjoyment of the leased premises by such occupant, is guilty of a violation.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.1]Statutory Excerpt or Summary

General.

The energy and water use of city buildings and covered buildings shall be benchmarked in accordance with this [NYC Admin. Code ch. 28, art. 309 (§§ 1 to 10)].

COMMENTARY

The Energy Benchmark Law went into effect on March 1, 2011, requiring more than 20,000 NYC landlords to submit annual reports of their tenants' energy and water consumption. The goal is to document energy consumption, with the idea of reducing consumption over time. Failure to comply can trigger penalties for landlords.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.2] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Definitions.

As used in this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 28-309.1–28-309.10], the following terms shall have the following meanings:

BENCHMARK. To input and submit to the benchmarking tool the total use of energy and water for a building for the previous calendar year and other descriptive information for such building as required by the benchmarking tool.

COVERED BUILDING. As it appears in the records of the [Department of Finance]: (i) a building that exceeds 50,000 gross square feet, (ii) two or more buildings on the same tax lot that together exceed 100,000 gross square feet, or (iii) two or more buildings held in the condominium form of ownership that are governed by the same board of managers and that together exceed 100,000 gross square feet.

Exception: The term “covered building” shall not include:

1. Any building that is a city building.
2. Any building that is owned by the city.
3. Real property classified as class one pursuant to subdivision one of [RPTL § 1802].

DWELLING UNIT. A single unit consisting of one or more habitable rooms, occupied or arranged to be occupied as a unit separate from all other units within a building, and used primarily for residential purposes and not primarily for professional or commercial purposes.

ENERGY. Electricity, natural gas, fuel oil and steam.

OWNER. The owner of record, provided that “owner” shall be deemed to include: (i) the net lessee in the case of a building subject to a net lease with a term of at least [49] years, inclusive of all renewal options, (ii) the board of managers in the case of a condominium, and (iii) the board of directors in the case of a cooperative apartment corporation.

TENANT. Any tenant, tenant-stockholder of a cooperative apartment corporation, condominium unit owner or other occupant.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Benchmarking required for covered buildings.

The owner of a covered building shall annually benchmark such covered building no later than May 1, 2011, and no later than every May [1] thereafter. Benchmarking of water use shall not be required unless the building was equipped with automatic meter reading equipment by the [Department of Environmental Protection] for the entirety of the previous calendar year. The owner or the owner's representative performing the benchmarking shall consult with the operating staff of the building, as appropriate.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.1]

Obligation to request and to report information.

Where a unit or other space in a covered building, other than a dwelling unit, is occupied by a tenant and such unit or space is separately metered by a utility company, the owner of such building shall request from such tenant information relating to such tenant's separately metered energy use for the previous calendar year and such tenant shall report such information to such owner.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.1.1]Owner solicitation of tenant information.

Such owner shall request information relating to such tenant's separately metered energy use for the previous calendar year no earlier than January [1] and no later than January [31] of any year in which the owner is required to benchmark such building. The office of long-term planning and sustainability may require that such owner provide such tenant with a form designated by the office of long-term planning and sustainability to report such information.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.1.2]Tenant reporting of information.

Such tenant shall report information relating to such tenant's separately metered energy use for the previous calendar year no later than February [15] of any year in which the owner is required to benchmark such building. Such information shall be reported in a form and manner determined by the [Office of Long-term Planning and Sustainability].

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.1.3]Provision of information prior to vacating a unit or other space.

Where such owner receives notice that such tenant intends to vacate such unit or other space before reporting information in accordance with [NYC Admin. Code §§ 28-309.4.1 and 28-309.4.1.2], such owner shall request information relating to such tenant's energy use for any period of occupancy relevant to such owner's obligation to benchmark. Any such tenant shall report such information to the owner of such building prior to vacating such unit or other space or, if such information is not available prior to vacating such unit or other space, as soon as practicable thereafter, regardless of whether such owner has requested information pursuant to this [NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4]. Such information shall be reported in a form and manner determined by the office of long-term planning and sustainability.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.1.4]Continuing obligation to benchmark.

The failure of any or all tenants to report the information required by [NYC Admin. Code §§ 28-309.4.1, 28-309.4.1.2, and 28-309.4.1.3] to the owner shall not relieve such owner of the obligation to benchmark pursuant to this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 28-309.1–28-309.10], provided that such owner shall not be required to benchmark such information not reported by a tenant unless otherwise available to such owner.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.2]Preservation of documents, inspection, and audit.

Owners of covered buildings shall maintain such records as the [Department of Environmental Protection] determines are necessary for carrying out the purposes of this [NYC Admin. Code §§ 28-309.1–28-309.10], including but not limited to energy and water bills and reports or forms received from tenants. Such records shall be preserved for a period of three years, provided that the commissioner may consent to their destruction within that period or may require that such records be preserved longer than such period. At the request of the [Department of Environmental Protection], such records shall be made available for inspection and audit by the [Department of Environmental Protection] the place of business of the owner or at the offices of the [Department of Environmental Protection] during normal business hours.

[NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4.3]Violations.

It shall be unlawful for the owner of a covered building to fail to benchmark pursuant to [NYC Admin. Code § 28-309.4]. The commissioner shall classify such violation as a lesser violation.

Venue

[RPAPL § 701] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Jurisdiction; courts; venue.

1. A special proceeding to recover real property may be maintained in a county court, the court of a police justice of the village, a justice court, a court of civil jurisdiction in a city, or a district court.
2. The place of trial of the special proceeding shall be within the jurisdictional area of the court in which the real property or a portion thereof is situated; except that where the property is located in an incorporated village which includes parts of two or more towns, the proceeding may be tried by a justice of the peace of any such town who keeps an office in the village.

[RPAPL § 769] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Jurisdiction; court; venue.

1. A special proceeding by tenants of a dwelling in [NYC] or the countries of Nassau, Suffolk, Rockland and Westchester for a judgment directing the deposit of rents into court and their use for the purpose of remedying conditions dangerous to life, health or safety may be maintained in the civil court of [NYC], the district court of the countries of Suffolk and Nassau and the courts or city courts in the countries of Rockland and Westchester.
2. The place of trial of the special proceeding shall be within the county in which the real property or a portion thereof from which the rents issue is situated.

Waiver of Jury Trial

[RPL § 259-c] Statutory Excerpt or Summary

Provision in lease of real property for waiver of trial by jury in actions for personal injury or property damage. Any provision in a lease, executed after [July 2, 1965],³⁰ that a trial by jury is waived in any action, proceeding or counterclaim brought by either of the parties thereto against the other in any action for personal injury or property damage, is null and void.

COMMENTARY

This statute may partly invalidate jury trial waivers in New York commercial leases, depending on the exact scope and waiver of the particular jury trial waiver. If landlord's or tenant's counsel is issuing an opinion on enforceability of the lease, which rarely happens, then perhaps the opinion should raise an exception for this statute. Nothing indicates this statute applies only to residential leases.

Zoning Lot

[NYC Zoning Resolution § 12-10] Statutory Excerpt or Summary*Definitions.*

A “zoning lot” is either:

(d) a tract of land, either unsubdivided or consisting of two or more lots of record contiguous for a minimum of [10] linear feet, located within a single block, which at the time of filing for a building permit (or, if no building permit is required, at the time of filing for a certificate of occupancy) is declared to be a tract of land to be treated as one zoning lot for the purpose of this [NYC Zoning Resolution § 12-10]. Such declaration shall be made in one written Declaration of Restrictions covering all of such tract of land or in separate written Declarations of Restrictions covering parts of such tract of land and which in the aggregate cover the entire tract of land comprising the zoning lot. Any Declaration of Restrictions or Declarations of Restrictions which individually or collectively cover a tract of land are referred to herein as “Declarations.” Each Declaration shall be executed by each party in interest (as defined herein) in the portion of such tract of land covered by such Declaration (excepting any such party as shall have waived its right to execute such Declaration in a written instrument executed by such party in recordable form and recorded at or prior to the recording of the Declaration). Each Declaration and waiver of right to execute a Declaration shall be recorded in the Conveyances Section of the Office of the City Register or, if applicable, the County Clerk’s Office of the county in which such tract of land is located, against each lot of record constituting a portion of the land covered by such Declaration.

COMMENTARY

A zoning lot, therefore, may or may not coincide with a lot as shown on the official tax map of [NYC], or on any recorded subdivision plat or deed.

(f) For purposes of the [foregoing]:

(4) A “party in interest” in the portion of the tract of land covered by a Declaration shall [include] only (W) the fee owner or owners thereof, (X) the holder of any enforceable recorded interest in all or part thereof which would be superior to the Declaration and which could result in such holder obtaining possession of any portion of such tract of land, (Y) the holder of any enforceable recorded interest in all or part thereof which would be adversely affected by the Declaration, and (Z) the holder of any unrecorded interest in all or part thereof which would be superior to and adversely affected by the Declaration and which would be disclosed by a physical inspection of the portion of the tract of land covered by the Declaration.

COMMENTARY

By creating a merged “zoning lot” of the type described in the quoted language from the zoning resolution, property owners can move unused development potential (i.e., value) from one parcel to another. The quoted language means that for some leases, particularly recorded ground leases of an entire building, a property owner will need a tenant’s signature as part of a zoning lot merger. To avoid that problem, landlords may wish to include language such as this in any lease where this issue may arise (and it should do no harm in any other lease):

Tenant and every Party-in-Interest claiming through Tenant irrevocably waives any right(s) it may have regarding any zoning lot merger or transfer of Development Rights relating to the Land, including any rights Tenant or any such Party-in-Interest may have to be a party to, to enter into, to execute or to consent or object to, any TDR Document. A “Party-in-Interest” means each party-in-interest as defined in New York City Zoning Resolution (“ZR”) § 12-10 (definition of “zoning lot”), as listed in a Certification of Parties in Interest certified by a title insurance company. A “TDR Document”) means any of these now or later affecting the Land, as Landlord reasonably requests: (a) Declaration of Restrictions as defined in the ZR; (b) zoning lot development agreement; (c) other document to cause the Land to be merged with, or subdivided from, a zoning lot under the ZR; (d) other certificate, document or instrument of a similar nature and purpose; or (e) a consent, subordination or waiver relating to any of the documents just listed. Any TDR Document shall: (w) not directly or indirectly impair any right of Tenant under this Lease (the “Permitted Development”), including Development Rights allocated to Tenant under this Lease and Tenant’s right (whether or not exercised) to develop, rebuild and occupy the Premises for the uses, building envelope and bulk this Lease allows; (x) impose no affirmative obligations on Tenant, except temporary arrangements to accommodate adjacent or nearby construction at no cost or interference to Tenant and obligations not exceeding Tenant’s obligations under this Lease; (y) require the owner of each of the other tax lots within a TDR Document to promptly correct any code violation within its tax lot; and (z) otherwise be on ordinary and customary terms. This Lease shall be subject and subordinate to any TDR Document that complies with the previous sentence. Except for Permitted Development, Tenant has no right to any unused development rights, rights to construct “floor area,” or comparable rights for the Land (collectively, “Development Rights”). Tenant consents to Landlord's utilization or transfer of all unused Development Rights.

When a landlord enters into a ground lease and then seeks to transfer development rights, disputes are particularly likely to arise.

Landlord and Tenant will often negotiate some arrangement for Development Rights other than as suggested in the language above, such as: (a) Tenant can bring them to the Land, and Landlord must sign TDR Documents; (b) TDR Documents cannot cause anyone to incur obligations regarding other real property; (c) Landlord can pay for any Development Rights Tenant brings to the Land, with Rent adjustment; (d) Landlord cannot transfer unused Development Rights to other land; (e) either party can sell unused Development Rights and the other must sign TDR Documents toward that end; and (f) one party grants another a power of attorney to sign TDR Documents. The suggested lease language provides the vocabulary and starting point for any of these arrangements. They will also require help from counsel experienced with zoning and ground leases, which can become very tricky. If either party ever needs the other to cooperate on any TDR Documents, substantial time pressure will often exist, so the parties may want to build in some monetary incentives.

The concept of Permitted Development assumes the Lease allows Tenant to use certain Development Rights, but others remain available and Landlord can sell them. That is just one of many possible permutations, and not necessarily the most likely one. But it provides a reasonable starting point.

When TDR Documents combine multiple tax lots into a single zoning lot, a major code violation on one of the “other” tax lots in the zoning lot could impair development anywhere in the zoning lot. That cannot be avoided, but: (a) in general, the risk arises only for major code violations, not minor ones; and (b) TDR Documents can address it.

Any arrangement contemplating future approval or negotiation of TDR Documents could create trouble and disputes. If a transfer of Development Rights could become important, the parties may want to go into more detail, attach forms or have a dispute resolution mechanism.

Getting Started with Commercial Leasing, Third Edition

This Help Document provides a basic introduction to working with Adobe Inc.'s proprietary PDF documents using Adobe's READER program, version XI. A full discussion of features and capabilities is available at:
<http://helpx.adobe.com/reader.html>.

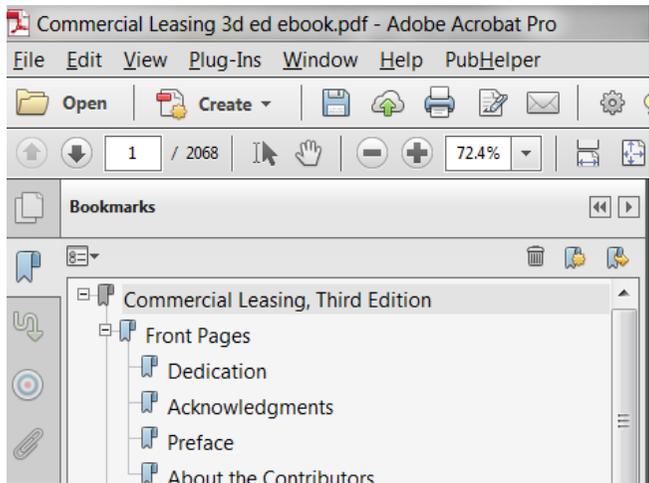

GENERAL INFORMATION

This e-Book contains the entire contents of the publication. The structure of this material is specifically set to provide easy and quick access to any section or sub-section with a minimum of mouse clicks. By utilizing both "Bookmarks" and "hyperlinks" (links), the user can go directly to the area of interest or, conversely, scroll page by page through the entire document if desired. This product is entirely formatted in the Adobe PDF structure and requires that Adobe Reader or other suitable software be installed on your computer.

NAVIGATING WITHIN THE PUBLICATION

Opening this e-Book displays the cover of the publication where several buttons have been added. Clicking your mouse on the button of interest will take you to the desired material. As you have already discovered, clicking the "Getting Started" button brought you to this help document. In the same way, clicking the "NYSBA License" button will display the NYSBA Single-User License that you have agreed to as confirmed by your use of this product. Clicking the "Table of Contents" button will take you to a list of the Chapters in the publication with each title a link which, when clicked, will display the first page of that Chapter.

When you follow links that take you into the text of the publication, the initial page of the selected chapter or sub-part will be displayed. Along with the text, a separate panel will also be displayed on the left side of the screen which contains a list of all the Bookmarks contained in the publication, volumes, chapters, sub-chapters, etc including the titles of each. An alternate method of navigating through the material is to click on the desired location displayed in this Panel.

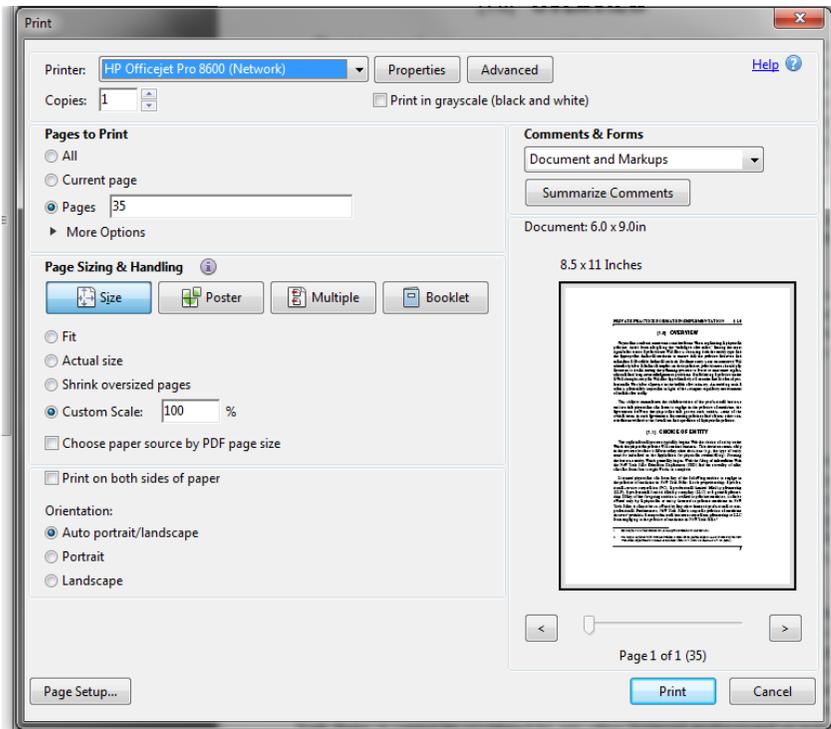

Commercial Leasing, Third Edition

Notice the small boxes to the left of the Chapter titles which contain a small plus sign (+). That is an indication that there are subsections within that Chapter and if you click on the plus sign, an expanded view of that Chapter is displayed. This allows you to select a sub-part for viewing. Note also that the + sign is changed to a minus sign (-) when the expanded view is open (see Diagram below). Clicking the Minus sign will close the expanded view and revert back to the initial Chapter title only as shown above.

Printing selected pages

While viewing the desired page that you wish to print, right click your mouse while it points to the Bookmark in the left hand panel (not to the text in the page displayed which sets up the whole volume to be printed). Then select the “PRINT” option from the drop-down list. A window will open which provides the necessary controls to print the desired page (see diagram below)

Note especially that the option to print “Pages” is selected. If “ALL” is specified, the complete book will be printed. Therefore, be very careful to insure the “PAGES” option is selected and the desired page number(s) is shown BEFORE clicking the “PRINT” button at the bottom of the window. The page number of the page you are viewing is shown to the right of the Pages option and also under the small display of the page in the lower right of the screen (in this example it is “Page 1 of 1 (35)” thus you are viewing page 35 of the document).

The following material is taken directly from the “Help” function of Adobe Reader and provides additional details regarding functionality of PDF documents.

Opening pages in a PDF

Depending on the PDF you open, you may need to move forward through multiple pages, see different parts of the page, or change the magnification. There are many ways to navigate, but the following items are commonly used:

Note: If you do not see these items, choose View > Show/Hide > Toolbar Items > Reset Toolbars.

Next and Previous

The Next Page  and Previous Page  buttons appear in the Page Navigation toolbar. The text box next to them is also interactive, so you can type a page number and press Enter to go directly to that page.

Scroll bars

Vertical and horizontal scroll bars appear to the right and bottom of the document pane whenever the view does not show the entire document. Click the arrows or drag to view other pages or different areas of the page.

Select & Zoom toolbar

This toolbar contains buttons and controls for changing the page magnification.

There are many ways to turn pages in a PDF. Many people use the buttons on the Page Navigation toolbar, but you can also use arrow keys, scroll bars, and other features to move forward and backward through a multipage PDF.

The Page Navigation toolbar opens by default. The default toolbar contains frequently used tools: the Show Next Page , Show Previous Page , and Page Number. Like all toolbars, the Page Navigation toolbar can be hidden and reopened by choosing it in the Toolbars menu under the View menu. You can display additional tools on the Page Navigation toolbar by right-clicking the toolbar and choosing an individual tool, Show All Tools, or More Tools and then selecting and deselecting tools in the dialog box.

- Click the Previous Page  or Next Page  button on the toolbar.
- Choose View > Page Navigation > [location].
- Choose View > Page Navigation > Page, type the page number in the Go To Page dialog box and then click OK.
- Press the Page Up and Page Down keys on the keyboard.

Jump to a specific page

- From Single Page or Two-Up page display view, drag the vertical scroll bar until the page appears in the small pop-up display.
- Type the page number to replace the one currently displayed in the Page Navigation toolbar, and press Enter.

Use page thumbnails to jump to specific pages

Page thumbnails provide miniature previews of document pages. You can use thumbnails in the Page Thumbnails panel to change the display of pages and to go to other pages. The red page-view box in the page thumbnail indicates which area of the page appears. You can resize this box to change the zoom percentage.

1. Click the Page Thumbnails button or choose View > Show/Hide > Navigation Panes > Page Thumbnails to display the Page Thumbnails panel.
2. To jump to another page, click its thumbnail.

Navigate with links

Links can take you to another location in the current document, to other PDF documents, or to websites. Clicking a link can also open file attachments and play 3D content, movies, and sound clips. To play these media clips, you must have the appropriate hardware and software installed.

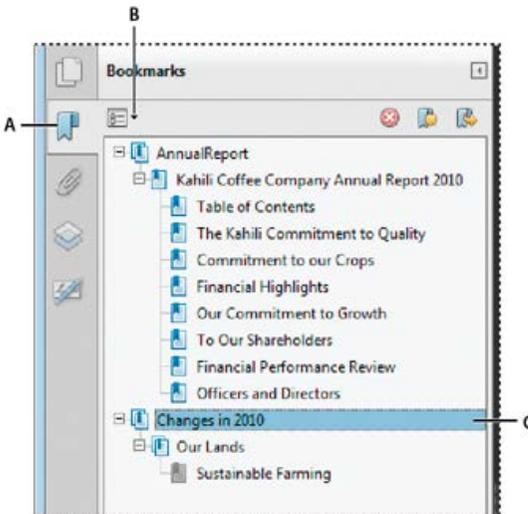

The person who created the PDF document determines what links look like in the PDF.

Note: Unless a link was created in Acrobat using the Link tool, you must have the Create Links From URLs option selected in the General preferences for a link to work correctly.

1. Choose the Select tool.
2. Position the pointer over the linked area on the page until the pointer changes to the hand with a pointing finger. A plus sign (+) or a w appears within the hand if the link points to the web. Then click the link.

Jump to bookmarked pages

Bookmarks provide a table of contents and usually represent the chapters and sections in a document. Bookmarks appear in the navigation pane.

Bookmarks panel

- A. Bookmarks button
- B. Click to display bookmark options menu.
- C. Expanded bookmark

1. Click the Bookmarks button, or choose View > Show/Hide > Navigation Panes > Bookmarks.

2. To jump to a topic, click the bookmark. Expand or collapse bookmark contents, as needed.

Note: Depending on how the bookmark was defined, clicking it may not take you to that location but perform some other action instead.

If the list of bookmarks disappears when you click a bookmark, click the Bookmarks button to display the list again. If you want to hide the Bookmarks button after you click a bookmark, select Hide After Use from the options menu.

Automatically scroll through a document

Automatic scrolling advances your view of the PDF at a steady rate, moving vertically down the document. If you interrupt the process by using the scroll bars to move back or forward to another page or position, automatic scrolling continues from that point forward. At the end of the PDF, automatic scrolling stops and does not begin again until you choose automatic scrolling again.

1. Choose View > Page Display > Automatically Scroll.
2. Press Esc to stop scrolling.

PDFs with file attachments

If you open a PDF that has one or more attached files, the Attachments panel automatically opens, listing the attached files. You can open these files for viewing, edit the attachments, and save your changes, as permitted by the document authors.

If you move the PDF to a new location, the attachments automatically move with it.
