DEDICATION OF THE THIRD EDITION: MELVYN MITZNER

We dedicate the third edition of the New York State Bar Association's Commercial Leasing treatise to the memory of Melvyn Mitzner, former chair of the NYSBA Real Property Law Section and a friend, advisor, and great resource to many members of the New York commercial real estate bar.

Mel was the dean of the title insurance industry and New York commercial real estate law, the person to call with difficult questions and judgment calls. He had special knowledge and expertise that he shared freely with the industry—not just to people who ordered title insurance from Commonwealth Land Title Insurance Company, but also real estate lawyers young and old throughout the region, as well as underwriting counsel at Mel's title company and its competitors.

He wrote and spoke extensively, sharing his knowledge and helping all of us do our jobs better. And he was a good guy, with a great sense of humor, patience, and respect for everyone with whom he dealt.

He graduated from City College and Brooklyn Law School, and in the course of his career served as an adjunct professor at St. Johns University Law School, New York University's Real Estate Institute, and Manhattanville College.

After decades in the title insurance industry, Mel became senior counsel at the White Plains law firm of Keane & Beane P.C. in the last few years of his life. He died in 2010 in a car crash.

In Mel's memory the New York Bar Foundation, the NYSBA Real Property Law Section, and Mel's widow, Rosalyn, created the Real Property Law Section Melvyn Mitzner Scholarship, which is awarded to a second- or third-year law student in New York State every year.

He was survived by Rosalyn, two children (one of them, Jeff Mitzner, is a senior executive at First American Title Insurance Company), and five grandchildren.

Mel is missed. We honor his memory by dedicating the Third Edition of NYSBA's Commercial Leasing treatise in honor of Melvyn Mitzner.

ACKNOWLEDGMENTS

This book is officially a project of the Commercial Leasing Committee of the New York State Bar Association Real Property Law Section. Less officially, it grew out of two of the Committee's programs: first, a series of speakers on commercial leasing and related issues while I co-chaired the Committee; and, second, two "silent lease issues checklists" that a subcommittee of the Commercial Leasing Committee put together starting in about 1998.

This book was first suggested by S.H. Spencer Compton of First American Title Insurance Company, co-chair since the beginning of the subcommittee on "silent lease issues checklists" and the motor for getting those projects done. Spencer initially suggested republishing those checklists in book form, along with other commercial leasing resources that the Commercial Leasing Committee had developed through its other activities.

I expanded Spencer's idea to include chapters from a number of commercial leasing practitioners who had spoken on a range of leasing topics at Commercial Leasing Committee meetings, as well as a number of commercial leasing practitioners who had not. These practitioners provided the most important pieces of this work, and their efforts are very much appreciated.

Particular thanks goes to Andrew L. Herz of Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler LLP. As an earlier downstate co-chair of the Commercial Leasing Committee, Andy initiated the "model nondisturbance agreement and report" that I chaired and edited in 1993, and which is included in this work. (That model nondisturbance agreement and report has become disturbingly old. Although the law in the area does not change much, the agreement and report deserve another look. Anyone who would like to get involved in that project should please contact the author.)

Over 20 years ago, Andy encouraged my active involvement in the Commercial Leasing Committee, without which this book would not exist. That involvement led to my becoming co-chair of the Committee and eventually Chair of the Section for the year ending in May 2006.

In addition to being entitled to recognition under each of the preceding three paragraphs, Andy also reviewed and commented on a number of the pieces that I contributed to this work.

My friend Mark Senn of Senn Visciano Rosenstein P.C., Denver, Colorado, many years ago undertook a project to collect each state's major statutes on commercial leasing in a single reference source and recruited me as the "reporter" for New York.

Mark and his publisher, Wolters Kluwer Legal & Regulatory U.S., graciously allowed me to publish a modified version of the New York statutory collection in this book. I regularly update the New York collection for Mark's book, and again publish an updated edition of that work here. Commercial leasing practitioners who negotiate leases in multiple states should look for Mark's national leasing guide, a tremendous help for those transactions. (See lrus.wolterskluwer.com.)

As another contribution to this work, Mark strenuously warned me against undertaking any publishing project that involved having multiple authors contribute multiple chapters. I ignored Mark's advice. The only reason I could do so and yet bring this book to completion was the persistence, professionalism, and follow-through of the New York State Bar Association's editorial department.

Alex Dickson, Kirsten Downer, Reyna Eisenstark, Marisa Kane, and Naomi Pitts of the NYSBA editorial department did a great job tracking all the pieces of this book and bugging everyone (including me) who needed to be bugged.

This book was very much a team project. Every member of the team contributed, and that contribution is very much appreciated.

I also thank my clients, who have been sending me terrific leasing and other work for many years, both before and after I founded Joshua Stein PLLC in 2010. And no matter how many transactions I've negotiated before, I always learn something new—and usually make a new friend across the table—from each negotiation. So I also thank all my esteemed adversaries for everything they've taught me.

My colleagues at Joshua Stein PLLC helped with this book more than they necessarily know. Deborah Goldman (now co-chair of the Section's Commercial Leasing Committee), Alexa Klein, James Patalano, and Lauren Silk, all members of my legal staff, have regularly helped me update many of the templates in this book and write articles that became chapters. My managing editor, Karen Lively, oversaw all these projects as well as dozens of other publications projects. And Waldemar Robles helped keep the office running and the computers working, without which we would have had a lot of trouble doing any of this.

Finally, I thank my daughters, Helaina and Julia, for their support and for being such terrific daughters.

PREFACE

Commercial leasing transactions are all about practicalities: the link between legal principles and issues on the one hand and the real world of real estate on the other. This book seeks to give the reader (or the “user”) a set of practical tools that he or she can use in day-to-day lease negotiations.

Although the tools offered here are grounded in the law of commercial leasing, they emphasize the give-and-take of negotiations and the need to meet the practical needs of landlords and tenants.

This book does not cover exhaustively every possible topic in commercial leasing law. It is not a treatise in the sense that it drills deeply into every possible legal topic within its purview. It is a set of targeted guides that seek to help lease negotiators do their job. And it focuses on the practical topics that matter most.

Because of the nature of this book, some of the chapters overlap. Almost every chapter overlaps, at least partly, with our “silent lease issues” checklists. Each author approaches his or her topic from a particular point of view. Even though the discussion may overlap, the varying viewpoints add value.

Most of the discussion in this book would apply in any state, except perhaps Louisiana. To a very limited degree, the discussion is specific to New York and considers issues unique to New York law. In most cases, those discussions are readily identifiable. Also, of course, the statutory supplement at the end of this work is entirely specific to New York State and City, although cannot possibly include every possible municipal code provision that might apply in some circumstance.

We hope to follow this third edition with subsequent editions. Any reader who has comments, reactions, responses, or corrections to anything in this book should communicate with the editor or with the author of the affected chapter. The editor can be reached at Joshua@joshuastein.com.

Future editions will be expanded to cover additional topics. Nominations, including self-nominations, for new authors and chapter topics for future editions will be much appreciated and should be directed to the editor.

CHAPTER 47 NEW YORK STATUTES ON COMMERCIAL LEASING

Joshua Stein, Esq.

CHAPTER ONE

INTRODUCTION: THE LEASING STATE OF MIND

Joshua Stein, Esq.

Your clients need space. Their current lease will expire soon, or they're opening a new location, or they're consolidating some functions. They need to be open and operating in six months or nine months or twelve.

Before they can open, though, they need to set up their new space just the way they want it—except they don't know what they want and they can't figure it out until they know what space they're talking about. And parts of their operation will be very difficult to move.

The person in charge of finding and moving to the new space might be very familiar with how real estate works—for example, if the tenant is a chain store that opens a new location every week.

If the tenant's business has nothing to do with real estate and it's a small company, though, then the lucky staff member overseeing the project may have no idea at all of what must be done. That person may look to you to provide the expertise and help them keep their job.

Any move or expansion brings with it uncertainty. What if the landlord can't deliver the space when they said they would? What if your client underestimated or overestimated their needs? And what happens if construction goes over budget or takes too long? What if your clients can't move out of their old space on time, before their old lease expires? What if everything goes great, as a real estate matter, but the company's business collapses or changes, or the company gets taken over or for any other reason the company needs to move again, so it no longer needs the space?

When a company makes a long-term commitment to a building, how long is too long? Would the company prefer flexibility or certainty? Does it want to bear the risk of possibly having to relocate again soon? Will it trade certainty for commitment?

The last few paragraphs suggest only the first few of potentially hundreds of practical business questions that any tenant must consider when negotiating a substantial new commercial lease. All these questions—and the larger business context they suggest—are also often part of the mix that tenant's counsel must consider in negotiating a lease.

The tenant will also want to understand how much the space will cost, and satisfy itself that even if the exact numbers cannot be predicted at lease signing, they will conform to the tenant's general expectations.

An owner of a building faces an entirely different set of questions and issues.

The value of any real estate is at its most solid if the real estate generates income—preferably reliable and steady income over a long term. To generate that income, an owner needs tenants in occupancy—preferably reliable and steady tenants over a long term (unless the owner thinks the rental market will shoot up quickly, in which case the owner might want a shorter term, although an owner’s tolerance for uncertainty will change over time). And the owner also wants to assure that the income stream will protect the owner from inflation.

The owner thinks about all these things in the shadow of future lenders, and what they will expect, want, and need from the building if the owner wants to obtain the best possible financing. Lenders look for reliable cash flow without interruption. Leases are supposed to provide it.

How can an owner get the right kinds of tenants into the building as quickly and cheaply as possible? How can the owner assure that they pay—and continue to pay—the highest possible rent? Or would the owner trade some rent for greater stability, longer-term leases, and more credit-worthy tenants?

If the owner needs to pay brokerage commissions and tenant improvement costs as the price of obtaining new tenants, does the owner have the money? If not, where will it find the money? The notion of just dipping into the owner’s pocket is unheard of in the world of real estate. Capital investments are typically financed through debt whenever possible.

And how can the owner be sure that these outlays to obtain new tenants will, in fact, give the owner the reliable income stream it wants and needs? Will the tenant stick around long enough to deliver the expected payoff for the landlord’s investment?

How do the current lease negotiations tie in to the owner’s long-term plans for the building? When does the owner plan to refinance? Does the owner plan to reposition the building? Change its use? Change its position or quality level in the market? Accumulate space for some other—more desirable—tenant? Sell? Eventually demolish or redevelop any time soon? The owner’s leasing decisions today can dramatically affect the actions the owner can take tomorrow.

In negotiating a lease, an owner and its counsel need to consider these questions and their answers, to try to assure that, at the end of the day, the transaction works for the owner and helps the owner meet its long-term needs and goals for the building.

Once a space user and a building owner find each other and work through the questions described above and many more, they negotiate and sign a lease. Then the two parties need to live with each other for the life of the lease. Their rights and obligations regarding the building will, in first instance, depend on the words of the lease. During their life together, here are some questions that may arise:

- Does the tenant need to change something about the leased space?
- Does the tenant want to sell its business or merge with some other company?
- Does the tenant want to change the nature of its business, so that instead of doing one thing it will now do something else and renovate its space accordingly?
- Does the landlord want to change the air conditioning system in the building or make other changes to accommodate a future tenant?
- Does the landlord want to change anything else about how the building operates—perhaps something as mundane as how the building processes messenger packages?
- Does the landlord want to refinance or sell or expand or demolish or even just rename the building?

In each case, a party's ability to do what it wants may, in the first instance, depend at least in part on what the lease says. The words of the lease will have been defined as part of the original transaction and original negotiations, a one-time event whose consequences will reverberate for both parties for the entire term of the lease.

When landlords and tenants sign leases, though, they often do it in the heat of the moment. The parties meet, feel some mutual attraction, then want to tie the knot, often with the same urgency as a pair of 18-year-olds at a wedding chapel in Las Vegas. The wedding ceremony may take 20 minutes, but the happy couple, the landlord and tenant, will have 20 years to regret it.

Unlike matrimonial law, though, the law of commercial leasing does not include the concept of divorce. Neither party to a lease can unilaterally (or relatively unilaterally) terminate the relationship. Unlike husband and wife, landlord and tenant are usually stuck with each other for the life of their lease.

This practical reality means that once a landlord and a tenant have accomplished their happy introduction, they both need to give significant thought to the lease that they ultimately sign. Although the step of signing a lease is crucially important—because it gives both parties some level of incremental certainty—both parties will have many opportunities to regret whatever the lease says in the short, medium and long term.

In the rush and excitement of getting a lease signed, both parties need to confirm that the lease properly considers their needs over time, and how those needs might change.

For a commercial leasing lawyer, that analysis begins by understanding the needs of the parties when they sign their lease. Some of those needs were suggested earlier in this discussion. But any tenant and any landlord will also have a variety of other needs and expectations.

A tenant's initial needs will depend largely on the nature of its business, what it plans to do in the space, and what the space needs to give the tenant so it can do those things.

This can require a complete understanding of the gritty details of how the tenant's business works. Where does the tenant's staff expect to park its cars? Does the tenant need signs? What kind of communications equipment does the tenant use? How does the tenant receive deliveries? Who are the tenant's competitors, and can the tenant tolerate them nearby? If the tenant is a store, how does it physically sell its goods? How much electrical power does the tenant need? The questions can go on and on.

Looking ahead, a tenant and its counsel must consider the myriad possibilities of changed circumstances. Some examples:

- What happens if the tenant no longer needs the space? Does the lease give the tenant an acceptable exit strategy?

- What if the tenant's technology and support needs change? For example, what if the tenant needs a new communications system or more air conditioning?
- Might the tenant need to change its business activities at this location? Its name?
- Will the tenant always need whatever package of services the landlord offers? More services? Fewer? Different?

A landlord takes a narrower view of the future.

As in the present, the landlord wants in the future to receive a reliable incoming cash flow, coupled with a predictable level of expenses.

Unless the landlord is in a branch of real estate operation that contemplates constant change (e.g., shopping malls or the renting of Broadway theaters to successive dramatic productions), the landlord and its lender want, above all, reliability, predictability, and no surprises. Change is tolerable only if the landlord can control it, or shift its costs and risks to someone else. This means a landlord may start the lease negotiations by trying to control almost everything, just to assure that nothing changes, at least in a way that might hurt the landlord's cash flow.

Tenants typically look for flexibility. Leasing lawyers who represent tenants need to know what kind of flexibility to ask for and need to ask their clients what kind of flexibility matters to them.

In negotiating a substantial commercial lease, the parties may need to consider carefully almost every issue that can possibly arise over a very long period regarding a single piece of real estate. These issues range from the fundamental to the mundane to the arcane.

To help commercial leasing lawyers identify those issues and do their job, this book gives them a practical set of tools, checklists, ideas, and sample documents. With a few exceptions, each chapter of this book covers a particular topic that arises again and again in commercial lease negotiations. In each case this book approaches that topic from the practical perspective of how to get a deal done, rather than in a legalistic vacuum.

Drawing from their experiences in the trenches of commercial leasing, the contributors have tried to identify—for both landlords and tenants—the issues that matter, and how those issues can reasonably be negotiated.

In addition to a couple of dozen chapters covering particular issues or “hot spots” in commercial lease negotiations, this book also includes two checklists that attempt to remind both tenants and landlords of the “silent issues” they should remember to raise (or at least consider raising) in negotiating any commercial lease. These checklists take a more comprehensive approach than the remainder of the book, and give lease negotiators a quick way to crosscheck their work and try to identify what they might have missed. (Many of the issues in the silent checklists turn out not to be as silent as the checklist authors originally intended. Some of those issues stare lease negotiators in the face, crying out for attention.) Both the landlord’s checklist and the tenant’s checklist are in at least their third editions and have been further updated for this book.

This work also includes many sample documents, including these, updated as appropriate for this third edition:

- A complete commercial lease suitable primarily for office space, but with a rider for retail space, as well as some other options.
- A set of “New York” clauses that any New York landlord will often want to include in any lease.
- The “model” nondisturbance agreement previously published by a subcommittee of the New York State Bar Association Real Property Law Section Commercial Leasing Committee.
- A sample demonstrating a sample rider that tenant’s counsel might attach to a New York City standard office lease.
- A comprehensive form of tenant estoppel certificate.
- A standby letter of credit suitable for use in place of a security deposit.
- A routine sublease for excess office space.
- A lease review/summary form for use by commercial mortgage lenders.

These and other sample documents included in this work were contributed by the editor and by some of the authors of this work. Each reflects the particular experience of whoever contributed it, and only through the moment of writing. None should be relied upon as a generic document that will always apply (as written) to any particular transaction. Any user of any model document must examine it from beginning to end to confirm that it is appropriate and complete for any particular transaction. These models are provided merely as starting points or for cross-checking or developing other documents.

Many of the models, checklists and other materials in this book have been published elsewhere but updated for this book.

This work concludes with a collection of New York statutes that relate directly to commercial real estate leasing, with a few provisions from the New York City Administrative Code and other primary sources. These statutes have been abridged by removing outdated provisions and simplifying numbering and internal cross-references, to make them easier to understand, follow, and use. These changes are all marked. The commercial leasing statutes have been categorized and separately indexed by subject matter. This collection should help New York commercial leasing practitioners understand the significant body of statutory law that governs this area, and easily find particular provisions when necessary.

	5. All public areas, elevators, call buttons, indicator lights, toilets, core doors, fire pull stations, warden stations, etc. shall fully comply with code.
	6. Landlord shall upgrade core toilets to the standard of a Class A building, including new fixtures, new tiles (on walls and floors), new mirrors, replacement of all hardware, new partitions, new ceiling and new lighting, and strobes to be installed.
	7. Please indicate electrical capacity (watts/usable foot).
	8. Landlord shall provide building standard venetian blinds.
NON-DISTURBANCE	Tenant [requests/requires] at Lease signing a non-disturbance agreement from all mortgagees and ground lessors.
ALTERATIONS	Tenant may perform decorative and other minor alterations. Anything above a threshold requires Landlord approval, not to be unreasonably withheld. No alterations to exterior, structure, building systems, etc.
RESTORATION	Tenant need not restore at end of term.
SIGNAGE; DIRECTORY	Proportionate share.
BROKERAGE	Landlord to pay ____ one full commission only if and when the parties have a signed a Lease and all conditions to its effectiveness have been met, all through a separate brokerage agreement. ²
CONFIDENTIALITY	This proposal is submitted in strict confidence. Neither party shall disclose it except as required by law or to advisors or consultants who have agreed to maintain confidentiality.

2 Given the pitfalls of brokerage law, Landlord should consider signing something to similar effect with the broker (particularly a tenant's broker with whom Landlord might have no relationship) early in the process.

MODEL TERM SHEET FOR OFFICE LEASE

This proposal does not bind either party in any way, except the sections on “Brokerage” and “Confidentiality” and this paragraph. The parties may circulate drafts, comments, issues lists, emails, and other communications, with or without expressly reserving rights. Neither party shall rely on any such communications, which shall bind no one in any way unless and until the parties have executed, exchanged, and delivered final agreed documents.

Very truly yours,

OFFICE LEASING TERM SHEET: TENANT'S AGENDA

When an office tenant, particularly a major office tenant, negotiates a term sheet, the tenant and its advisers should consider adding at least some of these provisions to the term sheet, beyond the “obvious” provisions such as rent, base term, and scope of premises. By adding to the term sheet provisions like those below, a tenant can simplify and shorten Lease negotiations. Exactly which terms to raise will depend on all circumstances. It is the nature of this type of list to grow and never shrink. This list starts with the most important items – concessions that even a small Tenant might seek – and then includes other items in descending order. Anyone using this list must do so selectively and intelligently. No one should shovel words from this document mindlessly into some other document. Many of these terms also apply to other types of leases.

Landlord Services. Landlord will provide cleaning, security, maintenance, repairs, utilities, HVAC, freight and passenger elevator, and other services to a standard comparable to similar first-class buildings, for premises and common areas. Landlord will provide [at least __ cardkeys] [cardkeys equal to Tenant parking spaces], and replacements at nominal cost.

Use. Tenant may use as general office premises and customary incidental uses for Tenant and its employees, e.g., training, duplication, exercise room, food service, child care, and ATM.

Tenant's Alterations. No fee for plan review for tenant's initial build-out. Landlord must be reasonable, and pre-approve Tenant's initial build-out, to the extent defined at signing. No bonds. Landlord shall promptly sign permit applications. Tenant need not restore, except unusual and non-standard installations such as vaults and internal staircases. As a matter of due diligence, will Tenant's alterations raise any issues within the building, e.g., the need to enter other tenants' space?

Assignment and Subletting. No Landlord consent needed for transactions with Tenant affiliates; any merger, consolidation, or other transaction affecting Tenant; or transfer of Tenant's equity. Landlord shall not unreasonably withhold consent to other transactions. Landlord shall respond within 10 days. No recapture right. No profit share. Will Tenant sublet space to suppliers, consultants, or other counterparties?

TI Allowance. Tenant may apply to any “hard” or “soft” costs of Tenant's work, including network and other communications cabling. Disburse in installments as construction progresses, not only upon completion. Lien waivers for final disbursement only. Disburse any remaining allowance to Tenant upon completion of work. If Landlord fails to disburse within 90 days after required to do so, Tenant may abate rent, plus interest at prime.

Operating Expenses. Limit to actual. One-year deadline to bill. After receiving Landlord's final bill for any operating year, Tenant will have 6 months to audit (18 months for base year), using any auditor of Tenant's choice. If audit discloses an overcharge of 3% or more, Landlord will pay all audit costs.

HVAC. Overtime fees must reflect Landlord's actual costs, allocated among multiple simultaneous users. Deadline to order overtime HVAC shall be 3 p.m. on same day. Regular HVAC hours shall be _____.

Utilities. If space is submetered, Tenant shall reimburse Landlord only for actual cost of submetered power at Landlord's tariff[, plus an administrative fee of ___%]. If Tenant requires additional power, Landlord will arrange it at Tenant's expense. If Tenant requires additional telecommunications service, Tenant may arrange it at Tenant's expense. Landlord will cooperate.

Legal Compliance. Tenant shall comply with legal requirements for Tenant's particular manner of use of the Premises. Landlord shall be responsible for all other compliance.

Environmental. Tenant shall have no liability for any environmental matters except arising from Tenant's acts or omissions in violation of law. Landlord will deliver the space [free of any asbestos or ACM] [with all asbestos or ACM abated in compliance with law].

SNDA. Landlord will deliver SNDA(s) at signing. Any present or future SNDA will not exculpate successor liability for (a) TI allowance; or (b) offsets or abatements accrued under express terms of Lease, provided Tenant gave mortgagee notice of Landlord's default.

Renewal Option. 95% of fair market value with no floor. Exercise deadline shall be 6 months before end of term, provided no uncured Event of Default. Option travels with Lease.

Insurance. Tenant may satisfy all insurance requirements by delivering appropriate certificates under Tenant's reasonable company-wide insurance program.

OFFICE LEASING TERM SHEET: TENANT'S AGENDA

Parking. If any tenant has reserved parking, Tenant will have equivalent rights, adjusted for relative occupancy.

Security Deposit and Default. Ideally, no security deposit. If a security deposit is required, then Tenant can provide letter of credit. Cure periods after notice of default: monetary, 10 days; nonmonetary, 30 days plus diligence. For first 30 days of holdover, prorate holdover rent daily at 125% of reserved rent. No liability for consequential damages or loss of next tenant.

Right of First Offer. Tenant shall have right of first offer for any available space in building. Tenant may assign this right as part of Lease.

Signage. Tenant may list (and later update) at least ____ individuals and Tenant affiliates in building directory. Tenant may use its share of any outdoor signage. Building will not be named for Tenant or its competitor.

Additional Facilities. Tenant may install and use reasonable rooftop communications facilities, such as satellite dishes. Tenant may install backup generators and fuel tanks at a location outside the premises as specified in Lease. No additional rent for these items.

Rent Abatement. Tenant can abate rent and exercise self-help rights if services are interrupted (or if Landlord's work interferes with Tenant's use and occupancy) for more than 3 business days, or any 10 days in 6 months. Tenant may offset rent, with interest at prime, if Landlord does not reimburse Tenant's costs within 30 days after receipt of an invoice.

Abatements and Incentives. Before signing, Tenant will need to understand available incentive programs and file preliminary applications as needed. Landlord shall cooperate. If Tenant's occupancy triggers real estate tax abatements, Tenant shall receive the sole benefit.

Exclusivity. For 45 days, these negotiations shall be exclusive and neither party shall negotiate with any other counterparty for a competing transaction.

MODEL COMMERCIAL LEASE

[4.0] I. DESCRIPTION

This Model Document consists of a generic commercial space Lease. It approaches the transaction primarily from a Landlord's perspective, but also reflects some concerns that a well-represented Tenant will raise. This Lease does not, however, seek to offer a "fair" or "balanced" resolution of issues. The latter, though perhaps a good idea, is more easily suggested than done. This Lease does, however, leave out some common "gotcha" clauses often found in Landlords' form leases.

The "base" Lease covers office space. For retail space, Exhibit B-3 offers provisions one can incorporate by reference or weave into the main Lease. Retail use will also require making appropriate changes to the "base" Lease, e.g., tightening the transfer and use restrictions.

When using this Lease for any particular building, one will always need to tailor it to that building, mostly for issues of use, utilities (for example, the "basic" Lease defines the Landlord's "Basic Services" to exclude electricity, and assumes direct metering with no Landlord involvement), construction, repairs, compliance with law, Landlord services (e.g., cleaning), pass-throughs, and operating requirements. When counsel starts a new leasing project—particularly a leasing program to cover all leases in a particular buildings as they arise—counsel should discuss these and other matters with the client. Buildings vary widely, as do Landlords and their expectations and standard operating procedures. Something "obvious" to one Landlord client may seem "bizarre" to another. And, in a perfect world, all leases in any given building will both (a) reflect the actual operations of that building; and (b) conform to one another.

Beyond those areas, though, any user must review, consider, and adjust the entire Lease as appropriate in context. A Landlord or its counsel may delete provisions that seem unnecessary or excessive under the circumstances. But almost every "excessive" provision in this Lease: (a) appeared at one point or another in a Lease that the author received from Landlord's counsel when representing a Tenant; and (b) may make all the difference in some future dispute. Because of its status as a "model" Lease, this document errs on the side of saying more rather than less. Any Landlord or Landlord's counsel can easily fix that. It's easier to delete than to identify what's missing.

After Exhibit B-3 (retail terms), this Lease includes optional language on rent adjustments; option terms; demolition; electricity variations (sub-metering and rent inclusion as opposed to direct metering); treatment of so-called “profits” on transfer; and other matters. Some of these optional provisions might be regarded as overkill.

Like any other sample document, this one reflects many transactions where it was used, adjusted and negotiated. Some provisions in this Lease will not make sense for any particular future transaction. Past transactions might not have required provisions appropriate in some future transaction. Footnotes in this Lease discuss some issues, but not all issues or decision points.

Anyone using this Lease or any other model document must review it carefully from beginning to end to assure it is correct and appropriate for the particular transaction in the applicable market. The author makes no representation or warranty about whether this Lease satisfies the preceding sentence or is fully enforceable.

This Lease leaves blanks for most percentages and other numerical terms, which will vary with circumstances and context. For most time periods, this Lease provides a “typical” number of days.

For issues to consider, please see the Landlord’s Checklist of Silent Lease Issues (chapter 7) and Tenant’s Checklist of Silent Lease Issues (chapter 6), both co-authored by Joshua Stein, updated and reprinted for the third edition of this book. This Lease does not cover all issues in those checklists, but covers most of them.

This Lease seeks to follow principles of “Plain English” and straightforward legal writing. Many sentences are (relatively) short. The Lease expresses obligations in the active voice. It relies on defined terms instead of section cross-references and repeated “laundry lists.” The first few pages contain all deal-specific definitions and business terms. Many clients like that format. It simplifies future lease reviews. The last few pages of Exhibit B-1 define most other capitalized terms the Lease uses.

Considered as a whole, this Lease is relatively long and “full.” It also includes some nonstandard provisions driven by recent case law or the author’s experiences.

An earlier version of this Lease was reviewed in draft by Elissa G. Benudis, formerly of Latham & Watkins LLP and now with The LeFrak Organization; Andrew L. Herz of Patterson, Belknap, Webb & Tyler LLP; and Robert J. Shansky of Scarola Malone & Zubatov LLP. Lauren Silk, of the author's legal staff, assisted in updating this Lease based on use in transactions. Blame only the author for any errors or misjudgments in this Lease. This model Lease also benefits from comments and negotiations from a range of clients and Tenant's counsel in many leasing transactions.

[4.1] II. OTHER DOCUMENTS

This document may need these exhibits, related documents or deliveries, additional information, conforming provisions in other documents, etc.

- Authority, Etc. Landlord may desire evidence of due execution and authorization. Occasionally, Landlord may even request an opinion of counsel. Opinions are, however, rarely requested except for very large leases or those with not-for-profit, foreign, governmental or diplomatic entities. This general laxity about opinions does not seem to have produced an epidemic of improperly executed, undelivered, unauthorized or unenforceable leases. One could require an officer's certificate on these matters—already more paper than industry standard and not particularly more useful or reliable than the representation and warranty already in the Lease itself.

- Exhibits. If necessary, attach space plan and other exhibits, including description of Landlord's Initial Work and Tenant's Initial Work, if Tenant wants it pre-approved. This Lease refers to some other possible exhibits, without samples. Most exhibits still require designation by exhibit letter. The process of obtaining exhibits will often amount to the critical path in getting any Lease done.

- Guaranty. If the Lease will be guaranteed, attach the form of Guaranty as an exhibit. The Guarantor's signature may be harder than the Tenant's to obtain, thus creating potential last-minute problems. Another Chapter of this work offers a model Lease Guaranty.

- Landlord Waiver. A retail Tenant may want Landlord (and perhaps its mortgagee(s)) to waive any liens against Tenant's personal property, and agree to let Tenant's asset-based lender enter the Premises and take possession of its collateral under certain circumstances. Landlord should review these waivers carefully, as they are often rather one-sided in favor of the lender, e.g., by giving the lender open-ended access rights after Lease termination free of any obligations at all.

- Lender Approval. If the Lease will require approval by Landlord's mortgage lender, Landlord's counsel should start the process early, and comply strictly with the requirements and procedures of the loan documents. The hardest part may consist of figuring out who currently services the loan, how to reach them and what they want to see when asked to approve a lease. And all of this will change every time the loan moves from one servicer to another. A "business" call before the "legal" call sometimes helps.

- Letter of Credit. If Tenant will use a letter of credit in place of a cash security deposit, this will need to be coordinated with the L/C issuer. The process can become tedious, especially to the extent the L/C issuer has (or Tenant causes the issuer to have) its own ideas about the form of L/C. To prevent these problems and delays, if a Lease will require an L/C, the parties should focus on it as one of the earliest and most important documents. If the L/C will exceed a year's rent, it should come from a guarantor and not from Tenant. Other chapters of this book address the use of L/Cs for leases.

- Memorandum of Lease. If Landlord is willing to record a memorandum of lease, then it must be prepared for signature, with all necessary tax returns and deliveries for recording. Sometimes, Landlord will want a release of the memorandum of lease to be deposited in escrow. This is, however, nonstandard and probably excessive in most transactions. If the parties do record a memorandum of lease, then New York law effectively requires them to amend the memorandum every time they amend the Lease, even if the amendment affects nothing disclosed in the memorandum.

- Nondisturbance Agreement. Ideally, at the moment of Lease signing, Landlord's counsel can handle this document as an adjunct to the process of obtaining lender consent to the Lease, if required. If Tenant will try to negotiate this document, get that process started as early as possible.

- UCC Financing Statement. If Landlord obtains a security interest in Tenant's personal property and wants that security interest to be meaningful, then file a UCC financing statement. New York law gives Landlord no automatic lien on Tenant's personal property. Any such liens are probably not "market standard" for Tenants with any negotiating strength at all.

[4.2] III. ADMINISTRATION

This document creates these and other issues and concerns for post-closing administration and follow-through.

- Advice Memo to Landlord. Landlord’s counsel will often want to give Landlord a summary of important dates, requirements and other provisions in the Lease. For a sample and some other advice on Lease administration, see the Chapter on “Living with Leases” in this work.

- Commencement Date Notice. If the Lease contemplates future delivery of the space, Landlord should remember to give whatever notices of commencement the Lease requires.

- Dates. Track any deadlines, delivery dates, or reminder requirements.

- Estoppel Certificates; Other Deliveries. Landlord may periodically request estoppel certificates (both from tenant and from any guarantor); financial statements; sales figures; ownership certificates; etc.

- Letter of Credit. A letter of credit requires extra administrative steps that are extremely important. See the Chapters of this book on letters of credit.

- Security Deposit. Handle Security in compliance with Law.

Landlord and Tenant enter into this Lease (this “Lease”) as of the first date when both have signed it (the “Signature Date”). This Lease consists of the signature page below and the following, all legally binding as if they appeared in the body of this Lease:

- Basic Terms. The Basic Terms attached as Exhibit A (“Basic Terms”), which identify some basic business terms and other matters about this Lease;

- Supplemental Terms. The Supplemental Terms attached as Exhibit B-1 (the “Supplemental Terms”), which contain additional terms;

- State-Specific Terms. The State-Specific Terms attached as Exhibit B-2 (also “Supplemental Terms”), which cover some state-specific matters;

• *Retail Terms.*¹ The Retail Terms attached as Exhibit B-3 (also “Supplemental Terms”); and

• Other. Any other exhibits or attachments that this Lease identifies.

By signing below, Landlord leases the Premises to Tenant; Tenant takes and hires the Premises from Landlord; and the parties agree to all terms and conditions of this Lease.

“Permitted Use”	[Use of the Premises only as _____ space, to conduct a _____ business under this trade name: _____]^a a. Typically a Tenant will want a broader Permitted Use. A bankruptcy court may treat a very narrow Permitted Use as a transfer restriction and ignore it.

EXHIBIT A: BASIC TERMS

THIS TERM	MEANS
“Premises”	[The rentable area of the _____ floor of the Building, as Exhibit __ depicts] ^b
“Rent Commencement Date”	The [earlier] [later] of (a) the day before the date that is _____ months after the Commencement Date and (b) _____, 201__ ^c

“Security”	$_____, ^d subject to adjustment under the Supplemental Terms
“Security Deposit Bank”	_____ _____ _____, New York 1_____
“Tax Share”	_____% ^e
“Tenant”	_____, a _____ _____ _____ Attention: _____ Telephone: _____
“Tenant’s Completion Deadline”	_____ days after Commencement Date

- b. Describe Premises unambiguously. Avoid saying anything about the size of the Premises. Attach diagram if appropriate. Update list of exhibits.
- c. If Rent starts on Commencement Date, then say so and eliminate a Rent Commencement Date, with conforming changes.
- d. If this exceeds a year’s rent, it should come from a Guarantor and not from Tenant, because of bankruptcy concerns. See chapter 40 on letters of credit. The same concerns arise for cash security.
- e. If Operating Expenses Share and Tax Share are the same, change to just “Share.” In a mixed-use building, Landlord should focus on how to allocate Property Taxes. Retail space will probably drive more than its per-foot share of Property Taxes and future increases in Property Taxes. If Landlord allocates Property taxes based on square footage, Landlord may face a squeeze later.

THIS TERM	MEANS
“Tenant’s Counsel”	_____, Esq. _____ _____ Client/Matter: _____ or any successor Tenant’s Counsel Tenant designates from time to time in compliance with the Supplemental Terms
“Tenant’s Owners”	Person Percentage of Equity Interests _____ % _____ % _____ %
“Tenant’s Wattage”	Electricity (demand load) equal to _____ watts per usable square foot, ^f excluding electricity for HVAC

f. Leases often express Tenant’s permitted usage by reference to rentable square footage. This could later produce a debate over rentable square footage. One would prefer to specify a number of watts for the total Premises, but leases usually don’t do this.

2. Additional Terms for Retail Leases⁴

In addition, as used in this Lease, these terms shall have these meanings:

THIS TERM	MEANS
“ Exclusivity Zone ”	The Building
“ Landlord’s Percentage ”	_____%
“Minimum Hours”	_____ a.m. to _____ p.m. on Business Days _____ a.m. to _____ p.m. on all other days except _____ “Noncompete Zone”	All points within _____ miles from the closest boundary of the Land

⁴ Delete this table for a non-retail Lease. For a retail Lease, consider combining the two tables into one.

EXHIBIT A: BASIC TERMS

THIS TERM	MEANS
“Opening Deadline”	The later of (a) the date ____ months after the Commencement Date and (b) _____, 201__
“Plan Deadline”	___ days after Signature Date
“Tenant’s Exclusive Use(s)”	_____
“Tenant’s Trade Name”	_____

3. Additional Understandings

In addition to the agreements in the Supplemental Terms, Landlord and Tenant agree as follows:

a. Guaranty. On the Signature Date, each Guarantor is delivering to Landlord a Personal Guaranty (each, a “Guaranty”) in the form of Exhibit __.

b. Heading. [Additional agreement.]

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

These Supplemental Terms (the “Supplemental Terms”) constitute part of the Lease to which attached. Terms this Lease defines: (a) appear (with page numbers) in an Index of Defined Terms after the Basic Terms; and (b) can be used before being defined.

1. Rent and Additional Rent

1.1 Obligation to Pay. Tenant shall pay Landlord all Rent as this Lease requires, by good check or at Landlord’s request by wire transfer to the Rent Payment Account or as Landlord otherwise Notifies Tenant. Starting on the Rent Commencement Date, and continuing for the rest of the Term, Tenant shall pay Base Rent in equal monthly installments, on the first day of each calendar month, in advance. Landlord may, but need not, give Tenant prior Notice, demand, or invoice(s) for Base Rent. Tenant shall on the Signature Date prepay one month of Base Rent or such greater Base Rent as the Basic Terms require. Landlord shall credit that prepayment against Tenant’s first required payment(s) of Base Rent. Tenant shall pay Landlord, as additional rent, all Additional Rent, all within 20 days after receiving an invoice, whether in or after the Term.⁵

1.2 Estimated Payments; Rent Adjustments. For any Escalation Rent calculated for a period longer than a month, Landlord may require Tenant to pay on the first day of each month estimated equal payments based on Landlord’s reasonable projections over that period. Landlord may reasonably adjust those estimates at any time. The parties shall then make appropriate adjusting payments, without interest, for previous months, as Landlord reasonably requires. Except as this Lease otherwise provides, Landlord’s calculation, determination or estimate of any Additional Rent or Base Rent adjustment, if this Lease provides for one (a “Rent Calculation”) shall bind Tenant unless: (a) it is arbitrary, capricious, or manifestly erroneous; and (b) Tenant gives Landlord Notice of Tenant’s objection (with all reasonable grounds for it) within 30 days after receiving Landlord’s first invoice based on that Rent Calculation. If Tenant timely gives that Notice, then the parties shall cooperate to resolve the dispute. The existence of a dispute shall not entitle Tenant to any Offset.

5 Twenty days is on the generous side, but reflects common practices in Lease administration. Landlord could add: “To the extent that any Additional Rent arises from Tenant’s obligation to reimburse Landlord for any nonrecurring payment, Landlord may require Tenant to pay it before, simultaneously with, or as a condition to Landlord’s making that payment.” This is non-standard.

1.3 Partial Periods. For any period within the Term of less than a calendar month, including any period in the Term before the first Lease Year or after the last Lease Year: (a) Landlord shall reasonably prorate Rent; (b) Tenant shall pay prorated Rent on the first day of the period; and (c) the parties shall have the same rights and obligations, equitably prorated, as in any other period in the Term. If, at any time, Tenant has prepaid or overpaid any Rent, then, unless this Lease terminated because of an Event of Default (in which case Landlord may first offset any amount owing from Tenant to Landlord), Landlord shall promptly refund any prepayment or overpayment.

1.4 No Offset. Tenant shall pay all Rent without offset, defense, claim, counterclaim, abatement, reduction, deduction, diminution, or exercise of recoupment rights (collectively, “Offset”).

1.5 Abatement Period. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, if any Event of Default or Transfer, except an Exempt Transfer, occurs before the Rent Commencement Date, then the Rent Commencement Date shall automatically accelerate to the date of that Event of Default or Transfer.

2. Operating Expenses Escalation Rent

2.1 Estimates. Before each Operating Year, or as soon as practicable, Landlord shall Notify Tenant of Landlord’s estimate (subject to updating from time to time) of Operating Expenses for that Operating Year. The previous Operating Year’s estimate shall apply until Landlord delivers a new one. Tenant shall pay Operating Expenses Escalation Rent to Landlord in equal monthly installments, in advance, by the first day of each calendar month, based on Landlord’s estimate.

2.2 Annual Accounting. As soon as reasonably practicable after each Operating Year, Landlord shall give Tenant a summary of that Operating Year’s actual Operating Expenses. If the summary shows: (a) Tenant overpaid Operating Expenses Escalation Rent, then Landlord shall within 30 days refund the overpayment or agree to give Tenant an equivalent credit against Rent next coming due; or (b) Tenant underpaid Operating Expenses Escalation Rent, Tenant shall pay Landlord the deficiency.

2.3 Proration for Partial Lease Year. If Landlord adjusts Landlord's Operating Year, then Landlord shall prorate Operating Expenses Escalation Rent.

2.4 Adjustment for Occupancy Factor. If the Building is less than 95% occupied on average in an Operating Year, Landlord shall adjust Operating Expenses as if the Building had been so occupied. If Landlord does not furnish any particular tenant(s) any work or service includible in Operating Expenses, then Landlord shall calculate Operating Expenses as if Landlord did furnish that work or service to such tenant(s). Although this Lease requires Landlord to incur certain costs, that does not mean Landlord must exclude them from Operating Expenses if they otherwise constitute Operating Expenses.

3. Property Tax Escalation Rent

3.1 Payment. Tenant shall pay Property Tax Escalation Rent in equal monthly installments (as Landlord reasonably calculates), by the first day of each calendar month, so that at least one calendar month before Landlord must pay any Property Taxes, Landlord has received from Tenant all Property Tax Escalation Rent based on those Property Taxes.

3.2 Contests and Refunds. Nothing in this Lease requires Landlord or permits Tenant to contest any Property Taxes or assessment. If Landlord receives a refund of Property Taxes (in or after the Term), then Landlord shall apply it first to reimburse Landlord's reasonable costs of obtaining it, including appraisal, accounting, and Legal Costs, to the extent not already included in Property Taxes for a Property Tax Year in the Term. Any balance of that refund shall be treated as an adjustment of Property Taxes for the Property Tax Year to which it relates. To the extent that such adjustment indicates Tenant overpaid Property Tax Escalation Rent for any Property Tax Year, Landlord shall, if no Default exists, refund that overpayment without interest. If, for any Property Tax Year, Property Taxes are below Base Property Taxes, then for that Property Tax Year Tenant need not pay Property Tax Escalation Rent, but Tenant shall receive no credit against, or other reduction of, any other Rent for that or any other period.

3.3 Other Taxes. Tenant shall pay any and all taxes or Government-imposed charges or impositions (except Property Taxes) assessed on: (a) this Lease or the Rent; (b) any leasehold interest or personal property of any kind, owned by or placed in, on, or about the Premises by Tenant; or (c) Tenant's connection to or use of Utilities.

4.1 Permitted and Prohibited Uses. Tenant shall use the Premises only for the Permitted Use(s), provided in each case that Law allows each such Permitted Use,⁶ and for no other purpose. Tenant shall not cause, suffer, or permit anyone to use the Premises for any Prohibited Use. Tenant shall comply with all commercially reasonable insurance company requirements for the Premises and the Building. Tenant shall not allow the Premises to become vacant or abandoned.⁷ Tenant shall not use or occupy the Premises, or permit the Premises to be used or occupied, in any way that requires Landlord to make any Alteration. Landlord need not enforce against Tenant any restriction in this Lease, or notify Tenant of any breach of any such restriction. Failure to enforce any restriction shall not waive it.

4.2 Conditions to Occupancy. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, Tenant shall not take possession of, begin Tenant's Initial Work in, or otherwise use or occupy the Premises unless Tenant has delivered to Landlord (as this Lease requires) for Tenant's Initial Work: (a) complete plans and specifications, approved by Landlord and, to the extent Law requires, stamped "Approved" by the Department of Buildings; (b) a copy of Tenant's building permit, if Law requires one; (c) all Insurance Documents; (d) the Security; (e) if enforceable, Lien Waivers from all Contractors; and (f) copies of Tenant's construction contract(s). Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, until Tenant has satisfied the foregoing conditions, Landlord may exclude Tenant from the Premises, which shall not constitute a constructive or actual eviction or give Tenant any rights or claims.

5. Landlord's Delivery of Premises

5.1 "As Is" Condition. Except to the extent that this Lease requires any Landlord's Initial Work: (a) Landlord shall deliver the Premises to Tenant vacant in its "as is" condition on the Signature Date, subject to reasonable wear and tear; (b) Tenant shall perform all Work for the Premises; (c) Landlord shall have no obligation to obtain a certificate of occupancy or perform any Work; and (d) Tenant acknowledges, represents, and warrants that Tenant has inspected the Premises and is fully satisfied with its "as is" condition and present condition and state of repair, if any, on the Signature Date. Except as this Lease expressly allows, Tenant shall not

6 Tenant may ask Landlord for assurances on legally permitted uses. Tenant should review the certificate of occupancy for the Premises.

7 For an office Lease, Landlord will often not care about the previous sentence.

modify, alter, or disturb any post, column, mechanical or other system, or Structure component located within the Premises.

5.2 Variations from Plans. Any description or depiction of the Premises in this Lease is only an approximation. It might not include, or might inaccurately show, existing conditions. Neither party shall have any rights or obligations because of variations between any such description or depiction and the Premises as delivered. The Premises and the Rent are not subject to remeasurement, survey, or adjustment for “rentable square footage,” “loss factor recalculation,” or any other recomputation or recalculation of any kind.⁸

5.3 Landlord’s Initial Work. If the Basic Terms define any “Landlord’s Initial Work,” Landlord shall perform it in conformity with Law and in a good and workerlike manner with only new materials. Landlord may make minor changes in Landlord’s Initial Work as advisable in Landlord’s judgment. Landlord shall Notify Tenant of those changes on request. To the extent any exhibit to this Lease states that Landlord’s Initial Work has been completed, Tenant approves Landlord’s Initial Work and its state of completion as stated in the exhibit.

5.4 Changes in Landlord’s Initial Work. Landlord need not make changes that Tenant requests in Landlord’s Initial Work (“Change Orders”). If Tenant requests, and Landlord approves, any Change Order, Tenant shall pay Landlord’s additional costs (including architectural and design costs) of that Change Order, plus an Administrative Fee. To the extent Landlord reasonably determines that Change Order(s) delayed Landlord’s Initial Work, that delay shall constitute “Tenant Delay.” On request, Landlord shall give Tenant a nonbinding estimate of any charges or Tenant Delay that a proposed Change Order would cause.

5.5 Tenant Delay. If Tenant delays or impairs Landlord’s prosecution of Landlord’s Initial Work, then “Tenant Delay” shall include that delay. After Landlord has Substantially Completed Landlord’s Initial Work, Landlord may deem the Commencement Date to have occurred (after taking into account any delay that Landlord caused) as of when it would have occurred but for Tenant Delay. Landlord shall also have other remedies for Tenant Delay as this Lease provides.

5.6 Completion of Landlord’s Initial Work. Landlord anticipates Landlord will Substantially Complete Landlord’s Initial Work and deliver the Premises to Tenant by the Anticipated Delivery Date. Landlord shall orally advise Tenant when Landlord has Substantially Completed Landlord's Initial Work (the "Substantial Completion Notice"), which notice Landlord shall promptly confirm in writing. That notice shall nevertheless be effective when given orally.⁹ Landlord shall give Tenant a written punchlist of work that remains to be accomplished for Landlord to fully complete Landlord's Initial Work (the "Punchlist"). Landlord shall have no liability to Tenant, and shall not be in breach under this Lease, if Landlord fails to Substantially Complete Landlord's Initial Work and deliver the Substantial Completion Notice to Tenant by the Anticipated Delivery Date.

5.7 Delivery Deadline. If, as of the Delivery Deadline, Landlord has not given Tenant the Substantial Completion Notice, then for every day thereafter until Landlord has given Tenant the Substantial Completion Notice, Tenant shall be entitled to a one-day extension of the Rent Commencement Date. [If, as of the date ___ days after the Delivery Deadline, Landlord has still not given Tenant a Substantial Completion Notice, then Tenant may, within 10 days, give Landlord Notice that Tenant desires to terminate this Lease. If, as of the date 30 days after that Notice, Landlord has still not given Tenant the Substantial Completion Notice, then this Lease shall automatically terminate and neither party shall have any obligations or liability, except Landlord shall return the Security and prepaid Rent.]¹⁰

5.8 Extension of Time. Landlord may extend the Anticipated Delivery Date and the Delivery Deadline from time to time by Notice to Tenant: (a) for Force Majeure; (b) for Tenant Delay; and (c) as this Lease otherwise expressly allows.

5.9 Acceptance of Landlord's Initial Work. By entering the Premises to commence Tenant's Initial Work, Tenant shall, except as this paragraph provides, be deemed to have agreed that Landlord has fully completed and satisfactorily performed Landlord's Initial Work (except as listed in the Punchlist) and the Commencement Date has occurred. Landlord shall complete Punchlist Work in a reasonable time after the Commencement Date. The parties shall cooperate to coordinate Punchlist Work with Tenant's Initial Work. In place of any other Landlord guarantee or warranty: (x) to the extent that Landlord obtains any warranty or guarantee for Landlord’s Initial Work, Landlord shall on request assign it to Tenant, if permissible; and (y) Tenant may, for ___ days after the Commencement Date (the “Defect Reporting Period”), Notify Landlord of defects in Landlord’s Initial Work. Landlord shall reasonably promptly correct those defects provided Tenant has not covered or worsened them. Any such defect shall not entitle Tenant to any Offset. After the Defect Reporting Period, Tenant shall be deemed to have accepted Landlord’s Initial Work in its entirety except defects of which Tenant Notified Landlord in the Defect Reporting Period.¹¹ Nothing in the previous sentence limits Landlord’s continuing obligations of maintenance and repair, if any, under this Lease or Law.

⁹ Tenant would prefer a written Notice. Such requirement will just defer the Rent Commencement Date by a couple of days.

5.10 Asbestos Compliance. Landlord represents and warrants that to Landlord’s knowledge the Premises contain no asbestos (or asbestos-containing materials) in violation of Law.¹²

6. Work, Generally

6.1 Landlord’s Consent Required. Tenant may not perform Work without Landlord’s prior consent. Provided no Default exists, Landlord shall not unreasonably withhold consent to reasonable Work to the Premises, provided it does not affect any Structure, outside Building appearance, part of the Building except the Premises, or Building System, and otherwise complies with this Lease. Tenant shall give Landlord at least 10 Business Days prior Notice of proposed Work. If Tenant does any Work that violates this Lease, Tenant shall on demand remove or correct it in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord. At Landlord’s option, Landlord may do so at Tenant’s expense, plus an Administrative Fee.

6.2 General Requirements. Tenant shall perform all Work in a good, workerlike, diligent, first-class and first-quality manner using new and first-quality materials, in a way that does not materially interfere with, damage, annoy, or inconvenience Landlord, other tenants, or any of their activities. Tenant’s Work shall not: (a) adversely affect Building Systems; (b) increase Tenant’s usage of those systems beyond the usage this Lease allows; or (c) require any change or penetration of the Structure, except ceiling or flooring elements solely within the Premises. To the extent that, as a result of Tenant’s Work, any Law requires any other Work or action in the Premises or Building, including any inspections and maintenance, 11 Tailor as appropriate, such as for “phased” build-out, or eliminate any guarantee or warranty.

12 Make sure this assurance is correct.

Tenant shall cause that Work or other action to be performed, except to the extent Landlord elects to do so at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee. Within 30 days after completing any Work, except Minor Work, Tenant shall give Landlord "as-built" plans showing that Work, if Tenant obtained them for any other purpose. If Landlord reasonably estimates the cost of any Tenant Work, including Tenant's Initial Work, would exceed the Bonding Threshold, then Tenant shall comply with such additional requirements as Landlord establishes (including, at Landlord's option, disbursement procedures, bonding, a guaranty from a guarantor satisfactory to Landlord or other measures) to assure lien-free completion. If Landlord requires, Tenant shall defer filing Tenant's building permit application until Landlord has filed any preliminary filing necessary to enable Landlord to qualify for any available tax abatement or deferral. All Work Tenant performs or initiates shall be performed at Tenant's sole expense and risk. If Law requires Tenant to obtain a building permit for any Work, then Tenant shall: (a) do so; (b) do the Work with reasonable diligence; (c) promptly close out Tenant's permit; and (d) give Landlord any certificate of occupancy required by Law promptly after completion.

6.3 Plan Submission. Before Tenant starts any Work, except Minor Work, Tenant shall give Landlord complete plans and specifications, for Landlord's reasonable approval. Landlord shall endeavor to respond to any plans (or schematics, concept drawings, preliminary drawing, or sketches, if Tenant submits them) within 15 days after submission. If Landlord reasonably objects to Tenant's submission, Tenant shall revise and resubmit it for Landlord's approval. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's reasonable third-party costs for review of Tenant's submissions, e.g., architect fees. Tenant shall pay Landlord, as an oversight fee, an amount equal to 6% of the estimated cost of any Work. Tenant shall not start Work unless and until Tenant has obtained any approvals Law requires and, except for Minor Work, Landlord has reasonably approved the Work, Tenant's Contractors and the contracts with Tenant's Contractors. Tenant shall construct Tenant's Work in substantial compliance with approved plans and specifications.

6.4 Filings. If Law requires Landlord's signature on any filing with any Government for Tenant's Work, then Landlord shall sign it, provided no Default exists and Tenant's filing is truthful, accurate and reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, and imposes no liability, obligation or unreimbursed cost on Landlord. At Tenant's option and risk, Tenant may make any filing before Landlord has approved Tenant's Work. Landlord's signature on a pre-filing shall not be deemed Landlord's approval of Tenant's

Work. Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord regarding any filing Landlord signs at Tenant's request.

6.5 Operating and Construction Requirements. Tenant shall comply with Landlord's reasonable Operating Requirements and Construction Requirements as established from time to time, provided they apply by their terms to all tenants and do not unreasonably discriminate against Tenant. [As of the Signature Date, Landlord's Operating Requirements appear in Exhibit __ and Landlord's Construction Requirements in Exhibit __.]

6.6 Contractors. Tenant Parties shall use only Contractors that: (a) have all licenses and permits Law requires; and (b) have given Landlord any Insurance Documents Landlord reasonably requests. Landlord may reasonably disapprove any Contractor Tenant engages, or require Tenant to select from an "approved list" of Contractors, at least three for each trade if reasonably possible. If, however, any electrical, life safety, mechanical or HVAC Work involves connection to Building Systems, Tenant must use Contractors Landlord designates. Tenant shall, to Landlord's satisfaction, bond all Contractors whose (sub)contract amount exceeds the Bonding Threshold, under bonds naming Landlord as an additional obligee. If in Landlord's reasonable judgment failure to do so would, may or does cause labor disharmony, Tenant Parties shall use only union Contractors. Tenant shall cause its Contractors to deliver Lien Waivers to Landlord when and as Landlord requires, to the maximum extent Law allows. Even if Landlord has approved a Contractor, Landlord may revoke that approval (and require the Contractor to leave), by Notice to Tenant, if Landlord reasonably determines later experiences with that Contractor have been unsatisfactory.

6.7 After Completion. All Tenant Work shall become Landlord's property when Tenant has completed and paid for it, subject to the Article on "End of Term."

6.8 Payment. Tenant shall promptly pay for all labor, services, materials, supplies and equipment (alleged to have been) furnished in, at, for or about the Premises, to or on behalf of any Tenant Party. If any Lien is filed based on (alleged) acts or omissions of any Tenant Party or otherwise because of any Work Tenant initiates, then Tenant shall Notify Landlord immediately. Within five Business Days after receiving notice of any Lien, Tenant shall bond or discharge it. Tenant may, however, contest it in a way satisfactory to Landlord, but only if: (a) no Default exists; (b) Tenant gives Landlord security as Landlord reasonably requires; and (c)

the contest causes no default under Landlord's Financing. If Tenant bonds or contests a Lien, then Tenant shall do so diligently, in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, and give Landlord written progress reports promptly on request. If any Lien becomes subject to foreclosure proceedings, then within two Business Days Tenant shall bond or discharge it. In addition to any other Landlord's right or remedy, if Tenant does not perform any obligation under this paragraph, Landlord may (but need not) pay any Lien or demand the Contractor foreclose. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for those payments, plus an Administrative Fee. If Law establishes procedures so Landlord can disclaim responsibility for Liens, Tenant shall take such actions as Landlord requests to give Landlord the benefit of those procedures. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, Tenant need not remove any Lien from Landlord's Work. Nothing in this Lease constitutes Landlord's consent or request, express or implied: (a) to any Contractor to perform any labor or furnish any materials; or (b) to subject Landlord's property to any Lien.

6.9 Agreed Work. To the extent Landlord agrees to perform any Work at Tenant's request (except any Work, repairs or maintenance this Lease requires Landlord to perform), Tenant shall pay Landlord for its cost, plus an Administrative Fee.

6.10 Cabling. Tenant shall properly label its Cabling in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord. To the extent Cabling passes through floor slabs or fire-rated walls, Tenant shall install fire-stopping material to properly seal openings around that Cabling, all as Law requires. If Tenant abandons or stops using any Cabling, Tenant shall promptly remove it in compliance with this Lease and Law.

7. Tenant's Initial Work

7.1 Tenant's Obligation. By Tenant's Completion Deadline, Tenant shall prepare the entire Premises for occupancy for Permitted Use(s) and complete (and obtain a temporary or permanent certificate of occupancy for) Tenant's Initial Work, all in compliance with this Lease. Tenant shall thereafter at all times maintain that certificate of occupancy. From the Signature Date until Tenant has completed Tenant's Initial Work and opened for business, Tenant shall keep Landlord fully informed of progress of Tenant's Initial Work. On request, Tenant shall meet with Landlord at a reasonable frequency to report on that progress.

7.2 Plan Development. Tenant shall give Landlord a complete set of plans and specifications for Tenant's Initial Work, collectively a complete filing for Tenant's Initial Work in form suitable for filing with the Department of Buildings, all for Landlord's reasonable approval, by the Plan Deadline. Tenant shall file those plans and specifications with the Department of Buildings, and give Landlord proof of filing, within 10 days after Landlord approves them. Time is of the essence on Tenant's compliance with the Plan Deadline.

7.3 Landlord's Contribution. If the Basic Terms define a Landlord's Contribution, then Landlord shall contribute to Tenant's Initial Work an amount not to exceed Landlord's Contribution. Landlord shall disburse Landlord's Contribution in monthly installments, in proportion to the progress of Tenant's Initial Work (as Landlord reasonably determines), subject to Tenant's compliance with these requirements.¹³ Landlord shall make each disbursement within 10 Business Days (or at Landlord's option simultaneously with the next available draw under Landlord's Financing, but no later than 60 days after Tenant's submission) after Tenant has delivered these, all reasonably satisfactory to Landlord: a disbursement request; backup invoices for Tenant's costs for Tenant's Initial Work; a certificate of Tenant's architect confirming that Tenant's Initial Work to date substantially complies with the approved plans and specifications; progress Lien Waivers; evidence of the proper application of previous disbursements of Landlord's Contribution; and such other deliveries as Landlord reasonably requests. Tenant shall not be entitled to any disbursement in any Default Period. Tenant may not use Landlord's Contribution for furniture, equipment, Cabling (except as this paragraph permits), architectural or engineering fees, or any item not constituting improvements to real property. Tenant may apply up to __% in aggregate of Landlord's Contribution (to the extent disbursed) to these items as Landlord reasonably approves for Tenant's Initial Work: (a) architectural and engineering fees; and (b) Cabling.

7.4 Completion. Within 30 days after completing Tenant's Initial Work, Tenant shall give Landlord full and complete computer aided-design "as-built" plans showing Tenant's Initial Work.

8. Utilities and Services

Landlord shall furnish Basic Services for the Premises. Tenant may request Landlord to provide Additional Services, if reasonably available to Landlord and the Premises. Landlord need not, however, make available more than the Operating Expenses Share of the total capacity of any available Additional Services. To the extent Tenant uses Additional Services, Tenant shall pay Landlord, at Landlord's regular rates as adjusted from time to time, for those Additional Services. Landlord grants Tenant a license in the Term (except in any Default Period) to use Utility and Communications Service hookups and outlets in the Building as Landlord designates to serve the Premises. The parties further agree as follows.

8.1 Tenant's Usage. Tenant shall use Utilities and other facilities in a safe manner that does not exceed their capacity. Tenant shall pay for Tenant's consumption of all Utilities, including demand charges. If Tenant's consumption exceeds the Operating Expenses Share of the capacity of any Utility, Tenant shall either reduce consumption or request that Landlord, in its sole discretion, arrange more capacity as Tenant reasonably requires, at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee.

8.2 Costs. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's cost, as Landlord reasonably calculates it, of the following (plus an Administrative Fee): (a) installing or operating any meter, submeter or other device or service (and related wiring, conduits, panels and service fees) to measure Tenant's use of Utilities; (b) installing, modifying, operating, maintaining and repairing any equipment (including standard HVAC equipment) Landlord deems necessary to balance the temperature for the Premises and/or any equipment required for any Additional Services Tenant requests or because of Tenant's activities; and (c) keeping account of or determining any Additional Services Tenant uses.

8.3 Balancing. If the temperature otherwise maintained anywhere in the Premises by the HVAC system is adversely affected by: (a) the type or quantity of any lights, machines, or equipment (other than typical office equipment) Tenant uses in the Premises; (b) occupancy of the Premises by more than one person per ___ square feet; or (c) any rearrangement of partitioning or other improvements in the Premises, then at Tenant's sole cost, Landlord may install any equipment, or modify any existing equipment Landlord deems necessary to restore the temperature or rebalance the system. Tenant shall cooperate with Landlord and comply with any Building Rules for proper functioning and protection of HVAC. Landlord has no responsibility for any HVAC to maintain temperatures in, or because of, any computer or communications rooms, machine rooms, conference rooms, food service areas, or other areas of high concentration of personnel or electrical usage, or any other use beyond consumption normally required for office equipment, including matters referred to in the first sentence of this paragraph. Landlord shall have no liability for any loss or damage from any HVAC inadequacy.

8.4 Communications Services. Tenant shall arrange and promptly pay when due for all Communications Services, including Cabling and new hookups, except as this Lease states otherwise. Landlord need not provide any Communications Services. Tenant shall pay the provider(s) of any Communications Services directly for all usage in or at the Premises. Tenant shall not resell any Communications Services at the Building.

8.5 Interruption. Landlord's obligations to provide Basic Services, Additional Services and any Utilities are subject to: (a) Tenant's compliance with Building Rules and Law; (b) shutdowns for maintenance, repairs or security; and (c) Force Majeure. Any interruption in, or failure or inability to provide, the foregoing for any reason shall not constitute an eviction, constructive or otherwise, or impose on Landlord any liability. Tenant waives any existing or future Law allowing Tenant to terminate this Lease or assert any claim against Landlord for that interruption, failure or inability. Landlord shall have no liability (and Tenant shall have no Offset) for inconvenience or harm (including damage to Tenant's computer hardware, software, or data) caused by stoppage or reduction of Utilities or services.

8.6 Energy Shortages. If, in Landlord's reasonable judgment, it is necessary or desirable because of any Government recommendation to reduce energy consumption, then Tenant shall comply with Landlord's reasonable, uniform and nondiscriminatory energy reduction measures provided (unless Law requires otherwise) those measures do not affect Tenant's operating hours.

8.7 Elevator and Stairs. Tenant shall have the nonexclusive right to use Building passenger elevator(s) for access to the Premises 24 hours a day, seven days a week, 365/366 days a year, except during reasonable closures for breakdowns, repairs, or maintenance. Landlord shall have no liability for those closures. When the elevator is closed or broken, Tenant may use the stairs Landlord designates. If the Building has a freight elevator, then Tenant may use it only in compliance with Building Rules and upon paying Landlord's freight elevator charges as set from time to time. Tenant shall schedule deliveries of building materials and freight only outside Business Hours.

8.8 Construction Period Utilities. During Tenant's Initial Work, if Landlord allows Tenant to connect to Landlord's Utilities, then Tenant shall comply with Landlord's reasonable instructions, requirements and procedures, and pay Landlord for Tenant's consumption, as Landlord reasonably estimates it, plus an Administrative Fee.

8.9 Interference with Tenant's Business. To the extent that Landlord exercises any right under this Lease to enter, or interrupt any services to, the Premises, Landlord shall reasonably endeavor to minimize any disruption to Tenant's business. This shall not, however, require Landlord to hire overtime help or entitle Tenant to any Offset. Landlord shall reasonably endeavor to provide advance oral notice of any such entry or interruption when reasonably possible.

9. Electricity

9.1 Direct Metering. Tenant shall obtain its electricity directly from Power Company. Tenant shall reimburse any actual third-party out of pocket costs that Landlord incurs because of installation of Tenant's electricity lines or meters. Tenant shall not, without Landlord's reasonable consent, do any Work affecting the electrical system or any lines, in each case, unless within and exclusively serving the Premises. Tenant shall not change electricity providers without Landlord's consent, unless that provider fails to deliver reasonable service on a consistent basis, in which case the parties shall work together to identify a replacement provider.

9.2 Power Company Requirements. Tenant shall comply with Power Company's rules, regulations, terms, tariffs and conditions that govern service, equipment and wiring. Tenant has determined that Building risers are capable of supplying Tenant's Wattage to the Premises. If a survey by Landlord's engineer determines that Tenant needs more electricity than Tenant's Wattage, and additional riser(s), supply line(s), or other equipment need(s) to be installed, Landlord shall so Notify Tenant. Within five Business Days after receiving that Notice, Tenant shall stop using that additional electricity. The parties shall cooperate to arrange additional electricity service, to the extent reasonably available to the Building, all at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee. Landlord shall not be liable in any way to Tenant for any failure or defect in the supply or character of electric service furnished to the Premises by reason of any requirement, act, or omission of Power Company or for any other reason not attributable to Landlord's intentional misconduct.

9.3 Shutdown. Landlord may shut down electrical energy to the Premises when necessitated by safety, repairs, Work, connections, upgrades, or for any other reason relating to the Building electrical system (“Electrical Work”), whether for the Premises, any other tenant space, or any Common Area. Landlord shall reasonably endeavor to: (a) give Tenant reasonable prior oral notice of any shutdown; and (b) not shut down Tenant’s electrical energy for Electrical Work in Business Hours, unless required by an emergency, Power Company, or Law. Landlord shall have no liability to Tenant for any loss, damage, or expense that Tenant incurs due to any electricity shutdown or Electrical Work.

9.4 Electricity Impairment. Any Electricity Impairment shall not: (a) constitute an actual or constructive eviction of Tenant, in whole or in part; (b) entitle Tenant to any Offset; (c) entitle Tenant to any damages, or impose any liability on Landlord, on account of any loss, expense or damage, direct or indirect, of Tenant; (d) relieve or release Tenant from any obligation under this Lease; or (e) entitle Tenant to terminate this Lease. Tenant waives all benefits of any Law permitting Tenant to terminate this Lease because of any Electricity Impairment.

9.5 Cost of Consumption. Tenant shall make its own arrangements with Power Company (including posting any deposits) for payment and pay directly for all costs of electrical service to the Premises, including demand and usage charges. Landlord shall not be responsible for those costs. All meters, equipment and facilities within the Premises required to obtain electricity for the Premises shall be solely the responsibility of Tenant and Power Company. Landlord shall have no obligations regarding those matters, subject to any express obligations under this Article. Even though Tenant may install its own direct service, Landlord may retain, at Landlord’s cost, sufficient service capacity with Power Company, as Landlord’s engineer determines, to satisfy all base building (HVAC, elevator, etc.), public light and power requirements and electrical requirements for all other leasable space in the Building, but this shall not limit Landlord’s obligation to reserve for Tenant sufficient capacity to deliver Tenant’s Wattage to the Premises. To the extent insufficient electrical power remains for Tenant, Tenant shall at its expense obtain new electrical service, including negotiations with Power Company, the cost of building a vault, paying rent for the space to house a new vault, cost of new switchgear, distribution costs for those electrical services, and reimbursement of Landlord’s third party expenses, all in a way that does not diminish or impair present or potential Utility service to the rest of the Building. Except to the extent that Landlord elects otherwise, all electrical equipment shall remain in place as Landlord’s property when this Lease expires. Tenant shall give Landlord copies of Tenant’s direct utility bills promptly on request.

9.6 Electrical Devices. Tenant shall not use any device in the Premises that: (a) uses current in excess of 110 volts; or (b) would cause Tenant's electrical demand load to exceed Tenant's Wattage. Tenant shall not connect with electric current except through existing outlets in the Premises or additional outlets installed in the Premises as part of Work that comply with this Lease.

9.7 Energy Reporting. If any Law requires Landlord to calculate and report on Utility consumption in the Building, then Tenant shall promptly comply with Landlord's reasonable requests for information from Tenant so Landlord can comply with that Law.

9.8 Rebates. If Power Company pays any rebate to either party for installations of equipment, that rebate shall belong to [Landlord] [whichever party paid for that installation of equipment].

10. Cleaning

10.1 Generally. Tenant shall maintain the Premises in a clean, neat, safe and orderly condition. Tenant shall keep the Premises free from vermin and perform pest spraying and extermination as Landlord reasonably requires. Tenant shall adopt and implement other sanitation and health programs as Landlord reasonably requires from time to time. If Landlord from time to time designates any cleaning, window cleaning, plant care, or maintenance contractor, then Tenant shall engage its services, and engage no other contractor for those services, provided the fees of Landlord's contractor are reasonably competitive. Tenant shall clean the interior of all windows that serve the Premises, all as Law requires. Tenant shall not clean the exterior of any windows. Landlord shall do so under a reasonable schedule. If Tenant desires additional window cleaning, Tenant may order it, at Tenant's expense, directly from Landlord's window cleaning contractor. If Landlord and Tenant cannot agree on whether the fees charged by Landlord's designated contractor are competitive, Landlord and Tenant shall each obtain two bona fide bids for that work from qualified contractors in the City. The average of the four bids shall be the standard of comparison. Tenant may use its own employees to clean the Premises, including windows.

10.2 Garbage. Tenant shall keep the Premises and the Common Areas serving the Premises free from Garbage resulting from Tenant's operations. [Tenant shall be solely responsible for its Garbage removal at its expense.] Tenant shall comply with Landlord's instructions on Garbage storage and separation, and keep Tenant's Garbage storage area in a clean and sanitary condition satisfactory to Landlord, whether or not any Tenant Party caused any unsatisfactory conditions in that area. Tenant shall collect in accordance with Law and Landlord's procedures all Garbage produced, caused by, or otherwise resulting from the use, occupancy, and operation of the Premises, Tenant's Work, the conduct of Tenant's business, or otherwise from Tenant's activities in the Premises. [Landlord shall be responsible for Garbage pickup and removal.] To the extent that Tenant generates Garbage beyond that normally generated by typical office activities, Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for Landlord's extra costs, as Landlord reasonably estimates them. Landlord may from time to time establish, and Tenant shall comply with, a reasonable schedule for Garbage collection.

10.3 Landlord's Cleaning. Provided that Tenant complies with its cleaning obligations under this Lease, Landlord shall, on Business Days, provide routine janitorial and cleaning services, limited to emptying and removing general office refuse, dusting, and light vacuuming, all in accordance with Landlord's reasonable cleaning specifications for the Building in effect from time to time.¹⁴ Landlord's obligations shall not include any cleaning or janitorial work the need for which arises from any unusual or extraordinary activities in the Premises, including preparation of food, move-in, move-out, removal of furniture crates, and the like.

11. Compliance with Law

11.1 Generally. Tenant shall promptly and timely comply with all Laws, whether that compliance requires work or remedial measures to the Premises (excluding Structure) that are ordinary or extraordinary, foreseen or unforeseen, or expenditures that are capital in nature, and otherwise perform all actions necessary or appropriate to preserve and keep in full force and effect all Approvals, but only to the extent that the need for that compliance arises from Tenant's particular manner of use or occupancy of the Premises or acts or omissions. If any Law requires actions or expenditures be undertaken generically for space being used for the Permitted Use, Landlord shall be responsible for those actions and expenditures. If, as a result of Tenant's activities, any Law requires any Work in Common Areas, then Landlord shall perform that Work at Tenant's expense, in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord.

11.2 Approvals. Except to the extent that Landlord elects by Notice to Tenant to seek to obtain them at Tenant's expense, Tenant shall at its sole cost and expense obtain every Approval necessary or appropriate for Tenant's Work, and give Landlord copies of them promptly after issuance.

11.3 Right to Contest. Tenant may, in its name, contest, in any manner Law allows, the validity or enforcement of any Law that applies to Tenant, and may defer compliance with that Law (a "Contest"), but only so long as: (a) no Default exists; (b) Tenant Notifies Landlord of the Contest; (c) in Landlord's reasonable judgment, the Contest exposes Landlord to no (1) material risk of any liability or penalty, (2) risk of criminal liability or (3) material risk that the Building may be subject to any Lien or mandatory sale; (d) the Contest complies with Landlord's Financing; and (e) if Landlord requires, before starting a Contest involving compliance whose cost Landlord reasonably estimates could exceed 15% of Tenant's annual Base Rent, Tenant has delivered to Landlord a surety bond or other security reasonably satisfactory to Landlord (and satisfactory to Landlord's Lender/Lessor(s)), to Indemnify Landlord and its Lenders/Lessors against Tenant's Contest. Tenant has no right to contest Property Taxes or any underlying assessment(s).

12. Repairs and Maintenance

12.1 Tenant's Obligations. Tenant shall maintain the Premises and all equipment and fixtures in and serving solely the Premises (excluding the Structure), and all signs for the Premises, in first-class condition, repair and appearance. Tenant shall make all repairs necessary or appropriate to the Premises and all equipment, fixtures and systems in and solely serving the Premises (including mechanical, electric and plumbing systems and any Utility lines installed by or for Tenant), excluding in each case the Structure. Tenant shall make all repairs and improvements to the Premises (excluding the Structure) that Law requires, except to the extent Landlord's responsibility under this Lease. Tenant shall make all repairs in a way satisfactory to Landlord and in compliance with the provisions of this Lease on Work. Tenant shall paint all painted surfaces and treat all architectural finishes in the Premises as often as required, in Landlord's reasonable determination, to maintain them in first-class condition and to a consistent standard of appearance throughout the Premises.

12.2 Landlord's Obligations. Landlord shall perform, and Tenant need not perform, maintenance and repairs affecting these elements of the Building, except (at Landlord's option, but at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee) to the extent the need for those repairs directly or indirectly arose from any Tenant Party's negligent or intentional acts or omissions (including Tenant's Work), from any activity conducted in the Premises or Tenant's particular manner of use or occupancy of the Premises, or to the extent that this Lease expressly requires Tenant to maintain or repair the Building or the Premises: Common Areas; Structure; Utility lines serving the Building as a whole, but not Tenant's distribution lines; Building exterior; any areas of the Building or Land except the Premises (unless required to be maintained by third-party Utility providers); and plumbing in any restroom Landlord installed. Except to the extent that this paragraph requires Landlord to repair and maintain the Building or this Lease requires Landlord to restore Landlord-Restored Damage, Landlord shall have no obligation to maintain or repair the Building or the Premises. Tenant waives any Law: (a) inconsistent with the foregoing or (b) that allows Tenant to make repairs at Landlord's expense. Landlord shall perform under this paragraph in accordance with standards for Comparable Buildings. Nothing in this paragraph: (a) limits any express obligations of Landlord under this Lease; or (b) requires Landlord to maintain or repair Tenant's Initial Work or other Work Tenant initiated.

12.3 Equipment. Tenant shall pay Landlord for the cost to repair any equipment that serves only Tenant or the Premises, to the extent that Landlord repairs it. Landlord need not repair or maintain that equipment except to the extent Landlord agrees to do so in writing.

12.4 Miscellaneous. Tenant shall promptly replace any broken door closers or burnt-out light bulbs serving the Premises. If the Premises is located on the ground floor, or to the extent that windows separate the Premises from any pedestrian walkway, Tenant shall maintain, repair and replace the windows of the Premises. Otherwise, if any exterior window breaks: (a) Landlord shall replace it; and (b) Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's reasonable expense in doing so, plus an Administrative Fee, if in Landlord's reasonable determination any Tenant Party caused that breakage.

12.5 No Damage. No Tenant Party shall destroy, deface or damage the Building. Tenant shall repair (or, at Landlord's option, reimburse Landlord for the cost to repair, plus an Administrative Fee) any damage any Tenant Party causes, all in a way satisfactory to Landlord.

12.6 Notice of Repairs. Tenant shall promptly Notify Landlord of condition affecting the Building that this Lease or Law requires Landlord to repair. Landlord shall have no obligation to maintain, repair or replace until a reasonable time after Landlord receives that Notice.

13. Operations

13.1 Building Rules. Tenant shall comply with all Building Rules. If Tenant fails to Notify Landlord of Tenant's reasonable objection to any new or changed Building Rule within 15 days after Landlord Notifies Tenant of it, then Tenant shall have waived any right to object to it. Landlord shall have no: (a) obligation to enforce Building Rules against any tenant; or (b) liability to Tenant for any other tenant's breach of any Building Rule. Landlord may enforce any Building Rule against Tenant whether or not Landlord actively enforces it against other tenant(s).

13.2 No Interference. Tenant shall not interfere with, diminish or impair the peace, quiet or comfort of Landlord, other tenants or other Persons in the Building or in the neighborhood near the Building, or otherwise materially adversely affect the environment at, around or near the Building. Tenant shall not cause or permit unreasonable noise, vibration or sounds to be emitted from the Premises. Tenant shall not cause or permit any odors or fumes to be released from the Premises, and shall take all actions reasonably necessary, in Landlord's reasonable determination, to eliminate odors. Tenant shall conduct no activities that cause odors or fumes.

13.3 No Discrimination. No Tenant Party shall discriminate against any Person in violation of Law. Tenant shall timely prepare and submit such reports, forms, questionnaires and other documents as any Government from time to time requires to evidence compliance with this paragraph.

13.4 Storage. Tenant shall not store or otherwise locate, leave or install any bicycle, cart, equipment, food deliveries, Garbage, inventory or other personal property of any kind anywhere in or near the Building outside the Premises. Landlord may, without notice, remove anything that violates the previous sentence. Tenant shall pay Landlord the cost of that removal, plus a fee of $50 per occurrence.

13.5 Deliveries and Access. Tenant shall receive deliveries and obtain access to the Premises only under procedures and schedules that Landlord reasonably approves or establishes.

13.6 Signage. Except as this Lease expressly permits, Tenant shall attach no banner, streamer, decal, poster or other temporary or permanent sign or posting of any kind to the exterior of the Building (include any window of the Building), or in the Premises (including the interior side of any window) at any location visible outside the Premises. Window treatments and signs require Landlord's prior written approval, not to be unreasonably withheld so long as they otherwise comply with this Lease. Nothing in this paragraph prevents Tenant from installing any signs that Law requires.

13.7 Building Directory. For each floor in the Premises, Tenant may without charge have ___ listing(s) in any Building directory, in Landlord's standard format. If Landlord allows additional listings, or at Tenant's request modifies, supplements or replaces, any listing previously posted for Tenant, Tenant shall pay Landlord's reasonable fee for those listings.

13.8 Conservation and Recycling. Tenant shall comply with all Laws that apply to the Premises or to Landlord (and all reasonable voluntary programs that Landlord adopts from time to time) on collection, conservation, disposal, reclamation, recycling or separation of water, Garbage and other matter (liquid or solid) Tenant generates.

13.9 Common Areas. Tenant and its employees and invitees may use the Common Areas in the Term, in common with Landlord and other persons Landlord authorizes from time to time, subject to Building Rules. Landlord shall operate, manage, equip, light, repair, clean and maintain the Common Areas as Landlord reasonably determines appropriate. Landlord may temporarily close any Common Area for repairs or Work, to prevent dedication to the public or accrual of prescriptive rights or for any other reason, but Tenant shall nevertheless be entitled to access to the Premises. Landlord shall have sole and exclusive control of the Common Areas. Landlord may from time to time restrain any use or occupancy of the Common Areas except as Building Rules allow, subject however to Tenant's rights to access to the Premises under this Lease. Tenant's rights in the Common Areas are subject to rights of Landlord, Landlord's other tenants and the invitees and licensees of all the foregoing, to use the Common Areas in common with Tenant. Tenant shall keep the Common Areas free and clear of obstructions created or permitted by Tenant or resulting from Tenant's operations. If in Landlord's opinion any unauthorized persons use Common Areas because of Tenant's presence in the Building, then Tenant, upon Landlord's demand (or, at Landlord's option, Landlord at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee), shall restrain that unauthorized use by appropriate proceedings.

13.10 Building Access. Landlord may promulgate from time to time procedures for Building access. Tenant shall comply with them. If Landlord establishes access control equipment or procedures, this imposes no obligations on Landlord. Landlord shall have no liability or responsibility if that equipment or procedures malfunction or fail to operate. Landlord has no obligation to establish or promulgate any security procedures for the Building or to require any tenant to implement security procedures. Tenant shall be solely responsible for access control in the Premises. Tenant's installation or material modification of any equipment or device for that purpose constitutes an Alteration.

14. Landlord's Access and Work

14.1 Throughout Term. Landlord and its designees may enter the Premises on reasonable oral notice to Tenant to: (a) inspect, including to ascertain Tenant's compliance with this Lease; (b) perform repairs or Work, if any, that this Lease permits or requires of Landlord; (c) supply services this Lease requires; (d) in the last year of the Term, show the Premises to prospective tenants; and (e) show the Premises to prospective purchasers or mortgagees.

14.2 Reservation. Landlord reserves and excepts from the Premises elevator shafts, elevator lobbies, riser spaces, stairways, other circulation areas, chambers, shafts, electrical, telecommunications, and janitorial closets, and all other mechanical spaces in the Building as Landlord designates from time to time. The Premises do not include the structure or exterior surfaces (except Tenant's Façade) of exterior walls. Landlord reserves and excepts from the Premises the right to install, maintain, use (including turning valves on and off), repair and replace pipes, ducts, conduits, valves, wires and appurtenant fixtures leading through the Premises, either in their locations at the Signature Date or at locations that, to the extent reasonably practicable, will not materially interfere with Tenant's use of the Premises. Tenant shall not cover, conceal or impair ready access to any pipe, duct, conduit, valve, wire or appurtenant fixture of Landlord unless Tenant complies with Landlord's reasonable requirements to assure future access. During any Work Landlord or its designee does in the Premises or as reasonably necessary to facilitate Work elsewhere, Landlord or its designee may bring materials and equipment into or through the Premises at reasonable times and on reasonable Notice to Tenant (which may be oral). Landlord's exercise of its rights under this paragraph shall not constitute an eviction or entitle Tenant to any Rent abatement or damages for loss or interruption of business or otherwise.

14.3 Emergency. Landlord may enter the Premises without notice or liability to Tenant in the event of an emergency.

14.4 Keys. Tenant shall give Landlord keys (and any other devices necessary to obtain access to the Premises, e.g., security cards and codes) to all doors to and in the Premises, except vaults and similar secure areas that (a) were designated as such on plans Landlord approved; and (b) do not constitute a substantial part of the Premises.

14.5 Landlord's Work. Landlord may, from time to time, perform or allow others to perform Work on the Building interior or exterior, including Building Systems, Facade, glass, elevators, hallways and lobby. Landlord shall have no liability to Tenant, and Tenant shall be entitled to no Rent abatement, because of that Work, including installation of sidewalk bridges, sheds, scaffolds or other temporary structures, or any noise, vibration or other disturbance to Tenant's business at the Premises, including partial blockage of access to the Premises (provided Tenant still has reasonable access) any Work may cause. Landlord and its designees shall have access to the Premises at all reasonable times, upon reasonable notice, to perform that Work, without liability. Except in an emergency or upon Tenant's failure to perform repairs as this Lease requires, this paragraph does not give Landlord the right to enter the Premises to perform repairs that this Lease requires Tenant to perform. Tenant shall comply with Landlord's reasonable requirements to facilitate Work elsewhere in the Building, provided Landlord does not materially impair Tenant's use and occupancy of the Premises.

15. Indemnity

15.1 Tenant's Obligation. Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord and its Lenders/Lessors against: (a) any occurrence at, in, on, upon, or about the Premises, except to the extent caused by Landlord's gross negligence or willful misconduct; (b) Tenant's occupancy or use of the Premises, or performance of any Work; (c) any Lien caused by any Tenant Party's act or omission; (d) any act, omission or negligence of any Tenant Party, including failure to comply with Law or with this Lease; and (e) any damage to the Building and costs (including security costs) incurred because of protests, vandalism or other acts of third parties (including Tenant's employees and any union(s) representing, purporting to represent or seeking to represent them) directed at Tenant or caused by Tenant's occupying the Premises.

15.2 Litigation. If Landlord or any Lender/Lessor is made a party to any litigation for which this Lease requires Tenant to Indemnify Landlord (or any action of any kind against a Tenant Party) then, at Landlord's option, Tenant shall undertake Landlord's or that Lender/Lessor's defense. Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord and each Lender/Lessor against that litigation. Tenant shall pay all costs, including Legal Costs, that Landlord or any Lender/Lessor pays or incurs in any such litigation.

16. *Insurance*¹⁵

16.1 Obligations to Insure. Tenant shall obtain and maintain throughout the Term liability insurance for the Premises and fire, hazard, special perils and other casualty insurance (including extended coverage and vandalism and malicious mischief endorsements) for Tenant's Work, any Tenant improvements and Tenant's contents at the Premises.

16.2 Requirements. Tenant's insurance shall be in such amounts, and provide such coverages, as Landlord requires from time to time, except to the extent that Tenant establishes that Landlord's requirements exceed those in Comparable Buildings. As of the Signature Date, Landlord requires liability insurance of $5,000,000 in combined single limit liability coverage for bodily injury and property damage. If Tenant sells alcoholic beverages, then Tenant shall maintain liquor sales and dram shop liability coverage in amounts as Landlord reasonably requires. All insurance shall be written by companies licensed to do business in the State and otherwise reasonably satisfactory to Landlord with a Best's rating of A or better and financial size category of at least Class VII, or such higher standard as Landlord reasonably requires. Deductibles and terms and conditions of Tenant's insurance shall be subject to Landlord's reasonable approval. All policies and certificates of insurance shall state the carrier cannot cancel or refuse to renew without giving Landlord at least 30 days prior Notice (10 days in the case of nonpayment). Tenant's liability insurance shall include contractual liability coverage for the "Indemnity" requirements of this Lease.

16.3 Additional Requirements. Tenant shall also obtain and maintain insurance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord for plate glass (to the extent this Lease makes Tenant responsible for window repairs), water damage, lost profits, lost business, business interruption, completed operations, personal property, computers, hardware, software, data, electronic and electrical equipment, merchandise and products.

16.4 Certificate Holders. Tenant's insurance shall name all Certificate Holders as additional insured(s) as their interest(s) may appear (or loss payee in the case of building insurance) or as Landlord reasonably requests. Landlord may designate (or terminate) any Certificate Holder(s) from time to time.

16.5 Insurance Documents. On the Signature Date, Tenant shall deliver to Landlord the following (collectively, the “Insurance Documents”): (a) original policies of all insurance this Lease requires, or (if Landlord permits) form ACORD-28 evidence of that insurance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord; (b) evidence that each Certificate Holder is named as this Lease requires and that Tenant’s insurance fully complies with this Lease; (c) proof of payment of at least one year’s premiums; and (d) if Tenant delivers certificate(s) of insurance, then evidence reasonably satisfactory to Landlord that Tenant’s insurance agent can bind the carrier.¹⁶ Tenant shall deliver renewal Insurance Documents at least 30¹⁷ days before any Insurance Document or the underlying policy expires, whichever occurs first.

16.6 Waiver of Subrogation. Each party shall attempt to cause its insurance carriers to agree to a Waiver of Subrogation. If any insurance policy cannot be obtained with a Waiver of Subrogation, or if one is obtainable only at additional cost, then the party undertaking to obtain the insurance shall Notify the other of that fact. The other shall have 10 Business Days after receipt of Notice to (a) direct the party undertaking to provide insurance to place it with a company reasonably satisfactory to the other party that will issue it with a Waiver of Subrogation at no greater cost, or (b) agree to pay the additional premium. To the extent the parties obtain insurance with a Waiver of Subrogation, the parties release each other, and their Related Parties (and Landlord’s Lenders/Lessors, as to claims by Tenant), from any claims for damage to any Person or the Premises that are caused by or result from risks that such policies cover.¹⁸

16 We all know that insurance certificates provide little comfort; hence clause “d.” In the real world, most people accept insurance certificates, for what (little) they’re worth. Landlord might conceivably also ask Tenant’s insurance broker to provide a letter confirming that Tenant’s insurance program matches Lease requirements. If Landlord cares about that—and Landlord should!—then Landlord should arrange for its own review, and not rely on Tenant’s insurance broker.

17 Tenants typically try to reduce this number as much as possible, ideally to zero, based on the reality that no one renews insurance until the last minute. Even if Landlord rejects those attempts, insurance will still often create a last-minute scramble. Can Landlord obtain backup coverage in case of a loss during a brief lapse in insurance? A Landlord’s level of concern will vary depending on the type of insurance Tenant must maintain.

18 Many insurance policies automatically include a Waiver of Subrogation. This paragraph may no longer be necessary.

16.7 Compliance. Tenant shall not use the Premises in any way that results in a premium increase, or a cancellation, for any insurance for the Building. Without limiting Landlord's remedies, if because of the nature or manner of Tenant's use of the Premises Landlord cannot obtain and maintain any insurance whose amount, cost, scope, form and coverage are reasonably acceptable to Landlord, then Tenant shall pay any resulting increased premiums.

16.8 Modification of Insurance Requirements. Landlord may from time to time, by Notice to Tenant, reasonably and in any event consistent with Comparable Buildings: (a) modify or increase any insurance requirements of this Lease; or (b) require additional insurance coverages, if appropriate (for either "a" or "b") in the judgment of Landlord's insurance advisor, for any reason, including risks of Tenant's use of the Premises, inflation-related adjustments, to comply with Landlord's Financing, or because of changed circumstances.

16.9 Blanket Insurance. Tenant may provide any required insurance under blanket policy(ies) covering other premises that Tenant or its Related Parties own, occupy or operate, so long as, in Landlord's reasonable judgment, those policies comply as to terms, amounts and scope of coverage with this Lease and provide a separate fund to draw on for only this Lease and the insurance this Lease requires, regardless of claims made elsewhere.

17. *Casualty and Condemnation*¹⁹

17.1 Casualty Affecting Building. If a casualty causes any Landlord-Restored Damage that materially impairs Tenant's use of or access to the Premises, then: (a) provided no Default exists, Landlord shall reasonably promptly repair the Landlord-Restored Damage unless either party validly terminates this Lease; (b) Base Rent and Escalation Rent shall equitably abate so long as Landlord has not substantially completed repair of the Landlord-Restored Damage; (c) Tenant's obligations under this Lease shall not otherwise change; (d) the paragraph on "Tenant-Restored Damage" shall apply; and (e) this Lease shall not terminate. Landlord shall be entitled to all proceeds from insurance Landlord procured.

17.2 Landlord's Right to Terminate. If (a) the reasonably estimated cost to repair Landlord-Restored Damage exceeds an amount equal to ¹⁹ These provisions will vary with circumstances, depending in part on the size and nature of the Lease and the larger Building.

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

[$ _____] [____% of the annual Base Rent as then in effect]; or (b) the cost to repair exceeds available insurance proceeds by more than [$ _____] [____% of the then current annual Base Rent] (except by operation of the deductible under Landlord's property insurance); or (c) Landlord reasonably estimates that repair would take longer than 240 days, then Landlord may terminate this Lease by Notice to Tenant.

17.3 Tenant's Right to Terminate. If Landlord cannot or does not elect to terminate this Lease because of Landlord-Restored Damage, then Tenant shall remain fully liable for Tenant's obligations under this Lease, except as this Lease expressly states, unless: (a) Landlord reasonably estimates the Landlord-Restored Damage will take more than 180 days to repair; (b) no Default exists; and (c) within 30 days after the Casualty or Condemnation Tenant Notifies Landlord that Tenant desires to be released from this Lease and elects to terminate this Lease.

17.4 Tenant-Restored Damage. If a Casualty or Condemnation causes any Tenant-Restored Damage but does not cause any Landlord-Restored Damage, or if Landlord has repaired the Landlord-Restored Damage, then thereafter: (a) Rent shall not abate; and (b) Tenant shall reasonably promptly restore the Tenant-Restored Damage, all in compliance with the Work provisions of this Lease. Tenant may receive proceeds of all casualty insurance Tenant procured for Tenant-Restored Damage. Landlord may, however, require that a disbursement agent, selected by Tenant and reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, hold proceeds for disbursement under reasonable procedures reflecting progress of restoration. If Tenant-Restored Damage occurs in the last 24 months of the Term and prevents Tenant from conducting business in the Premises, then Tenant may terminate this Lease provided that Tenant: (a) cures any Default; (b) gives Notice to Landlord of termination within 30 days after the Casualty or Condemnation; and (c) assigns to Landlord all casualty insurance (including time element insurance but only up to the Rent otherwise payable under this Lease) proceeds otherwise payable to Tenant.

17.5 Condemnation. If any Condemnation occurs, then: (a) Landlord may, by Notice to Tenant, terminate this Lease; and (b) if the Condemnation relates to more than 50% of the Premises and materially impairs Tenant's ability to conduct its business, and no Default exists, then Tenant may, within 30 days after Landlord's Notice to Tenant of the Condemnation, terminate this Lease effective as of the date of that Condemnation. The entire Condemnation award shall belong to Landlord, except any sum expressly awarded to Tenant for trade fixtures, goodwill, and moving costs, provided it does not reduce any payment to Landlord

(or any Lender/Lessor) and Tenant cures any Default. If neither party properly terminates this Lease because of a Condemnation, then the provisions of this Lease on Landlord-Restored Damage and Tenant-Restored Damage shall apply.

18. Hazardous Substances

Tenant Parties shall not cause or permit to occur at, from or about the Building any: (a) generation, manufacture, processing, production, refining, storage, transportation or use of any Hazardous Substance, except in customary volume reasonably necessary for Tenant's business in compliance with industry standards and Law; (b) violation of any Environmental Law; or (c) Hazardous Substance Discharge. Tenant shall: (1) comply with all Environmental Laws that apply to any Tenant Party or its activities; (2) make all submissions to, provide all information required by and otherwise fully comply with all requirements of, any Government relating to "1"; (3) if any Government requires any clean-up plan or measures because of any Hazardous Substance Discharge that any Tenant Party causes or arising from any Tenant Party's activities: (i) immediately Notify Landlord; (ii) prepare and submit the required plans and all related bonds and other financial assurances; and (iii) carry out all such clean-up plans; (4) promptly give Landlord all information Landlord reasonably requests about matters referred to in this paragraph; and (5) Indemnify Landlord against any Tenant Party's violation of this paragraph.

19. Assignment or Subletting

19.1 General Prohibition. Landlord entered into this Lease with Tenant based on Tenant's skills in operating the Permitted Use(s) and an analysis of Tenant's reputation and credit. To induce Landlord to enter into, and as part of the consideration for, this Lease, Tenant agrees that (except as this Lease expressly permits) Tenant shall not cause or permit any Transfer without Landlord's prior written consent, which Landlord [may (except as this Lease otherwise expressly states) withhold for any reason or no reason] [shall not unreasonably withhold provided Tenant has complied with and satisfied: (a) the section of this Lease on "Recapture"; and (b) the "Conditions and Limitations to Landlord's Consent" set forth below]. Any Transfer made in violation of this Lease shall be null, void and of absolutely no force or effect, and shall constitute an Event of Default.

19.2 Entity Transactions. If Tenant, any constituent entity of Tenant or any Guarantor is a corporation, partnership, limited liability company, or other entity, then (unless the ownership interests in that entity are publicly traded) any transaction set forth below affecting that entity or its Equity Interests shall constitute a Transfer of this Lease, whether or not within Tenant's control. All transactions from the Signature Date to the date in question shall be aggregated.

19.2.1 Equity Interest Transfer. Any direct or indirect transfer, including by merger or consolidation, producing a change in ultimate beneficial ownership, of ___% or more of the Equity Interests of Tenant (or the direct or indirect ownership of those Equity Interests at any tier of direct or indirect ownership of Tenant) whether to the same or different transferees.

19.2.2 Other Ownership Change. Any increase or decrease in Equity Interests or any direct or indirect constituent entity or any other transaction of any kind, the effect of which is to increase or decrease by more than ___% the direct or indirect beneficial ownership of Tenant held by any Person(s).

19.3 Exempt Transfers. Landlord consents to any Exempt Transfer, if it satisfies the "Conditions and Limitations to Landlord's Consent" in this Lease.

19.4 Recapture. If Tenant seeks Landlord's approval of a Transfer (excluding an Exempt Transfer), then Tenant shall promptly give Landlord all information and documents Landlord reasonably requests for that Transfer, including a nonbinding term sheet signed by both parties, containing all material economic terms, but not necessarily fully negotiated and executed closing documents for that transaction. Beginning on the date when Tenant requested Landlord's approval and ending 30 days after Tenant has provided all information and documents the preceding sentence requires, Landlord may, by Notice to Tenant (a "Recapture Notice"), terminate this Lease²⁰ as of the date (the "Recapture Date") that is, at Landlord's option by Notice to Tenant: (a) the day immediately

20 Particularly in Landlord-friendly leasing markets, some leases allow Landlord to choose between recapturing the space and continuing the Lease while stepping into the shoes of the proposed subtenant or assignee. The second option allows Landlord to maintain the rental income under this Lease while also benefitting from whatever good deal the assignee or subtenant was able to negotiate. Such provisions require some care in drafting, to assure that the shoes Landlord steps into allow Landlord to do whatever it wishes with the recaptured space. Tenant will argue that Landlord should either recapture by terminating the Lease (thus cutting off Tenant's losses), or agree not to unreasonably stand in the way of Tenant's transaction, but Landlord should not be able to both retain the Lease revenues and frustrate Tenant's exit transaction. Landlord views all of this as a reasonable revenue opportunity of the type that periodically arises as a result of building ownership.

before the proposed effective date of the Transfer; (b) the date 90 days after delivery of the Recapture Notice; or (c) any date between “a” and “b” that Landlord designates. If Landlord timely gives a Recapture Notice, then the “Expiration Date” shall be accelerated to the Recapture Date. If Tenant’s proposed Transfer affects only part of the Premises (the “Recapture Space”), then this Lease shall terminate only for the Recapture Space. It shall continue to apply, in a proportionate manner as Landlord reasonably determines, to the remaining Premises. Landlord shall, at Tenant’s expense (including an Administrative Fee), install demising walls and other Work as necessary to permit separate occupancy of the Recapture Space. [If Landlord does not timely give a Recapture Notice, then Landlord shall not unreasonably withhold Landlord’s consent to the proposed Transfer, provided that Tenant consummates it: (a) in a way substantially consistent (and fully consistent in all material economic respects) with the information Tenant gave Landlord under this paragraph; and (b) within 45 days after Landlord’s approval.]²¹

19.5 Conditions and Limitations to Landlord’s Consent. If Landlord consents to any Transfer including Landlord’s consent to any Exempt Transfer provided for in this Lease, Tenant shall comply with these requirements and conditions for that Transfer. These requirements and conditions apply to any Transfer, including any Exempt Transfer, any Transfer this Lease expressly allows and any Transfer for which Landlord must act reasonably in consenting or not.

19.5.1 Conditions Precedent. Tenant shall give Landlord at least 15 days prior Notice of the Transfer, with a processing fee of $____. The proposed Transfer (except an Exempt Transfer) shall be consummated within 45 days after Landlord’s consent. No Transfer shall be consummated if: (a) any Default exists, unless cured at or before the Transfer; or (b) Tenant has not completed Tenant’s Initial Work and performed any other obligations this Lease requires Tenant to perform by Tenant’s Completion Deadline or any other date.

19.5.2 Advertising. Any advertising or circulars on availability of the Premises for Transfer shall be subject to Landlord’s reasonable approval. Any publicized asking price per rentable square foot shall equal or exceed Landlord’s then current asking price.

19.5.3 Separate Occupancies. The Premises shall in no event contain more than [a single legal occupancy] [____ separate legal occupancies].

²¹ The preceding sentence usually appears in a “market standard” Lease.

19.5.4 Transferee. Without otherwise limiting any other restriction that applies to any Transfer, no Transfer shall be made to any Person, even if otherwise permitted, if Landlord reasonably determines that such Person or its Related Party: (a) has, in the preceding year, materially defaulted under any commercial lease; (b) is disqualified from entering into contracts with any Government; (c) otherwise has a poor credit record or business reputation; (d) has been convicted of a felony; (e) is immune from suit, an agency or instrumentality of any Government, or a religious or political organization; (f) occupies other space in the Building, unless fully occupied at the time; (g) competes, or has at any time been in litigation, with Landlord or its Related Party; or (h) would violate Landlord's Financing.

19.5.5 Closing Requirements. For an Assignment, the transferee shall assume all obligations under this Lease. All references to "Tenant" in this Lease shall then refer to the assignee, except where the context requires otherwise. The transferee shall deliver to Landlord any documents Landlord reasonably requires to evidence the transferee's due execution of the Lease assumption. The transferor shall: (a) retain full liability under this Lease, not merely liability as a surety or guarantor; and (b) before closing, execute and deliver to Landlord documents reasonably satisfactory to Landlord to confirm that liability. Any Default affecting a transferor shall be deemed a Default. If Landlord holds any guaranty(ies), then all principals of the assignee shall join in such Guaranty(ies). That joinder shall not release or limit any obligation of any previous Guarantor(s).²²

19.5.6 Subordination, Attornment, Etc. For any sublease or similar transaction, if this Lease terminates or is cancelled: (a) the subtenant or other transferee shall attorn to Landlord, at Landlord's option; and (b) if Landlord accepts payment from the subtenant or other transferee but does not request attornment in writing, then Landlord shall not have accepted that subtenant or other transferee as a direct tenant and Landlord may terminate its rights at any time. The documents for any such transaction shall, and shall be deemed to, incorporate by reference the preceding sentence.

19.5.7 Increase of Security. If at the time of any Assignment, the Security is less than ___ months' then-current Base Rent, then Tenant shall increase the Security to that amount.

22 Tenant will often negotiate a release of any guaranty if a replacement Guarantor steps in and meets a certain financial standard.

19.5.8 Post-Closing. Within 10 days after any Transfer, Tenant shall give Landlord an unredacted and complete copy of all documents for that Transfer, all reasonably satisfactory to Landlord.

19.5.9 Miscellaneous. Tenant shall pay all transfer and other taxes (and interest and penalties) assessed or payable for any Transfer. Landlord's consent (or waiver of its rights) for any Transfer shall not waive Landlord's right to consent to a later Transfer.

19.6 Tenant's Ownership. If Tenant is a corporation, limited liability company, or other entity (unless publicly traded), then: (a) Tenant represents and warrants that as of the Signature Date, Tenant's Owners own 100% of the Equity Interests of Tenant; and (b) on Landlord's reasonable request, Tenant shall deliver to Landlord a certified statement by Tenant's outside accountant listing all direct and indirect owners and officers of Tenant and their then-current Equity Interests.

19.7 Effect of Assignment. If Landlord receives notice of any Assignment and a copy or purported copy of the instrument(s) actually or purportedly effecting that Assignment, then without limiting Landlord's remedies under this Lease Landlord may (provided that Landlord acts in good faith) deal with the purported transferee as "Tenant" under this Lease for all purposes, including Lease amendments. Provided that Landlord acts in good faith, Landlord need not inquire as to the genuineness or accuracy of any instrument of Assignment or purported copy of any such instrument.

20. Incremental Value

If Tenant Transfers this Lease, except an Exempt Transfer, for consideration of any kind (including a sublease of any or all Premises at a subrent exceeding the Base Rent and Escalation Rent, as Landlord reasonably allocates them on a per-square-foot basis (the "Excess Subrent")), then Tenant shall pay Landlord, as additional consideration for Tenant's occupancy of the Premises, an amount (the "Incremental Value Payment") equal to 50%²³ of an amount (the "Incremental Value") equal to the sum of (a) that consideration and any Excess Subrent minus (b) Tenant's Transaction Costs. Tenant shall pay any Incremental Value Payment at closing of the Transfer and monthly for Excess Subrent. Consideration

23 This usually seems to be 50% in New York City office and small retail leases. Stronger retail tenants can sometimes eliminate the concept entirely, or helpfully suggest that they will agree to it only if Landlord also agrees to participate in "losses" and not just "profits" on a sublease.

shall include the aggregate amount of payment(s) for Tenant's furnishings, fixtures and equipment, but only to the extent they exceed Tenant's adjusted basis for federal income tax purposes, as certified by Tenant's outside certified public accountant. For a Sublease with Excess Subrent, Tenant shall amortize Tenant's Transaction Costs over the term of that Sublease (including any option terms) in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord. Tenant's "Transaction Costs" means Tenant's actual bona fide third party out of pocket costs of the Transfer, including brokerage commissions, attorneys' fees, cost of new Work, and other actual and reasonable third party expenses that Tenant would not have incurred but for the Transfer, all as reasonably approved by Landlord.²⁴ Landlord shall make all calculations and determinations under this paragraph. Landlord's reasonable determination or calculation shall be final. Tenant shall give Landlord information, documents, and invoices Landlord requires to make those calculations and determinations. If Tenant does not, Landlord may estimate them. That estimate shall govern unless and until Tenant establishes it is wrong. If Landlord requires, Tenant shall confirm the amount and timing of Incremental Value Payment(s) in writing before the Transfer closes, unless: (a) the Transfer is a Bankruptcy Transfer; (b) a bona fide dispute exists on the Incremental Value Payment; and (c) delay in closing would impair Tenant's ability to reorganize. To the extent Tenant receives any consideration for any Transfer for which Tenant owes an Incremental Value Payment, that consideration constitutes Landlord's property. Tenant shall hold it in trust for Landlord and promptly give it to Landlord. The requirement to pay Incremental Value Payments does not prevent, limit, restrict or impair Tenant in any way from Transferring this Lease, to the extent this Lease otherwise allows any Transfer. To the contrary, the obligation to pay Incremental Value Payments merely allocates any Incremental Value created between the Signature Date and the date of Transfer from any increase in rental value of the Premises, thus defining the scope of the parties' property interests under this Lease. Landlord owns any Incremental Value to the extent this paragraph provides. The value of the Lease to Tenant, whether or not a Bankruptcy Event exists, must be adjusted based on the parties' freely negotiated sharing of any Incremental Value from a Transfer. That negotiated sharing does not limit Tenant's ability to close any Bankruptcy Transfer or any other Transfer this Lease permits.

21. Quiet Enjoyment

²⁴ Tenant will often want to include vacancy period and free rent, plus anything else Tenant can think of.

So long as no Event of Default exists, Tenant shall peaceably and quietly hold and enjoy the Premises for the Term, without hindrance or interruption by Landlord or any other Person(s) lawfully claiming by, through or under Landlord, subject to the terms of this Lease and any matters to which this Lease is subordinate. Nothing in this Lease gives Tenant any easement of light, air or view.

22. Option Term(s)

If the Basic Terms grant Tenant any Option Term(s) (each, an “Option”), then for each Option:

22.1 Exercise. Landlord must receive Notice of Tenant’s exercise of an Option for a particular Option Term in this period (the “Option Exercise Period” for that Option Term): (a) beginning on the date 24 calendar months before the first day of the Option Term; and (b) ending at 5:00 p.m. on the last Business Day before the date 12 calendar months before the first day of the Option Term. Time is of the essence for Tenant’s exercise of any Option. Any purported exercise of any Option shall be null and void if: (a) given at any time except in the Option Exercise Period for that Option; (b) any Transfer of this Lease (except an Exempt Transfer) has occurred during or before that Option Exercise Period; (c) any previous Option expired without exercise; or (d) at the time of exercise or the last day of the Term (before the Option Term), an Event of Default exists. Tenant waives any right that Tenant might otherwise have to require Landlord to accept Tenant’s exercise of an Option outside the Option Exercise Period. Tenant assumes full responsibility to maintain a record of any Option Exercise Period. If Landlord waives strict compliance with any Option Exercise Period, that waiver shall not apply to any later Option Exercise Period. If Tenant validly exercises an Option in an Option Exercise Period, then the “Term” shall extend to include the corresponding Option Term, and the “Expiration Date” shall become the last day of that Option Term.

22.2 Failure to Exercise. If Tenant does not validly exercise an Option in its Option Exercise Period, then the Term shall unconditionally expire and terminate as of the then-applicable Expiration Date. After that, Tenant shall have no rights to the Premises, nor any right to exercise any other Option(s). Tenant waives and disclaims any rights under, and covenants not to assert, any Law that would extend any Option Exercise Period or validate any Option exercise outside an Option Exercise Period.

22.3 Option Terms. In any Option Term, this Lease shall continue on the same terms that applied in the last Lease Year before that Option Term, except as follows. Unless the Basic Terms provide otherwise, Base Rent in any Option Term shall be the greater of (a) the Base Rent in the last Lease Year before the Option Term;²⁵ and (b) Fair Market Rent as of the first day of the Option Term. Tenant shall also continue to pay all Additional Rent, except that Base Operating Expenses and Base Property Taxes shall use a Base Operating Year and a Base Property Tax Year that both include the first day of the Option Term. Landlord need not provide any Landlord's Initial Work or Abatement Period for any Option Term. After any Option Term, Tenant shall have no further Option Term(s) except to the extent that the Basic Terms provide for them.

22.4 Definition: Fair Market Rent. The "Fair Market Rent" means, given market conditions in the Option Exercise Period, the Base Rent that a hypothetical tenant and a hypothetical landlord would agree upon for the Premises, assuming a hypothetical lease for a term equal to the Option Term and otherwise on all the terms of this Lease (including a new Base Operating Year and a new Base Property Tax Year, each of which shall include the first day of the Option Term) as they apply in the Option Term. That Base Rent shall be periodically adjusted in accordance with any periodic Base Rent adjustments that applied under this Lease before the Option Term.²⁶ Fair Market Rent shall: (a) take into account those subsequent adjustments; (b) assume Landlord delivered the Premises to Tenant in its then-current condition, with no need for any Work, and allowed an Abatement Period or other "free rent" or rent abatement consistent with then current market conditions (although Tenant shall not be entitled to any Abatement Period); and (c) otherwise take into account all applicable provisions of this Lease. [If the Option Term is less than seven years, then Fair Market Rent in each year of the Option Term shall be determined as if the Option Term were seven years. The Fair Market Rent as so determined shall apply within the actual Option Term.]²⁷

22.5 Notice from Landlord; Tenant's Rights. Within 30 days after Tenant exercises any Option, Landlord shall Notify Tenant of Landlord's proposed Fair Market Rent for the Option Term ("Landlord's Fair Market

25 This "floor" is probably unreasonable but it is market standard except in very Tenant-friendly situations. If the Lease contemplated annual bumps, Landlord would like the "floor" to include the usual annual bump for that year.

26 Explain very specifically how future Base Rent adjustments will work.

27 Bracketed language responds to the fact that some people believe it may be hard to determine Fair Market Rent for Lease terms below seven years, because they are rarely agreed to.

Rent Notice”). Late delivery of Landlord’s Fair Market Rent Notice shall not adversely affect either party’s rights. Tenant may, by Notice given within 15 days after receipt of Landlord’s Fair Market Rent Notice (a “Dispute Notice”), dispute Landlord’s proposed Fair Market Rent and invoke this appraisal procedure. If Tenant does not deliver a timely Dispute Notice, Base Rent in the Option Term shall be based on Landlord’s Fair Market Rent Notice.

22.6 Commencement of Appraisal Process. The parties shall endeavor, for 15 days after Landlord’s receipt of Tenant’s Dispute Notice, to agree upon Fair Market Rent. If the parties cannot, Landlord shall request that the President of [the Real Estate Board of New York, Inc.] (or if that organization does not exist, its successor or a similar industry organization Landlord designates), select a qualified real estate appraiser that is not a Related Party of either party (the “Arbitrator”) to resolve the dispute. All communications between Landlord or Tenant and the Arbitrator shall be in writing with a copy to the other party.

22.7 Two Proposals. Within 15 days after selection of the Arbitrator, Landlord and Tenant shall each simultaneously submit to the Arbitrator (with a simultaneous copy to the other party) a written proposal of Fair Market Rent, with any written supporting information the submitter desires to include.

22.8 “Baseball” Selection. The Arbitrator shall within 30 days after selection choose either (a) Landlord’s Fair Market Rent; or (b) Tenant’s Fair Market Rent, whichever (“a” or “b”) the Arbitrator believes is closer to Fair Market Rent. The Arbitrator shall have no authority to set any Fair Market Rent except “a” or “b.” The Arbitrator shall certify it has considered all information it considers relevant, but need not otherwise justify, substantiate, or explain its choice. The Arbitrator’s determination shall bind the parties in the affected Option Term. In no event, however, shall Base Rent in any Option Term be less than Base Rent in the last Lease Year before that Option Term.

22.9 Payments. Until the Arbitrator has selected Landlord’s or Tenant’s Fair Market Rent, Tenant shall pay Base Rent consistent with Landlord’s Fair Market Rent. If the Arbitrator selects Tenant’s Fair Market Rent, Landlord shall promptly refund to Tenant any previous excess payments of Base Rent, with interest on that excess at the Prime Rate.

23. End of Term

23.1 Automatic Termination. This Lease shall terminate on the Expiration Date with no need for Landlord to Notify Tenant of that termination. Tenant waives any Notice to vacate or quit the Premises on the Expiration Date.

23.1 Required Condition of Premises. Unless Landlord elects otherwise by Notice to Tenant, or as this paragraph otherwise states, at the Expiration Date Tenant shall: (a) leave the Premises vacant, in good broom-clean condition; (b) remove Tenant's personal property, signs and Work; (c) repair all damage from the foregoing; (d) leave any HVAC that Tenant installed or maintained in good working condition; and (e) give Landlord all documentation for Tenant's HVAC service contracts. Tenant need not, however, repair any damage, or remove any Work, to the extent that: (x) in Landlord's reasonable judgment not doing so would not reduce the desirability or rentability of the Premises or materially increase the next tenant's fixturing or demolition costs (for example, failure to remove raised floors, vaults or other special installations would increase the next tenant's costs); (y) any damage arises from reasonable wear and tear; or (z) this Lease otherwise expressly excuses Tenant from performing that repair or removal.²⁸

23.2 *Cabling.*²⁹ By giving Notice before (or within 30 days after) any termination of this Lease, Landlord may elect to: (a) retain any or all Cabling; or (b) remove any or all Cabling and restore the Premises and risers and other common areas to their condition before Tenant installed its Cabling (the "Cabling Restoration Work"). Landlord shall perform Cabling Restoration Work, or may require Tenant to perform Cabling Restoration Work, in either case at Tenant's sole cost and expense. Landlord's rights and Tenant's obligations under this paragraph shall survive expiration or termination of this Lease. If Landlord elects to retain Cabling, Tenant covenants that Tenant: (a) shall be the sole owner of that Cabling, with good right to surrender it; and (b) Tenant shall leave all Cabling in good condition, working order, properly labeled at each end and in each closet and junction box and in safe condition, free of Liens. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, Landlord may retain Tenant's Security Deposit after expiration or sooner termination of 28 The preceding sentence is more Tenant-friendly than many Leases, but represents a common agreed outcome. Landlord could edit this Lease to require removal of all Work, creating a future profit center for Landlord.

29 This requirement, a response to the ever-increasing tangle of abandoned wiring that accumulates in any Building, is nonstandard. A Tenant may consider it excessive. Landlord may prefer to drop the notice requirement and make up its mind now on what Landlord will require.

the Lease until the earlier of these events: (a) Landlord elects to retain the Cabling; or (b) Tenant has completed and paid for Cabling Restoration Work. If Tenant fails or refuses to pay all costs of Cabling Restoration Work within 10 Business Days after receiving Landlord's bill, Landlord may pay it from Tenant's Security Deposit, but this does not limit or waive any other right or remedy.

23.4 Abandonment. If Tenant leaves any property, including property in which a third party has any interest, in the Premises after the Expiration Date, then Landlord may dispose of it at Tenant's expense, or keep it as abandoned property. If Tenant has removed Tenant's property from the Premises (except property this Lease requires or allows Tenant to leave), and Landlord reasonably determines Tenant does not intend to return, Landlord may immediately enter, and perform Work in, the Premises. That shall not entitle Tenant to any Rent abatement or claims against Landlord, or affect this Lease or Tenant's obligations.

24. Security for Tenant's Performance

24.1 Delivery and Use of Security. On the Signature Date, Tenant is depositing with Landlord the Security.³⁰ Landlord shall hold it in compliance with Law. If Law requires, Landlord shall hold (and notifies Tenant that Landlord holds) the Security in Security Deposit Bank. Landlord may change Security Deposit Bank by Notice to Tenant. Tenant shall not assign or encumber any Security or attempt to do so. Any such action shall not bind Landlord. Landlord may apply Security to pay any Rent not paid when due. This shall not limit Landlord's other remedies. After Landlord applies any Security: (a) Landlord shall reasonably promptly Notify Tenant; and (b) Tenant shall replenish the Security on demand. The Security shall remain constant except: (a) if the Base Rent increases, Landlord may require Tenant to increase the Security in proportion;³¹ and (b) as this Lease otherwise provides. Tenant may not use Security to pay Rent. Within a reasonable time after the Expiration Date, unless the Expiration Date occurred because of an Event of Default, Landlord shall return any remaining Security.

24.2 Tax Documents. Tenant certifies under penalty of perjury: (a) its correct Taxpayer Identification Number is as stated below its signature; and (b) the Internal Revenue Service has not notified it that it is subject to back-up withholding. Tenant shall promptly on request complete, sign and return to Landlord any document that Landlord reasonably requests for Tenant's receipt of interest on the Security. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, subject to Law: (a) the Security shall not bear interest until Tenant has given Landlord a filled-out and signed "W-9" form; and (b) before Landlord remits to Tenant any interest on the Security, Landlord may apply it to increase the Security as this Lease requires.

30 If Security exceeds a year's Base Rent, this may create bankruptcy issues. See Chapters of this work on letters of credit.

31 Clause "a" is nonstandard, but a reasonable Landlord requirement.

24.3 Transfer. If Landlord transfers Landlord's interest in the Premises, then Landlord shall turn over the Security to the new Landlord and reasonably promptly Notify Tenant of Landlord's transfer, the new Landlord's name and address, and any change in Security Deposit Bank. When the transferor Landlord has done so, it shall no longer be responsible for the Security. Only the new Landlord shall be responsible, until it has applied or transferred the Security in compliance with this Lease.

24.4 Bankruptcy. Immediately before any Bankruptcy Event affecting Tenant, unless Landlord elects otherwise in writing, the entire Security shall automatically be deemed to have been applied as follows, whether or not Landlord actually does so: (a) first, to pay unpaid Rent for periods before the Bankruptcy Event; and (b) second, to Landlord in partial payment of Landlord's damages for Tenant's Default. Landlord may disburse the Security accordingly.

24.5 Use of L/C Security. If the Security exceeds $50,000,³² then Tenant may, except in a Default Period, substitute a letter of credit (the "L/C Security") for all cash Security, as follows.

24.5.1 Form and Delivery of L/C Security. If Tenant elects to deliver L/C Security, then Tenant shall provide Landlord, and maintain in full force and effect throughout the Term, a letter of credit substantially in the form of Exhibit __ issued by an issuer reasonably satisfactory to Landlord ("L/C Issuer"),³³ in the amount of the entire Security, with an initial term of at least one year. If, at the Expiration Date, any Rent remains uncalculated or unpaid, then: (a) Landlord shall with reasonable diligence complete any necessary calculations; (b) Tenant shall extend the expiry date of the L/C Security from time to time as Landlord reasonably 32 If the Security exceeds a year's rent, then Landlord should insist on obtaining the Security, or an L/C, from the Guarantor and not from the Tenant. See the Chapters of this work on letters of credit.

33 Landlord may want to set standards for L/C Issuer, e.g., a New York Clearinghouse Bank and a net worth of at least $_____.

requires; and (c) in that extended period, Landlord shall not unreasonably refuse to consent to an appropriate reduction of the L/C Security. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's Legal Costs, as estimated by Landlord's counsel, in handling Landlord's acceptance of L/C Security or its replacement or extension. Tenant shall pay all L/C Issuer fees for issuing, amending, extending, replacing or accommodating any transfer of L/C Security.

24.5.2 Noncompliant L/C Security. On the Signature Date, Landlord may accept L/C Security that does not comply strictly with Exhibit __. Landlord may then, for 60 days after the Signature Date, by Notice, require Tenant to have the L/C Security modified or reissued to comply strictly with Exhibit __ (a "Corrective Reissuance"). If Tenant does not accomplish a Corrective Reissuance within 60 days after that Notice, then Landlord may draw the entire L/C Security and hold the proceeds as cash Security. If Tenant's L/C Security delivered on the Signature Date strictly complies with Exhibit __, then Landlord's counsel shall, on request, waive Landlord's right to require a Corrective Reissuance.³⁴

24.5.3 Release of Security. If Tenant delivers to Landlord satisfactory L/C Security in place of the entire Security, Landlord shall remit to Tenant any cash Security Landlord previously held.

24.5.4 Drawing Conditions, Procedures. Landlord may draw on the L/C Security, and hold and apply the proceeds in the same manner and for the same purposes as the Security, if: (a) an uncured Event of Default exists; (b) a Default exists and Landlord cannot legally Notify Tenant of that Default; (c) as of the date 45 days before any L/C Security expires (even if that scheduled expiry date is after the Expiration Date) Tenant has not delivered to Landlord an amendment or replacement for the L/C Security, reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, extending the expiry date to the earlier of (i) six months after the then-current Expiration Date or (ii) the date one year after the then-current expiry date of the L/C Security; (d) the L/C Security provides for automatic renewals, Landlord asks L/C Issuer to confirm in writing the current L/C Security expiry date and L/C Issuer fails to do so within 10 Business Days; (e) Tenant fails to pay (when and as Landlord reasonably requires) any bank charges for Landlord's transfer of the L/C Security; (f) L/C Issuer ceases, or announces that it will cease, to maintain an office in the City or in Florida where

Landlord may present drafts under the L/C Security; (g) any credit rating of L/C Issuer has been significantly impaired, as reasonably determined by Landlord; (h) L/C Issuer has been seized, shut down or taken over by any Government or is the subject of any Bankruptcy Event; or (i) Tenant is the subject of any Bankruptcy Event.³⁵ This paragraph does not limit any other provisions of this Lease allowing Landlord to draw the L/C Security under stated circumstances.

24.5.5 Unsuccessful Draw. If Landlord seeks to draw on L/C Security when this Lease permits, but L/C Issuer refuses to pay that attempted draw for any reason except curable defects in Landlord's presentation, then Tenant shall promptly pay Landlord the amount that Landlord properly sought to draw on the L/C Security. The parties shall cooperate to simultaneously reduce the face amount of the L/C Security by the amount so paid.

24.5.6 Interference with Draws. Tenant shall not seek to enjoin, prevent or otherwise interfere with Landlord's draw on L/C Security, even if it violates this Lease. Tenant acknowledges that the only effect of a wrongful draw would be to substitute cash Security for L/C Security, causing Tenant no damage. Landlord shall hold the proceeds of any draw in the same manner and for the same purposes as cash Security.³⁶ In the event of a wrongful draw, the parties shall cooperate to allow Tenant to post replacement L/C Security simultaneously with the return to Tenant of the wrongfully drawn sums, and Landlord shall on request confirm in writing to L/C Issuer that Landlord's draw was erroneous.

24.5.7 Changes in L/C Security. If Landlord transfers its interest in the Premises, then Tenant shall at Tenant's expense, within five Business Days after Landlord's request, deliver (and, if L/C Issuer requires, Landlord shall consent to) an L/C Security amendment naming Landlord's grantee as substitute beneficiary. If the required Security changes while L/C Security is in force, then Tenant shall deliver (and, if L/C Issuer requires, Landlord shall consent to) a corresponding L/C Security amendment.

25. Defaults and Events of Default

35 Although the Lease allows Landlord to draw on a Tenant Bankruptcy Event, does that suffice to support a draw under the L/C if a Tenant Bankruptcy Event actually occurs?

36 If the Security exceeds a year's Base Rent, language like this sentence could help support claims that Landlord must "disgorge" part of the security. As a better strategy, Landlord should have the Security come from a Guarantor rather than from Tenant. See Chapter 38.

25.1 Definition: "Event of Default." Occurrence of one or more of these events shall constitute an "Event of Default." If and only if Tenant fully cures an Event of Default before Landlord has validly commenced to exercise remedies for it, then that Event of Default shall no longer exist for any purpose and Landlord may not exercise any rights or remedies for that former Event of Default.³⁷

25.1.1 Nonpayment of Base Rent. Tenant fails to pay any Base Rent as this Lease requires, and (subject to "Chronic Late Payment," below) that failure continues for five Business Days;

25.1.2 Nonpayment of Additional Rent. Tenant fails to pay any Additional Rent when this Lease requires, and (subject to "Chronic Late Payment," below) that failure continues for five Business Days after Notice from Landlord.

25.1.3 Chronic Late Payment. Tenant fails to pay any Rent, including Base Rent or Additional Rent, or make any other payment, when and as due under this Lease, if, in the last 18 months, Landlord has Notified Tenant two or more times of late payment of any Rent. (This paragraph shall not obligate Landlord to give Tenant any Notice, not otherwise required under this Lease, of any late payment of Rent.)

25.1.4 Transfer. If Tenant makes a Transfer requiring Landlord's consent without obtaining that consent as this Lease requires.

25.1.5 Nonperformance. If any Default occurs and, after Landlord gives Tenant a Default Notice, that Default continues for this period:³⁸

25.1.5.1 Insurance. For failure to provide insurance or Insurance Documents, three Business Days.

25.1.5.2 Documentation. For failure to deliver (and sign, where required) any document except Insurance Documents this Lease requires, including plans and specifications, concept drawings, schematics, sketches, an Estoppel Certificate or any other required document(s), 15 days.

37 If a Guaranty exists, then the Guaranty should state that Notice to Guarantor constitutes an adequate substitute for Notice to Tenant. That should protect Landlord from any surprises resulting from the automatic stay in a Tenant bankruptcy.

38 Modify these periods as appropriate. A typical Lease would allow 30 days (plus up to 60 additional days for due diligence) for all nonmonetary defaults, but this seems excessive for some.

25.1.5.3 Liens. For failure to comply with obligations on Liens, five Business Days.

25.1.5.4 Date for Performance. For failure to perform any nonmonetary covenant that must be performed by a specified or ascertainable date or on or within a specified or ascertainable date or period after the Signature Date, the Commencement Date or Tenant's Completion Deadline, 15 days.

25.1.5.5 Restrictions and Prohibitions. For failure to comply with any restriction, prohibition or other negative covenant in this Lease, five Business Days.

25.1.5.6 Other—Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period. For any other Default that can reasonably be cured within that period, the Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period.

25.1.5.7 Other — Due Diligence. For any other Default that cannot reasonably be cured in the Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period, Tenant shall have up to 90 more days, beyond the Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period, to the extent Tenant reasonably needs it, to cure the Default, but only if: (a) Tenant endeavors diligently and with continuity to cure it; and (b) Tenant acknowledges in writing that the Default exists, and (if Landlord requests) delivers an Estoppel Certificate and increases the Security by Landlord's reasonable estimate of the cost to cure the Default. Landlord shall promptly refund that increase in the Security if Tenant actually cures the Default before it becomes an Event of Default.³⁹

25.1.6 Matters Affecting Guaranties. Any Guarantor: (a) is a natural person and dies or becomes disabled unless, within 60⁴⁰ days, a replacement Guarantor, satisfactory to Landlord, has executed and delivered to Landlord a replacement Guaranty in the same form;⁴¹ (b) fails to perform any obligation under any Guaranty, including failure to deliver any 39 This details are unusual and perhaps excessive.

40 This period ranges from 30 to 90 days in most leases. Tenant may prefer to establish a standard that a replacement Guarantor must meet, such as: (a) dollar amount of net worth or liquid assets, perhaps subject to CPI adjustment; (b) stated multiple of annual Base Rent; or (c) at least the same financial strength that the original Guarantor had, tested either as of Commencement Date or as of Guarantor's death or disability. Guarantors do die or become disabled, so Tenants legitimately worry about this particular Event of Default, but a risk-tolerant Tenant might be willing to "deal with it later if it ever happens."

41 Tenant may argue that "a" is unnecessary because Guarantor's estate will remain bound by the Guaranty, but "a" is fairly standard.

required document or information, and does not cure that failure within 10 days after Notice to Tenant or Guarantor; (c) purports to revoke, rescind, cancel, or limit any Guaranty; or (d) asserts in writing that any Guaranty is partially or wholly unenforceable.

25.1.7 Bankruptcy Events. Any Bankruptcy Event occurs affecting Tenant or any Guarantor and that Bankruptcy Event either: (a) was voluntarily initiated by (or with the collusion of) the Person it affects; or (b) is not dismissed, cancelled, vacated, discharged, and rescinded within __⁴² days.

25.1.8 Vacancy. If Tenant abandons the Premises and does not reoccupy the Premises within 15 days after Notice from Landlord.

25.1.9 Other Leases. If (a) Tenant or its Related Party is a party to any other lease with Landlord or its Related Party;⁴³ (b) the tenant under that other lease is in default beyond applicable cure periods (or the landlord under that other lease is entitled to terminate it); and (c) Landlord elects to treat the circumstance described in clause “b” as an Event of Default.⁴⁴

25.2 Default Notices. If any Default occurs, then Tenant shall promptly give Landlord Notice of that Default. If, for any Default, Law requires Landlord to give Tenant notice and opportunity to cure, then Tenant shall have only the greater of: (a) any Notice and opportunity to cure this Lease requires or (b) any notice and opportunity to cure Law requires. Tenant’s notice rights and opportunities to cure shall not be sequential or cumulative. If Landlord complies with the greater of “a” or “b,” then Landlord need not also comply with the other (“b” or “a”) before exercising remedies.

26. Remedies for Default

If any Default occurs, then subject to Law, Landlord shall have these rights and remedies, which shall be cumulative and in addition to any other rights and remedies of Landlord:

42 Fill in with a number typically between 60 and 180. As a trend, the cure periods for involuntary Bankruptcy Events seem to be getting shorter.

43 Tenant may want to limit to refer only to other leases in the Building.

44 This paragraph may be excessive, but a Landlord may appreciate it if a multilocation Tenant begins to suffer distress.

26.1 Injunction. Landlord may obtain a court order enjoining Tenant from continuing the Default. Tenant acknowledges that damages are not an adequate remedy for any nonmonetary Default.

26.2 Security. Landlord may apply the Security to cure or partially cure any Default. Tenant shall promptly replenish and restore the Security so applied. Landlord may, by Notice to Tenant (after any application of Security to cure any Default), thereafter increase the Security required under this Lease by an amount of Security equal to an additional two months of then-current Base Rent.⁴⁵

26.3 Landlord's Cure. Landlord may cure the Default. Tenant shall pay Landlord: (a) all costs Landlord incurs in doing so; plus (b) an Administrative Fee. Nothing in this paragraph, or in any Notice stating Landlord intends to or may cure any Default, shall limit or excuse Tenant from any obligation under this Lease or any Default, permit Tenant to delay performing any such obligation, or impose any obligation whatsoever on Landlord. If Landlord gives Tenant Notice that Landlord intends to cure any Default, Landlord may revoke that Notice, with or without Notice, and without prejudice to Landlord. If Tenant has repeatedly or chronically failed to perform any continuing or repeated obligation, then Landlord may by Notice to Tenant (and continuing so long as Landlord determines) perform that obligation itself or through a third-party contractor.⁴⁶ Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for all costs Landlord thereby incurs, plus an Administrative Fee.

26.4 Late Payments. If Landlord has not yet received any Rent by 5:00 p.m. on the third Business Day after the date when this Lease first requires payment, whether or not that late payment constitutes an Event of Default or Landlord gives any Notice of that late payment, then Tenant shall pay Landlord both: (a) interest on the unpaid Rent, from the date originally due until the date Landlord actually receives it, at a rate equal to the greater of (i) the Prime Rate plus 5% per annum; or (ii) 1% per month; and also (b) a late charge equal to the greater of: (i) $50; and (ii) 5% of the late Rent. The late charge compensates Landlord for inconvenience and staff time to handle a late payment. It is not a penalty or interest. Landlord may apply late payments to unpaid Rent in any order.

45 The preceding sentence is nonstandard. Could Landlord apply it repeatedly if multiple Defaults occur?

46 Preceding sentence is nonstandard. It arises from sad experiences.

26.5 Good Funds. If twice in any 12 months either (a) Landlord receives any Rent more than five days late; or (b) the bank dishonors any Rent check (except due to defects in endorsement), then Landlord may by Notice require Tenant to pay Rent only in Good Funds. So long as that requirement exists, if Tenant purports to pay Rent by any form of payment except Good Funds, Landlord may either impose a fee equal to the late charge that would apply for a late payment of that Rent, or reject the non-complying payment and deem the Rent not paid. In the latter case, Landlord shall have all rights and remedies for nonpayment of Rent. If for 12 months Tenant pays by Good Funds all Rent when first due and payable, then Tenant may revert to personal checks if this Lease otherwise permits them.⁴⁷

26.6 Damages. Tenant shall pay all damages Landlord incurs by reason of any Default, plus Landlord's out of pocket costs and expenses, e.g., bank fees for returned checks. Landlord may recover damages at any time after Default, including after the Term.

27. Remedies for Event of Default

If an Event of Default occurs, then Landlord may exercise any or all of these remedies, which shall be cumulative, and all other remedies at law, in equity or under this Lease, subject in all cases to Law.

27.1 Termination of Tenant's Rights. Landlord may terminate Tenant's right to possession of the Premises by any lawful means. In that case, this Lease and the Term shall terminate (and the "Expiration Date" shall be redefined to become the date of that termination, except for purposes of Tenant's liability for damages) and Tenant shall immediately surrender possession to Landlord as this Lease requires. That termination shall not limit or terminate Tenant's obligation to pay damages.

27.2 Taking of Possession. Landlord may re-enter and take possession of the Premises with or without process of law and remove Tenant, with or without having terminated this Lease. This is an express right of re-entry for Landlord.

27.3 Security Devices. Landlord may change locks or other security devices for the Premises.

27.4 Subrent. Landlord may direct any subtenant of Tenant to pay Landlord directly any subrent. Landlord shall apply it against any Rent as Landlord designates. Landlord’s collection of subrent from any subtenant shall not cause Landlord to have any direct relationship with, or become the direct landlord of, any subtenant.⁴⁸

27.5 Damages. If an Event of Default occurs, Landlord may recover “Benefit of Bargain” damages or “Reserved Rent Less Reletting” damages as described below:

27.5.1 Reserved Rent Less Reletting. So long as Landlord has not terminated this Lease, Landlord may recover the Rent, when and as due and payable, less (in the case of this paragraph only) Landlord’s actual proceeds of reletting net of Landlord’s actual costs of reletting.

27.5.2 Benefit of Bargain. Whether or not Landlord terminates this Lease, Tenant shall pay Landlord the present value, calculated at a discount rate of 3% per annum, of the excess of the total Rent under this Lease (assuming Additional Rent continued to increase at the same average rate as it did from the Commencement Date to the date of calculation) over the fair market rental value of the Premises for the balance of the Term (without regard to any premature termination of the Term because of Tenant’s Event of Default), all as Landlord reasonably calculates and determines. If Tenant actually pays Landlord all “Benefit of Bargain” damages, then Landlord shall no longer be entitled to recover “Reserved Rent Less Reletting” damages.

27.6 No Separate Actions. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in any Law, Landlord need not commence separate actions to enforce Tenant’s obligations for each month’s Rent not paid, or each month’s accrual of damages for a Default, but may bring and prosecute a single combined action for all such Rent and damages.

27.7 Continue Lease. Landlord may at Landlord’s option maintain Tenant’s right to possession. In that case, this Lease shall continue in effect and Landlord may continue to enforce this Lease, including the rights to collect Rent and to exercise remedies for nonpayment.

48 As a result of unusual New York jurisprudence, New York leases require a “conditional limitation” remedy. For possible language, please see the chapter on State-specific lease clauses.

27.8 Tenant's Waiver. Tenant waives all claims for damages or other relief by reason of Landlord's reentry, repossession, changing of locks or other security devices, or exercise of other rights or remedies for Default.

27.9 No Obligation to Relet. Landlord need not relet the Premises or otherwise mitigate or limit damages from any Default or Event of Default.⁴⁹ If Landlord does relet: (a) that shall not constitute a surrender or its acceptance; and (b) reletting proceeds shall first be reduced by Landlord's costs, including Legal Costs, brokerage and fixturation. If Landlord relets any Premises in combination with other space, then Landlord shall reasonably allocate Landlord's proceeds and costs. If Landlord relets any Premises on an arm's-length basis, then the rents on reletting shall be conclusively presumed to be the fair and reasonable rental value of the area relet.

27.10 No Surrender. Landlord's exercise of any remedies for an Event of Default, or receipt of Tenant's keys or other access control devices for the Premises, shall not constitute Landlord's acceptance or Tenant's surrender of the Premises. Any surrender must be in writing and signed by the parties.

27.11 Bankruptcy Transfer. If a Bankruptcy Transfer occurs, the transferee shall be deemed without further act or deed to have assumed all obligations under this Lease on and after the effective date of that Bankruptcy Transfer, including any obligation to replenish and increase the Security. Any such transferee shall execute and deliver to Landlord an instrument confirming that assumption.

27.12 Scope of "Rent." Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, all Rent, whether or not expressly denominated as rent, shall constitute rent under Bankruptcy Law.

28. Additional Provisions on Landlord's Rights and Remedies

28.1 Legal Costs. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for (or at Landlord's option pay directly) all Legal Costs Landlord incurs as a result of: (1) any of these, unless Tenant prevails in substantially all respects: (a)

any litigation or dispute between Landlord and Tenant; (b) any claim that either party makes against the other arising from this Lease or the parties' landlord-tenant relationship; (c) any Default or Event of Default, including preparation of Default Notices and consultations on the Default, whether or not Landlord exercises any remedy; or (d) Landlord's enforcing any remedies against Tenant; (2) any Bankruptcy Event affecting Tenant; (3) Landlord's reviewing, considering or processing any request that Tenant makes relating to this Lease (including any request for Landlord's consent to any matter) or the Premises, whether or not Landlord agrees or consents to it; and (4) any Transfer. If any matter described in clauses "1" through "4" is initiated but terminates for any reason without final judgment or resolution, then that termination shall not limit Tenant's obligation to reimburse or pay directly Landlord's Legal Costs, unless under the circumstances Tenant has substantially prevailed in all respects. Without limiting the previous sentence, Tenant's cure of any Default shall not limit Tenant's obligation to reimburse or pay directly Landlord's Legal Costs incurred because of that Default.

28.2 Holding Over. If Tenant remains in the Premises after the Expiration Date Landlord will suffer injury that is substantial, difficult, or impossible to measure accurately, and in all likelihood substantially in excess of the Rent. The parties therefore agree that if Tenant remains in the Premises after the Expiration Date, then in addition to Landlord's other rights and remedies, Tenant shall pay Landlord, as liquidated damages and not as a penalty, for each month (or any part of a month) in which Tenant holds over in the Premises after the Expiration Date, a sum equal to 200% (reduced to 150% in the first 60 days of holding over) of the greater of: (a) the monthly total Base Rent and Escalation Rent that was payable under this Lease in the last full Lease Year before this Lease terminated; and (b) the then-current monthly fair market rental value of the Premises. The parties acknowledge that Landlord's actual damages would be difficult or impossible to quantify. They have accordingly agreed on the foregoing liquidated measure of damages. If Tenant holds over for more than 30 days, then Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord regarding that holdover. That indemnity that include an obligation to compensate Landlord for Landlord's loss of a subsequent Tenant for the Premises and any claims made against Landlord by any subsequent Tenant because Landlord fails to deliver possession when required.⁵⁰ Nothing in this

50 The last two sentences have become "standard" in New York leases after a court imposed similar liability on a holdover tenant. Strong tenants will try to reject them, noting that when Landlord negotiates the "next" lease Landlord can build in appropriate protections. Does this indemnification undercut the liquidated damages provided for elsewhere in this paragraph?

Lease allows Tenant to retain possession of the Premises after the Expiration Date. In any holdover occupancy, Tenant shall continue to have all its obligations under this Lease, except the holdover liquidated damages described in this paragraph shall replace Base Rent and Escalation Rent.

28.3 NO JURY TRIAL. BOTH PARTIES IRREVOCABLY WAIVE ALL RIGHTS TO TRIAL BY JURY IN ANY ACTION, PROCEEDING, COUNTERCLAIM OR OTHER LITIGATION ARISING OUT OF OR RELATING TO THIS LEASE, THE RELATIONSHIP OF LANDLORD AND TENANT, THE ENFORCEMENT OF THIS LEASE, TENANT'S USE OR OCCUPANCY OF THE PREMISES, ANY CLAIM OF INJURY OR DAMAGE ARISING BETWEEN LANDLORD AND TENANT, OR ANY ACTIONS OR OMISSIONS OF EITHER PARTY IN CONNECTION WITH OR RELATING TO THIS LEASE, THE PREMISES, THE BUILDING, OR THE LAND.

28.4 Counterclaims. If Landlord commences any proceeding for nonpayment of Rent or holding over, or any other summary proceeding relating to this Lease, Tenant shall interpose no counterclaim of any nature in those proceedings, even if the counterclaim relates to Landlord's alleged failure to provide services to Tenant or alleged impairment of Tenant's right to possess, use, or enjoy the Premises, unless failure to assert that counterclaim would waive it, unless Landlord agrees in writing not to assert that waiver. Tenant may assert any such claim in a separate action. Tenant acknowledges this right gives Tenant an adequate remedy. Tenant's obligation to pay Rent is an independent and absolute obligation under this Lease.

28.5 No Right of Redemption. Tenant waives any right of redemption provided for by Law.

28.6 No New Cure Period. Landlord's delay in exercising any rights or remedies shall not waive any Event of Default or any right or remedy. Landlord may exercise Landlord's remedies for an Event of Default (unless cured) at any later date, without giving Tenant any new Notice or cure period.

28.7 Effect on "Tenant Delay." "Tenant Delay" shall include a period equal to any Default Period.

28.8 Accord and Satisfaction; Partial Payments. No payment by Tenant or Landlord's receipt of a lesser amount than the amount this Lease requires Tenant to pay shall be anything except a payment on account. No endorsement or statement on any check or any letter with any payment shall constitute an accord or satisfaction. Landlord may accept any such check or payment without prejudice to Landlord's right to recover the balance of Rent due or pursue any other remedy. Notwithstanding any endorsement on any check or any statement to the contrary in any letter with any check or payment, Landlord shall apply any partial payment to such items as Landlord determines appropriate. After Landlord applies any partial payment, the remaining balance due shall remain due and payable.

28.9 No Waiver. Landlord's acceptance of Rent, with or without knowledge of any Default, shall not waive any Default or Landlord's rights or remedies. Landlord's failure to enforce any requirement of this Lease, to bill Tenant for any Rent or to exercise any right or remedy shall not waive Landlord's right to do so, regardless of how long that failure has continued or the circumstances of its continuation. Landlord's acceptance of Rent from any Person except Tenant shall not be deemed Landlord's acceptance of that Person as a tenant and shall not give that Person any rights in the Premises. Any such payment shall be made solely on Tenant's account. Landlord's acceptance or enforcement of any Guaranty or Security shall not limit or waive Landlord's rights or remedies.

28.10 Deemed Delivery of Invoice. To the extent that this Lease or Law requires Landlord to deliver an invoice as a condition to collecting any Rent, if Landlord has not delivered any such required invoice, then Landlord's commencement of any action (or exercise of any other rights or remedies) against Tenant to collect that Rent shall be deemed an adequate substitute for delivery of an invoice, and Landlord shall have no obligation to deliver an invoice as a condition to Rent collection.

28.11 Dishonored Check. If Tenant's bank dishonors any check for any payment made on signing this Lease (except due to defects Landlord caused), then Landlord may redeposit the check and either: (a) if it is again dishonored, rescind this Lease (except Tenant's obligations under this paragraph), enforce the check (and Tenant shall pay Landlord's Legal Costs of that enforcement), and hold the proceeds of the check as liquidated damages for removing the Premises from the market while dealing with Tenant; or (b) continue this Lease and require Tenant to increase the Security (in the entire Term) by an amount equal to two months of Base Rent.

29. Commercial Rent Control

If any Government enacts Commercial Rent Control, then Tenant shall, under documentation satisfactory to Landlord: (a) waive all rights and benefits under Commercial Rent Control; and (b) both during and after the effectiveness of Commercial Rent Control take any actions, consistent with Law, that Landlord requires to give Landlord the full economic benefit of this Lease as originally negotiated and entered into. When Commercial Rent Control terminates, including by judicial decision, Tenant shall pay Landlord an amount equal to the Rent Landlord lost from Commercial Rent Control (i.e., the difference between the Rent this Lease required, including holdover rent after the Expiration Date, if applicable, and the maximum rent that Commercial Rent Control allowed Landlord to collect), with interest at the Prime Rate from the date Landlord suffered each element of loss. This Section shall survive the Expiration Date.⁵¹

30. Notices and Amendments

30.1 Notices. All Notices must be in writing. Unless Law otherwise provides, Notices shall be given by: (a) hand; or (b) Federal Express or any similar means of overnight delivery under which an independent third party in the business of delivering written communications requests and retains a receipt for delivery. Two unsuccessful delivery attempts to the last address provided for by a party under this Lease (or one affirmative refusal to accept delivery) shall be deemed actual delivery. Notices shall be addressed to the parties at their addresses in the Basic Terms[, except that Notice to Tenant after the Commencement Date may be directed to the Premises]. Notices sent in accordance with this Lease shall be effective on the first Business Day after dispatch, or when actually delivered if earlier. The date any Notice was sent may be evidenced by the delivery service. Either party may change its Notice address by Notice. Tenant's Notice address must be a street address and may not be a post office box. Without limiting any provisions of this paragraph on effectiveness of Notices, any Notice to Tenant shall be effective for all purposes if and when Tenant actually receives it, whether or not it complied with this paragraph. A copy of any Notice to Landlord under this Lease shall, at the same time and by the same means, be simultaneously transmitted to such additional party(ies), including Landlord's Lender/Lessor(s), at such address(es), as Landlord from time to time designates by Notice.

51 Language similar to this paragraph often appears in leases, but is probably not worth the space it occupies. If Landlord wants to beef up the language on Commercial Rent Control, see the Optional Provisions at the end of this Lease.

30.2 Amendments. This Lease (including this paragraph) may not be Changed except by a written Change executed and delivered by the party to be charged. Circulation of a draft Change to this Lease shall not bind or obligate anyone. To the extent so provided in any Landlord's Financing of which Tenant has received Notice, any Change affecting this Lease shall not be effective without written consent by the applicable Lender/Lessor. No party shall rely on any purported oral amendment(s) or oral waiver(s) purportedly affecting this Lease. Each party acknowledges that reliance on a purported oral amendment or oral waiver is unreasonable.

30.3 Authority of Certain Persons. Any Notice, time extension, or written waiver of any terms of this Lease may be executed by an attorney on behalf of his or her client, or by Landlord's managing agent, if any, for Landlord.

31. Limitation of Landlord's Liability

Tenant acknowledges that Landlord would not enter into this Lease unless it contained this Article, which controls over everything else in this Lease. These limitations of Landlord's liability are cumulative. They shall benefit any Person that is, from time to time, Landlord under this Lease, including any Successor Landlord.

31.1 Acceptance of Premises. Tenant has examined and is familiar with and satisfied with the condition of the Premises. Tenant accepts the Premises and all means of access thereto "as is," except for performance of any Landlord's Initial Work. Except as this Lease expressly states, Landlord makes no representations or warranties on the Land, the Building, the Premises, the surrounding area, Permitted Use(s), Tenant's business prospects; any physical, environmental or other condition; zoning; square footage, area or size; title or ownership; compliance with Law; means of access; pedestrian traffic or suitability for Tenant's business; competition or the lack of it; certificate of occupancy; state of repair; mold; HVAC; fire sprinklers; Building Systems or Utilities; any assessment, status, abatement, or deferral; level of past, present or future Property Taxes; vaults; past, present, or future, uses or tenancies of the Building; flood plains; wetlands; paranormal conditions; health or environmental hazards or conditions, whether known or unknown and whether or not presently identified or recognized as constituting or creating a health or environmental risk; Hazardous Substances; any other building materials; radiation; radio waves; noise; future construction; any other conditions created by or arising from modern technology, as it exists from time to time; the identity or business activities of other tenants, the terms and conditions of the leases of other tenants in the Building or elsewhere; or any other matter whatsoever, whether or not listed, whether similar to or different from those matters specifically listed. Landlord shall have no responsibility for security or crime prevention measures at the Building or in the Premises. Except as this Lease expressly states, Landlord shall have absolutely no liability for any defects or faults, latent or patent, in the Building (but this does not limit Landlord's express obligations under this Lease) or any obligation to provide any services or take any other actions for Tenant.

31.2 Waiver of Certain Claims. Landlord, its Related Parties and its Lenders/Lessors shall have no liability to Tenant or any Tenant Party, and Tenant specifically waives and agrees (on its own behalf and on behalf of all Tenant Parties) not to assert any claims against Landlord or its Related Parties or Lenders/Lessors, for any loss, damage, claim or injury of any kind arising at, on, upon, in or about the Building or the Premises (including any loss of, or damage to, any fixtures, equipment, merchandise or other property belonging to Tenant, installed or left in the Premises), unless that loss was both (a) caused solely by Landlord's gross negligence or intentional acts; and (b) not insured or reasonably insurable against by Tenant. Landlord shall have absolutely no liability for water or other damage caused by breakages or leaks in any pipes in the Building, regardless of who owns, installs or maintains them. Tenant expressly assumes the risk of any that damage. Landlord shall have absolutely no liability for any damage caused to Tenant's computer hardware, software, or data, or other electronic or electrical equipment of any kind. Tenant specifically waives and releases Landlord from any liability for: (a) any loss against which Tenant is insured or against which this Lease requires Tenant to purchase insurance; and (b) damages for lost profits or lost business. Tenant's waivers in this paragraph shall be fully effective even if Tenant has notified Landlord, or Landlord is otherwise aware, of the nature and scope of Tenant's potential loss. Nothing in this Lease imposes on Landlord any obligation as a fiduciary to Tenant.

31.3 Nonrecourse. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, Landlord's liability under this Lease is limited to and shall not extend beyond Landlord's Interest. Tenant may not enforce any judgment for Landlord's breach of this Lease against any assets or property of Landlord (or of any general partner, shareholder, or other equity interest holder of Landlord) beyond Landlord's Interest. Landlord shall have no personal liability under this Lease. These limits on Landlord's liability shall not apply to Landlord's: (a) failure to apply Security (including proceeds of any L/C Security) as this Lease requires; or (b) obligation to comply with any equitable or declaratory relief, provided it does not require Landlord to spend money.

31.4 Landlord's Review and Consent Rights. If Landlord reviews or provides comments on anything requiring Landlord's consent, such review and comments are solely to protect Landlord. They create no warranty or duty to Tenant or anyone else. Any Landlord consent requirements are solely for Landlord's benefit. Landlord may waive any of them. Tenant shall not rely on Landlord's consent to evidence anything except Tenant's compliance with the requirement to obtain that consent.

31.5 Transfer. If Landlord assigns, conveys, or otherwise transfers its estate in and to the Building, then the transferee shall be deemed to have assumed and succeeded to Landlord's rights and obligations under this Lease. The transferor shall be relieved of all liability as Landlord under this Lease, except that the transferor shall remain responsible for the Security until the transferor delivers it to the transferee. Each Landlord's obligations under this Lease shall bind that Landlord only while it holds Landlord's interest under this Lease. Any deed of the Building shall automatically assign Landlord's interest in this Lease and shall fully evidence the transfer of Landlord's rights to the grantee. No separate assignment or assumption of such interest or rights shall be necessary.

31.6 Landlord's Default. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, before Tenant exercises any right to terminate this Lease for Landlord's default (including any termination right expressly provided for, or implied, by Law) or to claim a partial or total eviction (actual or constructive) for Landlord's alleged default, or any other right or remedy against Landlord, Tenant shall Notify Landlord of the alleged default. That Notice shall refer to this paragraph. Landlord shall then have the Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period to cure the alleged default. If Landlord cannot reasonably do so within that period, that period shall continue as Landlord reasonably requires to cure the alleged default, provided that in the extended part of the cure period Landlord: (a) endeavors to cure the alleged default diligently and with reasonable continuity; and (b) allows Tenant a reasonable rent abatement for any Premises that, because of Landlord's default, Tenant cannot use and has actually vacated. Landlord's rights to notice and opportunity to cure do not limit any cure rights of any Lender/Lessor.

32. Landlord's Financing

32.1 Lenders/Lessors; Amendments. At any time or from time to time, Landlord may: (a) designate any Lender/Lessor(s); or (b) terminate designation of any Lender/Lessor(s), except to the extent that Landlord (or the Lender/Lessor, with Landlord's written concurrence) has Notified Tenant that any such termination needs the Lender/Lessor's written concurrence. If a (prospective) Lender/Lessor requires any documentation regarding this Lease (including amendment(s) or confirmation of rights of Lenders/Lessors), then Tenant shall enter into that documentation, except an Adverse Amendment.

32.2 Subordination. This Lease shall be subject and subordinate to all Landlord's Financing (and all its covenants, conditions, terms and provisions), and all matters to which Landlord's Financing is subordinate, except as this Lease expressly states. This subordination is self-operative and automatic. No further instrument of subordination shall be necessary. Tenant shall, within 10 Business Days after demand, without charge, execute any instrument Landlord or any Lender/Lessor requests to confirm that subordination, upon the Lender/Lessor's standard form.

32.3 Optional Priority. Any Mortgagee may at any time elect in writing that this Lease shall have priority, in whole or in part (as the Mortgagee specifies) over the Mortgagee's Mortgage. If a Mortgagee gives Tenant a copy of any such election, then so long as the Mortgagee has not revoked it, this Lease shall have priority over that Mortgage, whether this Lease is dated before or after the date of that Mortgage, except as to matters (e.g., application of casualty or condemnation proceeds) for which the Mortgagee does not elect to make this Lease prior to that Mortgage.

32.4 SNDA Protection for Tenant. If the Building is at any time subject to any Landlord's Financing and the Premises consists of at least _____, then at Tenant's request Landlord shall use reasonable efforts to obtain for Tenant an SNDA from each Lender/Lessor. Landlord need not spend money or litigate to obtain an SNDA. Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's Legal Costs and other out of pocket costs in seeking an SNDA, including any payment due the Lender/Lessor. Landlord's failure to obtain an SNDA shall not limit Tenant's obligations in any way.

32.5 Assignment to Lender/Lessor; Successor Landlord Liability. If Landlord assigns this Lease to any Lender/Lessor, conditionally or otherwise, then the Lender/Lessor shall have no liability under this Lease unless and until it becomes a Successor Landlord and expressly assumes this Lease. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, any Successor Landlord shall have no liability to Tenant for Landlord's acts, omissions or defaults; not be subject to any Offset Tenant might have had against Landlord; and not be bound by any prepayment (except a prepayment this Lease requires) of more than one month's Rent (except the Security, to the extent the Successor Landlord actually received it) or any Change made after the date Tenant has received Notice of the corresponding Lender/Lessor without that Lender/Lessor's consent (to the extent the applicable Landlord's Financing documents required that consent).

32.6 Lender/Lessor's Cure Rights. Tenant shall accept performance of any Landlord obligation by any Lender/Lessor. A Lender/Lessor shall not be deemed to have assumed this Lease by performing any Landlord obligation or by demanding that Tenant pay Rent to Lender/Lessor, or otherwise have any obligations or liability under this Lease, unless and until that Lender/Lessor assumes this Lease in writing. If Landlord or any Lender/Lessor so requests by Notice to Tenant, then Tenant agrees that: (a) Tenant shall give that Lender/Lessor, by overnight delivery, a copy of any Notice of default served on Landlord; and (b) if Landlord does not cure the default in Landlord's cure period, then that Lender/Lessor shall have an additional period (up to 90 days) to do so, or if that default cannot be cured within that time, then such additional time necessary if within that reasonable period Lender/Lessor commences and diligently pursues the remedies necessary to cure that default (including completion of an Enforcement Proceeding if necessary), in which event Tenant shall not terminate this Lease while Lender/Lessor is pursuing such a proceeding and endeavoring to cure Landlord's default(s).

32.7 Effect of Enforcement Proceeding. Tenant shall have no right to terminate this Lease on account of an Enforcement Proceeding. Tenant agrees, at the option of any Successor Landlord, and only if that Successor Landlord by Notice so elects, to either, at the option of that Successor Landlord: (a) attorn to that Successor Landlord and accept it as Tenant's successor Landlord and perform for Successor Landlord's benefit all provisions of this Lease to be performed by Tenant with the same force and effect as if Successor Landlord were the landlord originally named in this Lease; or (b) enter into a new lease with Successor Landlord as landlord, for the remaining Term, on the same remaining terms and conditions as this Lease. This paragraph shall benefit any Successor Landlord and shall be self-operative if a Successor Landlord elects to invoke it. No further instrument shall be required to give effect to this paragraph. If any Successor Landlord requests, Tenant shall execute, from time to time, instruments confirming and implementing this paragraph, in form satisfactory to Successor Landlord, acknowledging that attornment or new lease and the terms of Tenant's tenancy.

33. Brokers

Landlord and Tenant each represents and warrants that in negotiating and consummating this Lease it has dealt with no broker, finder or similar party except Broker, whose commission(s) Landlord shall pay unless the Basic Terms state otherwise. Each party shall Indemnify the other against any breach or alleged breach of that representation and warranty.

34. Related Documentation and Deliveries

34.1 Estoppel Certificates. Tenant shall, within 10 Business Days after Landlord's request from time to time, sign and deliver (and cause any Guarantor to sign and deliver) to Landlord an Estoppel Certificate directed to such Person(s) as Landlord requests. Any Estoppel Certificate shall bind Tenant and any Guarantor, whether or not the addressee demonstrates detrimental reliance, and shall constitute a binding representation and warranty by Tenant.

34.2 No Recording. Tenant shall not record this Lease or any memorandum of it. If Tenant violates the previous sentence, then Tenant shall be deemed at Landlord's option to have committed an incurable Event of Default. Landlord may then record a "Notice of Termination" of this Lease, which notice shall be effective without Tenant's signature.

34.3 Further Assurances. Each party shall execute and deliver such further documents, and perform such further acts, as reasonably necessary to achieve the parties' intent as expressed in this Lease and so each party can achieve and obtain the rights and benefits this Lease contemplates (including, in Landlord's case, all rights and benefits of Landlord's estate in the Building and as necessary or appropriate in Landlord's reasonable judgment to comply with any Law), or as any of Landlord's Lender/Lessor(s) may request, provided in each case that documentation conforms to this Lease, is not an Adverse Amendment and (if signed by Landlord) repeats the "Nonrecourse" provisions of this Lease in a way satisfactory to Landlord. Tenant may not require Landlord to sign anything in a Default Period.

34.4 Evidence of Compliance. Tenant shall, promptly on request, give Landlord such written proof as Landlord reasonably requests to evidence and confirm Tenant's compliance with this Lease. Tenant shall on request give Landlord copies of receipts, paid bills or other proof satisfactory to Landlord that Tenant has made all third-party payments this Lease requires of Tenant.

34.5 Governmental Benefits. If Landlord desires to apply for (or continue to qualify for) or otherwise obtain any governmental, tax or other benefit available to Landlord for the Building or any other real property Landlord owns (including any tax abatement or tax deferral program, any special tax treatment available to Landlord under state or federal income tax law and any other reduction or deferral of any tax payable by Landlord), which benefits do not materially adversely affect Tenant, and those applications require cooperation by Tenant, then Tenant shall provide such reasonable cooperation (including execution of amendments to this Lease as necessary to satisfy conditions to those benefits or if otherwise necessary to enable Landlord to claim them) as Landlord requires, provided that cooperation does not require Tenant to sign an Adverse Amendment.⁵²

35. Additional Leasing Provisions

35.1 Building Name. Landlord may at any time adopt any name, or change the name or address, for the Building. Tenant shall not refer to the Building by any name or address except those Landlord or the U.S. Postal Service designates.

35.2 Excavations. Tenant shall comply with any Law on access to the Premises for any excavation on adjacent land. Tenant shall not, by reason of that excavation, have any claim against Landlord for damages, indemnity or suspension, diminution, abatement or reduction of any Rent. Any payment made in the Term for any excavation on adjacent land shall belong to Landlord.

35.3 Other Uses. Except to the extent, if any, this Lease expressly provides for it, Tenant has no right to control, limit or restrict any Person's use of any space outside the Premises.

35.4 Signs. Landlord may post "For Rent" signs at, on or near the Premises in the last 12 months of the Term.

35.5 Survival. Tenant's indemnity obligations, Tenant's obligations and Landlord's rights in the event of Tenant's holding over after the Expiration Date or upon the occurrence of an Event of Default (including Tenant's obligation to pay damages or any other payments on account of post-termination Rent under this Lease), and all other rights and obligations that by their nature would arise or continue after this Lease expires or terminates shall survive expiration or termination.

35.6 Vaults; Appurtenant Space. If the Building has a basement, cellar, courtyard, atrium, or vault, then the Premises does not include, and Tenant shall have no right to use or occupy, any such space, except to the extent that this Lease expressly gives Tenant that right. Tenant shall have no right to use or occupy any mechanical or outdoor space, recreational space, nonpublic parking facilities, or other space except the Premises in, at, or appurtenant to the Building, except to the extent Landlord so permits in writing. If Landlord permits Tenant to use or occupy any vault appurtenant to the Building, then: (a) Tenant shall pay all vault taxes, rent, and other charges assessed for the vault; (b) that occupancy is under a revocable license; and (c) if any such license is revoked or the size of any vault diminished, Landlord shall incur no liability, and Tenant shall be entitled to no compensation or Offset.⁵³

36.1 Confidentiality. Tenant shall not disclose any terms or conditions of this Lease (including Rent),⁵⁴ or give a copy of this Lease to any third party, and Landlord shall not release to any third party any nonpublic financial information or nonpublic information about Tenant's ownership structure that Tenant gives Landlord, except: (a) if required by Law or in any judicial proceeding, provided that the releasing party has given the other party reasonable Notice of that requirement, if feasible; (b) to a party's attorneys, accountants, brokers and other bona fide consultants or advisers, provided they agree to be bound by this paragraph; or (c) to any bona fide prospective Lender/Lessee, assignee, or subtenant, provided they are instructed in writing to comply this paragraph.

36.2 Consents; Reasonableness. Any reference to Landlord's consent or approval means Landlord's prior written consent. Wherever this Lease states that a party's consent or approval shall not be unreasonably withheld, it shall not be unreasonably conditioned or delayed. Tenant waives any claim (for damages or other relief of any kind, except as this paragraph expressly allows) that Landlord has unreasonably withheld, 53 If Tenant obtains antenna rights, revise this as appropriate or limit to a Default Period.

54 Perhaps the confidentiality should apply only to Rent.

delayed, or conditioned Landlord's consent or approval in breach of any applicable provision of this Lease. In the event of a determination favorable to Tenant (i.e., that Landlord acted unreasonably when this Lease required Landlord to act reasonably), the requested consent or approval shall be deemed granted. Landlord shall, however, have no liability for refusal or failure to consent or approve. Tenant's sole remedy for Landlord's unreasonably withholding, delaying or conditioning its consent or approval shall be as this paragraph states. If this Lease does not require a party to act reasonably in approving or consenting to any matter or in determining whether any matter is satisfactory, then that party may approve or disapprove that matter for any reason or no reason, and may require payment as a condition to approval or consent. The parties acknowledge it would be reasonable for Landlord to withhold consent to comply with Landlord's obligations to any present or future Lender/Lessor.⁵⁵ Nothing in this paragraph gives Tenant any right or remedy it would not have had but for this paragraph.⁵⁶

36.3 Execution. This Lease and any Change or other document relating to this Lease may be executed in counterparts. Each is an original. All are the same document. Each party represents and warrants this Lease: (a) has been duly authorized, executed and delivered by all necessary action of that party; and (b) does not violate any other agreement of that party. Either party may in the ordinary course of business maintain its copy of this Lease as an electronic scanned or other image. Any such scanned copy or other image shall have the same force and effect as an original. The original may be destroyed. Its absence need not be explained.

36.4 Failure to Enforce; No Waiver. Either party's failure to enforce any agreement in this Lease shall not prevent that party from enforcing that agreement later or for a later violation of this Lease.

36.5 Force Majeure. If Landlord does not punctually perform any nonmonetary obligation because of Force Majeure, then that failure shall be excused and not deemed a breach. The time for Landlord to perform

55 Without the preceding sentence, the requirements of a Lender/Lessor—especially one brought to the table after Lease signing—probably cannot limit the definition of “reasonableness.”

56 This paragraph, though common in many leases, vitiates any obligation for Landlord to act reasonably. A strong Tenant may persuade Landlord to allow some limited remedy in that case, such as payment of damages or reimbursement of attorneys' fees, in each case up to some low cap. This paragraph will often be the last paragraph resolved in any lease.

that term, covenant or condition shall be extended by a period equal to the delay the Force Majeure caused.

36.6 Limitation of Damages. Neither party shall under any circumstances be liable for punitive, consequential or indirect damages, suffered or purportedly suffered by the other party from any acts or omissions of that party. Each party specifically waives and releases all such damages. Nothing in this paragraph limits Tenant's obligation to pay any damages expressly provided for in this Lease.

36.7 Merger. This Lease contains the entire agreement between the parties regarding the subject matter of this Lease, including any and all payments, allowances, equipment or services Landlord must provide. No separate understanding or agreement, oral or written, exists between Landlord and Tenant about those matters. Tenant has not relied on any statement, representation or promise not expressed in this Lease.

36.8 No Binding Effect. This Lease shall not be effective in any way until both parties have executed and delivered it. Landlord's delivery of a draft Lease to Tenant is not an offer to lease or a reservation of space, and shall not otherwise create any obligations of any kind (legal, equitable or otherwise) between the contemplated parties. Unless and until Landlord and Tenant execute and deliver a final Lease, each party may: (a) discontinue discussions for any reason or for no reason and (b) pursue other possible leasing opportunities, including any that would necessarily exclude entry into this Lease.

36.9 Separability. If any court of competent jurisdiction invalidates any provision of this Lease, then that invalidation shall not affect the validity of any other provision of this Lease.

36.10 Successors and Assigns; No Third-Party Beneficiaries. Except as this Lease expressly states: (a) "Landlord" and "Tenant" shall each include each party's permitted successors and assigns; (b) this Lease shall bind and benefit both parties' permitted successors and assigns; and (c) this Lease shall not benefit anyone else. This does not limit the Transfer restrictions in this Lease.

37. Interpretation

37.1 Internal Inconsistencies. The Basic Terms and the Supplemental Terms all contain significant obligations of Landlord and Tenant and should be read together as an integrated Lease. If the Basic Terms vary from the Supplemental Terms, then: (a) if possible, that inconsistency shall be resolved by treating Tenant's obligations as cumulative and Landlord's rights as cumulative; (b) otherwise, if possible, the Supplemental Terms shall be interpreted as supplementing, clarifying, defining and otherwise explaining the Basic Terms; and (c) in all other cases, the Basic Terms shall supersede any inconsistent Supplemental Terms, to the extent of the inconsistency.

37.2 Multiple Parties as Tenant. If two or more Persons are Tenant, then: (a) each shall be jointly and severally obligated to pay and perform all obligations of Tenant and deemed to make all representations and warranties of Tenant; (b) Landlord may enforce this Lease against any or all such Person(s) with no need to join anyone else; (c) where this Lease defines any Event of Default based on an event or circumstance affecting Tenant (e.g., a Bankruptcy Event), that refers to any such event or circumstance affecting any one or more Person(s) constituting Tenant; and (d) if any such Person rejects this Lease through a Bankruptcy Event of such Person, that rejection shall be a breach of this Lease by all Persons constituting Tenant but shall not limit any other Person's liability as Tenant or as a Guarantor.

37.3 Generally. This Lease shall be construed under State law. To the extent this Lease defines any capitalized term, that definition applies throughout this Lease, including all exhibits. Terms defined in the plural have the same meanings in the singular, and vice versa, all in accordance with ordinary English grammar. If the Commencement Date predates the Signature Date, then Tenant's obligations under this Lease retroactively commenced as of the earlier Commencement Date. The first and last days of any Abatement Period shall accelerate accordingly. Where this Lease requires either party to perform an action or satisfy a condition, that party shall do so at its sole cost except as this Lease otherwise expressly states. This does not limit Landlord's right to collect any Additional Rent. The word "or" includes the word "and." This Lease does not identify particular obligation(s) of Tenant as "substantial obligations" of the tenancy. That shall not be considered in determining which obligations of Tenant are "substantial." Under some or all circumstances, any or all of Tenant's obligations are "substantial." Any reference to the "Premises," the "Building," or any other collective noun means "all or any part" of it, with an appropriate allocation to any matter affecting only part, except where, in Landlord's reasonable determination, the context requires otherwise. Wherever a party "may" take an action, such party has no obligation to do so. Wherever this Lease refers to anything being done at Tenant's expense, Tenant shall pay for it as Additional Rent. This Lease incorporates by reference all its exhibits, as if the text of such exhibits appeared verbatim in the text of this Lease.

37.4 Successor Statutes. Wherever this Lease refers to any statute, that also includes the statute as amended from time to time, and any other or successor statute similar to the statute mentioned.

38. Definitions

In addition to any other definitions in this Lease, these definitions apply for all purposes of this Lease. If this Lease fails to use a term defined here, then its definition shall be disregarded.

“Additional Rent” means all payments that this Lease requires Tenant to make, whether to Landlord or a third party, except Base Rent, whether or not this Lease designates any payment as Additional Rent. Additional Rent includes Escalation Rent; payments of Security; reimbursement of Landlord’s costs where stated; and all other payments this Lease requires Tenant to make, except Base Rent.

“Additional Services” means: (a) Utilities, janitorial services, and other services Landlord provides from time to time beyond Basic Services; (b) electricity and/or water Tenant consumes for any dedicated or supplemental HVAC, computer power and telecommunications, or other special units or systems of Tenant; and (c) chilled, heated, condenser, or domestic water beyond that necessary for Basic Services.

“Administrative Fee” means, for any outlay by Landlord or reimbursement of Landlord or payment to Landlord by Tenant, a payment by Tenant to Landlord, in an amount equal to this percentage of that outlay, reimbursement, or payment: (a) 10%, if the outlay, reimbursement, or payment arose from a Default; and (b) 5% otherwise. The Administrative Fee constitutes a reasonable estimate of Landlord’s indirect costs of the matter in question. Those indirect costs are likely to be higher under the circumstances described in clause “a.”

“Adverse Amendment” means any amendment to, or additional document related to, this Lease that materially adversely affects a party or materially diminishes its rights or the other party’s obligations. Without limiting the preceding sentence, an amendment or other document shall be an “Adverse Amendment” if it changes the Rent, the location of the Premises, or the Term (but cure rights that could prevent Tenant from terminating this Lease when otherwise entitled to do so shall not be deemed to change the Term), except as this Lease otherwise expressly requires.

“Anticipated Delivery Date,” if not defined in the Basic Terms, means the date when Landlord reasonably estimates from time to time (with Notice to Tenant) that Landlord will Substantially Complete Landlord’s Initial Work.

“Bankruptcy Event” means, for any Person, that such Person becomes bankrupt or insolvent, or makes an assignment for the benefit of creditors, ceases to pay its debts as they become due or admits in writing that it is unable to pay its debts as they become due, or becomes a “debtor,” or is otherwise the subject of any similar proceeding; or a custodian, administrator, receiver, or trustee is appointed to take possession of, or an attachment, execution or other judicial seizure is made for, all or a substantial part of that Person’s assets or interest in this Lease.

“Bankruptcy Law” means the United States Bankruptcy Code (United States Code Title 11), and any other law providing for or governing any Bankruptcy Event or debtor protection.

“Bankruptcy Transfer” means any Transfer of this Lease to any Person under Bankruptcy Law or through a Bankruptcy Event.

“Basic Nonmonetary Cure Period” means 30 days after Notice from Landlord.

“Basic Services” means: (a) HVAC required in Landlord’s reasonable judgment for comfortable use and occupancy of the Premises for Permitted Use(s) in Business Hours; (b) unheated water from the local utility at supply point(s) Landlord provides for Tenant’s ordinary drinking and lavatory purposes and for restroom(s) and drinking fountain(s) in Common Areas; and (c) for Premises above the ground floor, nonexclusive passenger elevator service for general office pedestrian usage. To the extent (if any) that this Lease requires Landlord to clean the Premises in accordance with Landlord's standard cleaning specifications, that cleaning also constitutes Basic Services.⁵⁷

“Building Rules” means such reasonable rules and regulations for the Land, the Premises, and the Building (including Common Areas) as Landlord reasonably promulgates or amends from time to time by Notice. [Building Rules as of the Signature Date are attached as Exhibit __.]

“Building Systems” means mechanical, gas, electrical, sanitary, heating, air conditioning, ventilating, elevator, plumbing, life-safety and other service systems of the Building.

“Business Hours” means 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. on Business Days.

“Cabling” means all Communications Services, electrical, network and other conduits, cabling, interfaces, risers, boards, wiring, sleeves and similar installations installed by Tenant or specifically for Tenant's benefit, whether in Tenant's own Premises or in the Building's shared telecommunications closets or other Common Areas.

“Certificate Holders” means: (a) Landlord, (b) all Lenders/Lessors of which Tenant has received Notice; and (c) any other Person(s) Landlord designates from time to time.

“Change” means amend, consolidate, extend, increase, modify, recast, refinance, renew, replace, surrender, terminate or waive, or the act of doing any of the foregoing.

“City” means any municipality where the Building is located.

57 Electricity is not a “Basic Service.” This Lease assumes Tenant has direct metering. See Optional Provisions at the end of this Lease for appropriate language for other arrangements regarding electricity.

58 This threshold seems relatively low. Tenant will favor a higher threshold, especially if Tenant is credit-worthy.

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

“Commercial Rent Control” means any Law, whether or not constitutional, that prohibits, precludes, or prevents Landlord from collecting, or excuses Tenant from paying, or otherwise controls, stabilizes, suspends, reduces, delays or defers any Rent this Lease establishes; requires any extension or renewal of this Lease beyond the Term (including Option Terms); grants Tenant any “right of first refusal” or similar extension right for the Premises; requires Landlord to participate in any so-called “rent arbitration” or similar proceeding, except as this Lease expressly requires; or otherwise directly or indirectly limits or restricts Landlord’s ability to collect the Rent this Lease establishes or to negotiate in a free market the rent for the Premises after the Expiration Date.

“Common Areas” means all areas within the boundaries of or adjacent to the Building not from time to time held for exclusive use by Landlord or by other Persons entitled to occupy space in the Building, including, to the extent, if any, existing in or serving the Building: parking areas and structures, driveways, entrances and exits, sidewalks and pedestrian passageways, truckways, atriums, courtyards, delivery passages, elevators and escalators, public stairways, lobbies, elevator lobbies, public corridors, loading docks, sidewalks, pedestrian and vehicular bridges within or providing access to the Building, ramps, open and enclosed courts and malls, landscaped and planted areas, exterior stairways, mechanical closets, drainage systems, bus stops, retaining walls, management offices, restrooms not located within the premises of any tenant and other areas and improvements Landlord provides for the common use of Landlord and tenants and their employees and invitees, and walls facing any of the foregoing. If any pedestrian or vehicular bridge provides access to and has a landing within the Building, then the entire bridge is a Common Area. Landlord may from time to time change the size, shape, location, number and extent of the Common Areas. No such change shall entitle Tenant to any Offset. Landlord may add improvements, including parking decks, anywhere in the Building or on the Land. To the extent Landlord uses the Building office to operate and manage the Building, Landlord may treat it as “Common Areas.”

“Communications Services” means all voice, data communications, Internet access and telecommunications services necessary or appropriate for the Premises and Tenant’s activities.

“Comparable Buildings” means prudently managed buildings similar to the Building in terms of location, overall quality of operations, tenant composition, nature of ownership and use, and the management, operational procedures and requirements in effect from time to time in such buildings, all as determined in Landlord's reasonable judgment.

“Condemnation” means taking by condemnation (or sale in lieu of condemnation) of all or any part of the Building or the Land, or in or as a result of any similar proceeding. That taking shall be deemed to have occurred upon the vesting of title.

“Contractor” means any contractor, subcontractor, laborer or materials supplier engaged by Tenant or any Tenant Party, and any other Person that has or may have the right to file a Lien if not paid for Work or related goods or services.

“Control” means the ability to determine management and decisions of a Person, whether by contract, by ownership of Equity Interests or otherwise.

“Default Notice” means any Notice from Landlord to Tenant about a Default or alleged Default. Any such Notice may describe Tenant's Default in general terms. It need not specify the provisions of this Lease being violated or Tenant's cure period.

“Default Period” means any period when Landlord has given Tenant any Default Notice and continuing until no uncured Default exists.

“Department of Buildings” means the department(s) or agency(ies) of any Government with authority to issue permits for Work.

“Electricity Impairment” means any change, failure, interference, disruption, interruption or defect in the supply or character of electric energy furnished to the Premises or Building, regardless of duration, or if the quantity or character of electric energy supplied by Power Company is no longer available or suitable for Tenant's requirements.

“Enforcement Proceeding” means any: (a) foreclosure or delivery of a deed in lieu of foreclosure under any Mortgage; (b) eviction of Landlord under a Master Lease; (c) other exercise of a Lender/Lessor's remedies under any Landlord's Financing, divesting Landlord of title; or (d) termination or expiration of any Master Lease.

“Escalation Rent” means Operating Expenses Escalation Rent, Property Tax Escalation Rent, and any other amount(s) that this Lease identifies as Escalation Rent.

“Estoppel Certificate” means a certificate substantially in the form of Exhibit __, signed by Tenant and any Guarantor, with such other confirmations, if any, as Landlord or a Lender/Lessor reasonably requests.

“Exempt Transfer” means any of these Transfers, if made without consideration and in compliance with the “Conditions and Limitations to Landlord’s Consent” in this Lease: (a) if Tenant is an individual, a Transfer to an immediate family member of Tenant; (b) a Transfer to a trust for the benefit of anyone in clause “a”; and (c) a Transfer to an entity 100% of which is owned by Tenant or by the Persons who, at the Signature Date, were (and, at and after the Transfer remain) all beneficial owners of Tenant and the Transferee.

“Force Majeure” means any strike, lockout, labor dispute, terrorism, inability to obtain labor or materials or reasonable substitutes for such labor or materials, act of God, governmental restrictions, regulations or controls, enemy or hostile government action, civil commotion, riot, insurrection, fire, or other casualty or other events similar or dissimilar to those listed in this paragraph beyond Landlord’s reasonable control.

“Good Funds” means certified or cashier’s check or wire transfer to an account Landlord designates.

“Guarantor” means: (a) any guarantor of any of Tenant’s obligations under this Lease; (b) any unreleased assignor of this Lease; and (c) any other Person primarily or secondarily liable for Tenant’s obligations under this Lease.

“Hazardous Substance” means radon, formaldehyde, urea, or any flammable substance, explosive, radioactive material, asbestos, chemical known to cause cancer or reproductive toxicity, pollutant, contaminant, hazardous waste, medical waste, toxic substance or related material, petroleum or petroleum product, or other substance declared to be hazardous or toxic under Environmental Law, or toxic mold.

“HVAC” means heating, ventilating, and air conditioning services and equipment, including any humidification system, dehumidification system, air handler(s), chiller(s), air compressor(s), related electrical service, and other equipment or components for the HVAC.

“Include,” “including,” “such as,” and similar words shall be interpreted as if followed by the words “without limitation” except where the context necessarily implies otherwise.

“Indemnify,” “Indemnitor,” and “Indemnitee” shall be defined as follows. Wherever this Lease states that a party (the “Indemnitor”) shall “Indemnify” another party (the “Indemnitee”) for, against, or otherwise in connection with, any matter (the “Indemnified Risk”), Indemnitor shall defend, protect, indemnify, and hold harmless Indemnitee (which term shall also refer to the Indemnitee’s Related Parties and, where Landlord is Indemnitee, Landlord’s Lenders/Lessors) from and against any and all loss, cost, liability, Operating Expenses, claim, action, damages (except consequential and indirect damages), and fines (including any arising from loss of life, personal injury, and/or property damage), and Legal Costs, caused by or arising from or out of the Indemnified Risk, except to the extent caused by Indemnitee’s gross negligence or intentionally wrongful acts.

“Land” means the land underlying or surrounding or adjacent to the Building and owned (or leased under a Master Lease) by Landlord or its Related Parties.

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

“Landlord-Restored Damage” means any damage caused by Casualty or Condemnation to the Building, including Landlord’s Initial Work, but not Tenant-Restored Damage.⁵⁹

“Landlord’s Financing” means, collectively, all Mortgages, all Master Leases, and all their terms and conditions.

“Landlord’s Interest” means Landlord’s entire right, title and interest (including leasehold interest, if applicable) in the Building and the Land, including Landlord’s rights to receive any rents, insurance proceeds, Condemnation proceeds and Property Tax refunds, to the extent any of those items were not already collected.

“Laws” or “Law” means all laws, regulations, ordinances, directives, codes, orders, insurance requirements, rules, guidelines, and other requirements (whether now existing or later enacted, whether or not foreseeable, and whether imposing any obligation on Landlord or on Tenant), including judicial rulings and other interpretations announced, enacted, established, promulgated or enforced by any Government, insurance carrier, board of fire underwriters or similar group and affecting the Premises, or the use, maintenance, physical condition, operation or occupancy of the Premises, or activities conducted in the Premises, or the abatement of any nuisance in, on or about the Premises or caused by activities in the Premises, or relating to matters substantially within the control of the occupant of the Premises, accommodation of disabled persons in the Premises, nondiscrimination, Landlord’s rights and remedies, this Lease or anything else affecting this Lease. “Law” includes all conditions or requirements within Tenant’s control the noncompliance with which could adversely affect Landlord’s eligibility or qualification for any benefit or dispensation from any Government, including any reduction, abatement or deferral of Property Taxes. For Utilities, “Law” includes all rules, requirements, tariffs and actions of any utility company.

“Lease Year” means initially the first 12 full calendar months starting on or after the Commencement Date. The next period of 12 full calendar months is another “Lease Year” and so on for each subsequent 12-month period in the Term.

59 It may make sense for Landlord to insure and restore everything. This would require adjusting—for the most part, simplifying—insurance and restoration language but is not hard to do. It would be somewhat off market.

“Legal Costs” of Landlord means all reasonable costs and expenses Landlord incurs in any legal proceeding (including any appellate proceedings), in obtaining legal advice and assistance relating to this Lease, Tenant, or this tenancy, in any exercise or attempted exercise of remedies under this Lease or with respect to this Lease under Law, in establishing the amount of or collecting any Legal Costs, as the result of or through any Bankruptcy Event affecting Tenant or Guarantor, or in connection with any other matter for which this Lease entitles Landlord to reimbursement of its Legal Costs. Legal Costs shall include reasonable attorneys’ fees, disbursements and other charges billed by Landlord’s attorneys, court costs and expenses, fees for bonds, and charges for the services of paralegals, law clerks, process servers, private investigators, and all other personnel whose services are charged to Landlord in connection with Landlord’s receipt of those legal services. To the extent Landlord uses its own staff attorneys and other personnel, “Legal Costs” shall include the value of their time based on the billing rates of Landlord’s outside counsel for persons with comparable experience, qualifications and seniority.

“Lender/Lessor” means any Mortgagee or Master Landlord.

“Lien” means any mechanic’s, material supplier’s, or other lien or encumbrance filed against the Premises, the Building, the Land, or any interest in any of them.

“Master Lease” means any master or ground lease of the Building or the Land, entered into or Changed from time to time (whether before or after the Signature Date) under which this Lease is or becomes a sublease.

“Minor Work” means any Work that is immaterial and of a decorative or minor nature, e.g., painting, decorating, wall covering and carpeting, provided it is not reasonably projected to cost more than the Bonding Threshold and does not require a building permit.

“Mortgage” means any mortgage(s) (as Changed from time to time) that Landlord or Master Landlord grants at any time encumbering the Building, the Land or any estate or interest in either of them.

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

“Mortgagee” means any holder of a Mortgage.

“Notice” means any notice, request or other communication, including a notice of Default or of termination. Notices shall be given and shall become effective in accordance with the provisions of this Lease on Notices.

“Notify” means give any Notice.

“Operating Expenses” means all costs and expenses of every kind, whether now or later classified as operating expenses or expenditures under generally accepted accounting principles on an accrual basis, that Landlord incurs to manage, operate, maintain, repair, and protect the Building (whether or not this Lease obligates Landlord to incur them), or to provide Basic Services, including costs and expenses of: (a) salaries, wages, bonuses, and other compensation (including hospitalization, medical, surgical, retirement plan, pension plan, union dues, life insurance (including group life insurance), welfare and other fringe benefits, and vacation, holidays and other paid absence benefits) for employees (including off-site senior property management personnel) of Landlord or its agents engaged in the operation, repair, or maintenance of the Building; (b) payroll, social security, workers’ compensation, unemployment and similar taxes for those employees of Landlord or its agents, and disability or other benefits imposed by law or otherwise, for those employees; (c) uniforms (including cleaning, replacement and pressing) for those employees; (d) premiums and other charges for fire, other casualty, rent and liability insurance and any other insurance as Landlord reasonably deems necessary or advisable, and repair of any insured casualty to the extent of the deductible amount under the applicable insurance policy; (e) water charges and sewer rents or fees; (f) license, permit and inspection fees; (g) sales, use and excise taxes on goods and services the cost of which constitutes “Operating Expenses”; (h) telephone, fax, cellular phone, two-way radio, postage, stationery supplies and other operating expenses incurred in connection with the operation, maintenance, or repair of the Building; (i) administrative and management fees, including accounting, data processing, and Legal Costs (except for negotiations and disputes with specific tenants not affecting other parties); (j) repair to and maintenance of the Building (including parking and circulation areas and facilities serving the Building), including Building Systems and appurtenances and repair and replacement of worn-out equipment, facilities and installations; (k) janitorial, window cleaning, guard, pest control and extermination, water treatment, Garbage removal and disposal, plumbing and other services and inspection or service contracts for elevator, electrical, mechanical, HVAC, fire prevention, warning and security systems and other building equipment and systems or as may otherwise be necessary or proper for the operation, repair, or maintenance of the Building and the Common Areas and any costs of monitoring, improving, and remedying indoor air quality within the Building, whether to comply with Law or to improve indoor environmental quality; (l) supplies, tools, materials, and equipment used in connection with the operation, maintenance or repair of the Building; (m) architectural, engineering, and other professional fees and expenses; (n) painting the Building exterior or Common Areas; (o) maintaining landscaping, gardening, and plants, and replacement of interior and exterior plants and maintaining the Common Areas; (p) Utilities for operation, maintenance and repair of the Building and its Common Areas; (q) reasonable amortization (with interest at the Prime Rate) of capital improvements Landlord makes (or capital assets Landlord acquires) after the Base Year for the Building to comply with any Law or change in Law⁶⁰ or to seek to reduce other operating expenses; (r) building office rent or rental value; (s) surcharges and license and permit fees required by Law for parking and transportation facilities, including traffic management fees and charges; (t) furniture, wall, floor and window coverings, interior plants and planters and other customary and ordinary items of personal property (excluding paintings, sculptures and other works of art) for use in Common Areas; (u) purchasing, installing and removing seasonal and other temporary decorations for the Building or Common Areas; (v) acquisition, maintenance, repair and replacement of elevators, escalators, moving sidewalks, stairways, fire escapes, flagpoles, fountains, satellite dishes, signage (including parking, traffic, and directional signage and markers, whether temporary or permanent), tenant directories and other equipment and machinery for use in the public or common areas of the Building, including any personal property taxes thereon; (w) computers, data communications, two-way radios, personal digital assistants and other technology used in the Common Areas; (x) maintaining, cleaning, re-striping, repairing, replacing, repaving and resurfacing of parking lots or facilities; (y) substitution of work, labor, material or services in lieu of any of the above itemized items, or for any additional work, labor, services, fees or material resulting from compliance with any Law that affects the Building; (z) actual or reasonably allocable interest expense on funds Landlord borrows to pay Operating Expenses not yet reimbursed; and (aa) all costs related to the foregoing.

60 If a Lease does not provide for Operating Expenses Escalation Rent, then Landlord may want to treat this cost as Property Taxes. In any case, Landlord may prefer to pass it through separately rather than as an escalation above a base.

EXHIBIT B-1: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS

Operating Expenses shall exclude these costs: (a) depreciation of the Building (or its capital improvements, equipment, or systems); (b) interest, amortization, or other financing costs except as expressly included in Operating Expenses; (c) Master Lease ground rent; (d) Property Taxes; (e) Additional Services furnished directly to any tenant and separately reimbursable; (f) attorneys' fees and expenses for lease negotiations; (g) decorating, improving for tenant occupancy, and painting or redecorating any leasable space; (h) executive salaries; (i) leasing commissions; (j) transfer taxes from any transaction of Landlord; and (j) at Landlord's option, any category of Operating Expenses that would otherwise constitute Operating Expenses, provided the exclusion applies both for Base Operating Expenses and for all Operating Years.

"Operating Expenses Escalation Rent" means, for each Operating Year, Operating Expenses Share times the excess, if any, of: (a) Operating Expenses for that Operating Year; over (b) Base Operating Expenses.

"Operating Year" means the fiscal year Landlord establishes from time to time. Landlord's Operating Year is now the calendar year.

"Person" means any corporation, estate, Government, limited liability company, natural person, partnership, trust or other entity of any kind.

"Power Company" means the company that supplies electricity to the Building and any replacement electricity provider Landlord designates.

"Prime Rate" means the "prime," "base," "reference," or equivalent rate announced from time to time by Citibank, N.A. or another bank in the City Landlord selects, or, at Landlord's option, published in The Wall Street Journal or a similar authoritative source.

"Prohibited Use" means these uses of the Premises, unless the Basic Terms expressly permit them: (a) department store, drugstore, pharmacy, dry cleaner, clothing store, supermarket, produce store, liquor store, restaurant, or delicatessen (but Tenant may install a microwave oven or other food heating equipment for use by Tenant's employees and business visitors); (b) sale or rental of video tapes or equipment; (c) sale of lottery or similar tickets of any kind; (d) barber shop or haircutting or beauty salon; (e) film developing or printing services; (f) sale of alcoholic beverages, marijuana or other recreational drugs, whether or not legal; (g) operation of a check-cashing or money transmission service; (h) operation of any church or other religious organization of any kind; (i) use or occupancy by any Government; (j) manufacturing or light manufacturing of any kind (including the use of any equipment or process that in Landlord's reasonable determination is neither (i) typically used in generic office space; nor (ii) reasonably necessary or appropriate for use of the Premises as the Basic Terms expressly permit); (k) any obscene, nude, or semi-nude live or recorded performances, or nude modeling, rap sessions, or as a so-called "rubber goods"⁶¹ shop, or as a sex club of any kind; (l) to conduct any auction, bankruptcy, or "going out of business" sale; (m) residential, living, dwelling or sleeping purposes; (n) operation of any cabaret, club, disco, dance floor or eating or drinking establishment or live music or other live entertainment; (o) sale or display of nude photographs, sexual devices, objects, or publications depicting genitalia, obscene material, pornographic material (i.e., any written or pictorial matter with prurient appeal or any objects or instruments primarily concerned with lewd or prurient sexual activity, all as Landlord determines), or any other items commonly associated with peep show, massage parlor, adult book, "head shop," or similar stores; (p) possession of any animal or pet of any kind (except service animals for the disabled); (q) any clinic, medical, healing, chiropractor's office, doctors' office, spa, or similar use; (r) any other use of the Premises that Law or this Lease prohibits; (s) any unlawful or hazardous use; (t) to sell or display drug paraphernalia or drug-related merchandise, including any merchandise that Landlord reasonably determines is of a type used primarily in or identified primarily with the preparation, consumption, storage, or use of illegal drugs or other controlled substances; (u) any auction, fire, inventory close-out, bankruptcy, "going out of business," liquidation (whether of merchandise only or of Tenant's entire business), or similar sale; and (t) a club of any kind, including a so-called "night club" or "private club." [The "Prohibited Uses" shall also include operation of any retail business or the sale of any goods or services at retail.]

"Property Tax Escalation Rent" means Tax Share times the excess, if any, of the Building's: (a) Property Taxes in each Property Tax Year over (b) Base Property Taxes.

"Property Tax Year" means the City's fiscal year, now July 1 to June 30. If the City changes its fiscal year, then the definition of Property Tax Year shall change accordingly.

"Property Taxes" means all taxes, assessments (including "betterment" assessments), business improvement district charges, vault taxes (except those paid by particular tenants), and other governmental charges, special or otherwise, actually assessed or levied (and in either case payable) from time to time upon or with respect to the ownership of and/or all other taxable interests in the Building, and/or the Land, including the sidewalks, plazas, or streets adjacent to the Land (as any of the foregoing may be improved, renovated, expanded or otherwise changed from time to time), imposed by any Government for any Property Tax Year. Property Taxes shall be measured based on the period to which they apply under Law, regardless of when Landlord actually pays them. If Landlord subdivides the Building into multiple tax lots (e.g., multiple condominium units), then Property Taxes shall continue to be measured for the Building as a whole based on the sum of Property Taxes for all individual tax lots. Property Taxes shall include so-called “payments in lieu of taxes” and any similar payments to any Government or otherwise in lieu of real estate taxes. Property Taxes shall not diminish by any discount for early payment. Property Taxes shall include assessments for public improvements or benefits assessed against the Building or Land, including any interest component. If because of any change in taxation of real estate any other tax or assessment (including any franchise, income, profit, sales, use, occupancy, gross receipts or rent tax, or any special assessment, levy or fee of any kind) is imposed upon Landlord, the Building, the Land, or the occupancy, rents or income of any of them, in substitution for any of the foregoing element(s) of Property Taxes, then that other tax or assessment shall at Landlord’s option be deemed part of Property Taxes. Except as the preceding sentence states, “Property Taxes” shall disregard: (a) Landlord’s income, intangible, franchise, capital stock, estate, inheritance, mortgage recording or transfer taxes; (b) water and sewer frontage charges; (c) penalties and interest for late payment; and (d) any partial or total abatement, deferral, or other tax benefit, exemption or rescheduling actually awarded or otherwise in place for the Building or Land (or any tax lot(s) within either), including any arising from the identity, investment(s) or business activities of any particular tenant(s) of the Building.⁶² If Tenant is tax-exempt, this does not limit the definition of Property Taxes or Tenant’s obligations and rights on Property Tax Escalation Rent.

61 This prohibition often appears. "Rubber goods" are actually just contraceptives. Look it up. Consider deleting the prohibition, at least for certain types of retail stores.

62 Preceding sentence will not always work. As another approach, consider this:

Property Taxes shall fully take into account (and shall be measured after any reduction resulting from) the effect of any partial or total abatement, deferral, or other tax benefit, exemption, or rescheduling actually awarded or otherwise in place for the Building or Land, except as follows. To the extent that any such benefit, exemption, or rescheduling arises from the identity, investment(s), or business activities of any particular tenant(s) of the Building and Landlord must pass it through to such tenant(s), then Property Taxes shall be measured as if such benefit, exemption, or rescheduling did not exist and had not occurred.

“Related Party” of a Person means any: (a) agent, director, employee, family member (spouse, sibling, parent, or child), managing agent, member, officer, parent company, principal, partner, shareholder or subsidiary of that Person; or (b) Person Controlled by or Controlling that Person or under common Control with that Person.

“Rent” means: (a) Base Rent and Additional Rent, as adjusted from time to time under this Lease; and (b) all other payments or deposits this Lease requires Tenant to make.

“SNDA” means a nondisturbance agreement between Tenant and a Lender/Lessor, as the Lender/Lessor approves or requires.

“State” means the state where the Building is located.

“Structure” means only these elements of the Building, excluding anything Tenant installed: structural steel or other structural support system; elevators; escalators; systems serving the Building as a whole rather than individual tenant(s); roof; floors; ceilings; foundations and pilings; exterior walls (including windows and mullions, unless the Premises consists of ground floor space or this Lease otherwise provides); masonry; concrete work; load-bearing walls; and vertical and horizontal support beams and other support structures for the Building.

“Substantially Complete” means Landlord: (a) has completed Landlord’s Initial Work to the extent that Tenant can reasonably start Tenant’s Initial Work without material interference from Landlord’s final completion of Landlord’s Initial Work; and (b) is otherwise prepared to deliver the Premises to Tenant.

“Successor Landlord” means any Person that acquires or terminates Landlord’s estate in the Land and the Building through an Enforcement Proceeding, including the Master Landlord under any terminated Master Lease and any designee, nominee or assignee of any Landlord’s Lender/Lessor in an Enforcement Proceeding.

“Tenant Party” means each and all of: (a) Tenant and its successors and assigns; (b) anyone claiming through or under Tenant, including the transferee under any Transfer; (c) any Related Party of Tenant; and (d) any agent, Contractor, customer, employee, franchisee, franchisor, independent contractor, invitee, licensee, supplier, or vendor of Tenant. Nothing in this definition limits any Transfer restriction or prohibition.

“Tenant’s Initial Work” means all Work necessary or appropriate for Tenant to operate the Permitted Use(s) in the entire Premises in compliance with this Lease.

“Tenant-Restored Damage” means any damage caused by a Casualty or Condemnation and affecting any Tenant’s Initial Work or other Work Tenant performed.

“Term” means a period that starts on the Commencement Date and ends on the Expiration Date.

“Transfer” means any of these affecting this Lease or the Premises: (a) Assignment; (b) subletting or grant of concession, license or other rights of occupancy; (c) Change or surrender of the foregoing; (d) use, operation or occupancy, by any Person or business except Tenant, for any purpose; (e) sale, mortgage, pledge or other transfer, assignment or succession, whether by operation of law or otherwise; and (f) any of the foregoing that affects any sublease or subtenant or any other estate or interest, or the holder of an estate or interest, whose creation was a Transfer. “Transfer” also includes: (x) any other transaction in substance equivalent to any of the foregoing; and (y) as this Lease provides, certain transactions affecting Equity Interests.

“Utilities” means all utilities and services necessary or appropriate for the Premises, including electricity, gas, water, HVAC, fuel, steam, sewer, Garbage removal, and all other utilities and other services of any kind except Communications Services.

“Waiver of Subrogation” means a provision in, or endorsement to, any policy⁶³ of insurance, by which the carrier agrees to waive rights of recovery by subrogation against either party to this Lease (and, in the case of Tenant’s carriers, against Landlord’s Lender/Lessor(s)) for any loss that policy covers.

“Work” means any addition, alteration, construction, demolition, reconstruction, renovation or other work of any magnitude of any kind in, at or serving (or materials fabricated off-site for) the Premises or the Building, including Tenant’s Initial Work and installations of any systems or services benefiting the Premises.

63 It is sometimes thought that Waivers of Subrogation: (a) apply only to Property Insurance; and (b) are now baked into standard insurance policy forms. Neither statement is true, according to the author’s reliable sources.

EXHIBIT B-2: STATE-SPECIFIC TERMS

These additional Supplemental Terms (also part of the “Supplemental Terms”) constitute part of the Lease to which attached. All statutory references relate to New York law.

EXHIBIT B-3: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS (RETAIL)

These additional Supplemental Terms (also part of the “Supplemental Terms”) are part of the Lease to which attached. Terms defined in this Exhibit B-3 are listed in the Index of Defined Terms after the Basic Terms, in each case with a page reference. The table of contents for Exhibit B-1 also covers this Exhibit B-3.⁶⁴

39. Percentage Rent

39.1 Tenant’s Obligation. For every Lease Year or partial Lease Year, except in any Abatement Period, Tenant shall pay Landlord an amount (“Percentage Rent”) equal to the excess, if any, in that period, of (a) Landlord’s Percentage times Gross Sales over (b) Base Rent. If in any period “a” is less than “b,” then Percentage Rent for that period shall be zero, no other Rent shall be affected and Tenant shall have no Offset. Within 30 days after the last day of each calendar month, except any calendar month entirely in an Abatement Period, Tenant shall pay Landlord Percentage Rent for that calendar month. Within 90 days after each Lease Year, the parties shall make adjusting payments so Tenant’s total payments of Percentage Rent for that Lease Year equal actual Percentage Rent.

39.2 Definition: “Gross Sales.” The “Gross Sales” means the entire amount charged, whether wholly or partly for cash, on credit or otherwise, for all merchandise sold, and all charges made for services performed or for the extension of credit in, at or from the Premises, or through the substantial use of the Premises, including the amount allowed upon any “trade-in,” the retail price of any merchandise delivered on redemption of trading stamps, all deposits not refunded to purchasers, all catalog sales at or from the Premises, all direct mail sales made from any location based on a list of Tenant’s customers at the Premises, all receipts from electronic or other video games and from advertising conducted at the Premises by Tenant for others and all orders taken in or from the Premises or that Tenant would in the normal course of its operations credit or attribute to its business in the Premises, even if those orders are filled from another location. If Tenant sells stamps or tickets at the Premises and receives only a service fee, royalty or commission from those sales, then Gross Sales shall include only the net amount payable to Tenant. Gross Sales shall not be reduced for uncollected or uncollectible credit accounts.

⁶⁴ Tenant will also want to cover at a minimum signage; parking; co-tenancy (for opening and for continued operations); and restrictions on activities and objects in common areas near premises.

EXHIBIT B-3: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS (RETAIL)

“Gross Sales” shall include gross receipts from all mechanical, electronic and other vending devices placed in the Premises by Tenant or under authority from Tenant, except any installed (in parts of the Premises not open to the public) for convenience of Tenant’s employees; mail or phone order sales solicited from the Premises; and mail order or telephone order sales from the Premises in response to advertisements using the Premises address or telephone number. “Gross Sales” shall include all sales made by mail, catalog, telephone, Internet, electronic, video, computer or other technology whether now or later existing (all, collectively, “Electronic Sales”) if received, placed, filled or shipped from the Premises,⁶⁵ including sales made from any computer in or accessed from the Premises. Tenant shall install no such computer unless Tenant demonstrates to Landlord’s reasonable satisfaction that Tenant’s sales reporting system for Gross Sales will include all sales made from that computer. Gross Sales include receipts from sales made and orders taken in the Premises even if: (a) the account is transferred elsewhere for collection; or (b) merchandise or services sold from the Premises are delivered elsewhere. Every credit sale shall be treated as a sale for the full price in cash when the transaction occurs, whether or not the customer pays or title passes. Tenant’s Gross Sales shall include the Gross Sales of every sublessee, licensee, concessionaire or other person using or occupying any Premises under authority from Tenant (“Additional Retailers”), but shall exclude payments Additional Retailers pay Tenant in consideration for use and occupancy.⁶⁶

39.3 Exclusions from Gross Sales. Tenant’s “Gross Sales” shall not include (or, if included, there shall be deducted to the extent of that inclusion) the amount of any: (a) cash or credit refund that Tenant actually makes for merchandise sold in, at, or from the Premises; (b) exchanges and transfers of merchandise between Tenant’s multiple locations, if made only for convenient operation of Tenant’s business and not with the purpose or effect of consummating elsewhere a sale (that would have been) made at the Premises; (c) returns to shippers or manufacturers; (d) sales of fixtures or equipment after their substantial use in the conduct of Tenant’s business in the Premises; and (e) sales, luxury or excise taxes on sales from the Premises, where Tenant (but not any vendor to Tenant) adds those taxes to (or absorbs them in) the selling price and pays them to the taxing authority. Tenant may not deduct from Gross Sales any cash or

65 Landlord may wish to include Internet orders shipped from anywhere to any address within the marketing area of this particular location (even if the order never passed through this particular location in any way), under the theory—probably dubious—that those orders represent sales that this particular location would otherwise have made.

66 “Gross Sales” may require tailoring for particular businesses.

credit refund for merchandise sold via Electronic Sales unless Gross Sales included the sales price of that merchandise.

39.4 Recordkeeping. Tenant shall keep and shall require Additional Retailers to keep at the Premises (or at another location approved by Landlord in writing) complete and accurate books of account and records that include all purchases and receipts of merchandise, inventories and all sales and other transactions from which Tenant's Gross Sales can be determined. Tenant shall record all sales, when made, whether for cash or on credit, in a cash register(s) containing locked-in cumulative tapes with cumulation capacity satisfactory to Landlord or a point of sale computer recording system, in either case with the capacity to identify individual sales by method of payment (cash, check or credit card). Tenant shall keep all pertinent original sales records, which records shall include, as applicable, these items or their electronic equivalents: (a) daily dated register tapes; (b) serially numbered sales slips; (c) mail and catalog orders; (d) telephone orders; (e) settlement report sheets of transactions with Additional Retailers; (f) records showing that merchandise returned by customers was purchased by them at or from the Premises; (g) receipts or other records of merchandise leased, licensed or taken out on approval; (h) duplicate bank deposit slips and bank statements; (i) such other records as would normally be required to be kept and examined by an independent accountant in accordance with accepted auditing practices in performing an audit of Tenant's Gross Sales; and (j) all income, sales and occupation tax returns. In addition to Landlord's audit rights under this Lease, Landlord may periodically inspect or monitor the Premises to confirm Tenant is complying with the operating procedures this paragraph requires. If Tenant is not in substantial compliance with those requirements, then Tenant shall reimburse Landlord's cost of that inspection and monitoring. Tenant shall on request give Landlord copies of Tenant's sales reports for the Premises (as electronic data, if Landlord requests) that were or are delivered to Tenant's headquarters.

39.5 Reporting. Tenant shall submit to Landlord, in each case in reasonable detail: (a) within 30 days after the last day of each calendar month, a written statement of Gross Sales for that calendar month; and (b) within 90 days after the last day of each Lease Year, a written statement certified by Tenant's chief financial officer of Gross Sales for that Lease Year. Each such statement, and its certification, shall be in form and scope (and subject only to qualifications) reasonably satisfactory to Landlord. Landlord's acceptance of Percentage Rent shall not limit Landlord's right to examine Tenant's records to verify Tenant's Gross Sales. If Tenant fails to timely report Tenant's Gross Sales as this Lease requires, then without limiting Landlord's other rights or remedies: (a) Tenant shall pay Landlord a fee of $50 per day for each day of lateness in Tenant's delivery of that report; and (b) Landlord may estimate Tenant's Gross Sales. Tenant shall pay Percentage Rent accordingly unless and until Tenant affirmatively demonstrates that Landlord's estimate is incorrect.⁶⁷

39.6 Audits. At any reasonable time, upon five days prior Notice to Tenant, Landlord or its designee may, at Landlord's expense (except as this Lease otherwise provides) audit Tenant's records of Gross Sales for any Lease Year. Any such audit performed by a certified public accountant or other auditor selected by Landlord shall bind the parties. If that audit discloses any deficiency in payment of Percentage Rent, then Tenant shall immediately pay Landlord that deficiency, with interest at the rate that applies to late payments of Rent from the dates when this Lease first required Tenant to make each such payment. Only if the deficiency exceeds 2% of the Percentage Rent as Tenant computed and paid it for the period the audit covered, Tenant shall pay for the audit, including reasonable travel, meal and lodging Operating Expenses of Landlord's auditor(s).

40. Noncompete Zone

40.1 Tenant's Covenant. Neither Tenant nor any Related Party of Tenant shall, directly or indirectly, operate, manage, franchise, license, have any interest in or allow or authorize any other Person to operate any store or other retail facility of any kind (including any concession, outlet store, discount store, seasonal store, temporary store or selling program, subleased or licensed department or other facility of any kind selling to the public, even if its prices vary from those in the Premises) that: (a) is located in the Noncompete Zone; (b) uses Tenant's Trade Name or a similar or variant trade name (owned or controlled by Tenant or Tenant's Related Party) or otherwise competes with or overlaps to any material degree Tenant's business in the Premises; and (c) is not in operation⁶⁸ on the Signature Date (a "Prohibited Store"). The parties acknowledge that the Noncompete Zone reasonably approximates the geographic area of Tenant's anticipated clientele and this restriction is reasonable given 67 Even if Tenant does not pay Percentage Rent, Landlord may desire periodic reports on Gross Sales simply to assess how well Tenant is doing and Tenant's long-term prospects. Lenders like this information, too.

68 Landlord may wish to memorialize exactly which existing operations of Tenant will be "grandfathered."

Tenant's ability to draw clientele from significant distances because of Tenant's favorable reputation.

40.2 Remedies. If any Prohibited Store(s) operate in the Noncompete Zone, then Landlord may: (x) treat such Prohibited Store(s) as a Default; (y) obtain injunctive relief to require Tenant to close the Prohibited Store(s); and/or (z) include all sales from the Prohibited Store(s) in Gross Sales.

40.3 Radius. If the Noncompete Zone is defined as any points within a stated distance from any point(s) or location(s), then that stated distance shall be measured on a straight line ("as the crow flies"). If the Noncompete Zone includes any part of any shopping center, mall or other retail (or mixed use) development project, then the Noncompete Zone shall include the entirety of that shopping center, mall or development project, as expanded from time to time.

41. Common Areas

41.1 Parking. Tenant and its employees shall park their vehicles only in parking areas as Landlord from time to time designates. Landlord may change that designation at any time. Tenant shall give Landlord a list of its and its employees' vehicle license numbers within 15 days after the Commencement Date. Tenant shall Notify Landlord of any change in that list within five days after it occurs. Tenant shall cause its employees to comply with the parking restrictions in this Lease. If Tenant or its employees violate Landlord's parking regulations, Landlord may charge Tenant $50 per day or partial day of that violation and may tow away or attach violation notice(s) or boot(s) to the affected vehicle(s). Tenant shall pay all towing costs as a condition to release of the affected vehicle(s).

41.2 Additional Operating Expenses. In addition to any items this Lease otherwise includes in Operating Expenses, Landlord's "Operating Expenses" shall also include all these expenses of Landlord.

41.2.1 Amenities. Maintenance and operation of special amenities, e.g., meeting rooms, amusements, a concierge desk and police and security facilities.

41.2.2 Decorations; Shopper Amenities. Providing customer services determined by Landlord to be advantageous to attract patrons or to help them shop at the Building, e.g., costs of leasing or operating shuttle buses and other transportation systems, public or private, and the costs of providing shopping bags, strollers, wheelchairs, gift certificates, valet parking and entertainment.

41.2.3 Audio/Video. Installing and operating loudspeaker systems, music program services and other audio or video transmission systems, including licensing fees, and all security systems for the Building.

41.2.4 Promotion. Promotion of visits to the Building, including advertisements, promotional literature and incentives for travel agents, public and charter transportation carriers and others engaged in the tourism industry, and advertising generally.

42. Exclusive Use(s)

42.1 Tenant's Right. So long as no Default exists, Tenant shall have the sole and exclusive right (as against Landlord and anyone claiming through Landlord), within the Exclusivity Zone, to operate a store whose business consists of (or includes as its primary component) the Exclusive Use. Nothing in the preceding sentence prohibits operation of any Exclusive Use(s) by anyone within the Exclusivity Zone if such Exclusive Use(s) either (a) are already permitted⁶⁹ under leases entered into before the Signature Date; (b) constitute one line (but not the single primary line) of goods or services among other lines sold, leased or licensed by a multi-department store, e.g., a supermarket, drugstore, department store or the like, whenever that store's lease was signed; or (c) constitute an incidental and minor line (but not the single primary line) of goods or services sold, leased or licensed by a store the primary business of which is not Tenant's Exclusive Use. For example, if Tenant's Exclusive Use consists of selling recorded music, then a coffee store selling music CD's as an incidental business would not violate Tenant's Exclusive Use.

42.2 Operation of Exclusive Use(s). Tenant shall operate all Exclusive Uses throughout the Term, except when this Lease allows Tenant to close. Any Exclusive Use shall cease to be an Exclusive Use if Tenant ceases to operate it and: (a) Tenant does not recommence its operation within 15 days after Notice from Landlord or (b) Landlord has already given Tenant one Notice under clause "a" in the preceding 36 months. That use shall then, for the remaining Term and any Option Term(s), constitute a Permitted Use but never again an Exclusive Use.

42.3 Landlord's Covenant. Landlord agrees that every future lease of retail space Landlord enters into in the Exclusivity Zone shall prohibit the tenant from using its demised premises for any Exclusive Use, if that tenant's operation of that use would violate this Lease, but only so long as: (a) no Default exists and (b) Tenant's exclusivity rights have not terminated.

42.4 Remedies for Other Tenant's Breach. If any retail tenant within the Exclusivity Zone, except Tenant, breaches its covenant not to use its demised premises for an Exclusive Use under this Lease, then at Tenant's request (as Tenant's sole and exclusive remedy) Landlord shall, provided no Default exists, at Landlord's election and at Tenant's expense (including Legal Costs), either: (a) exercise reasonable efforts to enforce that other tenant's lease, short of eviction; or (b) assign to Tenant, without recourse, or allow Tenant to exercise as a third-party beneficiary, Landlord's right (if any) to obtain injunctive relief compelling that other tenant to cease that use, but no other rights or remedies of Landlord against that other tenant. Landlord shall make the arrangements with Tenant described in clause "b" under documents satisfactory to Landlord.

42.5 Unenforceability. Any Exclusive Use(s) were granted at Tenant's request as part of negotiating this Lease. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, if it is determined that any Exclusive Use violates antitrust or any other Law, then: (a) that Exclusive Use shall be forever null and void and of no force or effect whatsoever; and (b) the remainder of this Lease shall continue in full force and effect without change. Landlord shall have no obligation to contest or defend any proceeding or other action that would or could have the effect described in this paragraph. Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord on any such proceeding or other action and its outcome.

42.6 Interpretation. Tenant's Exclusive Use, if any, shall be limited to its express terms, which shall be strictly construed. Nothing in this Lease (including the scope of Tenant's Permitted Use(s)) shall be deemed to give Tenant any Exclusive Use other than, in addition to or otherwise extending beyond the Exclusive Use and Exclusivity Zone, if any, that this Lease expressly contemplates.

43. Odors and Exhaust

Tenant acknowledges that Landlord would not enter into this Lease unless Tenant assured Landlord that under no circumstances will any other occupants of the Building be subjected to odors or fumes, whether or not noxious, and Landlord's Building will not be damaged by any exhaust, from Tenant's operations. Landlord and Tenant therefore agree as follows:⁷⁰

43.1 Prohibition. Tenant shall not cause or permit (or conduct any activities that would cause) any release of any odors or fumes of any kind from the Premises.

43.2 Venting Requirements. If the Building has a ventilation system that in Landlord's judgment is adequate, suitable and appropriate to vent the Premises, Tenant shall vent the Premises through that system. If Landlord at any time determines that no such ventilation system exists, Tenant shall in compliance with Law vent all fumes and odors from the Premises as Landlord requires. The placement and configuration of all ventilation exhaust pipes, louvers and other equipment shall be subject to Landlord's approval.

43.3 Abatement. Tenant shall, at Tenant's sole cost and expense, provide odor eliminators and other devices (e.g., filters, air cleaners, grease guards, scrubbers and whatever other equipment may in Landlord's judgment be necessary or appropriate from time to time) to completely remove, eliminate and abate any odors, fumes, grease, or other substances in Tenant's exhaust stream that, in Landlord's judgment, emanate from Tenant's Premises.

43.4 Odor Problems in Term. Tenant's responsibility to remove, eliminate and abate odors, fumes and exhaust shall continue throughout the Term. Landlord's approval of Tenant's Initial Work shall not preclude Landlord from requiring additional measures to eliminate odors, fumes and other adverse impacts of Tenant's exhaust stream, as Landlord may designate in Landlord's discretion. Tenant shall install additional equipment as Landlord requires from time to time under the preceding sentence.

43.5 Failure to Install. If Tenant fails to install satisfactory odor control equipment within 10 Business Days after Landlord's demand made at any time, then Landlord may, without limiting Landlord's other rights and remedies, require Tenant to cease and suspend any operations in the Premises that, in Landlord's determination, cause odors, fumes or exhaust. For example, if Landlord determines that Tenant's production of a certain type of food causes odors, fumes or exhaust and Tenant does not install satisfactory odor control equipment within 10 Business Days after Landlord's request, then Landlord may require Tenant to stop producing that type of food in the Premises unless and until Tenant has installed odor control equipment satisfactory to Landlord.

44. Tenant's Initial Work and Opening

44.1 Pre-Opening Signage. Promptly after the Signature Date, unless Landlord directs otherwise, Tenant shall give Landlord and Landlord shall install at Tenant's expense, or at Landlord's option Tenant shall install, in the windows of the Premises (or otherwise on the exterior of the Premises at locations satisfactory to Landlord), temporary professionally painted signage, in appearance and wording satisfactory to Landlord, including Tenant's and/or Landlord's name and logo, if Landlord requests, announcing the opening of Tenant's business. Installation of temporary signage shall not constitute Tenant's taking occupancy of the Premises or require payment of Base Rent. If temporary signage is damaged during Work, Tenant shall at Landlord's request promptly provide replacement signage.

44.2 Obligation to Open. The "Opening Deadline" means the date 90 days after the Commencement Date, unless the Basic Terms state some other Opening Deadline. By the Opening Deadline, Tenant shall complete Tenant's Initial Work, in compliance with this Lease; fully stock the Premises; and hire and assign to the Premises suitable staff for, and open the entire Premises to the public for, active and continuous operation of Tenant's business in accordance with this Lease.

44.3 Liquidated Damages for Late Opening. Tenant recognizes and acknowledges that if Tenant fails to open by the Opening Deadline in accordance with this Lease, then Landlord and Landlord's other tenants will suffer injury whose scope and nature cannot readily be ascertained or determined. In that case, beginning on the 15th day after the Opening Deadline, Tenant shall pay Landlord, as liquidated damages and not as a penalty, for each day (except the first 14 days) after the Opening Deadline on which Tenant has not yet opened for business as this Lease requires, an amount equal to 1/30 of Tenant's monthly Base Rent (determined as if any Abatement Period or "free rent" or other rent abatement under this Lease had expired and terminated). Tenant shall pay that amount in addition to any and all other sums, including Base Rent, that this Lease requires Tenant to pay. That payment shall not limit any other rights or remedies of Landlord.

45. Retail Operations

45.1 Trade Name. Tenant shall conduct business at the Premises only under Tenant's Trade Name. In conducting business at the Premises Tenant shall not use any trademark, service mark or other trade name except Tenant's Trade Name to identify or refer to Tenant's business. Tenant shall not change Tenant's Trade Name without Landlord's prior reasonable consent. Tenant's Trade Name shall not include the name of the Building or of Landlord or its Related Party, or otherwise suggest any connection or affiliation between Landlord and Tenant, without Landlord's consent.

45.2 Façade. Unless Landlord elects otherwise, Tenant shall perform and discharge, for the Façade, all obligations that this Lease requires Tenant to perform for the Premises, including maintenance, repairs and compliance with Work procedures. The "Façade" means signage (temporary and permanent) and non-structural customary tenant installations to the storefront (i.e. anodized aluminum, windows and other glass, mirrors, exterior finishes and window treatment, doors, door frames, rolldown doors, awnings, and similar storefront installations) for the Premises. If Landlord permits Tenant to install rolldown doors, then they shall be open-face (i.e., see-through rather than solid) and located inside Tenant's glass. Tenant shall install no exterior rolldown doors. The design and specifications of rolldown doors shall be subject to Landlord's prior written approval.

45.3 Coordinated Façade. Tenant shall comply with any requirements and limitations Landlord imposes (provided they do not unreasonably discriminate against Tenant and preserve reasonable visibility of Tenant's business) on coordination and design of Tenant's Façade and the overall Façade of the Building. Tenant shall install signage only on Landlord's designated signage panels. Tenant's Façade shall at all times comply with Landlord's signage and storefront program and criteria (the "Façade Requirements"). [Exhibit __ consists of the Façade Requirements at the Signature Date.] Landlord shall give Tenant further specifications, if any, for the Façade Requirements on Tenant's written request. Landlord may modify or add to the Façade Requirements from time to time with Notice to Tenant.

45.4 Façade Construction. Tenant's Façade, and any changes to Tenant's Façade, are subject to Landlord's prior approval, not to be unreasonably withheld provided Tenant's Façade at all times fully complies with the Façade Requirements. Any construction or alteration of Tenant's Facade shall constitute Work, except that if Tenant proposes to perform Façade Work, then Landlord shall have the right to perform it at Tenant's reasonable expense with no Administrative Fee or any other fee beyond reimbursement of cost. If Tenant's Façade is wholly or partially damaged or destroyed, Tenant shall repair it within three Business Days after receipt of Notice from Landlord, in accordance with Tenant's repair and maintenance obligations, and its obligations in the event of casualty, under this Lease. Notwithstanding the previous sentence, Tenant shall have no obligation to repair items this Lease requires Landlord to repair or rebuild. If Landlord decides to improve or replace Tenant's Façade, Tenant shall cooperate with Landlord and make the Premises available to Landlord at reasonable times and not cause or permit any obstruction or delays to Landlord's Work. That Landlord Work shall be subject to the provisions on Landlord's Work under this Lease.

45.5 Continuous Operation. From and after the Opening Deadline (or, if earlier, substantial completion of Tenant's Initial Work), except in reasonable periods for remodeling and bona fide periodic taking of inventory, Tenant shall actively operate a retail business (constituting a Permitted Use) in the entire Premises and keep the entire Premises (except up to 10% of the Premises for office, storage and warehouse area) open to the public, fully stocked with inventory, including seasonal items as appropriate for the Permitted Use, for the active and continuous conduct of Tenant's retail business in Minimum Hours and for additional operating hours as Tenant deems appropriate. Tenant shall not use the Premises for storage or warehouse purposes, except as this Section allows and then only as reasonably necessary to operate Tenant's business at the Premises for Permitted Uses. Tenant shall keep Tenant's exterior signage fully lighted at least until 10 p.m. every night.

45.6 Going Dark. If Landlord determines that Tenant has not substantially complied with the preceding Section entitled Continuous Operation, then Landlord may so Notify Tenant (a "Dark Fee Warning Notice"). Any Dark Fee Warning Notice shall refer to this paragraph and the Dark Fee. Any Dark Fee Warning Notice shall lapse if, for 24 months, Landlord has assessed no Dark Fee. After Landlord has given Tenant any Dark Fee Warning Notice, so long as that Dark Fee Warning Notice has not lapsed, for each hour that Tenant is closed during Minimum Hours (a "Dark Period"), Tenant shall pay Landlord a fee equal to this percentage of Tenant's then-current monthly Base Rent (the "Dark Fee"): (a) no Dark Fee for the first five hours of Dark Period in any calendar year; (b) thereafter, one half of one percent until the total Dark Fees in any one calendar year equal one month's Base Rent; and (c) thereafter (and continuing until Landlord's Dark Fee Warning Notice has lapsed, superseding "a" and "b"), 1%. The Dark Fees are intended to compensate Landlord for the detriment that Landlord would suffer from any Dark Period, e.g., diminished desirability of the Building, reduction of pedestrian traffic, complaints from other tenants, reduced percentage rent from other tenants and interference with Landlord's goal to produce an attractive environment in and near the Building. The parties acknowledge that the detriment to Landlord cannot be readily quantified or measured. They have therefore agreed on the Dark Fee as a reasonable estimate of that detriment. Tenant confirms to Landlord that the Dark Fee is fully enforceable.

45.7 Standards. Tenant shall fixturate (including replacements and additions to Tenant's initial fixtures), maintain and operate (including maintenance of inventory levels, introduction of new products, staffing, promotional activities and all other business activities) Tenant's retail store in the Premises in an attractive and first class manner, consistent with the highest standards for retail stores in the City selling goods or services of the type Tenant sells, in accordance with a standard of operations at least equivalent to the higher of (a) Tenant's competitors; or (b) Tenant's other locations. Tenant shall operate the entire Premises as a single retail unit entirely under Tenant's direct management and control. Tenant shall promptly replace with equivalent new glass all broken glass in Tenant's trade fixtures. Tenant shall always maintain adequate staffing to actively and continuously operate Tenant's business in compliance with this Lease. Tenant shall keep its display windows fully stocked and well-lit in Minimum Hours. Landlord, in its reasonable judgment, shall determine Tenant's compliance with this paragraph.

45.8 Windows. The portion of Tenant's Facade extending from ground level to a level equal to the lowest point on the ceiling of the Premises shall be primarily transparent glass. Tenant shall not: (a) replace any windows with brick, aluminum, metal or any other construction material except transparent glass; or (b) otherwise materially obstruct the visibility of the interior of the Premises from the street. Tenant shall not be deemed in violation of clause "b" if Tenant posts in Tenant's window professionally printed or professionally painted signs consistent (in style, quality, number and size) with those, in Landlord's reasonable judgment, customarily used by first-class operators of businesses like Tenant's in Comparable Buildings. Tenant shall post no other signs in the windows of the Premises except as this Lease permits.

45.9 Operating Standards. Tenant shall not conduct business through window counters, chutes or other openings of any kind in any exterior wall or storefront of the Premises. Tenant shall conduct business in a way consistent with high quality operation of the Permitted Use(s) in Comparable Buildings. Tenant shall create no nuisance or disturbance in or near the Premises. Any Work (temporary or permanent) and lighting within Tenant's Premises visible from outside the Premises requires Landlord's approval. Tenant shall install no Vending Equipment. All doors in Tenant's Facade shall be open and unlocked, providing access to Tenant's store, in Minimum Hours, except bona fide service entrances, identified as such on Tenant's plans approved by Landlord, constructed substantially entirely of metal and not glass. Tenant shall not use padlocks, chains or other portable locking devices. Tenant shall conduct Tenant's business entirely within the Premises, except as the Basic Terms otherwise expressly allow. Tenant shall place no signs or other objects in any Common Areas or at any other location outside the Premises at, in on or near the Building without Landlord's consent, except as Law requires or this Lease expressly permits. Tenant shall not cause or permit Tenant Parties to gather, wait, or await assignments anywhere outside the Premises, including in Common Areas. Tenant shall not suffer or permit individuals having no apparent business in the Premises to loiter in the Premises. Tenant shall not install loudspeakers or other sound systems in, on or about the Premises, or operate any musical instruments, that (in the case of any of the foregoing) are audible outside the Premises. Tenant shall not use or permit use of any flashing, moving and/or rotating lights audible or visible outside the Premises.

49.10 Franchise Requirements. If Tenant operates the Premises under a license or franchise issued by any franchisor, Tenant shall comply with that license or franchise and not cause or permit it to be terminated or cancelled without Landlord's consent, not to be unreasonably withheld.⁷¹

45.11 Additional Restrictions. Tenant shall not install or operate, or allow to be installed or operated, any video game, pinball machine, pay telephone, vending machine (whether for sale of beverages, foods, candy, cigarettes, or other goods or products, or otherwise), Internet kiosk, can redemption machine, pay locker, pay toilet, kiddie ride, scales, amuse-

71 If Landlord regards Tenant's franchise arrangements as fundamentally important, Landlord may want other covenants and protections, similar to those a hospitality lender might obtain when financing a franchised hotel. In these cases, Landlord will often sign the Lease with the franchisor, who will then sublease to the franchisee and seek comfort that if one franchisee fails the franchisor can install another one.

ment devices, automatic teller machine, or other coin-operated (or card-operated) equipment or machine of any kind in the Premises, or any other equipment or machine providing goods or services directly to Tenant's customers in exchange for payment of consideration in any other form, except machines dispensing gumballs and candy (all the foregoing, subject to that exception, collectively, "Vending Equipment").

45.12 Ground Floor Maintenance. If the Premises is located at ground level, then Tenant shall sweep and remove any snow, ice, clutter, refuse and litter from the sidewalk, driveway, parking area, yard, delivery doorway(s), and entrances serving the Premises, and keep them clean.

46. Miscellaneous

46.1 Security Interest. Tenant grants Landlord a security interest in all goods, inventory, equipment, trade fixtures and all other personal property of any kind or nature belonging to Tenant located in, on, or at the Premises in the Term, and all proceeds of the foregoing. That security interest shall secure Tenant's payment of all Rent, including damages upon an Event of Default, and all other indebtedness of Tenant to Landlord arising from or relating to this Lease or Landlord's exercise of rights and remedies under this Lease. This Lease constitutes a security agreement for that security interest. Landlord's security interest shall, however, survive any termination of this Lease and remain in full force and effect until Tenant has paid and performed all secured obligations. Tenant shall execute any further document(s) Landlord requests to effect, implement, evidence, or confirm Landlord's security interest. Tenant authorizes Landlord to file on Tenant's behalf any financing statement necessary or appropriate for that security interest.⁷² Landlord may exercise all rights and remedies available under the State's Uniform Commercial Code and other Law, but that does not limit Landlord's other rights and remedies. The lien granted under this paragraph shall be in addition to any Landlord's lien or distraint rights that Law may give Landlord at or after the Commencement Date.⁷³

46.2 Nature of Lease. If (a) the Building (with any adjacent or nearby buildings under ownership, operation or management by Landlord

72 If Landlord cares about its security interest, Landlord should file a financing statement; otherwise the security interest is generally unperfected. New York law does not give Landlord any automatic security interest.

73 Major tenants will typically require Landlord and its mortgagee(s) to waive or subordinate any such security interest to facilitate Tenant's asset-based financing.

and its Related Parties) contains or was designed to contain four or more retail occupancies; (b) this Lease requires Tenant to operate a retail business in the Premises; and (c) this Lease establishes Prohibited Use(s) that Law would otherwise allow, then this Lease is a lease of real property in a shopping center, within the meaning of 11 U.S.C. § 365(b)(3).⁷⁴

OPTIONAL PROVISIONS⁷⁵

47. Adjustment of Size

If the actual rentable square footage (as reasonably measured and calculated by Landlord in accordance with leasing practices in the City) varies by more than 2% from the square footage stated in this Lease, then the Base Rent, Tenant's Proportionate Share, any Security and any other obligations of the parties that in Landlord's reasonable judgment directly correlate to the rentable square footage of the Premises shall be adjusted in proportion to that variation, in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord.⁷⁶

48. Inability to Deliver

If Landlord reasonably determines that, because of circumstances beyond Landlord's reasonable control, Landlord cannot deliver the Premises before Delivery Deadline and may not be able to deliver the Premises within any reasonable period after Delivery Deadline, then Landlord shall so Notify Tenant and this Lease shall automatically terminate. If Landlord so terminates this Lease, Landlord shall within a reasonable time refund the Security to Tenant. At the same time, the parties shall enter into a termination of this Lease in mutually satisfactory form. That termination and refund shall be Tenant's sole remedy for Landlord's failure to deliver. Tenant shall have no other rights or remedies against Landlord on account of this Lease.⁷⁷

49. Rent Increase/CPI Adjustment

74 The statute does not define a shopping center. This paragraph seeks to establish a reasonable definition. Will a bankruptcy court accept it?

75 The following optional provisions may be used in Exhibits B-1 through B-3 as desired.

76 This paragraph would apply to a new Building rather than an existing one. Tenant might well push back with a request to have the right to remeasure downward. The entire discussion is usually counterproductive for both parties.

77 A Tenant will regard this provision as unreasonable.

49.1 Annual Percentage Increase. On the first day of each Lease Year after the first Lease Year, Base Rent shall increase by an amount equal to ___% of the annual Base Rent that was in effect (after previous adjustments, if any) in the immediately preceding Lease Year.

49.2 Annual CPI Increase. On the first day of each Lease Year after the first Lease Year, annual Base Rent shall increase by an amount equal to (a) annual Base Rent (as previously adjusted under this sentence) in the previous Lease Year times (b) the CPI Increase for the previous Lease Year.

49.3 CPI Increase Mechanism. If a CPI Increase entitles Landlord to a change in Base Rent, then Landlord shall Notify Tenant. Tenant's equal monthly payments of Base Rent in the affected Lease shall reflect that change. If Landlord gives that Notice after a Lease Year begins, then Tenant shall remit to Landlord, without interest, an amount equal to the additional Base Rent would have been required to pay had Landlord Notified Tenant before that Lease Year.

49.5 Definitions. These terms shall have these meanings:

“CPI” means the United States Department of Labor, Bureau of Labor Statistics “Consumer Price Index” for All Urban Consumers (CPI-U) published for New York - Northern New Jersey - Long Island, NY-NJ-CT,⁷⁸ with a base of 1982-1984 = 100. If that index is no longer published, or is modified from time to time, Landlord shall reasonably designate an appropriate successor or substitute index using, if available, such conversion factor, formula or table for conversion as published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics or by a nationally recognized publisher of similar statistical information.

“CPI Increase” means for any period a fraction: (a) whose numerator is the excess, if any, of the CPI last published before the last day of that period over the CPI last published before the first day of that period or, if no such excess exists, zero; and (b) whose denominator is the CPI last published before the first day of that period.

“Porter” means the classification of nonsupervisory employees employed in and about a Class A office building who devote a major portion of their time to general cleaning, maintenance, and miscellaneous services essentially of a nontechnical and nonmechanical nature and are the type of employees who have been historically included in the Classification of “Class A-Others” in the agreement between the Realty Advisory Board and the Union.

“Porter’s Wage” means the average hourly rate of wages, plus the allocable cost of all bonuses, fringe benefits, payroll and FICA taxes, unemployment, compensation taxes, disability benefit premiums, hospitalization, medical, surgical and general welfare benefits (including group life insurance), costs of any pension, retirement profit sharing or life insurance plan, uniform costs, and costs of other benefits or similar Operating Expenses relating to Porters in effect from time to time, whether or not actually paid by Landlord or any contractor employed by Landlord, computed as required to be paid over a standard working week to Porters in Class A office buildings under an agreement between Realty Advisory Board on Labor Relations, Incorporated, or any successor (the “Realty Advisory Board”), and Local 32B of the Building Service Employees International Union, AFL-CIO, or any successor (the “Union”), or under the wage agreement on Porters. If no such agreement prescribes a wage rate for Porters in the City, or if the “Porter” job classification is terminated, then Landlord shall reasonably calculate or estimate “Porter’s Wage” based on average hourly wage rate and allocated cost of all fringe benefits and all other costs actually payable to Porters over a 40 hour week at the time in Class A office buildings in the City. Landlord shall make all calculations and estimates of Porter’s Wage with Notice to Tenant.

“Porter’s Wage Escalation” means in each Lease Year after the first Lease Year the product of (a) _____⁷⁹ times (b) [100%] of the excess, if any, of (i) Porter’s Wage on the first day of that Lease Year over (ii) Porter’s Wage on the Signature Date.

50. Substitute Premises

50.1 Before Commencement Date. Landlord may, by Notice to Tenant before the Commencement Date, relocate the Premises to any other substantially similar space within the Building (the “Substitute Premises”). If Landlord exercises its rights under this paragraph, Landlord shall reimburse Tenant for Tenant's actual reasonable out-of-pocket costs for redesign or otherwise on account of the Substitute Premises. The Commencement Date and Opening Deadline shall be deferred to the extent reasonably appropriate and necessary.

⁷⁹ Fill in square footage of Premises.

50.2 After Commencement Date. Landlord may, upon six months' prior Notice at any time after the Commencement Date, deliver to Tenant Substitute Premises in place of the Premises, provided Landlord reasonably determines that: (a) the substitution is reasonably necessary to combine the Premises with adjacent vacant (or soon to be vacant) space to meet the needs of an actual or prospective tenant and (b) no other suitable vacant space exists in the Building. If Landlord designates Substitute Premises, then: (a) Landlord shall construct in the Substitute Premises, at Landlord's expense, tenant improvements substantially equivalent to those in the Premises on the date of Landlord's Notice; (b) Landlord shall pay all reasonable moving costs and other out-of-pocket costs Tenant reasonably incurs in relocating to the Substitute Premises or at Landlord's option Landlord shall arrange relocation at Landlord's expense; (c) Tenant shall be excused from any obligation to pay Rent under this Lease for ___ months beginning ___ days after Tenant moves into the Substitute Premises (provided Landlord has then in fact Substantially Completed Landlord's Initial Work in the Substitute Premises); and (d) the parties, acting reasonably, shall cooperate to minimize disruption to Tenant's business and to facilitate Tenant's relocation.

50.3 Requirements for Substitute Premises. Landlord may not designate any Substitute Premises unless it has at least as much sidewalk frontage (including as much avenue frontage) as the Premises (if the Premises is on the ground floor), has substantially the same size and visibility as the original Premises, is not on a lower floor than the original Premises and is configured in a way reasonably appropriate for Tenant's business.

50.4 Effect of Substitution. If Landlord designates Substitute Premises in place of the Premises, then after Tenant relocates to such Substitute Premises, every reference to the "Premises" shall refer instead to the Substitute Premises.

51. Demolition

51.1 Landlord's Rights. If Landlord intends, in Landlord's sole and absolute discretion, to demolish or to substantially reconstruct the Building, e.g., by stripping the Building down to its structural steel and then rebuilding it or otherwise changing the overall Building in a manner that it temporarily cannot reasonably be occupied (any of those, “Demolition”) (or has entered into or intends to enter into a contract to sell the Building to a purchaser that intends to accomplish a Demolition),⁸⁰ then Landlord may so Notify Tenant (the “Demolition Notice”). In any Demolition Notice, Landlord shall certify that: (x) Demolition is expected to commence (or the sale to a purchaser that intends to commence Demolition is expected to close) within [one year] after the Demolition Notice; (y) Landlord does not intend to relet the Premises as it exists; and (z) Landlord has given, or is substantially simultaneously giving, similar Notices to all other tenants of the Building whose leases entitle Landlord to do so, except any tenants with whom Landlord has entered into other agreements for Demolition.⁸¹

51.2 Effect of Demolition Notice. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, if Landlord gives Tenant a Demolition Notice, then:

51.2.1 End of Term. The Term shall unconditionally terminate and expire, and the Expiration Date shall occur, on the date the Demolition Notice specifies, provided it is at least [six months] after the Demolition Notice.

51.2.2 Tenant’s Obligations. Until the Expiration Date, Tenant’s obligations under this Lease shall continue in full force and effect, but Tenant may obtain a partial refund of Rent after the Expiration Date by satisfying the conditions described below.

51.2.3 Removal of Tenant Property. Tenant may remove any or all of Tenant’s improvements and equipment, and may vacate the Premises, at any time before the Expiration Date.

51.2.4 Duty to Vacate; Condition of Premises. At the Expiration Date, Tenant shall vacate and surrender the Premises in its then-current condition, and deliver to Landlord an instrument (in form and substance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord) unconditionally surrendering and 80 Any such purchaser will often want Landlord to deliver the Building vacant at closing, or will at least pay more for vacant delivery. The purchaser will regard this as far superior to merely having a right to give a Demolition Notice after buying the Building. Thus, Landlord wants to be able to give Demolition Notices in preparation for a sale.

81 If Landlord might demolish only “part” of the Building or might want to leave some favored tenants in place as long as possible, delete clause “z.”

terminating Tenant's estate under this Lease, with no obligation to restore the Premises or to repair any damage caused by Tenant's removal of Tenant's improvements and equipment, notwithstanding any restoration or repair obligations that would otherwise apply under this Lease.⁸² If Tenant fails to vacate and surrender the Premises by the Expiration Date, then in addition to any other rights and remedies available to Landlord under applicable law or this Lease, Landlord shall be entitled to recover all damages, direct and indirect, including consequential damages, as a result of Tenant's failure to vacate and surrender when required.

51.2.5 Documents and Deliveries. Tenant shall within ___ days after Landlord's request: (a) execute such documentation as Landlord requires to evidence, confirm and implement the absolute and unconditional termination and cancellation of this Lease effective at the Expiration Date, including at Landlord's option a stipulated judgment of eviction in form and substance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord;⁸³ and (b) deposit with Landlord additional Security equal to _____ times the then-current monthly Base Rent.

51.3 Demolition Payment. If and only if Landlord delivers a Demolition Notice and Tenant actually vacates and surrenders the Premises by the Expiration Date in the Demolition Notice, and otherwise performs all Tenant's obligations arising from that Demolition Notice, all in strict compliance with this Lease with time being of the essence, then at substantially the same time all Tenant Parties vacate the Premises and Tenant releases in writing any and all rights in or to the Premises and on account of this Lease: (a) the Expiration Date shall occur, even if earlier than the Expiration Date specified in the Demolition Notice;⁸⁴ and (b) Landlord shall, provided no Event of Default exists, refund to Tenant the entire remaining Security plus all Base Rent and Escalation Rent Tenant paid Landlord in the ___ months before the Expiration Date in the Demolition Notice.⁸⁵

82 If Tenant has Specialty Work such as vaults, Landlord may still want Tenant to remove them.

83 A stipulated judgment of eviction may be rather extreme. It does, however, represent a common element of any lease buyout transaction in New York, where the courts are extraordinarily friendly to tenants.

84 Consider deleting clause "a" although it does give Tenant a good incentive to move out early.

85 Landlords often agree to make a demolition payment (in the form of a Rent refund or waiver for a certain period—typically six months—at the end of the truncated Term), but many Landlords do not agree to do that.

52. *Utilities and Services.*⁸⁶

Tenant shall arrange and promptly pay when due for all Utilities, including distribution lines, necessary or appropriate for the Premises, except to the extent this Lease expressly states otherwise, including Landlord's Initial Work. Landlord grants Tenant a license, irrevocable in the Term so long as no Default exists, to use those Utility hookups and outlets within the Building as Landlord designates to serve the Premises, all in compliance with this Lease. Tenant shall pay for all Utilities consumed in or at the Premises. Tenant consents to any temporary interruption of any Utility service during installation of (sub)meters. The parties agree as follows regarding Utilities and certain other Building services.

52.1 Restrooms. Landlord shall at no separate charge provide hot and cold water to any existing restrooms serving the Premises, for normal lavatory purposes. Tenant shall (and Landlord shall have no obligation to) maintain and clean those restrooms.⁸⁷

52.2 Water and Sewage; Building-Wide Charges. If any Utility is metered or charged to the Building as a whole [(except water or sewage)], Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for the Operating Expenses Share of the cost of that Utility, or as Landlord otherwise reasonably allocates it. Landlord may require Tenant to make reimbursement in the form of estimated monthly payments before payment is otherwise due. [So long as Tenant's usage of water and sewage is consistent with ordinary usage for the Permitted Use(s), Landlord shall pay for water and sewage usage as Operating Expenses.] If Tenant's usage exceeds ordinary usage for the Permitted Use(s), Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for Landlord's reasonable estimate of the incremental cost of Tenant's excessive usage.

53. Electricity Definitions

These terms shall be defined as follows:

“Base Electric Rate” means the Electric Rate as of the Signature Date.

“Electric Rate” means the rates in effect under Power Company's service classification for the Building at the time particular energy is consumed, plus taxes, or any successor or replacement rate that applies from time to time to consumption of electricity in the Building, including all applicable surcharges, demand charges, rate adjustment charges, energy charges, fuel adjustment charges, volume charges, volume discounts, time of day charges and other sums payable to Power Company. The Electric Rate shall disregard any rebate(s) arising from installation of electrical equipment.

EXHIBIT B-3: SUPPLEMENTAL TERMS (RETAIL)

54. Submetering

54.1 *Electricity Additional Rent.*⁸⁸ Landlord shall furnish electricity to the Premises. Tenant shall pay Landlord an amount (the “Electricity Additional Rent”) equal to the Electric Rate times Tenant’s actual consumption in kilowatt hours and demand in kilowatts, respectively (and/or any other method of quantifying Tenant’s use of or demand under Power Company tariff) as registered on (sub)meter(s) (installed by Landlord at Landlord’s⁸⁹ sole cost and expense) to measure that demand, consumption or other method of quantifying Tenant’s use of or demand for electricity. The (sub)meter(s) shall measure demand and consumption, and off-peak and on-peak use, in either case to the extent they affect determination of Electricity Additional Rent.

54.2 *Totalization.*⁹⁰ Where more than one (sub)meter measures electricity supplied to the Premises, the electricity rendered through all those (sub)meters shall be measured, consolidated and totalized as if all service were rendered through a single meter.

55. Electricity Rent Inclusion

55.1 Provision of Service. Landlord shall furnish electric current to the Premises for Tenant’s lighting fixtures and equipment this Lease allows on a “rent inclusion” basis. There shall be no separate charge to Tenant for electric current by way of measuring it on any meter. In addition to any other Rent, Tenant shall pay Landlord an annual charge (in equal monthly installments) for electricity service equal to the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge⁹¹ (as increased or decreased from time to time in 88 Either “Submetering” or “Electricity Rent Inclusion” (but not both) may replace the provisions on Tenant’s direct relationship with Power Company. In that case, some defined terms may not apply and this Lease should be modified appropriately.

89 Tenant may need to pay. This is negotiable.

90 This paragraph will reduce Tenant’s electricity costs. Landlord may prefer to omit.

91 Specify the “Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge” in the Basic Terms, typically around $2.50 to $3.00 per square foot for office space as of 2015. If the Lease does not indicate square footage, adjust the charge and Lease language accordingly.

accordance with this Lease) times the rentable square footage of the Premises. Although Additional Rent includes the charge for furnishing electrical energy on a so-called “rent inclusion” basis, it may not fully reflect the value to Tenant of that service. Landlord may from time to time cause a reputable and independent electrical engineer or electrical consulting firm (the “Independent Engineer”), to make a determination, after Tenant has commenced normal business activities in the Premises, of the Full Value of that service. The “Full Value” means the product of (a) the demand and consumption of electric energy at the Premises times (b) the Electric Rate. The Independent Engineer shall certify its determination in writing to Landlord and Tenant. If the then Full Value exceeds the then Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge, then the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge (and corresponding Additional Rent) shall proportionately increase, and vice versa. If in the Term the Electric Rate increases or decreases as against the Base Electric Rate, the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge shall be proportionately increased or decreased.⁹²

55.2 Electricity Statements. Landlord shall promptly give Tenant a written statement (an “Electricity Statement”) with Landlord’s determination of any increase or decrease that has occurred in the Full Value and the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge. Any such increase or decrease in the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge for the Premises shall be effective as of the date of the increase or decrease in the Electric Rate or the date of the survey and shall be retroactive if necessary.

55.3 Tenant’s Right to Object. Each Electricity Statement shall bind Tenant unless within ___ days after receiving it, Tenant notifies Landlord that it disputes the correctness of the Electricity Statement. If that dispute is based on Tenant’s demand and consumption of electric current, Tenant shall submit a survey and determination of that adjustment, made at its sole cost and expense, by a reputable independent electrical engineer or electrical consulting firm (“Tenant’s Engineer”), within 60 days after receipt of that Electricity Statement. If Landlord and Tenant cannot resolve their differences within ___ days after Landlord receives a copy of the determination of Tenant’s Engineer, then a third reputable independent electrical engineer or electrical consulting firm (the “Third Engineer”) shall decide the dispute. If the parties do not agree on the Third Engineer within ___ days after Landlord receives the determination of Tenant’s Engineer, then either party may apply to the AAA to designate the Third Engineer. The Third Engineer shall conduct such hearings as it deems appropriate. Within ___ days after designation, the Third Engineer shall select the determination of either the Independent Engineer or Tenant's Engineer. That determination shall be conclusive and bind the parties. The parties shall pay equally the costs of that arbitration, except that (i) each party shall pay its own counsel fees and expenses; and (ii) the loser in the arbitration shall pay the Third Engineer's fees. Pending resolution of the dispute by agreement or arbitration, Tenant shall pay the increase in the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge in accordance with the Electricity Statement. If Tenant wins the dispute, Landlord shall promptly refund any overpayments, without interest.

55.4 No Waiver. Landlord's failure in the Term to prepare and deliver any Electricity Statement, or bill, or Landlord's failure to make a demand, under this Article or any other provisions of this Lease, shall not waive, or cause Landlord to forfeit or surrender, its rights to collect any increase in the Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge that may become due in the Term. Tenant's liability for the amounts due from Tenant, and Landlord's obligation to make any refund, under this Article shall survive the expiration or sooner termination of this Lease.

56. Discontinuance of Electricity

If Landlord is required to discontinue furnishing electricity to Tenant on any basis under this Lease, then this Lease shall continue in full force and effect and shall be unaffected, except that from and after the effective date of that discontinuance, Landlord need not furnish electricity to Tenant and Tenant need not pay any Electricity Additional Rent or Electricity Rent Inclusion Charge. If Landlord so discontinues furnishing electricity to Tenant, Tenant shall use diligent efforts to obtain electric energy directly from Power Company. Tenant shall pay the costs of that service directly to Power Company. That electricity may be furnished to Tenant by means of the existing electrical and related facilities serving the Premises, at no charge, to the extent they are available, suitable and safe for that purpose as Landlord reasonably determines based on the advice of Landlord's engineers. Landlord shall install all necessary or appropriate meters, panel boards, feeders, risers, wiring and other conductors and equipment at Tenant's expense, plus an Administrative Fee.⁹³

57. Removal of Signage

93 This appears in every Lease. The author has never heard of any circumstance in which it has ever become relevant or even possibly relevant. If any reader is aware of any such circumstance, or the historical reason for this paragraph, please notify the author.

On Notice from Landlord, Tenant shall immediately remove any sign(s) that Tenant installed in violation of this Lease. If Tenant fails to do so within two Business Days after Landlord's Notice, then Landlord may remove any such sign(s), without further Notice, at Tenant's expense plus an Administrative Fee. If Landlord determines it is necessary to remove Tenant's sign(s) to paint, repair, alter or improve the Building, then Landlord may do so, on two Business Days' Notice, provided that Landlord: (a) reasonably promptly restores the removed sign(s), except any violating this Lease; (b) pays for removal and restoration; and (c) allows Tenant to install reasonable temporary signage as reasonably feasible under the circumstances. In an emergency no prior notice shall be required. Landlord shall provide prompt notice after the emergency.

58. Mitigation of Damages

If it is determined that Landlord must seek to mitigate damages from a Default, then none of these would constitute failure to mitigate: (a) failure to enter into a lease for only part of the Premises or with a replacement tenant that Landlord disapproves; (b) failure to enter into a Lease for a term substantially shorter or longer, or providing for a net effective rental rate (taking into account leasing commissions, tenant improvement costs and other costs) significantly lower than current market rent; (c) encouraging prospective tenants to lease other space that Landlord or any Related Party owns or controls, and not the Premises; or (d) taking or not taking any other action, if Landlord's course of action conforms to what a reasonable landlord would do to protect its interests in comparable circumstances.

59. Discussions or Negotiations

Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, if Landlord gives Tenant a Default Notice, Tenant's cure period (if any) for that Default shall continue to run, and not be tolled or suspended, notwithstanding any discussions between Landlord and Tenant about possible resolution of the Default. Tenant shall rely on no such discussions as the basis to fail to cure or delay curing a Default. Those discussions constitute settlement discussions and shall be inadmissible as evidence. All cure periods shall continue to run during any such discussions, unless and until Landlord and Tenant, in their sole and absolute discretion, fully agree upon, execute and exchange legally binding documentation by which Landlord withdraws any Default Notice(s), tolls any cure period(s) or waives any Default(s). Email messages do not meet that standard, except to the extent that they attach scanned images of ink-signed documents.

60. Designation of Tenant's Agent

60.1 Initial Designation. Tenant irrevocably designates _____ as Tenant's agent ("Tenant's Agent") for service of process, including all notices required to institute any proceeding in any court or in any way required to confer personal jurisdiction over Tenant in any court, and for receipt of any Notices under this Lease, including personal demands for Rent. Service or demand on Tenant's Agent shall be good and sufficient service and demand on Tenant for all purposes, including obtaining personal jurisdiction for any legal action or proceeding, including a summary dispossession, unlawful detainer or eviction proceeding.⁹⁴

60.2 Preservation and Replacement of Tenant's Agent. Tenant shall maintain Tenant's Agent's designation in full force and effect throughout the Term. If Tenant's Agent cannot act as such for any reason, then Tenant shall forthwith irrevocably designate a replacement Tenant's Agent. By Notice to Landlord, up to once every six months, Tenant may substitute in place of Tenant's Agent a new Tenant's Agent, provided it is: (a) an attorney admitted to practice in the courts of the State and having full-time business offices in the City (or, in the alternative, admitted to practice and having full-time business offices in the state within the United States where Tenant maintains its single bona fide headquarters office); or (b) a corporate service company in the business of acting as agent for service.

60.3 Notice to Tenant's Agent. Delivery of any Notice to Tenant's Agent, or any service of process on Tenant's Agent, in accordance with the notice requirements of this Lease, constitutes valid and effective personal service on Tenant. Tenant's Agent's failure to give Tenant a copy of that service of process shall not impair or affect its validity or any judgment rendered in any Proceeding based thereon.

61. *More Provisions on Commercial Rent Control*⁹⁵

Tenant acknowledges that the Term of this Lease is satisfactory to Tenant, giving Tenant a reasonable opportunity to conduct Tenant's business for a period satisfactory to Tenant even if Landlord does not extend the Term. Tenant assumes the risk that Landlord will not extend the Term. Tenant does not desire any Government to give Tenant any extended Term 94 Landlord should also obtain from Agent its acceptance of such appointment.

95 These provisions supplement Basic Terms on Commercial Rent Control. They are relegated to Optional Provisions because any Government that enacts Commercial Rent Control will also probably be smart enough to invalidate provisions like these.

not expressly provided for in this Lease, and waives any such extended Term. If Commercial Rent Control is enacted but this paragraph is not fully enforceable, then any or all of these (as Landlord designates from time to time during Commercial Rent Control or at any later time before Landlord has received all payments this paragraph requires) shall apply, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, including the Basic Terms: (a) Landlord may suspend all services to the Premises that this Lease otherwise requires Landlord to provide and shall have no obligation to perform any actions this Lease otherwise requires; (b) to the extent this Lease grants Tenant any options or exclusive uses, they shall be permanently and irrevocably terminated, canceled, and of no force or effect; (c) no Transfer may be made, and any provisions of this Lease (including any Basic Terms) permitting any Transfer shall be of no force or effect; and (d) Landlord may terminate this Lease, or require Tenant to assign this Lease to an assignee Landlord procures, upon Landlord's payment to Tenant of an amount equal to the actual cost of Tenant's Initial Work, less amortization on a five-year straight-line schedule. If this paragraph conflicts with any other terms and conditions of this Lease, then this paragraph governs.

62.1 Failure to Allow Cure Period. Wherever this Lease requires Landlord to deliver a Default Notice for any Default (an "Unmatured Default") to commence the cure period after which an Event of Default occurs (the "Cure Period"), if Landlord fails to give a required Default Notice or to permit a full Cure Period, then: (a) that failure shall not invalidate, nullify, or constitute a defense in any eviction or other proceedings against Tenant otherwise properly commenced for Tenant's Unmatured Default; (b) if, within the Cure Period, as measured from Landlord's commencement of proceedings (or the date of Landlord's Default Notice, if earlier), Tenant cures the Unmatured Default, then Landlord shall discontinue such proceedings; and (c) that discontinuance shall constitute a complete and adequate substitute for, and Tenant's sole remedy for Landlord's failure to have given, the Default Notice.

62.2 Landlord's Unrecovered Leasing Investment. If Landlord terminates this Lease because of an Event of Default, then, at Landlord's option, in addition to any other Landlord remedies (unless Tenant has fully paid all damages otherwise due Landlord), Tenant shall pay Landlord an amount equal to Landlord's Unrecovered Leasing Investment. These terms shall have these meanings:

“Landlord’s Leasing Investment” means the sum of: (w) Landlord’s Contribution; (x) Landlord’s actual cost of Landlord’s Initial Work, except demising walls and any costs that Tenant separately reimbursed; (y) all Rent Tenant would pay under this Lease in any Abatement Period but for that Abatement Period (at the same monthly Rent as would apply in the first six months after the Abatement Period); plus (z) any brokerage commission(s) and Legal Costs Landlord actually paid (as allocated in writing by Landlord’s attorneys) to negotiate and enter into this Lease.

“Landlord’s Unrecovered Leasing Investment” means (a) the Lost Recovery Period Factor times (b) Landlord’s Leasing Investment.

“Lost Recovery Period Factor” means a fraction: (a) whose numerator is the number of days from the date of the Event of Default until the Expiration Date as originally defined in this Lease and (b) whose denominator is the number of days from the first day after the Abatement Period (or from the Commencement Date if this Lease provides for no Abatement Period) until the Expiration Date as originally defined in this Lease.

62.3 Effect of Default. [If any Event of Default exists] [In any Default Period], the parties’ rights and obligations shall be modified as follows, notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease.

62.3.1 Landlord’s Obligations Suspended. Landlord may, without Notice, suspend performing any or all of Landlord’s obligations under this Lease, including providing Utilities, except as nonwaivable Law requires.⁹⁶

62.3.2 Tenant’s Privileges Suspended. Tenant may not Transfer this Lease, exercise any Option that may otherwise exist, require Landlord to enforce any exclusive uses that this Lease grants, otherwise limit the activities of Landlord or other tenants outside the Premises, deliver L/C Security in place of Security previously posted, require Landlord to execute or deliver any document, claim any abatement against Rent otherwise available, require Landlord to consent to, approve, or consider any matter, or require Landlord to be “reasonable” in granting or withholding any consent or approval.

62.4 Notice of Oral Waiver. Although this Lease may not be modified orally, and none of its terms may be waived orally, if either party nevertheless believes the other has made a binding oral waiver or amendment of this Lease (including one affecting this paragraph), then the former party shall give the other Notice of that binding oral waiver or amendment within one Business Day after it was allegedly made. That Notice shall set forth the provisions of this paragraph verbatim. Failure to give that Notice shall constitute an acknowledgment by that party that no binding oral waiver or amendment was made and shall permanently estop that party from asserting any such oral waiver or amendment. If that Notice is timely given, and the other party does not confirm the oral amendment or waiver in writing, then the oral amendment or waiver shall be deemed to have been revoked by agreement. Nothing in this paragraph is intended to allow oral amendments or waivers. Instead, this paragraph is intended to provide an additional mechanism to clarify and confirm that they cannot occur.

62.5 Claims Against Landlord. If Tenant is entitled to assert any claim against Landlord, then Tenant may do so only within ___ days after the claim first accrued. After that period expires, the claim shall be forever barred, whether as a direct claim or by way of counterclaim or setoff.

62.6 Use Restrictions. Landlord may, but need not, designate any other of Landlord's tenant(s) as third-party beneficiary(ies) or assignee(s) of any use restriction in this Lease. Any other tenant(s) so designated may (nonexclusively) enforce those use restriction against Tenant. Any such enforcement (or failure to enforce) and any related claims or disputes shall not affect the relationship, rights and obligations between Landlord and Tenant or give Tenant any Offset.

62.7 Asbestos Compliance. Landlord represents and warrants that Landlord has abated or encapsulated any asbestos and asbestos-containing materials in the Premises, in accordance with Law. To the extent Law requires any written confirmation to that effect, Landlord shall provide it.

62.8 Tenant's Alarm System. Tenant may install an alarm system at its expense. If in Landlord's reasonable judgment Tenant's alarm system produces an unreasonable number of false alarms, then Tenant shall modify Tenant's alarm system to correct the problem, in a way reasonably satisfactory to Landlord. Tenant shall maintain and operate Tenant's alarm system and maintain an alarm service contract with a reputable alarm service company. Landlord need not maintain Tenant's alarm system or respond to, or take any other action for, any alarms that Tenant's alarm system produces. Landlord shall have no liability for operation or failure of Tenant's alarm system. Subject to the Section of this Lease on Waiver of Subrogation, Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord regarding Tenant's alarm system.

62.9 REIT Compliance. The parties intend that all Rent payable to Landlord qualify as "rents from real property" under Internal Revenue Code § 856(d) and all related statutes, regulations, revenue rulings, interpretations and other official pronouncements, all as in effect from time to time. If the Rent ever no longer so qualifies, then Landlord may reasonably adjust the Rent to achieve that qualification. Any such adjustments shall produce the substantial economic equivalent to the previous Rent, as Landlord reasonably determines. The parties shall execute such documents as Landlord reasonably requires to make those adjustments.⁹⁷

62.10 Financial Information. Within 30 days after Landlord's request (which request Landlord may make no more than once for each fiscal year of Tenant), Tenant shall give Landlord Tenant's and each Guarantor's financial statements, in form and scope reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, for the most recent fiscal year (or the preceding fiscal year, if the most recent fiscal year ended only in the last 90 days before Landlord's request). Only if those financial statements are audited for any other purpose, then the financial statements Tenant gives Landlord shall be audited. Tenant shall promptly Notify Landlord of any material event or occurrence that relates to Tenant's or any Guarantor's creditworthiness.

62.11 Termination of Lease. If this Lease terminates for any reason, Tenant shall, if Landlord requests, execute and deliver to Landlord an instrument in form and substance reasonably satisfactory to Landlord confirming that termination and releasing and surrendering Tenant's entire right, title and interest in and to the Premises, under this Lease or otherwise.

62.12 *Attorney in Fact.*⁹⁸ To the extent this Lease requires Tenant to execute any document but Tenant fails to do so within 10 Business Days after Landlord's request, Tenant irrevocably appoints Landlord as Tenant's attorney-in-fact to execute and deliver any such document for and on behalf of Tenant. That appointment is irrevocable and coupled with an interest. Landlord's exercise of that power shall not limit Tenant's obligations. Tenant's failure to execute and delivery any such document shall still constitute a Default.

⁹⁷ A REIT Landlord may have additional requirements.

62.13 Refunds and Payments. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease, whenever this Lease requires Landlord to pay or refund Tenant any sum (except Landlord's Contribution, if any, or Security), Landlord may elect, by Notice, not to make that refund or payment and instead to allow Tenant to credit against Rent until Tenant has thereby recovered an amount equal to that refund or payment. If the Term ends before Tenant has fully recovered that refund or payment, then, unless the Term ended because of a Default, Landlord shall promptly pay Tenant the remaining balance due.

98 Tenant will often regard as excessive or want to limit to any Default Period.

CHAPTER FIVE

MODEL COMMERCIAL
LEASE RIDER (TO SUPPLEMENT STANDARD REBNY® OFFICE LEASE)

Abraham B. Krieger, Esq.

This Rider is incorporated into and made a part of the Lease dated _____, 2____ between _____, as landlord, having an address at _____, (“Landlord”), and _____, as tenant,¹ having an address at _____ (“Tenant”); both parties collectively referred to as the “Parties,” of the premises known as Suite _____ as shown on annexed Exhibit “A”² (for general and descriptive purposes only) at _____, New York; both this Rider and printed form of Lease and any subsequent amendments and/or modifications signed by the Parties are together referred to as the “Lease.” If there are any conflicts or inconsistencies between the provisions of this Rider, the annexed printed form of Lease and any other rider or document annexed, the provisions of this Rider shall govern and control.

The paragraph headings contained in the Lease and Rider are for accommodation and reference purposes only and do not prescribe the rights and obligations of the Parties and the provisions may contain terms not necessarily described in the headings themselves.

[5.0] I. RENT

(a) All financial obligations due under this Lease are deemed “Rent” and payable as independent covenants. Fixed monthly rent is due and payable in equal monthly installments on the first day of each calendar month.³ The first installment of fixed monthly Rent is payable upon the signing of this Lease.⁴

(b) Tenant’s obligation to pay Rent under this Lease is not conditioned upon the rendering of a monthly or other statement or notice by Landlord for payment of any and all sums due under this Lease; it being expressly agreed that any such statement or notice is furnished as an accommodation only, not as a condition precedent to Tenant’s obligations, and does not fix, prescribe or limit Tenant’s financial obligations under this Lease.

(c) Tenant shall pay to Landlord as fixed monthly Rent during the Term (as hereinafter defined) annual Rent of $_____ payable $_____ monthly

1 If there are multiple tenants, incorporate “joint and several liability” language, signature lines for each, and conform guaranty, if applicable.

2 Include a ‘line drawing’ to avoid any confusion or dispute involving the space dimensions. Suite number alone is insufficient.

Lease Period	Annual Rent	Monthly Rent

(d) Rent, not including utility charges, shall be conditionally abated as follows: [if applicable]

If Tenant defaults under this Lease beyond any grace, notice or cure periods, all Rent otherwise abated under this Lease shall be recaptured and become immediately due and payable as Rent.

⁵ Consider with the client other formulae of increases such as CPI, Porter’s Wage and operating expenses.

(e) Rent is payable in advance in equal monthly installments on the first day of each calendar month. If the Term does not commence on the first day of a month, Rent and other charges, if charged separately (not by meter), shall be apportioned for the month in which the Term commences.

(f) Tenant covenants to pay, as provided in this Lease, as additional Rent: all amounts and obligations which Tenant assumes or agrees to pay under this Lease; interest at the rate of [15%]⁶ per annum on any item of fixed or additional Rent not paid within [30] days of when otherwise due, subject to any applicable grace period, and a late payment and administrative charge of [5%] of the amount of any item of Rent not paid within [5] days of when due or, if a demand is required by the provisions of this Lease, within [5] days after the date of such demand. If any check is rejected for payment by Tenant's bank, in addition to, and not exclusive of, Landlord's other remedies, Tenant shall pay an administrative charge of [$150.00] for such returned check, which amount may be adjusted from time to time by Landlord. In the event of any default by Tenant to pay Rent beyond any cure period Landlord reserves all the rights, powers and remedies provided for in this Lease, at law, in equity or otherwise. Nothing shall be construed to extend the due dates of Tenant's payments under this Lease, or waive any rights or remedies of Landlord if Tenant defaults except as expressly provided in this Lease or otherwise agreed by the parties in writing. Tenant's obligations to pay Rent shall survive the expiration of the Term or earlier termination of this Lease. Tenant waives any right to designate the items against which any payments under this Lease are made for which payments may be applied by Landlord in its sole judgment.

(g) No remedy conferred on or reserved to Landlord under this Lease is exclusive of any other remedy or remedies and may be asserted independently, singly or cumulatively at Landlord's election. No delay by Landlord in asserting any remedy under this Lease is deemed a waiver thereof, equitable or otherwise.⁷

(h) All Rent shall be paid subject to collection, by good funds at the office of Landlord as set forth above, or at such place and to such party as Landlord designates in writing.

6 Portions of the Lease containing "[]" references are suggestions only, subject to negotiation and agreement.

7 If a form of guaranty, limited or otherwise, is used in conjunction with the lease, confirm that lease and guaranty language and terms strictly conform since both documents are generally strictly construed by the courts and an inconsistency in language can affect enforceability.

(i) All Rent shall be paid to Landlord without notice, demand, counterclaim, setoff, deduction or defense; which, may be asserted by Tenant only by way of a separate action, except as may be required by law or deemed waived if not asserted, otherwise nothing shall suspend, defer, diminish, abate or reduce any Rent except as specifically provided in this Lease or prescribed by statute.

(j) If Tenant defaults in the payment of Rent or any checks offered for payment are not honored by the bank against which it is drawn twice in any twelve (12) month period, Landlord, without waiving any rights or remedies under this Lease and not by way of limitation, reserves the right to demand that all checks tendered by Tenant for the following twelve (12) months shall be by bank or certified checks. Tenant shall further be required to post an additional one month's security. If Tenant defaults in the payment of fixed or additional Rent beyond any grace or cure period three times in any twelve (12) month period, such defaults shall be deemed "chronic," and a breach of a substantial obligation of this Lease. Landlord may serve a written three (3) days' notice of cancellation of this Lease upon Tenant and, upon the expiration of said three (3) days, this Lease and the Term shall end and expire as fully and completely as if the expiration of such three (3) day period were the day herein definitely fixed for the end and expiration of this Lease and the Term and Tenant shall quit and surrender the Premises to Landlord, but Tenant shall remain liable as elsewhere provided in this Lease.

(k) In the event of the termination of this Lease or Landlord's re-entry into the Premises by or under any summary dispossession or other proceeding or action, or any provision of law, by reason of Tenant's default hereunder, Tenant shall pay to Landlord as additional damages, a sum which at the time of such termination of this Lease or at the time of any such re-entry by Landlord, as the case may be, represents the aggregate of the Rent and the additional Rent payable hereunder (subject to a present value discount as prescribed) which would have been payable by Tenant had this Lease not terminated or had Landlord not re-entered the Premises.

(l) The obligations and liabilities of Tenant in no way shall be released, discharged or otherwise affected (except as expressly provided herein), so long as the condition of the Premises reasonably allows Tenant to operate its business as prescribed in this Lease. Subject to Tenant's ability to so operate its business, Tenant's obligations under this Lease shall continue notwithstanding interruption of service beyond Landlord's reasonable control, any taking by condemnation or eminent domain of the Premises or any part; any title defect or encumbrance; any bankruptcy, insolvency, reorganization, composition, adjustment, dissolution, receivership, liquidation or other similar proceeding relating to Landlord, or any action taken with respect to this Lease by any trustee or receiver of Landlord, or by any court, in any such proceeding; any claim which Tenant has or might have against Landlord unless said claim is resolved by a court of competent jurisdiction. Except as expressly provided herein or by statute, Tenant waives all rights now or hereafter conferred by statute or otherwise to quit, terminate or surrender this Lease or the demised premises or any part thereof, or to receive any abatement, suspension, deferment, diminution or reduction of any Rent payable by Tenant hereunder.

(m) If any payment under this Lease, regardless of the number of times, is made by a party other than the named Tenant, acceptance or deposit of said payment by Landlord shall not under any circumstances be deemed a recognition of any other permissible use, occupancy or tenancy, sub-tenancy or assignment. The listing by Landlord or Tenant of any party in the Building or floor directory other than that designated as Tenant in this Lease shall not be construed as any form of consent or acknowledgment by the Landlord to the party's occupancy or use of the Premises.

(n) Landlord reserves the exclusive right to apply any payment of Rent or other sums paid by Tenant for any part of the Rent or additional Rent then due or owing, irrespective of any restrictive endorsement placed on the check or correspondence accompanying the check(s) or any reference to such tender being an accord and satisfaction irrespective of whether an action of proceeding is pending, Landlord may further accept such check or payment without prejudice to Landlord's rights to recover the full balance due under this Lease and pursue any and all other remedies provided in this Lease and under law and without prejudice to any notice of default, termination or summary proceeding or action involving this Lease except to the extent of applying any such amount to sums due under this Lease.

(o) If Tenant holds over beyond the expiration or termination of this Lease, with no written agreement signed by Landlord permitting same and notwithstanding any discussions or negotiations involving possible extension of the tenancy or otherwise, Tenant shall, and conclusively agrees to, pay as monthly use and occupancy for the holdover period an amount equal to two (2) times the Rent and additional Rent otherwise due during the last month of the Term, plus all other charges due under this Lease. This provision shall in no manner be construed as an implicit or explicit consent by Landlord to extend the Term but shall only serve as a basis for establishing the amount for use and occupancy due from Tenant during such holdover. The Parties further acknowledge that this provision is intended to serve as an additional incentive, and not a penalty, to Tenant's obligation to timely vacate the Premises and reimburse Landlord for a portion of damages suffered. It is based on, among other things, the economic and other considerations of Landlord including and not limited to costs and inconvenience arising from Tenant's failure to surrender the Premises as agreed and the interference said delay and failure on Tenant's part will cause in the Landlord's re-letting of the Premises. The Parties further agree that this provision is not intended to serve as a liquidated damages clause or penalty but merely establish the reasonable, agreed-to Rent and other charges otherwise agreed as due for the holdover period. Accordingly, Landlord shall be entitled to all additional remedies provided for in this Lease including reimbursement for all costs and expenses, including and not limited to, reasonable legal fees and expenses arising from the default(s) and incurred regaining possession of the Premises.

(p) If Tenant vacates the Premises either prior to or upon the expiration of this Lease, any personal property remaining in the Premises shall be deemed abandoned and Landlord may elect to remove and dispose of same at Tenant's expense or retain such personal property. Any such costs and expenses shall be deemed Rent due prior to surrender or vacating the Premises. Unless Landlord is notified to the contrary in writing with proof, any such personalty and equipment shall be deemed owned and not leased or financed by Tenant and Tenant shall indemnify Landlord against any claim by any lessor, owner or third party claiming an interest in such personalty or equipment including reasonable counsel fees. Tenant further waives any claim or defense against Landlord under this provision.

(q) If during any time during the Term, Tenant removes or has removed substantially all of the installation(s) in the Premises belonging to Tenant and Tenant has defaulted in the payment of Rent, beyond any grace or cure period, for a period exceeding one (1) calendar month, same shall conclusively be deemed a de facto surrender of the Premises by Tenant without requiring Landlord to bring any summary proceeding or action to terminate this Lease.

(r) If Tenant remains in possession of the Premises after the expiration of this Lease, Tenant shall indemnify Landlord against liability and consequential damages arising from such delay involving the loss of Rent and business opportunity from a succeeding or prospective tenant.

(s) If Tenant defaults in performing any covenant or condition of this Lease beyond any grace or cure period, Landlord may, in its sole judgment, and not by limitation or election of any of its remedies, cure said default at Tenant's expense and Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for such expense and all other charges for which Tenant is responsible under this Lease.

(t) Tenant shall surrender the Premises to Landlord at the expiration or sooner termination of this Lease in the same condition as of the Commencement Date (as hereinafter defined) in good order, vacant, free of any interests in the Premises including without limitation tenants, subtenants, licenses or occupants, and broom clean, ordinary wear and tear excepted and excepting work originally performed by Landlord for Tenant's initial occupancy of the Premises. Any installations performed by Landlord whether at Tenant's expense or otherwise, shall be deemed owned by Landlord and not removed from the Premises. Landlord's consent to any alteration performed by Tenant shall not waive or excuse Tenant's obligation to remove such alteration and restore the Premises at the end of the Term termination of this Lease, if Landlord so requires.

(u) As additional security for Tenant's obligations under this Lease, Tenant hereby grants to Landlord a first security interest in all Tenant's equipment, and non-fixture installations owned, and not leased or financed, by Tenant. In furtherance, Tenant also authorizes Landlord to execute and file any UCC-1 Financing Statements confirming the security interests granted herein by Tenant and all filing and administrative fees advanced by Landlord are deemed additional Rent. If Tenant defaults under this Lease beyond any grace or cure period, Tenant authorizes Landlord, at Landlord's election, as an additional remedy, to immediately assert and exercise said security interest towards satisfaction of Tenant's financial obligations under this Lease.

(v) Tenant's loss of authorization to do business shall be deemed a default under this Lease.

(w) If, pursuant to Landlord's instructions, Tenant pays Rent into a "lockbox" (or the like), any deposit of Rent by the lockbox administrator on Landlord's behalf does not waive Landlord's rights under this Lease.

[5.1] II. TERM

The term (the "Term") of this Lease shall be (____) years commencing on _____, 2____ (the "Commencement Date") expiring _____, 2____ (the "Expiration Date"). If the Term does not begin on the first of the month, the number of days within the first month of this

Lease shall be added to the full term set forth and adjusted Rent shall be paid for the portion of the first month of the Lease.⁸

[5.2] A. Real Estate Tax Escalations

(a) Tenant shall pay, during the Term, prescribed amounts as Rent provided for in this Article. As used herein, the following terms shall have the meanings set forth below:

(i) “Real Estate Taxes” shall mean all real estate taxes, school taxes, assessments, water charges and sewer Rents, business improvement district (BID) charges and assessments, Rents and other taxes and charges of every nature and kind whatsoever, whether general or special, ordinary or extraordinary, foreseen or unforeseen, of every character, which at any time may be assessed, levied, charged, confirmed or imposed on or in respect of or be a lien upon the Building including and not limited to those arising from an increase in rate or assessment. “Real Estate Taxes” shall exclude taxes attributable to an increase in the Building’s square footage, income, franchise, inheritance or similar taxes; provided, however, that if the method of taxation or assessment shall be changed so that the whole or any part of the Real Estate Taxes theretofore payable with respect to the Building instead shall be levied, charged, assessed or imposed in whole or in part on the income or Rents received by Landlord from the Building or shall otherwise be imposed against Landlord in the form of a franchise tax or otherwise, then the same shall be deemed Real Estate Taxes for purposes of this Article.

(ii) “Base Year” shall mean calendar _____ and fiscal _____ relative to all real estate and related taxes to which the Building is subject.⁹

8 If the Commencement Date is not a date certain at the time of Lease execution, consider a provision whereby the Landlord provides written notice to Tenant setting forth the commencement, expiration and other critical dates, and whether such notice must be acknowledged by Tenant to avoid later dispute.

9 Include “calendar” and “fiscal” tax years based on Commencement Date.

(iii) “Escalation Year” shall mean the calendar and fiscal years following the Base Year.

(iv) The “Building” shall mean the land and the building of which the Premises forms a part, known as _____, New York.

(v) “Tenant’s Share” shall mean _____%.

(b) Tenant shall pay to Landlord, as additional Rent, a base amount of $ _____, payable _____ monthly, for present Base Year taxes, plus an amount equal to Tenant’s Share of the amount by which the Real Estate Taxes payable during all Escalation Years shall exceed the Real Estate Taxes paid during the Base Year, irrespective of whether such excess is due to higher tax rates, increases in assessed valuation or other cause. Such additional Rent may be billed by Landlord at or about the dates on which installments of Real Estate Taxes are due and payable by Landlord, or at any time thereafter during the term of the Lease, and such additional Rent shall be payable by Tenant to Landlord within ten (10) days after being billed therefor. Copies of tax bill shall be sufficient evidence of the amount of Real Estate Taxes for purposes of computing the amount payable by Tenant.

(c) The Real Estate Taxes actually payable by Landlord shall be used in computing the additional Rent hereunder. If the amount of Real Estate Taxes for the Base Year is reduced by final determination of legal proceedings, settlement or otherwise, the additional Rent theretofore paid or payable hereunder shall be recomputed on the basis of such reduced amount, and Tenant shall pay to Landlord as additional Rent, within thirty (30) days after being billed therefor, any deficiency between the additional Rent theretofore paid and the amount due as the result of such recomputation. If Landlord receives a refund of any Real Estate Taxes paid during any Escalation Year on which additional Rent shall have been based, as a result of a reduction of Real Estate Taxes by final determination of legal proceedings, settlement or otherwise, the additional Rent shall be recomputed based on the net refund, after deducting Landlord’s expenses, and Tenant shall receive, at Landlord’s option, a credit for or refund of any overpayment of additional Rent.

(d) Landlord shall not be obligated to contest the levy or assessment of any Real Estate Taxes, and it shall be at Landlord’s sole discretion whether any such contest shall be undertaken. Landlord hereby reserves the exclusive right to take and prosecute all such proceedings, including any such proceedings for the Base Year, and if so taken, Landlord may proceed without notice to Tenant and may prosecute the proceeding, including settlement and discontinuance, in such manner as Landlord may determine in its sole discretion.

(e) In no event shall the first year's annual fixed Rent under this Lease be reduced by virtue of this Article.

(f) The additional Rent provided herein shall be apportioned as of the expiration of the Term or earlier termination of this Lease. The obligations of Tenant to pay additional Rent as provided for herein shall survive the expiration of Term or earlier termination of this Lease. If Tenant continues in possession of the Premises after the expiration of the Lease term or earlier termination of this Lease, as a month-to-month or periodic Tenant or otherwise, the provisions of this Article shall continue in full force and effect.

(g) The additional Rent provided for herein shall be collectible by Landlord in the same manner as the regular installments of fixed Rent due under this Lease. No delay or failure by Landlord in preparing or delivering any statement or demand for any additional Rent shall constitute a waiver of, or impair Landlord's rights to collect, such additional Rent.

(h) Landlord reserves the right to collect Real Estate Taxes payable by Tenant in monthly installments based upon estimated annual taxes divided by twelve (12), adjusting the exact amount due on an annual basis.

(i) Tenant shall cooperate, as necessary, at its expense, in Landlord's efforts to qualify for any tax or governmental benefits.

[5.3] B. CPI Escalations

(a) "Base Year" as used herein shall mean the twelve (12) month period ending _____.

(b) "Consumer Price Index" shall mean the Consumer Price Index published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics of the U.S. Department of Labor, All Items, New York, New York—Northeastern, N.J., for urban wage earners and clerical workers, or any successor or substitute index appropriately adjusted.

(c) "Consumer Price Index for the Base Year" shall mean the average of the Consumer Price Index for each of the twelve (12) months of the Base Year.

(d) Effective as to each anniversary from the Commencement Date, a cost of living adjustment shall be made to the annual fixed Rent payable hereunder. The adjustment shall be based on the percentage difference between the Consumer Price Index for the month preceding the anniversary date (the "Preceding Month") and the Consumer Price Index for the Base Year.

(e) If the Consumer Price Index for any Preceding Month within the Term reflects an increase over the Consumer Price Index for the Base Year, then the annual fixed Rent to be paid commencing on each anniversary date of this Lease (unchanged by any adjustments under this Article 3) shall be increased by the percentage difference between the Consumer Price Index for such Preceding Month and the Consumer Price Index for the Base Year. Said adjusted annual fixed Rent thereafter shall be payable hereunder, in equal monthly installments, until it is readjusted pursuant to this Article 3.

(f) The statements of Rent adjustments to be furnished by Landlord pursuant to this Article 3 shall be based upon data prepared for Landlord by a certified public accountant, who may be the accountant now or hereafter employed by Landlord for the audit of its accounts. The statements thus furnished shall constitute a final determination as between Landlord and Tenant of the Rent adjustments for the periods represented thereby.

(g) If the Consumer Price Index ceases to use 1967=100 as the basis of calculation, or if a substantial change is made in the terms or number of items contained in the Consumer Price Index, then the Consumer Price Index shall be adjusted to the figure that would have been arrived at if the manner of computation had not been changed. If the Consumer Price Index (or successor or substitute index) is not available, a reliable governmental or other nonpartisan publication evaluating the information theretofore used in determining the Consumer Price Index shall be used at Landlord's discretion.

(h) In no event shall the fixed Rent under this Lease be reduced by virtue of this Article 3. The computations under this Article 3 are intended to constitute a formula for an agreed rental escalation and do not necessarily constitute an actual reimbursement to Landlord for costs or expenses paid by Landlord.

(i) The obligations of Tenant to pay the additional Rent provided for in this Article 3 shall survive the expiration of the Term or earlier termination of this Lease. The additional Rent provided for herein shall be apportioned as of the Expiration Date or earlier termination of this Lease. The additional Rent provided for herein shall be collectible by Landlord in the same manner as the regular installments of fixed Rent due under this Lease. No delay or failure by Landlord in preparing or delivering any statement or demand for any additional Rent shall constitute a waiver of, or impair Landlord's rights to collect such additional Rent.

(j) Increases under this paragraph shall not exceed _____% annually.

[5.4] C. Operating Expense Escalations

(a) Tenant shall pay, during the term of this lease, the additional Rent provided for in this Article 3b. As used herein, the following terms shall have the meanings set forth below:

(i) "Operating Expenses" shall mean all costs and expenses paid or incurred by or on behalf of Landlord with respect to the operation, cleaning, maintenance, repair, safety, security or management of the Building, the equipment of Landlord therein, the sidewalks or other areas adjacent thereto, or the services provided to tenants thereof, including without limitation: (i) salaries, wages and bonuses paid to, and the cost of any hospitalization, medical, surgical, union and general welfare benefits, pension, retirement or life insurance plans, and other benefits or similar expenses relating to employees of Landlord engaged in the operation, cleaning, maintenance, repair, safety, security or management of the Building, or said equipment or areas, or in providing said services to tenants; (ii) social security, unemployment and other payroll taxes, and the cost of disability and worker's compensation coverage required by any applicable law, rule, regulation or union contract, or otherwise paid with respect to said employees; (iii) the cost of electricity, gas, steam, water, air conditioning and other fuel and utilities; (iv) the cost of casualty, rent, liability, fidelity, plate glass and any other insurance; (v) the cost of repairs, maintenance and painting; (vi) the cost or rental of all building and cleaning supplies, tools, materials and equipment; (vii) the cost of uniforms, work clothes and dry cleaning; (viii) window cleaning, concierge, guard, watchman or other security personnel, services and systems, if any; (ix) management fees, or if no managing agent is employed by Landlord, a sum in lieu thereof which is the prevailing rate for management fees payable in _____, New York; (x) charges of independent contractors performing any of the aforesaid work for Landlord; (xi) legal, accounting and other professional fees and disbursements incurred in connection with the operation or management of the Building; (xii) association fees and dues; (xiii) decorations and exterior and interior landscaping; (xiv) depreciation of hand tools and other movable equipment used in connection with the operation, cleaning, maintenance, repair, safety, security and management of the Building; (xv) Real Estate Taxes, as hereinafter defined; and (xvi) such other items or cost or expenses as are normally included in operating expenses of similar buildings. Where work is performed by a contractor, the amount charged Landlord for such work shall constitute the cost of such work for purposes hereof, but if the contractor is related to, or is associated or affiliated with Landlord, then such cost shall not exceed what an independent contractor reasonably would charge for similar services. Operating Expenses, however, shall exclude: (a) executives' salaries above the grade of Building manager; (b) expenditures for capital improvements, other than those which under generally applied real estate practices are expensed or regarded as deferred expenses, except as hereinafter provided; (c) amounts received by Landlord through proceeds of insurance to the extent they are compensation for sums previously included in Operating Expenses; (d) cost of repairs or replacements incurred by reason of fire or other casualty or condemnation to the extent Landlord is compensated therefor; (e) advertising and promotional expenditures; (f) costs of painting and decorating any tenant's space, and costs incurred in performing work or furnishing services to any Building tenant to the extent that such work or service is in excess of any work or service that Landlord is obligated to furnish at Landlord's expense; (g) depreciation, except as provided above; (h) brokerage commissions and rental fees; (i) the cost of electricity (other than for air conditioning) furnished to the Premises or any other space leased to tenants, as estimated by Landlord; (j) refinancing costs and mortgage interest and amortization payments; (k) any costs incurred in the ownership of the Building, as opposed to the operation and maintenance of the Building and (l) ground rent payments to any ground lessor. If Landlord shall purchase any item of capital equipment or make any capital expenditure which has the effect of reducing the expenses which otherwise would be included in Operating Expenses, or is required by reason of laws, rules or regulations of any governmental authority or insurance requirements, then the costs of such capital equipment or capital expenditure are to be included in Operating Expenses for the Escalation Year in which the costs are incurred and subsequent Escalation Years, on a straight-line basis, to the extent that such items are amortized over an appropriate and reasonable period, not in excess of 10 years, with an interest factor equal to 12% per annum at the time of Landlord's having made such expenditure. If Landlord shall lease any items of capital equipment designed to result in savings or reductions in expenses which would otherwise be included in Operating Expenses, then the Rentals and other costs paid pursuant to such leasing shall be included in Operating Expenses in the Escalation Year in which they were incurred. If during all or part of any Escalation Year, Landlord shall not furnish any particular items of work or service (which otherwise would constitute an Operating Expense hereunder) to portions of the building due to the fact that (i) such portions are not occupied or leased, (ii) such item of work or service is not required or desired by the tenant of such portion, (iii) such tenant is itself obtaining and providing such item of work or service, or (iv) for other reasons; then, for the purpose of computing Operating Expenses, the amount for such item and for such period shall be deemed to be increased by an amount equal to the additional costs and expenses which reasonably would have been incurred by Landlord during such period if Landlord had at its own expense furnished such item of work or services to such portion of the building or such Tenant.

(ii) "Operating Expenses" shall mean the Operating Expenses adjusted to compensate for vacancies in the Building, and to compensate for amounts that Landlord would have incurred for servicing occupants who furnish their own services in whole or in part, which adjustments shall be based on what would have been charged by an independent contractor, acting reasonably, for the same services.

(iii) The “Building” shall mean the land and the building known as _____, NY of which the Premises forms a part.

(iv) “Tenant’s Share” shall mean _____%.

(b) Tenant shall pay to Landlord, as additional Rent, an amount equal to Tenant’s Share of the Operating Expenses during the Term. In furtherance, Tenant shall pay _____ monthly towards such obligation to be adjusted annually based upon actual charges computed under this paragraph.

(c) As soon as reasonably practicable, Landlord shall submit to Tenant a statement setting forth the computation of the amount of Tenant’s Share of Operating Expenses. Tenant shall pay Tenant’s Share of such amount within ten (10) days after the rendition of such statement.

(d) Commencing as of the first day of the month immediately following the rendition of such statement and on the first day of each month thereafter until a new statement is rendered, Tenant shall also pay to Landlord an amount equal to one-twelfth of the total additional Rent payable under this Article 3 and 3a for the preceding Year. Said monthly payments shall be adjusted to reflect, if Landlord can reasonably so estimate, known increases.

(e) If the payments made by Tenant pursuant to the preceding paragraph of this Article 3 exceed the amount of additional Rent payable to Landlord pursuant to this Article 3 for such year, such excess, at Landlord’s option, either shall be paid to Tenant or credited without interest against the next payments provided for hereunder. If the amount payable by Tenant as additional Rent pursuant to this Article 3 for any year is less than the payments made by Tenant pursuant to the preceding paragraph of this Article 3, Tenant shall pay the difference within ten (10) days after Landlord furnishes to Tenant a statement of the Operating Expenses for such year.

(f) If Tenant shall have paid additional Rent for Operating Expenses for any year and thereafter there is a reduction in the Operating Expenses in a subsequent year during the Term, then Tenant, if not in default hereunder, shall be entitled to an amount equal to Tenant's Share of the reduction in the Operating Expenses for the particular year in question. All such payments to Tenant shall not total more than the aggregate of the payments of Operating Expenses theretofore paid by Tenant, and in no event shall Tenant be entitled to any payment that would result in the reduction of the fixed Rent originally reserved herein, regardless of any reduction in Operating Expenses. If Tenant has paid any Operating Expenses, then Landlord thereafter shall, as soon as practicable after the end of each subsequent Escalation Year, submit a statement of Operating Expenses for each such subsequent year, as long as Tenant may be entitled to share in any reduction in Operating Expenses as provided above. If Tenant shall be entitled to share in any reduction in Operating Expenses, the amount of Tenant's Share thereof shall accompany such statement.

(g) In no event shall the annual fixed Rent under this lease be reduced by virtue of this Article 3. The computations under this Article 3 are intended to constitute a formula for an agreed Rental escalation and do not necessarily constitute an actual reimbursement to Landlord for costs or expenses paid by Landlord with respect to the building.

(h) The additional Rent provided herein shall be apportioned as of the Commencement Date and the Expiration Date or earlier termination of this Lease. If the Commencement Date is not the first day of the first year, then the Rent due hereunder for such first year shall be a proportionate share of the additional Rent that would have been payable for the entire first year. Upon the Expiration Date or earlier termination of this Lease, a proportionate share of the additional Rent payable under this Article 3 for the year during which such expiration or termination occurs shall immediately become due and payable by Tenant to Landlord. Said proportionate share shall be based on the length of time that the Term shall be within such year. Promptly after such expiration or termination, Landlord shall compute the additional Rent due from Tenant, as aforesaid, which computation shall be an estimate based upon the most recent annual statements theretofore furnished by Landlord to Tenant. Promptly after the end of the aforesaid year, Landlord shall cause a final statement showing the computation of the actual additional Rent due from Tenant for that year to be prepared and furnished to Tenant, whereupon any appropriate adjustments of amount owed to Landlord shall be made. The obligations of Tenant to pay additional Rent as provided for herein shall survive the expiration of the Lease term or earlier termination of this lease. If Tenant continues in possession of the Premises after the Expiration Date or earlier termination of this Lease, as a month-to-month tenant or otherwise, the provisions of this Article 3 shall continue in full force and effect for so long as Tenant remains in possession of the Premises.

(i) The additional Rent provided for herein shall be collectible by Landlord in the same manner as the regular installments of fixed Rent due under this Lease. No delay or failure by Landlord in preparing or delivering any statement or demand for any additional Rent shall constitute a waiver of, or impair Landlord's rights to collect, such additional Rent.

(j) The statements provided by Landlord pursuant to this Article 3 shall constitute a final determination as between Landlord and Tenant of the additional Rent for the periods represented thereby, unless Tenant, within thirty (30) days after they have been furnished, gives a notice to Landlord that Tenant disputes their accuracy or appropriateness, which notice shall specify the particular respects in which the statement is inaccurate or inappropriate. If Tenant fails to give such notice within thirty (30) days, Tenant's rights under this provision are waived and Landlord's computation shall be conclusive. Pending the resolution of such dispute, Tenant shall pay the additional Rent to Landlord in accordance with the statements furnished by Landlord. After payment of said additional Rent, Tenant shall have the right, during reasonable business hours and upon not less than three business days prior written notice to Landlord, to examine Landlord's books and records with respect to the foregoing, provided such examination is commenced within thirty (30) days and is concluded within sixty (60) days following the rendition of the statement in question.

[5.5] D. Electricity and Utilities

(a) Landlord shall furnish electricity to Tenant on a "Rent inclusion" basis based upon an annual attributable usage of $_____ at an annual cost to Tenant of $_____ payable $_____ monthly. This amount shall be increased proportionally to reflect any increases in electrical rates charged by the utility providing service over the rate then in effect as of the Commencement Date.¹⁰

[ALTERNATIVE] (a) Tenant shall timely pay all charges for all public or private utility services provided to the Premises and billed directly by the utility to Tenant or Landlord for Tenant's use and shall comply with all requirements of said service including but not limited to all rules and regulations of governmental authorities and the public utility.

(b) Landlord shall furnish reasonable use of such lighting, electrical equipment or appliances presently installed in the Premises or as Landlord hereafter may permit to be installed. To the extent not provided pursuant to Section 5(g) below, Tenant shall be responsible to replace any bulbs, ballasts and outlets at its expense during the term of the Tenancy. Tenant shall not make alterations or additions to the electrical equipment or appliances without the prior written consent of Landlord. Landlord and its agents and consultants may inspect the electrical equipment and appliances in the demised premises at any time and from time to time. Landlord shall not be liable or responsible to Tenant for any loss, damage or expense which Tenant may sustain or incur if either the quality or character of electric current is changed or is no longer available or suitable for Tenant's requirements or is interrupted.

(c) Tenant covenants and agrees that its use of electric current shall never exceed the capacity of the existing conductors, feeders, risers, wiring installations or other equipment servicing the Building. Tenant shall not alter or make any addition to the electrical equipment without the prior written consent of Landlord. If Landlord grants such consent, all additional risers and other equipment shall be provided by Landlord, and the costs and expenses thereof shall be paid by Tenant to Landlord on demand, as additional Rent, without setoff or deduction.

(d) Landlord reserves the right to interrupt, suspend or cease any of the services referred to herein when necessary by reason of accident, or repairs, alteration or improvements which in Landlord's opinion are necessary or desirable, or difficulty or inability in securing supplies or labor, or strikes, or any other cause beyond the reasonable control of Landlord whether similar or dissimilar to those herein above mentioned. Tenant shall not be entitled to any diminution or abatement of Rent or other compensation, and Tenant's obligations under this Lease shall not be affected or reduced, by reason of any interruption, suspension or cessation of services or losses arising from or relating to such interruption in service whether caused by Landlord or arising from an interruption of service by the utility providing such service. Landlord shall not be responsible to Tenant for any damage to Tenant's equipment arising from any interruption in services including brownouts. No interruption, suspension or cessation of services shall constitute a constructive or partial eviction.

(e) Landlord shall not be liable for any injury to or death of any person or persons, or injury or damage to property from steam, gas, electricity, water or rain which may seep into, issue or flow from the Building.

[ALTERNATE—Include (f) and (g) if utilities are provided on a Rent Inclusion basis:]

(f) Tenant agrees that an electrical consultant, selected by Landlord, may survey the electrical lighting and power load of the premises to determine the average monthly consumption of electric current in the demised premises. The findings of the consultant as to the proper electrical usage and charges based on such average monthly consumption of electric current, which may be greater than or less than the amount stated above, shall be conclusive and binding upon the Parties, unless contested in accordance with the procedures set forth below. Tenant shall pay such increase, if any, with the monthly installments of fixed Rent reserved herein.

(g) The determination of the electrical consultant shall be binding and conclusive on Landlord and Tenant, unless within thirty (30) days after delivery of a copy of such determination either party shall give notice to the other that such party disputes the determination of the electrical consultant selected by the other party. In such event, the party giving notice, at its own expense, shall obtain its own determination from a reputable, independent electrical consultant and deliver to the other party a copy of said determination within thirty (30) days after the delivery date of the aforesaid notice. Landlord's electrical consultant and Tenant's electrical consultant then shall seek to agree upon the proper Rent increase based on such electrical consumption. If they cannot agree within forty-five (45) days following the delivery of the aforesaid notice, said electrical consultants shall choose a third reputable, independent electrical consultant, whose costs shall be shared equally by Landlord and Tenant, to make said determination. If the electrical consultants of Landlord and Tenant cannot agree on such third electrical consultant within ten (10) days after the said forty-five (45) day period, then either party may apply to the Supreme Court of the State of New York for the appointment of such third consultant. The determination of the third consultant shall be final and conclusive. Pending the resolution of any dispute as to the proper Rent increase, Tenant shall pay to Landlord a Rent increase in accordance with the determination of the original electrical consultant. If the final determination of the proper Rent increase shall differ from the determination of the original electrical consultant, then Tenant shall pay, on demand, any deficiency owed by Tenant; and Landlord shall credit or remit to Tenant any overage paid by Tenant.

(h) If Tenant installs additional or substituted electrical equipment or appliances, or otherwise increases its use of electric current, then the fixed Rent reserved herein shall be increased by an amount determined by the electrical consultant as provided above. The fixed Rent shall be appropriately adjusted if Tenant removes any electrical equipment or appliances from the demised premises. If electric rates or charges paid by Landlord are increased or decreased, the aforesaid additional Rent shall be increased or decreased in the same proportion.

(i) Landlord's failure to issue a statement under paragraphs 3, 3a and 4 shall not prejudice Landlord's right thereafter to render a statement for any amounts due under these paragraphs nor shall said failure or delay effect Tenant's obligation to pay same. The obligations of Tenant pursuant to Articles 3 and 4 shall survive the Expiration Date or earlier termination of this Lease. Furthermore, Tenant's right to dispute said charges must be made in writing within thirty (30) days of notice of said charge otherwise any right to dispute same shall be conclusively waived.

[5.6] E. Work To Be Performed

(a) Prior to the Commencement Date, Landlord at its sole cost and expense, and if so agreed, shall perform the work and make the installations in the Premises set forth in the exhibit entitled "Landlord's Work" attached hereto and made a part hereof and the plans approved by the Parties, if such is the agreement between the Parties.

(b) If Landlord hereafter agrees to perform, upon Tenant's request, and upon submission by Tenant of necessary plans and specifications, any additional or nonstandard work over and above that described in the exhibit entitled "Landlord's Work," such work shall be performed at Tenant's sole cost and expense. Prior to commencing any such work requested by Tenant, Landlord shall submit to Tenant a written estimate of the cost of such work. If Tenant shall fail to approve any such estimate within [five (5)] days after receipt of such estimate, the same shall be deemed disapproval by Tenant in all respects, and Landlord shall not be required to proceed thereon. Tenant agrees to pay to Landlord, as additional Rent, upon being billed therefor, an amount equal to the cost of all such work plus an amount equal to [fifteen (15%)] percent of such cost as compensation for Landlord's overhead. Such bills may be rendered by Landlord as the work progresses.

(c) In all instances in which Tenant is required to supply information with regard to the work to be performed by Landlord, including, where applicable, paint color, Tenant shall supply such information within [three (3)] days after request therefor.

(d) Notwithstanding the date provided in this Lease for the Commencement Date, Tenant's obligations for the payment of fixed Rent shall not commence until Landlord shall have substantially completed¹¹ all of the work to be performed by Landlord as described in the exhibit hereto entitled "Landlord's Work." However, if there shall be any delay in Landlord's making the Premises ready for Tenant's occupancy by reason of (i) delay or failure by Tenant to supply information, to approve estimates or to give authorizations, (ii) Tenant's making changes or additions in the plans and specifications or materials originally approved, including without limitation, requests for additional or non-standard work, (iii) interference by Tenant or Tenant's contractors with the performance of work by Landlord or Landlord's contractors, or (iv) delay or failure of delivery of specific or additional new materials selected by Tenant, then the Commencement Date shall be deemed to have occurred on the date when Landlord would have substantially completed the Premises but for such delay or failure. If by reason of such factors, Landlord incurs any additional cost to prepare the Premises for Tenant's initial occupancy, such additional cost shall be paid by Tenant to Landlord on demand as additional Rent.¹²

(e) Upon completion of the work set forth in the exhibit hereto entitled "Landlord's Work," Landlord shall have no obligation, liability or responsibility of any nature with respect to any work or installations in the Premises, except as may be expressly set forth herein. Tenant covenants and agrees to maintain or, if necessary, replace all such work and installations, including without limitation, carpeting and other floor covering materials.

(f) Tenant has examined and inspected the Premises. Tenant agrees to accept possession of the Premises "as is" except as otherwise expressly provided in this Lease. Landlord shall not be responsible for making any improvements, alterations or repairs therein or for spending any other money to prepare the Premises for Tenant's occupancy, except as expressly provided herein. With respect to Landlord's Work and the delivery of the Premises by Landlord, Tenant further waives any and all rights otherwise conferred under N.Y. Real Property Law section 223-a. All other improvements and alterations to the Premises prior to or at any time after the Commencement Date shall be made at Tenant's sole cost and expense, in accordance with the provisions of this Lease. The approval by Landlord of any of Tenant's plans and specifications shall not constitute an assumption of any liability on the part of the Landlord for their accuracy or conformity with applicable municipal regulations.

11 Consider defining "substantially complete."

(g) At Landlord's option, Landlord or its designee shall furnish and install all replacement lighting, tubes, lamps, starters, bulbs and ballasts required in the Premises and Tenant shall pay Landlord or its designee upon demand the then established charges therefore as Additional Rent.

[5.7] F. Alterations and Additions

(a) Tenant shall not make any alterations of or additions to the Premises without the prior written consent of Landlord in each instance.¹³ Landlord shall not unreasonably withhold or delay such consent provided that Tenant is not in default under this Lease and provided the alterations and additions: do not change the general character, reduce the value or impair the usefulness of the Premises; are effected with due diligence, in a good and worker-like manner and in compliance with all applicable laws, rules and regulations of governmental authorities including and not limited to compliance with The Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 as amended 142 U.S.C. §§ 12101–12213 (“ADA”) and requirements of insurance companies; are promptly and fully paid for by Tenant; and are made under the supervision of an architect or engineer acceptable to Landlord in accordance with plans and specifications approved by Landlord. Notwithstanding, Landlord may withhold its consent to any work intended to be performed by or on behalf of Tenant if, in the Landlord's opinion, said work may affect either the structure or integrity of the Building or any of the utility systems servicing the Building.

(b) All permissible work performed by Tenant shall be on prior written notice to Landlord setting forth the nature and extent of work, the parties performing the work and the time frame within which the work is intended to be completed. In addition, all such permissible work shall be performed in compliance with the Building's Rules and Regulations Governing Tenant Alterations. No such work shall interfere with the use of the common facilities and systems of the Building and shall be performed during hours prescribed by the Landlord or its managing agent.

(c) Tenant, in connection with such alterations and additions, shall provide and maintain at all times workers' compensation insurance covering all persons, contractors and subcontractor who will perform work for Tenant, in amounts, with companies, and in form and substance satisfactory to Landlord and public liability insurance naming Landlord as an insured in amounts prescribed in Article 14 of this Lease. Before proceeding with any work Tenant shall provide to Landlord certificates of such insurance. Landlord may, at its option, require Tenant to post a bond or other guarantee to insure completion of any alteration or addition prior to Tenant commencing any such alteration or addition.

(d) No approval by Landlord of any of Tenant's plans for work in the Premises shall in any way be deemed an acknowledgment by the Landlord that the plans comply with any legal, zoning, municipal or other requirements or certificate of occupancy conformance. Nor shall any such approval be deemed a waiver by Landlord of any provisions of this Lease other than that relating to Landlord's approval.

(e) Landlord's consent to any Tenant alteration shall not waive Tenant's obligations to remove or restore such alteration at the expiration, surrender or termination of this Lease.

(f) Tenant shall reimburse Landlord for architect and other related fees incurred for reviewing such plans and proposed alterations.

(g) Tenant shall provide copies of all such plans to Landlord and shall also keep all records of such plans and approvals, if granted, for a period of six (6) years and shall further provide copies to Landlord upon request.

(h) At the expiration or termination of this Lease, at Landlord's option, Tenant shall either remove or leave behind all cables, conduit, wires and or installations inside the sheetrock walls.

(i) Tenant shall not and is specifically prohibited from doing any of the following:

(i) installing or hanging, or in any way attaching, any equipment, machinery, appurtenances, or the like in or on any structural elements of the Building or the exterior of the Building including, but not limited to, the roof;

(ii) cutting any holes into any structural element of the Building or any exterior portion of the Building including, but not limited to, the roof;

(iii) making any structural modifications to the Premises or any portion of the Building;

(iv) making any modifications or alterations to the Building's systems as they existed on the Commencement Date;

(v) installing any equipment that generates electromagnetic fields ("EMF") or interference¹⁴ for which in any event Tenant shall be exclusively responsible to cure or remediate, by removal of such equipment or otherwise; and

(vi) placing a load upon any floor of the Premises which exceeds the load per square foot for which the floor was designed. All machines and equipment installed in the Premises shall be properly shielded and so placed, equipped, installed and maintained by Tenant so as to eliminate the transmission of noise, vibration or electricity or other interference with other occupants of the Building. Tenant shall not move any equipment or bulky matter in or out of the Building without Landlord's prior written consent, which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld, and Tenant shall repair any damage caused by such movement at Tenant's expense.

[5.8] G. Liens

(a) Tenant shall indemnify and hold Landlord harmless from and against any and all bills for labor performed or equipment, fixtures and materials furnished to or for Tenant, and from and against any and all liens or claims therefor or against the Premises or the Building of which it forms a part, and from and against any and all liability, claim, loss, damage or expense, including reasonable attorneys' fees, in connection with any work performed by or for Tenant. The Premises and the Building shall at all times be free of liens for labor and materials supplied or claimed to have been supplied to or on behalf of Tenant, and no financing statements or other security instruments shall be filed against the Premises or the Building or the contents thereof.

(b) Tenant shall not directly or indirectly create or permit to be created any mortgage, lien, security interest, pledge, conditional sale, or other encumbrance on this Lease, the Premises or any part thereof, any equipment, fixtures or materials therein, Tenant's interest under this Lease or any Rent hereunder. The foregoing shall not apply to liens for impositions not yet due, or liens of mechanics, materialmen, suppliers or vendors, incurred in the ordinary course of business for sums which are not yet due, provided that adequate provision for the payment thereof shall have been made and the following paragraph is complied with.

(c) At no time may Tenant use this Lease, the security, its installations or the value of this Lease or its leasehold as collateral for loans or any similar purpose.

(d) If, in connection with any work being performed by or for Tenant or any subtenant, or in connection with any materials being furnished to Tenant or any subtenant, any mechanic's lien or other lien or charge shall be filed or made against the Premises or any part thereof, or if any such lien or charge shall be filed or made against Landlord as owner, then Tenant, at Tenant's expense, within thirty (30) days after such lien or charge shall have been filed or made, shall cause the same to be canceled and discharged of record by payment thereof or filing a bond or otherwise. Tenant promptly and diligently shall defend any suit, action or proceeding which may be brought for the enforcement of such lien or charge; shall satisfy and discharge any judgment entered therein within ten (10) days after the entry of such judgment by payment thereof or filing a bond or otherwise; and on demand shall pay any and all liability, claim, loss, damage or expense, including reasonable attorneys' fees, suffered or incurred by Landlord in connection therewith.

(e) Nothing in this Lease shall constitute any consent or request by Landlord, express or implied, for the performance of any labor or services or the furnishing of any materials or other property in respect of the Premises or any part thereof, nor as giving Tenant any right, power or authority to contract for or permit the performance of any labor or services or the furnishing of any materials or other property in any fashion that would permit the filing or making of any lien or claim against Landlord, the Premises or the Building.

[5.9] H. Use of Demised Premises¹⁵

(a) Tenant covenants that Tenant shall use and occupy the Premises solely for general and administrative offices for the conduct of Tenant's business as and for no other purpose. Tenant shall not use or permit all or any part of the Premises to be used for the: (1) storage for purpose of sale of any alcoholic beverage; (2) storage for retail sale of any product or material; (3) conduct of manufacturing, printing or electronic data processing business, except that Tenant may operate business office reproducing equipment, electronic data processing equipment and other business machines for Tenant's own requirements (but shall not permit the use of any such equipment by or for the benefit of any party other than Tenant); (4) rendition of any health or related services, conduct of school or conduct of any business which results in the presence of the general public in the Premises; (5) conduct of the business of an employment agency or executive search firm; (6) conduct of any public auction, gathering, meeting or exhibition; (7) conduct of a stock brokerage office or business; and (8) occupancy of a foreign, United States, state, municipal or other governmental or quasi-governmental body, agency or department or any authority or other entity which is affiliated therewith or controlled thereby and which has diplomatic or sovereign immunity or the like with respect to a commercial lease. The use permitted by Tenant under this Article shall not constitute a representation or warranty by Landlord that Tenant's business may be conducted in the Premises or is lawful or permissible under any certificate of occupancy issued for the Building or applicable zoning or that Tenant's use is otherwise permitted by law, for which conformance and determination, Tenant is exclusively responsible. If Tenant's use of the Premises results in a requirement of ADA conformance, Tenant shall be exclusively responsible therefore at its expense, excepting initial work, if performed by Landlord.

(b) Tenant covenants that it shall continuously conduct its business at the Premises in the regular and usual manner and in the event Tenant and any of its principals or employees shall fail to occupy the Premises for a continuous period of thirty (30) days and shall further fail to pay Rent as prescribed for said period, Tenant shall be deemed to have abandoned and surrendered the Premises and any personalty contained therein without the need for a summary proceeding confirming same, and surrenders all right and interest to the Premises under this Lease and further waives any right to redeem the Premises or assert any claim against the Landlord under the Lease in any summary proceeding or otherwise.

(c) Prior to the Commencement Date, if Tenant is then in possession and at all times thereafter, Tenant, at Tenant's sole cost and expense, shall promptly comply with all present and future laws, orders and regulations of all state, federal, municipal and local governments, departments, commissions and boards and any discretion of any public officer pursuant to law and all orders, rules and regulations of the New York Board of Fire Underwriters or any similar body which shall impose any violation, order or duty upon Landlord or Tenant with respect to the Premises arising out of Tenant's use thereof or with respect to the Building if arising out of Tenant's use of the Premises or the Building (including the use permitted under this Lease).

(d) Tenant shall adhere and conform to all environmental rules and regulations of all local, state and federal agencies and offices. This shall include, but not be limited to, insuring that no hazardous or potentially hazardous materials are stored or kept in the Premises. In furtherance, the officer signing on behalf of the corporate Tenant herein is deemed personally obligated on all matters involving this paragraph. This obligation is confirmed by the officer's signature to this Lease and Rider and no further confirmation shall be required. Such obligations shall survive expiration or earlier termination of this Lease.

(e) If Tenant's use of the Premises is governed or licensed by any local, municipal, county, state or federal office or agency and a determination is made by said office or agency revoking or suspending any license or authority issued to Tenant to operate its business or a determination is made that Tenant's use of the Premises violates any laws or ordinances of the State of New York or its municipalities, same shall constitute a default under this Lease entitling Landlord to remedies prescribed herein.

(f) The Parties agree that the Premises being leased herein does not include any air rights or zoning lot rights nor does it include any use whatsoever of the roof portion of the Building for any purposes; all such uses, rights, and access being excluded and prohibited and reserved exclusively to Landlord; this covenant being a material element of consideration of this Lease.

[5.10] I. Right to Relocate

Landlord reserves the right to relocate Tenant's Premises to another part of the Building in which the Premises are located in accordance with the following:

(a) The new premises shall be substantially the same in size, dimensions, configuration and decor as the Premises described in this Lease and shall be placed in that condition at the expense of Landlord.

(b) The physical relocation of the space shall be accomplished at the expense of Landlord.¹⁶

(c) Landlord shall give Tenant sixty (60) days written notice of Landlord's intention to relocate the Premises.

(d) The physical relocation of the Premises shall take place in a manner least disruptive to Tenant and, if possible, completed over a weekend. If the relocation extends beyond the weekend, Tenant shall be entitled to an abatement of the Rent until the relocation is completed.

(e) The Parties agree to execute an amendment to the Lease reflecting all changes caused by the relocation.

[5.11] J. Signs and Exterior Appearance

Tenant shall not be permitted under any circumstances to place or install any signage on the exterior portion of the Building or Tenant's entrance and/or exit doors or the exterior hallway of the Premises except in those areas designated by the Landlord as main floor and tenant floor directories in conformity with Landlord's requirements, the cost for same to be paid by Tenant. Landlord shall install [at Tenant's expense] signage for the entrance doorway and Building directory consistent and in conformity with Landlord's requirements and Building standard.

[5.12] K. HVAC Services¹⁷

(a) Landlord shall furnish to the Premises cold and temperate air at reasonable temperatures, pressures and degrees of humidity and in reasonable volumes and velocities, from 8:00 A.M. to 6:00 P.M. on business days from May 15th to September 30th, as required for the comfortable occupancy of the Premises. Tenant shall pay Tenant's Share of costs for the HVAC services.

(b) Tenant shall cooperate fully with Landlord and shall abide by all rules and regulations which Landlord may reasonably prescribe for the proper functioning and protection of the HVAC system. Tenant shall cause to be kept closed the doors, when not in use, and to lower and close the blinds when reasonably necessary because of the sun's position so that the HVAC system can operate effectively. Landlord, throughout the Term, shall have free and unrestricted access to the air conditioning facilities in the Premises.

(c) Landlord reserves the right to interrupt, suspend or cease any of the services referred to herein when necessary by reason of accident, or repairs, alteration or improvements which in Landlord's opinion are necessary or desirable, or difficulty or inability in securing supplies or labor, or strikes, or any other cause beyond the reasonable control of Landlord whether similar or dissimilar to those herein above mentioned. Tenant shall not be entitled to any diminution or abatement of Rent or other compensation, and Tenant's obligations under this Lease shall not be affected or reduced, by reason of any interruption, suspension or cessation of services. No interruption, suspension or cessation of services shall constitute a constructive or partial eviction.

[5.13] L. Limited Liability

(a) If Landlord defaults hereunder, Tenant shall look solely to the interest of Landlord in the Premises for the satisfaction of any judgment or other judicial process requiring the payment of money by Landlord based upon any default hereunder, or any claims arising from the landlord/tenant relationship of the Parties or any rights and obligations involving the Premises or this Lease. No other assets of Landlord or any such successor shall be subject to levy, execution or other enforcement procedure for the satisfaction of any such judgment or process. Upon any conveyance or transfer of the Building, the transferor shall be relieved from all liability hereunder.

(b) Landlord shall not be held liable for any injury to or death of any person or persons, or injury or damage to property, from theft or accident, or from steam, gas, electricity, water, rain which may seep into, issue or flow from the Building, unless same shall be due to Landlord's otherwise foreseeable gross negligence.

(c) Landlord makes no implied covenants, representations or warranties. Accordingly, Landlord's responsibilities and obligations are limited to those expressly set forth in this Lease. Tenant's rights herein are subject to the rights of mortgagees, grounds lessors, and Tenant being in conformance with the terms of this Lease and not being in default beyond any expressly prescribed cure or grace periods set forth in this Lease.

(d) Tenant acknowledges and agrees that the Building's front desk/concierge services, if any, are provided for the limited purpose of directing parties to the appropriate Building tenant and not for the purposes of providing any security for the Building and/or the Premises or occupants.

[5.14] M. Indemnification By Tenant

Tenant indemnifies and holds Landlord harmless from and against any and all liability, claim, loss, damage or expense, including reasonable attorneys' fees, by reason of any injury to or death of any person or persons, or injury or damage to property, or otherwise, arising from or in connection with the occupancy or use of the Premises or any work, installation or thing whatsoever done in, at or about the Premises, or resulting from any default by Tenant in the payment or performance of Tenant's obligations under this Lease or from any act, omission or negligence of Tenant or any contractors, agents, employees, customers, subtenants, licensees, guests or invitees of Tenant and in the exercise of Landlord's rights to assert any security interest granted herein. This Article shall apply prior to the Commencement Date if Tenant then has possession or use of the Premises.

[5.15] N. Insurance¹⁸

(a) Tenant, at all times during the term of this Lease and at Tenant's expense, shall provide and keep in force with insurers then reasonably acceptable to Landlord, comprehensive public liability and property combined limits and coverage insurance protecting Landlord, the Building's managing agent and any other related parties designated by Landlord, against any and all liability occasioned by negligence, occurrence, accident, disaster and other risks included under "extended coverage" policies, occurring in or about the Premises or any part thereof which amounts at the date hereof shall be, in the case of public liability, $_____ per person and $_____ per accident, and $_____ in the case of property damage, and insurance against such other hazards; any and all such policies to be issued by Best A rated or better insurance companies. Tenant shall comply with such other requirements as Landlord from time to time reasonably may request for the protection by insurance of Landlord's interest.

(b) All insurance maintained by Tenant pursuant to this Article shall also name Landlord, and any other parties designated by Landlord in writing as "additional insureds," and shall provide that any loss, excepting that involving Tenant's equipment and trade fixtures, shall be payable to Landlord notwithstanding any act or failure to act or negligence of Landlord, Tenant or any other person and shall provide that no cancellation, reduction in amount or change in coverage thereof will be effective until at thirty (30) days after receipt by Landlord of written notice thereof, and shall be reasonably satisfactory to Landlord, in all other respects. Tenant shall, at its expense and throughout the Term, procure a clause in, or endorsement to, all such insurance whereby the insurance company waives subrogation or consents to a waiver of right of recovery against Landlord for any sums paid to Tenant.

(c) Upon commencement or earlier possession by Tenant of the Premises, Tenant may provide proof of insurance required herein by ACORD certificates duly issued and approved by the carrier, and thereafter when issued, a counterpart of issued policies and endorsements and thereafter not less than thirty (30) days prior to the expiration date of any policy delivered pursuant to this Article, Tenant shall deliver to Landlord the originals of all policies or renewal policies, as the case may be, required by this Lease, bearing notations evidencing the payment of the premiums therefor and accompanied by copies of such policies with proof of premium payment. [Such insurance may be provided through a blanket policy or policies in form and substance satisfactory to Landlord. Such blanket policies shall provide specific allocation to the Premises of the coverage afforded thereby, and shall give to Landlord no less protection than that which would be afforded by separate policies as prescribed by this Lease.

(d) If at any time Tenant shall neglect or fail to provide or maintain insurance or to deliver insurance policies in accordance with this Article with proof of payment, Landlord may effect such insurance as agent for Tenant, by taking out policies in a company satisfactory to Landlord, and the amount of the premiums paid for such insurance shall be paid by Tenant to Landlord on demand. Landlord, in addition to Landlord's other rights, powers and remedies, shall be entitled to recover as damages for any breach of this Article the uninsured amount of any liability, claim, loss, damage or expense, including reasonable attorneys' fees, suffered or incurred by Landlord, and shall not be limited in the proof of damages which Landlord may claim against Tenant to the amount of the insurance premiums not paid or incurred by Tenant which would have been payable for such insurance. Evidence of insurance may be provided by delivery of an original ACORD 27 form, or similar or successor form then in effect, conforming to the within requirements.

[5.16] O. Estoppel Certificates

Tenant shall execute, acknowledge and deliver to Landlord, in form provided by Landlord or required by any lender or purchaser and from time to time, promptly upon request, a certificate stating: (a) that this Lease is unmodified and in full force and effect (or, if there have been modifications, that this Lease is in full force and effect, as modified, and identifying the modifications); (b) the commencement and expiration dates of the Term; (c) the dates through which fixed Rent and additional Rent have been paid; (d) whether or not there is any existing default by Landlord or Tenant with respect to which a notice of default has been delivered, and if there is any such default, specifying the nature and extent thereof; (e) that this Lease is subordinate to any existing or future mortgage placed by Landlord on the building; and (f) whether or not there are any setoffs, defenses or counterclaims against the enforcement of any of the agreements, terms, covenants or conditions of this Lease to be paid, complied with or performed by Tenant; (g) the amount of security deposit held by Landlord under this Lease; and (h) any other information requested by Landlord or any lender. Any such certificate may be relied upon by Landlord and any mortgagee, purchaser or other person with whom Landlord may deal.¹⁹

[5.17] P. Security Deposit

(a) Tenant shall deposit²⁰ with Landlord upon the signing of this Lease, the sum as security, to be adjusted through the term of this Lease to equal to _____ () months of the then current Rent and actual or estimated electrical charges, for the full and faithful performance and observance by Tenant of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease subject to adjustment as provided for in this Lease. If Tenant defaults in the performance or observance of any term, covenant or condition of this

Lease, including without limitation the obligation of Tenant to pay any Rent or other sum required hereunder, Landlord may use, apply or retain the whole or any part of the security so deposited to the extent required for the payment of any Rent or any other sum as to which Tenant is in default or for any sum which Landlord may expend or may be required to expend by reason of Tenant's default, including without limitation any damages or deficiency accrued before or after summary proceedings or other re-entry by Landlord, legal fees or otherwise. If Tenant shall fully and faithfully observe and perform all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease and provided Tenant has not been in default under the Lease the security shall be returned to Tenant after the end of the Term and the delivery of possession of the Premises to Landlord in the manner prescribed in this Lease.

(b) In the event of a sale, transfer, leasing or financing of the Premises by Landlord, Landlord reserves the right to transfer the security to the transferee or mortgagee whereupon Landlord shall be deemed released by Tenant from all liability for the return of said security upon written assumption by such transferee of such obligation, upon which, Tenant shall look solely to such new owner or landlord or designated party for the return of said security. This paragraph shall apply to every transfer or assignment of the security to a new owner or landlord as provided herein.

(c) Tenant shall not assign or encumber the security deposit and Landlord shall not be bound by any such attempted assignment and encumbrance.

(d) In no event shall the security deposit be applied to or credited against the obligations otherwise due by any guarantor under this Lease.

(e) If Tenant defaults beyond any cure period, at any time during the Term, in addition to any other rights Landlord may have arising from said default, if Landlord elects to continue this Lease, the security deposit prescribed herein shall be increased by an amount equal to ____ month(s) of the then current Rent.

[5.18] Q. Assignment and Sublet

(a) Tenant covenants not to voluntarily or involuntarily assign, encumber, mortgage or otherwise transfer this Lease, or sublet the Premises or any part thereof, or suffer or permit the Premises or any part thereof to be used or occupied by others, by operation of law or otherwise, without the prior written consent of Landlord in each instance, [which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld]²¹. Absent such consent, any act or instrument purporting to do any of the foregoing shall be null and void.

(b) The transfer or sale of 50% or more of the capital stock of any corporate tenant, or of a majority of the total interests in any partnership tenant, however accomplished and whether in a single transaction or a series of transactions, shall be deemed an assignment of this Lease, except that a transfer of stock for purposes hereof shall not include sales of stock by persons through the “over-the-counter market.” Notwithstanding the foregoing, Tenant may assign this Lease to a corporation into which or with which Tenant is merged or consolidated or to an entity to which substantially all of the assets of Tenant are transferred, or, if Tenant is a partnership, to a successor partnership, and Tenant may sublet the Premises to subsidiaries or affiliates of Tenant for so long as any such subsidiary or affiliate shall retain the status of a subsidiary or affiliate of Tenant and proof thereof is delivered to Landlord. For purposes hereof, a “subsidiary” or “affiliate” shall mean a corporation of which at least 50% of the common stock is owned by Tenant or a partnership of which at least 50% of the equity is owned by Tenant.

(c) If Tenant desires to assign or sublet the Lease, Tenant shall submit to Landlord in writing: the name and address of the proposed assignee or sublessee (a “Transferee”); a counterpart of the proposed agreement of assignment or sublease and all other instruments or agreements pertaining thereto; such information as to the nature and character of the business of the proposed Transferee; the proposed use of the space; banking, financial or other credit information relating to the proposed Transferee sufficient to enable Landlord to determine the financial responsibility, reputation and character of the proposed Transferee and any proposed guarantor; a statement of all sums or other consideration paid or to be paid to or by Tenant by or for the account of the Transferee in connection with such assignment or sublease, including without limitation sums paid or to be paid for the sale or rental of Tenant’s fixtures, leasehold improvements, equipment, furniture, furnishings or other personal property; and such other information as Landlord may reasonably request. Tenant shall pay all of Landlord’s costs and expenses, including reasonable attorneys’ fees and disbursements, incurred in connection with the review, preparation and execution of any documents pertaining to any proposed assignment or sublease if Landlord approves such party.

21 Consider limitations very carefully.

(d) No assignment or transfer, irrespective of any consent by Landlord, shall be effective unless the assignee shall execute, acknowledge and deliver to Landlord an agreement, in form and substance satisfactory to Landlord, whereby assignee assumes the obligations and performance of this Lease and shall agree to be bound by all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease, including restrictions on use, to be observed, performed or complied with by Tenant, and whereby the assignee shall agree that the provisions of this Article shall continue to be binding upon it in the future notwithstanding such assignment or transfer. No sublease shall be effective, irrespective of any consent of Landlord, unless the subtenant shall execute and deliver to Landlord a recordable agreement, in form and substance satisfactory to Landlord, whereby the subtenant agrees to comply with all applicable terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease, including restrictions on use, to be complied with by Tenant hereunder.

(e) Each assignment, as the case may be, shall specifically state that: (1) it is subject to all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease; (2) the assignee shall not have the right to a further assignment, or to allow the Premises to be used by others, without the prior written consent of Landlord in each instance; (3) a consent by Landlord thereto shall not be deemed to modify or amend the provisions of this Lease or Tenant's obligations hereunder, which shall continue to apply to the Premises involved and the occupants thereof as if the assignment had not been made; (4) if Tenant defaults in the payment of any Rent, Landlord is authorized to collect any Rents due and accruing from any assignee, or other occupant of the Premises and to apply the net amounts collected to the Rents reserved in this Lease; and (5) the receipt by Landlord of any amounts from any assignee, or other occupant of any part of the demised premises shall not be deemed or construed as releasing Tenant of Tenant's obligations hereunder except to the extent of the amount received or the acceptance of that party as a direct tenant.

(f) In no event shall Tenant be entitled to assign this Lease or to sublet all or any portion of the Premises to: any tenant or occupant of any other space in the Building, or to any affiliate or any associated entity of any tenant or occupant of other space in the Building; any person or entity who has dealt with Landlord or Landlord's agents, directly or through a broker, with respect to space in the Building during the twelve (12) months preceding the assignment or subletting; any person or entity whose business or activities or intended use of the Premises is not in keeping with the standards of the Building or of the floor or floors upon which the Premises is located; any person or entity entitled directly or indirectly to diplomatic or sovereign immunity; a governmental or quasi-governmental organization, authority or agency; or charitable or a not-for-profit corporation or nonprofit organization. In no event shall Tenant be entitled to assign this Lease or sublet the Premises or any part thereof if there shall have been a default by Tenant, beyond any applicable grace or cure period, under any term, covenant or condition of this Lease.

(g) Tenant shall not advertise, or authorize any broker to advertise, for a subtenant or assignee, without the prior written consent of Landlord in each instance. No advertisement or public communication shall mention or refer to a rental rate or to any other matter which directly or indirectly might adversely reflect on the dignity and prestige of the Building.

(h) Landlord's consent to an assignment or transfer shall not be deemed or construed as a consent to any further assignment or transfer, or a waiver of this provision of this Article. Any person or representative of Tenant to whom Tenant's interest under this Lease passes by operation of law, or otherwise, shall be bound by the provisions of this Article.

(j) No assignment of this Lease or acceptance of Rent by Landlord from any assignee or other party shall discharge or release Tenant or any person, firm or corporation which previously assumed Tenant's obligations hereunder, and Tenant and such persons, firms and corporations shall remain liable for the payment of Rent due and to become due under this Lease and for the performance and observance of all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease on the part of Tenant to be observed or performed for the balance of the Term as if no assignment has been effected. If this Lease is assigned, whether or not in violation of this Article, Landlord may collect Rent from the assignee. If the Premises or any part thereof are sublet or occupied by anybody other than Tenant, Landlord, after any default by Tenant, may collect Rent from the subtenant or occupant, and apply the net amount collected to the Rent due hereunder. Such collection of Rent by Landlord shall not be deemed or construed as a waiver of the provisions hereof, the acceptance of the assignee, subtenant or occupant as a tenant, or a release of Tenant from the further performance and observance by Tenant of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease.

(k) Whenever Tenant shall claim under this Article or any other provision of this Lease that Landlord has unreasonably withheld or delayed its consent to any request of Tenant, Tenant shall have no claim for damages by reason of such alleged withholding or delay, and Tenant's sole remedy therefor shall be a right to obtain specific performance without recovery of damages.

(l) In the event Tenant is in default in the payment of Rent or additional Rent due under this Lease, Landlord is hereby authorized by Tenant to collect and accept Rent from any of Tenant's subtenants, licensees or assignees and apply the net amount collected to sums otherwise due by Tenant. This shall not be deemed a waiver of any of Landlord's rights against Tenant nor shall it be deemed an acknowledgment of any leasehold interest purportedly held by any such subtenant, licensee or assignee unless expressly acknowledged in writing by Landlord.

(m) In the event Landlord consents to an assignment of the Lease or a subletting of the entire Premises, in either event the security deposit shall be increased by an amount equal to ____ months of the then current Rent.

(n) In the event any assignment or sublet results in sums payable to Tenant in excess of that paid by Tenant to Landlord, such excess shall be divided equally between Landlord and Tenant after deducting the direct costs incurred by Tenant in effectuating such assignment or sublet income.

(o) Notwithstanding the terms of this paragraph, in the event Tenant wishes to assign this Lease, simultaneous with such request, Tenant shall offer to surrender the Premises to Landlord, and Landlord, at its sole option and discretion, may elect to accept such surrender as an alternative to considering an assignment in which event and subject to all sums otherwise due under the Lease having been fully paid and obligations of Tenant having been otherwise performed to the time of surrender, the Lease shall terminate and be cancelled for all purposes. This provision shall in no manner confer any rights to Tenant to compel Landlord to accept a surrender of the Premises.

(p) Landlord's consent to any assignment or sublet under this Lease is conditional upon Tenant not being in default at the time of such request through assignment or subletting and delivery by Tenant of an estoppel certificate to Landlord with copies of all required documents in furtherance of such request.

(q) The right to assign or sublet in accordance with this Section 17 is personal to the current named Tenant and is not assignable or otherwise transferable with this Lease.

[5.19] R. Subordination and Attornment²²

This Lease, and all rights of Tenant hereunder, are and shall be subject and subordinate in all respects to all mortgages which may now or hereafter affect the Premises, whether or not such mortgages shall also cover other lands or buildings, to each and every advance made or hereafter to be made under such mortgages and to all renewals, modifications, replacements, spreaders, consolidations and extensions of such mortgages. In the event of any sale of the Premises in a foreclosure of any such mortgage or the exercise by the holder of any such mortgages of any other remedies provided for by law or in such mortgage, Tenant, upon written request of the holder of the mortgage or the purchaser at such foreclosure or any person succeeding to the interest of the holder of the mortgage, shall attorn to such holder, purchaser or successor in interest, as the case may be, without change in the terms, covenants or conditions of this Lease. If such a request is made, this Lease shall not be deemed to be terminated by any foreclosure proceedings or other remedies for the enforcement of the mortgage by such holder, purchaser or successor in interest. The provisions of this Article shall be self-operative and no further instrument of subordination and/or attornment shall be required. In confirmation of such subordination and/or attornment, Tenant promptly shall execute and deliver at Tenant's expense any instrument that Landlord or the holder of any such mortgage may reasonably request to evidence such subordination and/or attornment. As used in this Article the term "mortgages" shall mean all mortgages, deeds of trust, mortgage deeds and similar instruments now or hereafter affecting the Premises

[5.20] S. Option to Extend Term

(a) Subject to the satisfaction of the conditions set forth below in this Article, Tenant shall have the option to extend the Term for an additional period of ___ (___) years, subject to all of the terms, covenants and conditions of this Lease. During said extended term of this Lease, Tenant shall pay fixed Rent at the rate of <$___> per annum, payable <$___> monthly, for the first year of the option period [ALTERNATIVE: in an amount equal to the fair market rental for the Premises as reasonably determined by Landlord], but in no event less than the Rent payable in the last month of the Lease, in the manner provided in the Lease, and then subject to annually compounded increases of _____ percent (___%) plus all other items of Rent and additional Rent as prescribed in the Lease.

b. To be effective, Tenant must give Landlord written notice of Tenant's election to extend the Term and Landlord must receive said notice not less than [eight (8)] months prior to the expiration of the then existing term of this Lease, time being of the essence. Tenant's right to extend the term of this Lease pursuant to this Article shall be expressly conditioned upon Tenant not having been in default beyond any cure period under this Lease. If Landlord does not receive said notice as prescribed, this option shall automatically terminate with no further rights or obligations enuring to either party and this Lease shall expire as otherwise prescribed, and this option being deemed void ab initio.

c. This renewal option is personal to the current named Tenant herein and is not assignable or otherwise transferable with this Lease. This option shall also terminate without further notice or requirement if Tenant defaults in the payment of Rent or additional Rent [twice] in any [nine (9)] month period.

[5.21] T. Brokerage

Tenant represents and warrants that Tenant has not dealt with any broker in connection with this Lease or the negotiation or execution thereof, other than _____ whose commission Landlord agrees to pay pursuant to a separate agreement. Tenant agrees to indemnify and hold Landlord harmless from and against any claims, damage, liability or expense, including attorneys' fees, pertaining to any other broker with whom Tenant has dealt. Landlord shall not have any liability for any brokerage commission arising out of any subletting or assignment of this Lease by Tenant, and Tenant shall indemnify and hold Landlord harmless from and against any claims, damage, liability or expense, including attorney fees, pertaining to brokerage commissions in connection with any such subletting or assignment.

[5.22] U. Modifications and Corrections

If, in connection with obtaining financing or refinancing for the Building of which the Premises form a part, a banking, insurance or other institutional lender shall request reasonable modifications to this Lease as a condition to such financing or refinancing, Tenant shall not unreasonably withhold or delay its consent thereto, provided such modifications do not materially adversely affect the leasehold interest hereunder or increase Tenant's obligations hereunder, except to the extent that Tenant may be required to give notices of any defaults by Landlord to such lender or permit the curing of such defaults by such lender together with the granting of such additional time for such curing as may be required for such lender to get possession of the Building. In no event shall a requirement that the consent of any such lender be given for any modification of this Lease or for any assignment or sublease be deemed to materially adversely affect the leasehold interest hereby created.

[5.23] V. Notices²³

(a) All notices required or permitted hereunder shall be given by either certified mail²⁴ or nationally recognized overnight mail, next-day delivery with proof of delivery, addressed to Landlord at the address herein above stated and to Tenant at the Premises. Any notices required by Landlord under this Lease or any actions or summary proceedings, may be given and signed and affirmed by the Landlord, its employees, attorneys or agents and may be served by certified mail or nationally recognized overnight-mail service upon Tenant.

(b) Tenants, its subtenants, successors and assigns, if any, waive the requirements of personal service of any process upon them in any action or proceeding arising from this Lease and consent that all service of process may be made by certified mail or recognized overnight-mail service addressed to the Tenant at the address of the Premises. Tenant, by its signing this Lease, further consents to the personal jurisdiction of the District, Civil and Supreme Courts in the county and or district in which the Building is located in any action or proceeding brought by Landlord.

(c) Notice of any complaint involving Building services or related matters provided for in this Lease or any claimed default by Landlord under this Lease shall be provided in writing by Tenant to Landlord within no more than [twenty-one (21) days] of Tenant's knowledge of any such issues or problems, signed by a specified officer or manager of Tenant. Such writing in form and notice prescribed by this Lease is a condition precedent to Tenant pursuing any claimed remedies provided for in this Lease.

[5.24] W. Condemnation

(a) If the whole or materially all of the Premises shall be taken for any public or quasi-public purpose by any lawful power or authority by the exercise of the right of condemnation or eminent domain or by agreement between Landlord, Tenant and those authorized to exercise such right (herein called "Total Taking"), this Lease, the term hereby granted, shall terminate and expire on the date of such taking and the Rent shall be apportioned and paid to the date of such taking.

(b) The term "materially all of the Premises" shall be deemed to mean such portion of the Premises, as when so taken would leave remaining a balance of the Premises which, due either to the area so taken or the location of the part so taken in relation to the part not so taken, would not under economic conditions, zoning laws or building regulations then existing or prevailing, readily accommodate a new building or buildings in nature similar to the Building existing upon the land at the date of such taking, and of floor area sufficient, together with such portion of the Premises not taken in the condemnation, to reasonably permit the use of the Premises for the conduct of the business heretofore conducted thereon by Tenant. If there be any dispute as to whether or not there has been a Total Taking, such dispute shall be submitted to a court of competent jurisdiction.

(c) In the event of a Total Taking, the entire award relating to the Premises except for trade fixtures and moving expenses shall be paid to Landlord and this Lease shall be deemed terminated.

(d) If less than materially all of the Premises be taken or condemned (herein called "Partial Taking"):

(i) This Lease shall continue in full force and effect as to the part of the Premises not so taken.

(ii) Tenant, shall proceed diligently to repair and restore any remaining part of the Premises not so taken.

(iii) The entire award with respect to the Premises shall be payable to Landlord (subject to the right of Landlord to elect to have the award deposited with any mortgagee) and subject to the provisions and limitation in this Section, Landlord agrees to make available to Tenant so much of the portion of the award actually received and held by Landlord, if any, less all reasonable expenses paid or incurred by Landlord in the condemnation proceedings, as may be necessary to pay for the cost of repairing and restoring for use and occupancy the part of the Premises no so taken. Any balance of the award with respect to the Premises thereafter remaining shall be distributed to Landlord.

(iv) The annual Rent due and payable hereunder shall be reduced equitably. If Landlord and Tenant cannot agree on such reduction, such reduction shall be determined by a court of competent jurisdiction.

(e) In the event of a Total Taking, or a Partial Taking, Tenant waives all claims for any value for its leasehold or its interest in this Lease or in the Premises or any part thereof and all claims for any compensation for the cost of construction or otherwise, except as herein specified.

(f) The Premises or a part thereof, as the case may be, shall be deemed to have been taken or condemned on the date on which actual possession of the Premises or a part thereof, as the case may be, is acquired by any lawful power or authority or the date on which title vests therein, whichever is earlier.

(g) In the event of a taking for a temporary use, this Lease shall continue unaffected and Tenant shall continue to pay in full the Rent. Tenant shall be entitled to receive the entire proceeds for such taking which shall be attributable to the Premises unless the period shall extend beyond the termination of this Lease in which case (x) the proceeds shall be apportioned between Landlord and Tenant as of the date of such expiration, and (y) Landlord shall be entitled to be paid out of the proceeds for any damage to the Premises or to the condition as it was before the taking. If the Lease shall not have expired prior to the termination of the taking, Tenant shall upon termination of the taking, restore the Premises. Notwithstanding the foregoing, but without affecting (x) above, if any portion of such proceeds relates to a period subsequent to the date of payment, such portion shall be deposited with Landlord as security for Tenant's obligations under this Lease and be released to Tenant in monthly installments over the period to which such proceeds relate.

(h) In the case of any governmental action not resulting in a taking of any portion of the Premises, but creating a right to compensation therefor, such as without limitation, a change of the grade of any street, this Lease shall continue in full force and effect; Tenant shall, if any governmental action results in physical damage to the Premises, proceed with reasonable diligence to conduct, at Tenant's own cost and expense, all restorations necessary to remedy any such physical damage; and any awards or awards in connection with any such governmental action shall be paid to Landlord and disposed of as provided in this Article, as in the case of a Partial Taking.

[5.25] X. Miscellaneous

(a) Tenant shall pay Landlord for all reasonable attorneys' fees incurred in connection with or arising from any defaults by Tenant under this Lease or actions to compel compliance by Tenant with any provision of this Lease or to recover damages resulting from non-compliance. Such amounts shall be deemed additional Rent and shall be paid on demand.

(b) All amounts which are due from and payable by Tenant under this Lease shall be deemed Rent and/or additional Rent.

(g) The failure of Landlord anytime during the term of the Lease to bill Tenant for item of Rent or additional Rent or to insist upon strict performance of any term, covenant or condition herein or Landlord's acceptance of any late or partial Rent shall not be deemed a waiver of any rights or remedies that Landlord may have under this Lease.

(h) If any provision of this Lease shall be unenforceable or invalid, such unenforceability or invalidity shall not otherwise affect this lease or any other provision of this Lease.

(i) This Lease may be executed in any number of counterparts each of which shall be deemed an original. Furthermore, any photocopied, facsimile copy, or pdf signed of this Lease shall be deemed an original so long as it fully conforms to the original(s) signed by the Parties.

(j) The submission of this Lease to Tenant is not an offer or option to Lease and Tenant shall not have any rights hereunder unless and until Landlord executes a copy of this Lease and deliver same to Tenant; the parties acknowledge that submission of the Lease is for discussion purposes only.

(k) This Lease is governed by the laws of the State of New York. All actions or proceedings under this Lease shall be brought in the county in which the Building is situated before the court having jurisdiction over the subject matter of the litigation.

(m) The Parties acknowledge that this Lease has been reviewed by respective counsel and Tenant had an opportunity to and did consult with counsel and advisors of its choice on matters involving this Lease, all terms have been considered and negotiated independently. Accordingly, the rule that any ambiguity shall be interpreted against the drafter shall not apply and there shall be no presumption favoring one party or the other in the interpretation of this Lease. of the Premises and not for storage of vehicles, either overnight or long term. It is expressly agreed as a material element of this provision that parking is exclusively at Tenant's risk, Tenant is not relying upon any undertaking or responsibility by Landlord to provide security for the parking portions of the Building and Landlord is not responsible for any injury, or any theft or damage to Tenant's or Tenant's invitee's automobile(s) or contents. Parking stickers for the Building garage may be issued at Landlord's election and, if so, must be affixed to the front passenger side of the car's windshield. Only cars with authorized parking stickers are allowed in the Building garage, except for Tenant's visitors, customers and/or clients. (v) No posters, signs, bills, promotional materials or the like shall be posted or distributed anywhere in the Building or elevators.

Each and every remedy under this Lease, law or statute, shall be cumulative. No delay in asserting any remedy under this Lease shall be deemed a waiver thereof, equitably or otherwise.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF of the Parties have signed this Lease as of the date set forth above.

[6.0] I. INTRODUCTION

A landlord's lease form won't always remind the tenant's counsel of everything they might need to think about and negotiate to properly protect their client.

Any lease can conceivably raise hundreds of issues, from the glaringly obvious, to the somewhat obvious, to the obscure. The language of the lease suggests many of those issues, starting with "economic" issues and continuing with "noneconomic" ones, most of which will turn out to be "economic" issues at the end of the day, if they ever actually become relevant.

When you negotiate a lease for a tenant, thinking about and responding to issues that the landlord and its counsel have already raised in the draft lease is the easy part. For example, if the landlord got the rent or some date wrong, you will ask the landlord's counsel to correct the error. You may ask for longer notice periods, a more extensive opportunity to cure defaults, "reasonableness" as the standard for handling any number of issues, a narrowing of any open-ended tenant obligations or landlord discretion and flexibility on use and transfers. You will also demand absolute clarity on all monetary and other significant obligations, deletion of inappropriate or excessive obligations and restrictions and correction of errors and internal inconsistencies. To the extent that anything in the lease is incomprehensible, you will try to have it translated into comprehensible language. Finally, you will respond to any other issues that you find while reviewing the language of the lease.

When you identify all these issues, you will respond to the landlord's lease document by asking for changes based on your experience and knowledge and the tenant's specific needs. It is a reactive process that starts with the express language of the lease itself.

To do a complete job, though, you also need to think about what the lease does not say. If the tenant will need or want something that the lease doesn't cover, you must ask for it or it won't be there – and it won't be there for the entire term of a document that can remain in place for a very long time. That's a daunting prospect. It forces the tenant's counsel to think outside the agenda that the landlord and its counsel defined within the terms of the lease they circulated.

The courts won't necessarily agree with a tenant who later asserts that some missing lease provision "should be inferred" because it's consistent with the basic relationship between the parties. Instead, if it's not there, it is not part of the agreement.

That isn't the only way a legal system might deal with leases. For example, in civil law countries, a statute defines most of the rights and obligations between landlords and tenants, filling in a lot of gaps that might otherwise constitute "silent lease issues." The parties simply need to memorialize their basic business terms. They rely on the generally applicable leasing statute for all the other rights and obligations regarding the leased premises. If the statute doesn't make sense for them, they may be able to modify it by contract. But if they don't, then the statute governs their relationship, and they don't have to contractually "think of everything." The statute is supposed to define a bundle of rights and obligations that should work for most landlords and tenants.

In the United States, in contrast, if you represent any tenant, you bear the burden of identifying and dealing with issues that a landlord's typical standard lease does not mention at all, but that may nonetheless matter a lot to your client. These are the "silent issues" in any lease. Unlike the obvious issues covered in any landlord's lease form, the silent issues are hard to identify, because the landlord doesn't do you the favor of reminding you about them.

[6.1] A. Genesis Of The Checklist

In 1999 and 2000, a subcommittee of the Commercial Leasing Committee of the New York State Bar Association Real Property Law Section developed and published a checklist of silent lease issues for attorneys who represent commercial space tenants. That original checklist was republished extensively, drawing many responses from readers. Based on those comments, further thought, subsequent experience and further review by members of the subcommittee, the authors (again with help from the subcommittee) issued a second edition of the tenant's silent lease issues checklist in 2003.

After that, the co-authors of the tenant's checklist kept their eyes and ears open for other additions and changes to make to the tenant's checklist of silent lease issues. At first, they resolved never to publish a third edition, but changed their minds when they realized that the cumulative effect of all their notes and improvements added up to a third edition. Like the previous editions, this third edition seeks to help tenants' attorneys identify and, if they choose to, raise "silent lease issues" when they review a typical landlord's standard commercial lease.

The original “silent lease issues” checklist project expanded over time to include other significant issues, not just “silent” issues, that a tenant’s counsel might want to raise in lease negotiations. Reminders were also added for some, but not all, of the due diligence that a tenant (or its counsel or other advisers) might want to undertake before the tenant signs a lease. The third edition of the checklist continues that approach.

This checklist mentions each possible issue only once, even if it might reasonably belong under more than one heading. Even when an issue in one section relates closely to some other issue somewhere else, the checklist never offers a cross-reference. Any user who wants the full benefit of this checklist needs to read it from beginning to end.

This checklist covers most issues alphabetically, which makes no logical sense, but creates at least the appearance of order and accessibility. The last few sections of the checklist cover the various stages of the lease negotiation process, which don’t logically belong in the same alphabetical sequence. For anyone who negotiates leases for tenants, this checklist offers a useful set of reminders about nearly everything that could matter. This checklist will even help a landlord’s counsel, although any landlord’s counsel may prefer the Landlord’s Checklist of Silent Lease Issues, which is also in its third edition with a similar history.

[6.2] B. What The Checklist Is And Does

This checklist discusses a tremendous range of issues. Those issues represent, or at least touch on, almost every possible issue or event that could arise when two parties have potentially conflicting interests in the same real property over a very long time – one occupies it and the other owns it and will have rights of possession later.

A lease amounts to a private statute. The parties who must live with this statute have no way to change it except by persuading the other party to agree to a change. This might require the writing of a check—perhaps a large one.

Thus, a lease must get it right the first time. Before embarking on the relationship that the lease will govern, each party can try to shape the private statute that will govern the relationship. This checklist should help a tenant and its counsel seize that opportunity to the tenant’s advantage.

[6.3] 1. Which Issues to Raise

Depending on the market, the parties, their relationship and history, the nature of the transaction and its timing, the scope and terms of your engagement and any other circumstances, you may or may not choose to raise issues from this checklist. Even if you do raise these issues, you will not necessarily prevail on any of them. But if you never even raise an issue, you cannot possibly prevail on it. You can't win it if you aren't in it.

You should only “consider” raising each checklist item, as opposed to automatically raising it because you found it on this checklist. No checklist substitutes for thought and judgment. So if an issue doesn't really matter or apply to the lease you are working on, don't raise it. You'll lose credibility. And in a very landlord-friendly market (such as Manhattan since 2011), you may waste time and run up needless legal fees if you raise some of the issues suggested here. And before you ask for some concession, make sure the lease doesn't already give you that concession. If you raise an issue that the lease already resolved in your favor, you may lead the landlord to scrutinize and worsen what was already there, thus producing a less favorable outcome than if you had kept your mouth shut.

The fact that any particular lease does not reflect positions suggested here does not necessarily mean that the tenant's counsel did a bad job. To the contrary, to serve its client best, sometimes the tenant's counsel should raise no issues at all and just get the deal signed, or identify and raise issues that are outside this checklist. And even if tenant's counsel raises every issue in this list, the landlord may have enough leverage to do nothing more than laugh.

Sometimes, a tenant will tell its counsel to “just raise the major issues, and don't bother with the minor stuff.” In those cases, this checklist might help the counsel raise a few “major” issues, but the client will probably not appreciate it if the counsel makes extensive use of this list. Of course, some issues the tenant may consider “minor” may have implications not known to or considered by the client or counsel. Watch out for these. Counsel your client accordingly.

If your client tells you to focus only on the critical issues because of budget, transactional or time constraints (i.e., the client's typical instructions that extraordinary time pressures mean we “just need to get this deal done”), you may want to focus first on these sections of the lease and the corresponding issues suggested in this checklist, probably in this order of priority.

1. Use — Section 42
2. Rent (no separate section in this checklist)
3. Services by Landlord, Particularly Air Conditioning — Section 38
4. Operating Expenses — Sections 24, 25
5. Real Estate Tax Escalations — Section 31
6. Assignment and Subletting — Sections 3, 4
7. Security Deposit — Section 37
8. Alterations (Initial Occupancy)—Section 2
9. Electricity — Section 11
10. Utilities, Other Than Electricity — Section 43

Counsel may also want to include on the “short” list of “top” issues these topics, depending on circumstances and the client’s agenda:

11. Alterations Generally, Not Only For Initial Occupancy — Section 1
12. Failure To Deliver Possession — Section 16
13. End Of Term — Section 13
14. Parking, At Least For A Suburban Building — Section 27

The authors counsel against the minimalist approach just suggested. To the contrary, counsel should consider the entire lease and also at least consider raising issues suggested in this checklist. If the client insists on minimalism, counsel will want to establish a record of the client’s instructions and the fact that counsel warned of the resulting risks. Business people sometimes have little patience for details like those suggested in this checklist, and want to move decisively to “get it done.” But then they will be the first people to express shock and outrage when the lease turns out not to be perfect over its multi-year term.

On the other hand, if the tenant’s business strategy consists of trying to prolong lease negotiations, an easy goal to achieve, this checklist will provide plenty of help. More than almost any other category of real estate negotiations, lease negotiations can take as much or as little time as the parties want. They give the parties an opportunity to think about and deal with an incredible array of issues: all the practicalities related to operation and occupancy of a building over an extended period. For example, the definition of “operating expenses,” in and of itself, can raise dozens of knotty issues that may amount to a reinvention of cost accounting and federal income tax law.

In deciding which issues to raise, a tenant may also want to think ahead and assess how those issues may turn out once the tenant raises them. If the lease already covers an issue in a vague way, the tenant may prefer that vagueness and uncertainty over the adverse certainty that might result if the tenant tried to clarify the language in question, and the landlord clarified it in a manner that benefited the landlord. The tenant may prefer uncertainty in the lease, especially if coupled with a high likelihood of a tenant-oriented judge. In other words, keep in mind the principle that sometimes one should not ask a question unless one will like the answer. On the other hand, five years later, the “vagueness” may look like tenant’s counsel didn’t do such a good job.

[6.4] 2. What Types of Leases?

This checklist applies primarily to substantial commercial space leases for retail and office tenants. Most issues here will apply to some leases but not others. You should interpret almost every item in the checklist as if prefaced by the caveats: “if applicable, appropriate, desired, possible, under the circumstances, taking into account the size and nature of the transaction, market conditions, practicalities, the tenant’s business agenda and anticipated use of the premises, accounting considerations and current accounting rules, the needs and negotiating positions of the parties, what the tenant expects of lease negotiations, the tenant’s instructions to counsel, the timing and all other circumstances.”

Many items on the checklist make sense only for very large tenants that might occupy all or most of a large building. If a smaller tenant raised some of these issues, a landlord might reasonably regard the tenant’s requests as bizarre and overreaching, or perhaps even a bad joke. In contrast, for a chain store tenant, making the same request might seem entirely routine.

The checklist makes no effort to explain which issues apply to which types of leases. The checklist also makes no consistent effort to suggest how a landlord might respond to any lease provisions suggested here.

The checklist does not consider “triple-net” leases, ground leases, “bondable” leases, “synthetic” leases, “build-to-suit” leases, leases from a seller to a purchaser of a company or other specialized leasing transactions, some of which are not really leases at all, but debt or equity financing masquerading as a lease.

The discussion in this checklist sometimes states that a tenant “should” consider or even “should” obtain certain provisions. Each such statement must be taken with a bushel of salt, because the co-authors do not purport to establish or define “standard” requirements for what any lease “should” or “should not” say. It is very easy to say in retrospect that a lease is “flawed” because it doesn’t say something one might want it to say. But leases are typically negotiated under substantial time pressure with an impatient client who just wants the deal to be done. And every lease represents its own negotiation, depending largely on the business and marketplace contexts. The making of definitive one-size-fits-all recommendations would thus be inconsistent with reality in the world of commercial real estate leasing. Nevertheless, it focuses the presentation.

This checklist considers lease negotiations from the tenant’s perspective. It is a tenant’s checklist. The authors and all previous checklist contributors do not necessarily believe that any landlord should accept the tenant’s position on any issue suggested in this checklist.

The checklist does not represent a position statement or recommendation by any co-author, publisher, subcommittee member or any organization with which any of them is affiliated. The checklist does not define a “minimum standard of practice.” It’s more like a “maximum standard of practice.” It does not give anyone a “smoking gun” to prove malpractice if any particular lease omits any particular provision(s) suggested here. This checklist is not exhaustive or complete. It is just a checklist. It’s a resource for leasing practitioners. It creates no legal duties or obligations. Users of this checklist are cautioned not to rely on it in any way or for any purpose. Some of its comments and suggestions may be inappropriate, or worse, in any particular transaction or even generally.

1. Alterations

- 1.1 Acceptable Contractors. Attach as an exhibit a list of pre-approved contractors, architects and other vendors. If the landlord has approval rights, have the landlord pre-approve as many names as possible. If the landlord reserves the right to delete pre-approved names, insist that the landlord act reasonably and, in any case, that the list must always contain at least a minimum number of names in each category. To the extent that the landlord's list does not include the tenant's desired team, fix that before signing the lease. Prohibit the landlord from delisting vendors of particular importance to the tenant.
- 1.2 Flexibility. The tenant will want to maintain some freedom in choosing its architects, engineers, other consultants and contractors. It will not want to be limited to the landlord's approved list. At a minimum, the tenant should have the right to propose, at any time, additions to the landlord's list for the landlord's reasonable approval.
- 1.3 Consent Requirements. The landlord should consent in advance to the tenant's initial alterations and any anticipated future alterations. If the initial alterations haven't been fully determined, try to get the landlord to approve as much as possible, even just a sketch. For nonstructural changes, try to eliminate any landlord consent requirement. Instead, just give the landlord at most the right to confirm that the intended work complies with objective and limited criteria that the lease defines. If that doesn't work, try to get the landlord to agree to be reasonable about approving any non-structural tenant alterations. Prohibit the landlord from requiring the tenant to make any changes in alterations that would increase their cost, except when the tenant's plans do not comply with law or with objective criteria in the lease.
- 1.4 When Consent Not Required. Try to persuade the landlord to agree to limit any requirement for the landlord's consent to alterations. For example, perhaps the tenant should not need the landlord's consent for decorative or minor (less than a stated cost?) alterations or partition walls. Changes in the economy and work structure may make it necessary for many tenants to have more flexibility than in the past to relocate partition walls or make other nonpermanent changes.

- 1.5 Proprietary Design Features. If the tenant regards its space arrangements, designs and office layouts as proprietary information, the tenant may want the landlord to let the tenant make any alterations permitted by law, with no need to obtain the landlord's consent or even to deliver plans to the landlord.
- 1.6 LEED Compliance. If the tenant seeks to comply with LEED "green building" standards, the tenant may need to include suitable language in the lease and modify some typical lease provisions. That subject otherwise lies outside the present checklist.
- 1.7 Multiple Floors. A multi-floor tenant may want the right to construct internal stairs and drill through floors for cabling. Such a tenant may also want the right to use the building's internal fire staircases for access between floors. If the landlord allows the tenant to cut through the slab to install an internal staircase, the landlord will generally require the tenant to restore, either specifically or under a general alteration restoration clause. The tenant should seek to negate that requirement. If the tenant has the right to "give back" a floor to the landlord, what happens if that floor contains communications cables serving the tenant's other floors? The tenant may want the right to leave those cables in operation, even after giving back the floor.
- 1.8 Risers and Other Passages. The tenant may want to use riser spaces, shafts, chambers and chases to run ducts, pipes, wires and cables. Although, conceptually, limiting each tenant to its proportionate share of this space seems fair, such a limitation may not allow the tenant to meet its needs, especially if the landlord's building is inadequate (as a whole) to meet the needs of modern tenants. Try to have conduits and risers exclusively allocated to the tenant, not shared. At a minimum, try to control who else may use them and how. The tenant may want the right to control access to any conduits and risers serving the tenant. Provisions concerning riser use may need to be coordinated with those concerning telecommunications access. The entire area of telecommunications is one where many landlords ignore applicable provisions of federal law that mandate free access. Instead, landlords seek to impose restrictions and fees that may simply be void.
- 1.9 Hoist. The tenant may want the right to install and use an outside hoist. Conversely, if the landlord decides to install an outside hoist, the tenant may want the right to use it, and the landlord should agree to remove it as promptly as possible. What will hoist usage cost? Try to define or eliminate that cost.

- 1.10 Limit Fees. If the tenant agrees to reimburse the landlord for fees to its architects, engineers, or other consultants in connection with the landlord's review of any alterations, the tenant will want to limit or negotiate those fees. More generally, assuming the tenant uses its own architect and the tenant's architect is competent and licensed, why should the tenant agree to pay the landlord's architect at all?
- 1.11 Time to Remove Liens. If the tenant's work produces liens, the tenant will want enough time to remove them, taking into account procedural requirements of applicable law and related delays. The landlord should agree not to pay any lien that the tenant has bonded or is otherwise actively and diligently contesting in compliance with the lease.
- 1.12 Right to Finance Alterations. The tenant may want the right to finance alterations, perhaps even on a secured or quasi-secured basis. Require the landlord to assist the tenant's lender as needed, such as by signing landlord's waivers, or at least subordinations. Consider attaching the required form of waiver or subordination to the lease. If the landlord will not let the tenant grant liens to secure equipment financing, perhaps ask the landlord to provide the financing instead, with repayment built into the rent or documented separately.
- 1.13 Bonds. If the lease requires the tenant to obtain any type of bond relating to payment for alterations, ask a bonding company whether the tenant can actually obtain the bond in question. Often the answer will be no.

2. Alterations (Initial Occupancy)

- 2.1 Initial Criteria and Specifications. State the criteria and specifications for the landlord's initial construction of the building, common areas, parking lot and any related improvements that concern the tenant in any way -- not just limited to the premises. Will the landlord upgrade any systems or other tenancies? Request that the landlord configure the space so the tenant can easily sublease, demise or break up the space. Avoid including anything burdensome in the space such as bathrooms, HVAC or parking lots.

- 2.2 Entering Premises Before Lease Commencement. The tenant may want the right to enter the premises before the lease “commences”— even if the tenant will have a free rent period after “commencement.” The tenant may want to use that pre-commencement period to start preparing the space for the tenant’s needs. In that time, the tenant may need to take deliveries of building materials and equipment. Where will those deliveries go? Don’t let the landlord charge for storing them.
- 2.3 Landlord’s Space Preparation. The lease should define how the landlord will prepare the space for the tenant, including the landlord’s responsibilities for asbestos abatement or removal, demolition, re-fireproofing, floor leveling, and closing of floor penetrations. Does the space contain any unusual existing improvements, such as vaults, that the tenant will want the landlord to remove? What level of completion must the landlord achieve? An architect’s certificate? A certificate of occupancy? Temporary? Permanent?
- 2.4 Delayed Completion. If the landlord’s work is late or defective, treat this as a failure to deliver possession, or at least provide meaningful consequences, typically day-for-day additional free rent after delivery that escalates (e.g., two days free for each day of delay) if the delay continues. Try to extend the free rent period by the time spent for landlord’s turnaround/responses for plans and any other approvals required to be issued, and for as long as any violations exist that delay the tenant’s work. Require the landlord to give regular progress reports and estimated completion dates to create accountability for delays. So long the landlord has open building permits that prevent the tenant from obtaining a permanent Certificate of Occupancy, ask the landlord to pay for the renewal fees for the tenant’s temporary Certificate of Occupancy.
- 2.5 Right To Re-measure. Allow the tenant to re-measure the square footage of the premises when the landlord has finished its work, at least for a new building or extensive remodeling. (In the alternative, consider prohibiting any re-measurement by either party. Is a later re-measurement more likely to produce an increase or a decrease in rent?)
- 2.6 Existing Violations. The landlord should agree to cure any existing violations against the building that may prevent or interfere with the tenant’s intended alterations, or create issues when the tenant tries to obtain a building permit. It is up to the tenant's experts to determine whether any such violations exist and whether they would, in fact, interfere with the tenant's work. They very well might not.

2.7 Credit Issues. Is the landlord creditworthy? If the landlord fails to build out or contribute to the tenant's work, what can the tenant do? Most leases say that the landlord has no liability beyond its interest in the premises, if that. At a minimum, the tenant will want a right to offset against rent—with a “default interest” factor—for any landlord contribution not paid or work not performed after a substantial cure period. The tenant will also want to assure that its offset right remains valid if the landlord's lender forecloses against the property. Toward that end, the tenant might consider whether an “offset” right is such a good idea, given that most nondisturbance agreements provide that a foreclosing lender will not be bound by any “offset” rights in the lease. Instead, the tenant might want to replace the “offset” for nonperformance with language that gives the landlord an opportunity to increase the rent payable for the space if and only if the landlord does what the landlord was supposed to do. This may produce a better result for the tenant (than an “offset” right would) under nondisturbance agreements. If the landlord has a construction loan in place for the very purpose of paying for the tenant's improvements, the tenant could seek a direct right to receive those advances as part of negotiating the nondisturbance agreement with the lender. The feasibility of such arrangements will depend on state law on permitted uses of building loan proceeds.

2.8 Building Systems. Are the existing building systems adequate? Should the landlord agree to complete any upgrades? By when? Should the landlord construct any new installations outside the tenant's premises? What about HVAC, fire safety or other system connections? Directional and wayfinding signage? Does the tenant have any special electrical requirements? Does the tenant require any space outside the premises to install electrical, communications or other equipment for its own use? A backup generator? Should the landlord install these things? Does the landlord have a backup generator that the tenant would like the right to use? A fuel tank that the tenant would like to use for its own backup generator? Think about future flexibility in these areas if the tenant's needs change. And if the tenant has a backup generator, will legal occupancy of the building in a blackout also require the landlord to have a backup generator for common areas? If so, the landlord needs to assume that obligation in the lease – in a meaningful way, without too many caveats, excuses and exculpations.

- 2.9 Staging or Storage Area. Will the tenant need any staging area, “lay-down” area, or storage area for its construction activities and move-in program? If the building has a loading dock, service elevator or outside hoist, the tenant may want the right to some guaranteed usage or priority, particularly while it moves in and out, without charge. Hourly rates for these services can otherwise be quite high.
- 2.10 Substantial Completion. If the landlord performs the tenant’s initial alterations, “substantial completion” should require the landlord to have installed and activated all communications systems, utilities and interior elevator service. Require the landlord to deliver a permanent certificate of occupancy if at all possible in the particular circumstances, because a temporary certificate of occupancy, which expires after 90 days (in New York City), may not suffice. Treatment of this issue will vary by location.
- 2.11 Rent Commencement. The tenant should not pay rent until particular anchor tenants are open for business; the landlord has finished specified construction, including common areas; and the landlord has paid the tenant the agreed construction cost reimbursement.
- 2.12 New York City Commercial Rent Tax. New York City commercial tenants, in certain areas of the city, pay a “commercial rent tax” that is almost unheard of outside New York City. When it applies, it equals 6% of base rent. It supplements the City’s efforts to collect in real estate taxes about 30% of gross rent, an aggregate burden equal to about 36% of gross rent before even considering federal, state and city income taxes. In a particularly formalistic (or “creative”) application of that tax, city tax officials impose a commercial rent tax on the rent that a tenant would have paid but for an express rent credit that the lease gives the tenant to compensate the tenant for work it did in building out its space. The city treats that credit as if it were a “deemed” payment of rent, hence a taxable event — ignoring the fact that the credit probably results in some other taxable increase in the stated rent under the lease. If the parties achieve the same economic result through a free rent period or some other dollar adjustment of the rent not expressly tied to the cost of the tenant’s work, the rent forgone does not trigger a commercial rent tax. So a wise New York City tenant will ask for a free rent period or a general rent abatement rather than a rent credit tied in any way to the cost of the tenant's alterations.

- 2.13 Tenant's Build-Out Allowance. If the tenant performs initial alterations for its space, then allow the tenant to apply its build-out allowance to any "hard" or "soft" costs. When the tenant finishes its work, if any allowance remains the landlord should disburse it directly to the tenant or as the tenant directs. If the landlord fails to disburse any allowance within some reasonable period (e.g., 90 days) after the tenant properly requests it, then allow the tenant to abate rent to recover the amount due, with interest at some high rate. Focus on simplifying and speeding up the tenant's work allowance disbursement procedures, by, for example, defining the exact paper required to release funds and having the landlord create an escrow account at lease signing for the tenant's work allowance. Prevent delays by not letting the landlord condition releases on prior lender disbursements or third party approvals.
- 2.14 Simultaneous Work. Prohibit the landlord from doing any non-emergency work in or affecting the space while the tenant performs its initial build-out. If the landlord must enter the tenant's space to perform any work during the tenant's build-out, all landlord's work must conform to the tenant's and its contractors' reasonable instructions and timing requirements.
- 2.15 Tax Implications of Build-Out Allowances. When a landlord contributes funds to a tenant's alterations, that payment may create immediate taxable income to the tenant, though the landlord cannot recoup the same outlay except through depreciation on a schedule of up to 39 years, regardless of the lease term. Only the Internal Revenue Service wins. The tenant may wish to negotiate instead that the landlord owns (and depreciates) the tenant's improvements for tax purposes, in exchange for some other benefit to the tenant. As an alternative, the parties might characterize the allowance as reimbursement for current expenses, such as the tenant's cost of moving, buying out its existing lease, or purchasing tangible personal property like furniture, fixtures or equipment. Although the tenant may still suffer taxable income, the recharacterization will improve the landlord's position by giving the landlord either a current deduction or a much shorter depreciation period. The parties can shift this benefit to the tenant by adjusting other economics of the lease. Have an engineer or appraiser prepare a cost segregation study to determine which property can be depreciated over such shorter periods. If the amounts are significant, involve a tax lawyer to consider possible tax mitigation or deferral.

2.16 Permitting Process. The landlord should authorize and designate the tenant to sign permit applications on the landlord's behalf.

2.17 Warranties. If the landlord performed the tenant's installation construction, the landlord should assign all construction warranties to the tenant or make the same warranties to the tenant.

3. Assignment And Subletting: Consent Requirements

3.1 Landlord's Consent. Ideally, allow the tenant to assign or sublet without the landlord's approval. This seems particularly justified under particular circumstances where governing law prohibits giving any prior notice of a transaction, such as securities laws prohibiting prior notice of a merger. At a minimum, the landlord should not unreasonably withhold its consent. Try to set standards for reasonableness. Try to provide that the landlord's consent will be automatically given if the proposed transaction meets specified objective and easy criteria (e.g., net worth, reputation, no felony convictions, experience and proposed use). In the case of a sublease, the amount of subrent to be paid should not be a permitted criterion for approving subleases. The tenant must keep paying the landlord's rent no matter what, so why should the subrent matter, unless the landlord proposes to lower the rent to match the subrent?

3.2 Assignment vs. Subletting. Don't assume the conditions and procedures for assignment and subletting should always match. Even if the lease tightly restricts assignment, a tenant should often have much more flexibility on subletting.

3.3 Simple Approval Procedure. Make the approval process as simple and expeditious as possible. And try to complete it early in the assignment or subletting process. Instead of requiring the tenant to submit to the landlord fully executed assignment or subletting documents, ask the landlord to agree to approve or disapprove the transaction in principle — before the tenant even starts its marketing — based solely on the tenant's anticipated pricing. As a fallback, defer the landlord's approval only until the tenant has delivered a term sheet, the identity of a proposed assignee or subtenant and (in the case of an assignment only) financial information about the proposed assignee. These early clearance procedures seem particularly appropriate if the landlord can recapture the space if the tenant proposes an assignment or subletting.

- 3.4 Consent Form. Attach as an exhibit the required landlord's consent form to any transfer. Goal: prevent the landlord from adding new conditions and restrictions when consenting to a particular transaction. Although such conditions and restrictions may not conform to the lease, the tenant may agree to them because there is no choice or simply because the tenant is/was not paying careful enough attention (or saving money on lawyers) at the time. The consent form should include language allowing the tenant to assign to any subtenant or assignee all of the tenant's rights against the landlord.
- 3.5 Carve-Out for Affiliates. Expressly permit any assignments and subleases to affiliates (defined as broadly as possible) or successors, or in connection with the sale of the tenant's business. If the tenant operates multiple locations, a "sale of business" should include the sale of a single location or, worst case, some reasonable group of locations. Define "affiliate" to include trusts, estates and foundations in which the tenant or its officers are involved. The lease should impose no burdens at all (brokerage commissions, recapture or consent rights, pricing constraints and the like) for affiliate transactions. For an affiliate transaction, the tenant should merely agree to notify the landlord of the transaction—nothing more.
- 3.6 Suppliers, Vendors, Customers And Others. Let the tenant sublet (or license space) to its suppliers, vendors, or customers, as appropriate for the tenant's business convenience. Will the tenant or its principals form joint ventures or other new businesses (e.g., "new business incubators") that should have the right to share the tenant's space without any need for landlord approval? Today multiple companies are collaborating on projects more than in the past, and the lease should not stand in the way.
- 3.7 Lender Approval Requirements. The lease should not require approval from the landlord's lender for subleases or assignments. If it does, get copies of the loan documents, check them for lender approval requirements and insist on limiting (or at least receiving copies of) any burdensome changes in lender approval requirements in future refinancings.

- 3.8 Licensees. The tenant should not need the landlord's consent to grant bona fide concessions or licenses.
- 3.9 Prohibited Transfers. Try to persuade the landlord to commit to providing notice and an opportunity to cure if the tenant violates a lease restriction on transfer. Just like any other default under the lease, a tenant can and should have the right to cure that default — in this case by rescinding the transfer. The landlord will probably ask that the right to cure apply only to innocent or minor transfers, thus raising a factual dispute likely to create more trouble than it's worth.
- 3.10 Recapture Of Premises. If the tenant requests approval of an assignment or subletting but the landlord elects to "recapture" the space, the tenant may want to have the right to withdraw the request. If the landlord recaptures the premises for any reason, the landlord should reimburse the unamortized cost of the tenant's furniture, furnishings, equipment and improvements. Any recapture notice by the landlord must be accompanied by mortgagee consent to be effective. If the landlord elects not to exercise a recapture right, then the landlord should not unreasonably withhold consent to the tenant's proposal.
- 3.11 Assignment/Sublet Involving Other Tenants. The landlord should consent in advance to any assignment or subletting between this tenant and other tenants in the building, whether this tenant provides or receives additional space. Ask the landlord to waive in advance, for the benefit of this tenant, any provisions in other tenants' leases that would prohibit or limit such transactions or discussions, including recapture rights, profit participation and consent requirements.
- 3.12 Divestiture. If the tenant must (or "agrees to") sell a location to satisfy a divestiture requirement under antitrust law, that should not require the landlord's consent or entitle the landlord to any rights.
- 4. Assignment and Subletting: Implementation
- 4.1 Assignor and Guarantor Protections. As a general legal proposition, when the tenant assigns the lease, the original tenant remains liable for any default by the current assignee, or any later assignee. To facilitate future transactions, the tenant may want to try to mitigate that long-term post-assignment exposure, as it may severely constrain the tenant's flexibility when negotiating a future assignment. Try to say that both the assignor and any lease guarantor have no more liability -- their liability terminates -- if the tenant assigns the lease and meets certain conditions, such as delivering a guarantor that meets an objective credit test (or at a minimum make sure the assignor's insolvency or other financial trouble does not create an Event of Default). If the tenant cannot obtain this protection, then the tenant may ultimately need to structure any future lease transfer as a sublease.

- 4.2 Guarantor Protections. Ask the landlord to agree to give any unreleased assignor (guarantor) notice of any assignee's default and an opportunity to cure it. In any such case, the assignor's guaranty liability would terminate if the landlord did not give the notice. An unreleased assignor (guarantor) might also want a right to obtain a "new lease" if the landlord terminates the lease and the unreleased assignor (guarantor) later performs the tenant's obligations.
- 4.3 Suretyship Language. If, after an assignment, the landlord and the assignee modify or extend the lease, a typical suretyship boilerplate provision in the lease may say that the unreleased assignor and its guarantor remain fully liable under the modification or extension. Although such boilerplate may make sense in the context of an affiliate guaranty, it makes no sense for an unreleased assignor of a lease where the assignee is an independent third party. Insist that in such case the assignor's and guarantor's liability will never exceed what it would have been under the original lease.
- 4.4 Stock Transfers. If a lease treats an equity transfer as an assignment for consent purposes, the lease should not then treat it that way for purposes of requiring the assignee to assume the lease, except where the equity consists of a general partnership interest in the tenant. Many landlords' forms are written in a way that might require such an assumption of liability. If the lease deems an equity transfer to constitute a lease assignment, the tenant should exclude mergers, consolidations, initial public offerings, any change of corporate control of a substantial operating company, transfers of publicly traded stock, the sale of all or substantially all of the tenant's assets (or of all assets within some particular category), transfers among affiliates and any transfer resulting from an exercise of remedies by a bona fide pledgee.

- 4.5 Assignment Of Security Deposit. A tenant will want the right to assign the security deposit to any assignee of the lease. If the security is a letter of credit, the landlord should cooperate in substituting one letter of credit for another (so two letters of credit are never both outstanding at once) if the tenant assigns the lease or changes banks.
- 4.6 Confidentiality. The landlord should agree to keep confidential any submission for approval of an assignee or subtenant, including any financial information that a prospective assignee or subtenant furnishes. Rather than provide for a future confidentiality agreement, build it right into the lease to prevent painful delays later as the result of trying to negotiate a confidentiality agreement. Such an agreement would include a requirement to return any confidential information if a transaction does not close. Similar requirements should apply for any final transfer documents delivered to the landlord.
- 4.7 Splitting The Lease. The tenant may want the right to sever a large lease into two or more separate and independent leases, to facilitate assignment in pieces -- a more flexible exit strategy. This could produce greater flexibility down the road and perhaps tax benefits depending on the particular circumstances. It also would, in the worst case, allow the tenant to "walk away" from one lease without imperiling the other lease, if the tenant can successfully resist the landlord's desire to cross-default the two leases. Any such cross-default would vitiate the lease-splitting effort.
- 4.8 Protections For Subtenants. The landlord should agree to give "nondisturbance" or "recognition" rights to subtenants if the subleasing transaction satisfies certain tests. Usually one of those tests will require that the subrent must equal or exceed the rent under the lease. Any such requirement makes the nondisturbance/recognition protections relatively worthless because they are so unlikely to ever apply. Instead, the tenant should insist that the landlord protect any subtenant whose subrent is at least "fair market." But what does "fair market" mean? Comparable existing rents? Advertised rents? The phrase invites disputes. In the alternative, if any such sublease ever becomes a direct lease with the landlord, then the rent might adjust to match the lease rent, although this might defeat the whole point as viewed by a prospective subtenant. The lease should also give subtenants as much flexibility as possible, perhaps the same flexibility as the tenant, on future assignments and subletting.

4.9 Participation In “Profits.” If the landlord will participate in any net “profits” that the tenant realizes from assignment or subletting, define the tenant’s costs as broadly and inclusively as possible. For example, include brokerage commissions, professional fees, build-out, costs (including rent payable to the landlord) of carrying the space vacant during a reasonable marketing period, any free rent period, transfer taxes, cost of furniture included in the transaction and the unamortized balance of the tenant’s original improvements to the space. Try to let the tenant claim all these deductions at the beginning of the sublease term, from the first subrent dollars received, rather than amortize them over the sublease term. If the landlord insists on amortization, then at least try to include an interest factor on the unamortized balance. If some of the payments from the assignee or subtenant cover personal property or a loan from the original tenant, try to exclude those payments from the tenant’s cash receipts. Once the “profit” for a sublease has been measured, the tenant should avoid paying the landlord’s share of it as a lump sum at the time of the subleasing—even with a discount factor—because the tenant may never see the alleged “profit.” Instead, any “profit” payments to the landlord should be due only to the extent the tenant actually receives the anticipated “profit.” If the subtenant or assignee defaults, allow the tenant to stop paying and perhaps even recalculate (and receive a suitable refund of) any payments already made.

4.10 Multiple Lease Transfers. If the landlord is entitled to a “profit” payment for any assignment or sublease, the tenant may want to negotiate a “basis adjustment” in the case of future transactions. For example, suppose an assignee pays $1 million for a lease assignment, and the landlord receives 50% of that payment. What happens when the new tenant, the assignee, later assigns that lease again? At that point, the landlord has already “taxed” the first $1 million of increased value of the tenant’s leasehold. The lease should let the assignee treat that lease purchase payment as part of the assignee’s cost of the lease when subleasing or assigning to someone else. The assignee tenant’s deductions should include any consideration that the tenant paid to acquire the lease, straight-lined, possibly with an interest component, over the remaining term of the lease.

- 4.11 Minimum Subrent. The lease should not prohibit the tenant from subletting its space for less than the current stated rent, because that's exactly what the tenant will very likely need to do.
- 4.12 Bills and Administration. If the tenant sublets, try to have the landlord agree to bill the subtenant directly for any services the landlord provides to the subtenant and any other landlord sundry charges that apply to the subleased part of the premises. Although the tenant cannot expect to be relieved of liability for these charges if the subtenant does not pay, the tenant can avoid time and effort, and probably an endless series of billing errors and inconsistencies, by extricating itself from the billing process. The same goes for any other function—e.g., requesting overtime HVAC or other building services—where the tenant might otherwise act as a mere communications channel between subtenant and landlord. The tenant will still want to see copies of bills and prompt notices of unpaid amounts to avoid unpleasant surprises.
- 4.13 Guarantor. If the tenant can assign without the landlord's consent, the tenant also needs the right to replace any guarantor with a replacement guarantor that meets certain criteria. If the assignee delivers such a replacement guarantor—or if the landlord consents to an assignment without requiring a new guarantor—the first guarantor should be released automatically.
- 4.14 Landlord as Sublease Broker. If the tenant cannot avoid having the landlord or its agent as the “broker” for a sublease or assignment, try to define the terms of that brokerage engagement and consider all the usual brokerage issues, starting with the formula for the commission. In particular, no commission should ever be payable absent an actual closing and delivery of all required consents and third-party documents. Consider how to make the tenant comfortable that the broker will not “favor” any direct space then available in the building.

5. Bills and Notices

- 5.1 When Notice Is Required. Define when notice is required, but also try to limit when notice is necessary. The tenant should not have to comply with notice clauses if the tenant is sending, for example, only plans for approval, ordinary communications about the construction process, disbursement requests and the like. The lease should require compliance with formal (and tedious) notice procedures only for notices that could give rise to meaningful rights and remedies under the lease.

- 5.2 Attorneys And Managing Agents. Let attorneys and managing agents give notices on behalf of their clients. This should apply not only to any attorney or managing agent identified in the lease, but also to any future replacement, whether or not the party making the change has formally notified the other party of the change.
- 5.3 Copies. If the landlord gives the tenant any notice, the landlord should agree to give a copy to the tenant's central leasing personnel, and perhaps to other specified recipients, such as counsel.
- 5.4 Delivery. The landlord should deliver formal notices by personal service or nationally recognized overnight courier. State when notices become effective. Establishing receipt of notice by email can be problematic. Emailed notices seem particularly likely to get lost in the abyss. Thus, the co-authors have traditionally disfavored allowing formal notices to be given by email. On the other hand, a large organization might set up a special address for emailed notices and nothing else, with the idea that someone will check that address regularly and pay attention to, and act on, all incoming email. One could also perhaps live with email notices by establishing some reliable mechanism to assure that the notices were in fact received.
- 5.5 Notices Before and After Lease Commencement Date. Until the lease commencement date, the landlord should agree to deliver all notices to the tenant's existing address, not the premises under the new lease. Even after the commencement date, it may not make sense for formal legal notices to go to the new premises. For example, the tenant may have a central leasing office that should receive and handle all incoming notices. In those cases, do something about the typical lease language that allows the landlord, after lease commencement, to send all formal notices to the leased premises.
- 5.6 Delivery Notices. Require the landlord to give written notice of delivery of any part of the premises, with a "punchlist" of the work the landlord acknowledges remains incomplete. The premises should not be deemed delivered until the tenant has received that notice and, perhaps, a certain period of time has elapsed. The tenant may also want the notice not to become effective until the tenant has reasonably approved it. As a practical matter, a tenant is often not ready to begin using the space immediately after receiving it from the landlord. The more process, formalities and delay the tenant builds into the rent commencement date, the less rent the tenant will need to pay for space it is not ready to use.

5.7 Deemed Waivers. If the tenant will be deemed to have waived any claims because of its failure to assert them within a specified period (e.g., objections to the landlord's delivery of the premises), then the lease should require the landlord to remind the tenant of the deemed waiver provisions as part of the notice that triggers the waiver.

6. Building Security

6.1 Description Of Program. Describe (and require the landlord to provide) a security program in accordance with agreed criteria. The program could include package scanning and messenger interception, lobby attendant, the tenant's own lobby desk, security guards, keycards, night access doors and specified operating hours.

6.2 Tenant's Security. Let the tenant establish its own security system and connect that system to the landlord's system.

6.3 Windows Film. The tenant may want the right to install blast resistant glass or film on exterior windows.

6.4 New Measures. The landlord should be required to obtain the tenant's consent for any new security measures (e.g., messenger interception) or changes in existing measures. This would, for example, allow the tenant to prevent establishment of security measures if the tenant considered them superfluous and merely burdensome. The tenant should also seek the right to require changes to the landlord's security program if the tenant determines changes make sense. Set performance standards for the landlord's security program, such as maximum approval times or a requirement to hire more staff if lines chronically form. A tenant's exercise of these consent or control rights should impose no liability on that tenant for criminal actions of third parties or other adverse events.

7. Casualty

7.1 Right to Terminate. If a material casualty occurs and the landlord either cannot or does not restore the premises within a specified time period, or if the casualty occurs during the last two or three years of the lease term, let the tenant terminate the lease.

- 7.2 Adverse Impact on Business. Allow the tenant to terminate the lease or abate rent if a casualty or other event (e.g., a terrorist attack affecting some other building)—or restoration from any such casualty or other event—causes any temporary or permanent material change in the tenant’s permitted use (e.g., loss of nonconforming use status), access, parking, traffic volume, pedestrian volume or visibility of the premises.
- 7.3 Extent Of Restoration; Interaction With Loan Documents. Ideally, require the landlord to restore in all cases—whether or not the landlord has adequate insurance proceeds, i.e., whether or not the landlord decided to adequately insure the building. Perhaps, require the landlord to maintain a minimum required net worth or personal guaranty to cover the risk of insufficient insurance. Beware of the terms of subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreements, which may, in effect, modify the restoration requirements of the lease to match those of the loan documents. If the tenant negotiates a broad obligation to restore but the landlord’s loan documents let the lender take the money and run, then the tenant loses if, as often happens, the tenant agreed in a subordination, nondisturbance and attornment agreement that the loan documents would govern. A major tenant will usually not tolerate this possible outcome.
- 7.4 Abatement During Restoration. Try to abate rent, escalations, alteration fees and any other payments during all restoration — both the landlord’s and the tenant’s. Avoid any suggestion that rent abatement is available only to the extent that the landlord happens to receive rent insurance proceeds. It should be the landlord’s job to maintain suitable rent insurance. The tenant shouldn’t bear the risk of the landlord’s failure to do so. The landlord should refund prepaid rent and other items. These measures will often be a “win-win” for both parties, because the landlord often can insure the loss (on a property-wide basis) more easily, economically, consistently and reliably than can all the tenants individually.
- 7.5 Other Premises. If a casualty affects only improvements outside the tenant’s premises, don’t allow the landlord to terminate the tenant’s lease unless the landlord: (1) makes the tenant whole (e.g., reimburses the tenant’s amortized investment in the space); and (2) terminates all other similarly situated leases. And if the tenant's occupancy assumes the continued existence of other nearby buildings (such as a multi-building "retail mecca" destination), allow this tenant to terminate if some level of casualty affects those other buildings, even if it doesn't affect the tenant's building.

- 7.6 Landlord's Waiver Of Right To Sue. Even without a waiver of subrogation, the landlord should agree not to sue the tenant for negligently causing a casualty that a typical casualty insurance policy would have covered.
- 7.7 Lease Extension. Ask the landlord to agree to extend the lease termination date to compensate the tenant after a loss for any period when the tenant could not use and occupy the premises. Even if the lease terminates, if the premises are tenantable and may legally be occupied, seek some short extension of the lease term to give the tenant additional time to operate and ease the transition to new premises.
- 7.8 Time To Restore. Limit or perhaps even negate any landlord right to obtain an extension of time to restore in the case of a force majeure event. The tenant might reasonably take the position that the tenant simply doesn't want to wait around very long to see if the landlord decides to, and does successfully, restore.
- 7.9 Insurance Program. The entire discussion of casualty and restoration really relates to insurance more than space leasing. Who will insure what? Can tenant self-insure? (Probably yes, if credit-worthy.) Risks and responsibilities on casualty and restoration should match the insurance program. And because insurance is supposed to remove "negligence" from the discussion by shifting it to an insurance carrier, either party's "negligence" shouldn't change how the lease treats these issues.
- 8. Condemnation
- 8.1 Partial. Require the landlord to restore the premises in the case of a partial condemnation, at least to the extent of available condemnation proceeds. If the partial condemnation affects the premises or more than some percentage of the whole building, the tenant may still want the right to terminate the lease.

- 8.2 Separate Claim. A tenant wants to be able to submit a separate claim to the condemning authority for: (1) the value of the leasehold estate; and (2) moving expenses, trade fixtures, goodwill, advertising and printing costs, phone lines and damages for interruption of business. Landlords and lenders rarely tolerate item (1) but may accept it provided that the tenant's award does not diminish sums payable to the landlord and its lender.
- 8.3 Physical Impairments. The tenant may want a right to terminate or abate rent if any condemnation, including a road widening or other change, materially and adversely affects the tenant's business, such as by impairing parking, access (e.g., loss of curb cuts), traffic volume, or visibility. Similarly, if a condemnation affects nearby property within a multi-building "retail mecca" destination project, then the tenant may want the right to terminate, even if the condemnation doesn't affect the tenant's own building.
- 8.4 Landlord Participation. The landlord should agree not to instigate, support or cooperate in any condemnation or taking of the tenant's leasehold interests, rights under a reciprocal easement agreement or any other interest in the property. If the landlord violates that prohibition (for example, if the landlord enlists a governmental authority to cut off the tenant's exclusivity rights to facilitate expansion of the landlord's regional mall, which has happened in a mall development variation of the Kelo case), then all rent should abate and the lease should allow the tenant to terminate and recover significant liquidated damages.
- 9. Consents
- 9.1 Quick Exercise. Require the landlord to grant or deny any required consent quickly. After a certain time, silence should be deemed consent. As a compromise, the tenant might agree to remind the landlord of the response deadline in its consent request or to give a reminder notice if the landlord has not responded within a certain time. Insist that no landlord consent may be unreasonably withheld. And if the landlord cannot unreasonably withhold consent, the lease should say, once, that the landlord also cannot unreasonably condition or delay consent.
- 9.2 Reasonableness vs. Objectivity. Legal documents often use "reasonable consent" as a technique to solve many problems. No one quite knows what it means, beyond inviting litigation. If particular categories of consent seem particularly problematic, consider defining “reasonableness,” by replacing the concept with objective standards that the tenant must meet in whatever matter would otherwise need the landlord’s “reasonable” consent. Then, instead of giving the landlord a “consent” right just give the landlord a “confirmation” right, i.e., the right to confirm that whatever the tenant wants to do does in fact meet the objective standards. If the landlord thinks it doesn’t, then the landlord bears the burden of saying why. Even with the issues that arise about the meaning of “reasonableness,” a tenant would prefer a landlord to agree to be reasonable, ideally about all consents in the lease, rather than not agree to be reasonable.

- 9.3 Expedited Dispute Resolution. Some major leases build in an expedited dispute resolution procedure for certain consents—assignments, subletting, and alterations—and even designate the third party who will decide the dispute. If that third party can’t serve, then the lease may designate alternatives. Reports from the field indicate that one of the great advantages of such expedited dispute resolution procedures is that they almost never actually get used.
- 9.4 Pre-Consent. Does the tenant anticipate any possible future changes in the tenant’s needs for which the tenant wants the landlord’s consent today (e.g., a pending merger, change of name, change of business)?
- 9.5 Grounds For Disapproval. If the landlord decides not to consent, then the landlord’s notice to that effect should specify all grounds for that failure, so the landlord can’t manufacture other grounds later. The tenant could go a step further and require that any notice of disapproval must also specify reasonable changes in the proposal that would lead the landlord to approve it.
- 9.6 Use of Name. The landlord should consent to the tenant’s use of the building’s name and likeness in the tenant’s promotional and publicity materials.
- 9.7 Site Plan. For new construction, the tenant may want the right to consent to the landlord’s site plan (particularly as it relates to parking) and any substantial changes.

- 9.8 Press Releases. The landlord should obtain the tenant’s approval of press releases, tombstones and announcements about the lease. The landlord should not disclose any terms of the lease without the tenant’s consent. Will the tenant want any such press release to identify—or not identify—the tenant’s broker, counsel, or other advisers? The lease should not preclude the tenant from posting the lease on any securities disclosure website, if legally required.
- 9.9 Tenant Consent Rights. Does any tenant anticipate any matters for which the landlord should seek the tenant’s consent, such as changes in building security? Indicate in the lease that such consent will be required.
- 9.10 Damages. For unreasonable denial of consent, try to trim back the standard lease language by which the tenant waives any right to recover damages. Perhaps the lease should allow the tenant to recover damages up to a specified dollar amount, or at least a reimbursement of the tenant’s attorneys’ fees in establishing that the landlord acted unreasonably. The tenant’s position seems particularly compelling where the lease requires the landlord’s consent in connection with the sale of the tenant’s business, and the landlord withholds consent—in violation of the lease—and thus derails the tenant’s entire transaction.
- 10. Defaults and Remedies
- 10.1 Notice and Opportunity To Cure. The tenant should have the right to notice of and the opportunity to cure any monetary or other default—including a prohibited transfer. Request a double cure period before the landlord can exercise its right to terminate the tenant’s lease. Why should lease termination be easy?
- 10.2 Default Triggered By Bankruptcy. Although “ipso facto” clauses are typically unenforceable against a debtor-tenant, beware of any event of default triggered by someone else’s bankruptcy, for example that of a guarantor. A landlord can typically declare and enforce any such event of default against the tenant without a problem. Conversely, if the tenant becomes subject to an involuntary bankruptcy but the guarantor steps up and reaffirms the guaranty (and remains in reasonable financial shape), then perhaps that should suffice to cure the default for all purposes.

- 10.3 Limited Liability. Limit the tenant's liability and the liability of the tenant's general partners to their interest in the lease. Allow for release of departing or deceased partners.
- 10.4 Limitation On Landlord's Remedies. Limit the landlord's remedies (for example, to exclude lease termination or eviction) for defaults or disputes below a threshold level of materiality. Request that the landlord obtain an order from the court before it can exercise any right to terminate the lease. Why should the risk of lease termination hang over the tenant for every possible lease default or alleged default and hence almost every conceivable (even minor) dispute with the landlord? Also, ask the landlord to waive any right to recover consequential damages from the tenant.
- 10.5 Nonmonetary Defaults. The tenant might want to eliminate all "nonmonetary" defaults. This can be accomplished by requiring the landlord to convert any "nonmonetary" default into a monetary default by curing it and sending the tenant a bill for reimbursement (a provision common in old Woolworth's leases—though apparently it was not enough to save the chain from oblivion). As an alternative, state that so long as the tenant remains current in its monetary obligations, the landlord cannot exercise certain remedies (e.g., lease termination) for a nonmonetary default until the landlord has obtained a court order. In practice, of course, a court will often put the landlord in the same position anyway, regardless of what the lease says, such as through the "Yellowstone" procedure in New York.
- 10.6 Future Equipment Financing. Require the landlord, as well as its mortgagee, to waive or subordinate any statutory or other liens on fixtures, equipment and other personal property of the tenant, either in all cases or if the tenant's asset-based lender or equipment lessor requests it. To allow such a lender or lessor to exercise its remedies and remove any financed equipment, the landlord should also agree to enter into a landlord's consent, joined in by the landlord's mortgagee. This document could give the lender a brief right to enter the premises after the lease terminates and the right to conduct an auction on the premises. Ideally, attach the form to the lease. Try to avoid requiring the lender or lessor to pay rent for any brief occupancy period. Just don't mention it, and try not to call it an extension of the lease.

- 10.7 Holdover Rent. Prorate holdover rent on a per diem basis for partial months, at least for the first month of holding over. As a practical matter, that may be the single most important concession for a tenant to request in the typical “boilerplate” of any lease, which will usually impose a full month’s holdover rent—often at double the contractual rent—for a day’s delay in departing. Establish a short-term right to hold over at the same rent, to give the tenant some flexibility in case of delays in relocating. Try to negate any holdover rent during some limited period, if the parties are negotiating a lease extension in good faith for the premises, or the tenant is diligently negotiating for space in another building. Try to eliminate holdover rent at any time when a new tenant is not ready to occupy the premises.
- 10.8 Mitigation Of Damages. The landlord must seek to mitigate damages. (New York still imposes no such requirement on commercial landlords.) For example, the landlord must try to re-let the premises.
- 10.9 Waiver Of Self-Help. Ask the landlord to waive any right of self-help (to retake possession) and any right to lock out the tenant.
- 10.10 Acceleration Of Rent. If the landlord has the right to accelerate all rent as liquidated damages, first try to eliminate this remedy, as it is “off market” even in the typically very landlord-friendly New York City market. If you can’t, seek the following: (1) the tenant gets credit for fair and reasonable rental value; and (2) the highest possible discount rate (for example, prime rate rather than four percent per annum).
- 10.11 Default By Subtenant. Extend the tenant’s cure period in the case of nonmonetary defaults arising from the actions of a subtenant. Try to give the tenant time to enforce the sublease and, if necessary, to obtain possession of the subleased premises. As long as the tenant is diligently exercising its rights against the subtenant – including through litigation – try to negate any risk of lease termination.
- 10.12 Statute of Limitations. Limit the landlord’s right to collect unbilled rent, particularly escalations, once a certain time has passed (e.g., 18 months).

10.13 Piercing the Veil. Require the landlord to waive any theory that might let the landlord “pierce the corporate veil” of the tenant named in the lease. The landlord should acknowledge it has no claims against the tenant’s principals or affiliates under any circumstances, including tort-based theories relating to the lease or the premises, except to the extent they have actually signed a guaranty. Recognize that the “corporate” or “limited liability company” separation may not be as sacrosanct as lawyers usually assume it is.

10.14 Reletting Costs. To the extent that the lease requires the tenant to reimburse the landlord’s cost to “relet” the space after the tenant’s default, try to limit that obligation to apply to only an equitable portion of the landlord’s reletting expenses. For example, perhaps the tenant should pay reletting costs only to the extent reasonably allocable to the reletting period within the original lease term. If the reletting covers one year of the remaining lease term and nine later years, the tenant should pay only 10% of the reletting costs.

11. Electricity

11.1 Totalized Submeter Readings. Landlord should totalize readings from multiple submeters, using a third-party service and appropriate security controls to limit access to submetering equipment and computers.

11.2 Usage Survey. Let either party, not just the landlord, initiate a usage survey. The tenant may want, or may want to require the landlord, to periodically test electrical submeters for accuracy and to make sure they are not charging the tenant for any power delivered to any areas outside the premises.

11.3 Rate For Submetered Electricity. The tenant should pay for submetered electricity using the same tariff under which the landlord purchases electricity. If the landlord purchases electricity from a private provider, the rate the tenant pays should not exceed the public utility’s rate. If the landlord is required to stop providing power to the premises (one of those many bizarre hypothetical possibilities that every significant lease seems to address, perhaps because it once happened somewhere somehow), then the landlord should pay the tenant for the conversion costs of obtaining alternate sources of power, and should not shut off power to the tenant until the conversion has taken effect.

- 11.4 Sufficient Wattage. The landlord should assure the tenant that the existing electrical system provides enough power for the tenant's present and anticipated needs, usually expressed in watts per usable (or sometimes rentable) square foot.
- 11.5 Additional Electrical Capacity. If needed, the tenant should be able to obtain more electrical capacity quickly, at a defined or ascertainable cost. The landlord should reserve a certain number of watts per foot for the tenant, even if the tenant will not need it at first. If the tenant later needs more electricity but the building has no available capacity, the resulting delays in obtaining additional capacity may hurt the tenant's business. And the additional capacity will probably cost more than anyone expected. It may, among other things, require the landlord to provide additional mechanical space outside the premises, and the lease should provide for that.
- 11.6 Location for Power Delivery. Specify the delivery point for electrical power.
- 11.7 Tenant's Backup Power Generator. Let the tenant install a backup power generator and fuel tank, or other arrangements for fuel storage and refueling. Allocate ownership, responsibilities (including responsibilities for regular testing and refueling) and costs between the landlord and the tenant. Give the tenant the right, but not the obligation, to remove this equipment at the end of the lease term. If a tenant installs its own generator, it will want the right to have 24/7 access to the generator and any related equipment (fuel tank, meters, piping, etc.) without needing to go through the landlord's personnel. Even if the landlord generally arranges to keep the building fuel tank full, in a blackout or other emergency, the tenant will want the right to refill the fuel tank itself. If the tenant installs a backup power generator for its space, the landlord needs to have, maintain, operate and adequately fuel a backup power generator for the common space in the building. Without that, the fire department may shut down the building and make the tenant move out even though the tenant has its own separate backup power generator.
- 11.8 Backup Electrical Operation. The landlord should give the tenant prior notice before any scheduled electrical shutdown or testing of the landlord's backup power generators. Limit the frequency of shutdowns and the periods when the landlord can test its backup power generators. These generators, when running, can make as much noise as jet engines.

- 11.9 Building Generator. Give the tenant the right to use the building generator. The landlord should reserve a certain amount of generator capacity for the tenant and agree to keep the fuel tanks full. The tenant may also want the right to monitor the landlord's generator maintenance and testing activities. A landlord will usually expect the tenant to reimburse a share of these costs, but that is ultimately a business negotiation.
- 11.10 Capacity. Allow the tenant to reserve additional riser space and additional capacity in the bus duct or other main electrical distribution system.
- 11.11 Retroactivity. Try to limit the period in which the landlord can retroactively bill the tenant for increased rates or usage.
- 11.12 Auditing. Allow the tenant to audit electrical bills, the same way the tenant can audit operating expenses, and perhaps under similar procedures, including an obligation for the landlord to pay for the audit if it reveals discrepancies above a certain level. The tenant should also have the right to request that a qualified third party periodically check the landlord's meters for accuracy.
- 11.13 Maintenance. Require the landlord to maintain and periodically calibrate any submeters and maintain evidence that the landlord has done so.
- 11.14 Termination Right. If the landlord terminates electric service (which many leases allow the landlord to do) and the tenant cannot get replacement service on comparable terms and pricing, then allow the tenant to terminate. Consider whether the landlord should then reimburse the tenant's costs to relocate.

12. Elevators

- 12.1 Freight Elevators for Moving. Ask to use the freight elevators to move in and move out. The tenant should seek the use of several elevators—e.g., all the passenger elevators in the building—on weekends and at night for the same purposes. Ideally, all this elevator usage, or at least a certain number of hours of usage, should be free, both for the move in and the move out. A “move” should include the period of any construction, alterations or demolition plus the period when the tenant is moving its equipment, furniture and other personal property into the space.

- 12.2 Night Service. The lease should provide that “night service” for elevators (restricted or limited service) cannot begin before a specified time. Require the landlord to have a minimum number of elevators in service at all times.
- 12.3 Changing Elevator Banks. Prohibit the landlord from reconfiguring elevator banks. If the tenant’s space is the first stop, it should remain so.
- 12.4 Exclusive Service. The tenant may want exclusive elevator service for certain floors. The tenant may want idle cars parked at, or returned to, the tenant’s floor for the tenant’s convenience.
- 12.5 Routine Repairs. Require the landlord to perform routine elevator repairs and maintenance only outside business hours and within a certain turnaround time (shorter if multiple elevator cars are out of order).
- 12.6 Waiting Time. Specify the maximum average waiting time for elevators. Establish measures to monitor elevator performance. In particular, a major office tenant might require the landlord to install in the ground floor elevator lobby a video display showing the elevator system and the status of each car. This would give the most likely critics of elevator performance—people waiting for an elevator—an immediate ability to know what to complain about (e.g., too many cars out of service). Establish consequences if elevator performance falls short of agreed benchmarks.
- 12.7 Security Measures. Does the tenant want to institute any special security measures for the elevators? For example, does the tenant want to require keycard access controls for its own floor(s), or at least some of them?
- 12.8 Service Contract. Require the landlord to maintain an elevator service contract that obligates the maintenance contractor to respond to a stuck elevator within a certain very short time frame.

13. End Of Term

- 13.1 Duty To Restore. The tenant will want to disclaim any obligation to restore (i.e., remove the tenant's alterations) at the end of the lease term. As a compromise measure, the tenant might agree to remove any of the tenant's improvements that are unusual, particularly difficult to remove, or improperly made, or if the landlord reasonably required restoration as a condition to consenting to the tenant's work. But, what's "reasonable"? Instead, try to specify an objective test for determining what the tenant must remove. It may make sense to attach an exhibit, defining specific items that the tenant must remove at the end of the term. The lease might still need to deal with possible additions to the list if the tenant does more work later in the lease term. Require the landlord to give a reminder notice at least a certain number of months, but no more than some shorter number of months, before the end of the lease term if the landlord intends to enforce the restoration requirement.
- 13.2 Restoration. If the tenant must restore, let the tenant: (1) perform any necessary restoration rather than pay the landlord to do it; (2) enter the premises on favorable terms for some reasonable time after the end of the lease term as needed; (3) during the post-term restoration period, pay only an equitable per diem payment (or nothing at all) rather than holdover rent; and (4) meet only a "substantial completion" standard rather than a higher standard that might apply to delivery of new space. Once the tenant notifies the landlord that the work is done, the landlord should have a short time to object. Silence should be deemed approval. Require the landlord to specify all objections, in reasonable detail, within the objection period. If the landlord's objections are minor and the tenant resolves them within a reasonable period, then the tenant should no longer be required to pay any rent (if the tenant agreed to pay any rent) during the post-term restoration period.
- 13.3 Condition Of Returned Premises. The tenant should have no duty to return the premises in any particular condition. For example, it should have no obligation to replace a worn-out compressor in the last year of the lease term. And any requirement for the tenant to "repair any damage" caused by its departure just asks for trouble, with no corresponding genuine benefit to the landlord.
- 13.4 Removal Of Personal Property and Confidential Information. Let the tenant enter the premises for a short time after the lease expires to remove the tenant's personal property. Tenants with heightened concern about confidential information may want the landlord to agree not to remove any computers or files from the premises, even after the lease terminates, without giving the tenant one last chance to come and get them. If the tenant doesn't do that, then the tenant might go a step further and insist that the landlord store them at the tenant's expense for some reasonable period.

- 13.5 Demolition Clause. If the tenant cannot negotiate away a demolition clause, then don't allow the landlord to terminate under that clause unless the landlord: (1) gives reasonable notice; (2) acts in good faith; (3) gives termination notices under all other leases where the landlord has the right to do so; (4) has entered into a binding noncancellable demolition agreement or contract to sell the building to a developer; and (5) deposits the lease termination payment in escrow. If the tenant can think of anything else to require, the tenant should do so, all toward the goal of delaying the lease termination as long as possible. The tenant might even try to require that the landlord has obtained a demolition permit before the landlord can terminate the lease – a requirement that in some municipalities could never be satisfied as long as the tenant remains in possession. This requirement would also not make sense if the landlord sells to a developer and needs to vacate the building before closing.
- 13.6 “For Rent” Signs. The landlord should not post “for rent” signs until the lease term has actually ended. The landlord should agree to remove any “for rent” signs as soon as the landlord has signed a new lease for the space, or perhaps even when the landlord and the next tenant have entered into a nonbinding term sheet.
- 13.7 New Location Sign. For a reasonable time after the lease has terminated, the tenant may want the right to install a sign directing customers to the tenant's new location.
- 13.8 Prepaid Rent. Upon any termination not arising out of the tenant's default, the landlord must promptly refund prepaid rent and other payments, with accrued interest. If the landlord doesn't do it promptly, perhaps charge an administrative fee.
- 13.9 Subtenant Problems. Sometimes a tenant cannot vacate solely because a subtenant fails to surrender its own subleased premises, which might consist of only a small part of the tenant's premises. To protect the tenant in such a case, try to limit the tenant's liability, by limiting such liability only to the part of the premises that the subtenant failed to surrender or, at most, to the entire floor that includes those premises. Absent such a concession, the tenant may find itself liable for holdover rent for an entire multi-floor leased premises, even though the tenant moved out and the subtenant's holdover affects only a tiny corner of one floor. Tenants should understand this risk when evaluating prospective subtenants and negotiating subleases. As one way to mitigate the risk, the tenant might have the sublease expire six months before the main lease, at which point the tenant would require the subtenant to deliver appropriate estoppel certificates and other assurances (such as an increased security deposit or a stipulated judgment of eviction) to back its obligation to vacate, and the sublease might convert to a license arrangement. A strong tenant might ask the landlord to agree to bear the risk of subtenant holdover.

13.10 Receipt And Release. Require the landlord to issue a receipt and release upon request at the end of the lease term.

13.11 Inspection. Require that the parties jointly inspect and photograph the premises at the end of the lease term to identify, in a written punchlist, any issues the landlord intends to raise. If the landlord doesn't photograph and raise them at the inspection, then the landlord can't raise the issues later.

13.12 Holdover Right. Negotiate the right to a brief holdover when the tenant cannot timely move out. This would typically require some prior notice from the tenant, so the landlord can plan its re-leasing and marketing program for the space.

14. Escalations (Generally)

14.1 Proportionate Share Computation. In computing the tenant's proportionate share, if the rentable square footage (the numerator) includes the tenant's share of the common areas, confirm that the denominator also includes all common areas. If the square footage of the building increases, then the denominator should also increase accordingly. Exclude basement and mezzanine space from the numerator. Avoid contributing to the landlord's land banking or costs of carrying dead space.

14.2 Over-Reimbursement. Do all of the tenants' percentages add up to 100 percent, or is the landlord being over-reimbursed for escalations? Are the anchor tenants paying their share, or is that share being shifted to the other tenants? If the latter, this tenant probably can't do anything about it, but may want to take the cost shifting into account in negotiating other terms of the lease.

- 14.3 Mixed Uses. In a mixed-use building, including office with retail on the ground floor, does the landlord treat all tenant types the same way or at least equitably? Should the landlord do that? Should certain parts of the project be excluded from the tenant's escalation formulas? More generally, the existence of multiple uses in the same building can make any allocations much harder to understand and much more subjective, i.e., it creates much more room for abuse and makes the abuse that much harder to find. If possible, the tenant should contribute only to an allocation of costs within the particular single-use component of the project that the tenant actually occupies. The tenant may want to go a step further and negotiate a fixed contribution to expenses, or even a "gross" rent number.
- 14.4 Occupiable Space. The lease should allocate escalations based on occupiable space (as the denominator), not occupied space. Let the landlord pay the full operating costs for all unoccupied space.
- 14.5 Multiple Escalations. The lease should not allow multiple escalations that give the landlord duplicative recoupment of a cost increase, or double-count any charges included in operating expenses or elsewhere. For example, the marketing director's salary should be either an operating expense or a charge to the marketing fund, but not both. Anything treated as "real estate taxes" should not also be treated as "operating expenses." These principles can be expressed both generically and by combing through and comparing the various definitions, watching for overlap.
- 14.6 Lease Termination Mid-Year. Apportion escalations if the lease terminates during a calendar year. Otherwise, the landlord could argue that annual calculation procedures and payment schedules obligate the tenant to contribute to an entire year's escalations.
- 14.7 "Base Year." Any "base year" should fully include all expenses. Did the landlord not yet incur any ordinary expenses in the base year? Did any exclusions apply? Was the landlord not providing full building services? Was the building new, so the landlord could rely on contractors' warranties instead of paying for regular repair and maintenance?

- 14.8 Cap On Escalations. The tenant might try to negotiate an annual limit on escalations—either a specific dollar figure, a percentage, a percentage of the consumer price index (CPI), or the comparable cost increases in a “basket” of comparable buildings, if such information can be obtained.
- 14.9 Free Rent Period. Does the “free rent” period apply to escalations or just base rent?
- 14.10 “Porter’s Wage” Escalation. For “porter’s wage” escalations (relatively rare in modern leases), the lease should exclude fringe benefits and the value of “time off.” Try to limit the measure to reflect only the base hourly rate. If you cannot exclude fringe benefits, try to define how to calculate them.
- 14.11 Consumer Price Index Adjustment. To the extent that lease includes a CPI adjustment, try to have that adjustment measure any increase consistently from the starting year of the lease, rather than from the preceding year’s CPI. This will usually work better for the tenant, as it will give the tenant the benefit of intervening decreases in the CPI. The adjustment clause should specify exactly which CPI index the lease intends to use and what happens if that index stops being issued.
- 14.12 Escalations Below Base. State that if an escalation amount falls below the original base, the tenant should receive a credit against fixed rent.
- 14.13 Fixed Rent Increases. To avoid controversy over calculating escalations, negotiate fixed rent increases in place of all pass-throughs of expenses. This may be a new trend, particularly in place of an escalation for operating expenses.
- 14.14 Waiver Of Escalations. The landlord should waive any escalations not billed within a certain period.
- 14.15 Fair Market Rent. If the lease provides for a “fair market rent” adjustment, how will the rent increase after the appraisal date? The appraisers can either determine the amount of future increases (as part of determining “fair market rent”) or assume certain future increases in their analysis. Many leases leave it open-ended, creating the possibility that the appraisers will determine a current “fair market rent” and then the landlord will be able to pile on future increases.

15. Estoppel Certificates and Other Confirmations

15.1 By Whom. Both the landlord and the tenant should agree to furnish estoppel certificates. How often?

15.2 Who Can Rely. Allow subtenants and assignees to rely on the landlord’s estoppel certificate, not just lenders. If the tenant delivers an estoppel certificate, negate any right for the landlord to rely on it; allow only third parties to rely on it.

15.3 Form. Attach an acceptable form of estoppel certificate as an exhibit to prevent subsequent issues or creative efforts by the landlord or its future lenders to turn future estoppel certificates into lease amendments (e.g., environmental indemnities or lender protection agreements without tenant protections). Limit the assurances the tenant must provide, both substantively and by adding “knowledge” requirements and as many other qualifiers as possible. Avoid restating any lease terms, except where they can’t be determined from the face of the lease, such as the actual commencement date if uncertain. Tell the lender, or anyone else relying on an estoppel certificate, to read the lease. They should rely on the estoppel certificate only for comfort that the landlord and the tenant have not secretly amended the lease and to confirm facts outside the four corners of the lease. Issuance of an estoppel certificate should not preclude the tenant from making audit corrections in the ordinary course, if the time to request an audit has not expired.

15.4 Legal Fees. Require the landlord to reimburse the tenant for the tenant’s reasonable legal fees in researching, reviewing and preparing future estoppel certificates.

15.5 “Knowledge.” Qualify appropriate sections of any estoppel certificate to apply only to the tenant’s knowledge, especially for issues of additional rent. Also, think about what “knowledge” means. Actual knowledge? As an alternative, say that the tenant reserves its rights on these claims. A typical 10-day requirement to deliver an estoppel certificate doesn’t give the tenant enough time to conduct adequate due diligence to knowingly surrender claims involving complicated and potentially debatable billing of operating expenses and utility charges. This is particularly true when the tenant is a large company with multiple departments involved in overseeing the lease.

15.6 Conflict Of Terms. If the estoppel certificate and the lease conflict, the lease should govern. The delivery of an estoppel certificate should not be deemed to waive or modify any rights or remedies of the tenant.

15.7 Failure To Sign. Negate any liability of the tenant (e.g., claims of “tortious interference”) if the tenant does not sign the estoppel certificate. Limit the landlord’s remedy to an injunction, a deemed estoppel or a nuisance fee. This is just like the landlord’s desire not to incur liability for derailing a transaction if the landlord unreasonably withholds consent to an assignment or transfer. And make sure the tenant has a reasonable turnaround time for any estoppel certificate, and the landlord cannot demand these certificates with an excessive frequency.

15.8 Commencement Date Letter. State that the parties will promptly sign a commencement date letter when the date has been determined, if the lease does not specifically define it.

16. Failure To Deliver Possession

16.1 Remedies. Let the tenant terminate or receive a substantial rent abatement if the landlord does not deliver possession by a certain date. Also try to get day-for-day, or better, rent credit for the delay. Require the landlord to pay for or provide temporary space or pay the tenant’s holdover damages in its present space. If the lease sets a formula for any payment or credit to the tenant for delayed delivery, courts may test it as “liquidated damages,” although when a New York court did so, that particular ruling was reversed on appeal.¹ Just in case, though, add the typical recitations that attempt to validate any liquidated damages clause. Beyond establishing consequences for the landlord’s failure to meet a delivery date, establish consequences if the landlord fails to meet individual interim milestones. Those milestones might relate, for example, to completion of HVAC upgrades or construction of demising walls, the walls that separate this tenant’s space from common areas and space leased to other tenants.

- 16.2 Lender's Approval. If the lease is conditioned on a lender's (or anyone else's) approval, set an outside date for approval and let the tenant terminate if the landlord misses that date. Try to have the landlord deliver the approval when the parties sign the lease, particularly if the tenant is under time pressure to resolve its occupancy arrangements.
- 16.3 Termination Of Lease. If the tenant terminates the lease because the landlord does not timely deliver possession or obtain any required approval, the landlord should refund all payments and redeliver any other documents (such as letters of credit) delivered on lease signing. Also ask the landlord to agree to compensate the tenant for the tenant's costs.
- 16.4 Late Delivery of Premises. The landlord should push back all rent abatements and adjustments as well as the expiration date (and base years, at some point) if the landlord delivers the space late.
- 16.5 Relocation. If possible, delete any clause that allows the landlord to relocate the tenant to other space. Otherwise, if the tenant agrees to give the landlord a right to relocate the tenant, require: (1) the new premises must be physically higher (or no more than ___ floors lower) than the existing premises; (2) the landlord must pay all direct and indirect relocation costs (e.g., new letterhead, announcements, rewiring costs); (3) the configuration, size and layout of the new premises must meet the tenant's reasonable approval; (4) the tenant need not relocate until the new premises are fully built out and legally occupiable, all at the landlord's expense; (5) a free rent period; and (6) instead of relocating, allow the tenant to terminate the lease, particularly if less than a certain period remains in the lease term. The landlord should also have no right to relocate the tenant more than once.
- 16.6 Seasonal Businesses. For seasonal businesses, the tenant may not want to be obligated to initially open for business just before its slow season. Try to control periods or dates during which the landlord may deliver the premises. A certain day of the week? Only outside the winter holiday season?
- 17. Fees And Expenses
- 17.1 Reasonableness. Limit fees and expenses to any that are reasonable, actual and out-of-pocket. Do not agree to allow fees "as established by landlord” or as “modified from time to time” or “based on landlord’s standard schedule.” The tenant should not be required to pay fees for any review of plans (or possible subtenants) by the landlord’s internal personnel, even if those persons are professionals.

17.2 Legal Fees And Expenses. Make the obligation to reimburse attorneys’ fees run both ways. Whoever prevails should recover attorneys’ fees, including the value of in-house counsel’s time. Exclude legal fees and expenses relating to a claimed default if no default exists or the landlord otherwise does not prevail.

17.3 Indemnification. The tenant should be responsible only for the direct consequences of its own acts and omissions. Keep any indemnity narrow. Negate tenant liability for consequential damages.

18. Heating, Ventilation And Air-Conditioning (HVAC)

18.1 Specifications. Specify required HVAC service, with variations by day of week and season, both during and outside business hours. Require the landlord to air-condition all interior public areas. Obtain the right to test air quality and other characteristics from time to time. Remember that HVAC includes “heating” and “ventilation,” not just air conditioning, so the specifications should address those services as well.

18.2 Rates. The lease should state the rates (and the basis of rates) for overtime HVAC. Squeeze out any profit component. If the landlord later charges any other tenant a lower rate, the landlord should agree to notify this tenant, and this tenant should get the benefit of that lower rate.

18.3 Installation. If the landlord must install any HVAC system, the lease should also require the landlord to get the system working properly. That means installing all meters, controls and thermostats, in locations satisfactory to the tenant and testing and balancing the system. Try to make this all a condition to the landlord’s delivery of the space, although some of the “testing and balancing” may need to await a change of seasons.

18.4 Allocation Of Charges. Allocate overtime HVAC charges among multiple simultaneous users. Otherwise, the landlord may charge each tenant the full cost to the landlord of providing overtime HVAC for the entire building.

- 18.5 Notice For Overtime. Minimize or eliminate any prior notice requirement for overtime HVAC. Even if the tenant misses the notice deadline, the landlord should agree to try to provide overtime HVAC.
- 18.6 Discount. The landlord should give the tenant a discount on overtime HVAC if the tenant commits in advance to specified levels of usage for a specified period. With sufficient notice, the tenant should still have the right to withdraw or change its usage commitment and later reinstate it.
- 18.7 Water Treatment. Require the landlord to add appropriate chemicals to any HVAC-related water lines to prevent pipe corrosion and system breakdowns. The landlord should maintain records of these treatments and give them to the tenant upon request. The tenant may want the right to test the HVAC system to confirm that the landlord is properly treating the water lines.
- 18.8 Miscellaneous Issues. Should the tenant have the right to install supplemental HVAC? How much condenser water must the landlord provide? Chilled water? Who owns the equipment? How much will installation and usage cost? Who must repair/restore? Should the tenant be able to reconfigure building standard HVAC as needed for supplemental service? Will the tenant need access to fresh-air louvers? Where?
- 18.9 Generally. After rent, HVAC is often the most important issue in any lease where the tenant will not arrange its own HVAC. If the parties get it wrong, the cost to the tenant can be shocking and the leased space can be unusable. And HVAC raises far more issues than rent.
- 19. Inability To Perform
- 19.1 Force Majeure. Give force majeure protections to the tenant, not just the landlord. The landlord must give notice of a “force majeure” event within a specified time, or lose the right to claim that event as force majeure. Any delays that result from a contractor that the landlord required the tenant to use (or perhaps even merely approved) should constitute “force majeure” for the tenant’s obligations.

19.2 Right to Cure. If the landlord fails to perform an obligation, let the tenant cure the failure to perform, even if the landlord can argue that its failure is caused by “force majeure.” If the landlord fails to reimburse the tenant’s cure costs, with interest at some high rate, then let the tenant offset rent.

19.3 Force Majeure Exceptions. Although “force majeure” clauses always have a certain logic and fairness to them, should the tenant always allow the landlord the potentially open-ended extensions of time that a “force majeure” clause might justify? If the lease requires the landlord to restore after casualty within a certain time, should the landlord be entitled to an endless extension of time? What about delivery of the premises? What about maintenance of the roof? At some point, the “force majeure” clock should stop ticking or the “rent abatement” clock should start ticking, perhaps at double speed — even for “force majeure” delays.

20. Insurance

20.1 Common Standard. The tenant should have no obligation to provide more insurance than similar tenants customarily maintain in similar buildings, or to provide insurance at rates that are not reasonable.

20.2 Type Of Insurance. Allow the tenant to carry blanket insurance, self-insure, or use a “captive” carrier. In the case of a large corporate tenant, the insurance requirements should conform to the tenant’s company-wide insurance program. If that program later changes, the lease should allow the tenant’s insurance deliveries to conform to the tenant’s changed program. And if the tenant is highly creditworthy, should they have any insurance obligations at all?

20.3 Waiver Of Subrogation. Insurance policies should contain a waiver of subrogation clause. The lease should then contain matching waiver and release language.

20.4 Property And Liability Insurance. The landlord should carry property and liability insurance and give the tenant evidence of that insurance on request. The tenant may also want the right to see copies of the landlord's insurance policies, a requirement that landlords often impose on tenants.

20.5 Effect Of Sublease. To the extent that the tenant subleases the premises, the lease should state that the subtenant's insurance coverage and insurance certificates (if otherwise substantially in compliance with the lease) will meet the tenant's insurance obligations. On the other hand, small subtenants will often expect to provide less insurance than a direct tenant. Avoid any suggestion in the lease that every subtenant's insurance must meet the insurance standards of the direct lease.

20.6 Landlord's Deductible. A major tenant may care about the size of the landlord's deductible (both a minimum and a maximum) and how the landlord will fund that deductible in the event of a casualty. Whose risk is the deductible? Will that payment constitute an operating expense?

20.7 Terrorism Insurance. If the tenant believes terrorism insurance may rear its head again as an issue in the world of commercial real estate, think about whether the lease should deal with it in any particular way. For example, the tenant might conclude that operating expenses should exclude any costs related to terrorism insurance. Make it the landlord's problem as a risk of owning real estate.

21. Landlord Obligations and Services

21.1 Generally. Does the lease require the landlord to provide any services or do anything at all, such as maintaining the building, insuring, providing security, or otherwise delivering what the tenant legitimately expects? As a "silent issue" staring the tenant in the fact, some landlords' form leases forget to mention that the landlord has any obligations at all.

21.2 Existing Systems. Let the tenant use existing cabling and other systems. The landlord should agree not to damage or remove such systems. These rights should extend to the tenant's use of wiring pathways located on the underside of the tenant's floors. For the tenant to gain access to those pathways, the landlord may need to exercise access rights under the leases of the "downstairs" tenants. The landlord should agree to do so for this tenant's benefit.

- 21.3 Performance Standards. Set performance standards or criteria for any landlord services (e.g., comparable to those provided in a “basket” of other buildings). Provide that if the building experiences an unreasonable number of false alarms or life safety system breakdowns or problems, the tenant can perform an audit, perhaps at the landlord’s expense, and require changes. The landlord should be responsible for any failure to supply services to the tenant unless, perhaps, that failure is due to causes beyond the landlord’s control. The landlord should, though, perhaps have some obligation to control those circumstances, or at least establish measures so that services can continue even if predictable surprises occur, such as power outages.
- 21.4 Service Shutdowns. Limit the landlord's ability to shut down building services, particularly for essential tenant functions (e.g., HVAC or electricity for data center). Require ample prior notice, and let the tenant reschedule the shutdown.
- 21.5 Engineering Issues. Counsel should work with the tenant’s engineers and other consultants to identify needs, standards and specifications for all building services, particularly heating, ventilation and air conditioning, and the landlord’s alterations.
- 21.6 Strike. If a strike occurs, the landlord should agree to establish a separate gate for the striking union in order to minimize any interference with the tenant. If the landlord or any other tenant uses a labor force that causes disharmony with the tenant’s labor force, require the landlord to remove the former labor force from the building. Most leases express only the converse proposition. Delegate to the tenant the landlord’s legal authority to exercise the landlord’s right to remove trespassers, protesters, etc.
- 21.7 Management Company Replacement. The tenant may want a right to require the landlord to replace the management company or the leasing broker if specified standards are not being met.
- 21.8 Windows. Allow the tenant to abate rent if windows are bricked up or covered over for any reason. The landlord should install (and repair/replace) sunscreen or other film on windows if needed, or at least give the tenant the right to do so.
- 21.9 Promotional Fund. Should the landlord agree to operate—or not to operate—any promotional association, fund, or other similar activities? Should the lease require that all other tenants participate?

- 21.10 Nonoccupancy Credits. If the tenant is not in occupancy, the landlord should give the tenant credit for any variable costs that the landlord avoids, such as cleaning. Such a provision appears in some government leases, but rarely, if ever, in commercial leases.
- 21.11 Receipt of Deliveries. Specify the location, arrangements, timing, and fees (none) for the tenant's receipt of deliveries. Try to allow deliveries at any time of day or night. Coordinate with the security program as necessary.
- 21.12 Contact Person. Require the landlord to designate a single exclusive (or at least "primary" or "backup") contact person for all questions, problems and issues about the premises, with a 24-hour emergency telephone number to call if problems arise outside business hours.
- 21.13 Overtime Services. The cost of any overtime services should be shared with any other tenants using such services at the same time. The tenant should receive a "most favored nation" rate.
- 21.14 Lobby Or Parking Lot Renovations. If the landlord undertakes lobby or parking lot renovations, the landlord must complete them quickly and give the tenant access to the premises equivalent to that which existed before work began. The landlord should shield from view any unsightly construction areas. Prohibit any (non-emergency?) construction work during the tenant's peak months of business. The tenant may want to have the right to give the landlord reasonable instructions regarding how the landlord performs any work that affects the premises or its access or visibility.
- 21.15 Work Outside Premises. What construction projects or alterations might the landlord undertake outside the leased premises that might cause the tenant concern or hurt the tenant's business? Try to identify them and negotiate appropriate restrictions or rent credits.
- 21.16 Continuation Of Services. The landlord should continue to provide services to tenant even if the tenant is in default. The tenant should lose services only if the landlord has validly terminated the tenant's lease.

21.17 Other Tenancies. If a tenant cares about the existence and continuation of other nearby tenancies (e.g., a high-end retail store that wants to be part of a high-end retail environment), the lease will often impose co-tenancy requirements. The tenant may have the right to terminate if the landlord doesn't line up or retain a certain level of neighboring leases. The tenant need not open unless a certain number of nearby high-end retail leases have opened or open simultaneously. And if major nearby spaces "go dark," the tenant may also have the right to terminate. As an alternative to terminating, the tenant may also have the right to switch to percentage rent without a floor, typically only for a certain period.

21.18 Protected Areas; Visibility. If the tenant cares about visibility and access for its customers, designate areas where the landlord cannot install anything that would block visibility (even a little bit) or impair access. This might include, for example, a prohibition on kiosks, plantings, artwork, signage, benches and anything else. Depending on the site, these restrictions could affect common areas, sidewalks, parking areas or other public areas of the property. The restrictions should capture installations of any kind, whether temporary or permanent.

21.19 Confidentiality. If the lease requires the tenant to give the landlord any financial, sales-related, or other sensitive information about the tenant, the landlord should agree to keep it confidential. Generally, the tenant should insist that the landlord keep the lease and all its terms confidential. That would include, for example, a promise that neither the landlord nor the landlord's counsel will disclose (or use against the tenant in other negotiations) any concessions that the tenant made in negotiating this particular lease. If the tenant provided the lease form, then the tenant should insist that the landlord and its counsel will preserve the confidentiality of the lease form and not re-use it for other transactions, whether with this tenant or anyone else.

Legally Required Actions. If either party is legally required to do anything, the other party will reasonably cooperate.

22. Landlord's Access

22.1 Prior Notice. How much and what type of prior notice should the landlord give to gain access to the tenant's premises?

- 22.2 Purpose Of Access. Limit the landlord's access to certain defined purposes (e.g., repairs, inspection, or to show the premises to prospective future tenants within the last few months of the lease term only).
- 22.3 Frequency. Limit how often the landlord can enter the premises.
- 22.4 Sensitive Areas. Should the lease prohibit or restrict landlord access to "special spaces" (bank vault, securities vault, network control rooms and the like) for cleaning and other purposes? If the tenant regards its entire operation as proprietary and "top secret," then perhaps the lease should not allow the landlord access at all, absent an emergency.
- 22.5 Time Of Access. Should access be limited to certain hours (business hours, after hours)?
- 22.6 Authorized Personnel. Precisely who among the landlord's employees, agents and contractors should have access?
- 22.7 Presence Of Tenant's Representative. The tenant may want its representative to be present whenever the landlord is on the tenant's premises. This is particularly important in any area where the tenant has sensitive, dangerous or expensive personal property.
- 22.8 Disruption and Security. Require the landlord to minimize interference with the tenant's business and comply with the tenant's reasonable instructions and security requirements, even if this requires the landlord to use overtime labor. If the landlord's personnel or contractors cause any damage or theft, make the landlord responsible.
- 22.9 Landlord's Installations. If the landlord wants to reserve the right to install pipes and conduits somewhere in the premises, the tenant may want to limit exactly where — such as only within existing walls or above ceilings, or at locations that the tenant reasonably approves. Require the landlord to minimize and repair (or pay to repair) any damage associated with the installation or maintenance of these conduits. Expressly negate any right for the landlord to install any new structural supports or other improvements not requested by the tenant within the premises. Perhaps also provide for significant liquidated damages if the landlord violates the restrictions in the preceding sentence.

22.10 Storage Of Materials. If the landlord stores materials in the premises for making repairs, limit that right to apply only to those materials necessary for repairs within the premises. This can be particularly problematic if the premises includes a terrace — a tempting storage area for long-term exterior projects. In any case, the landlord should store materials in the premises (or an adjacent terrace) only for short periods.

22.11 Repair Work Outside Business Hours. If the landlord's work in or affecting the premises will cause inconvenience, noise, odors or the like, the landlord should work only outside business hours. If the tenant needs the landlord to repair any critical area or function quickly, require the landlord to do so, even if the landlord must hire overtime labor.

22.12 Hazardous Materials. If the landlord will use hazardous materials for any work in or affecting the premises, the landlord should agree to notify the tenant in advance and provide "material safety data sheet" disclosures. If the landlord will make the premises uninhabitable during business hours, should the landlord provide substitute space?

23. Leasehold Mortgages And Tenant's Financing

23.1 Landlord's Consent. Ask the landlord to consent in advance to the tenant's grant of leasehold mortgage(s). The landlord should also agree to execute a recordable memorandum of lease. Any leasehold mortgagee should have the rights to: (1) receive notice of default from the landlord; (2) cure; and (3) obtain a new lease from the landlord if the original lease terminates, except a scheduled termination in accordance with its terms. For the lease to be truly "mortgageable," it needs much more than this. But the tenant may need it.

23.2 Equity Pledges. If the tenant's owners pledge their equity as collateral for a loan, the pledgee may want protections under the lease like those of a leasehold mortgagee.

23.3 Financing, Generally. Does the tenant anticipate entering into any other financing arrangements, such as equipment or inventory financing, that might affect the landlord, the lease, or the premises? If so, add appropriate language to the lease to preserve the tenant's flexibility. Plan ahead to obligate the landlord to comply with any likely requirements of the tenant's equipment lessor or other financing source.

24. Maintenance And Cleaning

24.1 Structural Repairs. Require the landlord to maintain and repair the "structure" of the building (including the roof, the foundation and other structural elements) and maintain and repair common areas, parking lots, garages and sidewalks. Define "structure" (broadly) to avoid future disputes over what it means. Try to have it cover as much of the building as possible except most improvements unique to a particular tenant.

24.2 Building And Systems Maintenance. The landlord should maintain electrical, plumbing, sewage, HVAC and other building systems, at least to the point of entry into the premises. Require the landlord to maintain service contracts. Let the tenant and its advisors inspect building systems and monitor or confirm the landlord's maintenance program.

24.3 Standard For Maintenance. The landlord should maintain the building and common areas in an attractive and first-class manner, which the tenant may want to define in a specific way. That obligation should extend to any empty shop spaces and all common areas on any multi-tenant floor, whether or not fully occupied. "Maintenance" should include the provision of security. Require the landlord to repaint, recarpet and repave periodically. If any landlord work damages the tenant's finishes, the landlord must restore the finishes to the original standard at the landlord's expense.

24.4 Cleaning Standards. Specify standards for the landlord's cleaning services, both within the premises and in common areas. Limit the scope of possible "extras." Try to define the pricing of "extras." Cleaning standards are an economic issue and potentially a profit center for a landlord. Review and negotiate them accordingly. If the cleaning standards say the landlord does not need to clean any "computer areas," how much space will this exclude for a modern office? If the landlord wants to disclaim any responsibility for cleaning of certain areas (food preparation, etc.), obtain a credit for the value per square foot of the "building standard" cleaning not provided. As an alternative, ask the landlord to give the tenant an allowance. Then the tenant should only be responsible to pay for any cleaning in the space that is above standard.

- 24.5 Cleaning Hours. Specify the earliest time at which cleaning may commence and the time by which it must finish.
- 24.6 Cleaning Personnel. The tenant may want the right to approve individuals or cleaning crews that provide cleaning services to the space. The tenant may also want to request background checks for these individuals. If the staffing changes, the tenant may want the same rights for any replacement cleaning staff members. The tenant may also want to require bonding of the cleaning staff.
- 24.7 Right To Terminate. The tenant may want to be able to terminate the landlord's cleaning services and take over cleaning of all common areas or just the premises, with a rent credit. If the landlord maintains storage and locker areas specific to the premises, for the landlord's cleaning staff, then if the tenant takes over cleaning, the tenant will want the right to use those storage and locker areas.
- 24.8 Garbage Removal. Define the location, access, timing and other arrangements for garbage removal. The landlord should provide separate recycling containers or areas.
- 24.9 Repairs Covered By Insurance. Require the landlord to make repairs—even if otherwise the tenant's obligation—where the need arises from an event covered by insurance that the landlord carries or should have carried.
- 24.10 Vermin. The landlord will exterminate vermin outside of the leased premises. The tenant should particularly worry about this issue if other space in the building has food-related uses.
- 25. Operating Expenses — Calculation And Auditing
- 25.1 Statement By Professional. An independent managing agent or, better, a certified public accountant should prepare the landlord's statement of operating expenses. Attach as a lease exhibit the landlord's operating expense statements for the preceding few years. Ask the landlord to confirm that: (1) these were the statements actually used for pass-throughs to existing tenants; and (2) the landlord will calculate future operating expenses the same way.
- 25.2 Time For Revision. Set a time limit for the landlord's revisions to operating expense statements—and make that limit subject to a “time of the essence” qualifier. The tenant may want to require the landlord to issue an audit confirmation letter waiving any unbilled charges beyond a certain point from when the operating expense statement is prepared.

- 25.3 Gross-Up. In any year the building is not fully occupied, operating expenses are often “grossed up” as if the building had been fully or nearly fully occupied during the entire year. Confirm that the base year and adjustment year are treated consistently and that the “gross-up” calculations make sense.
- 25.4 Consistency. For all operating expense definitions, references, and accounting procedures, the most important word is “consistently.” The landlord should not have the ability to change its calculation techniques after the base year.
- 25.5 Timing Of Operating Expense Statement. The landlord should provide the annual operating expense statement within a reasonable time (90 to 180 days) after fiscal year-end. To give the landlord an incentive for promptness, the tenant might insist that monthly estimated operating expenses payments must stay the same (for the next year) until the landlord has completed its operating expense statement justifying an increase. And if the statement shows a decrease, then the tenant should immediately obtain the benefit of that decrease (with interest?) and a suitable rent credit.
- 25.6 New Expense Items. Building management standards sometimes change over time, usually upwards (e.g., higher security standards or new types of insurance or new regulatory compliance costs). When that happens, the landlord may incur new categories of expense that the landlord did not incur during the base year, which would require the tenant to bear the entire cost of that new expense, not just increases above the base year. Therefore, if the landlord later incurs new categories or items of expense that were not being incurred when the lease was signed, the tenant may want to require the landlord to “gross up” the base year to reflect what this expense would have been if the landlord had already been incurring it the day the lease was signed.
- 25.7 Right To Review And Challenge. The tenant should have the right to examine and question the landlord’s operating expense calculations. Require that any expense the landlord incurs be reasonable, ordinary and customary, not just actual. Allow the tenant to challenge any expense as unreasonable. Those rights should survive any lease termination. The lease should give the tenant reasonable time to: (1) notify the landlord that it wants to audit expenses; (2) conduct and complete the audit; and (3) specify if, and how, it contests the landlord's calculations. Avoid any schedule that requires the tenant to provide more detail than is reasonable at any particular stage of the process. If the tenant discovers egregious errors, let the tenant reopen operating expenses from earlier years, even if the time to do so has otherwise expired.

- 25.8 Books And Records. Require the landlord to keep books and records for a specified number of years in a single place under a unified system. In the likely event this information is stored electronically, give tenant the ability to access it in useful electronic form (e.g., spreadsheets rather than PDF files). Allow the tenant to copy those books and records for any audit of operating expenses.
- 25.9 Base Year. The tenant's right to audit should also cover the base year, expiring no earlier than the expiration date for the right to audit the first operating year. The tenant may wish to audit the base year at the same time that it audits the first operating year.
- 25.10 Landlord's Responsibility For Audit Cost. The landlord should pay the cost of audit (credit it against the next month's rent) if the audit discloses an overcharge of more than some stated low percentage. Beware of language that refers not to an overcharge but to an overstatement of operating expenses; that's a harder threshold to meet.
- 25.11 Most Favored Nation; Landlord's Discovery Of Error. If some other tenant's audit discloses a discrepancy, the landlord should automatically give this tenant the benefit of any resulting adjustment to operating expenses, even if this tenant does not ask for it. If, on a particular issue, the landlord makes a better deal with any other tenant, this tenant should get the benefit. If the landlord fails to timely disclose any benefits of the types mentioned above, then the landlord should pay interest at a high rate and perhaps also an administrative fee. Don't call it a penalty, though.
- 25.12 Choice Of Auditing Firm. The lease should not limit the tenant's right to engage a firm of its own choosing, such as a contingent fee lease auditor or someone engaged by other tenants, to examine the landlord's books and records.

- 25.13 Parking Lots. Treat the cost of filling potholes and restriping as an operating expense, but resurfacing as a capital expense to be borne by the landlord without reimbursement. Require resurfacing at least once every ___ years. Exclude any parking lot maintenance costs for at least ___ years after the commencement date.
- 25.14 Cost Of Capital Improvements. If the estimated cost of any capital improvement or replacement for which the tenant is responsible exceeds a specified amount, perhaps varying based on the remaining term of the lease, allow the tenant to terminate the lease or require the landlord to contribute to the cost. Base that contribution on the expected useful life of the improvement or replacement as compared against the remaining lease term. Beware of unrealistic limits on the amortization period for any capital or quasi-capital outlays by the landlord. Beware of capital costs masquerading as operating costs, or that should be handled as part of a capital project (for example, initial adjustments and repairs of a newly installed elevator).
- 25.15 Tenant-Specific Exemptions. Look for justifications to support exemption from particular expenses (e.g., elevator expenses for a ground floor tenant).
- 25.16 Confidentiality. If the landlord requires the tenant to sign a confidentiality agreement for any future lease audit, insist that the form of agreement be attached to the lease, or that the agreement be built into the lease. (Why do we need a separate agreement?) Either approach avoids the risk of extended delays in trying to negotiate a confidentiality agreement when the need arises.
- 25.17 Credit. Try to get credit for any income the landlord derives from common areas (e.g., signage).
- 25.18 New Buildings. Part of the business negotiation of a lease in a new building will relate to the negotiation of the base year for any escalations. The parties are both at greater risk here, because the building has no operating history. Initially, the base year should reflect regular base operating costs and should not include savings that result from new construction (for example, lack of maintenance costs because a contractor's warranty covers all problems). The tenant may want to adjust the base year to a year (or average of several years) in which the landlord has achieved a certain occupancy level (e.g., 100 percent).

- 25.19 General Comments. The preceding discussion, and other comments on operating expenses in this checklist, amply demonstrate that operating expenses raise a wide variety of fascinating issues, giving landlords substantial discretion and opportunities and creating potential for many disputes based on characterization, measurement and conceptual issues. Operating expense clauses can sometimes amount to a reinvention of cost accounting and tax law by people who don't necessarily have expertise in either area. And if a particular lease includes creative protections for the tenant, will the landlord's actual accounting procedures adequately take those protections into account? Both landlords and tenants may favor replacing traditional operating expense escalations with fixed rent increases.
- 26. Operating Expenses—Exclusions. The tenant may desire to exclude at least these items from operating expenses:
- 26.1 Above-Standard Cleaning. Costs of cleaning portions of the building that have cleaning requirements higher than the tenant's (e.g., cleaning some other tenant's employee cafeteria or special mahogany conference rooms).
- 26.2 Americans with Disabilities Act. Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990 ("ADA") compliance costs, particularly when triggered by operations of other tenants.
- 26.3 Advertising. Advertising expenses, including the cost of maintaining any website.
- 26.4 Art. The purchase, maintenance, or insurance of any artwork or sculpture.
- 26.5 Bad Acts. Costs incurred as a result of the landlord's negligence or intentionally wrongful acts (good luck finding and proving either of those).
- 26.6 Breach of Lease. Costs incurred because any party breaches any lease.
- 26.7 Capital. Costs that under generally accepted accounting principles consistently applied would be considered capital outlays or are otherwise outside normal costs and expenses for operation, cleaning, management, security, maintenance and repair of similar buildings. As an alternative, perhaps allow capital expenditures if: (1) the tenant approves any expenditure above a certain level; or (2) an expenditure is justified by the cost of repairs or undertaken to reduce operating expenses and then only to the extent that the landlord demonstrates actual cost reduction.

- 26.8 Collateral Source. Any cost reimbursed by insurance proceeds (or that would have been reimbursed if the landlord had carried customary insurance), any condemnation award, or any indemnification from any third party.
- 26.9 Construction. The cost to perform initial construction and to correct initial construction defects, as well as such costs for any future alterations, additions or upgrades.
- 26.10 Contributions. Any charitable or political contributions the landlord might decide to make.
- 26.11 Development-Related Payments. Exactions paid to any governmental body or community organization, including those for infrastructure, traffic improvements, curb cuts, roadway improvements, transit costs, “impact fees,” statues of government officials and so on. The tenant can reasonably treat these as land costs and irrelevant to the tenancy.
- 26.12 Environmental. Costs of testing for, handling, remediating or abating asbestos and other hazardous materials or electromagnetic fields; the cost to remove chlorofluorocarbons or accomplish other future retrofitting driven by future environmental concerns not yet imagined; or the cost to purchase environmental insurance. If the landlord decides to make changes to achieve some level of LEED compliance, make that the landlord’s cost, not the tenant’s.
- 26.13 Excessive Management Fees. Management fees beyond those charged in comparable buildings, particularly where the property manager is an affiliate of the landlord.
- 26.14 Executive Salaries. Salaries for officers above the level of building manager, or that are overly generous.
- 26.15 Fines. Fines and penalties the landlord must pay as a result of failure to comply with law, code, etc.

- 26.16 Food Court. Costs related to food court tenants to the extent they exceed normal costs. As an alternative, allocate food seating area as tenant space (paid for by the food court tenants), perhaps with extra weighting because of the heavy cleaning requirements.
- 26.17 Holidays. Any holiday decorations or gifts. As an alternative, impose a reasonable limit on these costs.
- 26.18 Mall Advertising. Any mall advertising program. As an alternative, cap the tenant's contribution.
- 26.19 Other. Next year's newest area of legal concern (for inspiration, check the latest carve-outs from "nonrecourse" treatment in mortgage finance transactions).
- 26.20 Other Tenants. Any costs for a service not provided to this tenant and included in its rent (for example, the incremental cost of a higher level of service provided to office or retail tenants); costs reimbursed or reimbursable by specific tenants other than through pro rata rent escalations (e.g., fees for excessive use of utilities); or costs caused by the acts or omissions of particular other tenants.
- 26.21 Ownership-Related Costs. Ground rent; mortgage interest, principal and transaction costs; build-out of tenant space; clean-up of any landlord's construction projects; and general and administrative expenses (overhead).
- 26.22 Payments to Affiliates. Fees and expenses paid to the landlord's affiliates in excess of market rates. (But what's market and how do you know? The tenant may want preapproval rights.)
- 26.23 Professional Fees. Brokerage fees and commissions; legal fees and expenses to negotiate and enforce leases; and accounting fees.
- 26.24 Telecom Installation. Either exclude costs or offset them against the income the landlord receives.
- 27. Options
- 27.1 Additional Space. The tenant may want an option, right of first refusal or right of first offer for additional space.
- 27.2 Sublet Excess Space. As a fallback, negotiate a wide-open right to sublet excess space until needed.

- 27.3 First Refusal Mechanics. For a right of first refusal, seek a “second bite at the apple” if the landlord later decides to market the space in smaller pieces or on terms different from those originally contemplated. Also, scrutinize the conditions that trigger the right of first refusal. Landlords’ form leases often let the tenant exercise a first refusal right only if the space has become “vacant and available.” What does this mean? If the landlord negotiates a new lease for the space before an old lease expires, does that new lease mean the space is not “vacant and available”? The test should be whether an existing lease will (or has) expire(d) or terminate(d). The landlord should agree not to negotiate any extension or renewal that could impair the tenant’s claims to the space. Try to attach an exhibit to the lease identifying exactly when the tenant’s right of first refusal will arise, to the extent presently knowable. Rights of first refusal and their triggering events, exclusions and procedures are a fertile area for disputes and misunderstandings.
- 27.4 Excess Space Notices. Whether or not the tenant has preemptive rights to extra space, the landlord should agree to advise the tenant regularly of any space that becomes available, giving as much notice as reasonably possible under the circumstances. As a practical matter, if the tenant wants the space, the parties may be able to negotiate something at that point.
- 27.5 Recapture From Other Tenants. If the landlord can exercise its right to recapture space from another tenant, the tenant may want the authority to require the landlord to exercise its recapture right for the tenant’s benefit. The recaptured space would then become part of this tenant’s premises.
- 27.6 Early Termination Options. The tenant may want early termination options, either complete or partial (“shed rights”). But what happens if the terminated space includes critical communications facilities serving the rest of the tenant’s space? The tenant will want the right to leave those in place. If a smaller tenant wants an option to terminate the entire lease, the landlord will sometimes offer instead a “good guy guaranty,” in which the tenant’s principal stands behind the lease obligations until the tenant actually moves out and surrenders the premises. That works fine only if the tenant has no other assets and no other activities, and does not want to be able to recommence business at some other location. If a tenant cares about those things, then the tenant should insist on a termination option rather than a good-guy guaranty.

- 27.7 Renewal Option. Often tenants will seek a right to renew the lease term. In such cases, the tenant must scrutinize and confirm it can live with whatever conditions, requirements and procedures the landlord tries to attach to the renewal option. Landlords often require that rent can never go down in the renewal term and the renewal right can be exercised only by the initial tenant. Track renewal dates well in advance. Try to manage the process to give the tenant time to move if the rent, as finally determined, is unacceptable. Also, allow the tenant to assign any renewal options as part of a lease assignment.
- 27.8 Appraisal. If rent during the option term depends on an appraisal, allow the tenant to withdraw its option exercise if the tenant disapproves of the new rent as finally determined. In practice, this may simply allow the tenant to re-negotiate the rent (a one-way downward negotiation opportunity), regardless of what the appraisal says. Set objective appraisal criteria. Does the definition of “fair market rental value” make sense? Does it give the landlord “credit” for value-enhancing measures (e.g., a tenant improvement allowance) that the landlord will not in fact deliver to the tenant? If the tenant won’t receive such an allowance upon renewal, the definition of “fair market rental value” should not pretend otherwise. And if the tenant paid for above-standard interior work, then “fair market rental value” should not reflect the value of that work. “Fair market rental value” should instead assume that the landlord delivered the space in the same condition as on the starting date. And does “fair market rental value” assume the lease allows any uses that the tenant is not allowed to, or will not, conduct? If there is a rent arbitration, require the landlord to disclose the terms of all recently signed leases. If the option term is “short” (less than 7 years) then what is the “fair market value” of that term? People don’t regularly sign 3 year leases. Maybe 3 year leases are cheap. Maybe they are expensive. Perhaps assume a more “standard” term and then price it as the first 3 years of a 10 year term. And, during any “fair market” renewal term, what rent increases should apply? Should the appraisers come up with a fixed rent for the whole period? Scheduled bumps? If not correctly handled, the tenant might end up with the worst of both worlds.
- 27.9 Purchase Option. The tenant may want the right to purchase the building if the landlord intends to sell it or if the equity owners of the landlord intend to sell a substantial portion of their equity. If the landlord converts the building into a condominium, the tenant may want a preferred right to purchase one or more units.

27.10 Reminder Notices. Require the landlord to send reminder notices of any upcoming option exercise deadline, but not more than ____ days, or less than ____ days, before the deadline. Extend the deadline and the lease expiration date if the landlord delays sending notice.

27.11 Short-Term Extension. Negotiate the right to a short-term lease extension, at the tenant's option, to avoid holdover problems if the tenant suffers delays in moving. The landlord will probably want some significant prior notice before the tenant exercises any such short-term extension right, but if the tenant agrees to too much time, then the short-term extension right becomes worthless, as it cannot deliver the flexibility that the tenant needs.

27.12 Base Years. For any lease renewal, reset the base years for escalations, or make sure the rent revaluation process assumes continuation of the old base years (nonstandard but theoretically a slight bit better for the tenant because it would give the tenant the benefit of future decreases in costs).

27.13 Rule Against Perpetuities. Think about the possible impact of the rule against perpetuities on any option rights in the lease or ancillary to the lease. This will vary by state.

27.14 Option Timing. Scrutinize and work through all the time periods for any option, and confirm that the tenant will be able to take the actions required within each time period. Do all the time periods work together? Do they give the tenant enough time for its internal review and approval processes in deciding whether to exercise a renewal option? If the tenant exercises an option defectively, require the landlord to notify the tenant promptly and allow some additional time to exercise the option correctly.

28. Parking

28.1 Specific Requirements. Define the location, number and pricing (or assurance of no fee) for parking spaces, reserved and unreserved. If any other tenant has the right to reserved parking, then this tenant should also have reserved parking equivalent in amount, proximity, type (covered, uncovered) and signage, adjusted for relative occupancy. Attach a parking diagram as an exhibit. Prohibit the landlord from changing the parking arrangements without the tenant's consent. In any case, the tenant may want to seek some number of reserved, covered, indoor or otherwise "premium" parking spaces.

- 28.2 Bicycles And Motorcycles. The landlord should provide parking for bicycles, mopeds and motorcycles in a convenient location. If the tenant wants to allow bicycles, skateboards and the like into the tenant's space, make sure the lease allows it, without making special arrangements such as use of the freight elevator or giving advance notice.
- 28.3 Building Expansion. If the landlord expands the building, the overall parking ratio shouldn't worsen.
- 28.4 High Parking Uses. The tenant may wish to prohibit nearby high parking uses (e.g., movie theater, trade school, restaurant). Some of these uses are, however, regarded as less objectionable than they once were.
- 28.5 Location/Amount Of Employee Parking. Insist that the landlord enforce employee parking restrictions against other tenants.
- 28.6 Snow/Maintenance. Require the landlord to clear snow promptly from and otherwise maintain the parking area.
- 28.7 Lighting. Set standards for lighting of common areas and parking decks—especially important to a 24-hour operation.
- 28.8 Patterns. Prohibit the landlord from interfering with or changing traffic patterns in the parking lot areas.
- 28.9 Fences. The tenant may want the right to require the landlord to install a fence to segregate parking areas from adjacent heavy-use facilities.
- 29. Percentage Rent
- 29.1 Rent Abatements. Rent abatements or other rent reductions should not reduce percentage rent breakpoints (to avoid an anomaly where the breakpoint drops because of negotiated rent abatements, resulting in percentage rent payments increasing by a like amount).

- 29.2 Partial Year Gross Sales. Annualize first year and last year gross sales, with a seasonal adjustment, to prevent excessive percentage rent if the tenant opens or closes in its peak season.
- 29.3 No Partnership. State that the parties do not intend to establish a partnership or joint venture.
- 29.4 Exclusions From “Gross Sales.” Depending on the type of business, the lease should exclude or subtract certain items from “gross sales,” such as: sales made by concessionaires, sales not in the ordinary course of business, sales to employees up to a certain percentage or only if at a discount, sales taxes, refunds, returns, credit card fees, custom tailoring and monogramming. The tenant will want to avoid any suggestion that the landlord can collect percentage rent on the tenant’s catalog or Internet sales.
- 29.5 Time Limits. Impose time limits on the landlord’s right to audit. Prohibit use of contingent fee auditors. If the landlord performs an audit, then the landlord should give the tenant a copy of the audit report even if it produces no adjustments.
- 29.6 Termination Right. The tenant may want to request the right to terminate the lease if its sales fall below some specified threshold. If either party terminates because of a termination right like this, then the tenant may want the landlord to reimburse the tenant’s unamortized leasing and improvement costs, perhaps up to a cap.
- 29.7 Revenue Maximization. The tenant should avoid any obligation to operate or to “maximize” revenues. The tenant should not make any representations on the volume of its business. Expressly negate any “implied” obligations along these lines. Also, a court may infer from a percentage rent clause that the tenant has agreed to keep its store open. If that’s not intended, say so.
- 29.8 Special Categories. The tenant may wish to negotiate a lower percentage rate for particular low-margin activities or categories of sales.
- 29.9 Free Rent. Any free rent period should abate percentage rent too.
- 29.10 Use. Tie percentage rent to the tenant’s use of the premises. What happens if the tenant assigns to another operator with a different use? Request that the lease allow assignment even if this changes the amount of percentage rent, provided the assignee agrees to pay at least the same total rent as the assignor did in its last year of operation.

30. Quiet Enjoyment

30.1 No Default. Beware of “quiet enjoyment” conditioned on no default. Condition quiet enjoyment instead only on the landlord’s not having terminated the lease.

30.2 Dumpsters, Staging Areas, Lay-Down Areas. Try to control where the landlord may install these items. Prohibit them in parking areas.

30.3 Sidewalk Sheds, Etc. If the landlord installs a sidewalk shed, scaffold, bridge, or temporary fence (a “construction installation”), it must achieve a prescribed minimum clearance above the retail windows and signage, and it must have an opening so pedestrians can walk from the street directly to the tenant’s front door. Allow the tenant to place advertisements on the construction installation, at the landlord’s expense, and prohibit any other advertising. Prohibit construction installations in the holiday season or other peak seasons. The landlord should pay the tenant a daily fee (or allow a daily rent credit) for maintenance of any of these structures regardless of the reason for them. For any construction installation: (1) try to set limits (duration; minimum clearance; cannot block windows; just posts for 30’ up, then roof above posts; frequency and purpose); (2) require the landlord to remove promptly all unauthorized postings or graffiti; and (3) require landlord to provide adequate lighting.

30.4 Remedies. If the landlord breaches the covenant of quiet enjoyment, the tenant cannot easily prove the amount of the injury or damages. Provide for liquidated damages or some other mechanism to quantify damages, ideally measured on a daily basis. Include the necessary recitations to validate any liquidated damages formula.

31. Radius Clauses

31.1 Physical Scope. Try to limit the physical scope of any radius clause, i.e., a clause that prohibits a retail tenant from competing within a certain distance of the premises. Ideally, limit the radius to only a mile or two, depending on the site and the tenant's plans.

31.2 Exclusions. If the tenant must agree to a radius clause, carve out: (1) existing stores; (2) any new stores purchased in a future corporate transaction; (3) relocation of existing stores within any retail property where the tenant is already doing business; (4) any stores operated by any possible future acquirer of the tenant's business; and (5) any other brand names that the tenant operates.

31.3 Termination. Try to terminate the radius clause at a certain date; if the tenant has achieved a certain level of percentage rent; or if the landlord has achieved a certain occupancy level.

31.4 Near End Of Term. In the last few years of the lease term, the radius clause should terminate, to facilitate a graceful shift to a new location. In the alternative, allow the tenant to open a new store nearby provided that the tenant protects (or partly protects) the landlord from any decrease in percentage rent during the remaining lease term.

32. Real Estate Tax Escalations

32.1 Definition Of Property; Mixed-Use Projects. Confirm that the property to which the real estate tax escalation applies does not include other parcels or improvements; or, if it does, understand the likely future real estate taxes on those parcels or improvements. Will those taxes inevitably rise in ways that should not translate into higher escalations for this tenant? For example if the "other" parcels are now vacant and the landlord will improve them, this tenant should not participate in any resulting increases. Along similar lines, if a mixed-use building contains retail space, then an office tenant should worry that the landlord's income from the retail space will be higher and increase faster than the income on the office space. If the lease allows the landlord to allocate real estate taxes based on pure square footage, then the tenant may end up paying an unreasonable amount toward increases in real estate taxes attributable to the retail space. Especially in high-tax jurisdictions such as New York, a tenant signing a major lease should consider engaging special counsel just to advise on real estate taxes.

32.2 Substitute Or Additional Taxes. Devote close attention to how "substitute or additional taxes" are defined. Confirm that they are truly appropriate for pass-through to the tenant. One might more appropriately treat some of them as equivalent to income taxes.

- 32.3 Landlord's Tax Protest. For the base year, review any landlord tax protest filing to understand the landlord's theories for low value. Will those theories inevitably vanish next year, producing built-in increases? In the lease, express the base-year real estate taxes as a specified number of dollars per square foot. Avoid referring to the taxes payable in a particular tax year, because such a reference could increase escalations if the landlord successfully protests base-year taxes. It would mean that the base-year taxes never go up; they just go down if the landlord gets lucky. A tenant will not want to be at the receiving end of that crapshoot.
- 32.4 Installment Payments. Require the landlord to pay real estate taxes in installments, as taxes are due. In any event, calculate tax pass-throughs as if the landlord were paying in installments over the longest period allowed.
- 32.5 Special Assessments. The landlord should pay special assessments in installments and treat them as taxes only to the extent they fall within the lease term.
- 32.6 Right To Contest. Require the landlord to contest taxes or, if the landlord does not, give the tenant the right to do so in the landlord's name or in the tenant's own name, as necessary. Check statutory and case law requirements as to who may contest taxes. For example, in New York a tenant that leases only part of a building lacks standing to contest taxes. The parties may need to make other arrangements, and the lease should provide for those. Whether the tenant leases all or only part of the building, any tax contest will still require cooperation and delivery of necessary information and signatures by the landlord. Require the landlord to contest taxes if a certain proportion of tenants so request. Require the landlord to warn the tenant of any tax contest deadline to give the tenant enough time to contest if the landlord does not wish to do so. Require the landlord to report to the tenant on status of pending certiorari proceedings on the tenant's request.
- 32.7 Tax Refunds. Require the landlord to pay the tenant its share of tax refunds promptly, even if the lease has expired. The landlord should also notify the tenant of any such refunds promptly when received. If the landlord fails to do so, or the tenant needs to remind the landlord, then the landlord should pay a default interest rate or some multiple of the amount due to the tenant. Landlords have been known to forget to give former tenants their share of any subsequent refunds of real estate taxes they paid. This can produce a nontrivial profit center for the landlord and a significant issue in negotiating a later purchase and sale of the building.

32.8 Tax Protest Costs. Any contingent fees paid to real estate tax counsel should be arm's length and commercially reasonable. What's "commercially reasonable"? The landlord should not collect a separate "management fee" for its services in contesting real estate taxes. That's a burden of ownership. The tenant should pay tax protest costs only for tax years in the lease term, with allocations for partial tax years.

32.10 Abatement or Deferral Program. The landlord should agree to apply for any available tax abatement or deferral program. The risk of loss of tax abatements already granted (e.g., for failure to comply with governmental procedures) should belong to the landlord, not the tenant. For any future abatement or deferral programs, negotiate whether the benefits belong to the landlord or the tenant and, if the latter, identify exactly what cooperation the landlord must provide and when. How exactly does the application process work? Beware of repricing the base rent in a way that indirectly returns to the landlord any tax abatement/deferral benefits that the tenant expected to obtain. Some argue that the value of every geographically targeted tax abatement or deferral program will simply be negotiated into rents and hence land values within the targeted area and therefore have no effect except to increase local land values at the expense of the local taxing authority.

32.11 Artificially Low Assessments. If, under local assessment rules, the first year's free rent produces an artificially low tax assessment that year, then the assessment may automatically rise by the same amount in future years. The tenant may then, over the years, pay extra tax escalation payments far beyond the value of the free rent. This depends very much on local tax assessment procedures, but the tenant must understand them.

- 32.12 Exclusions. Real estate tax escalations should exclude: penalties and/or interest; excise taxes on the landlord's gross or net rentals or other income; income, franchise, transfer, gift, estate, succession, inheritance and capital stock taxes; taxes on land held for future development ("outparcels"); increases in real estate taxes resulting from construction during the lease term if not done for the benefit of tenants generally, or if it does not create additional proportionate rentable area; termination of interim assessment; loss or phase-out (whether or not scheduled) of abatement or exemption; corrections of underpayments in previous periods; acquisition of development rights from other property; increases resulting from the landlord's failure to deliver required information to the taxing authority or other failure to comply with the taxing authority's requirements; and, if possible, sale of the property. If the landlord transfers unused development rights in a way that reduces the landlord's net real estate tax expense, confirm that the tenant will participate in any savings that result.
- 32.13 New Buildings. Depending on when in the progress of the building project the lease is being negotiated, the tenant should confirm that the base year will reflect complete construction and full assessment of the building. This may require a retroactive adjustment of base taxes, depending on how the particular jurisdiction handles new construction.
- 33. Representations and Warranties. The tenant may wish to ask the landlord to provide representations and warranties, including these:
- 33.1 Asbestos And Hazardous Materials. The premises are free of mold, asbestos and other hazardous materials. The landlord should provide any document required to confirm that status for purposes of building permit applications, such as a New York City ACP-5 form, showing that the tenant's work will be a non-asbestos job. The landlord should indemnify the tenant against liability (and delay-based losses) arising out of any environmental conditions that existed before the tenant took possession, whether or not the landlord caused them. And the landlord should agree to clean up those conditions.
- 33.2 Certificate Of Occupancy. Attach a true, correct and complete copy of the certificate of occupancy as an exhibit. The landlord should represent that the tenant's use as permitted under the lease won't violate the certificate of occupancy or the landlord's other leases or agreements.

- 33.3 Commissions And Brokerage Fees. The landlord has paid or will pay all brokerage fees and commissions for the lease. If the tenant cares about its relationship with the broker, the tenant may want the right to offset rent and pay the broker (particularly for any commissions due on future renewals or expansions) if the landlord does not.
- 33.4 Impact And Hookup Fees. The landlord has paid or will pay all impact fees, hookup charges and other governmental exactions imposed on the project and will not recapture them through any escalation.
- 33.5 Rights Of Third Parties. The landlord's entry into the lease does not violate any rights of third parties, such as the prior tenant that was evicted from the space or other tenants in the building. Although any such problem should be "just landlord's problem," tenant would inevitably be drawn into it and may like the idea of a clear line of responsibility pointing to landlord. Tenant may also want specific rights or remedies if, for example, tenant's exclusive isn't really as exclusive as tenant thought. For example, under that circumstance perhaps tenant should have the right to terminate its lease and landlord should reimburse tenant's leasing costs. Damages or a rent reduction may not suffice.
- 33.6 Submetering. All equipment is in place and in good working order for any submetering of utilities the lease contemplates.
- 33.7 Utilities. Adequate utility locations and capacity are available both within the building and at the premises.
- 33.8 Violations. The premises are subject to no outstanding violation of any code, regulation, ordinance or law, and the landlord agrees to cure existing violations at the landlord's expense, not recaptured through any escalation.
- 33.9 Validity Of Lease. Each party represents and warrants to the other that the lease has been duly authorized, executed and delivered, and is valid and binding.

33.10 Zoning. The property is properly zoned and the tenant's permitted use under the lease is legal.

33.11 Construction Plans. Landlord plans no construction at the property, except ordinary tenant improvements.

33.12 Notices; Plans. The landlord has received no notice of any condemnation, including any grade change of any street or any partial condemnation. The landlord plans no changes in parking or circulation. The landlord has no present plans to do anything that would require the tenant's approval or require entry into the tenant's premises.

33.13 Municipal Subsidies and Mandates. The landlord has not received any New York City subsidies (or made any agreement) that would trigger a requirement for the tenant to pay a "living wage" or comply with any requirements that would not apply but for those subsidies. This is also a due diligence item.

34. Requirements Of Law

34.1 Responsibility For Compliance. The landlord should be responsible for compliance with existing and new laws (including ADA) if the compliance applies generically to the property (e.g., "mere office use") or any noncompliance already existed before the lease was executed.

34.2 Regulatory Flexibility For Tenant. Allow the tenant to sell or assign the lease (or go dark) if required by law or through a settlement with any government agency.

34.3 Americans with Disabilities Act Of 1990. The tenant should have no duty to bring any elements of the existing building into ADA compliance (e.g., elevator buttons), unless (perhaps) the tenant actually alters that particular element of the building. Make the landlord responsible for ADA and all other baseline legal compliance.

34.4 New Requirements. The landlord should comply with any new legal requirement if the potential noncompliance did not result from the tenant's actions, and failure to comply may impair the tenant's alterations or use as the lease contemplates or otherwise adversely affect the tenant.

- 34.5 Permits. The landlord should agree to cooperate with the tenant in obtaining permits and other governmental approvals that tenant may need, such as by signing permit applications (even before approving the tenant's work) and providing necessary existing information. Establish a tight turnaround time for any necessary landlord signatures. Don't allow the landlord to use the permit signing process as a back door technique to disapprove work that the lease otherwise obligates the landlord to allow.
- 34.6 Change in Zoning. The landlord should allow the tenant to terminate if a change in zoning or other law (or inability to obtain or maintain necessary permits or adequate parking) prevents or impairs the tenant's operation of its business, in whole or in part.
- 35. Restrictions Affecting Other Premises
- 35.1 Competing Stores. Prohibit the landlord and its affiliates from renting to competing tenants within a certain area – not just in this property – particularly where the landlord operates its properties under an identifiable brand name. For a major tenant, prohibitions of this type may raise antitrust issues, which are beyond the scope of this checklist. New York law invalidates this type of prohibition in bank leases, allowing anyone damaged by such a prohibition to recover treble damages. New York Banking Law Section 674-a.
- 35.2 Use Of Building. Prohibit the landlord from changing the use of the overall building or any part of it—such as turning the older and less rentable half of a regional mall into a call center or community college. Restrict the type of retail tenancies or other uses in the building (e.g., no fast food). Consider issues of density, traffic, parking, demographics, compatibility, likelihood of picketing or controversy, security concerns and other potential problems affecting building use and other tenants.
- 35.3 Prohibited Uses. For retail properties, prohibit flea markets, carnivals, petting zoos, clothing drop-off boxes, kiosks (especially if competitive or within a certain distance of the entrance or windows of the premises), drive-up booths and the like elsewhere on the landlord's property, including common areas. For office buildings, prohibit uses that attract large volumes of people, particularly if incompatible with first-class business offices (e.g., poverty benefit or advocacy offices, drug rehabilitation or methadone clinics, welfare offices, certain types of auction houses, fast food restaurants).

For any building, prohibit psychics, drug paraphernalia sales, marijuana stores or clinics, abortion clinics, classrooms and other high traffic or controversial uses. More generally, a tenant will often want to prohibit the same list of “nuisance” uses that any landlord will want to prohibit.

- 35.4 Competitors. Even for nonretail space, try to prohibit the landlord from leasing space in the building to the tenant’s competitors (creating a risk of a competitor's taking the tenant’s staff, customers or clients).
- 35.5 Additional Construction. Limit the location and type of any additional construction the landlord can perform (e.g., on “outparcels”). If the landlord does anything to impair access to, or visibility of, the tenant’s space, give the tenant meaningful remedies, potentially including termination with a landlord reimbursement of the tenant’s leasing expenses.
- 35.6 Minimum Operating Hours. Establish minimum operating hours for the property as a whole or for specific other tenants.
- 35.7 Scope of Restrictions. To the extent that the lease restricts the landlord’s activities, consider how broadly those restrictions should apply. Ideally, they should affect both the existing structure and any future expansion in which the landlord has any interest, or for which the landlord or an affiliate presently controls the site. Try to have the landlord agree not to enter into a reciprocal easement agreement or otherwise facilitate any nearby construction by others unless the counterparty agrees to honor the same restrictions. The tenant may even want the right to approve any future reciprocal easement agreement or amendments to the existing agreement.
- 35.8 Public Areas. The tenant should control (or have the right to require, within reason) future changes to public areas, lobbies, elevators, parking lots and other common areas. Require the landlord to renovate and update these areas periodically to keep them consistent with first-class standards as they change from time to time. Require the tenant’s approval for the plans for all such work, or at least the visible part (e.g., finishes) of the landlord’s work. The tenant may want the right to require the landlord to prohibit smoking in public areas even if governing law does not.

35.9 Exclusive Uses. The tenant may want exclusive rights for certain uses. As a fairly ordinary example, a coffee store may want the exclusive right to sell coffee within the landlord's shopping center. But the tenant's actual operating procedures may justify requests for other types of exclusives. For example, if a bakery tenant uses aromas as part of its marketing, it will want to limit competing aromas. A movie theater may want to prohibit not only competing movie theaters, but also any theater advertising. A careful landlord will push back and try to fine-tune any exclusives to assure they don't impair the landlord's overall leasing program. Every time the landlord chips away at the exclusive, this may make it less useful and valuable for the tenant. The tenant will want to make sure that any exclusive still serves its intended purpose and protects the tenant's investment.

35.10 Remedies for Violation of Exclusive Use. If another tenant violates the exclusive, will this tenant have direct rights to obtain injunctive relief against that other tenant? Not unless the exclusive is in a recorded document or the landlord and this tenant have carefully provided for such a right in this tenant's lease! Require the landlord to reimburse this tenant's costs of enforcement. Many exclusive use clauses give the tenant only limited remedies, such as the right to pay pure percentage rent with no minimum, or the right to terminate the lease in an extreme case (with or without a reimbursement of tenant's leasing costs). That's not as helpful as actually shutting down the violation of the exclusive use. In extreme cases, the landlord might be happy to see this tenant go away, so the tenant will not want to limit its remedies accordingly.

35.11 Adjacent Work. If a third party will pay compensation for inconvenience caused by work on an adjacent or nearby site, should the landlord or the tenant receive it?

35.12 Beware of Ownership Variations. To the extent the landlord agrees to any provisions suggested above, beware of limiting those provisions to any property "owned by the landlord and its affiliates." Third parties, often not even affiliates of the landlord, may own parts of what appears to be a single integrated building. In these cases, the tenant will need to focus on the governing easements and declaration documents for the building as a whole, triggering a level of investigation often reserved only for major tenants.

35.13 Use of Common Areas. Prohibit the landlord from allowing any tenant to use a common area in a manner specific to that tenant, such as for advertising, displays, nonstandard signage, or waiting area. In the alternative, allow this tenant to exclude the affected common space from any calculations of its rentable area.

35.14 Co-Tenancy. At least for retail leases, require the landlord to achieve and later maintain a certain level of other tenancies, such as 75% occupancy of the building as a whole and continued occupancy of anchor spaces by certain brands or types of anchor tenants. If the landlord fails to comply with co-tenancy requirements, then allow this tenant to pay only percentage rent for a certain period, and then eventually terminate. Should the landlord reimburse the tenant's unamortized leasing expenses in that case?

36. Rules And Regulations

36.1 Nondiscriminatory Enforcement. Require the landlord to impose and enforce its rules and regulations in a nondiscriminatory way. If the tenant so requests, the landlord should impose and enforce those rules and regulations against other tenants.

36.2 New Rules. New rules should be reasonable and of the type customarily imposed for similar buildings. New rules should require the tenant's approval. If the landlord wants to give the tenant a short period to object to any new rules, insist that the landlord give the tenant formal notice of any new rule, along with a reminder of the short period in which the tenant may object.

36.3 Interference With Permitted Use. The tenant should have no obligation to comply with any rule or regulation if such compliance would interfere with tenant's use permitted under the lease, or otherwise does not conform to the tenant's rights under the lease.

36.4 Third Party Enforcement. The lease should prohibit any other tenant from enforcing the lease against the tenant. Expressly negate any third-party beneficiaries of the lease, or anything in it.

37. Sale Of Property

37.1 Assumption Of Obligations. Upon any sale of the landlord's property, the purchaser should assume all obligations—including all existing undischarged obligations—of the landlord, including the obligation to return the tenant's security deposit; refund any previous rent overcharges; and allow the tenant to conduct any permitted audits. The purchaser should also assume the landlord's insurance requirements and any net worth restrictions. Some landlord's lease forms say that the old landlord is not responsible, but neither is the new one. The tenant theoretically ends up with claims against no one. After a change of ownership, the new landlord should be responsible for maintaining records for all open operating years. If the new landlord doesn't have those records, then allow the tenant to estimate what the right numbers would have been.

37.2 Transfer Of Security Deposit. Require the landlord to transfer the security deposit to any purchaser of the property and assure that the purchaser gives the tenant a written confirmation of receipt. Insist that the tenant have the right to offset rent if the landlord does not comply with these requirements.

37.3 Rental Payments To Purchaser. The tenant should not be required to pay rent to a purchaser until the tenant has received notice of the sale and purchase and directions on where and how to pay.

37.4 Only One Landlord. If the landlord transfers its interest in the building, the tenant should never have two landlords -- even if they speak with one voice.

38. Security Deposit

38.1 Interest. Require the landlord to hold the security deposit in an interest-bearing account with all interest to be paid to the tenant. Many landlords require an administrative fee, like that contemplated by statute in New York (N.Y. GEN. OBLIG. LAW § 7-103(2) (McKinney 1963)). Although a landlord's form may not quantify such a fee, the tenant should insist on doing so, or eliminate the fee.

38.2 Letter Of Credit. Allow the tenant, at any time, to substitute a letter of credit or other alternative form of security. If the tenant thereafter fails to maintain the letter of credit, the landlord should be free to draw upon it. That failure should not, however, constitute a lease default. The tenant should retain the right to deliver a letter of credit. If the tenant delivers a letter of credit backed by a reimbursement agreement signed by a third party (e.g., the tenant's venture capitalist), then the landlord should also agree to give that third party a copy of any notice from the landlord, or at least any notice of default or other notice that could result in a letter of credit draw. If the lease no longer requires a letter of credit at some point, require the landlord to sign whatever cancellation documents the letter of credit issuer requires.

38.3 Drawing Procedures. The tenant may wish to do what it reasonably can to make it hard to draw the letter of credit. For example, the tenant might require a prior notice before any draw. Or the letter of credit might require the landlord to deliver an affidavit of default, identifying all defaults in reasonable detail.

38.4 Return. The landlord should promptly return the security deposit after the lease expires. But what happens if landlord doesn't? Even if a letter of credit expires and is physically returned to the issuer, the issuer will often want landlord to sign a letter consenting to termination of the letter of credit. Landlord should agree to do that.

38.5 Reduction. Let the tenant reduce the security deposit over time, at least if the tenant is not in default. If the tenant has any concern about the landlord's creditworthiness, such reductions make particular sense in the last year or two of the lease term.

39. Signage And Identification

39.1 Signage Requirements. The lease should describe the signage requirements (for lobby, floor lobbies, elevators, exterior entry areas, driveways, roadway pylons, rooftop, common areas and other exterior locations) for the tenant and any subtenant(s). Allow the tenant to install temporary signage during construction and change its signage over time. If signage space is limited, the tenant should be given the right to use the next available signage space. Make the tenant's signage rights as transferable as any other rights under the lease. Also allow the tenant to use its logo or distinctive typeface or other graphic elements. If the tenant intends to illuminate its signage, the lease should allow that. Even if the tenant agrees to comply with the landlord's signage guidelines or obtain consent, the tenant should always have the right to match its national or regional signage program.

39.2 Other Parties' Signage. Establish requirements and other controls for other tenants' signage and the landlord's overall signage program, including future changes. The tenant may want to limit identifying signage for other tenants, particularly those competitive with the tenant. Provide that the landlord may not install advertising material, or any installations specific to any particular tenant, in common areas. This tenant is paying for its “share” of those common areas and they should be common and anonymous. Is there any type of signage or advertising that the tenant simply does not want the landlord to install anywhere in the property? What about political or other controversial signage?

- 39.3 Signage Position. Does the tenant want the top position on any pylon sign? Second from top? Largest position on any other sign(s)?
- 39.4 Name Of Building. Prohibit the landlord from naming the building after the tenant, any other tenant, or any competitor of the tenant. Make it clear that the landlord has no right to use the tenant’s name for anything. Does the tenant want affirmative naming rights? Prohibit the landlord from using the tenant’s name in any landlord advertising.
- 39.5 Directory Entries. Require the landlord to provide building directory entries for the tenant and any subtenant or assignee. If the landlord tries to limit those entries, do those limitations make sense? Does the tenant contemplate needing directory entries for parties other than the tenant and its subtenants or assignees, such as joint ventures or other new entities? Prohibit any other tenant from being more visible or using its logo in the building directory unless this tenant has the same right. Don’t limit the number of the tenant’s directory listings at all if the landlord uses a computerized directory.
- 39.6 Flagpoles. The tenant may want the exclusive right to use any flagpoles at the property. As an alternative, the tenant may want to limit the flags that the landlord or any other tenant may fly on those flagpoles.
- 39.7 Billboards. Prohibit the landlord from installing billboards or other signs anywhere on the building or outside the windows of the building, even if such billboards or other signs are allegedly transparent from the interior of the building. Prohibit the landlord from blocking the tenant’s signage.

- 39.8 Pre-Opening And Post-Closing Signage. The tenant may want the right to install signage announcing its imminent arrival, while the tenant's space is being constructed. This signage could be located at the space and elsewhere in the property. Once the lease is signed, the landlord must promptly delist the premises and remove "for rent" signs. Provide that after a retail tenant vacates (unless as the result of a default), it can leave reasonable signage in place to announce its new location.
- 40. Subordination And Landlord's Estate
- 40.1 Proof Of Fee Estate. The landlord should represent that it owns the fee estate. Perhaps attach a copy of the landlord's deed or title policy as an exhibit.
- 40.2 Nondisturbance Agreement From Mortgagees And Ground Lessors. At the time of lease signing, the landlord should deliver a nondisturbance agreement from every mortgagee or ground lessor. Attach the form of nondisturbance agreement to the lease and require future mortgagees to sign it when they close their loans and future ground lessees to sign it when they come into the picture. Beware of allowing the landlord to deliver such an agreement after the lease has been signed, with a right for the tenant to terminate if it is not timely delivered. In practice, such a right will rarely be exercised. That may, of course, say something about the practical importance of these agreements. Any nondisturbance agreement will typically say that the lender (or a foreclosure sale purchaser) is not bound by any later lease amendment the lender did not approve. Try to narrow that concept, to avoid the need to get lender approval for minor lease amendments, or require the lender to promptly approve any lease amendments that meet a certain standard.
- 40.3 Timing After Foreclosure. If a lender has the right to terminate a lease upon foreclosure, try to require the lender to make up its mind within a certain time. Typically, of course, any tenant without the clout to obtain nondisturbance protection will also lack the clout to obtain the protection just suggested.
- 40.4 Conditions For Subordination. If the lease is "subordinate," condition that subordination on the landlord's having delivered specified nondisturbance protections from holders of senior estates, ideally in the form attached to the lease. Don't settle for "best efforts." The lease should not require the tenant to "subordinate" to any mortgage if that mortgage is subordinate to any mortgage or any other lien that has not given the tenant nondisturbance protections. Foreclosure on that other, more senior, mortgage could wipe out both the more junior mortgage and the tenant's leasehold estate.

- 40.5 Debt Service Should Not Exceed Rent. When the tenant leases all or most of the space or an entire building, the tenant may want the landlord to agree that the debt service payable under any fee mortgage will not exceed the rent under the lease. The tenant would also want to confirm that this is also true as of lease inception.
- 40.6 Negotiations Of Nondisturbance Agreements. Require the landlord to reimburse the tenant for the tenant's reasonable legal fees for any future nondisturbance agreement negotiations.
- 40.7 Compliance With Mortgages. Avoid any covenant by the tenant to be bound by and do nothing to violate any present or future mortgages. Such a provision may amount in part to an "end run" around negotiated nondisturbance rights and priorities as well as other lease provisions, starting with casualty, condemnation, restoration and use restrictions.
- 40.8 Rent Redirection Notice. If the landlord's lender delivers a rent redirection notice to the tenant, state that the tenant may comply without liability even if the landlord disputes its lender's right to deliver the notice. The landlord should agree to reimburse the tenant's legal fees in reviewing, analyzing and figuring out how to respond to any such notice from a lender.
- 40.9 Landlord's Lender's Approval Rights. Understand the approval rights of the landlord's lender under its loan documents (e.g., assignment, subletting, alterations, lease amendments, etc.) and try to trim back if excessive. Ask the lender to pre-approve as much as possible. Going forward, try to eliminate lender approval requirements. Ask the landlord to agree never to enter into any loan arrangements (or amendments to existing loan documents) that would prevent the landlord from agreeing to later minor or ministerial amendments of the lease, excluding any that could materially adversely affect the lender. Affirmatively state that no lender consent is needed for the tenant to exercise any option or pre-emptive right (e.g., right of first offer).

40.10 Definition of Landlord. Include successors and assigns in the definition of “Landlord.”

40.11 “Replacement” Mortgages. If the tenant agrees to be “subordinate” to mortgages—without nondisturbance protection—in any way that might come back to haunt the tenant (for example, casualty and condemnation issues), limit the “subordination” to refer only to any mortgages that are currently in place and not to any replacement or future mortgages.

41. Tenant's Remedies Against Landlord

41.1 Set-Off and Termination. The tenant may cure the landlord's defaults (after notice), set off the cost of cure (with interest at a high rate) against rent and terminate the lease. The tenant can set off against rent for claims against the landlord or any judgment against the landlord that is returned unsatisfied (or, if the landlord is in bankruptcy, then based upon the mere filing of a claim in the bankruptcy). The tenant may want similar remedies if any representation or warranty by the landlord is inaccurate. Review the assumptions that support the tenant's decision to enter into the lease. For example, let the tenant terminate if the nearby courthouse, train station, army base, university, or other business-driving installation moves or closes. Let the tenant terminate if the municipality enacts a minimum wage law and it affects a substantial portion of the tenant's employees.

41.2 Abatement. The tenant may want the right to abate rent if essential building services (access, electricity, other utilities, elevators, air-conditioning, etc.) are disrupted, or if the landlord is in default for longer than a specified period (after notice?). Trigger rent abatement rights based upon ____ or more days of problems during any ____ day period, rather than requiring that any single problem must continue for ____ days before the tenant may abate. If any such rent abatement continues for more than a certain period, then let the tenant terminate.

41.3 Self-Help. The tenant may want emergency self-help rights (including the right to install temporary equipment or service arrangements) if a water leak, power failure, or communications failure imperils the tenant's computer systems, communications systems, or other mission-critical equipment or operations. Allow only a very short period before this self-help right accrues for any fundamentally important function of the tenant, such as the tenant's network control center or computer system. The landlord should reimburse the tenant's reasonable self-help expenses.

41.4 Payment Not A Waiver. The tenant's payment of rent with knowledge of a landlord default should not waive the default.

41.5 "Exculpation" Clause. When an "exculpation" clause limits the landlord's liability to the landlord's interest in the property, try to include the following within the definition of the landlord's interest in the property: rental income, insurance proceeds, escrow funds, condemnation awards, the landlord's interest in security deposits and sales and refinancing proceeds. For certain major landlord obligations — e.g., completion of buildout or return of a security deposit — consider whether "exculpation" makes sense or whether, to the contrary, the tenant should insist on some level of creditworthy assurances from someone beyond a single-asset landlord, or perhaps a letter of credit.

41.6 Other Tenants' Closure. The tenant may want the right to terminate the lease (or pay only percentage rent) if specified other retail tenants shut down or if the overall occupancy level drops below a certain level. Although such provisions are most common in retail leases, they could conceivably even apply to an office building if occupancy drops to a level where the tenant's staff feels uncomfortable working in the building even if the landlord continues to provide services.

41.7 Other Business Relationships. Do the landlord and the tenant have any other relationship (e.g., purchase and sale of a business) that might give rise to tenant claims against the landlord for which the tenant should be entitled to offset against rent if the landlord does not pay after some extended notice and warning period?

42. Use

42.1 Any Lawful Use. Try to allow "any lawful use" or at least "any lawful retail/office use" of the premises.

42.2 Permitted Uses. Describe permitted uses generically to avoid restricting future use by a subtenant or assignee (e.g., "medical or other health practitioner's offices" or "executive offices" rather than "podiatrist's offices" or "main headquarters of XYZ Corp.>").

If the tenant anticipates making unusual uses of the space (e.g., for basketball courts, pets, bicycles hanging from the ceiling, sleeping facilities, etc.), confirm that the lease and applicable law will not prohibit these uses.

- 42.3 Future Change Of Use. Build in flexibility for future change of use if any possibility exists of a change in circumstances (e.g., likely technological obsolescence of the tenant's business). Prohibit the landlord from changing the use of the building.
- 42.4 Incidental Uses. Obtain pre-approval for incidental uses, such as automated teller machines (ATM), food, training, duplicating, ancillary retail, gym, day care, other amenities, network control center, etc. If necessary, the tenant can usually agree that these facilities will be open only to the tenant's employees and invitees who are already on the premises to do business with tenant. If the tenant ever wants to hold an event requiring a liquor license (event permit), require the landlord to sign the permit application.
- 42.5 Duty To Operate; Recapture. A tenant will prefer to have no duty to open or operate, implied or otherwise. If the landlord counters with a request for a recapture right if the tenant goes dark for a specified period, carve out permitted closures (e.g., for "force majeure event," alterations, inventory taking, other brief closings). Limit the time within which the landlord may decide to recapture. Require the landlord to reimburse the tenant's leasing and improvement costs if the landlord recaptures in these cases.
- 42.6 Satellite Dishes And Antennas. The landlord should allow the tenant to install satellite dishes and antennas on the roof, either at no charge or for a defined or ascertainable charge. Allow the tenant to relocate this equipment if necessary to improve performance. The landlord should agree to prohibit future rooftop users from interfering with the tenant's use.
- 42.7 Rooftop, Generally. The tenant may also want the right to install its own backup generators, supplemental air-conditioning and other equipment on the roof or elsewhere. If this will require structural reinforcement, the landlord should consent to it and ideally pay for it. For any rooftop or other off-premises equipment, the tenant will also want the landlord's consent, without charge, to the running of any wires, cables, connections and lines between the premises and the tenant's rooftop equipment. A tenant will prefer not to be obligated to remove any equipment or connecting lines at the end of the lease term. A top floor tenant should try to restrict the landlord's further construction on the roof.

- 42.8 Use of Sidewalk. A ground floor tenant may want the right to install awnings, canopies and crowd control barriers on the sidewalk. Will the tenant otherwise need to use the sidewalk or the exterior of the building for special events, temporary installations, or other purposes? Exterior loudspeakers? Exterior laser or light displays? Should there be any control/restriction on other tenants' ground floor uses?
- 42.9 Conflict with Other Leases. The lease should not say that the tenant's use may not conflict with other leases or mortgages — unless this lease defines exactly what those other leases or mortgages prohibit. Any future leases or mortgages (or amendments to either) should be irrelevant to the discussion.
- 42.10 Common Facilities. Allow the tenant to use building common facilities, such as cafeteria or health clubs, auditoriums, conference facilities and common lavatories if the leased premises do not include lavatories. The lease should state the minimum operating hours (24 hours in many cases) and maintenance and cleanliness standards for common facilities and any cost for such uses.
- 42.11 Outdoor Areas. The lease should give the tenant the exclusive use of terraces or other identified outdoor space or facilities adjacent to the tenant's premises. The landlord should maintain and clean these areas according to specified standards. Terraces create a tremendous risk of roof leaks, which the landlord will try to shift to the tenant. The tenant can reasonably argue that it's up to the landlord to design terraces that don't create roof leaks.
- 42.12 24 Hour/365 Day Access. The tenant should obtain 24-hour access, 365 days a year, via elevator or (if the elevator is broken) stairway. Unless the leased premises are on a very low floor, think about establishing consequences (monetary payments) if the elevators break down to the point where the tenant can't obtain access to the floor, though this level of breakdown rarely actually happens.
- 42.13 Reception, Security, Other Facilities. Will the tenant want to install any reception, security, package handling, messenger, or other facilities in the lobby, basement, ground floor, or other common area of the building? If so, the lease should allow them and negate any obligation to pay rent for the affected space.

42.14 Storage Areas. In addition to the premises, the tenant may want to lease storage space available in the building. Any such arrangements should be coterminous with the lease and not, for example, a revocable license.

43. Utilities, Generally (Except Electricity)

43.1 Entry Point. The landlord should bring all utilities to a defined entry point on the perimeter of the premises, not just wherever the landlord decides to bring them. Decide what entry point works best for the tenant, for each utility service.

43.2 Special Requirements. Require the landlord to allow the tenant or its service providers to install T-1 and fiber optic lines, multiple points of entry and other telecommunications facilities, including cabling and connections from service providers to the premises. Recognize that these technologies and related tenant requirements will change over time.

43.3 Free Choice of Carrier. Allow the tenant to use any carriers or utilities it wishes for telecommunications and other services. The landlord must, without charge, cooperate as needed, such as by signing papers, providing closet space in the basement, providing pathways as needed and providing information. Requirements of federal law may actually mandate some of this. The tenant's counsel should check what law requires and what must be negotiated. Of course, law could change.

43.4 Excess Capacity. If generators or fuel systems in the building have excess capacity, require the landlord to preserve at least some of that excess capacity (without allocating it to other tenants) to maximize the backup value of those systems to this tenant.

43.5 Alternative Providers. Limit the landlord's right to change power or telecom providers.

44. Preliminary Arrangements And Considerations

44.1 Brokerage. Is a brokerage agreement in place? Are the commission negotiations completed? If the landlord will pay the broker, as is typical, does the tenant want to discuss having the broker rebate part of the broker's commission to the tenant?

- 44.2 Term Sheets And Letters Of Intent. Attorneys should deal with term sheets and letters of intent early in the lease negotiation process to raise and resolve major issues while it is relatively easy (and inexpensive) to do so. These preliminary documents should state they do not bind anyone, except relating to such matters as confidentiality.
- 44.3 Board Approval. If the tenant will require its own internal board or other approval to ratify a contemplated transaction, provide for that condition in all letters of intent, term sheets, lease drafts and other preliminary documents.
- 44.4 Tax Incentives. Can the tenant qualify for any tax incentives, abatements, deferrals, rebates, subsidies, or other governmental benefits? Check the timing requirements and pitfalls for any application. Often, a tenant must apply before “committing” to a new location.
- 44.5 Warranties. If the landlord has the benefit of any warranties for the building, the tenant may want to be a beneficiary of those warranties and have the right to enforce them directly against the warrantor.
- 44.6 Premises Off Market. During the lease negotiations, ask the landlord to agree to remove the space from the market and not to negotiate with other parties for a specified period. In particular, ask the landlord to remove any “for lease” signs at the premises, while the parties negotiate. Should the parties agree to a break-up fee? A reimbursement of expenses and attorneys' fees if the deal dies?
- 44.7 Tenant's Professionals. Select, coordinate and negotiate the contracts of the tenant's other professionals: architect, broker, engineer, facilities consultant, signage designer, space planner and so forth. Try to get architects started early. Architects usually cost less than either lawyers or rent. The tenant's architect should review the lease while it is being negotiated.
- 44.8 Tenant's Procedures. Understand the tenant's (and the landlord's) internal approval procedures, including any documentation requirements and likelihood for delay.

44.9 Backup Lease Negotiations. Consider negotiating multiple leases at the same time, though perhaps at various stages of negotiations, to be able to recover quickly if the lease negotiations for a particular premises break down or the landlord decides to lease to some other tenant.

45. Due Diligence

As noted above, no one should regard this checklist as exhaustive or complete. This is particularly true as it applies to the following list of “due diligence” investigation that the tenant’s counsel may wish to perform, or make sure other tenant advisers perform:

45.1 Existing Condition of Premises. Is the existing condition of the premises satisfactory? Does the tenant need to change the certificate of occupancy? Can it be changed? Are there open violations or permits? If so, require the landlord to correct them, at least if they delay the tenant’s construction. Does zoning law allow the tenant’s intended use of the new premises? What existing personal property is included? Should the landlord be required to remove—or be required to leave in place—any existing improvements or personal property? Does the landlord plan any major work affecting the building? If so, should the tenant try to limit the work in any way? If the lease covers the top floor of the building, does the landlord plan to construct additional space above, or do any major work on the roof? Is there anything about the space, or the building as a whole, that the tenant would not want the landlord to change? If so, the lease should prohibit the landlord from making such changes, or else the tenant won’t be able to stop them. Is the view from the premises critical to its perceived value? Could the view become obstructed during the lease term? In such event, should tenant have a right to terminate? Is there any risk of hazardous substances dripping from floors above? Unpleasant smells from other premises?

45.2 Title Search. Perform a title search and review, or an online search to confirm, ownership of the fee (easily available in many areas). Check any prior recorded documents that might affect this tenant. Review the landlord’s certificate of occupancy. Perform other municipal searches. Does the landlord have any outstanding violations that might impair the tenant’s ability to obtain necessary permits?

- 45.3 Square Footage. Don't believe the landlord's or broker's numbers. Calculate the actual square footage and scope of the premises. Do all of the landlord's exclusions and inclusions of space make sense? For example, should the elevator lobby be part of the premises? Does the landlord propose that the premises include any mechanical space or equipment that the tenant won't really use? Don't assume "REBNY" or "BOMA" measurement standards make any practical sense. And compare the landlord's "rentable" square footage (sometimes rather creatively calculated) against the actual "usable" or "carpetable" square footage (as measured) of the premises. What space in the building does the landlord treat as "building common areas," thus increasing the rentable square footage of this tenant's premises? Do any of those "building common areas" really benefit only particular tenants rather than all tenants in the building? After adjusting for the "loss factor" (the percentage reduction from "rentable" to "usable" space), do the economics still make sense? Might the tenant be paying for any unusual spaces or installations that really should be entirely irrelevant to the leased premises? Perhaps none of this matters, as long as the tenant is satisfied with the space and the number of dollars the tenant is paying for the space, regardless of its square footage. But many tenants want to compare the "price per foot" of multiple options, and this requires measuring footage in a consistent way.
- 45.4 Special Permits. Do any unusual uses require special permits or that special measures be taken to obtain necessary permits (e.g., liquor licenses, generators, sidewalk cafes)? If the tenant conducts business in a regulated industry, will the tenant need any regulatory approvals? How long will any permitting or approval process take, and what will it require? For example, the landlord may need to sign documents as part of the permit application, and should agree to do so. What other permits might the tenant need, such as public assembly? If the tenant anticipates delay or possible failure in obtaining one of these permits, the tenant should, at a certain point, have the right to terminate the lease.
- 45.5 Ventilation. Does the space provide adequate ventilation, or adequate pathways for the tenant to install new ventilation? The tenant should either perform its own indoor air quality report or critically review the landlord's report.

- 45.6 Escalations. The tenant, and particularly its accounting and leasing personnel, may want to consider at least these due diligence issues on escalations:
- (A) Capital Projects. What capital projects are underway or contemplated today? Does the tenant agree with how the landlord plans to treat them?
 - (B) Historical Operating Expenses. What are the historical amounts for operating expenses and taxes? Review the underlying financial information, presentation, characterization and documents, including sample escalation statements.
 - (C) Pre-Programmed Increases in Assessment. Investigate any built-in future increases in the tax assessment (e.g., termination of interim assessment, upcoming loss or phase-out of existing abatement or exemption). Is the building fully assessed? Does anything about the tax assessment for the building suggest future increases are unusually likely?
- 45.7 Telecommunications Capacity. Investigate available capacity and pathways for telecommunications and other utilities. Is service available from more than one company?
- 45.8 Technological Requirements. Check the tenant's network and other technological requirements.
- 45.9 Rooftop. Check lines of sight for a rooftop satellite dish or antenna. Can the roof support any heavy equipment the tenant will install? Will the tenant be able to get the equipment up to the roof?
- 45.10 Present Occupancy. What is the present occupancy of the premises to be leased? What is the practical likelihood of delays in possession?
- 45.11 Tenant's Existing Lease. Review the existing tenant's lease for expiration date, holdover penalties, etc. If the tenant will need a short extension, ask for it early in the process, as the tenant's existing landlord may become less accommodating over time.
- 45.12 Disposition of Present Premises. If the tenant has "too much" time remaining on the tenant's existing lease, how does the tenant plan to dispose of the premises it now occupies? Does the tenant understand any uncertainties and risks in that process?

- 45.13 Engineering. If the tenant is taking the building systems as is, have an engineer check them--particularly the HVAC. The tenant's engineers should consider a range of issues, including the adequacy, directness and feasibility of pathways for utilities and services for the premises and more mundane issues such as floor load capacities. Does the building offer sufficient utility capacity for the tenant's needs? Multiple competing suppliers of, e.g., telecommunications services?
- 45.14 Security. Does the landlord's security program meet the tenant's expectations?
- 45.15 Meter. If the premises are metered or submetered, does any meter or submeter also serve any space outside the premises?
- 45.16 Taxes. Any transaction might raise tax issues. Consider those during negotiations. Might the tenant qualify for any tax credits, abatements, subsidies, incentives, etc.? Usually, a tenant needs to apply for any of these measures before signing a lease. A careful tenant should investigate them early in the process.
- 45.17 Operating Requirements. Does the tenant have any unusual operating requirements, procedures, or expectations? Specific expectations on usage of loading docks, freight elevators, security guards, or lobby operations? Anything outside the premises? Identify these and state them in the lease.
- 45.18 Environmental Concerns. Consider whether the tenant should obtain an environmental review or perhaps a "baseline" to memorialize environmental conditions at lease inception. The tenant may want to take a look at the landlord's energy audit reports.
- 45.19 Special Governmental Requirements. Does the landlord have any special subsidies, tax benefits, or other forms of governmental support? Do any of those things impose any nonstandard requirements on the tenant? Based on legislation enacted in 2015, those nonstandard requirements may arise outside the lease and the land records, as a result of governmental edicts. For example, New York City now says that whenever a landlord receives certain benefits, all tenants in the building must pay a "living wage" higher than would otherwise apply. This has nothing to do with the lease; it just applies. Tenants should look into this type of issue and, among other things, seek suitable assurances from the landlord.

- 45.20 Violations. Check for any notices of violation filed against the property that could impair the tenant's ability to obtain necessary permits. Also, check for any litigation against the landlord.
- 45.21 Landlord's Credit Issues. Should the tenant worry about the landlord's creditworthiness?
- 45.22 Tenant's Insurance. Make sure the tenant's insurance program adequately covers the new location and the tenant's activities there.
- 45.23 Tenant Entity. Determine which entity will enter into the lease and, if necessary, form that entity and figure out its ownership structure. Give the landlord this information early in this process to prevent surprises and last-minute suspicions.
- 45.24 Consents. Determine and satisfy the tenant's internal corporate approval requirements to enter into the lease.
- 45.25 Design and Construction. The tenant should start to think about design and construction of its new space – and the contracts necessary for that work – at the same time the tenant negotiates its lease. That thought process should include a critical examination of the likely cost of the tenant's work.

46. Lease-Related Closing Documents

At closing, any significant lease transaction may require a number of documents other than the lease itself. Counsel should resolve these documents as part of the lease negotiation process. They might include any of the following:

- 46.1 Memorandum of Lease. Mention any “exclusive use” rights and other lease provisions that restrict the landlord's activities on other premises. Record the memorandum against all affected real property (e.g., “outparcels”).
- 46.2 Nondisturbance Agreement. See the “lender's form” nondisturbance agreement as soon as possible, so it can be negotiated and signed along with the lease. Attach it as an exhibit as the standard for future nondisturbance agreements.
- 46.3 Reciprocal Easement Agreement. For a new retail mall or mixed-use project, the tenant may want to have a role in establishing and approving any reciprocal easement agreement that the landlord intends to record against the project.

- 46.4 Recognition Agreement And Estoppel from Ground Lessor. If the landlord actually leases the building from a third party (a “ground lease”), any space tenant may want appropriate protections and assurances from the underlying fee owner. The tenant should generally insist on having that agreement in place at the same time the tenant signs its lease.
- 46.5 Written Authority For Agent. If the landlord’s agent signs the lease (or any future amendment or estoppel certificate), the landlord should deliver a copy of a written authorization to sign.
- 46.6 Additional Consents. Does the landlord need any consents or approvals? This is especially important if the landlord is a governmental entity or charity. Approvals could be internal or require cooperation from lenders, ground lessors, or other third parties. The landlord should represent and warrant that it needs no further consents or approvals and deliver copies of any necessary consents or approvals at closing.
- 46.7 Opinion Of Landlord’s Counsel. One could limit such an opinion to authorization and execution and related issues, without entering the morass of issues—angels dancing on a pin—raised by “enforceability.”
- 46.8 Transfer Taxes. Beware of transfer taxes generally. The calculation and allocation of any transfer taxes on the creation of the lease, including the treatment of any transfer of personal property, should be embodied in a closing document. In New York, some leases attract transfer tax, whether or not the parties record a memorandum of lease. Transfers of personalty may attract a sales tax. Prepare all necessary transfer tax returns, including required calculations and exhibits (e.g., copy of the entire lease, if required). Get them signed and filed.
- 46.9 Title Insurance. Consider obtaining a policy of leasehold title insurance, or at a minimum an updated title search.
- 46.10 Unusual Security Arrangements. Unusual security arrangements—letters of credit, delivery of marketable securities and the like—should be structured and documented. The landlord’s lender and other conceivable third parties may also need to get involved in these discussions. Those third parties may ultimately become the “critical path” to signing the lease. They often have rigid documentation requirements applied by rigid people.

- 46.11 Leasehold Insurance. Consider separate casualty insurance coverage for a valuable leasehold. If the lease requires insurance, comply with those requirements (e.g., insurer’s ratings, additional insureds, evidence of insurance).
- 46.12 Insurance Advice. Send the insurance and casualty provisions of the lease to the tenant’s insurance advisor for review and comment. Confirm the tenant’s broker can actually issue the contemplated insurance coverages and in a timely manner.
- 46.13 Landlord’s Approvals. Obtain and confirm the landlord’s approval of plans and specifications for initial work. Attach the plans and specifications as a schedule to the lease. If the tenant enters into any immediate subleases, have the landlord approve those at the time of lease signing.
- 46.14 Diagram of Premises. Include an exhibit consisting of a precise diagram of the premises. Confirm that the tenant, the broker and other advisors reviewed and approved the diagram. Try to make this happen early in the process. The landlord may think it is “obvious” that certain spaces should be excluded or included, but the landlord may be wrong.
- 46.15 Guaranty. Any guaranty of a lease will raise its own issues. A discussion of these issues lies beyond this checklist.
- 46.16 Internal Approvals. Any documents necessary to evidence the tenant’s internal approval of the contemplated lease (resolutions, consents, or the like).
- 46.17 Rent Bill. Instructions for how to pay rent under the lease, if not incorporated into the lease, and calculation of the first rent bill.
- 46.18 Brokerage Commission. Evidence of payment of any brokerage commission.
- 46.19 Client Instructions. If the client instructed counsel to do anything less than a full lease review and negotiation, counsel should maintain some written record of those instructions and a record that counsel warned the client about the risks of “minimalism” in lease negotiations. Memories are short.

46.20 Exhibits. Focus on the exhibits early on. No one will be very happy if the lease is otherwise ready to sign but the parties have not worked out some items that were left for the exhibits.

47. Post-Closing Items

Like any other real estate transaction, a tenancy under a lease may require post-closing legal attention in order for the tenant to preserve its rights. The following are a few items that the tenant’s counsel may want to handle or at least mention to the tenant:

47.1 Advice And Administration Memo. The tenant may desire its counsel to prepare a memorandum to summarize any proactive and nonobvious actions that the tenant should take to protect its position under the lease. Such a memo might, for example, describe the deadlines and processes for objecting to the landlord’s delivery of the space; escalation statements; or provision of building services.

47.2 Ticklers For Deadlines. The tenant may want to make tickler file entries for tax protest deadlines, option and/or renewal exercise dates, letter of credit renewal dates and any other deadlines.

47.3 Future Filings. If the lease contemplates that the tenant will make any nonintuitive filings, or take any other nonstandard actions, the tenant’s counsel may wish to bring those matters formally to the tenant’s attention. This list might also include any necessary filings for available governmental incentives.

47.4 Escalation Audits. Note the deadlines to initiate any audit of the landlord’s operating expenses or other escalations. For the first year of operating expenses, audit the operating expenses not only for that year but also for the base year.

47.5 Tax Protests. The tenant should understand the deadlines for tax protests and any actions the tenant should take to preserve and exercise any rights to require the landlord to protest taxes.

47.6 Commencement Date Letter. When the commencement date has actually occurred, confirm it in writing and reconfirm the expiration date and any other dates keyed off the commencement date.

- 47.7 Options; Rent Adjustments. The parties should memorialize all option terms and rent adjustments in writing.
- 47.8 Estoppel Certificates. If the landlord asks the tenant to sign an estoppel certificate, the tenant should take it seriously, start researching the facts immediately and take advantage of the opportunity to put pressure on the landlord to solve any problems that the tenant identifies. Courts do take estoppel certificates seriously. The tenant should not simply “sign and return.” If the lease allows the tenant to require estoppel certificates of the landlord, the tenant may occasionally wish to do so, just to avoid future issues or surprises.
- 47.9 Future Lease Transactions. Any future lease amendments (or negotiated termination of the lease) may require consent from the landlord’s mortgagee. Raise that issue early in the discussion. The landlord may otherwise think the tenant won’t really insist. Even if the landlord’s loan documents don’t expressly require lender consent to certain lease amendments, if the lender “granted” a nondisturbance agreement, that agreement will say the lender (or a foreclosure purchaser) won’t be bound by any lease amendments it did not approve.
- 47.10 Recordation. If the parties signed a memorandum of lease, then the tenant should make sure it actually gets recorded and recorded correctly.
- 47.11 Effect Of Memorandum of Lease. If the tenant recorded a memorandum of the original lease, then New York law in effect requires an amendment to the memorandum to be recorded (and accompanying transfer tax returns to be filed) whenever the parties amend the lease. Even if the amendment changes nothing that the recorded memorandum of lease disclosed, New York law requires the additional recording to give notice of the mere fact that the lease was amended. The tenant should insist on such an additional recording. For simplicity, both the landlord and the tenant may prefer to embody any future amendment in a single recorded document, assuming nothing in it must stay confidential.
- 47.12 Notices. If the tenant has relocated its main office or legal department, then the tenant may need to notify all its contractual counterparties of the new address. This may require the tenant to do some digging in its contract files. If the tenant has filed any notice of address for service of process with any Secretary of State's office (e.g., the tenant's state of formation and any state where the tenant has qualified to do business) or corporate service company, the tenant should update those filings as well. Who else needs to know about the tenant's change of address, and what level of formality will that change of address require? Taxing authorities? Don't assume an ordinary emailed or bulk-mailed announcement will do the job. Similarly, going forward, the tenant should watch for change of address notices from the landlord or a mortgagee (for example, every time the building is sold or refinanced). The tenant should update its records accordingly.

47.13 Nondisturbance Agreements. If a future mortgage lender requires the tenant to sign a nondisturbance agreement for a closing, insist that the agreement not become effective unless the lender signs and returns it to the tenant at closing or within a short time thereafter.

47.14 Landlord Relations. Maintain good relations with the landlord. Keep the landlord informed on anything relevant to the tenant's occupancy of the building. Have a communications channel. Use that channel before the need for any serious communications arise. That way when things arise, the tenant has someone to talk to, and the landlord knows who the tenant is. Pay the rent early every month. This is the single best way to maintain a good landlord-tenant relationship, and probably far more useful than any magic language the tenant can include in the lease.

LANDLORD'S CHECKLIST OF SILENT LEASE ISSUES (THIRD EDITION)

[7.0] I. INTRODUCTION

If you represent a landlord, do not assume a “standard” commercial lease says everything it should. Unexpected issues can lurk, sometimes silently, sometimes not. This checklist gives landlord’s counsel a tool to spot those issues and prepare or negotiate a better lease.

Any lawyer who handles commercial lease negotiations has lived through the same story a billion times: After much back and forth, often over an extended time, the landlord and the tenant have come to an agreement on the business terms of a lease. The landlord will then call or email its attorney (you) to put together a lease that covers the negotiated terms. Just this one time, the parties are really in a hurry. And the landlord, with a keen eye on the bottom line and prevention of delay, doesn’t want to break new ground in the world of commercial leasing. The landlord’s counsel, feeling the pressure to deliver what the landlord wants in the most cost-effective way possible, turns to one or some combination of the following:

- A standard form of lease, preferably one that someone updated and improved recently, but more likely one that no one has updated and improved for a very long time;
- A form of lease from some other similar recent transaction; or
- A similar lease between the same parties or their affiliates negotiated for a different deal.

In this checklist, a “Standard Form” refers to any of those possibilities.

What’s in a Standard Form lease anyway?

A Standard Form lease will probably do an adequate job of covering bread-and-butter leasing issues. But it almost certainly will not adequately consider recent developments in leasing law, recently reported cases, unreported litigation and disputes, newly discovered gaps and glitches in Standard Forms generally, advances in technology, or changes in the marketplace. If participants in other transactions have come up with better ways to handle landlord-tenant issues, or have identified new issues that nobody has thought about before, those things usually will not appear in a Standard Form.

[7.1] II. GETTING AROUND TO IT

Even if you know your Standard Form needs work—and almost all of them do—you probably will not have the time during any particular leasing transaction to give your Standard Form a tune-up, much less an overhaul. Yet clients expect (demand, actually) a suitable document, consistent with modern industry standards, immediately, if not yesterday. Even if the business negotiations moved like a glacier before you got involved, as soon as the landlord and the tenant reach a deal, they want the legal work done instantly. They know: (1) lawyers just push buttons to create documents, and (2) leases are pretty simple and standard documents, so after pushing the button it shouldn't take long to generate a lease. Does your landlord client want you to pause long enough to improve your Standard Form? Only in your spare time—and only after the deal has been signed—and not on their meter.

If you want to improve your Standard Form, though, you need to start somewhere. You might first gather up several other recent leases that seem particularly well done, thorough, and up-to-date. You might read each one and compare it against your Standard Form, improving the Standard Form as appropriate. This is a job that almost no particular transaction will ever support or even allow. And editing any Standard Form will probably never rise to the top of your to-do list, either. The job is just too big and squishy, to say nothing of being a bit painful. But you should, at least as an aspiration, try to do it once in a while anyway.

[7.2] III. HOW THIS CHECKLIST WAS BORN

To simplify that process, and to create a road map for any landlord's attorney who wants to update a Standard Form, in 2000 the New York State Bar Association Real Property Law Section Commercial Leasing Committee appointed a subcommittee to prepare the first edition of a Landlord's Checklist of Silent Lease Issues.

Looking at leasing transactions from a landlord's perspective, the subcommittee tried to identify issues that a typical Standard Form would probably cover inadequately, or not at all. These issues—the “landlord's silent lease issues”—might arise from any of the causes or trends described above. Many of them also reflect the reality that judges do not like to infer obligations or prohibitions in leases, particularly in New York, and particularly at the behest of a landlord or to the detriment of tenants, often a “protected class” in the New York courts even in commercial cases. Courts often say that if a landlord wanted to impose any particular obligation, burden, restriction, or prohibition on a tenant, then the landlord should have made it clear in the lease. If the landlord didn't do that, the courts usually will not do it for them. Courts routinely rule that if something is not in the documents that the parties signed, then it is not part of the deal. This checklist aims to help landlords assure that their leases contain whatever they may need to contain.

The Landlord's Checklist initially sought to suggest pro-landlord changes in a Standard Form that would apply in at least 15 percent of commercial leasing transactions. For an issue to make it on to the list, though, earlier editions required that the issue was also less than 50 percent likely to appear in a typical Standard Form, assuming the Standard Form was intended to cover transactions of the type for which the issue is relevant but had not been updated recently. The first and second editions of the Landlord's Checklist theoretically ignored any provision that the authors thought was 50 percent or more likely (when relevant) to appear in a typical Standard Form, or likely to apply in less than 15 percent of commercial leases. This sounds incredibly scientific and responsible, but is not really.

Both the "15 percent test" and the "50 percent test" were applied in an absolutely arbitrary, capricious, and subjective manner, with no evidence, data, or other empirical information, validation, confirmation, or corroboration of any kind whatsoever. Random exceptions were made with precisely the same level of analytical rigor. Thus, the inclusion or exclusion of any particular issue carries and continues to carry no weight. The checklist merely amounts to a reasonable reference point for anyone representing a landlord and looking for points to consider when improving a landlord's form of lease. Such imperfections and incompleteness are inevitable in any checklist like this one.

These imperfections only compounded themselves as the Landlord's Checklist grew over time to become something closer to a generic checklist for lease negotiations. The threshold for adding suggestions to the checklist eroded over time. Thus, many comments in this checklist no longer have the aura of mystery and intrigue that ran throughout the first (and to a lesser degree the second) edition of this checklist. One should, however, still not assume that this Landlord's Checklist offers a complete list of everything that a landlord's counsel should consider.

[7.3] A. What The Checklist Does

Any issues checklist like this one will probably cover both too much and too little at the same time. Nevertheless, this Landlord's Checklist valiantly seeks to deliver a summary of the latest issues that an author of a "state-of-the-art" Standard Form might wish to cover, all collected in one place, in a condensed manner, to help commercial leasing practitioners. That was true of both the first and second editions and is even more true of this third edition.

[7.4] B. Does The Checklist Give Landlords An Unfair Advantage?

Some might argue that Standard Forms are already landlord-oriented enough and no one benefits from piling on even more landlord rights and tenant burdens (also known as "gotcha" clauses). The landlord can counter that argument by stating that once in possession, the tenant has all the leverage and judicial sympathy, and the landlord just has the words of the lease on which to rely. A landlord would also argue that if the lease enforcement game were played on a level playing field, then perhaps Standard Forms would not need to be landlord-oriented; they could just be "balanced" and "fair." The use of landlord-oriented Standard Forms, the argument goes, merely represents some minimal effort to restore balance to the landlord-tenant relationship. Tenants' counsel would, of course, disagree.

As a variation on the theme of leveling the playing field, this Landlord's Checklist will also help a landlord's counsel respond when a major tenant insists on using its own form of lease. The points mentioned in this checklist will often correlate with the points that a tenant's form of lease somehow manages to omit, or perhaps covers in a way that does not adequately protect the landlord.

[7.5] C. Intended For Major Commercial Space Leases

This checklist is intended mainly for substantial commercial space leases, for both retail and office uses, and other commercial occupancies. This checklist does not apply to residential leasing transactions. They raise their own set of "consumer protection" issues that can be treacherous, much like the minefield of residential mortgage lending.

Most issues here will apply to some leases but not others. Every item in this checklist should be interpreted as if prefaced by the words: "if applicable, appropriate, desired, possible, and realistic under the circumstances, taking into account the size and nature of the transaction, market conditions, the landlord's project, the tenant mix, the needs and negotiating positions of the parties, the history, the timing, governing law, and all other circumstances." Those words appear here once, but they could just as well appear as part of every suggestion made in the checklist.

Before adding anything from this list to a lease as part of a negotiation, first check to see if the lease under negotiation already covers it. If it does, only consider whether the suggestions here inspire some fine-tuning of the particular lease provision. Do not ask for something you do not need, because if it's already in the lease and you show the addition as a highlighted change, you may lead the tenant's counsel to focus on it and ask for concessions they might never have thought of otherwise.

This checklist does not try to suggest which issues apply to which types of leases, which issues matter most, or how a tenant might respond to any of these issues. Particularly given these limitations, this checklist will add more value for an experienced lease negotiator than for a novice. Even a novice, though, will find it useful. Any reader of this checklist should use it prudently and with judgment, and should not stop thinking just because something appears on this checklist. Do not just shovel words from this checklist into a lease.

Sometimes, a landlord will tell its lawyer to "just update the major issues, and do not bother with the minor stuff." In those cases, this checklist might help counsel raise a few "major" issues, but the client will probably not appreciate it if counsel makes extensive use of this list.

If your landlord client has directed you to focus only on the critical issues because of budgetary, transactional, or time constraints, you might focus on these as the "most important" lease sections for review and comment:

- Rent, including escalations and percentage rent;
- Operating expenses;
- Real estate tax and escalations;
- Use;
- Consents;

- Services by landlord;
- Utilities, including electricity;
- Assignment and subletting;
- Security deposit; and
- Defaults and remedies.

If relevant to the transaction, you will probably also want to consider provisions on Alterations, End of Term and, in a suburban building, Parking. This list is not exhaustive or complete. The authors recommend against using this short list at all, and instead considering all sections of any lease.

If a client insists on the limited approach suggested here, then you want to make it clear that you recommended a more careful and complete approach. This is especially important if it turns out that some “minor” item—something that counsel skipped—turns out to be important and expensive to fix.

[7.6] D. Caveats, Warnings, Disclosures

This checklist does not represent a position statement or recommendation by the New York State Bar Association or its Real Property Law Section, Commercial Leasing Committee, any of its subcommittees, any member of any of them, or either of the authors. This checklist is offered merely as a tool for leasing practitioners, in the hope that it might help. It creates no legal duties or obligations, and no standard of care. No representation or warranty is made on the enforceability, validity, or practical feasibility (or palatability to a tenant) of any provision suggested here. The checklist simply lists some issues landlord’s counsel might want to consider when updating a Standard Form or responding to a tenant’s lease form.

Although the authors of the checklist and the subcommittee members will be honored and pleased if anyone who reads this checklist mentions it in lease negotiations, this checklist does not estop any author or subcommittee member from taking any position in any lease negotiation. To the contrary, any reference to or quotation of this checklist in lease negotiations shall constitute an immediate and incurable event of default.

[7.7] E. Notes on Style

In the editing process, the authors decided to express some issues as affirmative recommendations, to achieve a more direct and lively presentation. Thus, the checklist sometimes says a landlord “should” consider some concept or even “should” add specific provisions to a lease. Take each such statement with a barrel of salt. The subcommittee and the authors do not purport to establish or define requirements for what any lease should or should not say or what any landlord’s counsel should think about or do. Every lease represents its own negotiation, depending largely on the considerations above. One-size-fits-all recommendations usually do not work.

This checklist mentions each issue only once, even if it might reasonably belong under more than one heading, but provides no cross-references, even in cases where this checklist breaks one topic into two related topics, both of which you should consider. Read this checklist from beginning to end.

[7.8] F. The Case Law

Although court decisions drive many landlord concerns suggested in this checklist, we do not cite a single case. Any effort to cite cases would change the character of the checklist. Case citations could go on almost without end, but would add little practical value for lease negotiators. If you want to find case law relevant to any issue, plenty of other resources exist for that purpose. For example, you might consider visiting a law library. They still exist. Many readers will fondly recall that a library is a room or other central physical facility that contains a range of “books,” which are objects consisting of multiple paper sheets, typically printed on both sides, in which people who claim (and often even have) expertise in a particular legal area share the benefit of that expertise. A book can sometimes be even more effective than Google as a legal research tool. Unfortunately, books are also more work to use, often requiring the user to leave his or her computer terminal and constant easy access to his or her email stream for well over five minutes. Books also create that the risk that the user will learn something about related legal issues not directly responsive to the user’s specific question, surely an inefficient and unnecessary use of time.

Likewise, you will need to develop lease language from sources outside this checklist (another visit to the library, perhaps?) or by thinking.

[7.9] G. Beyond The Four Corners of The Lease

This checklist considers primarily what goes into the lease itself. A successful leasing transaction also requires a landlord's counsel to consider many "silent" and other issues outside the leasing document. Those issues fall in three categories, collected at the end of this checklist: (1) due diligence; (2) additional lease-related documents and deliveries; and (3) administering and monitoring the lease after the parties sign it.

[7.10] H. Have At It

So, keeping in mind that this checklist is not perfect, that it offers an accumulation of issues with no scientific rigor whatsoever, that misusing this checklist can create problems not solve them, that the unanticipated and the unexpected are also the inevitable, and that, in the end, every lawyer must do his or her own thinking, we present for your perusal and, we hope, edification and practical value, the third edition of the Landlord's Checklist of Silent Lease Issues.

1. Alterations and Build-Out

1.1 Activities Outside Premises. If the lease lets the tenant perform alterations outside the premises (such as cable or riser installations, HVAC equipment installations, back-up generator, or fuel storage and transmission), the tenant should, at a minimum, meet all the same requirements (including removal/restoration) that would govern interior alterations. At the landlord's option, consider having the landlord, not the tenant, perform any alterations that affect space outside the premises, but at the tenant's expense.

1.2 Americans with Disabilities Act (and Similar Laws). Require the tenant's alterations to comply with not only the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA), but also state and local laws, state and local codes, etc., on disabled/handicapped access. The latter can be more burdensome than federal law. Allow the landlord to block any alteration, even inside the leased premises, if it might require any significant changes to space outside the leased premises to comply with these laws. In any case, the landlord must understand those requirements, allocating their cost between the landlord and the tenant, before signing the lease. In the worst case, complying with these requirements may be so expensive that a particular building will not work for a particular tenant.

1.3 Artists' Rights. Prohibit the tenant from installing any artwork that could give the artist a right under federal law to prevent the artwork from being modified or removed. The law in question is the Visual Artists Rights Act of 1990. That was a busy year for federal landlord-tenant legislation, the same year Congress enacted the ADA. If the tenant has an agreement with the artist governing removal, the landlord needs to see and approve that agreement (and any amendments) and it must allow modification or removal of the installed artwork without cost to the landlord. Consider requiring a direct agreement between the artist and the landlord on these issues. Attach to the lease a copy of the artist's agreement.

1.4 Broker's Representations. State that any representations made by a broker, including representations on square footage, do not bind anyone and shall not be used to interpret the lease.

1.5 Building Security. Reserve the landlord's right to control building security. The landlord needs the right to install or change security cameras, scanning devices, and any other security technology—including future security technology—in common areas. Require the tenant to waive any right to object to such devices, and any right to sue the landlord over any privacy, labor, or workplace issues arising from their use. But the landlord should have no implied obligations on security, even if the landlord installs security equipment.

1.6 Completion of Alterations. Require the tenant to finish any construction job, close out all alteration permits, and deliver a final certificate of occupancy within a reasonable but determinable time after the tenant has obtained its first building permit, received possession or substantially completed its work. The tenant must also keep the landlord informed of tenant's schedule and progress.

1.7 Completion Bond. Before the tenant undertakes alterations expected to cost above a stated amount, require the tenant to deliver a bond or letter of credit in an amount equal to X percent of the estimated cost. (By the way, bonds sound great, but most bonds come from general contractors and don't necessarily backstop the tenant's payment and performance obligations.) If the landlord doesn't require bonds for construction work because the tenant has great credit, consider giving the landlord the right to rescind this concession if the tenant's credit deteriorates or the tenant assigns the lease.

1.8 Construction Protocols. During construction, require the tenant to fence or close off its premises. Prohibit the tenant's contractors from entering the premises until the landlord has completed its work. If the tenant needs a staging area, the tenant should use only the area (if any) that the landlord designates.

1.9 Exterior Hoist. If the tenant wants to use a hoist outside the building, all lease provisions, rules, and regulations that govern alterations and activities within the premises should also apply to the hoist. Consider requiring that the landlord, rather than the tenant, control the hoist, although the landlord may not want the headaches or exposure. In the lease or a separate agreement, the parties should memorialize the terms of the tenant's use of the hoist, including priorities among the landlord and other tenants if the hoist will not belong exclusively to the tenant. Require the tenant to remove the hoist by a certain date. Should the landlord have the right to "free rides" on any hoist? If other tenants complain about the hoist or even try to claim rent offsets because of it, the tenant should indemnify the landlord. If the landlord has installed the hoist, provide for scheduling, charges and the right to remove it, particularly if the hoist has overstayed its welcome. In any agreement or lease provisions on the hoist, think about how the hoist is attached, use of walkie-talkies, the landlord's liability under scaffolding or other strict liability laws, permits, insurance and the landlord's liability to other tenants.

1.10 Filings. Consider requiring that the landlord's architect or expeditor supervise or handle all certificate of occupancy filings, and perhaps all other governmental filings for the tenant's work. Issues with the tenant's filing (and closing out of permits once issued) may impair the ability of the landlord or other tenants to pursue other work in the building. If the landlord signs permit applications, this should not waive any obligations of the tenant or make the landlord responsible for anything about the tenant's work.

1.11 Labor Harmony. The tenant's obligation to maintain labor harmony should relate not just to construction, but also to any other activities at the premises and in the building. Establish a specific monetary consequence if the tenant doesn't comply. Describe it as liquidated damages, and include the magic language necessary to make the liquidated damages enforceable. Also, prohibit the tenant from starting its work until the landlord has completed all "base building" and other landlord work. Simultaneous work creates greater risk of disharmony.

1.12 Landmarked Buildings. If the building is designated as an historical landmark (or lies within a similarly protected area), include whatever "magic language" the landmarks protection law requires. If the building is not so designated, but might make an attractive target for designation, the tenant should agree: (i) not to file for historic designation, (ii) not to support any such designation without the landlord's consent; and (iii) to oppose any such designation if the landlord asks the tenant to do so.

1.13 Lender Consent. All alterations require approval by the landlord's lenders.

1.13. Liens. Try to say that the landlord's fee interest will not be subject to liens arising from the tenant's alterations, but do not assume the language will work. One could even argue that including such language is deceptive, because a non-lawyer on the landlord's staff might read it and think it solves any problem.

1.14 Modifications to Plans and Specifications. Limit the tenant's right to modify its plans and specifications, except as necessary to conform to field conditions. If the tenant modifies its plans and specifications after the landlord approves them, the alterations as modified should still be required to meet the original standards of the lease. To avoid dealing with a flood of change orders, the landlord might give the tenant some leeway, but subject to criteria to protect the landlord's interests.

1.15 Plans and Specifications. Require the tenant to deliver plans and specifications (initial, as-built, and as filed with the buildings department) in a specified (or more current) computer-aided design (CAD) format using naming conventions and other criteria as the landlord approves or requires. Also, require the tenant to deliver copies of its construction budget as well as all governmental approvals needed for the alterations, including a building permit and a temporary and final certificate of occupancy, as and when appropriate.

1.16 Removal. A strong tenant will often negotiate away any obligation to remove the tenant's alterations at the end of the lease term. As a more common alternative, the tenant will agree to remove only any unusual alterations that are difficult to remove, such as vaults, raised floors, and stairways between floors—but only if the landlord imposed the removal requirement when the landlord approved the tenant's plans. So the landlord must remember to think about this when reviewing plans. To protect the landlord from falling into a trap, perhaps the lease should require the tenant to provide an appropriate reminder when the tenant submits plans for the landlord's approval.

1.17 Responsibility for Contractors. The landlord has no responsibility for contractors, even if the landlord required or approved them. Sometimes the landlord will have an affiliate that the tenant may decide to engage for construction work. In those cases, the tenant and the contractor should still negotiate an ordinary contract, and the lease should negate any linkage between the lease and the construction contract.

1.18 Scope of Work. Even if the tenant will bear all construction risks and costs, the landlord should think twice before agreeing to tenant alterations that may require a major compliance effort or cost. Regardless of what the lease says, tenant construction projects that will raise major issues will often, one way or another, end up costing the landlord money and grief. If the building is landmarked, for example, then trivial work in one part of the building may focus municipal attention on other parts. Landlords should understand those problems before they undertake projects for the tenant or allow the tenant to undertake projects. Lease language should take into account these concerns. For example, if any tenant alterations would trigger an undesired level of scrutiny by the landmarking authorities, such as a “hearing” rather than a “staff action,” consider categorically prohibiting those alterations.

1.19 Supervisory Fee. Allow the landlord to charge a supervisory fee for any tenant alterations and for any landlord review of environmental and other conditions. The landlord’s wage schedule or standard rates in effect from time to time should constitute prima facie evidence of reasonableness.

1.20 Tenant’s Records. Require the tenant to maintain records of the costs of its improvements for six years. This information may help in real estate tax protest proceedings. If the tenant’s cost of any particular alteration exceeds a set amount, consider requiring the tenant to deliver its cost records within a certain short time after the tenant has completed construction. Otherwise, they will probably get lost, regardless of what the tenant has agreed to maintain.

1.21 Third-Party Fees. Require the tenant to reimburse the landlord for its architect’s fees, lender’s fees under any landlord loan documents and any other in-house and outside professional fees for review of plans and specifications. If a building is subject to a special regulatory regime such as landmarking, the tenant’s reimbursement obligation should also extend to any counsel or consultants the landlord engages to deal with that particular regime. The lease can express this idea broadly and generically. Always have the tenant reimburse the landlord’s legal fees (inside and outside counsel) for practically anything the landlord does relating to the lease.

1.22 Warranties. Require the tenant to provide a warranty on completed alterations or at least an assignment of any warranty it receives from its contractor.

2. Assignment and Subletting: Consent Requirements

2.1 Assignment/Sublet of Other Tenants' Leases. Even if other leases allow assignment or subletting, prohibit this tenant from accepting an assignment of any other tenant's lease or from subletting any other tenant's premises in the building without the landlord's consent.

2.2 Change of Control. Treat a change of direct or indirect control of the tenant, unless a public company, as an assignment. To monitor, require the tenant to: (1) represent and warrant the tenant's current ownership structure, perhaps in an exhibit, when the parties sign the lease, to establish a baseline and define "change of control"; (2) deliver an annual (or upon request) certificate confirming the tenant's then-current ownership structure; and (3) report any change of control. The certificate described in (2) might, ideally, come from the tenant's attorney or accountant, but the landlord might settle for a certificate from the tenant. In prohibiting any equity transfers, do not limit the restriction to refer only to corporations, partnerships, and limited liability companies. The restriction on transferring equity should apply even to future entity types not yet known.

2.3 Collateral Assignment of Lease. Any prohibition against assignment and subletting should also prohibit any collateral assignment of the lease (such as mortgaging, encumbering or hypothecating).

2.4 Continuing Status as Affiliate. If the lease allows "free transfers" to the tenant's affiliates, require that the assignee or subtenant thereafter remain an affiliate throughout the lease term. If the affiliation ceases the tenant must notify the landlord, but the landlord should not assume the tenant will remember to do so. Once the affiliation ceases, the transaction must pass whatever test it would have needed to pass if the affiliation did not exist when the transaction occurred. That might require the landlord's consent and possibly a payment. At that point, if the landlord does not consent or the tenant does not pay, the transaction may become an event of default.

2.5 Fixture Financing. Prohibit the tenant from financing its fixtures, or impose appropriate protective conditions upon any such financing arrangements.

2.6 Future Sublease-Related Transactions. Even if the lease allows the tenant to sublet, think about future transactions that might arise from the subletting, such as further subleasing by subtenants. Try to limit the number of sublets, and consider demanding a recapture right if the tenant wants to sublet more than once. If the tenant sublets any space subject to a renewal option, that option should go away. Require the tenant to obtain the landlord's approval (or at least give notice) for any future modification or termination of a sublease, any recapture under a sublease, any sub-subletting or any expansion or assignment by the subtenant. If at any point the tenant sends or receives a commencement date notice (or any other material notice), the landlord should receive a copy. A landlord may regard at least some of these transactions as future opportunities worth preserving for the landlord. Any landlord rights regarding these transactions should appear not only in the lease, but also in the sublease, with the landlord identified as an intended third-party beneficiary. The lease needs to require all of that.

2.7 Government and Similar Tenants. A government tenant often burdens the elevator, HVAC, parking, lobby, rest rooms and security, by producing a higher occupant and visitor density than the typical private-sector tenant. This can quickly change a first-tier building into a second-tier building. Governmental occupancy, even by a subtenant, can in some cases lead to the unexpected imposition of governmental procurement regulations on the landlord. When drafting a sublease consent provision, consider limiting occupant density, power consumption, parking, operating hours and noise. If the landlord is generally willing to allow a particular government agency as tenant, state that only a particular agency (or its successor performing the same functions) can occupy the space. Any change of agency should be deemed an assignment. Conform the use clause accordingly. The comments in this paragraph about government tenants would also apply to schools, both public and private, as well as social service agencies and some non-profit organizations.

2.8 Lender Consent. Any lease assignment needs consent by the landlord's lenders.

2.9 Operation of Law. Confirm that the assignment restrictions extend to prohibit (or require the landlord's consent to) any assignments made by operation of law, such as mergers. Absent specific language to that effect, an assignment clause will often not reach assignments made by operation of law.

2.10 Prohibit Competition with Landlord. Prohibit assignments or sublets: (i) to existing tenants in the building; (ii) for less than fair market rent or the present rent; or (iii) if the landlord has available space. Prohibit the tenant from subleasing to any entity: (i) that occupies any other building the landlord (or its affiliate) owns within a specified area; or (ii) with whom the landlord (or its affiliate) is actively negotiating or has recently negotiated.

2.11 Prohibit Other Landlord's Takeover. Any other landlord's takeover of the lease, perhaps as an inducement to relocate the tenant to that landlord's building, should be deemed a prohibited sublease. The same should apply if that other landlord, or someone else, directly or indirectly obtains the right to exercise control over the disposition of the lease (a variation on a lease takeover transaction).

2.12 Restriction. Consider prohibiting any assignment/sublet to: (1) any party with whom the landlord (or its affiliate) is in litigation (or an affiliate of any such adversary), or perhaps even any party with whom other landlords have had significant litigation; (2) a controversial entity such as a terrorist organization; (3) any party entitled to diplomatic immunity; or (4) specified entities or their affiliates, such as certain chain stores, parking lot operators, and multi-site/multi-brand restaurant operators that may have become notorious for their aggressive litigation programs against landlords. Also, prohibit assignments/sublets to any government, domestic or foreign; any government agency; a government contractor doing its contracted work in the space; or any other entity whose presence could subject the landlord to governmental procurement and affirmative action regulations. Federal procurement regulations sometimes make the landlord a deemed federal contractor under circumstances suggested in the previous sentence. State regulations vary, of course. The landlord may, however, prefer not to limit itself to any particular grounds for disapproval and rely instead on its right to "reasonably" reject proposed transactions, which might enable the landlord to reject a transaction on grounds like those suggested in this paragraph. This approach has the disadvantage, though, of creating an amorphous factual issue that may require litigation to resolve. Moreover, the cases indicate that if a landlord agrees to act "reasonably," this imposes a meaningful restriction on the landlord and could require it to show an objectively sound basis for its decision, such that a "reasonable person" in the landlord's position would reach the same result — not a conversation that any landlord should relish having.

3. Assignment and Subletting: Implementation

3.1 ADA. Prohibit any assignment or subletting that triggers incremental ADA or other legal compliance requirements in the building or by the landlord in the premises.

3.2 Advertisements. The landlord should have the right to pre-approve any advertisements for assignment or subletting. Prohibit any advertisement that mentions price.

3.3 Assignor Guaranty. As a condition to any permitted assignment, consider requiring any unreleased assignor—and any guarantor of the lease—to deliver a guaranty with full suretyship waivers or at least an estoppel certificate or a reaffirmation of guaranty to confirm that the signer remains liable. In either case, state that any future changes in the lease obligations do not exonerate the guarantor, though perhaps the guarantor need not necessarily stand behind any incrementally greater obligations.

3.4 Breach of Anti-Assignment Covenant. A breach of the covenant not to assign the lease without the landlord’s consent should create an automatic event of default, not merely a generic default for which the tenant might have a cure period.

3.5 Confidentiality. The same confidentiality concerns that apply to the lease in general also apply to the tenant’s assignment and subletting transactions, especially if the landlord would consider those transactions to be “below market”—as the landlord typically will. The landlord would like to assure that the market does not know the terms of those transactions.

3.6 Contiguous Subleased Floors. If a tenant wants to sublet multiple floors, require those floors to be contiguous—ideally at the top or bottom of the tenant’s stack. Or require that any subleasing maximize contiguity (in some defined way), to facilitate future transactions and flexibility.

3.7 Documentation. If the tenant assigns or sublets, require the tenant to deliver unredacted copies of all documentation on the assignment or sublet (including, e.g., commencement date letters, assignments, amendments and sub-subleases).

3.8 Leasing Agent. Require the tenant to designate the landlord's managing agent as leasing agent at market rate commissions for any contemplated assignment or sublet.

3.9 Partial Subleases. Wherever the lease refers to subletting, it should refer to a subletting of "all or any part of" the premises, because a bare reference to subletting may let the tenant argue that the provision relates to a sublet of the entire premises only. This is yet another example of how a literal reading, or the possibility of a literal reading, produces ever-longer legal documents.

3.10 Processing Fee. Charge a processing fee for any assignment/subletting, payable when the tenant submits an application. The tenant should pay the landlord's in-house and outside attorneys' fees and expenses for any assignment or sublease, whether or not the transaction requires the landlord's consent and whether or not the landlord grants consent.

3.11 Prohibited Use. Even if the tenant has rights to assign or sublet, the new occupant should remain bound by the use clause. Although that proposition may seem self-evident, courts may infer some unintended flexibility on use if the parties negotiate a right to assign or sublet. Retail landlords are particularly vulnerable. More generally, state that any permitted assignment or subletting does not modify anything in the lease, including negative covenants.

3.12 Recapture Right. If the tenant wants to sublease (or if the subtenant wants to sub-sublease) any space, give the landlord a right to recapture that space. Usually, the landlord must exercise or waive any recapture right early in the tenant's assignment or subletting process, before the landlord knows who the assignee or sublessee will be. A landlord may prefer to wait until the landlord has that information, as it may affect the landlord's decision. Define the recapture period window, and also the date when any recapture becomes effective. Avoid circularity, such as by saying the recapture becomes effective on the date of the sublease, but the sublease becomes effective upon the landlord's consent and, therefore, never becomes effective. If the tenant wants to sublease 50 percent or more of its space, allow the landlord to recapture the entire leased space. If the landlord exercises any recapture right, consider requiring the tenant to pay the landlord a brokerage commission equal to what the tenant would have paid a third party to broker a comparable transaction. If the recapture right arises from a sublease, let the landlord decide whether to partially terminate the lease for the recapture space, or instead to require the tenant to sublease the same space back to the landlord, which might create another profit stream for the landlord. For any partial recapture right, require the tenant to pay for any demising wall or other space separation expenses. These could include code compliance expenses to establish a legally separate occupancy. And any switch from a full-tenant floor to a partial-tenant floor may trigger ADA and other code requirements. The tenant should pay for those too. If the landlord exercises any recapture right, allow the landlord to require the tenant to comply with whatever obligations would have arisen at the end of the term; otherwise a “recapture” might be deemed something less than a “termination” sufficient to trigger end-of-term obligations.

3.13 Rent Increase or Other Changes Upon Assignment. If the tenant assigns, let the landlord increase base rent to fair market rent. When assigning a lease with percentage rent, consider resetting the base for the rent calculation—either based on current market conditions or, in the case of retail space, the sum of existing base rent plus the average percentage rent for some specific period before the assignment. Anemic percentage rent will, however, often correlate with a tenant request to assign or sublet. Consider whether to reserve the right to require certain other changes in the lease (a higher security deposit?) upon assignment.

3.14 Tenant’s Profit. If the tenant must pay the landlord a share of the consideration or other profit the tenant receives from a subletting or assignment:

3.14.1 Allow the landlord to audit the tenant’s books and records;

3.14.2 Any tenant revenue arising from rent concessions the landlord made under the original lease belongs entirely to the landlord (a proposition that has a ring of fairness to it but may reverberate with a dull thud);

3.14.3 If the tenant does not furnish the necessary information for the landlord to calculate assignment/subletting profits, the landlord may estimate and the tenant must pay the estimated amount until a correct amount is established;

3.14.4 The landlord may condition the closing of any assignment/subletting transaction on the tenant’s acknowledging the amount of the landlord's profit participation and making any payments due at the closing of that transaction;

3.14.5 The landlord may collect profit payments from the assignee or sublessee if the tenant fails to pay (which would imply failure to pay triggers a monetary default under the lease and the potential of lease termination).

3.14.6 For a sublease, amortize the tenant's transaction costs and other deductions over the term of the sublease; don't just subtract them from the first subrent payments;

3.14.7 Require the tenant to disclose all income derived from any subtenant, potentially backed by a certificate from the subtenant and from the tenant's principals;

3.14.8 Require the tenant to deliver copies of all assignment or sublease documents to the landlord for review before the landlord signs off on anything, as well as after the closing of the transaction;

3.14.9 Carefully define, limit, and scrutinize the scope and timing of all "offsets" or "credits" the tenant may claim in calculating its profits;

3.14.10 Consider requiring the tenant to pay the landlord's share of sublet profits in a present-valued lump sum at sublease execution;

3.14.11 Try to prevent the tenant from deducting any of the work allowance the tenant provided to the assignee or subtenant; and

3.14.12 Keep in mind that, even though the landlord might want to claim 100 percent of the sublet/assignment profit, this would vitiate the tenant's incentive to negotiate any sublease profit at all. The landlord might therefore prefer a somewhat lower percentage. In any case, the landlord might also want to require that the sublease be at market rent or higher.

3.15 Transactional Requirements. For any assignment/sublet, independent of any consent requirements, require the tenant to satisfy certain conditions (such as permitted use, reputation, net worth of assignee/subtenant, and no violation of exclusives) and delivery of certain documents satisfactory to the landlord (such as assignee/subtenant's certified financial statements, unconditional assumption of the lease, and reaffirmation of guaranties). The tenant should agree to report to the landlord, upon request, on how much space the tenant is marketing for sublease and the asking terms of any such sublease(s). Any sublease should expressly benefit the landlord as a third-party beneficiary, so if the tenant defaults, the landlord can take over the sublease, if it wishes.

4. Bankruptcy

4.1 Characterize Tenant Improvement Contribution as Loan. To the extent that the tenant's rent reimburses the landlord for tenant improvements, consider restructuring such payments as payments on a loan, independent of the lease, evidenced by a note. Require the tenant to pledge (at least) its leasehold as security and perhaps supplement that security with a separate "tenant improvements loan letter of credit." This structure may give the landlord an argument to avoid Bankruptcy Code limitations on the landlord's claim for "rent." The landlord would then, of course, instead face all the perils of being a secured or unsecured lender in bankruptcy. The landlord's choice of poison will vary with circumstances, especially the ratio between the landlord's contribution and the annual rent. How best to handle these concerns will require full consideration of bankruptcy issues in the context of the particular transaction.

4.2 Letters of Credit. If the tenant delivers a letter of credit in place of a security deposit for more than a year's rent, consider the effect of Bankruptcy Code § 502(b)(6). Check the drawdown conditions of the letter of credit to confirm that the landlord has the right, though no obligation, to draw on the letter of credit if the tenant files bankruptcy, even if the tenant remains totally current in payments. Do not just rely on the proposition that a tenant bankruptcy would constitute an "event of default"; instead, the letter of credit should expressly allow the landlord to draw in that event. And, if the letter of credit exceeds a year's rent, instead of having the letter of credit backstop the tenant's obligations, have it backstop the guarantor's obligations. This may improve the landlord's position in a tenant bankruptcy. Don't assume that replacement of a large cash security deposit with a large letter of credit solves the landlord's problems in that context.

4.3 Multiple Leases. If the same tenant (or its affiliate(s)) leases multiple locations from the landlord, try to structure the transaction as a single combined lease for all locations to prevent the tenant from "cherry picking" in bankruptcy. If the landlord must use multiple leases, try to provide cross-defaults and give all the leases the same date. Try to avoid any language that would allocate particular rent or other economics to particular premises, an allocation that might invite or support selective lease rejection. Even a formulaic adjustment of rent based on casualty or condemnation may create enough of a hook for a bankruptcy judge. Try not to create that hook.

4.4 Shopping Center Premises. Bankruptcy Code § 365 gives a landlord greater rights upon a tenant's bankruptcy if the landlord's building constitutes a "shopping center." But the statute does not define "shopping center." Within reason and the bounds of reality, the landlord can try to include favorable language in the lease to confirm that the landlord's project constitutes a "shopping center."

5. Bills and Notices

5.1 Change of Address/Notice Party. If the tenant relocates its main office or legal department, require the tenant to notify the landlord of the new address.

5.2 Date of Delivery Definitions. Confirm that every permitted means of notice also provides for the date when that particular notice will become effective. Try to make all notices effective as quickly as possible, even if the tenant refuses to accept the notice.

5.3 Emailed Notices. The co-authors disfavor the use of email as a means to give formal notices under a lease or other document. The market does, however, seem to be slowly moving toward accepting email notices. Any mechanism for email notices should include: (a) confirmation of receipt; (b) a generic address for incoming notices (e.g., legalnotices@landlord.com), with automatic forwarding to a handful of people; and (c) a reasonable way to deal with bounced messages.

5.4 Next Business Day Delivery. Define "overnight" delivery as "next business day" delivery, to avoid occasional case(s) saying "overnight" doesn't mean any particular number of nights—yet another example of bad cases producing ever-longer documents.

5.5 Routine Rent Invoices. Avoid any suggestion that the landlord cannot send routine rent or other invoices both: (1) by ordinary mail; and (2) only to the tenant, with no copies to counsel or the like. Negate any duty to send out base rent invoices unless they notify the tenant of an increase in base rent or an arrearage. The landlord should try to send only an annual invoice setting forth the year's base rent and known monthly escalation payments. The tenant should be able to pay monthly from that one invoice.

5.6 Service of Process. State that notice (or process) may be served on the tenant by serving the tenant's principal at his or her residence. Require the tenant to designate an agent for service of process and then maintain that designation.

5.7 Tenant's Notices. Copies of notices from the tenant (or perhaps just notices of alleged landlord defaults) should also go to the landlord's counsel.

5.8 Tenant's On-Site Contact. Require the tenant to provide a single on-site contact for operational issues who gives the landlord his or her current home and mobile numbers. If that person leaves the company, the tenant should notify the landlord and identify a replacement immediately.

5.9 Who May Give Notices

State that the landlord's counsel or managing agent (as engaged from time to time) may give notices for the landlord. Negate any suggestion that the party who gives the notice must provide any evidence of authority. If the tenant wants evidence of authority, allow them to ask for it, but without thereby diminishing the effectiveness of the notice.

6. Compliance With Laws

6.1 ADA. If the tenant uses the premises as "public accommodation" or for any other use that triggers extra ADA requirements in or out of the building (e.g., "path of travel" areas such as parking areas, entrances, lobbies, or public corridors), the tenant should pay for the work necessary to bring the premises into compliance with those legal requirements. Define the premises to include the restrooms and common areas of any full floor the tenant occupies.

6.2 Definition. Define "laws" broadly to include future enactments and amendments, insurance regulations and requirements, utility company requirements, administrative promulgations, governmental orders and recorded declarations, present and future.

6.3 Diplomatic Immunity. If applicable, obtain the tenant's waiver of diplomatic immunity. Ascertain under the specific circumstances whether this waiver will be enforceable. If it will not be enforceable, or if its enforceability raises interesting issues, find a different tenant. It is reasonable for a landlord to not rent to a consulate or foreign government or other entity entitled to diplomatic immunity.

6.4 Legally Required Improvements. Require the tenant to perform all improvements required by law. For any required improvements that relate to the building as a whole, the tenant should pay its proportionate share. Landlords often include such an obligation within the definition of operating costs for escalation purposes. That is fine, provided that the inclusion applies only during the adjustment years and not for any base year. If the tenant resists, consider limiting the tenant's obligation to apply only to laws enacted after the lease commences. The tenant will probably still resist and the parties will probably reach the following usual negotiated outcome in any space lease. The landlord will bear the risk of present and future laws that generally govern similar buildings and generic occupancies like the tenant's. The tenant will bear the risk of legal requirements that arise from tenant's particular use of the space, especially if unusual. Require the tenant to perform any improvements that are legally required as a result of any tenant alterations. Make the tenant financially responsible if it causes any part of the landlord's property to become non-compliant with the law or to lose a grandfathered status. For example, if code allows the landlord to maintain an antiquated fire alarm system, but requires the landlord to upgrade if anyone performs a certain amount of construction work anywhere in the building, and the tenant intends to undertake that amount of work, then the landlord may want to require the tenant to pay to upgrade the fire alarm system. Although that may sound like a desirable plan for the landlord, it may not conform to the best long-term asset management strategies.

6.5 Patriot Act. Require the tenant to certify that it is not a terrorist or someone with whom the landlord cannot legally do business, using language that refers to specific types of prohibited persons. For what it's worth, also have the tenant indemnify against any loss the landlord suffers (including, of course, the landlord's attorneys' fees) because the tenant really is a terrorist or falls within some other category of prohibited person. Consider similar anti-money-laundering provisions.

7. Consents

7.1 Conditions to Consent. Even if the landlord has agreed to be reasonable about a consent, require the tenant to satisfy certain conditions first. For example, the tenant must not be in default. The tenant must first deliver an estoppel certificate and copies of all relevant documents. Whenever the tenant requests any consent or future documentation, such as SNDA's and approvals, the tenant must reimburse the landlord's legal fees and other costs. Set other requirements tailored to the particular consent at issue. Remember that the landlord may forget to impose any such requirements as a condition to the consent when issued. The lease should give the landlord a checklist of what to require, assuming that the landlord will think of opening up the lease and looking at it when the tenant actually seeks consent. And a one-time waiver should not be deemed a permanent waiver the next time the same situation arises.

7.2 Deemed Consent. If the landlord has agreed that failure to grant consent within a specified number of days will be deemed consent, try to: (i) have this concept apply only in particular areas, such as consents to transfers or alterations; (ii) require a reminder notice before the deemed consent arises; and (iii) require both the original notice and the reminder notice to state conspicuously in all capital boldface letters that the landlord must respond within that period or will be deemed to have granted its consent.

7.3 Discretionary Consents. If the business agreement between the parties does not require the landlord to be reasonable about any particular action or event, then simply ban that action or event—instead of requiring “consent in the landlord’s sole discretion”—to avoid possible claims of an implied obligation to act reasonably. Also, in this case, negate any implication that the landlord must at least consider whatever proposal the tenant presents. The tenant can always request the landlord’s consent to anything, and the landlord can always choose to grant it, at any time in the lease term. The lease doesn’t need to say that.

7.4 Limitation of Remedies. State that if the landlord wrongfully withholds consent (for example, the landlord acts unreasonably even though it agreed to act reasonably), then the tenant’s only remedy consists of specific performance—not monetary damages, and especially not consequential damages. As a backup position, the lease could require expedited arbitration, perhaps with the potential arbitrator(s) designated in the lease. This might particularly make sense for construction disputes, if the tenant anticipates performing substantial construction. In these cases, or any other case where issues seem likely to arise, confirm with the designated arbitrator (s) that they are willing to serve. Negate any potential tort or common law liability as a result of withholding consent unreasonably or in violation of the lease or applicable law. As a backup, allow the tenant to recover damages, but subject to a low cap.

7.5 No Representation. State that the landlord’s consent to anything is not a representation or warranty that the matter consented to complies with law or will meet the tenant’s needs or otherwise makes any sense at all. In the case of alterations, the landlord should not be responsible for any contractors, architects, or engineers, even if the landlord approved or required them.

7.6 Reasonableness. Consider eliminating general references to “reasonableness” when describing a requirement for landlord consent. Instead, list specific permitted criteria, then agree that the landlord must act reasonably only once the tenant has met those criteria. Any present or future mortgagee’s disapproval of a matter should automatically constitute a “reasonable” basis for the landlord to withhold consent. Without some criteria or clear flexibility for the landlord, as a threshold before the landlord must act “reasonably,” the interpretation of “reasonableness” can result in litigation often stacked in favor of the tenant. Consider requiring arbitration on any issue of reasonableness.

7.7 Scope of Consent. Any consent applies only to the particular matter under consideration, and does not waive any future requirement to obtain the same consent if similar matters arise later.

7.8 Survival of Conditions to Consent. Whenever the tenant must satisfy certain conditions to obtain the landlord’s consent (or to take any action without obtaining the landlord’s consent), consider as a general conceptual proposition whether the lease should require the tenant to cause those conditions to remain satisfied even after the consent is granted or the action taken.

8. Default

8.1 All Rent Due at Signing. Consider requiring the tenant to pay all rent for the term of the lease at signing, but state that the landlord agrees to accept monthly installment payments only so long as no event of default exists. (Although this language sometimes appears in leases, it may be overly creative.)

8.2 Cross Defaults. Provide for cross defaults as against other leases with the landlord or its affiliates, or even against other obligations of the tenant or its affiliates, such as financial covenants under bank loans.

8.3 Default Notices. Provide that default notices need not specify cure periods; instead, the cure period will be whatever the lease provides for the particular default. (Does this work under governing landlord-tenant law?) Although any default notice will need to specify the default, give the landlord the right to supplement any default notice to include any additional defaults that were missed or correct any miscalculations, without thereby extending the tenant's cure period, unless the change is substantial.

8.4 Discount for Timely Payment. Consider increasing "face rent" in the lease by some high percentage, but also state that if the tenant pays its rent by the first day of the month, then the tenant receives a discount equal to the increased part of the rent. Although this is a creative suggestion occasionally seen, it may create unintended and unexpected grief in such areas as brokerage commissions, commercial rent tax, and property tax assessments. Thus, before adopting this suggestion, counsel should consider its possible unintended consequences.

8.5 Impairment of Business. Define an event of default to include events (beyond the usual insolvency list) that may indicate the tenant is preparing to shut down. These might include the tenant's announcing that it will make substantial distributions, dividends or asset sales outside the ordinary course of business; shut down its operations elsewhere; suspend or terminate a substantial part of its business; or lay off staff above a certain threshold. At a minimum, require reporting of these matters.

8.6 No Right to Cure Event of Default. Once an event of default has occurred, should the tenant have a wide-open cure right even after the tenant's cure period has already lapsed? Whenever the landlord can exercise remedies "if an event of default shall have occurred and be continuing," this quoted language effectively gives the tenant an open-ended right to cure the event of default, provided the tenant does so before the landlord actually exercises its remedies. Does the landlord really want that? Consider providing that if the tenant defaults more than a certain number of times within a certain period, then the tenant will not have the right to notice and cure for any additional default. Also say that if the landlord accepts rent after giving a notice of termination of the lease, the rent constitutes merely a payment on account of sums due. It does not vitiate the notice of termination or any landlord right to terminate unless it brings current all arrearages. The landlord may want to state once that, if the landlord has actually given a valid notice of termination of the lease, then whatever cure rights the tenant previously had no longer exist, except as law requires.

8.7 Noncurable Defaults. State that certain defaults are noncurable, such as prohibited transfers.

9. Destruction, Fire and Other Casualty

9.1 Disaster. Consider drafting a clause to address loss of the tenant's ability to use the premises because of disaster conditions that go beyond the building, or arise entirely outside the building, such as flood or terrorist attack. Under these circumstances, a landlord will face pressure to forgive rent if the tenant cannot use the premises. It might make sense to insure the risk, if possible, and provide for a certain limited abatement right in the lease.

9.2 Insurance Coordination. Whatever the landlord does on rent abatement, make sure it matches the landlord's insurance coverage, to prevent surprises and problems.

9.3 Rent Abatement. If the landlord maintains rental income insurance, the lease should allow the tenant to abate rent for a casualty, and not obligate the tenant to maintain its own business interruption insurance. If, however, a casualty affects only part of the premises, then limit the abatement accordingly, so it applies only to the extent that the premises are not usable.

9.4 Tenant Waiver. Require the tenant to waive the provisions of New York Real Property Law § 227 (which allows a tenant to terminate a lease in the event of a casualty that renders the premises untenable), and comparable provisions in other states.

9.5 Termination Right; Limitation on Restoration. Provide no right (or a limited right) for the tenant to cancel upon casualty. To the extent the lease requires the landlord to restore, impose appropriate conditions, including completion of insurance adjustment and recovery of adequate insurance proceeds.

9.6 Time to Restore. If the landlord has the right or obligation to restore after a casualty, measure any deadline from the landlord's receipt of insurance proceeds—not from the date of casualty. Insurance policies require restoration "with due diligence and dispatch." If the lease defines an unrealistically short restoration period and allows the tenant to terminate the lease if the landlord misses the deadline, this could create a lender issue. Moreover, depending on policy language, any resulting lease termination may not constitute loss covered by the landlord's insurance program.

10. Development and Asset Management

10.1 Air and Development Rights. If the project includes development rights from other locations, should the landlord include them as part of the definition of the project? The answer may vary depending on state and municipal law, as well as the landlord's strategies for handling real estate taxes and related escalation clauses in leases. Have the tenant waive any right to object to any merger or transfer of development rights, and agree to sign any zoning lot merger if requested to do so. The tenant should have no right to limit any other uses within the project.

10.2 Building Identification. Allow the landlord to change the name or address of the building. Require the tenant to refer to the building only by whatever name or address the landlord gives it.

10.3 Building Standard Specifications. The landlord should reserve the right to modify building standard specifications. Consider the implications of any modification to building standards or specifications. For example, if the landlord wants to divide the building or shopping center into pieces, any CAM charges should continue to be calculated as if the landlord owned the entire property as one unit.

10.4 Condominium Conversion or Ground Lease. If the landlord considers condominium conversion at all likely, the lease should cover this possibility. Allow the landlord to delegate its responsibilities to the condominium board. Require the tenant to join in or consent to the condominium declaration, if governing law might require that. Adjust pass-throughs to include condominium fees as appropriate. Consider how condominiumization would affect building operations, the use clause, base years, escalations and everything else. What role should the condominium board have? The landlord should also retain the right to create a ground lease of the entire building, raising similar issues. Require the tenant to cooperate, as reasonably necessary, provided any new structure produces no material adverse impact on the tenant. If the new condominium association will take on any obligations that previously belonged to the landlord, then the landlord will want to avoid being "whipsawed" between a tenant demanding services and a condominium that might fail to competently provide them. In those cases the landlord may want to limit its obligations to trying to get the condominium to perform. At a certain point, the landlord should even agree to initiate litigation against the condominium. That's a reasonable price for the landlord to pay for its more general exculpation under these circumstances.

10.5 Construction Restrictions. State that nothing in the lease limits by implication the landlord's right to construct or alter any improvements (including kiosks) anywhere on the landlord's property. If the lease does contain any such restrictions, state that they are limited to their express terms.

10.6 Demolition

Allow the landlord to terminate the lease after reasonable notice if the landlord intends to demolish the building or strip it down to structural steel and rebuild. Give the landlord a similar right if the landlord plans to redevelop the building, such as by changing its use or reconfiguring it. Set as low as possible a standard for the landlord to satisfy. For example, avoid any requirement that the landlord must be unalterably committed to demolition or must have terminated other leases or obtained a demolition permit or construction financing. It should suffice that the landlord has decided to redevelop the property or (more likely) has entered into a contract to sell the property to a developer. Give the tenant incentives to cooperate. Set up a process so the landlord will find out quickly whether the tenant will try to fight the early termination of the lease. For example, the lease can require the tenant (and any guarantors), promptly after receiving a termination notice, to deliver an appropriately tailored estoppel certificate and an increased security deposit. Pay the tenant a demolition fee only if the tenant vacates strictly on time. In certain cases, consider requiring the tenant to sign a stipulated judgment of eviction. The demolition clause should contain conditional limitation language.

10.7 Expansion Rights. If the landlord might want to expand the physical size of the building, such as by adding floors, build in enough flexibility so the landlord can prevent any issues that might arise from the expansion. More specifically: Consider resetting base years after the expansion.

10.7.1 Consider how the expansion would affect the tenant's proportionate share for escalations (after completion and lease-up).

10.7.2 Require the tenant to sign appropriate documents as needed.

10.7.3 Allow the landlord to expand the measure of real estate taxes by adding other tax lots to the project, though in that case the tenant's tax escalation share would need to drop.

10.7.4 Allow the landlord to reconfigure parking and the building as a whole.

10.7.5 Provide that the lease will be automatically subordinate to any future easements and other recorded documents the landlord signs to facilitate further development.

10.7.6 Review/revise/adjust the definition of “Building” as appropriate to take into account any possible future redevelopment of the project.

10.7.7 Give the landlord the right to enter the premises to install structural supports for any construction above the premises; to install new posts, pillars or supports as necessary; and to move walls around to accommodate any of this work. Allow the tenant an equitable rent adjustment for any significant interference or reduction of the premises, but have the tenant waive any right to an injunction, damages or claim of constructive eviction. Commentators raised their eyebrows when a case reached the result the previous sentence suggests, even in the face of silence in the lease. Despite the landlord-friendly outcome in that case, a careful landlord’s counsel will want to prevent the issue entirely.

10.7.8 The tenant should waive any rights to light or air, within limits.

10.7.9 Give the landlord the right to take back a limited amount of space to build more elevator cores or other necessary mechanical improvements.

10.8 Expiration Dates. The landlord may want to plan strategically so that all leases (or at least adjacent leases) end on the same date, to help the landlord put together large blocks of space for possible future tenants. Or the landlord may want to stagger multiple lease expirations over multiple years, so the landlord never faces “too many” lease expirations at once. This all depends on the landlord’s tastes and overall long-term strategy for the building. Might the landlord demolish or redevelop the building at a certain point?

10.9 Relocation. Give the landlord the right to relocate the tenant to comparable premises in the building or in some other specific building the landlord or its affiliate owns.

10.10 Remeasurement. If, over time, market conditions allow the landlord to nominally “expand” the building by remeasurement, make sure that will not produce any unpleasant surprises under this particular lease, e.g., an increase in the denominator for calculating this tenant’s share without a corresponding increase in the numerator.

11. Electricity

11.1 Additional Electrical Capacity and Riser Rights. If the tenant negotiates additional power and/or additional riser space, the landlord will want to preserve remaining electrical capacity and/or riser space for other tenants. Might the landlord want the tenant to remove any additional installations at the end of the lease term? Ordinarily no, but exceptions may arise.

11.2 Change of Provider. State that if the landlord changes the electricity provider for the building, the tenant must use the new provider, to the extent legally allowed, even if the tenant directly meters its own consumption.

11.3 Delivery of Electrical Service. The tenant should comply with electrical conservation measures and any limits on power grid availability, including required shutdowns that may arise. Allow the landlord to shut down electrical service to the premises when needed for alterations and other legitimate reasons so long as the landlord gives notice and the disruption is limited.

11.4 Electrical Service. If the tenant's space is directly metered, require the tenant to keep the landlord informed of the tenant's electrical consumption, with copies of bills. This may facilitate the landlord's long-term planning of electrical service for the building and future re-leasing of the space.

11.5 Electrical Measurement. In defining the electrical capacity that the landlord must provide, multiply the required watts per square foot by usable, not rentable, square feet. Then come up with a certain number of watts, because the lease should not use the words "rentable," "usable," or "square foot."

11.6 Post-Termination Electric Charges. To the extent any utility provider has the right to recalculate charges and bill the landlord later, expressly allow the landlord to bill the tenant for its share of such charges. If the electric utility has a certain time within which they can send such a bill, give the landlord at least the same time plus 60 days for processing.

12. End of Term

Some of the following comments on "end of term" issues also apply if the tenant has the right to prematurely or partially terminate the lease. The lease should treat any such termination as the end of the term, at least for certain purposes relating to the affected part of the premises.

12.1 Abandoned Personalty. Upon lease termination, any personalty in the premises that the lease requires the tenant to remove, but the tenant does not remove, should be deemed abandoned. Require the tenant to pay to remove and store that personalty unless the landlord elects to retain or discard it.

12.2 Cables, Conduits. The landlord should retain ownership of all cables and other wiring in the building. Require the tenant to remove cables, conduits, wires, raised floors, and rooftop equipment at the end of the lease term either in all cases or at the landlord's request. (Some landlords like to require this. Others prefer to handle it themselves as part of preparing the space for the next tenant.) Require the tenant to indemnify the landlord from all liability in connection with that removal. To the extent that the lease allows any of these items to remain, require the tenant to properly cap and label them.

12.3 Consequential Damages. If the tenant holds over, require the tenant to pay all damages the landlord incurs, including consequential damages such as the loss of the next prospective tenant. If necessary, consider giving the tenant a window of up to 60 days before consequential damages apply. Holdover rent would apply as usual.

12.4 Holdover. Consider providing that if the tenant fails to vacate the premises at the end of the term, the tenant must pay a use and occupancy charge (not "rent") equal to the greater of: (1) some high percentage of the final adjusted rent (including escalations) under the lease; and (2) some high percentage of the then fair market rental value of the entire premises. Calculate the charge on a monthly basis for an entire month for every full (or partial) month the tenant holds over. Confirm what the maximum enforceable holdover rate may be. Describe this payment as liquidated damages and not a penalty. Consider simplifying matters by saying that during the final year of occupancy the tenant must pay either fair market appraised rent, or a very, very high rate. Give the tenant an option to terminate the lease effective just before that last year of the term begins, on at least a year's notice. This way, if the tenant stays, the landlord can try to collect very high rent. The landlord does not have to hold its breath to the last minute to see if the tenant will decide to default. The whole arrangement looks something like the "anticipated repayment date" and "hyper-amortization" provisions that sometimes appear in securitized loans.

12.5 Landlord's Property. At the landlord's option, the tenant should leave behind any improvements, fixtures, or personal property that the landlord paid for, including by rent abatement. Consider the tax implications of ownership. Consider to what extent the tenant can remove improvements and fixtures. Should the landlord be able to prohibit the tenant from removing these items?

12.6 Obligation to Restore. Require the tenant to restore the premises, including removing signage, at the end of the term. State that the landlord's consent to any alteration does not waive the tenant's obligation to remove it and restore the premises at the end of the term—particularly for major or difficult-to-restore alterations such as a slab cut for an internal staircase. To the extent that the landlord wants—or might want—the tenant to leave a major alteration in place, give the landlord that right. Where appropriate, specify by exhibit which alterations may remain, which must remain, and which the tenant must remove and restore. The restoration obligation should survive expiration or sooner termination of the lease. State that if the tenant does not complete restoration or other end of term activities (such as environmental remediation) by the expiration date, the tenant must pay holdover rent until completion.

12.7 Security Deposit. Consider requiring an incremental security deposit, a few years before the end of the term, to back the tenant's end-of-term obligations. Security deposits often “burn off” over time, with the result that little security deposit remains when it may most matter, at the end of the term.

12.8 Survival. The tenant's obligations and liabilities under the lease should survive the expiration or termination of the lease.

12.9 Tenant Waiver. Require the tenant to waive any civil procedure law or rule that would allow a court to issue a stay in connection with any holdover or other summary proceedings the landlord might institute.

12.10 Time of Essence. State that “time is of the essence” for the tenant's obligation to vacate the premises.

12.11 Timing. The landlord may prefer not to have leases expire during a holiday season or before or after a long weekend.

12.12 Warranties. If the tenant surrenders space (either at the end of the term or because the tenant reduces its occupancy), require the tenant to assign to the landlord any warranties the tenant received for any improvements or equipment surrendered.

13. Environmental

13.1 Copies of Notices. Require the tenant to promptly deliver copies of all notices it receives from any state or federal environmental agency relating to the property.

13.2 End-of-Term Assessment. Where applicable, allow the landlord to require an environmental assessment at the tenant's expense at the end of the term. Require the tenant to remediate any conditions that would have been the tenant's responsibility under the lease.

13.3 High Risk Uses. For a gas station or other high-risk use: (1) establish an environmental baseline by undertaking a sampling plan or environmental assessment before occupancy (to define what problems, if any, already exist); (2) require periodic monitoring, especially where groundwater might be readily affected, and along perimeter areas where migrating oil can be detected; (3) obtain an indemnification that is both very broad (all environmental risks) and very specific (particular environmental issues arising from the tenant's particular business); and (4) require the tenant to post a bond if the tenant cannot obtain environmental liability insurance. If underground tanks already exist, require the tenant to: (1) accept them "as-is"; (2) comply with laws, including obtaining all permits (as well as annual registration and recertification); (3) post all required financial assurances; (4) maintain, repair and replace, if required, all tanks; (5) maintain all required records and inventory controls; (6) deliver evidence of compliance (e.g., copies of recertifications) according to a reasonable schedule; and (7) comply with any present or future lender requirements.

13.4 Interior Air Quality. Disclaim any landlord liability for mold, bad air or "sick building syndrome." Also allow the landlord to prohibit smoking anywhere in the building or nearby such as on sidewalks and terraces.

13.5 Landlord Indemnification. If the landlord agrees to indemnify the tenant for past environmental problems, limit this indemnification to any liability that exists under present law based on present violations. Exclude any liability arising from the act of a third party, future laws, amendments of existing laws or any action (or failure to act) of the tenant that exacerbates any existing condition or increases any existing liability.

13.6 LEED Compliance. If the landlord seeks to comply with LEED, the landlord may need to include suitable language in the lease and modify some typical lease provisions. As one element of green leasing, the landlord may require in every relevant context that the tenant comply with the landlord's environmental requirements or guidelines and perhaps anything necessary to preserve the landlord's LEED or other certification. This all works very well until it starts to cost the tenant an undefined and unknowable amount of money. If the landlord has agreed with other tenants to maintain LEED certification, then the landlord may not have much flexibility on these issues. Therefore, the landlord should try to avoid making any ironclad LEED commitments to any tenants.

13.7 Mold. The tenant must promptly report any mold infiltration. Make the tenant responsible for all mold in the premises unless it can affirmatively show the mold originated in a part of the building for which the landlord is responsible.

13.8 Notice of Hazardous Conditions. Require the tenant to promptly notify the landlord of any leaking or other hazardous or potentially adverse condition on the premises, including mold, leaks and other conditions that could cause mold. Require the tenant to abate any such circumstances promptly, except any that are the landlord's responsibility.

13.9 Reports; Inspections. The tenant should agree to deliver, or reimburse the landlord's cost to obtain, updated environmental reports. Give the landlord and its environmental consultant the right to enter, inspect and photograph the premises and perform environmental assessments, including invasive assessments, if the landlord reasonably believes that a violation of environmental law exists, all at the tenant's expense.

13.10 Tank Removal. The landlord might want the right to perform a further environmental assessment at the end of the term, and require the tenant to remove any underground storage tanks (especially but not only if the environmental assessment discloses problems) and perform any required remediation. Condition the return of the tenant's security deposit on the tenant's completing any such removal and remediation.

13.11 Tenant Indemnification. Require the tenant to indemnify the landlord against all harm arising from the tenant's use and occupancy of the premises and the property. The tenant's indemnity should cover all environmental matters and anything the tenant installs anywhere. The indemnity should survive the expiration or termination of the lease.

14. Escalations

14.1 Audit Issues (Operating Costs)

14.1.1 Auditors. Prohibit contingent fee auditors or auditors that have worked for other tenants in the building. If the landlord agrees to reimburse audit costs, e.g., if the tenant's audit reveals a certain level of mistakes, then negate any reimbursement to contingent fee auditors. Consider requiring a national CPA firm, billing on an hourly basis. Insist that such firm agree to notify the landlord of any undercharges or errors in the tenant's favor that the audit discloses, and to give the landlord a copy of the auditor's full report. If the auditor does not, the tenant should agree to do so. If the tenant engages any particular lease auditor, require that lease auditor to agree not to represent other tenants in the building. The tenant must keep audit results confidential.

14.1.2 Claims. Require specificity, completeness, and finality in any tenant claim of discrepancy or error.

14.1.3 Condition for Audit. Allow the tenant to audit operating costs only if those costs increase more than a specified percentage over a specified prior year or base year.

14.1.4 Confidentiality. Require the tenant and its auditor to sign a confidentiality agreement satisfactory to the landlord for any audit and its results before disclosing any records or information to the tenant or its auditor. The agreement should, among other things, prohibit the tenant and its advisors from disclosing the existence of any audit or any of its results, including any settlement, particularly to other tenants in the building. The tenant's breach of the confidentiality agreement should constitute an incurable default under the lease or at a minimum preclude the tenant from initiating further audits for several years.

14.1.5 Costs of Audit. Ask the tenant to pay for the landlord's out-of-pocket costs for any audit (such as photocopying, staff time, document retrieval, accountants' time spent answering inquiries, etc.), at least if the audit fails to disclose any issues serious enough that they would make the landlord responsible for the audit costs.

14.1.6 Dispute Resolution. Provide a private and final mechanism (such as arbitration) to resolve any dispute about operating costs.

14.1.7 Inspection Restrictions. Allow the tenant (or its representative) to examine specified books and records only, and only for a specified period, but prohibit copying. Require that any audit comply with the landlord's reasonable requirements and instructions. On assignment, prohibit the new tenant from auditing for any period before the date of the assignment.

14.1.8 Limits. Limit the timing, frequency and duration of audits. Require the tenant to complete the audit within a stated time after notifying the landlord of the audit. Consider requiring the tenant to audit multiple years at once, or requiring that the notice of audit specify the specific issues the tenant intends to raise (difficult or impossible if the tenant has not yet seen any of the underlying records).

14.1.9 Threshold for Payment. If overcharges (net of undercharges) total three percent or less of total annual operating costs (a generally accepted definition of "materiality"), then the tenant should receive no adjustment or reimbursement of its audit costs. Define carefully the variable against which the three percent test will apply. Try to use a variable that will be large rather than small. For example, refer to three percent of gross annual operating costs rather than three percent of the tenant's escalation payment. Try to use a higher percentage.

14.2 Generally

14.2.1 Base Year. Consider whether anything might make the current base year for operating costs unusually high, such as a spike in insurance costs, energy cost spikes, a change in management, or extraordinary repairs. Normalize the base year for operating costs to adjust for such unusual spikes. Or, instead, consider a fixed dollar amount to define the base.

14.2.2 Brokers' Commissions. Exclude all escalations from the calculation of broker's commissions in the brokerage agreement.

14.2.3 Ease of Proof. Make operating costs easy to prove. The landlord does not want to have to prove all the underlying facts. How would a judge respond to the definition of "operating costs" in the lease, and all the various definitions and exclusions? Ask a litigator. Perhaps the calculation should come from the landlord's outside accountant, and not be subject to challenge except based on manifest error.

14.2.4 Examples. For any complex or intricate escalation formula, consider adding an example, but do not make the numbers dramatic or shocking. Keep in mind, though, that the formula should speak for itself. By adding an example, one says the same thing twice, introducing the risk of inconsistencies. The example should add nothing. If it adds anything at all, then it also adds risk.

14.2.5 Fixed Fee. Consider replacing escalations based on operating costs or CAM with a fixed formula.

14.2.6 Implied Covenants. State that the landlord has no obligation to use operating cost escalations to pay operating costs; they merely constitute additional compensation to the landlord under the lease.

14.2.7 Liability for Refunds or Rent Credits. The landlord's liability for any refund (or credit) of overpaid escalations should terminate after a specified number of years. It should also terminate automatically upon any sale, receivership, or foreclosure of the building. Otherwise, the possible overpayment may create open-ended obligations or issues for the landlord, particularly at the time of sale. Consider whether the landlord should have the right to pay in installments any refund that the landlord might owe, or limit the tenant's relief to a future offset against rent, unless the lease expires before the tenant fully recovers what's due.

14.2.8 No Decrease. Escalation formulas should never allow rent to go down.

14.2.9 Reimbursements. What happens if the landlord can require other tenants to reimbursement some piece of the landlord's operating expenses? Those reimbursements may include a profit component to the landlord (e.g., for cleaning "extras"). If the tenant can require subtraction of the entire reimbursement payment, the tenant effectively participates in that profit. Instead, the lease should merely exclude from operating expenses the landlord's costs of providing whatever services trigger reimbursement payments.

14.2.10 Survival; Timing. Limit the time during which the tenant may challenge any escalation or demand a refund that the landlord "forgot" to pay. Be careful, though. The tenant may try to make this reciprocal for the landlord's billings. All the tenant's obligations on escalations should survive the expiration or termination of the lease.

14.3 Operating Costs

14.3.1 Broad Definition. Consider any special characteristics of the property that could cause the landlord to incur costs outside the typical operating cost definitions in a generic lease. For example, if a reciprocal easement agreement or a ground lease imposes costs similar to real estate taxes or operating costs, expand the appropriate definition to include them. State that any characterization of an expenditure in the landlord's tax returns (e.g., as a capital expenditure) has no effect on interpretation of the definition of operating costs in the lease.

14.3.2 CAM. Avoid the term "CAM" (common area maintenance) because operating cost escalations cover far more than common area maintenance. A tenant may argue that the phrase "CAM" is somehow deceptive or restrictive. At a minimum it might create confusion. Where do "common areas" end?

14.3.3 Capital Expenditures. Ideally, the base year would disregard any contribution to capital expenditures—even their partial amortization. Amortize capital improvements only in the comparison years, not the base year, for operating costs. In that case, unusual capital expenditures in the base year would not raise an issue. Only the adjustment years would include amortization of capital expenditures as part of operating expenses. Try to tack on an interest factor on the landlord's unreimbursed capital outlay.

14.3.4 "Gross Up" Clause. The landlord should have the right to "gross up." For example, if the building has an occupancy level under 95 percent, increase the amount of operating costs to the amount that the landlord would have incurred for full occupancy. The tenant will expect to see a gross-up in the base year operating costs as well.

14.3.5 Major Repairs. Do not necessarily limit multi-year amortization of large repair costs to "capital" items. Particularly if leases limit escalations or if the landlord worries about base years for new leases, the landlord may want the ability to spread major noncapital repair costs, and new costs of legal compliance, over multiple years.

14.3.6 No Fiduciary Duty. Negate any fiduciary duty regarding operating cost escalations and their administration, and any other lease provisions.

14.3.7 Off-Site Costs. Avoid limiting "operating costs" to those incurred physically within the particular building. The landlord may incur off-site operating costs, such as in a multi-use project (such as holiday decorations in a central plaza) or for off-site equipment, installations, or shuttle bus service for the benefit of the building. Likewise, if municipal approvals for development of the building required the landlord to incur continuing off-site expenses, treat those as additional operating costs. Examples might include maintenance of traffic improvements, a day care facility or a sculpture park containing statues of the Mayor and City Council.

14.3.8 Reality Connection. When negotiating the operating cost escalation clause, confirm that the clause, particularly as negotiated, matches the landlord's current practices in operating the building, so the landlord can actually make the necessary calculations and adjustments without experiencing a long, slow descent into accountancy hell. Consider consulting with the landlord's accountant and the building manager, or even someone in the business of auditing lease escalations for tenants. They should look at the definition of operating costs and any exclusions. Try to keep these definitions consistent across multiple leases.

14.3.9 Reserve Charge. Operating expenses should include repair and replacement reserves. To avoid common arguments about how to treat "capital" items, consider establishing an annual per-square-foot capital reserve charge. The landlord would not need to account for these funds and the lease would define categories of "capital type" costs to which tenants need not contribute. If, however, this reserve charge stays constant from year to year, including the base year, then the reserve charge on its own will not allow the landlord to recover a penny under the typical pass-through of only increases in operating costs. Therefore, make the reserve charge a separate additional charge.

14.3.10 Timing. Try not to agree to tight time limits (or, worse, a "time is of the essence" provision) for the landlord's obligation to provide operating statements. The landlord should, of course, try to be timely, based on cases that have required such timeliness based in part on an inferred "fiduciary duty" because the landlord controls the information.

14.3.11 Use of Generally Accepted Accounting Principles (GAAP). In defining operating "costs" (not "expenses," perhaps an accounting term of art), try not to refer to GAAP. The term often arises in two places: (1) when defining what the landlord can pass through to tenants; and (2) when excluding "capital" items. GAAP may unintentionally skew the calculation of operating costs in ways the landlord would regard as a surprise. Again, coordinate with the landlord's accountant.

14.4 Other Escalations

14.4.1 Consumer Price Index. Use the Consumer Price Index for all Urban Areas (CPI-U) index. Many believe that this index has historically increased faster than the Consumer Price Index for Urban Wage Earners and Clerical Workers (CPI-W) index.

14.4.2 Fixed Percentage Increase. Neutral, predictable, and easy to administer, though the landlord must still remember to do it.

14.4.3 Porter's Wage. Include fringe benefits and all other labor costs. The wage rate used should not reflect "new hire" or other transitional wage rates.

15. Estoppel Certificates

15.1 Additional Requirements. In defining the scope of an estoppel certificate, allow the landlord to require any additional information the landlord reasonably requests. Think about uncertainties that, at some later date, a lender might want the tenant to confirm —such as whether the tenant exercised an option, the dollar amount of base operating costs or any nonstandard dates that might help define either party's obligations.

15.2 Attach Documents. Require the tenant (if asked) to attach to any estoppel certificate a copy of the lease and all amendments, option exercise letters and other documents that define the landlord-tenant relationship.

15.3 Exhibit. Attach a form of estoppel certificate as a lease exhibit (conform to typical lender requirements), but build in flexibility for future lender requests. Include a certification of the tenant's current ownership structure.

15.4 Failure to Respond. Establish specific, meaningful remedies for failure to sign an estoppel certificate within a short period. These might include a deemed estoppel, a power of attorney to execute it for the tenant or a daily nuisance fee.

15.5 Future Estoppels. Require the tenant to deliver future estoppel certificates at any time on the landlord's request. If the tenant negotiates restrictions on the frequency of estoppel certificates, then think about other specific occasions when the landlord might want an estoppel certificate, and perhaps provide for those (e.g., completion of improvements, exercise of renewal option).

15.6 Ratify Guaranty. Allow the landlord to require a confirmation and ratification of any guaranty, and an estoppel certificate from the guarantor, not merely an estoppel certificate from the tenant. Lenders and purchasers will often care more about the guarantor and the guaranty than the tenant and the lease. As an alternative, require the guarantor to sign any estoppel certificate along with the tenant.

15.7 Reliance. Allow reliance by prospective purchasers, mortgagees or any participant in a future securitization, including rating agencies, servicers, trustees, and certificate holders. What about the landlord? If the landlord cannot demonstrate detrimental reliance, a court might conclude that an estoppel certificate does not estop the tenant as against the landlord. Thus, the lease should say that an estoppel certificate binds the tenant as against the landlord, even if the landlord cannot demonstrate detrimental reliance.

16. Failure to Deliver Possession

16.1 Condition of Premises. Substantial completion should suffice (for example, temporary certificate of occupancy) for the landlord's delivery of the premises. Try to maintain some record of the condition of the premises at delivery.

16.2 Delivery Dispute. Provide for a short deadline for the tenant to report any issue or problem about the premises or the landlord's work. If possible, state that taking of possession constitutes acceptance for all purposes.

16.3 Delivery Procedure. Try to tie the "commencement date" to an objective event—preferably within the landlord's control—or a date, rather than to any notice from the landlord. Notices are often not as easy or quick to give as they often seem to attorneys drafting leases. Any delay in giving a commencement date notice will mean lost revenue for the landlord. Allow the landlord to give notice of the commencement date promptly after it has occurred, not as a condition to its occurrence.

16.4 No Liability. The landlord should incur no liability for failing to deliver possession on the commencement date for any reason, including holdover or construction delays. The lease should expressly waive any applicable law that may provide otherwise. The tenant's obligation to pay rent should start on possession. Perhaps extend the term by the duration of any landlord delay in delivering the premises, especially if the delay exceeds a certain amount of time. Depending on state law, though, without an outside deadline for delivery, the lease may be subject to attack under the rule against perpetuities.

16.5 Rent Abatement. To the extent the landlord agrees to give the tenant a rent abatement for late delivery, limit the duration of the abatement (for example, if the rent abatement exceeds a set number of days, thereafter the tenant must either terminate or wait, but cannot continue to abate). Try to defer any such abatement (for example, spread it out in equal annual installments over the remaining term of the lease, rather than front-load it). This will reduce immediate damage to the landlord's cash flow at a time when the landlord may face financial stress.

16.6 Termination Right. The landlord (not just the tenant) may want the right to terminate the lease if the landlord ultimately cannot deliver possession by a date certain.

17. Fees and Expenses

17.1 Attorneys' Fees and Expenses. The tenant should reimburse the landlord's attorneys' fees and expenses both broadly and with specificity (for example, for actions and proceedings, including appeals, and in-house counsel fees and expenses). The reimbursement obligation should cover attorneys' fees and expenses incurred in connection with: (1) any litigation the tenant commences against the landlord (including any declaratory judgment action or any action to interpret or apply the lease), unless the tenant obtains a final favorable judgment; (2) any litigation or arbitration the landlord commences against the tenant whether for default or specific performance; (3) negotiating a lender protection agreement for the tenant's asset-based lender; (4) the landlord's (or its employee's) acting as a witness in any proceeding involving the lease or the tenant; (5) reviewing anything that the tenant asks the landlord to review or sign; (6) any lien filing arising from the tenant's work, even if the lien filing does not constitute a default; (7) bankruptcy proceedings; and (8) delivering an estoppel or a subordination, non-disturbance and attornment agreement (SNDA).

17.2 Fees and Expenses. Require the tenant to pay any fees or expenses the landlord incurs, including legal costs, in connection with any consent or waiver, or request for one, even if denied. Try to make the reimbursement obligation broad enough so it even applies if the tenant initiates discussions with the landlord for a totally discretionary lease amendment or waiver, as opposed to a consent already contemplated within the four corners of the lease. The tenant should also pay a fee (and expenses) for the landlord's review of any plans and/or specifications. Avoid a flat fee. Set the fee according to a formula based on the size of the job or hours necessary, with a floor.

18. Future Documents, Deliveries, Events, and Information

18.1 Confidentiality. The tenant should keep confidential the fact of the lease signing and the terms of the lease, particularly if the tenant's pricing is below current market value (or the landlord's conception of current market value) or the landlord's asking price for direct space. If the landlord provides the form of lease, require the tenant to acknowledge that the form is confidential. Require the tenant and its counsel to agree not to use the landlord's form of lease for other transactions, and not to disclose any concessions to this particular tenant that the landlord made.

18.2 Further Assurances and Cooperation. Require the tenant to enter into any amendments that the landlord reasonably requests to correct errors or otherwise achieve the intentions of the parties, subject to reasonable limitations. Provide that if a party is legally required to do anything, the other party will reasonably cooperate.

18.3 Future Events. The parties should agree to memorialize any commencement date, rent adjustment, or option exercise in a lease amendment or confirmation letter. If the parties do not actually do that, though, the lease should say such failure does not affect either party's obligations. If the parties recorded a memorandum of lease, they will often need to record the confirmation of dates.

18.4 Governmental Benefits, Generally. Require the tenant to cooperate in a timely manner, as necessary, to help the landlord qualify for any available tax or governmental benefits, such as tax abatements.

18.5 Landlord's Accommodations. To the extent that the landlord agrees to provide future deliveries or take certain actions for the tenant's benefit, require the tenant to reimburse all costs and expenses the landlord incurs, including reasonable attorneys' fees.

18.6 Limits on Tenant Rights. To the extent that the landlord gives the tenant any special "right" or "privilege," condition it as appropriate. Certain minimum occupancy? No default? Other criteria or conditions? Maintenance of a certain financial strength? When the landlord agreed to the concession, what assumptions did the landlord make? What happens if those assumptions stop being true? For example, if the tenant's good credit eliminates any requirement for bonds or other landlord protections, undo this concession if the tenant's good credit turns bad. Can the tenant exercise any privilege or right only once or only within a certain period? Or does it apply throughout the lease term? Can the tenant assign any particular special privilege if the tenant assigns the lease? Or does the special privilege go away upon assignment? Can the tenant assign that privilege or right separately from the lease? If the tenant exercises any privilege or right, should the lease require the tenant to deliver an estoppel certificate, any documents the tenant entered into in exercising the privilege or right or any other documents? These issues potentially arise for every tenant "right" or "privilege," including permitted assignments, releases from liability, options and exclusive uses.

18.7 Original Lease Document. The landlord may scan and destroy its original lease in the ordinary course of business. The landlord need never produce an original counterpart. Make sure this will not raise any problems in litigation in the particular jurisdiction.

18.8 Permitted Disclosure. If the landlord agrees to any confidentiality restrictions, or if governing law automatically infers such restrictions, then the landlord should exclude from such restrictions the right to disclose any information to actual or prospective mortgagees, equity investors, purchasers, or where required by law or legal process.

18.9 Reporting. Require the tenant to immediately report if the tenant or any guarantor experiences: (1) any adverse change in financial position; or (2) any litigation that could adversely affect the tenant's or guarantor's ability to perform. For an individual guarantor, require the tenant to notify the landlord of the guarantor's death or disability. If the landlord receives such a notice, the landlord may need to file a claim with the guarantor's estate, or lose the benefit of the guaranty.

18.10 Sales Reports. Even if the tenant does not pay percentage rent, a retail tenant should still deliver monthly sales reports and sales tax records. This helps assess the tenant's profitability, the long-term prospects of this tenant and the project, and how to approach future rent negotiations. Although such provisions are standard in mall leases, they probably make sense in all retail leases. If the landlord operates a property-wide promotional program and needs to know the tenant's current sales levels, try to connect the tenant's cash registers to the landlord's computers to track spending and promotions in real time. If the tenant uses tablets in place of cash registers, confirm that any percentage rent formula captures those sales.

18.11 Tenant's Financial Condition. Require the tenant to deliver annual financial statements for itself and any guarantor. Negotiate the right to require a security deposit, rent adjustment or other consequences to protect the landlord if the financial condition of either deteriorates.

18.12 Tenant's SEC Filing. A publicly held tenant whose lease is a "material obligation" must file a copy of the lease with the tenant's publicly available SEC filing. Therefore, consider having the tenant: (1) represent that the lease is not a "material obligation"; (2) agree to notify the landlord if the tenant ever must publicly file the lease; and (3) agree to try to have rental information and other economic terms redacted or given "confidential" treatment. If the lease is "material," however, the last suggestion might not be realistic, because if the lease was material then presumably its rent and economic terms are the most material part of the lease and hence the whole point of the exercise.

18.13 Tenants Representations, Warranties, and Status. The tenant should agree to update its representations and warranties from time to time and to stay in good standing throughout the lease term.

18.14 Termination of Lease Memo. If the tenant obtains a memorandum of lease: (1) the tenant should agree to execute and deliver a termination of memorandum of lease in recordable form if the lease terminates early; and (2) consider requiring the tenant to sign such a termination at lease execution, to be held in escrow.

19. Guaranty

19.1 Estoppel Certificate. Any guarantor should agree, in the guaranty, to issue estoppel certificates promptly upon request. Any failure should constitute a lease default.

19.2 Foreign Guarantor. In the case of any foreign or out-of-state guarantor, require appointment of an in-state agent for service of process and a consent to jurisdiction. Check into enforcement procedures for judgments in the guarantor's home country. Consider providing for arbitration as a means of enforcing the guaranty; arbitration awards can often be more readily enforced in foreign countries than U.S. judgments.

19.3 "Good Guy" Guaranty. If a tenant is not creditworthy, consider obtaining a "good guy" guaranty. This guaranty would cover all rent and certain other obligations under the lease, starting with mechanics' liens. Like "carveout guaranties" for loans, the scope of these guaranties has metastasized over time, potentially covering a wide variety of obligations under the lease. Any “good guy” guaranty would end when the guarantied obligations have all been performed (by the tenant or the guarantor) and the tenant surrenders the premises vacant, in satisfactory physical condition, and free of any occupancy rights, provided the guarantor gives X months notice of surrender and pays X months rent. Upon the tenant’s surrender, and as a condition to release of the guaranty, the tenant should release the landlord in writing from all lease obligations. The “good guy guaranty” should remain in force until the guarantor has paid all sums due under the guaranty.

19.4 Guarantor Consents. Tailor the guarantor’s consent/waiver boilerplate to reflect circumstances of the lease. For example, the guarantor should consent in advance to any future assignment of the lease. The guaranty should also contain any state-specific language necessary or helpful for a guaranty.

19.5 Guarantor Consideration. In any guaranty, recite the relationship between the guarantor and the tenant to confirm the guarantor will receive some benefit from the lease.

19.6 Guarantor’s Financial Condition. Require the guarantor to provide financial statements at lease execution. Require regular reporting of each guarantor’s net worth. State that a material decline in a guarantor’s net worth or a guarantor’s death, disability, or bankruptcy constitutes an event of default unless the tenant promptly furnishes additional collateral or a new guarantor satisfactory to the landlord or meeting an agreed financial test, such as a net worth equal to some multiple of the annual rent. If a guarantor enters bankruptcy but the tenant does not, then any lease remedies triggered by the guarantor’s bankruptcy should be perfectly enforceable against a tenant.

19.7 Lease Assignment. If the landlord sells the property, then the guaranty should, by its terms, automatically travel to the purchaser, whether or not the transfer documents say so.

19.8 Social Security/EIN Number/Address. State the Social Security or employer identification number (and, perhaps, driver’s license and passport) number and home address of any guarantor beneath its signature line. This underscores the fact that the guaranty is intended to constitute a personal obligation of the guarantor and may facilitate enforcement.

19.9 Springing Guaranty. Consider a springing guaranty if certain adverse events occur, such as a material reduction in the tenant's or a guarantor's net worth.

19.10 Tenant Bankruptcy. Any guarantor and any unreleased assignor should acknowledge that its liability will not decrease if a tenant bankruptcy "caps" the landlord's claim for "rent."

19.11 Unreleased Assignors. If the tenant assigns the lease, then unless the landlord has released the assignor, recognize that the assignor remains functionally a guarantor of the lease. Any reference to a guarantor of the lease should include any unreleased assignor, and the lease should treat them the same way.

20. Inability to Perform

20.1 Exception to Force Majeure. Force majeure should never limit any monetary obligation of the tenant, or any obligation to maintain insurance.

20.2 Force Majeure. For the landlord, force majeure should include a failure to obtain governmental consents or permits and acts of government, war, terrorism and insurrection.

20.3 Triggering Event. If the tenant negotiates a force majeure clause, require the tenant to notify the landlord promptly of any "force majeure" event. If the tenant doesn't notify the landlord quickly, then the tenant cannot claim force majeure. The tenant's extension of time to perform should continue only so long as the triggering event actually causes the tenant delay.

21. Initial Alterations

21.1 Completion of Landlord's Work. When the landlord completes any work it agreed to perform for the tenant, require the tenant to deliver an estoppel certificate confirming satisfactory completion. The lease will probably already allow the landlord to request an estoppel certificate at any time. The landlord just needs to remember to exercise that right.

21.2 Minimum Tenant Payment. Require the tenant to spend some minimum amount on its initial build-out, either generally or as a condition to satisfy before the landlord must make any contribution.

21.3 Landlord's Work. Because rent commencement will probably hinge on the landlord's completion of any work the landlord agreed to perform, scrutinize the scope and process for that work to assure that the landlord can accomplish it in a timely way without any need for cooperation from the tenant. As a small example, if anything requires the tenant's approval, even reasonable approval, the landlord can lose time if the tenant disapproves or delays its approval. Minimize any such requirements, and think about possible measures to mitigate the effect of consent requirements. Some are described in other sections of this checklist. The process of defining and completing any initial build-out requirements raises a huge number of issues large and small, which this checklist does not further address.

21.4 Punchlist Waiver. If the landlord has delivered the premises to the tenant, and the tenant starts alterations (or takes occupancy to conduct business) in any area, then the tenant waives any claims about the landlord's work in that area, unless previously included in a punchlist notice to the landlord.

21.5 Tenant Improvement Allowance. Coordinate the landlord's payment of any tenant improvement allowance with the terms of the landlord's construction loan or other financing. Make sure the requisition and funding schedules and conditions align. For example, avoid any obligation for the landlord to lay out its own cash for the tenant improvement allowance and then seek reimbursement. Instead, the lender should advance the funds when needed for the tenant.

21.6 Tenant Work Letter. The tenant work letter will become part of the lease. Give it the same legal scrutiny as the rest of the lease, or more. The landlord should confer with its architect and construction personnel to make sure the landlord can reasonably deliver what the work letter requires.

21.7 Use of Funds. Allow the landlord to keep any portion of the tenant improvement allowance not used by a specific date. Limit the tenant's ability to use its improvement allowance for anything that does not directly improve the landlord's real property. For example, exclude "soft costs," furniture, moving costs and network wiring.

22. Insurance

22.1 Additional Insureds. Require the tenant's insurance to name the landlord and its managing agent and mortgagee as "additional insureds,” not “named insureds.” The latter designation may lead to liability for premiums and may prevent the landlord from seeking indemnification against the tenant for claims. Bear in mind that nobody is an additional insured under a policy unless the policy is endorsed to say so. Two kinds of “additional insured” endorsement exist. One purports to cover anyone who is required by contract to be so covered. The other actually identifies the additional insured by name. The latter is preferable as a matter of practice. It requires less proof in court. In contrast, a so-called “blanket” or “automatic” endorsement forces the additional insured to prove that the contract was executed before the loss occurred and that the contract is between the additional insured and the named insured. Carriers successfully reject a significant number of additional insured claims because the claimant failed to meet the technical details of the endorsement. Require that coverage for the additional insured parties be primary. Any other insurance available to an additional insured party should not contribute to a loss until the tenant’s coverage (primary, umbrella and excess) is exhausted.

22.2 Approval Rights. Allow the landlord to approve the identity and financial condition of the tenant’s insurance carriers. Set minimum financial rating standards for any insurance carrier (typically a minimum A:X by AM Best or A by Standard & Poors).

22.3 Coordination with Loan Documents. Conform the insurance requirements in the lease to those in the landlord’s current loan documents. Allow the landlord to change the insurance requirements in the lease as needed to comply with the landlord’s and any mortgagee’s future reasonable requirements.

22.4 Evidence of Insurance. In the case of first party property insurance that tenant must maintain, call for delivery of “evidence” of insurance through one of the “ACORD” forms. “ACORD” is the universally used acronym for Association for Cooperative Operations Research and Development, a nonprofit standard-setting body for the worldwide insurance industry. (For more information, visit www.acord.org.) The forms would include the “ACORD 28” form, formerly “ACORD 27”) or a copy of the tenant’s insurance policy at lease signing, not a “certificate” of insurance (the “ACORD 25” form), which is a worthless piece of paper that may not lawfully be modified. For liability insurance, mandate the delivery of the policy itself and examine it for the endorsements that are necessary to make anyone at all an additional insured. The lease should require the tenant to deliver evidence of insurance whenever necessary to facilitate the landlord’s refinancing of the property, with a nuisance fee for late delivery. State that the landlord's failure to demand evidence of full compliance with the insurance requirements or to identify a deficiency in whatever documents the tenant does provide does not waive the tenant's insurance obligations.

22.5 Improvements and Betterments. Have the tenant insure any improvements and betterments it makes to its space, not just its personal property.

22.6 Insurance Advice. Work with the landlord's risk management team to check, update, and improve—and above all confirm compliance with—the insurance requirements of the lease as appropriate. Try to get an insurance broker (engaged by either the landlord or the tenant) or consultant to confirm in a letter, directed to the landlord, that the tenant's insurance coverage complies with the lease. Keep an eye on TRIA/TRIPRA/terrorism-related legislation; it has typically always had a sunset date, triggering a periodic crisis in the commercial real estate industry as each sunset date approaches.

22.7 Insurance Broker. Allow the landlord (at its option) to deal directly with the tenant's insurance broker to obtain any insurance documents the lease requires. The tenant should expressly authorize the tenant's broker to release the requested documents. The lease should state that doing so imposes no liability or obligation on the landlord, and doesn't excuse any tenant obligations. Absent special agreements, a broker owes no duty to anyone who is not the broker's "customer," so in an important enough case, ensure that the requisite special agreement is in place with the broker. In such a case, also consider checking the broker's errors and omissions insurance. Absent privity of contract, the landlord may find itself without any remedy against the tenant's adviser, at least absent fraud.

22.8 Limits on Liability Insurance. A well-drawn liability insurance clause should specify the limit of liability by requiring per-event coverage and aggregate coverage. As its name suggests, a "per-event coverage" limit would apply per occurrence, per accident or per claim. An "aggregate coverage" limit would apply to all occurrences, accidents or claims that take place in a policy period, typically a year. Specify when the aggregate limit should reset. For tenants with multiple locations, require a per-project or per-location aggregate limit. Require the tenant to submit "loss runs" to show how much insurance remains available after taking into account the claims filed to date. Establish a threshold for claims that will require the tenant to reset or increase its insurance coverage. Specify the maximum permitted deductible and self-insured retention amounts. Specify whether the policy is “claims made” or “occurrence”-based.

22.9 No Fault Liability. Resist the inclination to state that the tenant gets no rental abatement after a casualty if the tenant caused the casualty. Though this may sound “fair,” remember that the tenant has paid for its share of insurance coverage through operating cost escalations or otherwise. Fault may not be easily determined. Also, if rent does not abate upon a casualty, then the landlord cannot make a claim under its rental income insurance. Try to say that if the landlord cannot collect insurance proceeds, the tenant’s rent abatement ceases. Any tenant waivers of liability should expressly cover negligence and should benefit not only the landlord, but also the usual list of landlord-related parties, the property manager, and so on.

22.10 Plate Glass Insurance. Require any retail tenant to carry plate glass insurance. This coverage relates only to glass on the first floor of a building.

22.11 Rent Coverage. A landlord will usually prefer to maintain rental income insurance, as part of a larger property insurance package. In that case, it probably makes no sense to require the tenant to maintain business interruption insurance. Any rental/business interruption insurance should cover additional rent (such as escalations or tax pass-throughs) and percentage rent as well as base rent. The landlord should try to carry rental income insurance coverage for at least 12 months, more for buildings that would take longer to rebuild. The landlord will typically want to supplement the coverage with 12 months of an “extended period of indemnity” to cover the re-leasing period. Rental/business interruption insurance is usually written with an “exclusionary period,” which means the insurance does not respond until the loss continues for some period, typically 30 days.

22.12 Self-Insurance. If the tenant self-insures, work with an insurance adviser to understand the interaction between self-insurance and the waiver of liability addressed in a typical “waiver of subrogation” clause in an insurance policy. The landlord still needs to obtain the benefit of those waivers, even if the tenant (or its affiliate) acts as its own insurer. And the waivers should not preclude the landlord from making claims against the tenant in the tenant’s role as self-insurer.

22.13 Should Landlord Insure? Consider having the landlord insure the tenant's improvements, with the tenant reimbursing the allocable insurance cost—premium, co-insurance and all other insurance costs—either directly as additional rent or as an operating cost without a base year. Then have the landlord agree to restore, or give the landlord the right to require the tenant to restore, using any available insurance proceeds. If the landlord insures, have the tenant agree not to do anything that will void the landlord's insurance, increase the landlord's insurance risk or cause disallowance of sprinkler credits, if applicable.

22.14 Tenant Failure to Insure. If the tenant fails to insure and a fire occurs, then make the tenant liable for the entire loss and not merely the unpaid insurance premiums—even if the landlord knew about the failure to insure. Such a provision responds to cases that limit the tenant's liability to the amount of the unpaid premiums. For net-leased properties where the tenant is responsible for buying the insurance, give the landlord the right (but not the obligation) to buy the required insurance and obtain reimbursement from the tenant. Some landlords prefer or even insist on this arrangement as it gives them more control over insurance.

22.15 Tenant's Right to Proceeds. Make any right of the tenant to receive insurance proceeds subject to the rights of the landlord's mortgagee and to fulfillment of any tenant restoration duties under the lease.

22.16 Tenant's Special Use. Consider the tenant's specific use and whether the lease should require any particular insurance. For instance, if the tenant sells liquor on the premises require the tenant to purchase liquor liability insurance and dram shop coverage. If the tenant gives away liquor without charge, then the lease should require host liquor liability insurance. Art poses special issues, as do high-risk activities. More generally, if the tenant's use and occupancy of the premises presents an unusual situation or risk of loss, consult an insurance adviser. If the tenant keeps the premises vacant, it might trigger a higher insurance premium for the landlord. Therefore, if the tenant decides to do that, the tenant should pay any resulting insurance premium increase.

22.17 Waiver of Subrogation. Understand “waiver of subrogation.” This is a tricky topic, often handled badly. Do not provide that landlord and tenant waive their subrogation rights. They have no subrogation rights. Only the insurance carrier has subrogation rights. Provide instead that the landlord and the tenant waive any right to recover from the other for property damage to the extent covered by property insurance (and sometimes also liability insurance). These clauses should be mutual, covering all losses caused by any insured risk (even negligence of the landlord or the tenant), provided the insurance carrier has consented to the waiver. Such consents (the actual waivers of subrogation) appear in the standard insurance policies published by the Insurance Services Office and used by insurance carriers in the vast majority of the market. But confirm this each time. State that the landlord's waiver does not apply if the tenant does something that invalidates the insurance.

23. Landlord's Access

23.1 Communications with Third Parties. Require the tenant to provide the name, telephone number and email address of its consultants, insurance brokers and other third parties. Allow the landlord to communicate directly with these parties. The tenant should agree to authorize and require those people to cooperate.

23.2 Emergency Contact. Require the tenant to provide the name, telephone number and email address of an emergency contact and state it in the lease, subject to change by proper notice.

23.3 Keys. Leases usually require the tenant to give the landlord copies of all keys and access codes. The landlord should note that liability may travel with those keys and access codes, especially if the tenant has unusually valuable personal property. The landlord may want to be selective about requiring keys and access codes or limit the landlord's liability, if the lease does not already do that. Prohibit the tenant from placing chains or padlocks on any doors.

23.4 Landlord's Right to Enter. Give the landlord the right to enter to perform repairs, to take photographs in the premises and to facilitate the landlord's ability to perform repairs and do work in other tenants' premises.

23.5 No Eviction. Make clear in the lease that the landlord's entry onto or inspection of the premises does not constitute an actual or constructive eviction and does not entitle the tenant to any rights or remedies, or any claim, offset, deduction, or abatement of rent. It also does not increase the landlord's responsibility for any conditions in the premises.

23.6 Notice Requirements. The lease should state that the landlord may enter without notice in an emergency. Even absent an emergency, oral notice to someone on site should suffice. This is yet another example of an area where a requirement for "written notice" may sound perfectly reasonable, but in the real world such a requirement is completely impractical.

23.7 Reconfiguration. Reserve the right for the landlord to reconfigure or change the means of access to the premises.

23.8 Secure Areas. Limit the tenant's right to create secure areas (areas the landlord may not enter without the tenant's permission) by identifying those areas in an exhibit. If the tenant wants the right to move those areas around, limit them to their original overall size, and require some level of reasonableness.

23.9 Signs and Showings. The landlord should have the rights to: (i) show the premises to prospective purchasers, mortgagees, or appraisers and post "for sale" signs; and (ii) in the last six to 18 months of the term (longer for longer terms), show the premises to prospective tenants and post "for rent" signs. If the landlord has a commitment to "green leasing," the landlord may need to be able to show the premises to any consultants or organizations issuing or maintaining LEED or similar certifications, or want to be able to show the premises to interested persons seeking to learn about environmentally sound construction.

24. Landlord's Liability

24.1 Exculpation. Limit the landlord's liability to its interest in the property or, better, to whatever equity the landlord would have if it had entered into a mortgage securing financing equal to 80 percent of the value of the property. Negate any personal liability of the landlord and its partners, members, managers, officers, directors, affiliates, and the like. Recent cases have applied the "implied covenant of good faith and fair dealing"—a tort theory of liability—to sidestep exculpation clauses in leases. To avoid the possible effect of such cases, state that the landlord's exculpation applies not only to claims under the express terms of the lease, but also to claims of any kind whatsoever arising from the relationship between the parties or any rights and obligations they may have relating to the property, the lease or anything related to either.

24.2 Landlord Default. Give the landlord at least the same open-ended cure periods for nonmonetary defaults that tenants typically obtain. So long as the landlord has commenced and is diligently prosecuting the cure of its default, the tenant should have no rights or remedies against the landlord. Consider giving the landlord's mortgagees some additional cure period.

24.3 Liability. Any liability of the landlord should end if the landlord transfers its interest in the premises.

24.4 Liability for Prior Owners' Act. As a rather aggressive position, say that after any conveyance of the property (even outside foreclosure), the new owner is not liable for (and the tenant may not assert any credit, claim or counterclaim because of) any claims the tenant might have had against the former owner, such as for overcharges and refunds of escalations. Perhaps the liability should cut off as soon as a mortgagee takes over control of the property, whether through a receiver or as a mortgagee in possession.

24.5 Statute of Limitations. Require the tenant to assert any claim against the landlord within a certain short period after the tenant first became aware of the facts supporting the claim.

25. Landlord's Representations

25.1 Express Not Implied. State that the landlord makes no implied covenants, representations or warranties. Limit the landlord's responsibilities to those expressly stated in the lease (i.e., hopefully, none). As a practical matter, the landlord's continuing obligations under the lease matter much more than any representations and warranties.

25.2 Independence of Covenants; No Termination Right. The tenant should acknowledge that all covenants of the landlord are independent. The tenant should waive any right to terminate or suspend rent based on the landlord's default.

25.3 Merger. State that any agreements, written or otherwise, pre-dating the lease (including prior lease drafts) merge into (i.e., are totally superseded by) the lease. Indicate that any statements or representations on the landlord's website or in the landlord's advertising are not part of the lease.

25.4 Other Leases. State that the landlord makes no representations, warranties or covenants, about other tenants (past, present or future) or the terms of their leases.

26. Maintenance and Repairs

26.1 Broad Repair Obligations. When the tenant has broad repair obligations, expressly include "ordinary or extraordinary, structural or nonstructural, foreseen or unforeseen" repairs.

26.2 Landlord's Repair Obligations. If the landlord must make any repair, it should have no duty to replace or repair the tenant's finishes above plain vanilla building standard.

26.3 No Overtime. The landlord should have no obligation to do any work at overtime or premium rates.

26.4 Periodic Upgrades. Beyond maintaining the premises "as is," the lease could require the tenant to upgrade and renovate every specified number of years, to keep the premises exciting and new, particularly for retail space. Perhaps the tenant must have invested a certain additional amount in the premises within a certain period as a condition to exercising any lease renewal rights.

26.5 Right to Perform. If the tenant's acts or omissions cause damage to another tenant's premises, the landlord can repair them at this tenant's expense.

26.6 Specify Repair Obligations. Try not to refer categorically to repairs as "structural" (the landlord's responsibility) and "nonstructural" (the tenant's responsibility). Draw these lines specifically and in detail, saying exactly who repairs what. Otherwise, a court may decide what the parties intended and the landlord may not like what the court decides. The lines between "structural" and "nonstructural" may vary between whole-building leases and leases of only part of a building.

26.7 Tenant's Obligations. The tenant must maintain, repair and replace any parts of the building—including storefronts and sidewalks—that exclusively serve or abut the premises. Prohibit the tenant from placing anything on the sidewalks that might violate a local ordinance (e.g., a pickup box for FedEx). Should the tenant be allowed to display merchandise on the sidewalk? Or place vending machines on the sidewalk? If the tenant is allowed to place any "lucrative" vending devices on the sidewalk, then consider entitling the landlord to a percentage of the revenues. Require the tenant to obtain and maintain any related permits and insurance.

26.8 Wireless Internet. If the tenant's wireless internet service causes interference, the tenant must resolve. The landlord may require the tenant to password-protect its Wi-Fi service. The tenant cannot resell those services to other tenants.

27. Occupancy

27.1 “As Is” Condition. The tenant should represent and acknowledge that it takes possession of the premises and the building and common areas in their as-is, where-is condition as of the commencement date. Consider including specific language to negate landlord liability for any latent defect.

27.2 Minimum Operating Covenant. The tenant should agree to open for business by a certain date. The tenant should then agree to operate for at least a certain minimum period. For a retail tenant, the lease should set minimum days and hours of operation, and consequences if the tenant “goes dark.”

27.3 No Obligation Except Specific Work. Confirm that the landlord has no obligation to perform any work or make any installations to prepare for the tenant’s occupancy, except as the lease expressly states.

27.4 Service Contracts. Consider whether the tenant should agree to reimburse the landlord for some share of the cost of all applicable service contracts (such as HVAC, boiler, sprinklers, alarms and security) or to maintain such contracts for the premises at the tenant’s expense. If the tenant maintains such contracts, stipulate quality standards for the service provider; minimum maintenance frequency; and recordkeeping and reporting requirements, both during the lease term and when it ends.

27.5 Tenant’s Name. If the tenant operates under any name other than the tenant’s name as stated on the lease, confirm that this does not give the other entity any rights or require the landlord to name or serve them in any action. In some cases, if the name on the door does not match the respondent’s name on the warrant of eviction, the marshal may not evict. Careful landlord-tenant counsel can probably prevent the problem, but any variation in names could create a spurious issue. This will vary among states. In some cases, the lease should require that the tenant operate and identify itself only under a particular name consistent with the lease.

28. Options (Expansion/Renewal/Reduction/Termination)

28.1 Conditions. Although tenants like options, they limit a landlord’s flexibility and create the risk of mistakes and dropped balls, with potential exposure. Even if the landlord is willing to grant them, the landlord should do whatever it can to limit them and try to make them go away under circumstances that suggest the tenant does not really need them, or no longer deserves them. For example, do not allow the tenant to exercise an option if the tenant is in default on the exercise date or on the effective date of any exercise. The landlord could even require that no defaults have occurred within a specific period before the exercise date. A tenant's option rights should terminate if the tenant has: (1) assigned the lease; (2) sublet more than a certain amount of space; (3) dropped below a certain minimum occupancy; (4) stopped operating in the space; (5) recently exercised any "giveback" right; (6) recently failed to exercise any available "first refusal" or expansion right; (7) not invested a certain dollar amount in the space in a certain period; or (8) suffered a deterioration in its financial condition.

28.2 Consequences. If the tenant exercises any option right of any kind, think about whether any lease terms should change as a result. For example, if the tenant received special signage rights because of the tenant's large occupancy, those rights should perhaps go away if the tenant exercises a right to substantially reduce the size of the leased premises.

28.3 Multiple Bites at Apple. If the landlord offers "first refusal" space and the tenant does not take it (or if the tenant declines to exercise an option), then for a specified number of months the tenant should be deemed to have waived any first refusal rights (and any options that would otherwise apply), at least where they relate to comparable space, broadly defined.

28.4 Option Maintenance Fee. Require the tenant to pay a nominal annual fee to preserve future options. This gives the tenant an incentive to give up any option right it does not truly need and will never use.

28.5 Option Subject To Other Rights. Make any expansion option subject to existing exclusives and renewal clauses of other tenants. To preserve tenant diversity, the landlord may even want the right to negotiate a renewal with an existing tenant before making that tenant's space available to a new tenant negotiating its own option or right of first refusal.

28.6 Option Term Rent. Set a floor for rent in any renewal option term equal to the previous rent under the lease.

28.7 Overlapping Options. Try to limit the landlord's liability if the landlord inadvertently allows overlapping or inconsistent options, or forgets to notify the tenant of potentially available space.

28.8 Purchase Right Carveouts. If a tenant somehow manages to negotiate an option or right of first refusal to purchase the landlord's building, exclude: (1) foreclosure or its equivalent; (2) any subsequent transaction; (3) transactions between the landlord and affiliates or family members; (4) other permitted transactions, such as transfers of passive interests or creation of preferred equity for mezzanine lenders; (5) any exercise of remedies under one of those permitted transactions; and (6) if the tenant "passes" on its preemptive right, then all subsequent transactions. If the tenant does exercise a purchase option, state that the lease remains in effect, and the tenant must continue to pay rent, until the closing under the purchase. Otherwise, courts have been known to conclude that the lease vanished when the tenant became a contract vendee.

28.9 Reduction Options. If the tenant negotiates an option to "give back" space, this raises many of the same issues as expansion or renewal options, as well as lease expirations. In addition, think about the practical issues that any space reduction might create. Will the tenant need or want to leave any installations in place to service their remaining space in the building? If the tenant gives back a partial floor, who will construct—and pay for the construction—of any new demising walls or any incremental costs to comply with building code requirements for a separate occupancy? How will the landlord need to change its operations if a floor previously occupied by one tenant becomes a multiple-tenant floor? Will the tenant's elevator lobby signage need to change? Exclusive elevator banks? How will the parties handle submetering and other reconfiguration of utilities? What happens if the tenant gives a notice of reduction but then can't move out on time? If the tenant reduces its occupancy, should it lose some of the concessions it otherwise negotiated in the lease? If the tenant gives back multiple floors, the lease might require contiguity among those floors, and require them to consist of the highest (or possibly lowest) floors in the tenant's stack. One basically must think through and reverse-engineer all the practical issues that arose in the original lease structuring and negotiations.

28.10 Termination Options. If the tenant has a termination option, require the tenant to make any termination payment when the tenant exercises the option. Adjust any brokerage agreement to assure that if the tenant terminates, then the landlord will not have to pay a commission for the terminated/canceled part of the lease term. This is typically done by deferring the corresponding commission until the termination option has lapsed without exercise. The broker may expect to receive a commission on the termination fee.

28.11 Time of the Essence. Make time of the essence for exercising any option or right of first refusal. Say that timely notice constitutes an agreed and material condition of exercise. Recognize that the courts sometimes validate late exercise. Perhaps provide for a protective rent adjustment in this case, e.g., to fair market rental value if the lease would not otherwise provide for it.

28.12 Timing. Make the exercise deadline early enough to give the landlord time to relet if the tenant does not exercise. Allow the landlord to immediately start showing the option space if the tenant does not exercise. Coordinate the timing with other leases to facilitate assembling large blocks of space in the future if the landlord wants to do so. A landlord usually wants plenty of lead time and notice, but may want to give the tenant as little lead time and notice as possible, to maximize the landlord's flexibility in dealing with unexpected changes in occupancy. If some other lease ends earlier than anticipated, give the landlord the right to accelerate any future option or first refusal right that the tenant may have on the affected space.

29. Percentage Rent and Radius Clause

29.1 Audit Right. Let the landlord audit the tenant's gross sales. The tenant should deliver point of sales data as well as sales tax returns. If the tenant underpaid percentage rent (or underreported gross sales) by more than three percent, the tenant should pay interest and the costs of the audit.

29.2 Effect of Casualty. If the premises are closed for parts of the year because of a casualty or condemnation, the "breakpoint" for percentage rent should drop. This assumes the lease expresses the breakpoint as a fixed dollar amount, and not a formula referring to actual fixed rent payable from time to time. The latter would be more common, so this problem usually does not arise.

29.3 Fixed Rent Increases. Increase fixed minimum rent (and the percentage rent breakpoint) periodically, based on actual or projected increases in gross sales.

29.4 Gross Sales. Define gross sales to include sales by subtenants and concessionaires.

29.5 Inclusions/Exclusions. Consider whether to include any catalog or internet sales that the tenant makes through the store. Take into account the mechanics of the tenant's business. Prohibit the tenant from claiming any credit for goods that a customer bought through a catalog or over the internet, unless previously included in store sales. Exclude sales to the tenant's employees only if the tenant makes those sales at a discount or, better (but less "standard"), include those sales based on their actual discounted prices.

29.6 Increases. Provide for an increase in percentage rent upon any change of use or change of the tenant. If the lease provides for multiple increases in percentage rent over time, think about the interaction of those multiple increases, and whether any uncertainty exists about their possible "compounded" effect.

29.7 Kick-Out Right. Allow the landlord to terminate the lease if percentage rent does not reach a certain level by a certain date or if the tenant goes dark. Upon any such termination, require the tenant to reimburse the landlord for all its unamortized leasing costs, including the cost of tenant improvements, brokerage commissions, negative rent, inducement payments, free rent, and cash allowances. Try to continue any kick-out right over the entire lease term. If a retail landlord only has a one-shot kick-out right, this may concern future lenders. As a compromise, the kick-out right could recur periodically.

29.8 Limit Any Percentage Rent Penalty Period. If any co-tenancy or other problem arises, the lease may allow the tenant to pay "percentage rent only." In those cases, if the landlord ever solves the problem, regular rent should once again apply. After a certain time, allow the landlord to require the tenant to either terminate or resume paying regular rent (fish or cut bait).

29.9 Non-Compete Clause. Any non-compete clause should expressly benefit only the named tenant, not any successor or assignee. If the tenant assigns or sublets, the restriction should go away.

29.10 Radius Clause. Include a radius clause in any lease requiring percentage rent, i.e., the tenant (and affiliates) may not compete with itself within a restricted area without the landlord's consent.

29.11 Recordkeeping. Require the tenant to maintain records, in accordance with GAAP or any other generally accepted accounting standard, sufficient to make any audit meaningful. The tenant should keep its records at an accessible and reasonable location, specified in the lease. If the tenant moves its records, it should agree to promptly notify the landlord. The tenant should keep its records for at least three years. For any audit, the tenant should provide its record in electronic form such as a spreadsheet, so the landlord can easily work with them.

29.12 Violation. If the tenant violates the radius clause, then consider requiring the tenant to include as “gross sales” (for percentage rent purposes) the greater of: (1) a specified percentage of gross sales at the premises; or (2) the gross sales of the tenant’s store in the prohibited area.

30. Quiet Enjoyment

30.1 Conditions. New York law (and probably the law of other states) implies a covenant of quiet enjoyment if the lease says nothing. Indicate that quiet enjoyment is subject to the rights of mortgagees, ground lessors, other tenants, matters of record and all other terms of the lease. Condition the covenant of quiet enjoyment upon the tenant’s not being in default, or at least not being in default beyond cure periods.

30.2 Limit Services. Expressly limit the landlord’s obligation to provide services and other obligations to only whatever the lease expressly requires. Try to prevent the courts from using the “covenant of quiet enjoyment” as the basis to infer possible landlord obligations to provide services beyond those the lease requires. But also consider whether modifying the covenant of quiet enjoyment at all justifies the controversy and negotiations it may cause.

31. Real Estate Taxes.

31.1 Allocation of Tax Liability. The landlord might not always want to allocate real estate taxes by square footage. For example, retail space may increase taxes more and faster than residential or office space. Try to require each tenant to pay for any real estate tax increases that result from that particular tenant’s installation. If one tenant receives a tax abatement, the other tenants should typically contribute to real estate taxes based on the pre-abatement taxes.

31.2 Base Year Real Estate Taxes. Define “Base Year Real Estate Taxes” to include water and sewer charges; as “net of any special assessments”; and “as finally determined.” Consider the impact of varying tax years for varying tax jurisdictions, such as school district, water district, municipal, and county.

31.3 Business Improvement District (BID) Charges and Special Assessments. Include any BID charges and special assessments in the definition of “Real Estate Taxes,” even if no BID presently exists.

31.4 Estimated Tax Payments. Require the tenant to make monthly estimated tax payments, especially if the landlord’s mortgage requires tax escrow payments. Time the tenant’s payments to precede the mortgagee’s required tax escrow payments by at least a few days.

31.5 Further Assurances. The tenant should agree to assist the landlord, as reasonably necessary, to qualify for tax abatements and benefits (such as the Industrial and Commercial Abatement Program, or ICAP, in New York City). Allow the landlord to amend the lease to qualify for any tax benefits or abatements. If the landlord obtains such benefits, the lease should say whether the landlord or the tenant will ultimately receive the economic benefits of the program and how those benefits interact with real estate tax escalations. If an ICAP reduction arises from a particular tenant, all parties will typically expect it to be allocated just to that tenant.

31.6 Imperiled Abatement. If the property benefits from any tax abatement, deferral, subsidy or the like, think about the risk that someone might challenge the validity of such a benefit. If any such challenge arises or someone threatens such a challenge, allow the landlord to require the tenant to pay monthly (just like a regular payment of real estate taxes) an appropriate contribution toward whatever incremental taxes, with interest, the landlord owes or might owe if the challenge succeeds. The landlord would refund these payments with interest if the challenge failed. Without a structure like this, the landlord will bear much of the risk of any challenge and, in practice, may not be able to shift much of that risk to tenants.

31.7 Management Fee. If the landlord protests real estate taxes, impose a reasonable management fee to compensate for the landlord’s time, trouble and effort. Such a fee might apply generally or, if appropriate, only to particular tenant(s) requesting the tax contest.

31.8 Payments in Lieu of Taxes (PILOT). Include PILOT payments in real estate taxes.

31.9 Successful Contest. If a tax contest succeeds, the tenant will not necessarily be entitled to its share of the full refund. Instead, subtract the refund from actual real estate taxes for the year in question, and then ask whether this would have reduced the tenant’s tax escalation, after considering base years. The tenant's refund should not exceed that hypothetical reduction.

31.10 Tax Contests. Prohibit the tenant from contesting taxes without the landlord's consent. If the landlord does consent, the landlord may want the right to require the tenant to post a bond or letter of credit equal to any contested taxes, if the tenant did not need to pay the taxes first, as a condition to the contest. The landlord may also want to control choice of counsel. The tenant should indemnify the landlord against all losses that arise from any tax contest the tenant initiates. The landlord will almost always prefer to handle the contest.

31.11 Transfer Taxes. Consider possible transfer taxes on the lease. New York, for example, imposes a transfer tax on certain leases that extend beyond 49 years (including options) or contain a purchase option. New York City taxes any consideration ("key money") paid for a lease, regardless of term.

32. Recognition of Subtenants

32.1 Clear and Objective Standards. Any landlord that agrees to deliver recognition protections to subtenants should insist that any "recognized" sublease must satisfy clear and objective standards. (In the context of protecting subtenants, these agreements are often called "recognition agreements." They are very similar to, and also sometimes called, "non-disturbance agreements." This checklist reserves the latter term, abbreviated as SNDA, for the agreements between a tenant and a landlord's mortgagee.) Before agreeing to recognize any actual or potential sublease, the landlord must ask whether it wants to be stuck with that sublease and all of its terms if the main lease terminates. The landlord may want to require minimum rents, a certain form of sublease, an unrelated subtenant, arm's-length negotiations, a reasonable configuration (such as multiple contiguous full floors), subrent that does not decline over time, and other characteristics. And the tenant should not be in default.

32.2 Multiple Subleases. If the lease terminates, a landlord that has entered into recognition agreements could conceivably end up inheriting any one or more, or some random selection, of the tenant's subleases. Subtenant recognition agreements can create issues similar to partial release clauses in mortgages (concern about "cherry picking" and/or destruction of expected value).

32.3 Multiple-Floor Subtenants. If the tenant occupies multiple floors, try to limit the recognized space to full floor(s) at the top or bottom of the tenant's stack.

32.4 Negotiations. The tenant should agree to reimburse the landlord's legal fees to review the sublease and negotiate the recognition agreement. To short-circuit those negotiations, attach a form of recognition agreement to the lease as an exhibit. Those recognition agreements often give a landlord protections that exceed those a mortgagee expects in an SNDA. The agreement needs to assure, generally, that the landlord has no greater obligations under the "recognized" sublease than the landlord would have had under the terminated lease. Beyond that, the landlord will want to negate liability for a litany of possible unappealing sublandlord obligations, such as representations, warranties, confidentiality, space preparation and provision of incidental services. The landlord will also want protection against the risk (likelihood) that the subrent will fall short of the agreed rent under the main lease for the same space. If the landlord's counsel uses a mortgage SNDA as the template for a subtenant recognition agreement, counsel should check it against other subtenant recognition agreements. Failure to do that could result in important omissions from the subtenant SNDA.

32.5 Sale of Building. If a lease obligates the landlord to "recognize" subtenants and the landlord later decides to sell the building, how can a purchaser obtain comfort about the scope of "recognition" obligations the purchaser will inherit? Insist that only a recorded document will bind any future landlord. And try to say that any successor landlord – particularly one that acquires the property through foreclosure – has no liability for rent overcharges, escalation refunds or other financial obligations of the former landlord.

32.6 Security Deposit. If the landlord does agree to enter into a recognition agreement with any subtenant, the landlord may want to hold the subtenant's security deposit, but beware of becoming involved in sublandlord/subtenant disputes.

33. Remedies

33.1 Abandonment. The landlord's seizure and re-entry into the premises based on abandonment can create risk, because of uncertainty about what abandonment means. Try to define abandonment in the lease, such as nonpayment of rent and physical absence from the premises for a certain time. State that if the tenant defaults beyond cure periods and also removes a significant amount of fixtures and equipment, that would constitute an abandonment and a surrender of the premises, entitling the landlord to repossess. Thus, the landlord need not bring summary proceedings or give the tenant further cure rights. Expressly allow self-help for abandonment. But before actually doing it, check local landlord-tenant law.

33.2 Arbitration. If the tenant can invoke arbitration of disputes, condition this right on the absence of any rent default. Expressly exclude any rent dispute from arbitration. If the landlord cares about quick resolution of any arbitrated dispute, agree in the arbitration clause on possible arbitrators (and the number of arbitrators), the arbitration authority and the rules that will apply. Do not leave these matters until a dispute arises. Specify arbitrators (and confirm they are willing to serve), or arbitrator qualifications, so that the arbitrators will understand the landlord's business and position, or even favor the landlord. Specify a limited and short list of issues for which arbitration will apply, such as escalation charges; disputes about repairs; and assignment and subletting if the landlord has agreed to be reasonable. If, however, one draws lines between disputes to be arbitrated and disputes to be litigated, this creates the risk of disputes about how to characterize a dispute. Thus, if one must go down that road one should make the lines crystal clear and perhaps state that any disputes on characterization of a dispute shall be arbitrated. Some landlords think tenants are more willing to arbitrate than to litigate. Arbitration should not apply to nonpayment, dispossession or conditional limitation proceedings. Require any arbitrator to issue a written explanation of its decision. Most attorneys writing arbitration clauses prefer to require "baseball arbitration," in which the arbitrator must choose one party's proposed resolution of the dispute or the other party's proposed resolution of the dispute—nothing in between. It is believed this approach promotes reasonableness and settlements.

33.3 Default Rate. Require the tenant to pay interest at the default rate on amounts past due even after judgment, when the statutory judgment rate would otherwise apply. This assumes, of course, a default rate in excess of the judgment rate (9% in New York).

33.4 Equitable Relief. Try to state that the landlord can obtain injunctive, declaratory and specific performance-type relief regarding all nonmonetary covenants—both negative and affirmative—supervised and monitored by a special master if necessary.

33.5 Inducement Repayments. State that if the lease terminates early because of default, the tenant must repay with interest the unamortized balance of the landlord's rent concessions, brokerage commissions, contribution to the tenant's work and work the landlord performed for the tenant. The tenant will argue that this gives the landlord double compensation. That may be true, but only if the tenant actually pays both (1) the damages the lease or governing law requires the tenant to pay; and (2) the refund of the landlord's inducement costs. The landlord can agree to offset any liquidated damages provided for in the lease by the damages suggested in this paragraph if the tenant actually pays the latter damages. But in that case, why bother?

33.6 Interest and Late Charge. Require the tenant to pay interest on late payments, in addition to a late charge. Make the tenant responsible for any charges the landlord incurs due to a bounced check. Multiple defaults or bounced checks within a specified period should trigger special consequences up to and including termination of the lease. For example, the landlord can require a higher late fee; a larger security deposit; that the next default be incurable; or that future payments—or at least all payments for the next specified number of months—be made by bank checks or wire transfer.

33.7 Intermediate Remedies. Deal with the fact that courts typically refuse to terminate leases based on “minor” defaults such as failure to deliver financial information or an estoppel certificate. For these defaults, establish intermediate remedies, something less than terminating the lease. Make them meaningful, but not draconian, such as liquidated damages (e.g., $500/day) or an administrative fee, a temporary rent adjustment or a suspension or deferral of some privilege or benefit. If the tenant's “minor” default continues for a specified period, at some point it should constitute an event of default. Consider the degree of reasonableness necessary for any such payment remedy to qualify as liquidated damages.

33.8 No Mitigation. Provide that the landlord has no obligation to mitigate damages. If the landlord agrees to mitigate, the lease should define exactly what the landlord must do. It should not be much.

33.9 Nonpayment. If the tenant fails to pay rent, expressly allow the landlord to exercise a “conditional limitation” right and terminate the lease, not just commence nonpayment proceedings. Watch out: many Standard Forms establish a “conditional limitation” for all defaults except failure to pay rent. Expressly allow the landlord to exercise a “conditional limitation” right to terminate the lease and also prosecute simultaneously a proceeding for nonpayment of rent. Try to negate the usual rule that requires the landlord to elect between the two—although of course the landlord cannot actually obtain both forms of relief, and judges may do what they want.

33.10 Ownership or Succession. Consider asking the tenant to excuse the landlord from any obligation to prove ownership or succession in any eviction proceeding. The landlord would need to prove only tenant default. The tenant would then bear the burden of proving that the party claiming to be the landlord is really just an impostor without rights. If enforceable, this would eliminate a sideshow that merely gives any tenant an opportunity to trip up the landlord and delay the proceedings, with no practical benefit in the real world. As a variation, state that if the landlord shows a recorded deed to the court, then this constitutes prima facie proof of ownership sufficient to prosecute eviction proceedings, and the tenant bears the burden of proving the landlord doesn't actually own the building, i.e., has commenced the eviction proceeding just for fun.

33.11 Right to Cure. Allow the landlord to cure the tenant's defaults and bill the tenant for the landlord's expenses, with interest at the default rate, as additional rent.

33.12 Waiver of Jury Trial. The waiver should apply to all matters arising out of the landlord/tenant relationship and the property, not merely the lease, so as to reach tort claims between the parties.

33.13 Yellowstone Injunction. Consider whether the landlord can proactively add language to the lease to limit the availability and potential burden of so-called "Yellowstone" injunctions under New York law. For example, consider some or all of the following, each of which responds to one or more of the issues that arise in Yellowstone proceedings:

33.13.1 Cure Period Extension Rights. State that the tenant may obtain an open-ended cure period, and as much time as the tenant wants to litigate an alleged default, by depositing with the landlord as security an amount equal to the landlord's estimate of the cost to cure the alleged default. State that such a deposit constitutes the only way the tenant can evidence its ability and desire to cure the default.

33.13.2 Final Cure Period Before Eviction. State that if the landlord obtains a warrant of eviction, the tenant will automatically have—or the landlord can agree at any time to grant the tenant—a short final cure period before the landlord proceeds with actual eviction. A "last clear opportunity to cure" at the end of the eviction proceedings substantially undercuts the basis for a Yellowstone injunction. State that the landlord may offer the tenant any such “last clear chance” either in the notice to cure or at any later point before the lease has actually terminated.

33.13.3 Financial Defaults. Require the tenant to acknowledge that it cannot obtain a Yellowstone injunction for any financial default, even if uncertainty or disagreement exists about the tenant’s obligations. Uncertainty or disagreement will always exist in these cases. The tenant must pay first, fight later. At one time, it was thought that Yellowstone injunctions were never available for financial disputes, but that is no longer always true.

33.13.4 Landlord Court Victory. State that if the landlord prevails in litigation, the lease will be deemed to have terminated on the date the landlord delivered notice of default, and the hold-over rent rate applies from that date forward. Require the tenant to deposit this amount in escrow during any Yellowstone injunction.

33.13.5 Other Rights and Remedies. State that a Yellowstone injunction, if granted, limits only the landlord’s right to terminate the lease and does not limit any other rights or remedies, such as late charges, default interest, and reimbursement of the landlord’s expenses.

33.13.6 Waiver. Require the tenant to waive its right to bring a Yellowstone injunction, but recognize that existing law probably makes such a waiver unenforceable. Perhaps consider limiting the duration of any Yellowstone injunction to a short number of days, so that if the litigation is not fully resolved in that time the landlord is free to pursue remedies, or perhaps the rent automatically rises.

Although any or all of the above Yellowstone prevention measures may be creative and might even work, New York judges often regard Yellowstone injunctions as both automatic and a quasi-constitutional element of New York law. Thus, judges may disregard or laugh at any of the measures just suggested.

33.14 Assignment of Remedies. Allow the landlord to assign any of its enforcement rights under the lease to a third party. For example, if the lease restricts certain uses, the landlord may assign to another tenant the right to enforce that restriction.

33.15 Liquidated Damages. If the tenant violates a radius clause, operating covenant, or other similar prohibition, establish a simple formula for liquidated damages. Otherwise the landlord will have no meaningful remedy.

34. Rent

34.1 All Payments Are “Additional Rent.” Define “additional rent” to include all payments the lease requires of the tenant. This will support the use of “summary dispossession” rights for nonpayment of all these amounts. The same characterization may have unfavorable consequences in bankruptcy, though. The landlord may wish to be strategic about this issue.

34.2 Commercial Rent Control. Standard Forms already often require the tenant to make a corrective payment when rent control terminates. Consider requiring the tenant to escrow the shortfall amount with the landlord each month during any rent control period, and pay interest on the shortfall, with credit for any interest earned on the escrow account. Any such measure will almost certainly not be enforceable, though, once the Legislature establishes commercial rent control, hence might not be worth the effort.

34.3 Finalizing Dates. Where important dates remain to be determined after lease signing, such as the delivery date, commencement date or rent commencement date, state that the landlord can later deliver a commencement date letter to the tenant, memorializing all relevant dates. The lease could include a form of that letter as an exhibit. The letter should automatically become effective unless the tenant delivers a written objection to the landlord within 10 days after receipt.

34.4 Free Rent. Define the free rent period as ending on a particular date (defined in the term sheet), not a certain number of months after an event (such as lease signing or delivery of premises). Consider including a rent schedule for clarity. This approach shifts to the tenant the financial risk of protracted lease negotiations. Free rent periods should apply only to fixed rent. As a compromise in “free rent” negotiations, consider allowing a retail tenant to pay rent in gift certificates for a certain period.

34.5 Lockbox. If the tenant pays rent into a lockbox, consider how to handle the risk that the lockbox administrator will deposit a check that the landlord would have wanted to reject. For example, the lease might say that any such deposit does not waive the landlord's rights, as long as the landlord refunds the amount of the incorrectly deposited check within some short time after the lockbox administrator deposited it. Thus, the landlord can correct the lockbox administrator's mistakes and preserve the landlord's rights. The landlord will also need to make sure that any such corrections do not create issues under the landlord's loan documents.

34.6 Payment. The lease should include an express covenant to pay rent, not just a schedule of rental amounts. Allow the landlord to require the tenant to pay all rent by wire transfer. If an affiliate pays the rent, the landlord can reject the payment or require that all future payments be made by the actual tenant. The lease should say that an affiliate's payment of rent does not give the affiliate any rights. Any such payment is merely for the tenant's convenience.

34.7 Remeasurement. Negate any possible remeasurement of the space or the common areas. If the tenant insists on the right to remeasure, define the formula for remeasurement. For example, one might refer to the Building Owners and Managers Association (BOMA) standards. In that case, however, make sure the landlord and its counsel understand exactly how BOMA works. The authors of the BOMA standards almost by definition favor larger measurements rather than smaller measurements of any given space. Have the landlord's architect/space planner certify any space measurement to the landlord. If the tenant later brings an action against the landlord for bad measurement, the landlord may have a claim against the design professional. Any restriction on remeasuring the space should not preclude the landlord from remeasuring the entire building with no effect on the tenant's overall percentage.

34.8 Rent Concessions. Allow the landlord to undo or recapture a rent concession and any other inducement if the tenant defaults before fully applying the concession. Consider extending a rent concession for a longer time, such as six months of 50 percent free rent rather than three months of 100 percent free rent. Perhaps allow free rent in stages over the lease term, such as one month free after every 24 months rather than several months free at the beginning. Condition any rent concession on the tenant's having finished its initial alterations by a certain date or having met other conditions. Consider any accounting implications for the landlord.

34.9 Rent Not Per Square Foot. State rent as a flat amount rather than basing it on the square footage of the premises. This can prevent controversy about square footage and remeasurement. Avoid any statement about the square footage or rentable square footage of the premises.

34.10 Stock Options. For tenants with initial public offering (IPO) potential, consider whether to require stock, options, or warrants in lieu of, or in addition to, rent.

34.11 Waiver. Consider requiring the tenant to waive legal principles that can automatically convert a terminated lease into a month-to-month tenancy, with notice requirements for termination. Some subcommittee members reject such a waiver, arguing the automatic conversion makes sense.

35. Rules and Regulations

35.1 Compliance. Require the tenant to comply strictly with the rules and regulations attached as an exhibit to the lease, and also with any changes (or perhaps only just “reasonable” changes) that the landlord makes later. Consider whether the landlord’s rules and regulations correctly reflect present circumstances and building operations. They often do not. In that case, update them.

35.2 Lease Incorporation. If the rules and regulations contain anything unusually important, move it to the body of the lease. Courts may ignore rules and regulations. State that if any conflict exists between the rules and regulations and the lease, the lease governs.

35.3 No Liability. If the landlord does not enforce the rules or regulations against other tenants, or if other tenants violate them with impunity, this should impose no obligation on the landlord. A landlord often wants to have the freedom to enforce rules and regulations against some tenants but not others. Often the landlord has a good reason for that.

35.4 Recycling. Consider requiring the tenant to separate its waste. The landlord’s requirements may exceed those of applicable law. Consider adding a provision governing medical waste or other tenant-specific recycling or waste disposal requirements.

36. Security Deposit

36.1 Amount. Although the amount of any security deposit is a business issue, counsel may wish to suggest a declining letter of credit (initially in the amount of the tenant improvement allowance, or the landlord’s cost of build-out) to protect the landlord if the tenant defaults after the landlord incurs significant expense for front-end leasing costs.

36.2 End-of-Term Issues. Expressly allow the landlord to apply the security deposit to, among other things, costs to restore the demised premises and remove the tenant's abandoned personal property and signs. Give the landlord a reasonable time to return the security deposit after the end of the lease term, so the landlord can fully process and calculate any escalations, reimbursements, damages, and other amounts the tenant may owe.

36.3 Increased Security. Require the tenant to increase the security deposit if (1) the rent rises; (2) the tenant defaults more than x times; or (3) the tenant's or guarantor's financial rating drops below a certain point. Should any other circumstances trigger such a requirement?

36.4 Letter of Credit. Depending on the jurisdiction, consider requiring the tenant to deliver a letter of credit in place of a cash security deposit to try to reduce the impact of any possible tenant bankruptcy. To minimize administrative complexity, require the tenant to elect at lease signing whether it will post cash or deliver a letter of credit. Try not to allow either/or. Only if the landlord insists on the promptest possible closing, allow the tenant to deliver a letter of credit after signing. Close with a cash security deposit. This avoids delays in dealing with banks' letter of credit departments. Require the tenant to reimburse the landlord's costs of handling, renewing, accepting a replacement of or drawing on any letter of credit.

36.5 Letter of Credit Requirements. If the tenant delivers a letter of credit, require that: (1) the issuing bank be (a) reasonably acceptable to the landlord and (b) a New York Clearinghouse bank; (2) the landlord can draw the letter of credit at a bank branch in the same city as the landlord upon presentation of merely a sight draft (no drawing certificate or other documentary conditions); (3) the letter of credit be an "evergreen" (i.e., providing for automatic renewal unless the issuer gives ample notice of nonrenewal) or the bank must notify the landlord (at least X days before expiry) of any failure to renew and the landlord may draw (or better, shall be deemed automatically to have drawn) the letter of credit; (4) even if the letter of credit is an "evergreen," the issuer must confirm the current expiry date upon request (and then remember to request); (5) the letter of credit will not expire until at least a specified period after lease expiration (at least 30 days); (6) the landlord can transfer the letter of credit without charge to any lender or purchaser (or, if there is a charge, the tenant must pay it); and (7) the tenant must reimburse the landlord's out of pocket costs, including attorneys' fees, in dealing with the letter of credit.

36.6 Lien on Personalty. In states where the common law does not give a landlord an automatic lien on the tenant's personal property, the landlord should consider taking such a lien. File a UCC-1 financing statement if the landlord obtains a security interest in the tenant's personal property. Any security interest should by its terms survive lease termination; otherwise it might terminate with the lease. Note that the tenant may (legitimately) resist granting such a lien because it violates or will interfere with its financing arrangements.

36.7 Mortgage Requirements. Accommodate future mortgagee requirements (for example, allow the landlord to pledge the landlord's interest in the security deposit or to transfer any letter of credit to the mortgagee). If the tenant ultimately needs to cooperate with these measures, establish a tight time frame for cooperation. Allocate any resulting costs, including attorneys' fees and bank fees to reissue or transfer a letter of credit.

36.8 Replenishment. Require the tenant to replenish promptly the amount of any security that the landlord draws, or restore the letter of credit accordingly.

36.9 Segregated Account. The landlord and the lease should comply with any state-specific requirements on holding security deposits. When these provisions require notices to the tenant about the security deposit, try to build those notices into the lease, if possible and permissible. Well before the landlord disburses any interest to the tenant, the tenant should execute and deliver a W-9 form to the landlord.

36.10 Security for Guaranty, not Lease. Consider securing a lease guaranty obligation with a letter of credit or other security. By tying such a letter of credit or other security to a guaranty rather than to the lease, the landlord may reduce the likelihood that the tenant's bankruptcy estate could "claw back" any proceeds that exceed the landlord's permitted claim for rent in the tenant's bankruptcy. This becomes a potential problem only if the security deposit or letter of credit exceeds one year's rent.

36.11 Waiver. Require the tenant to waive any damages claim against the landlord for any wrongful drawing on the letter of credit, and any right to enjoin or otherwise interfere with a drawing. Replenishment of an incorrect drawing should make the tenant whole.

37. Services

37.1 Additional Services. If the landlord agrees to make available additional electricity or HVAC services, allow the landlord to set aside capacity for future needs, as the landlord estimates them. State that the landlord will furnish building services only during “building standard” hours, with some flexibility to (re)define what that means.

37.2 Changes in Building Operation. Allow the landlord to change how the building operates and the services the landlord provides, such as the number of elevators and security levels and procedures, subject to reasonable standards. To the extent that the landlord agrees to particular performance standards, build in flexibility if usage levels change, such as if the long-term storage area for old files on the third floor becomes a cafeteria.

37.3 HVAC. Define any HVAC standards as design criteria, not as performance specifications. The landlord’s only obligation should be to operate HVAC in conformance with design criteria. Prohibit the tenant from changing the HVAC system without the landlord’s consent. The tenant should be responsible for any distribution problems within the premises.

37.4 Off-Season Air-Conditioning. If the landlord provides air-conditioning before or after the regular air-conditioning season, because of hot weather or tenant requests, allow the landlord to charge tenants for that extra service, even if the lease does not yet require air-conditioning.

37.5 Resale. Prohibit the tenant from reselling to other tenants any telecommunication services, satellite capacity, electricity, or other utility or service.

37.6 Safety Measures. Require the tenant to cooperate with the landlord’s present and future safety measures for the building. For example, the tenant should participate in fire drills.

37.7 Specifications. To the extent the landlord agrees to meet specifications for any landlord services, consider the assumptions that underlie those specifications. For example, elevator specifications assume a certain level and distribution of occupancy and type of usage. If the tenant installs a cafeteria, this may alter traffic patterns so much that the landlord should have the right to change the elevator performance specifications.

37.8 Sprinklers. Charge the tenant for sprinkler maintenance and upgrades. Consider charging a monthly fee for static water.

37.9 Telecommunications/Fiber Optics Cable Provider. Consider requiring the tenant to use the landlord's telecommunications/fiber optics cable provider. Give the landlord the right to change providers. Negate any landlord obligation to continue to use any particular provider. The Federal Communications Commission constantly reviews and revises the rules in this area, which often supersede lease language.

37.10 Tenant Complaints. Limit who can complain about building services. Require a written notice of any such complaint, signed by specified officers of the tenant. Excuse the landlord from any liability for utility service failures.

37.11 Tenant-Provided Services. Prohibit the tenant from providing its services of types that the lease contemplates the landlord will provide, such as cleaning, especially if this might create labor problems.

37.12 Utilities. Require the tenant to pay for temporary utilities during construction. If the tenant's business will consume unusual amounts of utilities or services (such as a hairdresser, restaurant, or trading floor), try to require a separate (sub)meter. If not, make sure the allocation formulas will adequately capture the tenant's usage.

38. Subordination and Landlord's Estate

38.1 Expenses. Require the tenant to reimburse the landlord's expenses for obtaining any SNDA from the landlord's mortgagee, including the landlord's reasonable attorneys' fees. (All comments in this section on the landlord's mortgagee also presumptively apply to possible future ground lessors.)

38.2 "Financeability" Provisions. To avoid negotiating a separate SNDA, include directly in the lease all mortgagee protections and benefits that an SNDA would typically give a mortgagee. Require the tenant to confirm these protections if a mortgagee so requests, with the form of confirmation attached as an exhibit, perhaps within the form of estoppel certificate. Build in flexibility to add any other SNDA protections that some future mortgagee might (reasonably?) require. Tightly limit any cure period for any default arising from the tenant's failure to sign an SNDA. Any attornment or other lender protection provision should: (a) survive any (claimed) termination of the lease in foreclosure; and (b) expressly benefit present and future lenders. Review all loan documents affecting the building to ensure that any lease requirements (e.g. nondisturbance) have been satisfied.

38.3 Lease Subordinate. Make the lease automatically subject and subordinate to the landlord's existing or any future fee mortgage, easement agreements, condominium declaration, ground lease, and similar future documents. Try not to condition subordination on delivery or filing of these documents, or any confirmation or countersignature by anyone.

38.4 Mortgagee Modifications. Require the tenant to agree to any reasonable modification of the lease that a mortgagee or prospective mortgagee requests, if it does not materially reduce the tenant's rights or materially increase its obligations.

38.5 Mortgagee Right to Subordinate. State that any mortgagee can unilaterally subordinate its mortgage to the lease, in whole or in part, at any time, including after commencement of a foreclosure action. Any such subordination should bind the tenant automatically, whether or not the tenant has been notified of it.

38.6 SNDA Form. Require the tenant to execute any SNDA form that the landlord's lender requires or attach an industry standard model SNDA, such as the one the New York State Bar Association promulgated in 1994 (New York State Bar Association Real Property Law Section Newsletter, Spring 1994, 42). Edit the form of SNDA to make it nonrecordable, and prohibit recordation. State that if the landlord delivers a conforming SNDA and the tenant does not sign and return it within a specified period, then the landlord has fully performed its obligations on obtaining an SNDA from that mortgagee. Any SNDA should have an expiration date so that it will not cloud title after lease expiration. If the tenant wants to negotiate the form of SNDA, it must pay the landlord's lender's legal fees.

38.7 Zoning Lot Mergers. Require the tenant to cooperate and timely execute documents as necessary.

39 Tenant's Equipment and Installations

39.1 Conduits and Risers. The landlord should control and coordinate use of conduits and risers that run through or next to the premises. The landlord should have no liability for claims arising out of the tenant's use of conduits and risers. The tenant should label all cables and communications lines. Allow the landlord to relocate conduits; to recapture unused conduit or riser space; and (at the landlord's option) to require the tenant to remove cables, conduits, and risers no longer in use. Provide that the tenant may not install telecom or data cable outside the premises; the tenant must use one of the existing distribution cables. The landlord may have to commit in exchange to have at least two or three different telecom or data transmission providers in the building, with diverse points of entry.

39.2 Ducts and Ventilation. Require the tenant to pay for any alterations or upgrades. Require the tenant to solve at its expense any venting or odor problems, all to the landlord's reasonable satisfaction.

39.3 Electromagnetic Fields (EMF). The tenant should agree not to cause any EMF interference. If the tenant generates EMF interference, the tenant should agree to solve the problem. Negate any landlord liability. Allow the landlord to limit placement of machines that may cause EMF, even within the premises.

39.4 Rooftop Equipment. The landlord should control roof rights, including penetrations, fuel supplies, ancillary equipment, relocation, and size and weight of any rooftop dish or other equipment. Require the tenant to remove its equipment, including any connecting cables, and restore (or pay for the landlord to restore) the roof at the end of the term. The tenant should agree to indemnify the landlord against all liability and roof damage that arises from the tenant's rooftop equipment. Charge for the tenant's use of rooftop space. State that the landlord may require the tenant to relocate equipment elsewhere on the roof, and to provide screening or walkways, all at the tenant's expense. State that any use rights granted to the tenant do not limit the landlord's use rights. Describe the tenant's rooftop rights as a "nonexclusive license." Try to limit the tenant's roof usage as much as possible, recognizing that future installations, including installations as yet unknown, can produce substantial additional income for the landlord.

39.5 Signage and Identity. The landlord should control all rights to exterior signage (including the name of the building, any flagpole, and rights to install plaques or other identification), even if exterior signage affects light and air. Prohibit digital, flashing, or video signs, or establish criteria for such signs, such as how often they may change. Signage can only advertise this tenant's operation at this location; it cannot advertise the tenant's products or services generally, or anyone other than the tenant. If the landlord installs any signs for the tenant, the tenant should pay for them. As an alternative, state that the tenant's signs must comply with signage criteria attached as a lease exhibit, which the landlord may modify or update from time to time. The landlord should think about consistency and future needs in the signage program for the entire building.

For future changes in signage criteria, give the landlord an express right to upgrade the tenant's signs, at the tenant's expense. Require the tenant to cooperate and execute all necessary documents. Give the landlord the right to remove signage temporarily for repair or compliance with law. If the tenant's sign is worn, stained, unattractive or broken, require the tenant to repair or replace it quickly. In drafting lease provisions, think of signage as a profit center, which the landlord should preserve and protect. The landlord should also control interior signage visible from outside the space.

39.6 Supplemental HVAC, Backup Generator, and Fuel Tank.

The tenant must maintain its equipment in compliance with law and good practices (such as monthly inspections), and keep written maintenance records. These installations become the property of the landlord at the end of the term. The tenant must deliver the equipment in good working order with all permits, warranties, and maintenance history documents. Restrict testing of backup generators, which are very loud.

39.7 Uniform Elevator Lobbies, Signage, Entrance Doors and Window Shades. Require all tenants to maintain uniform elevator lobbies, signage, entrance doors and window shades. As an alternative, consider giving the landlord the right to require future uniformity. Give the landlord the right to install thermal film on the inside surfaces of any windows.

39.8 Temporary Signage. Require a retail tenant to install temporary promotional signage during construction and before opening. Does the landlord want the right to approve that signage? Require uniform signage for space under construction?

40. Use

40.1 Advertising. In a retail lease, consider requiring the tenant to include the name and address of the premises, as appropriate, in all regional and internet advertising. Or, in the alternative, prohibit the tenant from using the name, image, or likeness of the building in its advertising, or control the manner in which the tenant does so. If the landlord has trademarks, service marks, or other intellectual property, which the landlord will allow or want the tenant to use under certain circumstances, including appropriate provisions in the lease. At a minimum, the tenant will need to disclaim any interest in the landlord's intellectual property and the landlord will need to approve each usage.

40.2 Basement Use. If the building contains a basement with tenant access, describe the basement and indicate what permitted uses the tenant may conduct there. For example, is it a “selling basement”? If so, then the rent is generally higher. Is it a “storage basement”? If so, what can be stored there? And, in that case, prohibit use as selling space. If there are meters inside the basement, require that the utility companies have the right of access even if they have remote reading capabilities. Over time, basement usages tend to expand into any available and visible unused space. Allow the landlord to adjust the rent accordingly.

40.3 Certificate of Occupancy. State that the landlord does not represent or warrant that the tenant may use the premises for the permitted use. Even delivery of a certificate of occupancy does not create such a representation or warranty.

40.4 Continuous Operation. Require a retail tenant to open and stay open during certain prescribed hours with sufficient personnel and inventory and all required licenses. If the tenant breaches, try to define the landlord’s measure of damages. Also, provide for remedies other than an injunction or a lease termination, such as higher rent. A court may not grant an injunction and the landlord would probably not want to terminate the lease.

40.5 Co-Tenancy. Build in flexibility in co-tenancy requirements to accommodate possible future changes in the retail marketplace. Avoid requirements that over time may become impossible to satisfy (for example, because of multiple name changes). Define co-tenancy requirements broadly enough so the landlord can meet them not just by maintaining occupancy by the named co-tenants, but also by substitute or replacement cotenants, or even other categories of retail tenant. Terminate the co-tenancy requirements at some point (for example, based on the passage of time or the achievement of sales thresholds).

40.6 Density. Limit density in the premises, i.e., how many people in how much space.

40.7 Exclusive Uses. Track exclusive uses to avoid conflict. The landlord would ideally have no liability for conflicting exclusive use clauses or enforcement of exclusive use clauses. Consider limiting the tenant’s remedies if the landlord violates any exclusivity clause. For example, allow the tenant to pay “percentage rent” only—but have no other remedy—if the landlord violates the clause. After a certain amount of time, require the tenant to revert to full rent or terminate the lease. If some other tenant operates a prohibited use, allow the landlord to assign to this tenant, as this tenant's sole right and remedy, any right to enforce the prohibitions in the other tenant's lease. Carve out from any "exclusive use" existing tenants and expanded or new anchors, and/or any store that operates the same use as one of multiple uses, but not its primary use. Limit this tenant's exclusive use right so it refers only to this tenant's primary business. Consider measuring limited permitted excluded use by square footage, time of day, or percentage of sales. Allow other tenants a limited right to sell exclusive use items (so-called "incidental sales"), but limit the right to sell the exclusive use item to a certain percentage of sales floor area or restrict the percentage of sales that may come from the exclusive use item.

40.8 Franchises. If the tenant operates a franchise, the tenant should agree to comply with its obligations under the franchise agreement. The landlord may also want to receive copies of any material notices from the franchisor and have the right to communicate with the franchisor to confirm the tenant's good standing and identify any issues.

40.9 Limited Hours of Operation. Consider limiting hours of operation as appropriate, e.g., in a mixed-use building with security concerns.

40.10 Loss of Exclusive. Provide that if the tenant does not use its exclusive use right, or goes dark for a certain period, then any exclusive use rights terminate. These terminations need to be permanent. Temporary terminations do not help the landlord much.

40.11 Medical Use. Disclaim any right or obligation on any medically sensitive information in the tenant's space. The tenant should agree to remove all that information at the end of the term. As an administrative matter, the landlord will want to assure it never takes control of or touches that information, and may even want to say that in the lease.

40.12 Narrow Use. Draft the use clause narrowly (for example, not general office use, but office use for a computer consulting company operating under a specific business name). Then say: "and for no other use."

40.13 Noise and Odors. If the tenant's operation emits noise or odors (such as a bar, a restaurant, or a donut store), define in the lease specific noise and odor mitigation measures. Do not just impose a general obligation for the tenant to control or prevent noise and odors. Allow the landlord to impose additional noise and odor control measures if the landlord determines that the initial measures do not work. Any odor and noise mitigation ultimately must meet with the landlord's reasonable approval. State that the landlord has no responsibility for other tenants' noise or odors, provided the landlord exercises reasonable efforts to require those tenants to comply with law.

40.14 Permitted Use. State that the landlord has no obligation, implied or otherwise, to allow any change in the permitted use of the premises, even if the landlord consents to (or is required to consent to) an assignment or subletting or any alterations.

40.15 Quality Standards. If the landlord requires a certain quality level, try not to use words like "first class." Instead, define the required standard of operation, such as "white tablecloth" or "table service" in the case of a restaurant. These standards can be very tricky. It is best to use a very specific and objectively determinable standard. For example, the lease could require that the quality level match the quality level of a comparable business/location, as of a specified date. Pricing may be a dangerous test. Obligate the tenant to remodel and/or renovate as necessary to maintain the desired quality level.

40.16 Recapture Right. In a retail lease, especially one without an operating covenant, give the landlord a continuous or periodic recapture right if the tenant ceases to operate for a stated period. Structure the right so a lender can exercise it after foreclosure. For example, do not just give the landlord a one-time right to recapture within a certain period after the tenant closes its store; provide for a periodic or continuous right. Anything less will make lenders nervous.

40.17 Restaurant Use. If the local restaurant inspectors issue ratings, state that if the tenant's rating drops below a certain level, certain consequences follow. For example, the lease could give the tenant a limited but reasonable time in which to "clean up its act." Ultimately, if the tenant cannot do so after a long cure period, the landlord may want the right to terminate the lease.

40.18 Security Requirements. Make the tenant responsible for any additional security (and any damages) resulting from the tenant's presence in the building and its use of the premises.

40.19 Single-Store Operation. Require the tenant to use and operate the premises only as a single retail operation (no separate stores or stalls, except bona fide licensed departments or concessions not operated under a separate name). Prohibit the tenant from segregating any part of its space from the rest of the space for use as a separate store, with or without a separate entrance.

40.20 Zoning Restrictions. Do any zoning restrictions or rules limit the uses of the premises? If multiple units, consider limitations that apply to the building as a whole, or units as a group. For example, if retail space exceeds X square feet, must it have a loading dock? The landlord should consider requirements and issues like these in determining the scope and size of permitted uses within the leased space.

41. Vault Space

41.1 Diminution. State that any reduction of vault space (such as use by any government or utility) does not entitle the tenant to any rights.

41.2 Recapture. Give the landlord the right to recapture any vault area if the landlord, a utility or governmental authority ever needs the space.

41.3 Use and Occupancy. Since vault space may lie outside the boundaries of the landlord's property, state that the landlord makes no representation about any right to use or occupy such space. If the tenant uses any vault space, require the tenant to maintain, repair, and pay any municipal fees imposed from time to time. Alternatively, the landlord may want to prohibit the tenant's use of any vault space to avoid liability and other issues.

42. Due Diligence, External Considerations

42.1 Accounting Implications. The Financial Accounting Standards Board has finally issued new guidance on how to account for leases. Those new standards may drive substantive changes in the terms of leases, such as by leading tenants to favor shorter leases. This could affect not only lease negotiations but also the entire dynamic and structure of commercial real estate ownership. Any attorney negotiating a commercial lease, especially a substantial one, for the landlord or the tenant should involve the client's accountants to consider how the FASB's new provisions affect the lease negotiations and agenda.

42.2 Background Check. Perform suitable background and credit checks, including any tenant litigation history (court records, L & T law firms) and online checks. Check the Office of Foreign Assets Control (“OFAC”) list of terrorist entities online at www.fincen.gov to see if the tenant, or any of its principals, appears on the list. Perform a UCC and bankruptcy search for the actual specific entity that will be the tenant, as well as its parent company and perhaps major affiliates. Check any corporate and limited liability company entities on the applicable department of state website. Look online for general information about the tenant’s past litigation, other history, activities, and plans. Some types of background investigation will require a consent from the person being investigated. Do not assume the prospective tenant can consent to a background check for some other person, such as a guarantor.

42.3 Consents. Does any mortgage, ground lease, other space lease, development agreement, or reciprocal easement agreement limit who may be a tenant in the building? Confirm that this tenant complies. If appropriate, obtain suitable representations and warranties (for example, not a “prohibited person”). Does the transaction require any consent on the landlord’s side, such as from a joint venture partner, mortgagee, mezzanine lender, or ground lessor? Do any of these parties require the landlord to include particular provisions in space leases? If so, include them. And what will the consent process require? How long will it take? Can the landlord seek consent based on just a term sheet, or must the landlord wait until the transaction has been fully documented? What needs to go into the package sent to the party whose consent the landlord needs? And what else can the landlord or its counsel do to expedite the consent process?

42.4 Green Construction. Every company now seems to say it is a “green” company—whatever that means. Leases are starting to sprout new “green” covenants, e.g., obligations to recycle. But most new occupants of commercial space still fully demolish their new space, if it wasn’t already raw when delivered. Every time a space turns over to a new tenant, huge amounts of construction debris still go to landfills. If a landlord wants to reduce the environmental impact of its building, what can that landlord do over time to change construction techniques in the building, to eliminate or reduce those truckloads of construction debris? How can landlords make their spaces more adaptable to the needs of multiple tenants over time, so every tenant will not need to fully demolish the space? Those questions go beyond lease negotiations and legal issues. A “greener” approach to tenant improvements would eventually affect the terms of leases.

42.5 Identities of Tenant and Guarantor. Determine early the exact name of the tenant. Understand the tenant’s equity ownership structure. Get the right entity as the tenant. Cross-check the tenant’s name against its charter certificate as filed, or at least the appropriate Secretary of State website. The same comments apply to any guarantor.

42.6 Incentives and Subsidies. Understand any incentive and subsidy programs available for the contemplated lease. Can this tenant qualify? If so, the landlord should consider that qualification—and any economic benefits the tenant will realize—as part of rent negotiations. If the tenant will save a dollar through incentive and subsidy programs, perhaps the landlord can charge an extra 90 cents of rent, demonstrating that geographically targeted incentive programs may ultimately do nothing more than increase the value of real estate investments (and ultimately land) in the targeted area. These programs often require that when the beneficiary applies for benefits, the beneficiary has not yet taken some action to “commit” to a particular location, such as filing a building permit or signing a lease. Keep these pitfalls in mind in managing the process.

42.7 Lease Cross-Check. Just before signing the lease, take one last look at the term sheet or deal summary. Recheck to confirm that the final lease documents, after whatever negotiations occurred, still fully conform to the term sheet or deal summary. If the landlord moved away from that starting point in negotiations, counsel should confirm that the landlord signed off on those concessions in writing, at least by email. In the morass of leasing issues great and small, do not lose sight of the single most important issue: the rent. Consider circulating just the final rent numbers to the client and the client’s broker—separately from anything else—with a request for final confirmation that they are right. As with any other numbers in a legal document, these numbers can look right but be very wrong. And so can the rent adjustment dates.

42.8 Legal Requirements. Do any special legal requirements apply to this landlord? For example, if the landlord is somehow a governmental contractor, then procurement regulations may require this landlord to include in its leases an obligation for tenants to comply with equal opportunity requirements, hiring of particular categories of person, or other governmental agendas, including for example the foreign policy of the City of New York.

42.9 Other Leases. Does any other tenant have a right of first refusal or other preemptive right for the space now being leased? The landlord should understand all possible preemptive rights under other leases in the building, to assure that no two tenants can ever claim the same space at the same time. Does any other tenant’s lease contain any other provisions that this lease ought to take into account, such as a right to enter the premises to run cable or obtain access to telecommunications installations? Particularly in a retail context, has the landlord given any other tenant an exclusive right that this one might violate? If the tenant requests any rights outside the leased premises (for example, an antenna on the roof), can the landlord accommodate that request without running afoul of rights already given to other tenants? Rather than deal with all these issues on a one-off basis for each lease, the landlord or its counsel should maintain—and keep updated—a correct and complete master list of all rights of the types mentioned in this paragraph.

42.10 Plans. Does the landlord plan any significant changes, redevelopment, repositioning or sale of the building in the term of this lease? How would those plans affect the terms of the lease? Does this lease match the landlord's plans for the building?

42.11 Previous SEC Filings. If the tenant is publicly held and any previous lease of the tenant was a "material obligation," the tenant should have incorporated that prior lease in a previous SEC filing. As a strategic matter, the landlord may wish to review that filing and see what the tenant accepted in the previous transaction.

42.12 Real Estate Tax Assessment. Think about the real estate tax assessment in the base tax year. If for some reason the landlord knows it is "too high," will probably drop in later years, but probably will not drop for the actual base year, then over time the real estate tax escalation in the lease may not help the landlord much. How to handle this problem will depend in part on the particular building and the particular landlord, as well as local tax assessment procedures and timing.

42.13 References. Obtain references for the tenant and its principals.

42.14 Scope of Premises. Think about where the premises begin and end, identifying and resolving any uncertainties. Do not just refer, for example, to "the eighth floor" or "all the rentable space on the eighth floor." Prepare a clear floor plan (or at least a sketch) to attach to the lease. Even for a full-floor tenant, clearly demarcate where the premises end and the common areas (and other landlord-controlled areas) begin. Do the premises include service closets? Elevator lobbies and restrooms, particularly in the case of full-floor premises? The landlord may, for example, want to switch to the tenant the burden of restroom maintenance; inclusion in the premises can help achieve that. If someone prepares and throws onto the back of the lease an intuitive sketch of the space at the last minute, this can lead to serious disputes later if the sketch included even very tiny spaces that it shouldn't have included. If the lease refers to rent as a function of "rentable area"—an undesirable approach—then a space sketch could even somehow create arguments or uncertainty about the amount of "rentable area" and hence the rent. Give the landlord some flexibility to reconfigure the leased premises if needed, and at least the building core.

42.15 Status of Premises. Is the space presently vacant? Do any issues exist about its present physical condition? Does the landlord anticipate any problems obtaining vacant possession?

42.16 Tax. Consider any tax issues arising from, e.g., the structuring of the rental stream and allocation of depreciation deductions arising from any initial capital investment for the lease.

42.17 Tenant Representations. Obtain representations and warranties on the tenant's ownership structure, perhaps backed by a secretary's certificate and copies of documents. Also seek confirmation that the tenant obtained all necessary approvals, especially if the tenant is a non-profit or other unusual type of entity. Consider obtaining the same for any entity guarantor.

43. Other Documents And Deliveries

43.1 Advice and Administration Memo. The landlord may want its counsel to prepare a memorandum summarizing important provisions of the lease and advising the landlord on actions it should remember to take to avoid problems, issues or disputes. Any such memorandum should also include reminders of any important dates (including any that recur periodically); a disclaimer of counsel's responsibility to remind the landlord of those dates; and a suggestion that the landlord maintain a tickler file. Because such a memo can't include everything, it should include appropriate disclaimers. But to the extent it does cover anything, make it 100 percent right. Check it three times.

43.2 Brokerage Agreement. Confirm early on that the landlord has entered into suitable brokerage agreements (or has obtained commission waivers) with every broker involved in the transaction in any way. Any brokerage agreement should waive any claim unless the parties actually sign a lease and all conditions to its effectiveness are met. Consider the effect of a possible tenant default on the landlord's liability for unpaid brokerage commissions. What about an early negotiated termination of the lease based on a change in the tenant's financial condition? Try to negate any further payment obligations to the broker in any such event. If the lease gives the tenant early termination options, then defer any commission payments accordingly. Try to express any brokerage commission as a dollar figure rather than as a formula, because formulas invite disputes, especially when they provide for exclusions, gross-ups, adjustments, hypothetical eventualities, and other sources of complexity and disputes. Did the landlord ever enter into any previous leasing transaction with this tenant, creating the risk that a broker involved in the previous transaction will expect a commission from this one? Conversely, try to negate any obligation to pay today's broker a commission on future renewals. The landlord should reach out to the tenant to discuss renewal well before the tenant contacts the broker. The landlord and its counsel should mark their calendar. If the landlord cannot avoid such an obligation to pay a commission on renewals, then set as high a standard as possible for payment. For example, allow the broker to collect a commission on a renewal only if: (1) the tenant exercises a renewal option in accordance with its terms; (2) the broker still represents the tenant at the time of renewal; or (3) the tenant has formally notified the landlord of that continued relationship. Require the broker to keep the contents of the brokerage agreement confidential.

43.3 Certificate of Insurance. Have an insurance consultant review the tenant's insurance certificate as well as the tenant's underlying insurance policy and endorsements. There is really no substitute for reviewing the actual policy and endorsements themselves.

43.4 Copies. Say once, somewhere, that whenever the lease requires the tenant to deliver copies of anything, that means true, correct, and complete copies, without redaction.

43.5 Disclosures. To the extent that governing law requires a prospective landlord to disclose information to a prospective tenant, identify those requirements and make the disclosure. Ever-expanding disclosure requirements have become part of the territory for certain consumer transactions. The trend has started to affect commercial leasing. For example, New York requires prospective landlords to notify prospective tenants of certain vapor intrusion issues.

43.6 Environmental Assessment (Baseline). Particularly if a tenant will lease an entire building or conduct activities that might cause contamination, obtain an environmental assessment as of the beginning of the lease term. Attach it as an exhibit. Use it as a baseline to measure any possible contamination the tenant caused or for which the tenant might otherwise be responsible.

43.7 Estoppel Certificate. Attach a form of estoppel certificate to the lease. Make it as broadly acceptable as possible, and consistent with the form contemplated by any existing loan documents. Give the landlord the right to add to the form. It should allow reliance not only by third parties but also, if possible, by the landlord.

43.8 Exhibits. To the extent that the lease will contain exhibits, who prepares them? For example, will someone else want to prepare the rules and regulations for the lease? Construction rules and regulations? Have they changed since the last version included in the Standard Form? Don't wait until the lease is otherwise ready to sign. Focus on the exhibits from the beginning.

43.9 Financial Statements. Obtain for the tenant and any guarantor(s), and perhaps selected affiliate(s). Make sure the client has reviewed them. Confirm they relate to the correct entity.

43.10 Good Standing and Organizational Documents. Obtain and review the tenant's good standing certificate and government-certified copies of organizational documents. Ask for an organizational chart if the tenant's structure is complex.

43.11 Guaranty. Obtain a guaranty executed by the correct guarantor—check the name against some appropriate document and the Secretary of State website—and acknowledged before a notary. Confirm the authority of the signer for any entity guarantor. Require the guarantor's taxpayer identification number and (for an individual) residence address under the guarantor's signature. Check the guarantor's address on Google maps. Verify it is a residence. If an individual guarantor resides in a joint property state, consider obtaining the signature of the guarantor's spouse as well. If the guaranty covers anything less than all lease obligations, think about how the landlord might enforce the guaranty in the context of various possible defaults, and try to prevent any surprises. If the tenant defaults and perhaps cures some of those defaults in various ways, how does that affect the landlord's claims under the guaranty?

43.12 Letter of Credit. Review the letter of credit form as early as possible in the process. Obtain lender sign-off as needed. If the lender requires any arrangements to give the lender control of the letter of credit, set up those arrangements. They may involve third parties, hence take longer.

43.13 Lender's Rights. Review the landlord's loan documents to assure that the landlord's rights and obligations under the lease track the landlord's obligations as borrower under the loan. What landlord consent rights do the existing loan documents require the borrower to retain? And what landlord consent rights will future lenders probably require? If the loan documents are being negotiated at the same time, try to correct any disconnects by modifying the loan documents if necessary. The concerns in this paragraph go beyond assignment and subletting, but seem most likely to apply to assignment and subletting.

43.14 Marked Leases. When preparing final lease documents for signature, mark them against the landlord's standard form to facilitate future lease review projects and administration. Do not give tenants and their counsel those marked copies.

43.15 Memorandum of Lease and Release. If the lease requires the landlord to sign a memorandum of lease, also obtain a release of memorandum of lease, and deposit it in escrow with the landlord's counsel or some other third party willing to assume responsibility.

43.16 Opinion of Counsel. For a major lease, consider obtaining an opinion of counsel on the tenant's due authorization, execution, and delivery of the lease, though probably not enforceability of the lease. Consider requesting a representation by the tenant that entering into the lease does not violate any pre-existing agreements of the tenant. Similar considerations may arise for any guarantor. A landlord might particularly want an opinion of counsel for a foreign, governmental, or nonprofit tenant.

43.17 Original Documents. Create an audit trail showing who received original documents, particularly letters of credit. In general, original documents should go to the client and the landlord's counsel should retain a scanned copy of the entire lease and all related documents, with all exhibits. Is there anyone else to whom the landlord must send copies of new leases? What about the landlord's mortgagee or any ground lessor?

43.18 Plan Approval. If the landlord will perform any construction, have the tenant approve any plans at lease signing, if possible. Failure to do that may give the tenant an opportunity to delay the construction process (by withholding approval of future plans), which could delay commencement of rent.

43.19 Press Release. Particularly if the landlord wants to control or initiate press coverage for the transaction, the landlord may want the parties to issue a press release about their transaction. If so, the parties should resolve the form of that press release as part of negotiating documents, because it will need to go out immediately after signing to achieve maximum attention from the press.

43.20 SNDA Request. Without putting any ideas into the tenant's head, try to determine early in the process whether the tenant intends to require an SNDA. If so, start the process early. See what exactly the governing loan documents will require the landlord to do. Who acts for the lender? What information and other deliveries must that person receive? Match the form of SNDA attached to the lease (or otherwise expected by the tenant) to the form of SNDA contemplated by the loan documents. The same agenda arises for any ground lessor.

43.21 Taxpayer Identification Number; W-9 Form. Require the tenant's taxpayer identification number under the tenant's signature. Sooner or later the landlord will need it. If the tenant delivers an interest-bearing security deposit, the landlord will need the taxpayer identification number immediately. Consider incorporating the tenant's W-9 Form certifications into the body of the lease, as a backup for a separate form, which the landlord should also obtain.

43.22 Term Sheet (Letter of Intent). Any significant leasing transaction often starts with a term sheet or letter of intent, prepared by the brokers. The landlord's counsel should try to participate in preparing that document, at least to the extent necessary to prevent unintended liability, obligations, and issues for the landlord. Typically, it will make sense to say that the term sheet or letter of intent does not bind the parties, except a few provisions that do, such as confidentiality, a brokerage indemnity, consents to background checks, nonreliance, and the agreement of the parties about the otherwise nonbinding nature of the document.

43.23 Third-Party Consents. If the transaction will require any third-party consents, obtain whatever piece of paper evidences that consent. Like any other piece of paper, it may require drafts and negotiations. Start those early.

44. Post-Closing; Monitoring

The following suggestions on lease administration and enforcement do not constitute a complete guide to administering and enforcing leases.

Some of these responsibilities will belong to the landlord's leasing broker or property management company, so they should be delegated accordingly in a way that is unambiguous.

44.1 Abandonment. If the tenant seems to have moved out, then before entering and taking control of the premises, consider sending an "estoppel" notice to the tenant reiterating the lease provisions on "abandonment" and inviting the tenant to confirm that it has not abandoned the premises, with payment of any unpaid rent. If any doubt exists about whether the tenant has abandoned the premises, consider using a summary possession action rather than self-help to avoid claims of wrongful eviction.

44.2 Alteration Consents. A lease sometimes says the tenant need not remove its alterations and restore the premises at the end of the term unless the landlord requires such restoration as a condition to the landlord's approval of the particular work. In those cases, the landlord must remember to exercise its right to require restoration when appropriate—thus creating a little trap for the landlord. So when the landlord receives a request for approval of alterations, the landlord should check the lease to see if it imposes such a requirement. (In a perfect leasing world, of course, the lease would require the tenant to give the landlord a conspicuous reminder of any such requirement whenever the tenant submits plans.)

44.3 Casualty and Restoration. If a casualty occurs during construction and affects the construction, identify and comply with any lien statutes or other contractor-protection statutes that might apply. In New York, for example, insurance proceeds that arise under these circumstances will be subject to the trust fund provisions of Lien Law article 3-A, a minefield for all concerned.

44.4 Changes of Address. If the landlord or any other notice recipient relocates, send formal notices to all tenants. Do not assume an ordinary emailed or bulk-mailed announcement will do the job. Update any filings, such as the Secretary of State and corporate service companies. If a tenant gives a formal notice of a change of address, the landlord should update its records. If the landlord becomes informally aware of a tenant relocation, the landlord should add the tenant's new address to its records, but use it in addition to continuing to use the old address. For clarity in that case, the landlord might request the tenant to give a formal update.

44.5 Commencement Date; Delivery of Premises. Issue formal notice and confirmation of delivery of the premises and commencement date, in a way that satisfies the specific delivery requirements of the lease. Exactly who needs to receive notice? Does anyone else need to receive a copy? The requirements may exceed those of the regular “notices” clause in the lease. Think about how to comply with them before the commencement date actually occurs, because delays in giving notice may result in lost rent dollars. Memorialize the commencement date with a document filed in such a way that someone will be able to find it in five years. If the lease (or a memorandum of lease) was recorded, consider recording notice of the commencement date. Once the lease is signed, prepare the commencement date notice with a blank date so it’s ready to go. Provide that if the parties never actually confirm the commencement date, the landlord can provide evidence of rent payments (with backup) to establish the commencement date.

44.6 Consent Requests. If the tenant requests consent to anything, check the lease to see what conditions the tenant must satisfy. The tenant’s request for consent may give the landlord an opportunity to solve problems or uncertainties that may have arisen. If the landlord anticipates incurring attorneys’ fees in dealing with the consent, confirm that the lease obligates the tenant to reimburse those fees. If it doesn’t, try to have the tenant agree to do that before the landlord starts to consider the request for consent.

44.7 Contact Person. Keep accurate records of the tenant’s emergency contact details. Check them occasionally.

44.8 Document Files. The landlord should establish reliable procedures to assure that when the tenant requests an estoppel certificate, the landlord will be able to list all documents that define the landlord-tenant relationship, such as option exercise letters, change of address notices, other notices, and the like. The landlord should prevent issues that might arise if the landlord delivers an estoppel certificate and forgets to include any of these other miscellaneous documents.

44.9 Escalations. If the landlord and the tenant agree on simplifying assumptions or formulas for calculating operating expense or other escalations, memorialize those understandings in writing. Otherwise, they leave the door open for a future lease auditor to come in many years after the fact and try to recalculate escalations in accordance with the precise words of the lease, an exercise that may and may not be practical.

44.10 Estoppels. The landlord may wish to request periodic estoppel certificates simply to try to prevent future issues from arising. Request an estoppel certificate (or include equivalent language in the documentation) for any amendment, consent, waiver, favor, or other concession of any kind. Consider periodically requiring an estoppel certificate on general principles, including from guarantors. Obtain one when the landlord has finished initial build-out. If the tenant has a deadline to respond to these requests, and perhaps in all cases, communicate these requests in compliance with the notice provisions of the lease. Periodically ask the tenant to confirm its formal notice address. If the tenant wants to negotiate the form of estoppel, it must pay the landlord's lender's legal expenses. Don't amend the lease in an estoppel certificate, as the parties may never find it again.

44.11 Fair Market Value Determinations. If the lease will require the parties to determine fair market rental value for any rent adjustments or option terms, the landlord should plan ahead for those likely disputes. At a minimum, the landlord should maintain suitable notes on other transactions and useful information, and perhaps engage the "best" appraisers well in advance to try to assure the process goes well if the parties can't agree on fair market rental value. If a renewal option term is for less than ten years and priced at fair market value, describe it as "the first three years of a ten year hypothetical fair market value term." Price renewal option terms at highest and best uses. If there is to be a fair market rent appraisal, how does the rent bump after the appraisal date? The appraiser can either determine or take it into account in the analysis. The lease should indicate which.

44.12 Future Amendments. If the landlord and the tenant amend the lease, the landlord should obtain guarantor consent (even if the guaranty waives such a requirement); amend any recorded memorandum of lease; and obtain any consents needed from lenders, partners, or other parties. Consider including estoppel-type assurances in any amendment.¹ Among other things, lease amendments give the landlord a good occasion on which to check the file, understand all amendments that have occurred to date and make sure the landlord's housekeeping remains in order.

44.13 Future Deliveries. To the extent the lease requires the tenant to make future or periodic deliveries of documents (such as financial statements of the guarantor or the tenant, certificate of ownership structure, insurance renewals or sales reports), remember to ask for them. If the landlord fails to enforce a tenant obligation long enough, that might create a waiver.

44.14 Future Events. Memorialize any exercise of an option, delivery of additional space, and the like, and any resulting rent or base year adjustments. Keep a copy of any resulting documentation in the lease file, in a place where someone will find it when they want “all” the lease documents. Memorialize any such understandings or event in writing. Do not rely on a course of dealing or other circumstances.

44.15 Guarantor. For an individual guarantor, check occasionally to see if the guarantor has died or has become disabled. If this occurs, the landlord may need to file a claim in probate, quite quickly, or lose its rights against the guarantor.

44.16 Insurance. Monitor expiry dates of insurance. Update coverage limits and requirements as markets change. Check insurance certificates for renewals, to confirm they continue to comply with the lease.

44.17 Lease-Related Agreements. If the landlord and the tenant enter into any future agreements related to the lease, think about whether they constitute lease amendments and require approval from lenders or other third parties. Unless they constitute lease amendments, any nonpayment or nonperformance under these future agreements will probably not constitute a default under the lease, and thus may not allow the landlord to exercise lease-related remedies.

44.18 Letters of Credit. Establish a single safe location to store letters of credit, and memorialize that location among all who need to know about it. Check that location once in a while to make sure the letter of credit has not somehow walked away. Monitor expiry dates. Pay attention to possible credit downgrades affecting the letter of credit issuer; they may allow the landlord to draw the letter of credit. If the letter of credit is an evergreen, consider obtaining periodic confirmations that the letter of credit remains in effect. It’s hard for a landlord to prove the landlord never received a cancellation notice. Typically, draw at the earliest possible opportunity, if necessary.

44.19 Notice Address. From time to time, confirm that the tenant’s notice address remains valid.

44.20 Permits. Periodically check the official records for open building permits that the tenant should have closed.

44.21 Preemptive Rights. Give the tenant notices of available space, and other notices, under any right of first refusal or other preemptive rights in the lease. Track this tenant's rights, and potential triggering events for those rights, in a way that nothing will fall between the cracks. In giving notices, do it right the first time.²

44.22 Tenant's Name. If the tenant operates or identifies itself under any name other than its legal name in the lease, check with landlord-tenant counsel to see whether this could create an issue in an eviction action. Similarly, if checks for rent under the lease show the name of anyone other than the tenant, consider any issues this may create. If necessary, notify the tenant that future rent checks should come from the tenant, and not any affiliate or other party.

44.23 Tickler Reminders. If the tenant persuaded the landlord to remind the tenant of certain matters (e.g., option exercise deadlines), establish appropriate reminders in the landlord's calendar. Track lease renewal dates. Approach the tenant well in advance to make sure no broker is involved. Counsel may also wish to make appropriate "tickler" entries, but should avoid assuming responsibility to remember. To the contrary, counsel should affirmatively warn the landlord that counsel does not assume responsibility to remember any dates.

44.24 Title Search. Any careful property owner may want to obtain an updated title search on their property periodically, just to check for surprises. As a landlord, the most common surprise would consist of a mechanic's lien arising from a tenant's work.

44.25 Violations and Real Estate Taxes. Check periodically for outstanding Department of Buildings violations and for payment of real estate taxes (if that's the tenant's obligation). For the latter item, the landlord may want to engage a tax service.

CHAPTER EIGHT

MODEL NEW YORK LANGUAGE FOR SPACE LEASES

Joshua Stein, Esq.

[8.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter seeks to collect, for convenient reference, language that a New York leasing lawyer may want to include in any space lease because of legal considerations unique to New York. This chapter offers three sets of sample provisions: (1) the base case, which would typically apply to all Leases; (2) special cases, which reflect New York leasing law but would apply only sometimes; and (3) general provisions, which do not uniquely apply to Leases but could also apply to any other document governed by New York law.

Footnotes explain and comment on the model provisions, and when and why one might want to use them.

Any competent New York real estate lawyer will helpfully point out that New York leasing law and practice requires a lot more than shoveling a few paragraphs of standard language into a Lease. But the few paragraphs of New York language offered here do provide a good starting point to think about New York law or check a space lease for New York issues. Knowledge of New York law also helps.

The sample clauses offered here seek to demonstrate plain English writing: short and direct sentences, verbs, ordinary words, active voice, not too many parentheses, general principles expressed before their exceptions and presentation of concepts in an orderly and logical way. Even a non-lawyer should have no problem understanding any of these provisions, though not necessarily the logic, if any, that drives them.

These sample clauses assume the overall Lease already defines common capitalized terms. Any user must confirm that defined terms used in the model provisions match those in the rest of the Lease. Check every capitalized term. If a particular paragraph does not itself define a capitalized term it uses, then the larger document will need to do that. No paragraph in these model provisions uses a capitalized term defined anywhere outside that paragraph.

This chapter assumes the Lease already defines, once: (1) “include” to mean “include without limitation”; and (2) any statute to include its amendments, replacements and supplements. For ease of use, this sample language does not establish defined terms for statutes, instead spelling them out every time. A user can change any of this, of course.

This chapter does not collect generic “boilerplate” that is not state-specific or city-specific, such as jury trial waivers or attorneys’ fees clauses. Sometimes this becomes a hard line to draw. In general, if particular language would appear in about the same form in any transactional document anywhere in the United States, this article omits it, even if it is very important language.

Any opinions expressed or implied are solely those of the author, and only at the moment of writing.

[8.1] II. LEASES (BASE CASE)

Almost every Landlord for almost every Lease will typically want to include these clauses. Other clauses apply only in certain cases, as listed below.¹

1.1 Casualty. The provisions of this Lease on casualty constitute an express agreement on damage or destruction of the Premises by fire or other casualty. Therefore, Real Property Law § 227 (RPL), providing for this contingency absent express agreement, shall not apply.

1.2 Conditional Limitation. If an Event of Default² exists, then without limiting Landlord’s other remedies, Landlord may serve on Tenant a written five-day³ notice of cancellation and termination of this Lease (that five-day period, the “Conditional Limitation Period”). When the Conditional Limitation Period expires, this Lease and the Term shall automatically and without any further action by anyone terminate, expire and come to an end, by lapse of time, as fully and completely as if the last day of the Conditional Limitation Period were the Expiration Date. After the Conditional Limitation Period, Tenant’s tenancy no longer exists. Tenant shall then quit and surrender the Premises to Landlord but remain liable as this Lease provides. This

1 New York law gives Landlords no statutory lien or “distrain” right. If they want one, they must create and perfect it under the Uniform Commercial Code, N.Y. UCC § 9-109. Only then would it make sense for a Tenant to ask a Landlord to agree to waive or subordinate any such lien. Nothing about that waiver or subordination would be specific to New York. 52A C.J.S. Landlord & Tenant § 1410 (2016).

2 The Lease should say, once, that an Event of Default exists only until Tenant has cured it and maybe Landlord has accepted the cure. This avoids the need to refer repeatedly to an “uncured Event of Default.”

3 Tenant will often negotiate for more than five days.

paragraph establishes a conditional limitation, not a condition subsequent.⁴

- 1.3 Delivery of Premises. Tenant waives any right it might have under Real Property Law § 223-a. Landlord’s obligations under this Lease on delivery of the Premises constitute “an express provision to the contrary” as Real Property Law § 223-a contemplates.⁵
- 1.4 Holdover. If Tenant holds over after the Term then, without limiting Landlord’s other rights and remedies, Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord regarding that holding over. Without limiting Tenant’s liability under the previous sentence, Tenant shall Indemnify Landlord against any loss Landlord suffers because, as a result of Tenant’s holding over, the next tenant of the Premises fails to take possession of the Premises or Landlord is otherwise in default, or incurs any incremental obligations, under that next tenant’s lease.⁶
- 1.5 Mitigation of Damages. Notwithstanding anything to the contrary in this Lease or governing law, if Tenant defaults then Landlord has no obligation to mitigate its damages or to seek to relet.⁷
- 1.6 Right of Redemption. Tenant waives any right of redemption under Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law § 761.

4 This paragraph responds to New York landlord-tenant jurisprudence that allows Landlord to bring a summary proceeding against a Tenant only if a Lease terminated by its terms, not if Landlord exercised a direct right to terminate. N.Y. Real Prop. Acts. Law § 711 (RPAPL). The distinction is rather arcane but drives much landlord-tenant jurisprudence in New York.

5 RPL § 223-a.

6 It has become standard to require New York tenants, if they hold over, to indemnify their landlords against the “loss” of the next tenant of the Premises as a result of holdover. This began with a court case that allowed the “next” tenant to recover from a holdover tenant for interfering with the next tenant’s occupancy. See Kronish Lieb Weiner & Hellman LLP v. Tahari, Ltd., 35 A.D.3d 317, 318, 829 N.Y.S.2d 7, 9 (1st Dep’t 2006). Tenant can reasonably argue that Landlord’s next lease with the next tenant, if standard, should contain language relieving Landlord of the risk, such as the standard language on “Delivery of Premises” offered in this article. Nevertheless it is usually a landlord’s market in New York. Sometimes the parties compromise by saying the holdover tenant does not become responsible for loss of the next tenant until the holdover has continued for some time, e.g., 30 days. Just how does one measure that loss?

7 This language is not statutory, just customary. It universally appears in New York commercial leases, except sometimes very large or tenant-friendly leases. Although New York law does not require commercial landlords to exercise commercially reasonable efforts to relet at market rates, a customary measure of damages in any lease—the one that will most likely apply in most cases—does give Landlord a reasonable incentive to do exactly that.

- 1.7 Security. To the extent General Obligations Law § 7-103 (GOL) requires: (a) Landlord shall deposit the Security in an account at a bank with a place of business in the State; (b) if the Building contains six or more family dwelling units, then that account shall earn interest at the prevailing rate earned by similar deposits with banks in the State; (c) Tenant acknowledges that Landlord has Notified⁸ Tenant that Landlord shall deposit the Security at _____ Bank located at _____; (d) if the Security is deposited in an interest-bearing account, then Landlord shall be entitled to receive, as administration expenses, 1% per annum of the Security; and (e) any other interest paid by the bank shall belong to Tenant and Landlord shall hold it in trust until repaid, applied to Rent or annually paid to Tenant.⁹
- 1.8 Waiver of Stay. Tenant expressly waives, for itself and anyone claiming by or through Tenant, any rights under Civil Practice Law and Rules 2201 (CPLR), for any holdover proceeding or other action or proceeding on this Lease or Tenant's rights in the Premises.
- 1.9 Window Cleaning. Tenant shall not clean, nor require, permit, suffer or allow anyone else, to clean, any window from the outside in violation of Law.¹⁰
- 1.10 Zoning Lot Waiver. Space Lease. Tenant, and anyone claiming through Tenant: (a) is not a "party in interest" as defined in New York City Zoning Resolution § 12-10 (definition of "zoning lot"); and (b) shall promptly on demand execute and acknowledge any document Landlord reasonably requests to confirm that or as Landlord reasonably requires so Landlord can combine the Land with any other real property as a zoning lot, or subdivide the Land from any zoning lot.

8 The statute may require Landlord to give this Notice only after the Security has been deposited. If so, Landlord must remember to give a separate Notice after the fact. GOL § 7-103.

9 This paragraph just restates New York law, so it doesn't seem strictly necessary, but many tenants ask for it and it's a good reminder for landlords. Id.

10 Labor Law § 202 prohibits certain window washing techniques. N.Y. Lab. Law § 202. Most Leases specifically refer to that section, "or any other Law, including the rules of the New York City Board of Standards and Appeals." It is apparently not enough to say Tenant must comply with all law generally.

[8.2] III. LEASES (SPECIAL CASES)

Only some Leases will require the additional clauses collected here. Footnotes offer local color on some of these clauses and when they might apply.¹¹ Some of these clauses might apply to all Leases, but don't always appear. If a clause would apply only to a ground lease, it does not appear here.

- 2.1 Acceptance of Rent. If Landlord accepts any payment from Tenant after the Term expires, then Landlord shall credit it against any damages that Tenant may owe Landlord. By accepting that payment, Landlord shall not be deemed to have reinstated this Lease or to have agreed to continue or accept Tenant's tenancy or occupancy on any basis whatsoever. This paragraph constitutes "an agreement . . . providing otherwise" within the meaning of RPL § 232-c.¹²
- 2.2 ACP-5 Form. If legally required, Landlord shall, reasonably soon after Landlord has approved Tenant's plans and specifications for Tenant's Initial Work, give Tenant an ACP-5 form showing Tenant's Initial Work is not an "asbestos job."¹³
- 2.3 Fee Estate Conveyance. During any Construction by Tenant known to Landlord, Landlord shall immediately Notify Tenant of any conveyance of Landlord's interest in the Premises. Tenant shall, to the extent Law requires, comply with General Obligations Law § 5-322.2(1), which requires the "owner" of a building under Construction to notify 11 As another New-York-specific commercial leasing issue, if Landlord and Tenant disagree on whether certain defaults exist under a Lease, this dispute often results in a temporary restraining order or preliminary injunction to prevent Landlord from terminating the Lease, a so-called "Yellowstone injunction." The need for such an injunction arises from a somewhat arcane glitch in New York's landlord-tenant statute. CPLR 6301. That glitch has existed for at least 50 years and no one has fixed it. With a Yellowstone injunction in place, the court resolves the disagreement on whether a Lease default exists, and the parties then proceed accordingly. This would all work really well if the courts resolved the dispute quickly. Instead, the status quo gets preserved for an extraordinarily long time. For example, in the most recent "Yellowstone" proceeding involving one of the author's clients, the court took 26 months to rule against Tenant—26 months during which Landlord was stuck with a defaulting Tenant and enjoined from doing anything about it. This strange dynamic has achieved almost constitutional stature in New York. Great legal minds sometimes struggle to craft language to make the "Yellowstone" process work better, or not at all, but no standard language exists to solve the problem. Landlord-tenant courts would probably laugh at it anyway.

12 RPL § 232-c.

13 This paragraph applies in New York City assuming the usual allocation of responsibility on asbestos. To prepare and sign an ACP-5 form, Landlord first needs to see Tenant's plans and specifications. Tenant will often try to set a short deadline, e.g., five days.

the contractor, by certified mail, within five days after any conveyance of the underlying land.¹⁴

2.4 Landmarks Preservation. The Premises are subject to jurisdiction of the New York City Landmarks Preservation Commission (LPC). As required by New York City Administrative Code, Title 25, Chapter 3 and Rules of the City of New York Title 63 (R.C.N.Y.) (collectively, “LPC Law”), Tenant shall not in any way alter the Premises, as defined in LPC Law, without first complying with LPC Law. Tenant shall ascertain and comply with LPC Law requirements. Nothing in this paragraph limits any other Alteration restrictions in this Lease.¹⁵ Tenant shall promptly correct or at Landlord’s option reimburse Landlord’s cost to correct any threatened or actual violation of LPC Law Tenant causes.

2.5 Modifications to Memorandum of Lease. If the parties record a Memorandum of Lease, they shall execute, acknowledge and record an amendment to that Memorandum of Lease promptly after any amendment of this Lease, even if it changes nothing in the Memorandum of Lease.¹⁶

2.6 No Implied Consent to Remaining in Possession. If, after Tenant’s default in payment of Rent or under any notice from Landlord demanding payment of Rent or possession of the Premises, Landlord accepts any Rent payment, partial or complete, that shall not consti-

14 That’s what the words of the statute require. No available cases interpret the statute. The statute says nothing about consequences of any violation. GOL § 5-322.2(1).

15 New York City has a very extensive landmarks preservation program. For a substantial percentage of properties in the City, particularly in Manhattan, LPC acts as a second buildings department, with power to approve even the smallest change in a building. For example, if someone wants to install a sign in a landmarked building, the approvals process requires far more work than the sign. If LPC has landmarked only the exterior of a building, then delete the words “within or” in the second sentence. N.Y.C. Admin. Code tit. 25, ch. 3; R.C.N.Y. tit. 63.

16 New York law requires these additional recordings. Failure to record means the undisclosed Lease amendment does not bind third parties. Once the parties have decided to record a Memorandum of Lease, they then bear the burden of recording notice of any Lease amendment, whether or not germane to anything the Memorandum disclosed. Though this requirement sounds bizarre, it isn’t really; it means that once the parties have chosen to “go public,” anyone who searches the public record can rely on the public record. This may give Tenants a reason to disfavor Memoranda of Lease, especially after taking possession, because possession puts all parties on notice of all of Tenant’s rights. A Memorandum of Lease becomes unnecessary and potentially dangerous if the parties amend the Lease and forget to amend the Memorandum of Lease. Tenants typically do not record Memoranda of Lease, except for: (a) ground leases; (b) very large or institutional leases or (c) leases with significantly delayed delivery of possession. RPL § 291-c.

tute Landlord's "express consent in writing to permit the tenant to continue in possession" within the meaning of RPAPL § 711(2).¹⁷ Landlord shall not be deemed to have waived its right to commence and prosecute summary proceedings against Tenant under the Real Property Actions and Proceedings Law on that basis.¹⁸

2.7 Prohibited Use. As used in this Lease, the words "obscene" and "material" shall have the same meanings as in Penal Law § 235.00 (PL).¹⁹

2.8 Sidewalks. For any sidewalk this Lease requires Tenant to maintain or repair, Tenant shall perform Landlord's obligations, and shall Indemnify Landlord against any liability, under N.Y.C. Admin. Code § 7-210 and 211. Tenant shall maintain all insurance the cited sections require, naming Landlord as an additional insured.

2.9 Stale Rent. Tenant waives any right it might have to assert or claim a limit on the amount (or accrual period) of unpaid Rent that Landlord may seek to collect in a summary proceeding under RPAPL Article 7. If Tenant has failed to pay Rent for more than one month and believes or intends to assert that Tenant may suffer prejudice because of Landlord's failure to promptly exercise its remedies under this Lease for that nonpayment, Tenant shall Notify Landlord and ask Landlord to promptly exercise those remedies. Tenant assumes responsibility to fund appropriate reserves to prevent any surprise or prejudice that Tenant might otherwise suffer from any accumulation of unpaid Rent. Nothing in this paragraph limits Landlord's rights or remedies.²⁰

2.10 Summary Dispossess. Nothing in this Lease limits Landlord's right to commence and prosecute a summary dispossess proceeding under RPAPL Article 7.

17 RPAPL § 711(2).

18 This is a possible "overkill" provision designed to respond to occasional cases inferring that Landlord agreed to allow a defaulting Tenant to remain in possession.

19 PL § 235.00(1), (2).

20 Courts have used "stale rent" as a basis to kick Landlords out of court, though more often in residential than commercial cases. Failure to pay, continued long enough without action by Landlord, results in no further obligation to pay. This paragraph seeks to respond to that jurisprudence. Rather than use this language, Landlord would be well advised not to allow "stale rent" to accrue. Marriott v. Shaw, 151 Misc. 2d 938, 574 N.Y.S.2d 477 (1991).

2.11 Untimely Exercise. If this Lease gives Tenant any Option(s), Tenant acknowledges that if Tenant fails to exercise an Option in the Option Exercise Period, Landlord would inevitably suffer prejudice if Landlord were required to honor Tenant's untimely exercise. The amount of prejudice may be difficult or speculative for Landlord to establish. It could include, for example, Landlord's possible loss of the ability to relet the Premises to a new tenant of Landlord's choice at then-current market rates; expenditure of Landlord's time to seek replacement tenant(s) or to prepare the Premises for reoccupancy; costs of brokers; and other costs, expenses and expenditure of time, of Landlord. Tenant recognizes that Landlord's prejudice may not be demonstrable or provable in court. In recognition of that prejudice, if any court requires Landlord to accept an Option exercise outside the Option Exercise Period, then Landlord may require that the Rent under this Lease be adjusted to equal then-current fair market rent.²¹

[8.3] IV. GENERAL PROVISIONS

The general provisions collected here do not apply only to Leases. They could also apply to any other document governed by New York law. Some of these clauses might apply to all Leases, but don't always appear.

3.1 Consumer Contract Statutes. This Lease is not a "consumer contract" within the meaning of GOL § 5-327, or any other Law that applies only to transactions for personal, family or household purposes.²²

3.2 Disputes. If any litigation arises over this Lease: (a) if that litigation is heard in the Commercial Division, New York State Supreme Court, then the parties agree to application of the Court's accelerated procedures, Uniform Rules for the Supreme and County Courts (Rules of 21 This paragraph is nonstandard. It responds to New York cases allowing late exercise of Options based on the theory that late exercise causes no prejudice to Landlord. Whether or not an Option already contemplates fair market Rent, then perhaps Landlord should collect a fee for its trouble in dealing with any late exercise.

22 Ordinarily the nature of the transaction will be obvious. In those cases, this paragraph seems unnecessary. If uncertainty exists, this paragraph might help, but a court will probably still reach its own conclusion. So should counsel. Many special requirements apply to consumer contracts. For example, GOL § 5-327 says that if any consumer contract requires a consumer to pay the other party's legal fees, then that obligation automatically becomes mutual.

Practice for the Commercial Division § 202.70(g), Rule 9)²³ and (b) the parties shall promptly enter into and submit to the court, with a request to be “so-ordered,” a Stipulation and Order for the Production and Exchange of Confidential Information as promulgated by the New York City Bar Association Committee on State Courts of Superior Jurisdiction.²⁴

3.3 Governing Law. New York internal law, disregarding any law on conflict of laws, governs this Lease and any claims arising under it or from the parties’ relationship, whether in contract, in tort or otherwise, regardless of the location of any real property.²⁵

3.4 Non-Business-Days. If this Lease requires Tenant to pay any sum on any day that is not a Business Day then, notwithstanding any Law to the contrary, including General Construction Law § 25 (GCN),²⁶ Tenant shall not be credited for that payment until the date Tenant actually pays it.

3.5 Notices. Any attorney may give notice on behalf of his or her client.²⁷

23 These procedures, the so-called “Rocket Docket,” seek to limit discovery and streamline the litigation process. Ordinarily whichever party favors quick resolution of a dispute will want the special procedures to apply. They are by no means “industry standard” yet. N.Y. Unif. R. for Trial Cts. (22 N.Y.C.R.R.) § 202.70(g).

24 In any business litigation, though the parties will disagree on the facts, the law and other things, they will usually agree they want to preserve confidentiality. Thus they may already have every incentive to enter into a stipulation of this type. Still, the language suggested here may make sense, though it is not “market standard.”

25 If a transaction involves only New York real property and only parties located in New York, why might any other state’s law possibly apply? That is a great question. But most New York Leases do expressly choose New York law. They often also include a consent to jurisdiction and a consent to venue, both with generic language rather than anything New York-specific.

26 This statute allows payment on the next business day, but requires calculation of interest as if the payment were made on the non-business-day when due. For a large rent arrearage, the difference could matter. GCN § 25.

27 An unfortunate New York case held that attorneys could not give notice on behalf of their client because the notice recipient bargained for notice from the counterparty, not the attorney. Hence this sentence. That case has been widely ignored. Siegel v. Kentucky Fried Chicken of Long Island, Inc., 108 A.D.2d 218, 488 N.Y.S.2d 744 (2d Dep’t 1985).

HIDDEN COSTS IN LANDLORD'S LEASE FORMS

[9.0] I. INTRODUCTION

For the corporate tenants you represent, office space is a significant expense. For many companies it remains the second- or third-largest expense—after payroll costs. However, it can be unnecessarily expensive if a tenant fails to gain protection against the hidden costs and restrictions that are buried in many leases.

An important point to remember when negotiating an office lease is that your client's prospective landlord probably has the advantage. If you are like many lawyers, real estate may be just part of your practice—you may negotiate a lease of this type, or in this market, only occasionally. You are familiar with all the basic principles and issues. You treat a lease as a relatively routine matter. Your focus may be on avoiding extraordinary risk, alerting the tenant to lease conflicts with its non-real estate loan covenants, and other corporate issues.

The building owner, whose business is leasing space, is in a different position and buildings are its major asset. The landlord is highly motivated to plan for the long term and to write conservative, pro-landlord leases that maximize the return on its assets. Terms in the landlord's so-called "boilerplate" that may represent acceptable legal solutions can impose unnecessary costs on your client.

This presents an opportunity to provide additional value to your client. By fine-tuning your understanding of certain key business terms, you can help your clients reduce long-term costs and turn office leases into assets that provide flexibility to respond to changing business conditions. Here are some of the more obscure lease provisions that protect landlords at their tenants' expense—and give you the opportunity to provide additional value.

[9.1] II. THE SPACE

Office space priced per "rentable" square foot often turns out to be much more expensive than tenants expect because landlords may include space that tenants consider unusable. Normally, a tenant will be able to use only 75% to 90% of the space it pays for. This difference—the loss factor—depends on three things: the physical configuration of the offices, the landlord's method of measuring rentable area, and, increasingly, the landlord's whim.

Rentable area is sure to include a portion of elevators, janitors' closets, lobbies, stairways, and more. Fair enough. Be aware, however, that some buildings have a higher loss factor than others. Fancy curves or sharp angles, elevator banks placed in the center of the building instead of on the side, and an abundance of columns in a tenant's space contribute to a higher loss factor.

In addition, landlords often develop their own methods for measuring rentable area. A landlord may measure from the outside of one exterior wall to another, for example, and include questionably "public" areas like air shafts. Some buildings seem to be measured from gargoyle to gargoyle (facade ornaments unrelated to a tenant's usable space).

Beyond this, many landlords create an arbitrary loss factor. Once they've determined how big a space is, they just inflate the number by, say, 25%, and then call that the rentable area.

For instance, my firm completed an analysis of how building owners "re-measure" their buildings to increase reported rentable area not accompanied by any physical change. We studied 50 randomly selected buildings in mid-town Manhattan over a 15-year period, from 1990 to 2005. More than 33% of these buildings "grew"—without any change in physical area—by more than 5%. Several buildings grew by more than 20%. Although many, many buildings reported growth, only one building actually changed in any significant way in physical size. This building used development rights from another site to add space to an existing structure. Taking into account the reported increase in rentable area where no real growth occurred, and then-current asking rents for such space, the revenue at stake was significant. Extrapolated to the entire Manhattan market, the annual increase in revenue for landlords, as of early 2006, was estimated at $387 million—all from an increase in quoted rentable area which had no physical counterpart. And, while Manhattan may be an exemplar of this technique, similar practices can be found nationwide. So understanding the issue really can make a difference to your clients. To help your clients protect themselves, you may recommend that they hire an architect or tenant advisor to measure the space they plan to lease and advise whether the usable area will satisfy their business's needs. The tenant advisor should use a generally accepted standard, like that adopted by the Building Owners and Managers Association, so the prospective tenant can precisely compare one space with another.

Then, whatever number the landlord uses, your client will know how much he or she will be paying per usable square foot, and will have a more informed basis for negotiation. In some markets, the loss factor—the difference between rentable and usable area—may be negotiable. A landlord may agree to reduce the loss factor on your unit or to make a trade-off. As an example negotiation: The landlord agreed to reduce the loss factor for a tenant from 18% to 15%, provided that the tenant accept within its premises about 65 square feet that otherwise would have been common corridor. On this 20,000-square-foot suburban transaction at a mid-$20s rent, the tenant kept the same usable area (i.e., the same functionality) but, because of the reduced loss factor, reduced the nominal rentable area by about 600 square feet. This saved the tenant approximately $130,000 over the lease term.

The best protection against excessive loss factors remains comparison. While loss factors are often excessive, they are not uniformly so. Tenants who understand their value, look for differences in the marketplace, and accurately factor these differences into their decision making will reduce occupancy costs. You can help guide your clients to a knowledgeable advisor in this area.

On lease renewal, the tenant may also find that the landlord has “remeasured” the space and now claims it is much larger. In one instance, a well-known Manhattan landlord told a tenant that the tenant’s space had grown 20%, and also demanded a higher rent per square foot—a double blow.

[9.2] III. OPERATING EXPENSES— THE TRICKIEST CLAUSE

An operating expense clause permits building ownership to recover normal out-of-pocket costs of running a building. That should be all it does. Operating expenses listed in a tenant’s annual billing statement should correspond directly to benefits the tenant receives under the lease, and they ought to meet an objective standard such as GAAP (generally accepted accounting principles), not conventions particular to a given landlord.

When representing tenants in this aspect of lease negotiations, insist on a precise and limited definition of the items to be included. Landlords sometimes use the operating expense clause as a profit center; in other cases, operating expenses become a convenient source of reserve funds. If you approve a catch-all clause, which many landlords argue is necessary, it can become a blank check for the landlord to draw on your client’s account. Your client may be billed for charges that have little to do with running a building. And, as you well know, ambiguity is likely to increase the risk of litigation your client faces.

Here are key factors to consider when negotiating an operating expense clause to protect your client:

[9.3] A. Umbrella or Enabling Clause

The initial portion of the operating expense clause functions as an overarching definition of what may be billed as operating expenses. Negotiate this so that it is appropriately narrow and linked to objective standards.

[9.4] B. Exclusions

Certain items—which might otherwise be permitted by the enabling clause, or which simply have a propensity to cause problems, or for which your client wants extra assurances that it will not pay—should be specifically excluded from operating expenses. For example:

1. electricity that serves tenants' spaces (the landlord recovers this from each tenant individually);
2. executive salaries;
3. consulting fees;
4. market study fees;
5. commissions and advertising costs;
6. initial landscaping costs;
7. structural repairs or replacements;
8. penalties incurred because the landlord failed to pay taxes on time;
9. fees and higher interest charges caused by the landlord's refinancing of the property;
10. money the landlord must pay if it defaults under a lease or other agreement;
11. any legal fees to resolve disputes involving the landlord;

12. any excessive amount the landlord pays a contractor or vendor because of a special relationship;
13. the cost of above-standard facilities or services provided to other tenants;
14. new items added after the base year; and
15. all reimbursements of expenses that would otherwise be included in operating expenses.

In negotiating exclusions from an operating expense clause, it's important to consider the nature of the building and its systems, their age, the operations of other significant tenants in the building, and similar matters. The better a tenant can anticipate the expenses a landlord may incur over the life of the lease (and advise you of same), the more likely you will be able to effectively exclude from billable operating expenses those which are improper. Many of the most important exclusions will be particular to a given building or lease or relate to the tenant's particular operations, so be sure to work closely with your client's real estate advisor in this area.

[9.5] C. Capital Improvements

Capital expenditures require particular attention when you're negotiating a lease. The operating expense clause should exclude them generally from the operating expenses for which your client will be billed.

Barclay's Bank in New York got a repair bill after its landlord, Panel Realty Company, installed a new air conditioning system. Barclay's refused to pay, and the case ended up in court. The bank's lease required the landlord to make all structural repairs. The bank was responsible for its share of all other building maintenance and repairs, including repairs to the air conditioning system. The court reasoned that replacing the system goes beyond traditional notions of repair. This was a capital expenditure that Panel Realty couldn't pass on to Barclay's. While the bank won, it had taken needless risk because its lease didn't make the landlord responsible for capital expenditures.¹

Remember, however, that if your client enters into a net lease—taking, for instance, an entire building for its use—and agrees to be responsible for “maintaining” the building, that client may unwittingly be agreeing to be responsible for structural repairs. Like everything else, this can be negotiated to appropriately limit your client's liabilities. Foremost among your considerations in this situation will be the age and nature of the structure and special tenant uses that may stress the building or its systems and increase the likely need for structural repairs or capital improvements. This means that even in the case of a single-tenant occupant, net lease, it remains important to define what will be considered structural, and to be especially clear if your client's business objective is to exclude structural repairs from its obligations.² Work closely with your tenant's real estate advisor on these issues.

Even with an exclusion, substantial capital expenditures—artfully relabeled—can find their way into a tenant's operating expense charges if you're not careful. For instance, a lease may require your client to pay for equipment rentals. This is a common technique for converting capital expenditures into expenses that are passed on to the tenant. Your client should agree to pay for equipment rentals only if they're not a substitute for capital equipment the landlord would otherwise have to buy. Tenants should be on the lookout for charges like this because tax law often makes equipment leasing more attractive to landlords than buying.

Certain capital improvements (like new, more efficient elevators or a new HVAC system) are supposed to reduce the cost of running the building and thus become operating expenses which a landlord passes on to a tenant. Such capital expenditures normally are not included in operating expenses. Landlords often insist, however, that tenants absorb a portion of the cost. To protect your client, take four important steps.

First, work with the tenant's real estate advisor and determine if the landlord currently plans to make specific cost-reducing upgrades. You may be able to exclude these known, planned expenses in their entirety. Second, as for future cost-saving capital expenditures the landlord may make, include in the lease a requirement that savings be demonstrated before such expenditures may be billed as operating expenses. Third, to the extent such expenditures may be billed as operating expenses, work with the tenant's advisor to determine appropriate amortization formulas and interest rates to be allowed (if any) based on the nature of the building and prevailing market practices. Finally, make sure that any amount which may be billed is always less than the demonstrable savings realized that year. These steps will help assure that your client's operating expenses are never greater than they would have been without the cost-saving improvement.

[9.6] D. Double-Dipping

The landlord's costs of running separate income-producing parts of the building should be excluded from operating expenses—or the costs permitted into operating expenses—only after the income they generate is deducted from your client's billable operating expenses. This goes for sundry shops, coffee shops, observation decks, recycling operations, and so on. If the building has a garage, the building owner likely charges tenants and the public for parking spaces, but the cost of operating the parking garage may also be included among the tenants' operating expenses. If a tenant's lease doesn't specifically exclude this cost, the building owner has a good argument for billing your client.

Perhaps the most common area for double-dipping is labor costs. Tenants are routinely billed for episodic services provided by building staff, and 100% of staff salaries are also billed as operating expenses. For instance, one tenant in a large office building reserved the freight elevator each morning for early morning deliveries to its cafeteria, and paid a fee to cover all expenses for this special service. At the same time, the landlord included in operating expenses billed to the tenant who used the elevator—and all others in the building—overtime labor charges for the engineers required to handle the elevator's early morning runs. This is a clear example of double-dipping; the landlord was paid twice for the same services. Work with your tenant's advisor to understand how a particular building or landlord's method of operating a building exposes your client to double-dipping risks and then seek to exclude or limit these excess charges.

[9.7] E. Electricity

For many tenants, electricity is one of the biggest operating expenses. Landlords who want to augment their revenues without quoting a higher rent often use the electricity clause as a profit center, inflating the already substantial cost for this essential service. Help your clients ensure that a building owner's profit center does not unnecessarily increase their rent. Multi-tenant office buildings, whether central business district or suburban, typically provide that tenants will pay for electricity in one of three ways: (1) direct metering, (2) submetering, or (3) rent inclusion.

Direct metering is straightforward and may be the least costly for most tenants. When only one meter in a building connects to the utility, the tenant or its landlord may install a separate meter to measure the electricity used by a particular tenant. In this situation, the landlord pays the utility company and the tenant pays the landlord. This method, called “sub-metering,” can provide a tenant with less-costly electricity, provided the tenant knows what to ask for. If building ownership can buy electricity at low bulk rates, you should bargain for your tenant to receive the benefit of that lower rate. Landlord draft leases often say the tenant will be billed “in accordance with” a utility’s published rate schedule. This may mean the landlord will charge your client the highest rate that would apply to its own consumption and pocket the difference. Particular areas of concern in dealing with sub-metered electricity are to ensure that your client is billed only for its own consumption, accurately measured, and to ensure that the demand component of the electrical charges is not permitted to artificially increase your client’s electrical bills. Some building owners seek to add an administrative fee to sub-metered electric charges. This fee commonly ranges from 3% to 12% of the amount billed, and is generally unjustified. The most common ongoing cost associated with sub-metering is monthly meter reading, which often costs less than $30/month (2006), and can often be accomplished through online monitoring at a fraction of this cost. The purported administrative fee is a profit center and should be avoided.

So-called “rent inclusion” is the riskiest option for tenants. The landlord usually estimates a tenant’s electrical usage by looking at installed or planned-for office equipment and asking how many hours the tenant uses each piece of equipment in a typical day or week. Alternatively, the landlord’s proposed lease may permit ownership to assume that a tenant uses each piece of equipment at maximum capacity eight hours per day, five days per week. Such estimates are inherently less certain than measuring the amount of electricity a tenant uses. On one Manhattan block, the basic rate landlords charge for electricity by this method varies by more than 30%.

Be wary of such estimates for another reason. They may include a substantial “safety factor” that needlessly increases your client’s costs. For instance, suppose your client’s landlord pays $2.25 per square foot for electricity, but adds $2.75 a square foot to the base rent (this is the “rent inclusion”). A 10% rate increase would raise your client’s electricity charges to $3.02 per square foot, and the landlord’s profit would grow from 50 cents to 55 cents per square foot per year. If your client leases 100,000 square feet—that extra 5 cents alone would cost $50,000 over a 10-year lease term. The landlord's total profit on this tenant's electricity usage is $550,000—and that's assuming no further increases.

Can the landlord cut off your client's electricity? Leases used throughout the country often allow a landlord to do this on short notice—leaving a tenant to deal directly with a utility. Landlords usually insist that they need this flexibility to operate their buildings. But a tenant forced to make its own arrangements for electricity is likely to find this expensive and time-consuming. It may require much interior work—like new risers, conduits, and wiring—which, incidentally, are capital in nature and which the lease may not give your tenant the right to install. Such clauses also would require tenants to perform work outside their own premises, perhaps with a requirement to obtain consent from other tenants for access and alternatives, and with liability for damage to other building systems' and other tenants' systems and property. Landlords have used such clauses to gain leverage when dealing with unrelated matters.

Deregulation of electricity presents your client with additional issues related to utility supply. A building owner may reserve the right (or where a lease is silent, may claim that it has the right) to change utility providers from time to time. Building ownership may do this to benefit from bulk purchase arrangements, to benefit from reduced rates for common area electrical services, or for other reasons. But the result for a tenant may be disruption or inferior supply, with no compensating advantage.

Depending on the nature of your client's operations, it may be appropriate to limit building ownership's choice of utility suppliers, and how and when they make any substitutions to minimize cost and disruption to your client. In some circumstances, it may be appropriate to reserve this right for the tenant alone, or to give the tenant an independent right to choose utility suppliers. Work closely with your client's real estate advisor on this issue.

In protecting your clients from excess operating expenses, inappropriate capital expenditures, excess utility costs and the like, one of the most important assets is good information about the building where a lease will be signed. You may find it worthwhile to encourage your client to retain an architect or engineer to perform a limited feasibility study. A few thousand dollars spent before a lease is signed to identify potential problems can save many thousands of dollars over the life of the lease. A tenant considering a 40,000-square-foot lease retained an architect to perform a feasibility study. They learned that the HVAC units serving their space were 12 years old. Such units have an expected life of about 10 years. The tenant then negotiated to make replacing these units part of landlord's initial work—saving themselves money, disruption and potential disputes over inadequate service later on.

[9.8] IV. RENT INCREASES

[9.9] A. Base Year

Office tenants generally must pay the increase in building operating expenses and real estate taxes measured over some base point—either a base year or an expense stop. These escalations can easily outstrip the base rent, and courts will generally enforce the provisions in a lease your client signs, regardless of how much the rent may increase over the years. During the last decade, we have seen low inflation, and therefore relatively low escalation increases, but this has not been the case historically, and real estate markets tend to be cyclic. So it's important to understand the mechanics of escalation formulas.

The “base year” is generally considered to be the first 12 months a tenant occupies the space. The expense “stop” is a number representing average, reasonable operating expenses per square foot during those first 12 months. Because the “stop” or “base year amount” is the threshold against which each subsequent year's increases are measured, if your client agrees to an early base year or an expense stop that's too low, the landlord will get higher profits every year of the lease. Landlords sometimes argue that the base year should be the 12 months preceding occupancy, but that would mean the tenant would face a rent increase on the day it moved in.

If a tenant is leasing space in a building that has been functioning for a while, the previous 12 months' operating expenses are a good basis for estimating the expense stop, but these tenants will want to have their tenant advisors check their building's vacancy level. A building with high vacancies will typically have lower expenses, and an appropriate adjustment would be necessary to develop a valid expense stop or base year. Next, your client's tenant advisor should check the estimate with management companies that handle similar buildings or a reliable database of actual building expense data to see if the chosen building's expenses are within normal range for that type and size of building in that particular market. The experience of comparable buildings is also a good source if the building is new or if for some reason you don't have access to its expense history.

[9.10] B. Fair Share

Rent escalation formulas, whether tied to direct operating expenses or to an index (see the next section), should limit the tenant's obligation to pay a fair share of a building's total costs. Usually this means that a tenant will be responsible for expenses in proportion to how much of the building it leases.

Watch out. Some leases make the building's "rented" area (rather than "rentable" area) the denominator in the fraction. This means that the tenant, not the landlord, would pay operating expenses for the building's vacant areas. If the landlord adds floors or converts storage or basement space to office space (thereby adding to the rentable area), the fraction used to determine the tenant's share of the building's expenses should reflect this. Bear in mind that landlords sometimes "re-measure" buildings during the course of a given lease term—as other leases come due. Therefore, at any given time, the landlord may be using more than one measuring standard at a single building. Because of this, it's sometimes helpful to specify during lease negotiations that all tenant shares must add up to no more than 100%, and that building ownership may not collect more than 100% of actual operating expenses.

And be alert for clauses that don't clearly spell out how the landlord will calculate your client's share of the building's area. In one case involving a ground-floor tenant whose lease did not contain a formula, a Pennsylvania court decided that the tenant should pay escalations in the same proportion as its rent to the total rent roll.³ A bad deal for the tenant. Ground-floor space often costs more than double the cost-per-square-foot of office space on upper floors, but ground-floor tenants get no more services.

[9.11] C. Indexing the Rent

As an alternative to a complex operating expense clause, some landlords index their rents. This lets landlords keep their books private. It also saves tenants from a costly, time-consuming review of expenses that may produce legitimate disagreement.

But be wary. There are a variety of indices, with many subtle variations, in common use and their behavior can vary substantially. It's surprisingly common for even large, sophisticated companies to be hit by higher rent escalations than they anticipated. In 1969, for instance, Avon Products signed a 27-year lease for nearly half of a 50-story tower in Manhattan. Avon's rent increases were tied to the "porter's wage"—hourly wage and fringe benefits hikes that certain employees receive under a union contract. Because the contract calculated fringe benefits on a weekly or yearly basis, Avon's landlord, Sheldon Solow, had to translate these fringe benefits into an hourly rate.

For 10 years, Solow assumed, for the purpose of his calculations, that the union employees worked a 40-hour week. But in 1980, Solow notified Avon that he was revising his calculations to base them on the actual hours employees worked—31 hours a week. The effect on Avon was dramatic: its rent would jump $780,000 a year, more than $13.5 million over the remaining life of the lease.

In 1981, Avon sued Solow over the increase, but the case was tossed out. The judge ruled that the lease required the parties to settle by arbitration. This triggered procedural skirmishes and arbitration proceedings that continued—with the help of very costly counsel—for about a dozen years. In two proceedings alone, the litigation produced more than 5,000 pages—10 volumes of material. The matter was ultimately settled in a confidential arbitration.

Any tenant is going to feel a loss after years of litigating and arbitrating what should be a straightforward agreement to maintain space for its business operations. Above all, this shows the need to understand the potential effects of escalation formulas and the high cost of ambiguity. Consult closely with the tenant's real estate advisor to gain a complete understanding of the nuances of escalation formulas which building owners may propose. Be skeptical if anyone tells you such indexed escalation formulas are simple. One way to help your client avoid a predicament like Avon's is to include a sample calculation in the lease.⁴

The most common escalation formulas link rent increases to the Consumer Price Index. The CPI measures the cost of food, clothing, recreation, residential rents, and other goods and services, but has no component relating to commercial rents. The components of an index like this may increase far more than the general inflation rate or the cost of running a building.

4 Avon Prods., Inc. v. Solow, 150 A.D.2d 236, 541 N.Y.S.2d 406 (1st Dep't 1989).

The CPI-W, a national index, covers only urban wage earners and clerical workers. The CPI-U covers all urban consumers. The CPI-U is generally favored as an index for rent escalation because it covers about twice as many people and is less volatile.

If your city is covered by one of the 27 metropolitan or regional CPI indices, your client's prospective landlord may propose linking the rent to a local index, rather than to the more general CPI-U. But the regional CPIs are generally published less frequently, based on smaller samples, much more volatile and, depending on the local economy, may fluctuate in ways entirely unrelated to the cost of running a building.

Another common gauge, the Producer Price Index, is also highly volatile. It measures changes in large quantities of certain commodities at the wholesale level. During the 1970s, when metals and petroleum products made the index rise dramatically, landlords benefitted from the index. One group of Florida tenants sued their landlord, claiming that the use of this index was unconscionable. The court turned them away.⁵

A New York City tenant sued its landlord with a similar argument. It claimed that its rent increases, linked to a local union contract rather than the landlord's actual costs, were so high that the court should rewrite the lease. The court declined, stating that indexing is a common method of increasing rents, and that the tenant assumed the risk it now sought to avoid after the fact.⁶ It is perhaps worth noting that courts continue, overwhelmingly, to adhere to this long-standing principle. The Backer case cited above has been followed in five cases, cited in 204 court decisions, and another 38 statutes, law review articles, ALR annotations and treatises. The message is clear. Tenants should be well advised when negotiating escalation formulas and other non-rent increases. Courts generally insist that parties adhere to the bargains they negotiated.

[9.12] D. Overlapping Escalation Formulas

If your client's landlord indexes base rent in addition to passing through certain operating expenses like fuel, electricity, and real estate taxes, you should negotiate for a partial-CPI, porter's wage formula, or other indexed increase. Otherwise, your client will pay twice for those increases.

5 Sea Tower Apts., Inc. v. Century Nat'l Bank, 406 So. 2d 69 (Fla. Dist. Ct. App. 1981).

6 George Backer Mgmt. Corp. v. Acme Quilting Co., Inc., 46 N.Y.2d 211, 413 N.Y.S.2d 135 (1978).

[9.13] E. Disappearing Indices

The CPI has been “re-based” several times over the years, and its components have changed. Several regional CPI indices in common use have been eliminated. The porter’s wage clause, linked to a New York City labor contract, has seen significant changes in composition as categories of workers have been added and eliminated. All these changes can significantly and unexpectedly affect the amount of rent your client pays. One corporate tenant agreed to a CPI increase linked to a Washington, D.C.-area index. The Bureau of Labor Statistics eliminated that index during the term of the tenant’s lease and building ownership proposed to substitute a newly created regional index covering a larger and economically different geographic area. The use of this new index instead of a national index threatened to significantly increase the tenant’s escalation bills. When your client agrees to link rent increases to an index, plan ahead for an alternative and preserve for your client a right to veto a new or changed index which may be inappropriate.

[9.14] V. REAL ESTATE TAXES

In general, real estate taxes are the landlord’s legal responsibility; a tenant becomes liable only for the taxes that it specifically agrees to pay as a result of lease negotiations. Like the operating expense clause, however, a real estate tax clause can be used as a catch-all to cover additional charges. Help your client control occupancy costs by limiting what building ownership may include in billable real estate taxes.

First, limit your client’s obligations to (1) real estate taxes, or (2) taxes a community may impose instead of real estate taxes. A lease should protect your client from paying a landlord’s income taxes, corporate taxes, taxes on rents and gross receipts, inheritance taxes, capital gains taxes, and payroll taxes. Be careful about language that tries to make your client responsible for undefined taxes that a government authority might impose some time. One tenant who failed to do this many years ago wound up paying its landlord’s income taxes after the Sixteenth Amendment initiated them.⁷ New taxes are constantly being proposed—Hartford, Connecticut once considered imposing a “view tax” on office buildings near the Capitol building—this is the kind of thing your clients will thank you for helping them avoid. Taxes related to income or the value of an asset, which may be substituted for real estate taxes, require special consideration. For instance, during the 2006 legislative session, Texas amended its property tax code to include franchise taxes as a substitute for real estate taxes formerly billed. This could subject tenants to tax on items which have no relationship to ad valorem taxes or the building where they are located. In such a situation, it's wise to negotiate a limitation so that, for purposes of the lease, any such franchise tax must be calculated as if the building where the tenant is located is the landlord's sole asset.

Pay attention to special assessments to see if building ownership proposes to include them in billable real estate taxes—charges for new sidewalks, new sewer lines, and so on. These are a species of capital improvement and courts have told landlords repeatedly that special assessments aren't real estate taxes. While including such special assessments as part of defined, billable real estate taxes has become common, whether this is appropriate must be assessed at each building or in each locality where your client is considering a lease. Work closely with your client's real estate advisor on this one. If known or reasonably anticipated special assessments would add significantly to your client's rent, it may be appropriate to exclude them, limit them, or move on to a different location. Special assessments which your client may agree to include should always be limited, and building ownership should be required to pay for them over the longest time permitted by law. Otherwise, by paying assessments as part of its tax bill, your client is giving the landlord more than it bargained for.

Landlords in some areas seek to bill Business Improvement District (BID) fees as part of real estate taxes. BID fees are not real estate taxes, and this can be a back-door way of including capital expenditures, promotional programs, and executive salaries in the rent. These would be excluded by well-negotiated operating expense terms. Other problems arise when BID fees are instituted during the course of a lease. Aside from the fact that they are not taxes, they are not in your client's base year, so the "increase" is actually 100% of the cost, and occupancy costs become excessive and markedly uncompetitive compared to what other tenants are paying.

In some situations, a building owner will contest high taxes to enhance the property's value. Make sure the lease your client signs entitles it to the benefit of any tax reduction building ownership or other tenants may gain after they've recouped their expenses.

[9.15] VI. ALTERATIONS, MAINTENANCE, AND REPAIR

[9.16] A. Alterations

The building owner's proposed alterations-and-improvements clause may give your client a false sense of security. It may say that your client can make whatever non-structural changes it likes and that it may also make structural changes, provided only that the tenant first obtain the landlord's permission, and that the landlord will be "reasonable." But courts have ruled that things as trivial as lighting fixtures are "structural" components of a building. So a seemingly liberal clause like this could make it impossible for a tenant to move even a single partition.

If your client and building ownership disagree about what's structural, after your client has made a "non-structural" change, the landlord may declare your client in default under the lease, even though the changes seemed quite reasonable to your client and necessary for its operations. In such a situation, the tenant may be presented with the unpleasant option of paying a big bill at the end of the lease term or restoring so-called structural changes.

With this type of lease structure, define what is meant by structural elements. Limit the definition to components like bearing walls, columns, roof, and facade. And negotiate for the client to have the right to make alterations and improvements inside its space, without the landlord's permission, so long as these changes don't affect the few agreed-upon structural elements or the systems that deliver electricity and utilities to other tenants in the building.

The procedures that govern alterations and improvements also have a substantial effect on your client's costs and ability to use their space effectively. Most leases require a tenant to submit plans and specifications for landlord's review before proceeding with alterations. Limit the time for review to a reasonable period, and negotiate to require that any rejection of the tenant's plans and specifications be accompanied by a written explanation. Negotiate an adequate remedy; if ownership fails to meet the agreed-upon time limits or provide a reasonably detailed explanation of any rejection, tenant's plans will be deemed approved. An open-ended procedure can be extremely costly to a tenant, both in increased construction costs and impediments to business operations. The time to avoid these problems is when you are negotiating the lease. Another way a landlord can significantly increase your client's cost of alterations and limit its business flexibility is by limiting the contractors that may be used. Always insist that your client have the right to competitively bid all trades. One acceptable way to achieve this (when a landlord insists upon some measure of control for safety, insurance, or quality reasons) is to insist upon your client's being able to choose from a selection of contractors for each trade who are not affiliated with the landlord.

Also be aware that many landlords will object to allowing a tenant to choose its own contractors because (they say) they are concerned about labor harmony. There is no need for a tenant to give up important rights to control costs and achieve accountability for this reason. Increasingly, even in strongly union-oriented markets, construction jobs are run on an open-shop basis with union and non-union trades working side by side. The key here is often a strong, effective general contractor. Work closely with your tenant's real estate advisor on this issue, as well. Effective negotiation of the alterations-and-improvements component of a lease can reduce tenant build-out costs by as much as 30%.

[9.17] B. Maintenance

In a typical multi-tenant office building, the landlord will be responsible for repairing certain listed items—usually structural elements, the exterior, and parts of the building's common areas. Your client will be responsible for maintaining and repairing everything in its space.

What happens when something outside the tenant's space has to be repaired and isn't among the items that building ownership promised to take care of? Your client may have to pay for the repairs. Whether it pays or suffers the consequences of disrepair, your client may have no recourse to the landlord, even if the problem makes the space unusable.

The best remedy: Make sure your client's responsibilities are specified and limited. The landlord should be obligated to take care of everything that your client is not.

[9.18] C. Wear and Tear

A well-negotiated lease should at least stipulate that your client is not responsible for repairing normal wear and tear. Some landlords require tenants to "restore" their leased space when they leave. Advise your client against agreeing to such an arrangement. Since almost every tenant has needs that require modification of the space it moves into and building ownership will have to demolish the old installation and rebuild to attract a new tenant, agreeing to restore the space simply obligates your client to bear costs that building ownership must normally incur.

[9.19] VII. CASUALTIES AND CATASTROPHES

[9.20] A. Casualties

Many leases have clauses allowing the landlord to terminate the lease after a minor casualty affecting the building, even though your client's space remains quite usable. This clause gives the landlord an opportunity to force tenants out in a rising market or to force tenants to renegotiate unrelated parts of their leases before it will agree to restore the damage. It also exposes your tenant to a loss of its improvements and the value of the lease if the landlord's lender refuses to allow insurance proceeds to be used for rebuilding after such a casualty.

Negotiate your client's lease to ensure that the building owner is obligated to restore the building and your client's space after a casualty if the work can be done in a reasonable time. Work closely with your client's real estate advisor to determine a reasonable time for restoring the space given the nature of the installation, the needs of the operation, and customary build-out times in the marketplace. Your client should have the right to walk if the damage is so severe that the space can't be restored at all, or within a time that's reasonable, given its business needs. Without this right, your client could be compelled to wait for an unreasonable period as ownership debates whether to (or attempts to) restore the space, and could ultimately have to continue paying rent even though it has leased other space.

A doctor in Suffolk County, New York, signed an eight-year lease for office space. Less than a year later, the building burned down. The landlord sued to keep collecting rent and won, even though he had no obligation to repair the building. New York law would have protected the doctor against this kind of thing, but the lease contained a clause providing that rent wouldn't abate and that his responsibility under the lease would continue even if a casualty destroyed the building. In effect, the doctor signed away his legal rights.⁸ Dr. Nachamie argued that forcing him to pay rent on space he couldn't use was unconscionable, but this and subsequent courts have routinely rejected such arguments. The tenant had many choices available to him when he signed the lease. After signing, he would have to live with the bargain he had made.

To protect your client against a casualty, it's also essential to ensure that the landlord will have enough money on hand to restore the property. Negotiate to require the landlord to carry adequate insurance and to assure that insurance proceeds must be used first to restore damage and not to pay down mortgages or other debt.

[9.21] B. Other Catastrophes—Off-Site Events

Casualties traditionally include events like fires, floods, hurricanes and the like, and assume at least some physical damage to your client's building if not their premises. In addition to casualties, off-site events which have no direct physical impact on your client's building or premises can wreak financial havoc, and leave your client obligated to pay rent on space that they cannot use or sometimes even access. Typical examples of such off-premises events include malfunction of a utility company's transformers or other equipment so that your client's space has no service, e.g., the blackout that incapacitated much of the East Coast of the United States in August 2004, water main breaks off-premises that result in loss of water and plumbing services to a tenant's premises, and events that curtail access to buildings, such as those in New Orleans that could not be entered after Hurricane Katrina, even though they were physically unharmed, because the entire surrounding area had been declared off-limits by local authorities.

To protect your client against excessive real-estate related costs from such events, it's important to define the concept of essential services and provide remedies if your client's space will be without essential services for any prolonged period—whether or not such cessation results from a casualty.

[9.22] VIII. ESCAPES AND EXTENSIONS

If the lease your client's prospective landlord proposes says nothing about subleasing or assignments, your client is free to do either. This, however, would be a rare find in almost any U.S. market. Even in the case of long-term, single-occupant, net lease, landlords typically try to restrict a tenant's sublease rights. Most landlords are acutely aware of the profit potential subleasing and assignment may offer a tenant. Usually, they're also concerned about controlling the character and quality of tenants in their buildings. Often a landlord's proposed lease flatly prohibits a tenant from assigning or subleasing its space. In a variation that is little better, unless well negotiated, landlords will permit subleasing or assigning only with their consent, and they'll agree to be "reasonable."

[9.23] A. Subleasing

Flexibility could be crucial to your client's business in a changing and competitive business environment. Unless your client leases a tiny space or takes a very short lease-term—less than three years, for instance—negotiate for your client the right to sublease part of its space without the landlord's approval. This allows a tenant to warehouse unneeded space but gives it the option of easily regaining the space from the subtenant.

In a very common approach to subleasing, the landlord's draft lease requires ownership's consent before a tenant may sublease and provides that the landlord must be "reasonable." Define what this means. Companies interested in subleasing space are often looking for a quick, ready-to-go solution to their space needs. Prospective subtenants probably won't wait while your client wrangles with the landlord over the terms under which it can sublease, nor do subtenants wish to walk into an adversarial situation. They will just move on to other choices. Accordingly, the landlord's rejection of prospective subtenants should be for limited, objective reasons—like financial inability to handle sublease payments (a common component of "reasonableness," though arguably irrelevant) or a use inconsistent with that of other tenants in the building. Also limit the landlord's time to decide on any proposed subtenant. A "yes" that comes too late will cost your client a subtenant as surely as a "no."

Whether your client is required to turn over 100% of sublease profits or only a portion, define sublease profits to make sure it can recover expenses before any so-called profit must be paid. A tenant must be able to deduct from rents it receives any expenses like advertising, brokerage commissions, the cost of negotiating and drafting the lease, and concessions like free rent, carpeting, and painting—as well as the unamortized cost of its own improvements in the subleased space. Work with the tenant's real estate advisor to ensure that you have a full picture of expenses your client may incur, based on the nature of its operations and the building where it intends to locate.

Also negotiate the right for your client to deduct rent paid while the space sits vacant as it tries to sublease it. A tenant that is obligated to share sublease profits should agree to pay the landlord only when and if it actually receives income. If the subtenant defaults, leaving your client without a promised income stream, your client won't want to be obligated to pay illusory profit to building ownership. For the same reason, negotiate a right for your client to recover expenses in full before "profits" are paid. Your client incurred all expenses up front and should be able to recover them in this manner.

Some landlords will insist on the right to take back space your client may want to sublease at some time during the lease term. This allows a landlord to regain desirable space in a rising market and rent the space out itself, perhaps negotiating a longer term with another tenant. If your client agrees to a lease term like this, make sure the landlord is limited to taking back only the space your client wants to sublease, not the entire premises, and only for the time that your client wants to sublease it.

Make sure, too, that if the landlord recaptures space for whatever benefit it wishes to enjoy—100% of the profit or other advantage—the landlord pays all the costs associated with the recaptured space, including brokerage commissions that may be due from your client and costs of demising or altering the space. Be aware that if you agree to a recapture provision and ownership will not pay brokerage commissions on space it takes back, your client will be left with a large expense and no opportunity to recover it.

If your client's operations are in any way regulated, be sure to allow for this in negotiating sublease rights. For instance, if certain activities can only be performed by licensed professionals or a specifically licensed entity, provide that your client can sublease a designated portion of its space—10%, 20%, or whatever might be appropriate—to such an entity without landlord approval and without any of the restrictions or obligations that might otherwise accompany a sublease.

[9.24] B. Assignment

Protect your clients especially from leases that flatly prohibit assignments or give a prospective landlord unfettered discretion to prohibit one. In many cases, a merger or acquisition will result in an assignment when the lease is transferred to a new legal entity. This means your client could be in technical default, and it could enable the landlord to force your client out of the space—especially in a rising market, or if the preferred use for this type of space has changed.

The landlord also may try to impose capitalization requirements on an assignee—demanding, for example, that any potential merger partner have assets at least equal to those of your client. Yet, in a merger, your client may not be in control. We can all think of recent mergers or acquisitions when the acquirer was smaller than the company it acquired. Similarly, building ownership may seek to impose a requirement that any subsidiary to which your client assigns its lease have assets as solid as those of the original tenant. But subsidiaries are seldom as well-endowed as their parent companies. A clause like this seriously hampers your client's business flexibility, especially if the landlord requires it to remain primarily liable even after the assignment.

Make sure your client can assign to any subsidiary or affiliate as long as it owns at least 33.33%; your client will be safest if it negotiates a deal with no capitalization restrictions on companies with which it may merge. If management anticipates that your client may be an acquisition target—e.g., a young, fast-growing company—it can preserve its flexibility by retaining the right to assign the lease to any acquiring company that meets only minimum capitalization requirements (e.g., that it have a net worth at least equal to your client's at the date the lease was first signed).

[9.25] C. Renewals

An extension option can be valuable. Economics aside, it ensures that your client can continue operating its business, uninterrupted, at the same location for more than a short three, five, or ten years. If your client agrees to a fixed rent during the renewal term, both it and the landlord are gambling on a future market. For this reason, leases frequently include a formula—usually tied to the fair market rate—to determine rent during the extended term.

The fair market rate depends on many individual considerations, like a tenant's credit rating (for instance, IBM will probably get a greater discount than a two-year startup because the landlord's risk is lower), the formula for calculating operating expenses, and the lease term. If your client agrees to a fair market value renewal option, specify factors that would be especially important in the client's situation. This is another area where close coordination with the tenant's real estate advisor is required. Moreover, insist that the space be valued for use as office space, lab space, etc., depending on your client's current and anticipated uses, even if those are not its "highest and best" uses at renewal time.

Quite a few leases don't require the landlord to commit to the renewal term rental rate until after the term has started. Though the mechanism for determining the renewal rate may be clear, most tenants do not want to commit to paying for space unless they know the cost in advance. Structure a renewal mechanism so that building ownership is obligated to specify a firm rate far enough in advance so that your client can effectively shop for alternatives. Otherwise, your client gives up leverage essential to help ensure it a fair renewal rate. An ambiguous arrangement or one which pushes key decisions close to your client's lease expiration date has another hidden cost if it does decide to move: Your client may have to pay steep holdover rates—one-and-a-half to two times or more than the normal rent while it shops for new quarters.

Be sure that your client understands that a holdover clause—with its specified rental rate—should not be used as a backdoor lease extension. A 2006 New York case showed how costly this can be.⁹ A well-known apparel company leased space in a prestigious office building under a long-term lease. This tenant had no right to extend its lease term. Rather, at the end of the term, this space would become the premises of another tenant in the building who had negotiated a right to expand. At the end of its lease term, the apparel company refused to move out. After a protracted dispute with the landlord, the apparel company was finally compelled to leave, but the incoming tenant had suffered a delay of many months. This tenant sued on a theory of trespass, seeking damages for its losses and prevailed. The apparel tenant became liable to both the landlord and the incoming tenant.

So, whatever you do, specify the essential terms of your client's extension option. Don't postpone the decision with a vague lease clause that "agrees to agree." This invites costly litigation and could leave your client with no office space—and costly bills.

[9.26] IX. DISPUTE RESOLUTION

Landlords' proposed leases often include a clause saying that in a dispute about such items as operating costs, electricity, and real estate taxes, the tenant must pay whatever ownership has billed, but can take the landlord to court. This is a bad idea for your clients. It gives them nothing they did not have already, and the landlord has no incentive to settle. Time-consuming and costly litigation may leave a tenant with no answer for years. Meanwhile, the landlord has your client's money even if the court eventually rules in favor of your client.

⁹ Kronish Lieb Weiner & Hellman, LLP v. Tahari, Ltd., 11 Misc. 3d 1057(A), 815 N.Y.S.2d 494 (Sup. Ct. N.Y. Co. 2006).

Provide for dispute resolution in the lease. Here are a few guiding principles:

- Arbitration may be the best method to resolve disputes like disagreement over the fair market rent or whether a tenant's use of space has caused more damage than normal wear and tear. Real estate experts are more qualified than the lay public to say who's right. Depending on the nature of your client's lease and operations and the issues likely to arise, it may be prudent to specify private arbitration with defined time periods for each action, the qualification for arbitrators, how costs will be allocated, and fallback measures if one party does not comply. This can lead to fast, low-cost resolution of many items. It may be appropriate to specify more than one type of arbitration proceeding depending on the issues that may arise.
- In certain disputes, the tenant should have the right to withhold operating expenses—for instance, if the landlord fails to provide essential utilities or repair services.
- The tenant should have convenient access to documentation supporting the landlord's bills and should be given reasonable time to audit the operating expenses. An independent CPA, not the landlord's nephew, should prepare the statement, or the statement should be verified by one of the landlord's officers, and the tenant should be free to select the advisor of its choice to review this documentation. Don't agree to terms that limit your client to using a CPA or someone approved by the landlord.
- The landlord should share certain audit costs with the tenant.
- If it prevails in a dispute, the tenant should get a prompt refund with interest, plus reimbursement for out-of-pocket expenses and attorney fees.
- An obvious but essential reminder: Once you agree on a way to resolve disputes, follow the procedure to the letter. Paine, Webber, Jackson & Curtis, Inc.—the financial services company that was UBS Paine-Webber's predecessor—took its landlord to court over a dispute about operating expenses, but the case was tossed out by a judge without even a hearing. The company had neglected to start the proceeding within 30 days, as its lease required.¹⁰

[9.27] X. NEGOTIATING THE WORKLETTER

When a tenant seeks a build-to-suit office or a turnkey interior installation, the landlord is responsible for building out the space.

[9.28] A. The Build-out Workletter

The workletter, which provides for the build-out, may be a separate contract that sets out rights and liabilities for finishing off a building's interior space before the tenant moves in. Whether separate or included in the body of the lease, it describes a unique relationship between landlord and tenant during the initial build-out. It covers installation of interior walls, fixtures, flooring—all the finishing work—and provides a timetable for completion. It must also specify what the landlord is obligated to provide—base building work—regardless of any agreement about tenant improvements.

Build-out costs often exceed budget because of delays. Many landlords propose workletters that recognize two kinds of delay: “tenant-caused delay” and “force majeure,” or excusable delay. With tenant delays your client pays, usually by reimbursing the landlord for extra out-of-pocket costs and by paying rent even before it can move into the space. But many landlords, concerned about their expenses, try to make tenants responsible for delays they can't control. Similarly, landlords may penalize tenants for delays that are actually part of the normal back-and-forth required to get everyone to sign off on working drawings or unit prices, or that arise because of field conditions.

To protect your client, check the definition of tenant-caused delay. It should cover only those situations your client can control. Work with your client's real estate advisor and make sure the workletter includes a realistic schedule for producing and reviewing drawings, bidding out the work, and so on. If your client's build-out requires so-called long-lead items, allow for these in the schedule—don't allow them to be the basis for billing your client extra charges. And make sure that if there are delays, your client pays only for delays that affect a project's critical path—the schedule of dates that tells the landlord when each task must be finished so that it doesn't interfere with any other.

In addition, require that the workletter your client agrees to allows enough time to review design drawings and other documents it must approve. A landlord's delay in delivering the documents shouldn't cut into your client's allotted time.

Force majeure, or excusable delay, is supposed to cover events the landlord can't control: flood, strikes, hurricane. Be sure that it applies only to those few situations for which the landlord can't reasonably be held responsible. Otherwise, this becomes a catch-all that excuses the landlord from managing the work your client has hired it to do.

What happens to your client if building ownership suffers from an excusable delay? Landlords normally propose that no matter how long the delay, or how much it costs the tenant to make alternative arrangements, the tenant can't break the contract. They propose only to delay the date when a tenant starts paying rent. In other words, your client has to wait around. But every tenant needs assurance that its business will continue with minimal interruption. Protect your client by negotiating for additional free rent for every day that the landlord delays beyond a certain point. This creates real incentive for building ownership to perform in a timely way. The ultimate protection your client requires is a specific walk date. Except for delays your tenant causes, if the space isn't ready after a reasonable time, it needs the right to terminate the lease and go elsewhere—without having to pay rent on two leases.

[9.29] B. Interior Allowance and Fit-up

Whether or not the landlord built the space, tenants often get an interiors allowance for the initial fit-up work: Landlords provide a credit of so many dollars per square foot or they provide certain standard items like electrical outlets, doors, latchsets, lighting fixtures, plasterboard, and carpet.

Most tenants prefer better quality or simply need something other than the building standard. But unless you negotiate it, the lease may permit no credit for items your client doesn't want.

The tenant portion of fit-up can quickly reach $55 or $70 per square foot for interiors that aren't lavish. Tenants with more technical requirements (e.g., any type of raised floor, trading rooms, laboratories, or clean rooms) can easily incur costs in the $150 to $300 per square foot range. So refuse any clause that would oblige your client to use the landlord's resident or otherwise preferred contractors. It's essential that your client retain control over costs and accountability by bidding out work to several independent general contractors.

Make sure that your client understands and has thought through precisely how the lease distinguishes between "base building," which the landlord pays for, and tenant work, which your client pays for. Otherwise, your client may find it's obligated to pay for expensive wiring, duct work, removing hazardous materials or relocating utilities, etc., it hadn't planned on.

Be aware, too, that many times workletter issues are resolved relatively late in the lease-negotiation process—when both landlord and tenant are comfortable enough with other aspects of the deal structure that they are willing to invest in architectural and engineering time to explore and resolve these nitty-gritty issues unique to tenant build-out. As more data about build-out costs becomes available, what looked like a low-cost option may turn into the high-priced alternative, and your client may need to move on to an alternative location.

Shield your client from obligations to demolish existing space. As outsiders, your client and its advisors can't know what expensive obligations may lurk behind drywall or above a dropped ceiling. Even if your client accepts space "as is," it needs to protect itself against the cost of asbestos removal and compliance with existing laws such as the ADA or fire-safety codes. To best address these issues, work with your client's real estate advisor to understand particular cost risks associated with a given space—e.g., spalling concrete, slab-related issues, functionally obsolete HVAC equipment, etc.

It's also important to pay attention to mold as your client considers its build-out obligations. Mold may accumulate almost anywhere water does, and unwary tenants who accept space "as is" may find themselves saddled with mold in wall cavities or above ceilings when they start to build their premises. Because of the costs associated with removing mold, many landlords explicitly shift this obligation out of base-building work, where it would traditionally lie, onto tenants—often with extensive lease language that obligates the tenant to remediate.

The workletter allowance is an important economic term, so be sure your client has adequate time to use the funds. Some landlords propose that funds be forfeited if not used within a short time. Always insist upon reasonable procedures for securing landlord approval of tenant drawings and reimbursement of tenant expenses.

[9.30] XI. CONCLUSION

As part of your clients' real estate team, you can help them achieve a major business objective—controlling and reducing real estate costs. Do this by understanding and eliminating hidden lease costs.

CHAPTER TEN

MODEL MEMORANDUM OF LEASE

Joshua Stein, Esq.

This chapter offers a sample Memorandum of Lease (the “Memorandum”), which the parties to a Lease can record to give constructive notice of their Lease, without recording the whole document.¹ This document is designed for use in New York. In any other state consult local counsel for state-specific problems, issues and requirements.

[10.0] I. COMMENTS FOR THE USER

[10.1] A. Must We?

These cover notes and the following model amply demonstrate that a Memorandum can require some thought and raise issues. Before going to the trouble, the parties—particularly Landlord—should first ask themselves whether they really need a Memorandum or should perhaps not bother. Landlords in particular may hesitate to burden their record title with documents that may become irrelevant, and future title problems, over time. That discussion lies outside the scope of these cover notes. As a general practice, however, a Memorandum is atypical for most routine New York leases, excluding: (a) ground leases; (b) very large space leases; or (c) leases with substantial delayed delivery obligations or where the tenant will spend extraordinary sums to fixturate the space before taking possession. If the parties record a nondisturbance agreement, joined in by landlord, referring to the lease, this may provide a limited and temporary substitute to recording a Memorandum.

[10.2] B. Term of Lease

The governing statute (RPL § 291-c) states that a Memorandum may be recorded for any lease “for a term exceeding three years.” This conforms to RPL § 291, the general recording statute, which allows the parties to record a lease (as opposed to a Memorandum) only if the term exceeds three years.

[10.3] C. Execution Requirements

A Memorandum must be executed by the parties and acknowledged as necessary for a conveyance to be recorded.²

1 See New York Real Property Law § 291-c (RPL).

2 See RPL § 291-c.

[10.4] D. Addresses

Addresses for the parties in the Memorandum must conform to those in the Lease.³

[10.5] E. Lease or Sublease

This model Memorandum works for either a Lease or a Sublease. For a Sublease, confirm that a correct memorandum of the underlying master lease has been recorded. Include its recording information in this Memorandum. Change “Lease” to “Sublease” except, of course, in the context of “Master Lease.” Replace the recital about Landlord’s ownership with a recital like this one:

A. Landlord’s Leasehold Estate. Landlord has leased from _____, a _____ whose address is _____ (“Master Landlord”) the real property described in Exhibit A (“Landlord’s Premises”) under the _____ Lease dated _____ (as amended, modified, or extended from time to time, the “Master Lease”). A memorandum of the Master Lease dated _____ [is to be recorded prior to this Memorandum] [OR] [was recorded at Reel _____, Page _____ on _____, 20__] in the Official Records of _____ County, New York.

Under such circumstances, in defining the “Lease” identified in the Memorandum (under these facts really a sublease), the parties may want to add language like this:

Although the Lease is denominated as a “_____,” the Lease is a sublease, by which Landlord subleases to Tenant only Tenant’s Premises, constituting only part of Landlord’s Premises as demised to Landlord under the Master Lease.

When this Memorandum is being used for a sublease, all the same issues apply—both as between sublandlord and subtenant and, sometimes, for protection of Master Landlord. For simplicity, however, these cover notes do not otherwise mention subleases or master landlords. If this Memorandum is being used for a sublease, consider the need for non-disturbance assurances from Master Landlord.⁴

3 See RPL § 291-c.

[10.6] F. Purchase Options

If the Lease contains a purchase option, disclose it of record in a separate memorandum of contract under RPL § 294. This may mitigate mortgage recording tax issues, but not necessarily. Purchase options also raise transfer tax issues.

[10.7] G. Brackets

Options and comments for the user appear in brackets.

[10.8] H. Nonstandard Provisions

Some leasing transactions, particularly ground leases, may justify adding certain additional nonstandard provisions to a Memorandum. This Model Document collects some such provisions after the exhibits, with comments in footnotes. Whenever these provisions are appropriate for a particular transaction, they should be edited and tailored as necessary to conform to the larger terms of the particular transaction. The drafter can otherwise usually ignore them.

[10.9] II. OTHER DOCUMENTATION

A Memorandum raises the following concerns about other documentation, including items and exhibits that the parties should attach to this document.

[10.10] A. Defined Terms

This Memorandum assumes, particularly in optional provisions, that the Lease defines certain terms. Confirm and conform as needed. Anything essential to this instrument should appear within the four corners of this instrument, and not be incorporated by reference from the Lease. This model Memorandum calls for all essential information, and that information should be provided here, instead of relying on a cross-reference to the Lease.

⁴ Some object to using the word “nondisturbance” to refer to preservation of a subtenant’s rights after a master lease terminates. They argue that the right word is “recognition.” The writer disagrees and thinks “nondisturbance” is a perfectly appropriate word and the two words are interchangeable.

[10.11] B. Exhibit A: Landlord's Premises

Attach as Exhibit A a legal description of Landlord's overall premises—not just the part being leased to Tenant. If the Memorandum discloses restrictions or burdens that affect any other real property Landlord owns, identify that other real property as well. (Check that Landlord and not an affiliate owns it, too!)

[10.12] C. Exhibit B: Tenant's Premises

The Memorandum must include a description of Tenant's premises in the same form contained in the Lease. Therefore the Memorandum must include any legal description or diagram that appears in the Lease.⁵

The cover page must include block and lot (and, in New York City, street address) to allow proper indexing.

[10.14] E. Nondisturbance

Tenant should consider the need for nondisturbance assurances from mortgagees. A Tenant would prefer to record any nondisturbance agreement, or at a minimum refer to it in this Memorandum and have the non-disturbing party join in this Memorandum. Tenant may also want to consider the implications of a bankruptcy affecting the nondisturbing party. For more on nondisturbance issues, see chapters 48–50.

[10.15] F. Title Insurance

Tenant should consider leasehold title insurance. To the extent that the Lease includes an option to purchase, or otherwise contemplates future transactions, try to obtain the title company's commitment today to issue a future policy at a reduced rate.

[10.16] G. Release of Memorandum

Landlord may want Tenant to sign a Release of Memorandum of Lease (the "Release") to go in escrow when the Memorandum is recorded. If the Memorandum were later to impair inappropriately Landlord's title and Tenant were unavailable or uncooperative, Landlord might solve the problem by recording the Release. Such arrangements are by no means "market standard.” They seem likely to add much value, because: (a) the Release will probably get lost; (b) if a dispute arises, Tenant will seek injunctive relief against Landlord anyway; and (c) they incur a genuine present dollar cost today, in the form of preparing a suitable Release and negotiating an escrow arrangement.

[10.17] H. Recording Requirements

When a Memorandum is recorded, the clerk will require New York City and State Transfer Tax Returns and a $25 check for the privilege of filing them. In Bronx, Brooklyn, Manhattan and Queens counties, these documents and a few others must be prepared online. Similar requirements are starting to spread to other counties. Certain leases incur a transfer tax. In those cases, the transfer tax applies as soon as the parties enter into the lease, whether or not they record it. Recordation just gives the recording office a convenient collection mechanism. The clerk will also want to see the Lease (probably an original counterpart), to determine whether the Lease and the Memorandum are subject to the mortgage recording tax.⁶ This tax may apply if, for example, the rent is, in effect, a loan secured by a lien or deferred purchase price. The mortgage recording tax is governed by New York Tax Law §§ 250 et. seq. It is not known how often the clerk determines that a Lease in fact constitutes a mortgage. Mortgage recording tax arises only upon recordation. If a lease is in fact a mortgage but no one records it, then it should incur no mortgage recording tax, though other issues may arise, beyond the scope of this discussion.

[10.18] III. FOLLOWTHROUGH REQUIREMENTS

[10.19] A. Lease Modifications

Any modification to a Lease will not be enforceable against future bona fide purchasers unless notice of the modification has been recorded.⁷ A memorandum of a Lease modification agreement must contain information like that in a Memorandum.⁸ These requirements apply even if a Lease modification relates entirely to issues outside the scope of those covered in the recorded Memorandum. The requirement may sound illogical or unreasonable, but it conforms to the theory and function of the recording system and makes sense. Try to advise the client in writing of this requirement soon after the initial Lease closing. Once a space tenant takes possession, creating constructive notice of its rights, Tenant may prefer to terminate the Memorandum to avoid the risk that the existence of the recorded Memorandum will vitiate future unrecorded modifications. The risk seems low, but if Tenant went to the trouble of recording a Memorandum Tenant presumably worried about maintaining its rights against future grantees; so if Tenant truly cares about that Tenant should care about preserving those rights. A ground tenant and its leasehold mortgagee would typically never want to unrecord the Memorandum.

6 RPL § 291-c.

8 See RPL § 291-cc(2).

[10.20] B. Lease Dates

If the original Memorandum did not disclose the actual Commencement Date or Expiration Date, e.g., because they depend on Landlord's actual delivery date, the parties will need to record a further document to disclose those dates. If they remember, it is a good mechanism to prevent future uncertainties and problems; the recording system effectively becomes a reliable home for a leasing document that often gets lost, the commencement date confirmation.

[10.21] C. Termination or Cancellation

If the parties agree to terminate or cancel the Lease, they should terminate or cancel the Memorandum. Landlord should not release the security deposit until this has occurred.

[10.22] D. Title Policy

If the Lease is insured, typical only for a ground lease, confirm receipt of a satisfactory policy of title insurance.

[10.23] E. Recorded Original

Confirm the Memorandum actually got recorded and indexed. Look for it in the land records. Confirm receipt of the original recorded Memorandum. Keep a copy. Create a paper trail to show where the original went.

MEMORANDUM OF LEASE

This MEMORANDUM OF LEASE (the “Memorandum”) is entered into as of _____, 201__ (the “Effective Date”),⁹ by and between _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (“Landlord”), and _____, a _____, whose address is _____ (“Tenant”). Terms may be used in this Memorandum before being defined.

By executing and recording this Memorandum, Landlord and Tenant give notice of the facts below. Any person taking any interest in Landlord’s Premises, or any other real property subject to this Memorandum, shall do so subject to all documents (including all terms of those documents) and other matters that this Memorandum refers to or discloses.

1. Landlord’s Premises. Landlord owns the real property commonly known as _____ and more particularly described in Exhibit A (“Landlord’s Premises”).

2. Lease. Landlord and Tenant entered into a _____ Lease dated the Effective Date (as amended, modified, renewed or extended from time to time, the “Lease”).

3. Demise of Tenant’s Premises. For good and valuable consideration, Landlord has demised and hereby demises to Tenant [part of] Landlord’s Premises ([that demised part of Landlord’s Premises,]“Tenant’s Premises”), all as the Lease provides.

⁹ If the parties sign and record the Memorandum on a date other than the Effective Date of the Lease, adjust as appropriate.

4. *Description of Tenant's Premises.*¹⁰ A diagram of Tenant's Premises is attached as Exhibit B. The Lease describes Tenant's Premises as follows: "_____" The street address of Tenant's Premises is _____.

5. *Term.*¹¹ The "Commencement Date" of the Lease is _____. The Term of the Lease _____ [began/begins] on the Commencement Date and ends at [11:59 p.m.] on _____, unless terminated sooner under the Lease. Tenant has _____ Option(s) to extend the Term, each Option Term for _____ years. The maximum period for which the Lease may be extended is a total extension period of _____ years. The latest date to which the Lease may be extended by Tenant's exercise of all Options is _____. Tenant must exercise each Option, if at all, in writing no less than _____ calendar months and no more than _____ calendar months before the first day of the corresponding Option Term. The Lease more fully describes Tenant's Options, including conditions and procedures for exercise. The Lease grants Tenant no option or other right to expand, renew, extend or purchase except, or beyond, any such rights (if any) this Memorandum describes, all as the Lease more fully provides.¹²

6. Lien Law Trust Fund. Landlord, in compliance with Lien Law Section 13, covenants that Landlord will receive the consideration for this conveyance and will hold the right to receive that consideration as a trust fund to be applied first to pay the cost of the improvements at the Property for which Landlord is responsible. Landlord will apply that consideration first to the payment of the cost of those improvements before using any part of it for any other purpose.¹³

7. No Effect on Lease. The parties have prepared, signed and acknowledged this Memorandum only for recording purposes. It does not modify, increase, decrease or in any other way affect any party's rights, duties or obligations under the Lease. Landlord and Tenant each has rights, duties and obligations (and conditions to its rights) under the Lease but not

10 Edit this paragraph as appropriate under the circumstances. Leave in and edit all statements relevant to this Lease. The description of Tenant's Premises should track the Lease. The Memorandum should merely identify Tenant's Premises enough so a reader will understand what Tenant's Premises include. Don't further describe Tenant's Premises, such as by specifying square footage. It doesn't help. It could hurt.

11 Same comments as previous footnote. If the dates are not yet determined, disclose the basis for determination and then remember to amend the Memorandum after determination. See cover notes.

12 For expansion options, insert similar descriptions.

13 This should also appear in the Lease itself.

stated here. If the Lease and this Memorandum conflict, the Lease governs. Nothing in this Memorandum constitutes any representation or warranty by either party. To the extent, if any, that the Lease limits anyone's liability, that limitation also applies to any liability under this Memorandum.

8. Successors and Assigns. The Lease and this Memorandum bind and benefit the parties and their successors and assigns. This does not limit any restrictions on assignment or other transfer in the Lease.

9. Termination. This Memorandum shall automatically terminate and be of no force or effect upon any termination of the Lease, including any termination by Landlord upon an Event of Default as the Lease provides.

10. Further Assurances. Each party shall execute, acknowledge (where necessary) and deliver such further documents, and perform such further acts, as are reasonably necessary to achieve the parties' intent as expressed in the Lease and this Memorandum. If the Lease terminates, then Tenant shall execute, acknowledge and deliver such documents as Landlord reasonably requires or as any title insurance, abstract company or institutional lender requires to remove this Memorandum of record.

11. Counterparts. This Memorandum may be executed in counterparts.

IN WITNESS WHEREOF, Landlord and Tenant have executed this Memorandum as of the Effective Date.

NONSTANDARD PROVISIONS

[NOTE: These provisions are all nonstandard (and usually omitted for a typical commercial space lease) but may sometimes make sense, particularly in ground leases. In any case, they may help and should do no harm. None are statutorily required.]

Definition: Fee Estate. The “Fee Estate” means Landlord’s fee simple interest in Landlord’s Premises.¹⁴

*Mechanics’ Liens*¹⁵

Restrictions on Alterations. Under the Lease, Tenant may not authorize or perform any alteration, demolition, design or construction of any improvements in, on, at, for or relating to Landlord’s Premises or any part of it (a “Work of Improvement”). Landlord does not consent to any Work of Improvement.

NOTICE OF NONRESPONSIBILITY. LANDLORD SHALL UNDER NO CIRCUMSTANCE BE RESPONSIBLE OR OBLIGATED TO PAY (AND THE FEE ESTATE SHALL NOT BE SUBJECT TO ANY LIEN) FOR ANY MATERIALS, LABOR, SERVICES OR EQUIPMENT PROVIDED TO TENANT OR ANY CONTRACTOR, SUBCONTRACTOR OR MATERIAL SUPPLIER OF TENANT FOR OR IN CONNECTION WITH ANY WORK OF IMPROVEMENT, OR ANY OTHER “COSTS OF IMPROVEMENT” (AS DEFINED IN THE NEW YORK LIEN LAW) RELATING TO LANDLORD’S PREMISES OR ANY PART OF IT AND DIRECTLY OR INDIRECTLY CAUSED BY ACTS OR OMISSIONS OF TENANT, OR OTHERWISE ACTUALLY OR POTENTIALLY THE BASIS FOR A LIEN UNDER THE NEW YORK LIEN LAW ARISING FROM THE ACTS OR OMISSIONS OF TENANT OR TENANT’S CONTRACTOR, SUBCONTRACTOR OR MATERIAL SUPPLIER OR ANYONE CLAIMING BY OR THROUGH ANY OF THEM OR ON ACCOUNT OF DEALINGS WITH ANY OF THEM (A “LIEN”). THE FEE ESTATE SHALL NOT BE SUBJECT TO ANY LIEN.¹⁶

14 Some of the further provisions of this Memorandum use this term.

15 New York law does not provide for a “disclaimer of responsibility” as contemplated here. California law does, though not necessarily in a Memorandum. Do not assume these provisions will work.

16 Even though this language is EXTREMELY FIERCE, do not assume it will have any effect at all.

Tenant's Exclusive Use. In the Lease, Landlord grants Tenant the exclusive right (Tenant's "Exclusive Use") to sell _____ anywhere within [Landlord's Premises] (Tenant's "Exclusivity Zone"), subject to conditions, restrictions, exclusions and limitations in the Lease. To the extent that any future lease (or amendment of lease) of any premises (except Tenant's Premises) within Tenant's Exclusivity Zone directly or indirectly allows operation of Tenant's Exclusive Uses, that authorization: (a) violates Tenant's exclusive rights under the Lease; and (b) in that event is null, void and of absolutely no force or effect, except to the extent, if any, Tenant's Lease expressly states otherwise.¹⁷

Zoning Lot Waiver. The Lease states that Tenant waives any rights it may have: (a) regarding any transfer of any right to construct "floor area" (as defined in the New York City Zoning Resolution, the "ZR") to or from Landlord's Premises; or (b) to consent to or execute any Declaration of Restrictions (as defined in ZR § 12-10) relating to Landlord's Premises that would cause Landlord's Premises to be merged with or subdivided from any other zoning lot under the ZR or to any document of a similar nature and purpose. That waiver also binds all of Tenant's parties-in-interest. Each party-in-interest agrees to that waiver by accepting its interest in Tenant's Premises. Tenant shall nevertheless deliver, and cause its parties-in-interest to deliver, any document Landlord reasonably requests to confirm and join in that waiver.¹⁸

Restrictions on Subletting. The Lease states that Tenant may not enter into any sublease of any or all Tenant's Premises (a "Sublease") without complying with the Lease, including requirements that any Sublease: (a) needs Landlord's prior written consent; and (b) must contain certain provisions. Any Sublease violating the Lease shall be null, void and of no force or effect and a default under the Lease.

Appointment. In the Lease, Landlord appoints Tenant as Landlord's attorney in fact to _____. Landlord reaffirms that appointment, confirm-

17 Exclusive uses are often quite complicated, with lots of complicated exceptions and nuances. Landlord would probably prefer to place them of record verbatim, to avoid uncertainty in future leasing transactions and the need to share Tenant's Lease with a future tenant or make representations and warranties about what it says.

18 Conform to Lease language.

ing that Tenant holds an agency coupled with an interest on those matters.¹⁹

*Leasehold Mortgages.*²⁰ The Lease contains these provisions, among others, on mortgage(s) that encumber Tenant's estate under the Lease ("Leasehold Mortgages") and their holders ("Leasehold Mortgagees").

Limitations. The Lease limits who may be a Leasehold Mortgagee and the indebtedness a Leasehold Mortgage may secure.

Required Provisions. Any Leasehold Mortgage must contain certain provisions as the Lease states.

New Lease. If the Lease terminates or if Tenant rejects the Lease, Landlord has agreed to enter into a "New Lease," on the same terms as the Lease, with certain persons. Any reference to "New Lease" includes any amendment, modification, renewal or extension of such a lease, subject to any governing restrictions or limitations. Any New Lease shall have the same priority as the Lease and this Memorandum. Any New Lease shall be subject to no lien, covenant, declaration, encumbrance or other interest (including any transfer of unused floor area or development rights; any mortgage encumbering the Fee Estate; and any conveyance by foreclosure or in lieu of foreclosure under any such mortgage) first recorded after this Memorandum (collectively, "Subordinate Claims"). All holders of Subordinate Claims, including their successors and assigns, should take notice that they and their Subordinate Claims will be junior and subordinate not only to the Lease and this Memorandum but also to any New Lease.²¹

Leasehold Mortgagee Rights in Bankruptcy. The Lease states that if it is rejected in a Bankruptcy Proceeding (as defined in the Lease) affecting Landlord, then: (a) Tenant may not treat the Lease as terminated without concurrence of all Leasehold Mortgagees [whose recorded Leasehold Mortgages require that concurrence]; and (b) if Tenant remains in possession of Tenant's Premises, all Lease terms shall remain effective for that continued occupancy, and all Leasehold Mortgages encumbering Tenant's 19 Consider beefing up this paragraph to comply with the technical requirements for a power of attorney. If the Lease contains other appointments of one party as agent for another, consider dealing with them as well.

20 These provisions usually apply only to ground leases. Consider the possible effect of Landlord bankruptcy.

21 The notion of "pre-subordinating" future Subordinate Claims makes a great deal of sense, but no one should assume it will work. Build in a mechanism for Fee Mortgagees to approve future Lease amendments.

estate under the Lease shall remain in full force and effect with the same priority as before rejection.

Restrictions on Amendment, Cancellation, Etc. Neither the Lease, any New Lease nor this Memorandum may be amended, waived, modified, subordinated, released or canceled without written consent by _____.²²

*Transactions Affecting Fee Estate.*²³ The Lease restricts some transactions affecting the Fee Estate, including as follows.

Fee Mortgages. Landlord may grant mortgages encumbering the Fee Estate (each, a “Fee Mortgage”), but only in compliance with the Lease, including requirements on provisions that must appear in any Fee Mortgage. Any Fee Mortgage entered into without compliance with those conditions is null and void and of absolutely no force or effect whatsoever. Without limiting the more general application of this paragraph, any Fee Mortgage shall be subject and subordinate to the Lease, this Memorandum, any New Lease and certain other interests in Tenant’s Premises, as the Lease states.

Transfer of Fee Estate. Landlord must satisfy some conditions and requirements for, and as a prerequisite to, any sale, conveyance, assignment or other direct or indirect transfer of the Fee Estate or any interest in it or in any entity²⁴ with a direct or indirect interest in it, including creation of any Subordinate Claim (any of these, a “Transfer”). Those conditions include, in some cases, compliance with Tenant’s Right of First Refusal under the Lease. Any Transfer that violates the Lease shall be null and void.

22 Even without a Leasehold Mortgage, this disclosure may make sense, although for a typical space lease with an SNDA, recordation of the SNDA should suffice.

23 Same comments as preceding footnote.

24 This language would not give notice to a transferee of equity in Landlord.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

COMMERCIAL LEASING BROKERAGE AGREEMENTS

Lawrence P. Lenzner, Esq.*

* Mr. Lenzner wishes to thank Andrew Herz of Patterson Belknap Webb & Tyler LLP for his assistance in the preparation of this chapter.

[11.0] I. PRELIMINARY CONSIDERATIONS

[11.1] A. Overview

This chapter analyzes brokerage or listing agreements between a landlord and a real estate broker who procures a commercial lease. It provides a general introduction to the basic concepts of commercial real estate leasing brokerage agreements and examines important brokerage issues. Hopefully, it will assist real estate attorneys in their daily practice, but it will not analyze statutory or case law. Several forms of listing agreements are appended at the end of this chapter to assist real estate practitioners.

A listing agreement between a real estate broker and the landlord of real property authorizes the broker to solicit offers to lease the property on the terms and conditions in the agreement. The listing agreement usually lists the conditions that the broker must satisfy to earn a specified commission.

A contract for the retention of a broker's services is a personal service contract for the employment of an agent. Although the broker agrees to endeavor to find a tenant for the property and the landlord agrees to pay the broker a commission, the landlord cannot force the broker to locate a tenant. Absent an agreement to the contrary, a listing agreement is an offer by the landlord to pay a commission upon the occurrence of certain conditions. The broker accepts the offer by producing a tenant who satisfies the requirements set forth in the listing agreement.

The existence of an agreement with the landlord is crucial, since the broker must prove employment by the landlord in order to receive a commission. Such agreement may be oral or written.

[11.2] B. Oral Listing Agreement

A binding contract to pay a brokerage commission may be oral. Even an oral brokerage agreement can be quite specific as to the terms and conditions of the hiring. A broker legally may be entitled to receive a commission even if a lease is never executed. Therefore, when a written agreement has not yet been executed, it is advisable to enter into an oral agreement to provide that no commission will be due if the transaction is not fully consummated. Good practice dictates that such an agreement be confirmed by a subsequent letter or memorandum.

Oral brokerage agreements are expressly not barred by the Statute of Frauds if they can be performed within one year. However, the better practice is for all brokerage agreements to be in writing. The broker wants the agreement to be in writing so that it can prove the existence of the agreement to pay a commission or to prove its particular terms. In addition, if the landlord does not pay the commission, a real estate broker licensed in New York State is authorized by statute to file a mechanic's lien to claim a commission involving an executed lease which has a term of more than three years and covers commercial real property. A written brokerage agreement is required for the broker to be entitled to file such a lien and a copy must be annexed to the notice of lien.

Brokerage agreements for commercial leases often provide for the commission to be paid based on rentals that are not capable of being calculated until more than a year has elapsed from the date of hiring (especially if percentage rentals or cost of living increases are provided for in the lease). Because of the Statute of Frauds, such brokerage agreements must be in writing to be enforceable.

[11.3] C. Types of Listing Agreements

[11.4] 1. Non-Exclusive Agreement

A nonexclusive agreement, also known as an open listing, gives the broker the right to a commission only if the broker actually procures a tenant for the property. A landlord can hire several brokers under this type of agreement. In such instance, the landlord will pay a commission only to the broker or brokers who procure tenants.

Although landlords may feel that a nonexclusive agreement will give them the benefit of wider exposure to potential tenants, brokers often assert that this type of agreement gives them little incentive or protection. Brokers are reluctant to expend much energy or expense searching for potential tenants when there is little chance for them to earn a commission. Therefore, a nonexclusive listing can only be effective where tenants are plentiful and the use of this type of listing is widespread.

A nonexclusive listing may be effective if the landlord limits the scope of the listing to provide the broker with greater incentive to locate tenants (for example, by agreeing to grant a nonexclusive agreement to only two brokers).

[11.5] 2. Exclusive Agency Agreement

In an exclusive agency agreement, the landlord designates a single broker as its exclusive agent. The broker earns a commission for every completed lease transaction, whether or not it procured the tenant. A landlord may not hire other brokers to lease the property, although the landlord may lease the property directly to a tenant without the involvement of any broker. If such a transaction is consummated in good faith directly by the landlord to a tenant not procured by the broker, the landlord is not liable to the broker for a commission.

It is customary for the exclusive broker to be obligated to enlist the cooperation of other brokers. In such situation, the exclusive broker coordinates the activities of other brokers and arranges for showings of the property. Where a cooperating broker procures the tenant, the cooperating broker will usually be entitled to receive a full commission and the exclusive broker will usually receive an additional amount, called an “override,” which is a percentage of a full commission.

If an exclusive agent is hired to lease property, the landlord cannot lease the property through another broker without being subject to liability to the first broker for damages for breaching the exclusive agency agreement.

Brokers generally prefer exclusive agency agreements. They will agree to diligently attempt to lease the property when given this type of listing. A landlord who is reluctant to give an exclusive agency to a broker may be persuaded to do so for a short time period, such as one month, with the understanding that if a tenant has not been found by the end of such time period, the exclusive agency will not be renewed.

Exclusive agency agreements are commonly used for the leasing of commercial property. The agreement should contain an explicit statement that the parties intend an exclusive agency. The agreement also should include a clause reserving the right of the landlord to lease the property to tenants procured by the landlord without liability for a commission. If the landlord has previously been contacted by, or has negotiated with, any prospective tenants, a clause reserving the landlord’s right not to owe any commission with respect to those prospects may be added.

[11.6] 3. Exclusive Right to Lease Agreement

An agreement granting a broker the exclusive right to lease establishes the right of the broker to a commission upon the consummation of any lease, even a lease by the landlord without the involvement of any broker. Such an agreement is in contrast to an exclusive agency, which only excludes the employment of another broker by the landlord, and is the type of agreement most often sought by brokers. In order to avoid any ambiguity, a brokerage agreement providing for an exclusive right to lease should clearly express that a commission will be due upon any lease by the landlord and that the landlord may not independently negotiate a lease without liability to the broker.

Absent an unequivocal expression of intent by the express terms of the agreement or by necessary implication from its terms, a listing agreement headed “Exclusive Right to Lease” probably will be considered an exclusive agency, especially if the agreement provides that a commission is earned if the broker delivers a ready, willing, and able tenant.

[11.7] II. DRAFTING COMMERCIAL LEASING BROKERAGE AGREEMENTS*[11.8] A. Generally

A broker must prove that it was hired to be able to recover a real estate brokerage commission. A mere volunteer is not entitled to a commission. Implied employment is difficult to prove.

Much litigation can be avoided by carefully drafting brokerage agreements. Counsel should focus on when the parties think the commission is earned and when it should be payable. Landlord’s counsel should understand the effect of a brokerage agreement stating that the commission is not earned until the lease is executed and delivered. Broker’s counsel should be concerned about clauses that preclude the broker from receiving a commission even if a ready, willing and able tenant has been procured by the broker.

The brokerage agreement with respect to leased space may be considerably more complicated than a brokerage agreement with respect to the sale of real property. Because a lease transaction may have many more aspects that must be covered in the brokerage agreement, such agreements are often lengthy. The major areas that should be covered are set forth below.

[11.9] B. Principal Areas to be Covered by the Brokerage Agreement[11.10] 1. Nature of the Agency Created

As discussed above, a landlord may grant a non-exclusive agency, an exclusive agency or an exclusive right to lease. The brokerage agreement must clearly set forth the nature of the agency.

[11.11] 2. Term

The agreement should clearly set forth its term. The length of the term is generally negotiable. It will often depend upon the type of agency being created and the type of commercial property being leased. It will affect other terms of the listing agreement, such as whether the agreement may be terminated with or without cause and how the agreement may be renewed.

[11.12] 3. Standards of the Broker's Performance

The listing agreement will typically state the standard to which the broker shall be obligated to perform. Landlords may seek to require the broker to use its "best efforts" but that is a dangerous and vague standard. Better practice is to provide for exactly what is expected of the broker. This may include (a) provisions requiring the development of a marketing plan and an advertising budget, (b) a requirement that the broker advertise in designated newspapers, prepare brochures and/or post signs on the property and (c) a requirement that the owner or broker pay all or a portion of the broker's advertising and promotion expenses. Ultimately, the goal is to define sufficiently the expectations of the parties so that neither party is unnecessarily disappointed.

[11.13] 4. Conditioning Payment of the Broker's Commission

Absent an agreement to the contrary, a commission in most states becomes due if the broker procures a ready, willing and able tenant to lease the premises in accordance with the landlord's terms. Negating this standard is one of the principal purposes of a brokerage agreement. Frequently, the payment of the broker's commission will be conditioned upon the satisfaction of certain conditions. The conditions that must be satisfied in order for the broker to have earned its commission may include that:

- (1) the lease (together with any required guaranties of third parties) has been executed and unconditionally delivered;
- (2) the security deposit and any initial rent have been tendered;
- (3) the term of the lease has commenced;
- (4) the tenant has accepted occupancy of the premises; and
- (5) any required consents or agreements (such as non-disturbance or recognition agreements) have been obtained (including, in the case of a sublease, any required consent of the overlandlord).

A brokerage agreement may specify that the broker is not entitled to a commission until a written lease has been executed and delivered. Such agreement is binding and prevents the broker from collecting a commission if no lease is signed. If the landlord obtained such agreement fraudulently, the broker will not be deprived of its commission.

From the broker's perspective, the brokerage agreement should state that the landlord agrees to pay the broker a commission, as opposed to stating that the broker agrees to accept a commission.

[11.14] 5. Amount and Payment of Leasing Commission

Calculation of a broker's commission for a lease of real property is generally more complicated than the calculation of a commission for a sale. The commission for a lease transaction is typically based upon a percentage of the yearly rent. Rates vary depending upon local practice and are often calculated on a sliding scale. The agreement should be specific as to what items are considered to be part of the rent for the purposes of computing the amount of the commission. Frequently excluded from the definition of rent for such purpose are:

- (1) escalation rental payments;
- (2) the cost of work in excess of a normal work letter (whether in the form of payments by the tenant or a work allowance provided by the landlord);
- (3) the value of obligations borne by the landlord to induce the tenant to enter into the lease, such as assuming the tenant's existing lease obligations;

- (4) utility charges;
- (5) percentage rent; and
- (6) rental concessions or rent abatements. If free rent is included within the calculation of rent, the broker would want the brokerage agreement to provide that it be amortized on a straight-line basis over the term of the lease if the commission is calculated on a declining sliding scale.

The time and method of payment of the commission should be specified. If a commission is to be paid in installments, a provision for the acceleration of any remaining installments following the landlord's default may be included as well as an obligation to pay interest on overdue installments. Large commissions are commonly paid in installments. For example, a specific percentage may be payable upon execution of the lease, a like amount may be payable after payment of the second month's rent and the remainder could be payable one year after the commencement of the term of the lease.

From its perspective, the broker's right to payment of all or any portion of the commission should not be forfeited if the tenant defaults under the lease. The broker would argue that it is not a guarantor of the tenant's obligations. In addition, the broker would seek to have all unpaid installments of the commission accelerated upon the sale by the landlord of the building if the new landlord does not assume in writing the obligation to pay to the broker the remaining installments. Similarly, the broker would not want any limitation upon the landlord's liability with respect to the proceeds of a sale or net lease of the building, insurance proceeds or condemnation awards. In addition, the broker should be wary if the landlord seeks to limit its liability to its interest in the building if the landlord has no equity interest in the building (e.g., some subleases).

[11.15] 6. Options for Additional Space and Renewal Options

The brokerage agreement may provide for the payment to the broker of additional commissions if the tenant exercises options in the lease to lease additional space or to extend the term of the lease. If (1) the renewal, extension or expansion option is set forth in the lease and such provision includes a specific dollar amount payable by the tenant upon the exercise of such option or (2) the expansion occurs near the beginning of the term, the broker contractually may be entitled to a commission if another broker is not involved. Commissions for renewals, extensions or expansion options, if payable by the landlord at all, generally are deemed due upon the exercise of such option.

[11.16] 7. Landlord's Default

Where payment of the broker's commission is conditioned on the happening of a specific event such as the execution and delivery of a lease, the issue of the landlord's default often arises. Since the commission is dependent upon an event partially within the control of the landlord, brokers often seek to exclude the "willful default" of the landlord.

Counsel representing the landlord may wish to include a provision in the brokerage agreement to the effect that the failure to execute and deliver a lease (or the failure to satisfy any other conditions with respect to the obligation to pay the commission) for any reason whatsoever will excuse the landlord from any liability for the payment of the broker's commissions. Counsel may further protect the landlord by including a provision stating that the landlord has the right to terminate negotiations with any of the broker's prospects for any reason whatsoever at any time.

Counsel representing the broker may seek to protect the broker against the landlord's willful default. Counsel should be aware that the exclusion of willful default does not preclude the landlord from opting for a better offer if the lease is not yet executed.

A compromise position would provide that the broker would be entitled to a commission in the event of a willful default of the landlord only if such willful default occurs after the lease has been unconditionally executed and delivered.

[11.17] 8. Representations, Warranties and Indemnification

Most brokers often seek the cooperation of other brokers to locate a tenant. Depending on the circumstances, the landlord and the listing broker may wish to establish limitations with respect to the use of cooperating brokers and the manner in which such cooperating brokers are to be compensated. If the listing broker is obligated to pay any commission to a third party broker, the listing agreement should clearly set forth such obligation. If, on the other hand, the landlord desires to preclude the use of cooperating brokers, such prohibition should be clearly set forth in the agreement.

It is also common for a brokerage agreement to contain a clause whereby the broker represents that it is the sole procuring cause of the lease and agrees to indemnify the landlord against the commission claims of any other broker. Brokers may wish to modify such clause to provide that the liability of the broker should (a) exclude any leasing agent of the landlord (the landlord should agree to pay any commission payable to its leasing agent in connection with the lease) and (b) state that in the event of any claim which may give rise to liability under the indemnity, the landlord shall (1) give the broker prompt written notice of any such claim, (2) cooperate with the broker in the defense of such claim, (3) not settle such claim without the broker's prior written consent, which consent will not be unreasonably withheld or delayed, and (4) permit the broker to defend any such claim with counsel selected by the broker. A broker is often reluctant to extend its indemnity obligation to the portion of the commission which is unpaid since in such instance, the broker may be obligated to expend more money than it has received from the landlord.

In most lease transactions where the landlord is to pay the commission, it is common for the tenant to make the same brokerage representation as the broker. In the event of a breach of such representation, the broker would prefer that the landlord first pursue its remedies against the tenant. The position of the tenant is the opposite. The landlord would not want to limit its ability to proceed against both parties. It is also appropriate for the landlord to indemnify the listing broker against claims by third party brokers with whom the landlord may have dealt either before or during the term of the agreement.

[11.18] 9. Arbitration

Counsel should consider the inclusion of an arbitration clause in a brokerage agreement. Standard arbitration clauses often specify that a dispute arising between the parties will be settled by arbitration conducted in accordance with the Rules of the American Arbitration Association. The American Arbitration Association has prepared suggested arbitration language to be included in such agreements.

The arbitration clause may provide that the arbitration panel have three members, at least one of whom must be an attorney with a specified amount of real estate experience. Alternatively, the clause may be drafted to provide for arbitration by a single arbitrator or by arbitrators selected by the parties. If the latter type of clause is used, it is recommended that the clause specify that each arbitrator chosen must have at least 10 years' experience. If a panel of three arbitrators is utilized, the agreement may provide that if the two arbitrators first appointed are unable to agree and a third arbitrator is appointed, the decision of any two of the three arbitrators selected shall be binding. Alternatively, the arbitration provision may provide that the sole function of the third arbitrator is to choose which of the determinations of the first two arbitrators is correct.

Arbitration may be the best approach if the issue to be determined is the correct amount of the commission. Arbitration may not be the best way to resolve disputes involving whether or not any commission is due since it is commonly felt that arbitration results in compromise rather than total victory.

[11.19] 10. Parties/Authority

The listing agreement should clearly identify the parties and also contain a representation with respect to the authority of each party to enter into the agreement. If the landlord anticipates that specific persons shall be working on the transaction, the agreement should specify such persons.

As stated above, the relationship between a real estate broker and a landlord is one of agency. As the broker's principal, the landlord may be liable for the representations or omissions of the broker, even if the principal has no knowledge of such representations or omissions. Due to such concerns, it is customary for the brokerage agreement to characterize the broker as an independent contractor and not as an agent of the landlord.

[11.20] 11. Expenses

The listing agreement should state if the landlord is responsible for all or any portion of the broker's expenses incurred in connection with the transaction. Such responsibility frequently depends upon the nature of the listing agreement. In an exclusive agency agreement, the broker is more likely to insist on some form of expense reimbursement if the lease is consummated with a party procured by the landlord. The listing agreement should clearly identify any expenses that the landlord agrees to pay.

[11.21] 12. Leasing Transactions Following the Expiration of a Brokerage Agreement

In order to protect the broker's right to a commission with respect to a transaction that closes after the expiration of the brokerage agreement with a tenant introduced by the broker to the landlord during the term of the agreement, the landlord often agrees to pay the broker a commission for such transactions if they occur within a certain period following such expiration. The listing agreement may provide for the broker to provide a written list of such prospects to the landlord upon the expiration of the agreement. If the premises are thereafter leased to any of the prospects on such list within the stated period after such expiration, the broker is entitled to a commission.

[11.22] 13. Miscellaneous Concerns of Brokers

Counsel for a broker may also consider addressing the following issues in the brokerage agreement: (1) the definition of the tenant to include both the proposed tenant and its designee or nominee, (2) the brokerage agreement to state that in the event either party shall commence litigation against the other party to enforce its rights under the agreement, the party prevailing in such litigation shall be entitled to recover its reasonable attorneys' fees from the other party and (3) that the broker may issue a standard tombstone advertisement which does not disclose the financial terms of the lease.

[11.23] III. CONCLUSION

As this chapter illustrates, commercial leasing brokerage agreements may be quite complicated. Some of the major issues that such agreements often address include the nature of the agency, the conditions upon the broker's right to a commission, the representations and indemnities to be provided by the broker and whether the broker is entitled to a commission for leasing transactions that occur following the expiration of the brokerage agreement. The resolution of such issues often depends upon local custom and practice.

APPENDIX A

Exclusive Agency Agreement for Commercial Building

Dated: _____

Re: _____ [Address of property]

1. The undersigned (“Owner”) who owns the building (“Building”) located at _____ [address] by this agreement designates and appoints you (“Broker”) as Owner’s exclusive leasing agent to obtain tenants, other than the parties set forth in Exhibit ____, annexed and attached to this agreement, for all of the space in the Building available for rental during the term of this agreement.

2. The term of this agreement shall commence on _____ [date] and shall expire on _____ [date]; provided, however, that after _____ [date] either party may cancel this agreement upon not less than days’ prior written notice to the other party.

3. If during the term of this agreement, any portion of the Building is leased, Owner agrees to pay Broker and Broker agrees to accept in full payment for all services rendered, whether or not Broker is a procuring cause for such lease, a commission computed as follows:

(a) for each lease transaction in which no other broker is a procuring cause, a commission equal to ___ percent of the average annual fixed rent, payable under such lease;

(b) for each lease transaction in which either (i) one or more other brokers are procuring causes of such leasing or (ii) the tenant under the lease is a tenant in the Building on the date of this agreement who executes a new lease, or extends its present lease, or leases more space, a commission equal to _____ percent of the average annual fixed rent under such lease.

In each instance in which a broker or brokers other than Broker is a procuring cause, Owner shall pay to such other broker(s) a commission upon the terms and conditions as may be agreed to by Owner and these other broker(s). Owner indemnifies and agrees to hold Broker harmless from and against any claim, liability, cost or expense asserted by or payable to any broker(s) other than Broker. Broker agrees to promptly notify Owner whenever it is aware of the involvement of a broker other than Broker with respect to any lease transaction. For the purposes of this agreement, “fixed rent” shall mean the aggregate rentals and all other sums and charges payable by the tenant under a lease over the term of the lease, exclusive of amounts specifically payable for _____ [for example: electricity, or for escalation adjustments whether for increased real estate taxes, operating expenses or cost of living increases]. The “average annual fixed rent” shall be determined by dividing the fixed rent for the stated term of the lease, exclusive of renewal terms by the number of years, and fractions of years, in the stated term of the lease.

4. Any commission due Broker shall be deemed earned in full upon the execution and delivery of the lease with respect to which the commission was earned. Owner agrees to pay each commission in _____ [specify installment payments for example: in four (4) equal quarterly annual payments, the first of which shall be due and payable upon the execution and delivery of the lease].

5. Owner authorizes Broker to employ and use cobrokers or subbrokers to obtain tenants for the Building. Such cobrokers or subbrokers shall be paid by Owner upon terms and conditions agreed to by Owner and such cobrokers or sub-brokers.

6. Owner authorizes Broker to obtain, prepare and secure, subject to Owner’s prior approval but at Owner’s expense [up to $_____], renting signs, renting plans, circular matter and other forms of advertising for the Building and portions of the Building. Owner agrees in each such instance to promptly pay the advertising expenses up to the specified amount or reimburse Broker in the event that Broker has paid any advertising expenses.

7. Owner shall promptly refer to Broker all inquiries that Owner may receive relating to space in the Building and Owner shall promptly advise Broker of the status of all pending negotiations with respect to the leasing of space within the Building. Broker shall promptly submit all offers and applications which it receives for space in the Building to Owner. Broker shall not have the authority to execute any lease on behalf of Owner or to commit Owner to make any lease. Negotiations with respect to the leasing of space in the Building may be conducted through and/or in conjunction with Broker or by Owner independently. Broker shall supply Owner with such reports and other information with respect to the leasing program as Owner may reasonably request.

8. If any lease for which Broker is entitled to a commission contains an option or a right of first refusal on the part of the tenant under the lease to purchase the leased premises, the Building or any part of the Building or interest in the Building, Owner shall pay to Broker a sales commission equal to ___ percent of the total purchase price, payable at the time the lease or purchase is consummated.

9. In the event Owner is required to take over space then occupied by a proposed tenant, Owner shall grant Broker the exclusive right to act as broker for the lease, sublease, release, surrender or other disposition of such lease(s) for the takeover space and Broker shall be entitled to receive a commission in connection with the disposition.

10. Within ___ days after the expiration or earlier termination of this agreement, Broker shall submit to Owner a list of all prospective tenants for the Building with whom it has conducted negotiations. If within [for example: six] months after the expiration or earlier termination of this agreement, Owner shall lease any space within the Building to any such prospective tenant(s), Owner shall pay Broker a commission computed as if this agreement had not expired or been terminated.

11. Owner covenants to treat this agreement as confidential and agrees not to disclose the contents of this agreement to any party, except as may be required by law.

12. Broker covenants and agrees that during the term of this agreement until such time as leases have been executed for _____ [specify percentage, such as: two thirds (2/3)] of the rentable area in the Building, Broker will not act or agree to act as the leasing or rental agent for any building in the _____ [specify location, for example: Wall Street area in New York City] except the Building.

13. This agreement shall be binding upon and inure to the benefit of the parties to this agreement and their respective successors and assigns, except that Broker shall have no right to voluntarily assign this agreement without the written consent of Owner.

14. Any dispute or difference with respect to any matter arising out of or in connection with this agreement shall be submitted for final determination to the American Arbitration Association at its principal office in New York, New York.

15. Any notices required or permitted to be given by either party under this agreement shall be in writing and sent by certified or registered mail, postage prepaid, return receipt requested, addressed as follows:

NOTES

This agreement is quite favorable to the Broker as, among other things, the Owner assumes the responsibility for paying other brokers, the Broker is not required to indemnify the Owner, and the only condition for the Broker earning a commission is that the lease be signed.

COMMERCIAL LEASING BROKERAGE AGREEMENTS APPENDIX A

Counsel should make sure the actual Owner of Building signs the agreement or adds a statement that the signatory is the Owner's authorized agent. Be sure to set forth their addresses for notices.

No provision has been made for renewal of the term of this agreement.

A clause can be added that the Broker will use its best efforts (consistent with prevailing practices) to negotiate and consummate leases for the Building. Owners like this type of clause, however, it often leads to trouble in determining what "best efforts" are.

In defining fixed rent, this Agreement does not cover "take over" problems as these are not sums paid by the tenant.

Paragraph 4 requires only that the lease be signed for the Broker to have earned a commission. Frequently, satisfaction of other conditions such as term commencement, the obtaining of required consents, and rent commencement are required.

Paragraph 5 puts the onus on the Owner to reach a satisfactory arrangement with outside brokers. If an Owner wishes to enter into a lease transaction where an outside broker is involved, the Owner must promptly reach agreement with the outside broker in order to prevent liability to the outside broker for a commission in the event that the lease is not consummated.

The computation of commissions does not explicitly cover allowances or concessions granted to tenants.

Paragraph 9 is left open ended as to the amount of compensation. However, a particular percent commission can be inserted instead.

Paragraph 14, relating to arbitration can be omitted or, if Owner favors arbitration, can be strengthened.

Note that this agreement is silent as to whether compensation is due for renewal of a lease with a new tenant in the Building procured by Broker.

APPENDIX B

Exclusive Brokerage Agreement for Lease Drafted by Owner's Attorney

_____ [Name of broker]

Re: _____ [address of property]

This letter will confirm our designation of you as our exclusive broker for the lease by us of the property described on the annexed Exhibit ____ (the "Property"). Your exclusive brokerage arrangement shall be on the following terms and conditions:

1. We reserve the right to determine all terms and conditions of any proposed lease and to accept or reject any proposed tenant procured by you for any reason in our absolute discretion.

2. This agreement is made subject to a prior lease or withdrawal from lease of the Property, or change of any terms or conditions of lease, all without notice to you.

3. (a) In respect of any consummated lease of the Property which shall be between us as landlord and a party procured by you as tenant, we shall pay to you, on behalf of you and any and all other brokers who may be entitled to share in the commission, a total commission in accordance with the terms set forth on the annexed Exhibit _____.

(b) A tenant shall not be deemed a party procured by you unless:

(i) the prospective tenant has, in fact, been procured by you;

(ii) you have given us written notice of the name and address of the prospective tenant, and you have exhibited the Property to the prospective tenant, during the term of this agreement and prior to our having learned of the interest of the prospective tenant from any other source;

(iii) negotiations commenced between us and the prospective tenant for the lease of the Property during the term of this agreement.

4. In computing any commission due under this agreement, the following rules shall govern:

(a) The following shall be excluded from the rental used to compute any leasing commission:

(i)_____ [such as: any increase in rent pursuant to any escalator provision contained in the lease whereby the prospective tenant pays a share of taxes, costs or expenses or any percentage rentals payable by the prospective tenant in excess of a fixed minimum rental];

(ii)_____ [such as: rentals payable by the prospective tenant allocated specifically or otherwise in payment for electricity, heat, air-conditioning or other utilities or services];

(iii)_____ [such as: rentals, allowances or other sums payable by the prospective tenant's improvements, decorations or installations];

(b) no commissions shall be paid to you as a result of any renewal or extension of a lease or any new lease between us and any prospective tenant nor as a result of any purchase of the Property whether or not pursuant to any option to purchase the property contained in any lease or other agreement between us and any prospective tenant or otherwise;

(c) if any lease provides that either or both of the parties may cancel the lease upon the happening of a specified contingency after the commencement of the lease but prior to the expiration of the term provided in the lease, then commissions shall be deemed due or earned only upon the uncancellable portion of the term until such right to cancel expires, and the balance of such commission shall then be paid by us to you following the last day on which any such right to cancel may be exercised; and

(d) if for any reason, including but not limited to, noncompletion of the premises covered by any lease because of inability to finance construction, acts of God, strikes or other labor difficulties, governmental restrictions, casualty or any other causes beyond our control, the prospective tenant does not take possession of the premises or commence the payment of rent, other than deposits or prepay-

ments of rental called for under the lease prior to the commencement of the regular periodic installments of rental, then no portion of the balance of your commission shall be deemed to be due or earned, or shall be paid to you by us, and we shall be relieved from any liability for the payment of any portion of any remaining balance of such commissions, and you shall refund to us any and all amounts which may have been paid under this agreement.

5. If for any reason whatsoever, including but not limited to, the acts, omissions, negligence or willful default of us or our agents, employees or representatives, a lease shall not be entered into between us as landlord and any prospective tenant procured by you or the conditions of the lease contained shall not be satisfied, then no brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation, or any portion of brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation, shall be deemed to be due or earned by you under this agreement, and we shall be relieved from all liabilities to you for the payment of any and all brokerage commissions, fees, or other compensation whatsoever. It is expressly agreed that we shall have the unqualified right, in our sole and absolute discretion, to refuse to enter into or refuse to consummate any lease of the Property for any reason whatsoever without incurring any obligation to you for the payment of any brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation.

6. You may not offer the Property through other brokers or enter into any commission arrangements with them which would be inconsistent with the terms of this agreement or which would increase the total amount of our liability under this agreement, and our sole liability shall be to you, and only you, as provided in this agreement. Your receipt of a commission paid by us shall constitute your agreement to indemnify and hold us harmless from and against any and all claims, liabilities, damages, costs or expenses, including attorney fees, which may be incurred by us as a result of the assertion by any other party in respect of any commission, brokerage, or other, compensation claimed to be due with respect to any lease of the Property. Provided, however, that your liability under this indemnity shall not exceed the amount of any commissions paid or payable to you under this agreement.

7. Any commission payable to you under this agreement shall be reduced by an amount equal to any commission, fee or other compensation directly, or indirectly, paid or payable to you by any prospective tenant or any other person, firm or corporation in connection with the proposed lease.

8. It is understood that you are an independent contractor and shall not be considered our agent for any purpose whatsoever. You are not granted any right or authority to assume or create any obligation or liability or make any representation, covenant, agreement or warranty, express or implied, on our behalf, or to bind us in any manner or thing whatsoever.

9. You will undertake an active leasing campaign on our behalf and, subject to our prior written approval in each such instance, will advertise the Property, find and investigate prospective tenants for the Property and otherwise use your best efforts to bring about its leasing. Expenses for promotion, advertising, mailings, providing floor plans and other expenses undertaken to further the leasing of the Property shall be borne by you, and you shall indemnify and hold us harmless from and against any claims of others in respect to these expenses, except that we shall reimburse you for your actual out-of-pocket costs paid to newspapers for advertising the Property up to a maximum amount of $_____. You shall attend all meetings with respect to the Property to which you are invited.

10. We shall refer to you all calls and inquiries relating to the Property which we may receive from other brokers and we shall not engage the services of any other broker during the term of this agreement. It is understood, however, that we reserve the right to lease the Property ourselves without incurring any liability to you for any commission, brokerage or other compensation.

11. This agreement shall terminate ____ months from the date of its execution, unless the term is extended in writing signed by both of us, or any earlier date on which we shall have entered into a lease for the leasing of all or substantially all of the Property where the tenant of the property is not a party procured by you, as defined above. Upon the termination of this agreement, each of us shall be relieved of any further obligation to the other. However, we shall recognize you as the broker in accordance with the terms of this agreement in respect of any lease of the Property subsequently entered into with any prospective tenant procured by you, as defined above, during the term of this agreement if a lease is entered into within ____ months after the termination of this agreement.

12. You shall execute and deliver to us such further documents and instruments as we may request in order to confirm or implement the foregoing.

Broker's counsel may want to add a provision freeing the broker from any responsibility for investigating the prospects' financial condition or ability.

Owner's counsel should consider adding the following clause: Broker will at all times advise owner of the status of broker's endeavors on owner's behalf and will furnish owner with such written status reports as owner may request.

Owner's counsel may wish to add a provision for an indemnity providing that the broker by submitting a prospective tenant shall agree to indemnify the owner against claims by other brokers.

APPENDIX C

Non-Exclusive Brokerage Agreement Drafted by Owner's Attorney

To: _____ [Broker]

From: _____ [Owner]

Re: _____ [address of property]

This letter will confirm our designation of you as our non-exclusive broker, for the lease by us of the property described on attached Exhibit ____ (“Property”). Your non-exclusive brokerage arrangement shall be on the following terms and conditions:

1. We reserve the right to determine all terms and conditions of any proposed lease and to accept or reject any proposed tenant procured by you for any reason in our absolute discretion.

2. This agreement is made subject to a prior lease or withdrawal from lease of the Property, or change of any terms or conditions of lease, all without notice to you.

3. (a) In respect of any consummated lease of the Property which shall be between us as landlord and a party procured by you as tenant, we shall pay to you, on behalf of you and any and all other brokers who may be entitled to share in the commission, a total commission in accordance with the terms set forth on Exhibit ____ annexed to and incorporated in this agreement.

(b) A tenant shall not be deemed a party procured by you under this agreement unless:

(i) the prospective tenant has, in fact, been procured by you;

(ii) you have given us written notice of the name and address of this prospective tenant, and you have exhibited the Property to this prospective tenant during the term of this agreement and prior to our having learned of the interest of this prospective tenant from any other source; and

(iii) negotiations shall have commenced between us and such prospective tenant for the lease of the Property during the term of this agreement.

4. In computing any commission due under this agreement, the following rules shall govern:

(a) the following shall be excluded from the rental used to compute any leasing commission:

(i) _____ [for example: any increase in rent pursuant to any escalator provision contained in the lease whereby the prospective tenant pays a share of taxes, costs or expenses or any percentage rentals payable by the prospective tenant in excess of a fixed minimum rental]

(ii) _____ [for example: rentals payable by the prospective tenant allocated specifically or otherwise in payment for electricity, heat, air-conditioning or other utilities or services]

(iii) _____ [for example: rentals, allowances or other sums payable by the prospective tenant in payment for the prospective tenant's improvements, decorations or installations]

(b) no commissions shall be paid to you as a result of any renewal or extension of a lease or any new lease between us and any prospective tenant nor as a result of any purchase of the Property whether or not pursuant to any option to purchase the property contained in any lease or other agreement between us and any prospective tenant or otherwise;

(c) if any lease shall provide that either or both of the parties may cancel the lease upon the happening of a specified contingency after the commencement thereof but prior to the expiration of the term provided in the lease, then commissions shall be deemed due or earned only upon the uncancellable portion of the term until such right to cancel expires, and the balance of commission shall then be paid by us to you following the last day on which any right to cancel may be exercised; and finance construction, acts of God, strikes or other labor difficulties, governmental restrictions, casualty or any other causes beyond our control, the prospective tenant does not take possession of the premises or commence the payment of rent (other than deposits or prepayments of rental called for under the lease prior to the commencement of the regular periodic installments of rental), then no portion of the balance of your commission shall be deemed to be due or earned, or shall be paid to you by us, and we shall be relieved from any liability for the payment of any portion of any remaining balance of such commissions, and you shall refund to us any and all amounts which may have been paid under this agreement.

5. If for any reason whatsoever, including but not limited to, the acts, omissions, negligence or willful default of us or our agents, employees or representatives, a lease shall not be entered into between us as landlord and any prospective tenant procured by you, then no brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation, or any portion thereof, shall be deemed to be due or earned by you under this agreement, and we shall be relieved from all liabilities to you for the payment of any and all brokerage commissions, fees, or other compensation whatsoever. It is expressly agreed that we shall have the unqualified right, in our sole and absolute discretion, to refuse to enter into or refuse to consummate any lease of the Property for any reason whatsoever without incurring any obligation to you for the payment of any brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation.

6. You may not offer the Property through other brokers or enter into any commission arrangements with them that would be inconsistent with the terms of this agreement or that would increase the total amount of our liability under this agreement, and our sole liability shall be to you, and only you, as provided in this agreement. Your receipt of a commission paid by us shall constitute your agreement to indemnify and hold us harmless from and against any and all claims, liabilities, damages, costs or expenses, including attorney fees, which may be incurred by us as a result of the assertion by any other party in respect of any brokerage commission, fee, or other compensation claimed to be due with respect to any lease of the Property; provided, however, that your liability under this indemnity shall not exceed the amount of any commissions paid or payable to you under this agreement.

7. Any commission payable to you under this agreement shall be reduced by an amount equal to any commission, fee or other compensation directly, or indirectly, paid or payable to you by any prospective tenant or any other person, firm or corporation in connection with the proposed lease.

8. It is understood that you are an independent contractor and shall not be considered our agent for any purpose whatsoever, and you are not granted any right or authority to assume or create any obligation or liability or make any representation, covenant, agreement or warranty, express or implied, on our behalf, or to bind us in any manner or thing whatsoever.

9. This agreement may be terminated at the will of either party at any time upon the giving or mailing of notice of termination to the other party and shall terminate in any event upon our entering into a lease for the leasing of all or substantially all of the Property where the tenant of the property is not a party procured by you, as defined above. Upon termination each of us shall be relieved of any further obligation to the other, except that we shall recognize you as the broker in accordance with the terms of this agreement in respect of any lease of the Property subsequently entered into with any prospective tenant procured by you if, and only if: (i) the prospective tenant was a party procured by you, as defined above, during the term of this agreement and (ii) the lease is entered into within ___ months after the termination of this agreement.

You shall execute and deliver to us all further documents and instruments as we may request in order to confirm or implement the foregoing.

11. This agreement sets forth the entire understanding between the parties to this agreement and cannot be changed, modified or amended nor any of its provisions waived except by an agreement in writing signed by the party to be charged.

If you are in agreement with the foregoing, please sign at the space provided below and return a fully executed copy of this letter to us within _____ days from the date below; otherwise there shall be no binding agreement between us, and you shall have no right to act with respect to the Property on our behalf.

NOTES

Broker's counsel may want to add a provision freeing the broker from any responsibility for investigating the prospects' financial condition or ability.

Owner's counsel should consider adding the following clause: "Broker will at all times advise owner of the status of broker's endeavors on owner's behalf and will furnish owner with such written status reports as owner may request." Owner's counsel may wish to add a provision for an indemnity providing that the broker by submitting a prospective tenant shall agree to indemnify the owner against claims by other brokers.

CHAPTER TWELVE

PREMATURE COMPENSATION AND HOW TO PREVENT UNPLEASANT BROKERAGE SURPRISES (WITH SAMPLE LANGUAGE AND MODEL BROKER REGISTRATION AGREEMENT)

Joshua Stein, Esq.

PREMATURE COMPENSATION

Consider this common series of events: A leasing broker has a good potential tenant for a property. The broker calls the property owner. The property owner agrees that the prospective tenant might be a good fit. The prospective tenant is willing to pay the asking rent—or at least close enough to it to make the deal work for the property owner. Landlord and tenant reach a deal. A lease goes out. Comments come back. Technical or legal issues arise. Negotiations break down. The tenant goes away. Or maybe the owner decides to rent the space to someone else who offers more rent. Exactly what happened and why isn't quite clear. Each side has its own version of the facts. The broker thinks the landlord killed the deal.

Under facts like these, the broker may conceivably sue for a commission. The broker's claim could survive the landlord's motion for summary judgment. The court could very well rule that the broker did enough to support a commission claim, even without a signed lease, at least under some circumstances. Traditional brokerage law supports such a ruling. A broker can recover a commission if the broker did his or her job: procuring a ready, willing and able tenant willing to pay a price the landlord is willing to accept. The deal doesn't necessarily need to close—i.e., the tenant doesn't necessarily need to sign a lease—for the broker to claim a commission, at least if the broker can somehow argue the landlord prevented the deal from closing. A New York case decided in mid-2013, discussed below, one of many similar cases over many decades, confirmed this traditional principle of brokerage law in the context of leasing brokerage.¹

As a common variation, in a hot market the owner of an attractive building often receives cold calls from brokers waving big numbers, offering highly credible buyers and otherwise trying to get the owner to sell. The owner might have a conversation with the broker and his client, and might even entertain a proposal. If those discussions break down, the broker might, again, still successfully claim the owner owes a commission, if the broker can show he delivered a “ready, willing, and able” buyer at a price satisfactory to the owner even if no formal written agreement ever existed. It's relatively easy for the broker to claim there “would have been” such an agreement if the owner hadn't decided to ditch the transaction.

Like so many ancient legal principles, these principles of brokerage law make no sense in today's world. Today, an owner intuitively expects not to have to pay a commission unless the broker's tenant or buyer actually creates value by signing a lease or closing an acquisition. An owner also knows that many things can go wrong, including a simple change of heart, between a deal in principle and a closing. If something does go wrong, no owner wants to have to prove why the broker didn't earn a commission. In this case, as in so many others, intuition is a poor guide to the law.

Stories like these call into question the common practice by which an owner enlists or at least accepts the help of brokers without negotiating or signing any brokerage documentation at the outset. Instead, if and when the parties reach an agreement in principle and seem to be moving toward documents, the owner expects to negotiate and sign a brokerage agreement as part of documenting the deal. Without some protective agreement earlier in the process, though, the owner could face the risk, not always theoretical, that negotiations will break down, but the broker will still claim a commission.

A cautious owner should consider a more deliberate process. If a broker is dangling desirable tenants, the owner should put in place some minimal agreement with the broker (just a mechanism to prevent claims) as early as possible in the process, and well before entering any negotiations. The same goes for a potential sale.

In the context of a lease, of course, if the owner has already engaged the broker as leasing agent for the building, then the agency agreement should cover the issue and forestall unexpected commission claims. These problems will occur more often in one-off transactions or if a new (or additional) broker gets involved, especially if the broker and owner don't expect to have a continuing relationship. Without a formal agreement, if the broker is "really" the tenant's broker, or isn't an institutional broker who wants a long-term relationship with the owner, problems can arise.

In the context of leasing brokerage, can an owner eliminate these risks by having a leasing agent for the building? Not really. Even then the risk remains. In the New York court decision mentioned earlier, the leasing agent conducted negotiations for the owner, but the court still thought the outside broker might have a good claim.

Similar problems might arise, in reverse, when a national retailer receives unsolicited inquiries from brokers proposing locations for the retailer's next store. Here, the retailer is the equivalent of the "owner" and therefore wants to avoid claims from a broker who helped negotiate a deal for a lease that the parties never actually sign. Even if the landlord would have paid the commission for a "done deal," a creative broker can claim that because it's the tenant's fault that the deal didn't close, the tenant should compensate the broker for the commission the broker would have collected from the landlord.

In any of these cases, the dynamics of the commercial brokerage business give a broker every incentive to assert a premature claim. Most efforts to bring about commercial transactions fail, so much of a broker's effort will go to waste. In the occasional case where the broker achieves any degree of success, they may have hit the jackpot. Commercial brokerage relies on big hits rather than a steady stream of income from lots of small, easily arranged transactions. So a broker has every incentive to make a claim if any basis at all exists for doing so. Unfortunately for owners, the law allows such claims under circumstances that an owner would regard as premature.

An owner protection agreement needs to state only that the broker won't receive a commission unless the owner actually negotiates and closes a deal. Such an agreement, if entered into early in the process, need not lay out all the details of the commission or the entire relationship between owner and broker. The owner will just want to protect himself from legal arguments that might limit his ability to walk away from the transaction. The essence of such an agreement can be distilled into a paragraph, such as this, in a letter from the broker to the owner:

We look forward to discussing with you the possible interest of _____ ("Prospect") in a transaction involving _____. You will have no obligation or liability to us, we will not look to you for any payment, and you may terminate discussions at any time, unless and until you agree upon, enter into and actually close a binding transaction with Prospect, and all conditions to its effectiveness have been met or waived.

If an owner doesn't want to cover the matter in a separate letter with the broker, he can address the issue in the usual preliminary document that the parties exchange as they try to reach a nonbinding business deal, i.e., a term sheet or letter of intent. That document will usually already say something about the broker. Any party worried about exposure to premature brokerage claims might simply ask the broker who might make a claim to add language like this to the letter of intent or term sheet:

No party to this contemplated transaction shall have any liability for any payment to any broker, and each party may terminate discussions at any time without liability to any broker, unless and until the parties agree on, sign and exchange binding documents, all conditions to their effectiveness have been met or waived and a closing has occurred.

Either of the sample provisions suggested, if the broker signs onto it, should prevent a broker from making premature claims. But each leaves a lot unsaid. One could add many other points to the understanding between the parties, inflating the agreement from a paragraph into a page or more. As always, legal documents of all types only get longer, never shorter. An example of a more complete preliminary—but still not very long—agreement with a broker follows this discussion. That agreement goes into some other issues that an owner or broker might want to resolve early in the process, beyond just protecting the owner from premature commission claims.

If an owner wants to enter into an agreement like this, he should make that clear when the broker submits the first term sheet or other proposal. Nothing stops the owner from requiring it before that. If the owner doesn't want to have a complete, full-blown brokerage agreement at that point, that's fine. The owner just needs to assure that some binding documentation communicates one crucial point: the owner will never owe a commission unless a transaction actually closes. If and when a transaction actually starts to come together, it's up to the owner and the broker to proceed with the usual commission negotiations and sign a more complete agreement.

The model agreement offered here achieves two goals. First, it protects the owner from unexpected claims, something the owner could also achieve with the simpler language options suggested above. Second, this agreement recognizes the broker as the procuring cause of a particular potential counterparty and takes care of some other housekeeping.

The first goal serves the owner, recognizing that brokers can and do assert claims even when their efforts do not bring about an actual transaction, as described above.

Under this letter agreement, if and when the broker actually does earn a fee, the broker can either agree to look solely to its prospect, or acknowledge it has no claim against the owner absent a closing. If the broker acknowledges that it has no claim and a closing occurs, this model registration agreement (just like either of the shorter options suggested above) does not immunize the owner from claims. In fact, in that case—if a true closing occurs and the owner gets the benefit of a completed transaction—then the broker could still potentially assert a claim, even if the parties never actually signed a brokerage agreement. To prevent that, the parties must sign a brokerage agreement before or along with transaction documents, or at the very least before closing.

The second function of the preliminary agreement offered here benefits primarily the broker. A broker will worry that if the broker introduces the owner to a possible counterparty, then the owner might “go around” the broker and deal directly with the interested party. This concern often leads some brokers to ask owners to sign a marginally literate “noncircumvention agreement” very early in any negotiations. Because the broker’s concern is understandable, this model agreement contains the essence of a noncircumvention agreement—though written in English, unlike most such agreements.

This agreement also requires the broker to “register” his client, and requires the owner to recognize that registration. Once that happens, the owner might sometimes already have a relationship with the broker’s client, so the broker’s introduction serves no purpose. One can handle this concern by adding language to give the owner the right to quickly disallow and “unregister” the broker’s client by establishing that the owner already knew that person and was perhaps already having discussions with her. The model registration agreement offers optional language to that effect. If the owner wants to unregister the possible counterparty, then the owner bears the burden of showing some level of pre-existing relationship with or knowledge of that counterparty. The model requires proof of that relationship through email communications dated within a certain period before the registration agreement.

An owner might, of course, prefer to sign a full brokerage agreement now, in place of this letter or a one-paragraph waiver letter, leaving nothing for later. But that may be too much work, the transaction may never happen, the risks may seem manageable, this letter may already be too long, etc. (On the other hand, a full brokerage agreement is not much more difficult to negotiate than this letter and is probably more “standard.”) Until the parties sign a full brokerage agreement for an imminent transaction, though, this letter protects the owner in some important ways. If and when the parties sign a brokerage agreement, it would supersede this letter.

Owners who ask brokers to sign agreements like the one offered here may encounter rough sailing. Brokers do not like signing this type of agreement. They may say it's premature. Many brokers don't like thinking too much about legal concerns or dealing with legal documents of any kind. They might say the model agreement offered below is "too long." They might be right about that and, if so, perhaps they will agree to one of the much shorter options suggested above. They may favor taking their chances, knowing that if the owner takes the bait, the law of brokerage may ultimately support a claim so the broker can hit the jackpot—exactly what this letter agreement seeks to prevent.

As another possibility, once a broker sees this letter agreement, a broker who claimed to have the ideal purchaser may announce that she doesn't want to bother with the property in any way unless she gets an exclusive listing, even though the broker premised their overture on the proposition that they had one ideal buyer for the property. This actually happens a lot. It shows that owners may end up wasting their time if they deal with one-off inquiries from brokers. In other words, the best way to deal with brokers may be to carefully choose one reputable broker and enter into an exclusive listing.

Of course, sometimes a broker who parachutes in with a "great buyer" may in fact: (a) have an actual great buyer who is willing to pay more than anyone else and (b) not really be looking for an exclusive listing.

More often, though, in today's world, everyone knows everyone and everything. That makes it unlikely that a particular broker will add value by introducing the owner to a buyer that no one else could possibly have found. A broker instead will more often add value by developing the best possible marketing program to present the owner's property, determining which prospective buyers should learn about the property and when, and playing multiple buyers against each other to achieve the best possible execution. That type of a brokerage engagement requires the owner to choose a single exclusive and competent broker and then undertake a strategic marketing program with that broker's expert advice, rather than deal with a menagerie of one-off brokers.

The owner's dilemma—how to deal with all these brokers and brokerage alternatives—is not a bad problem to have. The owner also should remember that markets change. If the owner does in fact want to sell in a hot market, then he or she should not waste time. He or she should try to get a solid deal signed and closed before the market turns against him.

PREMATURE COMPENSATION

If an owner chooses to deal with multiple brokers, though, the exposures described above merit careful consideration. An owner doesn't need to do very much to protect himself or herself. And the owner's attorney can play a crucial protective role by encouraging the owner to sign an agreement based on this model—or at least have the broker sign a one-paragraph waiver of the type suggested here—before opening substantive deal discussions.

APPENDIX
AND COMMISSION WAIVER

[Date]

CONFIDENTIAL

[Name and Address of Property Owner]

Registration of Prospect for _____ (the “Property”)²

To the Owner:

Please countersign below to confirm (the “Registration”) that we: (a) may discuss the Property with _____ or its affiliate (the “Prospect”); (b) may seek to develop Prospect’s interest in a possible ground lease, joint venture, recapitalization, redevelopment, sale, space lease or other transaction for the Property (any of these, a “Transaction”); (c) introduced Prospect to the Property; and (d) are Prospect’s broker of record.

Notwithstanding anything in the previous paragraph, if you already [had a relationship and lines of communication] [discussed the Property or a possible Transaction] with Prospect, as demonstrated by email communications dated within the last ___ days, then the Registration shall be of no force or effect. You must, however, notify us of that in writing within ___ days of the date of this letter, or the Registration will remain fully effective.³

This Registration will remain in effect only for this “Registration Period”: (a) ___ days after the date of this letter (the “Initial Period”); (b) if, in the Initial Period, we show the Property to Prospect and, with Prospect’s approval, give you (by email or otherwise) a written letter of intent or term sheet for a Transaction (an “LOI”), then so long as you are actively negotiating an LOI or binding documents (the “Documents”) with Pros-

2 This assumes the owner owns the Property and may sell it. With adjustments, this letter will work for a landlord with vacant space who receives unsolicited inquiries from brokers, or a national tenant looking for new locations but also worrying about reaching a nonbinding agreement with an owner and then deciding not to proceed.

3 This paragraph is optional. If the parties think very hard about the issues raised here, then they may face a conundrum: which side will show their cards first? As a practical matter, they deal with it. And most but not all brokers and owners are honorable.

pect (the “Negotiation Period”); and (c) if you sign Documents in the Initial Period or the Negotiation Period, then until Closing as defined below.⁴

The Registration Period will also continue for ___ more days (the “Tail Period”) after: (x) the Initial Period ends with no LOI or signed Documents; or (y) the Negotiation Period ends with no signed Documents or Closing. You or your counsel may, by email: (x) give notice of any Tail Period; or (y) extend the Registration Period.

In the Registration Period, you will not circumvent us in dealings with Prospect. After the Registration Period, we have no rights or claims regarding Prospect, but the rest of this letter still applies.⁵

Although you recognize our Registration, we initiated these discussions. You have made no determination to proceed with a Transaction on terms in an LOI or any other terms. The purpose of this Registration is just so you can see if it makes sense for you to even consider whether you have any interest in a possible Transaction. Your signing this Registration does not imply you plan to enter into a Transaction.⁶

You have no obligation to sign Documents or close a Transaction. You may freely and without liability to us, for any reason or no reason, or arbitrarily, capriciously or willfully: (a) withdraw the Property from the market or any possibility of a Transaction; (b) not sign Documents; (c) default⁷ under any Document; (d) discontinue or not even start negotiations; (e) enter into a Transaction with someone other than Prospect; or (f) work with other brokers or finders, except regarding Prospect in the Registration Period. You may do any or all of these things even if you and Prospect reach an understanding on a Transaction but no Closing has occurred. In any of those cases, you will owe us nothing.

[We will look only to Prospect for any commission, compensation, or other consideration due us as a result of any Transaction or other dealings

4 To shorten and simplify this document, one could provide for, e.g., a 12-month Registration Period and call it a day, deleting this paragraph and the next two.

5 If the broker already had a relationship with Prospect, and brought only one Prospect to the Property, and the owner didn't know the Prospect before, then the broker might reasonably demand perpetual exclusivity. A Tail Period after which “anything goes” may make more sense when an owner engages a broker for a broad marketing program.

6 An owner would add this paragraph only if some other document gives a third party pre-emptive rights if the owner “decides to sell.”

7 Brokers will often seek to have rights against an owner that “willfully defaults.” An owner should resist that concept and insist on absolute freedom to default.

with Prospect.^{8]} We will not look to you for payment of any kind, and you will have no liability to us under any circumstance[, except as follows. If signing of Documents seems imminent, then you and we will promptly and in good faith negotiate a commercially reasonable agreement on ordinary and customary terms for you to pay an agreed commission only if a Closing occurs (a “Brokerage Agreement”). A “Closing” means: you and Prospect sign and exchange Documents; any due diligence period or termination or rescission right lapses without exercise; all conditions to a Transaction closing are met or waived; you actually close a Transaction with Prospect; and you receive the consideration due at closing. If and only if a Closing occurs but you and we did not sign a Brokerage Agreement, then this letter, except its provisions on confidentiality, shall have no force or effect for any purpose, as if it had never been signed, and shall not bind or limit anyone in any way^{9]}.

You and we may exchange emails on the Property, the Prospect, a Transaction or Documents (the “Emails”). No Email and no oral communications will modify this letter, obligate anyone, extend the Registration Period or constitute a Brokerage Agreement (each, a “Modification”), except as this letter states. If an Email transmits as an attachment a Modification, manually signed with pen and ink, not an electronic signature, then that attachment binds the signer. Except as this letter states, any Emails will not: (a) be written with advice of counsel or intention of having legal effect; or (b) have legal effect or be admissible in court.

We will keep confidential all information on this engagement, the Property, any Transaction and any Documents, except we can share it with Prospect and Prospect’s advisors. We will direct them to preserve confidentiality. We may disclose this agreement in any dispute between us, but shall seek confidential treatment.

This letter applies only to Prospect. We will not list or publicize the Property, or suggest or communicate its possible availability, except to Prospect. We will not introduce anyone except Prospect to the Property. We will not purport to bind you to any Transaction. This arrangement is non-exclusive. We will not work, and have not worked, with any other broker, finder or other agent for the Property or a possible Transaction.

8 Choose this bracketed language or the next bracketed language, but not both.

9 Here, the broker could claim a commission and a court would decide its amount and timing. Neither owner nor broker should let this sentence govern. An owner might prefer to negate any commission under these circumstances. That seems unreasonable.

If Prospect comes to the Property in a group of investors or other participants, you will have no liability to us unless we affirmatively show you introduced Prospect to that group in the Registration Period, including a Tail Period.¹⁰

You confirm you have engaged no exclusive broker for a possible Transaction (“Exclusive Broker”). You have not committed to engage us as Exclusive Broker. If you engage an Exclusive Broker other than us in the Registration Period, then you will promptly notify us. When we receive that notice, the Registration Period will end. A Tail Period will then apply, but only if we affirmatively show you suggested Prospect to Exclusive Broker in that Tail Period.

If Prospect wishes to acquire the business located in the Property (the “Business”), then: (a) references to the Property also refer to the Business; (b) we acknowledge the Business is separately owned; and (c) references to you also refer to the Business owner.

When we say “you” in this letter, we also mean your constituent principals, partners, members, employees, agents, board members, family members, and other related parties.

We look forward to speaking with you about Prospect.

Very truly yours,

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

CONSTRUCTION AND THE COMMERCIAL LEASE

Kevin J. Connolly

[13.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Landlords commonly find themselves having to address construction-related issues. It is not at all uncommon for some construction work to be needed or wished for by the Tenant.

The art of building is a dark art. It is risky, expensive, and, in principle, undertaken only when necessary. Construction is often inevitable when commercial leases are made, and herein we have one of the great collisions between differing rules of law and getting things done: Construction Law is not like Real Estate Law. Real Estate lawyers will argue over every sentence and every paragraph, if not every word and punctuation mark, in the contract. This reflects the nature of real estate: it lasts. A fee interest is theoretically perpetual. Leases and mortgages have generational durations. Even a short-term lease is likely going to last for years, which is too long to live with a problem.

Construction is based on getting the work done. The Work cannot be used until it is done, and the time frame for getting the Work done is always (and obviously) of much shorter duration than the lease. Those who use real estate lawyers to handle construction often discover that the contract is still being negotiated as construction begins. It is not unusual to find enormous construction projects for which “the Contract” is signed only at the closeout of construction. The work is substantially complete, the tenants are in possession and sometimes actually operating, the final disbursement of mortgage proceeds has been made and divvied up, and only now is the contract signed, ostensibly “for insurance purposes.”

This is a backward approach to the process. The contract is a tool whose purpose is to get the project built. However, the tool is useless until the contract is signed, and herein lies one of the collisions that so often bedevil construction. A large proportion of commercial construction is accomplished without a contract being in place. This is foolish, and often reflects the intransigence of real estate lawyers who insist on having their way.

Contracts take time to negotiate, and while there are ways to limit negotiations¹ it still remains true that most substantial projects kick off under a Letter of Intent (LOI). All practitioners teach that the LOI should have a very short life, but in practice, a surprising number of construction contracts are not signed until closeout. The LOI keeps being extended, with more and more work authorized to be performed pending the formalization of the contract.

In theory, the “Owner”² retains control during the pre-Contract Stage because the Owner can terminate the LOI at any time and for any reason or no reason.³ In practice, once a constructor actually begins operations pursuant to a LOI or informal agreement, the constructor will act as though it is The Anointed One for the whole project. Depending on what the Owner has paid for during the pre-Contract Stage, it may be impractical to replace the constructor without a good reason. It may also be impossible, particularly if the trades are so beholden to the constructor that they won’t accept a substitute.

[13.1] II. THE LETTER OF INTENT

The Letter of Intent should identify the parties to the project and set out the nature of the Work in as much detail as practical. If a “100% Complete” set of plans and specifications is ready, then the LOI can refer to those documents. If the design is less complete than the Owner will need to attend to describing the project in enough detail to guide the actions of the Constructor.

The LOI should make it clear that “The Contract” is in flux. Owners typically reserve the right to cancel at any time and for any reason or no reason, with its obligations limited to paying for the Work accomplished. There will be additions to that measure to defray the cost of demobilizing and protecting Work in place. Unwinding the insurance coverage may be quite different.

1 One time-honored way is to include all of the terms of the contract in a “Project Manual.” The price quoted or bid thus reflects all of the terms incorporated into the documents and which should have been reviewed by the Owner before approval. When imposing the terms of the contract on bidders, it is advisable to hold a pre-bid conference at which the bidders can express comments and concerns. Those that are adopted are communicated to the bidders through an Addendum, which becomes part of the basis of the bargain in fact.

2 “Owner” is used in the construction industry meaning of “he who pays for the Work.”

3 This right is the distinctive element of a Letter of Intent as distinguished from “The Contract.” A full contract is usually not terminable by the Owner except for default or on payment of compensation for the termination.

Some Letters of Intent sidestep those issues by limiting the interim work to items that can be performed off-site. The Constructor should have its own general liability insurance to cover activity at its workshop, and much of the long lead time Work that is addressed by LOIs will be done by subcontractors and material suppliers at their own premises. Once operations begin on the site, the task of unwinding the insurance coverage becomes more daunting. For example, if the Owner elects to obtain a “Wrap-Up” Policy, the amounts paid up front or irrevocably committed to be paid will have a major role to play in the decision to terminate or not. In such a case, the party that places the insurance—and this is usually but not always the Owner—is not protected by the ability to cancel the Letter of Intent unless it also has the ability to substitute a new Constructor as the insured contractor under the Wrap. These concerns can also arise even without a wrap if the Owner is taking on the obligation to advance front-end costs.

The key to maintaining the LOI as such lies in keeping the constructors on a short leash. Once the Constructor is authorized to proceed with the Work on a Time and Materials basis, the Project has moved beyond the LOI stage: you now have a contract for the whole Project, and unwinding that sort of deal is as hard as resolving an acrimonious divorce for two glitterati with no pre-nup.

Bear in mind that some up-front costs should never be paid under a LOI. Tower Cranes come to mind as a large financial commitment, one that once incurred is unlikely to be undone unless the Project is being abandoned. That much said, the performance of substantial parts of the Work under a mere LOI remains an issue that cannot be addressed properly except by getting the contract signed. This is not limited to construction contracts. Most leasing lawyers have war stories in their repertoires that attest to the importance of compromise. Failing to compromise means that you may never get the contract signed in time to be useful, leading all involved to reap only the liveliest awfulness.

The parties usually have only themselves to blame for the outcome. Owners are so petrified at the rising cost of certain components that they will brook no delay in getting that phase built. Contractors will of course extract maximum benefit from working on a quantum meruit basis.

[13.2] III. WHOSE PROJECT IS IT, ANYWAY?

Construction is perilous, expensive and hard to control. One of the tried and tested solutions to the risks of construction is to delegate the Work to the Tenant. The alternative—that of Landlord agreeing to achieve the construction (e.g., “build to suit” deals) puts the Landlord in the construction business, and this brings with it all the perils of construction.

The foremost peril is that of a failure to complete the work. If the Landlord has agreed to do the initial work, it cannot expect to collect rent until the space is ready for the Tenant to occupy and use the space. There is a flip side to using the space: most constructors operate on the theory that once there is “beneficial occupancy” of the Work, it is deemed to be Substantially Complete. That stage usually results in a substantial payment to the constructors.

The Landlord’s work is of course critical. Landlords must be aware that some “base building work” has the potential for significant downsides, among which the presence of asbestos or other hazardous materials must hold pride of place. Even if a Tenant is willing to undertake the abatement, e.g., of asbestos, the health of the entire building can be compromised if the abatement is not done thoroughly and carefully. Moreover, as the owner of the premises from which the toxic or hazardous material is generated, the Landlord owns the materials and their risks in perpetuity. Be aware that if abatement work is performed by a lower-tier subcontractor, the insurance coverage may not help the Landlord unless newer forms of endorsement are being used. Many forms of Additional Insured endorsement provide coverage only to a party with whom the contractor has a contract. Subcontractors’ policies cannot name an Owner as an additional insured unless a novel endorsement is employed.

The risks that come from letting the Tenant engage and hire the constructor and architect are both operational and financial. On the operational side, the Landlord needs to be satisfied that the construction documents reflect the limitations of the site. Zoning and other legal constraints may be relevant; structural and systems adequacy need to be evaluated. The Tenant’s satisfaction with the design should be implied from the submittal of the plan, but Landlords should always evaluate the plans for compliance with law. The Landlord bears the burden if, for example, the newly renovated space does not include ADA-accessible restrooms. Operational concerns extend to the attributes of and controls over the design and construction team. Especially if the Work is being done with other Tenants in occupancy, Landlords need to control the times when noisy work can be performed, as well as to restrict the use of common spaces and vertical transportation systems.

When work is performed “out of the ground,” the constructors should know everything that there is to know about the building. Repurposing, renovating and otherwise working in an existing building brings different issues. The walls are often closed up, leaving the team to rely on existing plans to discern where utility risers and distribution facilities are located. There is no guarantee that the plans were followed to the letter, and while as-built drawings may be available they are not always accurate. We then have the scenario where a wall is cut in order to gain access or perform work, and while the existing documents showed that the location was suitable, it sometimes happens that the contractor hits an electrical or gas line. In especially unlucky cases, both services are severed, with sparks, explosion and fire to follow. Insurance is a subject with which construction planners need to be conversant. This is sometimes seen in construction when a wall is closed up before the Work was inspected. In this case, it may be easier to assign blame, either to a trade who installed risers in the wrong place or the general contractor who did not annotate the documents for “as built” purposes.

On the financial side, a Landlord’s construction exposure is found principally in the laws governing mechanics’ liens. Controlling this exposure is highly dependent on state laws. Many states allow a contractor to waive the right to enforce a mechanic’s lien, not only for itself but for all of its subcontractors. Other states vitiate any waiver of the right to claim a lien in the absence of payment. At least one state provides that not only funds actually received but the right to receive further funds are held in trust for the benefit of “downstream” contractors, laborers and material suppliers.

One recurrent theme in mechanics lien enforcement is whether the Landlord has assented to the performance of the Work. As a general rule, the constructor’ right to a lien requires the Landlord’s positive assent, and this requires more than the terms of the Lease that call for construction work. A contractor who wishes to enforce a lien against the whole building needs to have the assent of the Landlord, and a wise constructor gets it in writing.

[13.3] IV. THE CITADEL OF PRIVITY STILL STANDS

Many states leave the Landlord without adequate remedies against careless architects and engineers who are hired by Tenants. The requirement for privity of contract is not universal, but in states, such as New York, that require it, the lack of a contract between the Landlord and the design/construction teams is fatal to the claim. Indemnification agreements are useful in this connection, not only because they provide for payment to the injured party (almost always, the Landlord) but because they often trigger insurance coverage. However, most forms of architects' and engineers' professional liability coverage do not contain an "insured contract" exception. This means that the policy does not cover contractual liability. To the extent that a loss is occasioned by the designer's negligence, Landlords may be able to prosecute claims against the Tenant and the Tenant will bring a claim for the designer's negligence. The outcomes are highly variable, but the variation can be controlled by invoking a Liquidating Agreement.

Liquidating agreements have been used for decades, especially in construction, to bridge the lack of privity that would otherwise defeat the claim. It has been seen most often in claims by Subcontractors against Owners.

Let us suppose we have three parties, A, B and C. A has a contract with B; B has a related contract with C. If C's misconduct causes a loss to A, A has no remedy against C, but must claim against B. In a Liquidating Agreement, B formally admits that it is responsible to A for the loss caused by C. B agrees to institute a claim against C, including suit if needed. B, who may have its own claim against C, agrees to account for the proceeds of the suit. This enables a Landlord to maintain a claim against remote contractors and consultants without increasing the financial risk to the Tenant.

Bear in mind that liquidating agreements can increase the risks faced by an Owner. If the Owner deals with the contractor, secure in the belief that the trades generally cannot enforce claims against the Owner,⁴ it may be surprised when the Contractor asserts claims derived from the disappointments of the subcontractors. Controlling this risk can be folded into the general terms of the General Contract (or CM Agreement) if the Owner retains the right to approve not only the identity of the subcontractors but also the terms of the engagement. A liquidating agreement is an amendment of the underlying contract, and if the Owner's approval of the terms of the subcontract is required, then the General Contractor cannot enter into a liquidating agreement unless the Owner assents to the change.

One convenient way to ensure that these terms become part of the contract is to require.

4 Mechanics liens are normally the only exception to this rule, and should receive their own proper attention.

In jurisdictions that require privity, the lease needs to cover this gap with a broad form indemnification agreement. Whether the Tenant is able to pass the hot potato back to the architect's insurer depends on how that contract is written.

[13.4] V. DELIVERY METHODS AND PAYMENT OF COSTS

Payment is a critical aspect in which General Contracting and Construction Management differ. A General Contractor covers the costs of construction that it must pay—to subcontractors, laborers, material suppliers and others—prior to the Owner being obligated to pay the costs. The Owner's obligation to pay does not turn on what the Contractor has to pay, but on the percentage of completion of the Work.

Some of these expenses are simply enormous: a project-specific general liability policy with the substantial limits required⁵ represents a significant capital outlay. Unless different terms are negotiated, this premium is recouped pro rata as the Work progresses. Under Construction Management, the CM collects from the Owner the amounts that it is obligated to pay to others. Under CM, payment of the entire insurance premium will fall due from Owner to the CM when the premium bill is payable.

A portion of each "Progress Payment" is withheld to provide some security to the Owner for defective or omitted work, and to ensure that the contractor always has an incentive to finish the Work. There was a time when retainage of 10% of each progress payment was close to universal. The market is different today. Constructors will negotiate lesser amounts of retainage, sometimes using a formula that calls for retainage of 10% until the job is 50% complete, with no further retainage being held. In theory, when the Work is complete, the Owner will still hold 5% of the Contract Sum, an amount which should cover the Owner's exposure as long as it is paying attention to the progress of the Work.

Variable retainage can be a recipe for trouble. Many states have enacted "Prompt Payment Acts" that regulate payments for construction work. The New York Act addresses, among many other things, retainage under general contracts and subcontracts. The statute permits a contractor to withhold retainage from a trade at a rate no higher than the retainage provided in the general contract: "A contractor or subcontractor may also retain a reasonable amount for retainage so long as the amount does not exceed the actual percentage retained by the owner.”⁶

In our hypothetical situation, let us suppose that the project is more than 50% complete. There is no further retainage being withheld on account of the general contract. Does this mean that a painting subcontractor, all of whose work is performed after the project midway point, is entitled to paid all of the value its work, without retainage? Or must we calculate the net amount of the whole contract sum that is withheld after the current payment is made? No court decisions have been found to date. It is, however, worth noting that, according to the only available industry surveys (taken in 2004), most private projects call for retainage at 10% for the entire project.⁷ Current political initiatives by the American Subcontractors’ Association indicate that the fight has a long way to go, but some states have enacted legislation limiting retainage to 5%.

There are alternatives to retainage. When contracts are bonded, many constructors argue that retainage is unnecessary. That argument runs into resistance because construction sureties are not known for the speed with which they pay claims. Hence the self-help remedy of retainage retains significant value.

Landlords may wish to consider the approach to contract security that has become de rigueur in Continental Europe, the Middle East, North Africa, Latin America and Oceania: independent bank guarantees. These instruments are functionally indistinguishable from standby letters of credit.⁸ They are not taken for the full contract sum, but for an amount calculated to make the Owner whole following a default. Another alternative is to take a guaranty from the Tenant, and where a credit party is available, recourse to that person can be invaluable.

[13.5] VI. INSURANCE

Construction carries with it a need for insurance. It also has impacts on insurance coverage that outlast the construction project.

Improvements and betterments, even if they are paid for by the Tenant, are real estate. They increase the insurable value of the building, and even the Landlord has no obligation to replace them they are still part of the building. If the Landlord was carrying just enough insurance to meet the coinsurance requirements of the policies before the Work was done, then the installation of improvements and betterments may result in coinsurance penalties for the Owner. The only way to avoid this problem is to secure an Agreed Value Endorsement, which eliminates the coinsurance requirements of the policy.

Bear in mind that construction work, regardless of its motivation, calls for both First Party property insurance and Third Party liability insurance. Landlords should be aware that the “standard” form of property insurance, the ISO Building & Personal Property Insurance Coverage Form, provides coverage for “additions under construction, alterations or repairs to the building or structure.” This coverage provides $250,000 of coverage for the building additions and $100,000 in personal property coverage as long as it is constructed on the Insured Premises and used for purposes similar to the existing building or as a warehouse. The amount of coverage can be increased, but its duration is strictly limited to thirty days. This coverage does not extend to Personal Property of Others, so this coverage is unsuited for heavy projects.

For projects of longer duration, or which involve substantial personal property, somebody needs to procure Builders Risk Insurance. Despite its broad-sounding name, Builders Risk Insurance is property insurance on property that is under construction.

Interior construction work is ineligible for coverage under Inland Marine policies. As a result, any request by any constructor to be named as an Additional Insured Party on the builders risk should be resisted. The non-Inland Marine property insurance provides that misconduct by any “Insured,” such as withholding information about the risk, or a providing misleading information about a claim, vitiates the entire policy.⁹

It is also unnecessary. The usual forms of construction agreement provide that the Owner has the power to adjust claims for casualty losses to the Work under construction and that it is accountable for the proceeds of the Policy. The standard form includes terms that require the Owner to segregate funds and to obtain a surety bond if demanded by any party in interest. In the absence of such an agreed term, some states require the proceeds of the property insurance to be held in trust, though the terms of the trust are highly variable from State to State. In New York, the Lien Law requires the recipient of trust funds to use them solely to pay the “cost of the Improvement,” a defined term that the Landlord’s team should be familiar with. There is not guarantee the trades will be paid equitably, but the trust fund represents a pool of value that may not be used for other purposes as long as any of the protected contractors, subcontractors, laborers, material suppliers and consultants (to include architects and engineers) are unpaid. Diverting the funds is larceny, and while prosecutions under this section were vanishingly rare during the 20th Century, things have changed. People have been prosecuted for diverting trust funds, and even if the money went to someone who had a claim related to the project, if the payment does not match up with the “Cost of the Improvement,” then the payor will have a defense the crime but it will have to restore the funds.

⁹ A mortgagee escapes the forfeiture of coverage because, as long as the premium is paid, a mortgagee who is named as such in the Policy is deemed to have its very own policy of insurance, which is not vitiated by any other insured’s misconduct.

As indicated above, someone has to obtain builders risk insurance. Sometimes, because constructors have relationships with insurance producers, it is the contractor who places the insurance. This calls for attention as well, because in many cases, it will be the contractor who is named as the insured party, both on the property coverage and on the liability policy.

On the property side, the trouble with this structure is the way the policy covers materials and equipment that will be installed. The risk of loss of personalty shifts to the Owner not later than the time when they are delivered to the Site. If the materials were purchased under a shipment contract (which is assumed under the UCC) then the risk of loss is on the buyer as soon as shipment takes place. However, an ISO Builders Risk policy does not cover anything that is not at (or within 100 feet of) the insured site. What is needed is an inland marine floater policy to cover the transit risk. If the contractor is still the named insured under the builders risk policy, then a coverage gap arises because the materials and equipment that are laid down at the Site are the property, not of the contractor-named insured, but of the Owner. The builders risk policy provides only limited coverage the Personal Property of Others at the Site, and while the $2,500 limit can be raised by endorsement it is unlikely that such a endorsement will have been purchased.

The Landlord should always be the sole Named Insured under the property policy.

Similar concerns arise for the liability policy. Users must understand that liability insurance is written with several limits of liability.

It is not a good idea for an Owner to expect that its liability exposures are adequately covered by being an Additional Insured under the constructor's policy. While every Owner should insist on being added to the liability policies of all constructors who set foot on the Site, doing so is not enough. Some insurance companies simply do not defend an additional insured party until a court orders them to do so. There are many cases in which the claims back and forth over Additional Insured coverage went on for years after the underlying claims were settled. In many of these cases, the Additional Insured Landlord had to fund the costs of defense until the case was resolved.

Every Owner needs to have a liability insurance policy that it places and controls.¹⁰ At the very least, it should cover the costs of accident investigation and legal defense, though again, attention is needed.

It has been said that liability insurance is litigation insurance: it pays the cost of defending even the most laughable case—so long as it is a suit for bodily injury or property damage.¹¹ Coverage for defense costs, investigative costs, and other supplemental payments can be provided over and above the limits of liability that were purchased. The ordinary rule is that supplemental payments are “outside the limits.” However, some insurance companies and producers write the policy with supplemental payments being “inside the limit.” In that case, payments made to lawyers, doctors and investigators will erode the amount of insurance available to pay the claim. This is only one of the many changes that are endorsed onto policies that are never reflected in insurance certificates. This is why any insurance lawyer will tell you that you must RTFP, or Read the Friendly Policy.¹²

10 One alternative, known as Owners & Contractors Protective insurance, is supposed to take the place of the Owner's liability coverage and to obviate the contractor covering the Owner as an Additional Insured. While it does satisfy the requirement for a dedicated policy, the form does not cover liability that arises from completed construction, and its coverage is simply not as robust as what a policyholder expect from Commercial General Insurance.

11 Sometimes other coverages are present. CGL insurance may also be written to cover “personal injury and advertising liability,” which addresses false arrest, detention or imprisonment; malicious prosecution, defamation; invasion of privacy and unfair competition; and it can be written to provide medical payments coverage for those who sustain bodily injury from the premises or operations an insured party.

12 That's not what RTFP stands for, but this publication has certain standards. Cf., the Engineer's Saw: RTF Manual.

Certificates of insurance have a fundamental problem: they are not worth the paper they are printed on. Note the boldface legend at the top of every ACORD™ certificate: this certificate tells you nothing: read the policy. In most states, the certificate holder cannot sue the broker who issued the certificate because in the absence of privity of contract, the broker owes no duty of care to the certificate holder.¹³

Additional Insured Parties do not get notice when a policy is canceled, nor do they get notices that the limits of liability for a policy have been exhausted. Unless they make a special effort, they will have no idea of the special policy conditions that may be in the package.

Some of the conditions that are endemic to insurance can be significant. It is common for Owners' and Contractors' policies to mandate that all contractors and subcontractors on the job must name the insured as an Additional Insured Party on their respective CGL policies, and that they have at least a specified amount of insurance. Read this endorsement carefully, as it is frequently specific to each insurance company. The policies range from mild to draconic.

Some policies say that if the Named Insured did not get certificates of insurance from a prime contractor or major trade and the loss occurs on that contractor's watch, then there is a penalty deductible for that claim.¹⁴ This is a mild approach. At the other extreme are clauses that require that every trade on the site, even for a trivial amount of Work, has to get AI coverage for the Policyholder. Some require that the coverage has to attach: a false certificate is as bad as no certificate. Some policies make the AI coverage into a condition of the policy: if a trade does give up what is needed, then the whole insurance policy is void.

RTFP. And make sure that the Lease, which is the fundamental document here, reflects the needed construction and risk management terms.

13 The result might be different if the certificate of insurance is signed by an agent of the insurance company. However, so far as we are aware, none of the companies that markets its policies through agents (as opposed to brokers) will authorize an agent to issue a certificate of insurance. These companies are notable for the speed with which they produce a temporary permanent policy.

14 The usual deductible for construction liability policies is $25,000 per occurrence; a failure to get the required certificates from the involved trades causes the deductible to increase to $50,000.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

DRAFTING CONSIDERATIONS FOR ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES IN COMMERCIAL LEASING TRANSACTIONS

Lawrence Schnapf, Esq.

[14.0] I. INTRODUCTION

Parties to commercial leasing transactions frequently overlook environmental issues because they believe that tenants who do not use large quantities of hazardous chemicals will not be exposed to significant environmental liability. Consequently, the parties may do little to no environmental due diligence and use obsolete or boilerplate lease provisions that do not specifically allocate environmental risks. Even when a lessee examines environmental conditions of a site, the investigation is often limited to ensuring that there are no environmental conditions that would impair its ability to operate at the site or that the property is adequate for the intended use.

What these parties do not realize is that owners and operators of commercial property can be liable for contamination associated with historic uses. This means that landlords can be liable for contamination caused by their tenants and tenants may be responsible for contamination that preceded their tenancy.

This chapter will review environmental issues that may arise in leasing transactions and provides practical suggestions on how to address these issues. It begins with a summary of the principal sources of environmental liability on parties in commercial leasing transactions and discusses some of the more problematic uses that can lead to environmental liability. The chapter then reviews lease provisions with annotations that may be used to address or allocate environmental liability.

[14.1] II. ENVIRONMENTAL ISSUES UNDER COMMON LAW

Prior to the enactment of modern environmental laws, liability for contamination in leasing transactions was governed solely by contract and tort principles. In the absence of an express agreement or some misrepresentation, the tenant was expected to make its own careful examination of the conditions of the property and the vendor or landlord would not be liable for any harm or defects existing in the property.¹ The tenant was traditionally liable for harm caused to persons or property for dangerous conditions or nuisances created by it without the landlord's knowledge or acquiescence.² The tenant also was required to maintain the demised premises during the duration of the leasehold and to return the premises in good condition, less normal wear and tear.

1 This concept has sometimes been referred to as "caveat lessee."

Under common law, the general rule was that the lessor would not be liable to the lessee or others for harm for dangerous conditions existing at the time of the transfer³ or created after lessee took possession of the property.⁴ Over time, the courts crafted a number of exceptions to this common law principle of lessor non-liability. One such exception was that a landlord could be subject to liability if it knew or had reason to know of a condition that posed an unreasonable risk of physical harm to persons, the lessor had reason to believe that the lessee would not discover the dangerous condition, and the lessor concealed or failed to disclose this condition to a lessee or sublessee.⁵

Another was that, a lessor may be held liable for tenant activities that constitute a nuisance, such as environmental contamination, if the lessor consented to such action or knew that the tenant's operations would likely release contaminants and the landlord failed to take precautions to prevent such damage.⁶ Under this exception, it is not enough to show that the tenant's expected use of the premises is merely capable of creating a nuisance. If the premises could have been used by the tenant without becoming a nuisance, the landlord will not be liable for any nuisance created by the acts or omissions of the lessee after commencement of the leasehold.

Modern formulations link liability of lessor's and lessee's to a failure to exercise reasonable care and incorporate concepts of comparative negligence. For example, the Third Restatement of Torts moves away from creating duties based on the person's relationship with the land and instead adopts a general duty of reasonable care for by possessors of land- those in control of property.⁷ Thus, a lessor has a duty to exercise reasonable care for any risks that are created by the lessor and a duty to disclose any latent dangerous condition that the landlord knows or should know are unknown to the lessee.⁸ This duty to disclose includes dangerous latent conditions that were not created by the lessor.⁹ The disclosure obligation hinges on if the lessee appreciates the danger posed by the condition and not simply if the dangerous condition is open or obvious. The lessor's duty is not cut off by a lessee's failure to exercise reasonable care to discover dangerous conditions.¹⁰

In New York, landlords and tenants have been held liable for contamination under common law principles such as strict liability, nuisance, trespass and negligence. Owners who have failed to abate contamination caused by their tenants have been found liable for creating or maintaining a nuisance.¹¹ While some states allow transferees to bring a nuisance action against their transferor on the grounds that "the creator of a nuisance remains liable even after alienating his property," New York courts have held that a nuisance action can only be maintained between adjoining landowners, and is not a proper claim in a suit between successive landowners or operators of the same property.¹²

New York has a three-year statute of limitations for claims for personal injury and damage claims relating to exposure to hazardous substances. However, the statute of limitations is not linked to when the spill or discharge first occurred but from the date that the injuries are discovered or should have been discovered by a reasonably diligent party.¹³

[14.2] III. SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL FEDERAL ENVIRONMENTAL LAWS AFFECTING COMMERCIAL LEASING TRANSACTIONS

Numerous federal and state environmental laws can impose liability on owner or operators of contaminated property. The principal federal environmental laws of concern in commercial leasing transactions are the federal Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA)¹⁴ and the federal Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA).¹⁵ The principal New York environmental laws that may trigger liability in commercial leasing transactions are the New York State Superfund Law (SSF),¹⁶ the Oil Spill Law,¹⁷ and the Petroleum Bulk Storage Act (PBSA).¹⁸

A complete evaluation of these environmental laws is beyond the scope of this chapter. However, a summary of the key elements of these laws and how they apply to commercial leasing transactions are provided to assist the reader.

Practice Note: Before discussing these environmental laws, it is important to point out that real estate transactions have grown in complexity and in many instances have outpaced environmental laws that were enacted three decades ago. Law students are taught in Real Property class that property ownership consists of multiple rights that should be viewed as a bundle of sticks that may not necessarily all belong to the same person. Each stick represents a separate right or interest in the land, such as the right to sell, lease or subdivide the land, convey mineral rights, construct buildings, harvest its resources and exclude trespassers. The sticks can be conveyed individually or collectively depending on the extent of the interest conveyed in a transaction. Thus, a landowner may lease surface rights to one person, transfer the underground mineral rights to another entity while still holding the remaining sticks in the bundle such as the right to sell the land, though the sale may be subject to rights extended to others. The government has increasingly been viewed as holding some of the sticks, such as the right to tax, take property under 15 42 U.S.C. § 6901 et seq. Other federal environmental laws of concern to commercial leasing transactions may include the Clean Air Act, 42 U.S.C. § 7401 et. seq. (primarily for properties with oil-fired boilers and asbestos containing materials); the Clean Water Act, 33 U.S.C. § 1251 et seq. (properties with wetlands and that require stormwater permits), and the Toxic Substances Control Act, 15 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq. (PCBs and lead-based paint).

16 Environmental Conservation Law § 27-1301 et seq. (formally known as the “Inactive Hazardous Waste Disposal Law”) (ECL).

17 Navigation Law §§ 170–197 (Nav. Law).

18 ECL § 17-0101 (formally known as “Control of the Bulk Storage of Petroleum”). A similar law, the Hazardous Substance Bulk Storage Act, ECL § 40-0101 can impose cleanup obligations on properties that store certain quantities of hazardous substances in underground or aboveground storage tanks.

eminent domain, and establish rules to regulate use or protect certain natural resources.

While these modern real estate transactions have enabled landowners to extract value by slicing the sticks of property rights into thinner and thinner twigs, state and federal laws that impose liability on owners and operators of contaminated sites have not kept up with the creative and innovative forms of real estate ownership. For example, it is unclear if a commercial condominium could be considered a CERCLA owner by virtue of its fractional ownership in the land represented by the unit deed or if it could be deemed to have exercised sufficient control over the property to be considered a CERCLA operator. As a result of this uncertainty, environmental consultants are often unsure if a REC identified on a property pertains to the particular fractional interest held by the client much less the significance of the REC to the client.

One of the more common scenarios where this issue arises is when a property contains a ground lease. For example, a consultant may be asked to perform a Phase 1 on a shopping center and is advised that certain buildings should not be evaluated because they are subject to ground leases and are not of the property. While the structures are not the property of the landowner, they can still impact the property. In this situation, it would make sense to evaluate the structure as if it was an adjacent parcel under E1527-05.

A more difficult question is when the property to be investigated is the building on a ground lease. There are many scenarios in which this structure may be used, but it has frequently been employed when developing contaminated properties. Often times, a developer has developed the site and then a ground tenant builds a structure. The consultant will often be told that it should just focus on the building issue since the client does not own the land. Many times, a land use control was required as part of a cleanup but may not have been properly recorded, or the ground tenant is not even aware of the restrictions. If the land use control has not been recorded or an engineering control has not been maintained, this could trigger a re-opener: who is responsible? Certainly the developer should be, but it may be hard to find, or perhaps was a limited liability corporation that no longer has any assets. Could the ground tenant be responsible? If the building is the primary development on the site, the building owner/operator could possibly be viewed as an operator of the site for purposes of CERCLA liability or state environmental laws.

A more complicated but common situation is where a hotel or office building occupies the air above the land pursuant to a development agreement. There may be a sub-surface garage that serves as an engineering cap and an easement granted in favor of the building so its occupants can use the garage. Does the owner of the building occupying the air above contaminated land have liability if the engineering control is not recorded or maintained? Again, if the building is the dominant structure on the land, it is quite possible that the building owner or manager could be liable as an operator of the site unless it has taken steps to obtain a formal covenant not to sue or other liability release from the appropriate state agency. In the end, liability will be based on the particular facts of each case.

[14.3] A. CERCLA

CERCLA liability is probably the most significant environmental law for commercial leasing transactions. CERCLA applies to releases of hazardous substances.¹⁹ The federal Environmental Protection Agency (EPA) is authorized to perform cleanups (known as response actions) of releases of hazardous substances²⁰ and seek reimbursement of its costs from four categories of potentially responsible parties (PRPs) who may be strictly, jointly and retroactively liable for cleanup costs.²¹ Private parties who incur cleanup costs may also seek reimbursement from PRPs.²² Indeed, because the New York State Superfund law does not expressly authorize the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation (NYSDEC) to recover its cleanup costs, NYSDEC customarily uses CERCLA to seek cost recover.

19 Petroleum is excluded from the definition of hazardous substances. 42 U.S.C. § 9601(14). Because of the so-called petroleum exclusion, neither EPA nor private parties may seek reimbursement of costs incurred to remediate contamination from leaking gasoline underground storage tanks (USTs). White Plains Hous. Auth. v. Getty Props. Corp., 2014 WL 7183991 (S.D.N.Y. Dec. 16, 2014). However, the petroleum does not apply to contaminants added to petroleum during normal use such as waste oil. City of New York v. Exxon Corp., 766 F. Supp. 177, 186 (S.D.N.Y. 1991).

21 42 U.S.C. § 9607(a).

22 Innocent parties may seek 100% recovery of their costs (known as cost recovery actions) under 42 U.S.C. § 9607(a)(4)(B) while PRPs may file contribution actions under 42 U.S.C. § 9613(f)(1) if they incur costs that exceed their allocated share of the liability.

[14.4] 1. CERCLA Liability for Property Owners and Tenants

The types of CERCLA PRPs that may be liable include current and past owners and operators of contaminated property. The liability for past owners or operators under CERCLA is not necessarily congruent with the liability of current owners or operators. Parties that currently hold title or possession of contaminated property may be liable for historic contamination that occurred prior to the time the owner acquired title or the operator came into possession of the property.²³ However, past owners or operators are only liable only if they owned or occupied the property “at the time of disposal” of the hazardous substances.²⁴

Practice Note: New York courts have held that the term “disposal” does not refer to mere movement or migration of preexisting contamination but requires some affirmative act of disposal.²⁵ Under this line of cases, the mere migration or movement of preexisting contamination during the time a party owned the property is insufficient to impose liability on a past owner when another party placed the pollutants on the property. As a result, the liability of a former owner may be more limited in scope than the liability of a current owner. This is because current owners are responsible for any contamination that is present on the site regardless of who introduced the contaminants into the environment, while past owners can avoid liability for preexisting contamination if no disposal occurred during their ownership and they are fortunate enough to have conveyed title prior to the commencement of any enforcement action or filing of a lawsuit seeking cost recovery or contribution.

Current landlords may be considered CERCLA owners simply based on their ownership of property even if the owner did not place the hazardous waste on the site or cause the release.²⁶ Furthermore, a current passive landlord or sublessor does not have to exercise any control over the disposal activity to be liable as a CERCLA owner.²⁷

Tenants may be liable under CERCLA either as a CERCLA owner, if they had sufficient indicia of ownership, or as a CERCLA operator based on their control of a property. When deciding if a tenant should be considered a “de facto owner,” courts will examine rights and obligations of the tenant under a lease to see if effective control of the property had been handed over to the tenant. Some of the factors that courts have considered include:

- If there is a long-term lease where the lessor cannot direct how the property is used;
- If the lessee can sublet without permission of the owner;
- Whether the lessee is responsible for paying all costs, including taxes, assessments and operation and maintenance costs; and
- Whether the lessee is responsible for making any and all structural changes and other repairs.

Practice Note: Classifying a party as a CERCLA owner or operator may significantly impact the extent of the party’s cleanup obligations. This is because the scope of liability for a CERCLA operator may not be the same as that of a CERCLA owner. The test that most courts have adopted for determining if a party is a CERCLA operator liability is that the party must have exercised control over the contaminated property or, at least, the activity that caused the contamination. Often times, a current CERCLA owner may be liable for all historic contamination at a site while a tenant that qualifies as a current CERCLA operator may not be liable for any of the costs or just a portion of the costs. For example, a tenant may not be considered a CERCLA “operator” of an inactive UST that leaked hazardous substances and was abandoned before the tenant took possession of the property, and the tank was not part of the demised premises.²⁸

The leading case in New York for determining liability of tenants and subtenants is *Commander Oil Corp. v. Barlo Equipment Corp.*²⁹ The plaintiff initially leased one parcel to the defendant, Barlo Equipment Corp (Barlo), in 1964 and a second parcel to Pasley Solvents & Chemicals, Inc. (Pasley) in 1969. Barlo used its parcel for office and warehouse space while Pasley operated a solvent repackaging and reclamation business on its leasehold. In 1972, the plaintiff consolidated the leases so that 28 A different outcome might be reached for an abandoned petroleum UST under the New York State Oil Spill Law.

29 215 F.3d 321 (2d Cir. 2000).

Barlo was the lessee for both parcels and was sublessor for the Pasley lot. Under the new lease, Barlo was responsible for basic maintenance and payment of taxes on both lots.

In 1981, contamination was discovered on the Pasley parcel. Eventually, plaintiff entered into a consent order with EPA to implement a cleanup and sought contribution from Barlo for the costs plaintiff incurred at the former Pasley lot on the theory that it was a CERCLA owner. Plaintiff did not proceed against Barlo under an “operator” theory because Barlo never conducted operations at the Pasley parcel. The district court granted summary judgment to the plaintiff, ruling that Barlo was a CERCLA owner by virtue of its “authority and control” over the Pasley.³⁰ After a bench trial, the district court ruled that although Pasley was responsible for all of response costs associated with its lot, the costs had to be allocated between the plaintiff and Barlo since Pasley was “financially irresponsible.”

On appeal, Barlo argued that CERCLA’s owner liability was restricted to owners of record while Commander Oil urged a more expansive definition that relied primarily on the right to control property, whether the right is possessory or is a recorded property interest. The Second Circuit acknowledged that most of the district courts that have addressed the issue have held that site control is a sufficient indicator to find lessees or sublessors liable as CERCLA owners. However, the appeals court also noted that the circuit precedent provided that CERCLA “owner” and “operator” liability should be treated separately and suggested that relying solely on a site control analysis could essentially make owners of all operators and thereby render most operator language of CERCLA superfluous.

The court recognized that while the typical lessee should not be held liable as an owner, there might be circumstances when owner liability for a lessee would be appropriate.³¹ However, the court emphasized that in 30 For support of its holding that Barlo was a CERCLA owner, the district court relied on Delaney v. Town of Carmel, 55 F. Supp. 2d 237 (S.D.N.Y. 1999) and United States v. A & N Cleaners & Launderers, Inc., 788 F. Supp. 1317 (S.D.N.Y. 1992). These cases interpreted the term “owner” to extend beyond the fee or record owner to anyone possessing the requisite degree of control over the property.

31 The court provided three rare instances where the lessee did not have a typical lease but instead may have obtained a priority of ownership rights: (1) sale-leaseback arrangements . . . if the lessee actually retains most rights of ownership with respect to the new record owner; (2) extremely long-term leases where, according to the terms of the lease, the lessee retains so many of the indicia of ownership that he is the de facto owner; and (3) where a lessee/sublessor has impermissibly exploited more rights than originally leased.

reaching such a conclusion, the critical analysis was the relationship between the owner and the tenant/sublessor, and not the lessee/sublessor's relationship with its sublessee. The court then provided a non-exclusive list of factors that might constitute circumstances where lessees/sublessors might have the requisite indicia of ownership to that they could be liable as de facto owners under CERCLA. These included:

1. If the lease is for an extensive term such as a 99-year lease and does not allow owner/lessor any rights to determine how the property is used;
2. If the lease cannot be terminated by the owner before it expires by its terms;
3. If the lessee has the right to sublet all or some of the property without notifying the owner;
4. If the lessee is responsible for payment of all taxes, assessments, insurance, and operation and maintenance costs; and
5. If the lessee is responsible for making all structural and other repairs.

Turning to the lease, the court concluded that Barlo did not possess sufficient attributes of ownership over the Pasley lot based on the following factors:

- Barlo was limited to using its parcel and only “for that business presently conducted by tenant on a portion of the same premises leased hereunder”;
- Barlo was required to obtain written consent from Commander Oil before making “any additions, alterations or improvements” on the land, which alterations would become Commander Oil's property in any event;
- The lease required Barlo to obtain written approval from Commander Oil to sublet the property, and prohibited from subletting to any entity that had “any connection with the fuel, fuel oil or oil business”;
- Barlo had to obtain written permission from Commander Oil to display any “sign, advertisement, notice or other lettering” on the building;
- The lease required Barlo to keep the property “clean and in order to the satisfaction of” Commander Oil, and responsible for any damage Barlo itself caused to the premises or to the “systems or equipment or any installation therein”;

- Barlo was prohibited from doing anything that would “in any way increase the rate of fire insurance” on the property, and from bringing or keeping upon the premises “any inflammable, combustible or explosive fluid, chemical or substance”; and
- The lease was limited to a five-year term with one renewal option.

The court also recited the rights reserved by Commander Oil in the lease. Specifically, Commander Oil reserved a right to

- enter onto the lot for various purposes;
- use three oil storage tanks on the Pasley lot;
- maintain “its aerial or a comparable aerial” on the roof of the building;
- make structural repairs; and
- exercise an option to use certain office space on the Barlo lot;

The court went on to acknowledge that Barlo possessed some attributes of ownership with respect to the Pasley lot, such as

- securing insurance for the property;
- responsibility for all assessments on the property and any increases in taxes; and
- assuming responsibility for all nonstructural repairs such as repairs to heating, plumbing and lighting fixtures and equipment; cesspool maintenance, repair and replacement; snow removal; driveway, parking area and pavement repairs, etc.

However, when viewed in totality, the Second Circuit held that Barlo lacked most of the bundle of rights that comes with ownership of property and reversed the ruling of the district court.

More recently, a federal district court granted summary judgment to lessee/sublessor finding that it was not a CERCLA owner. In Next Millen- nium Realty, LLC v. Adchem Corp.,³² the plaintiff's property was identified as one of the sources that contaminated a municipal wellfield. The contamination originated from subtenant dry cleaner following a fire in 1976. The plaintiff's property was placed on the state superfund list and the plaintiff entered into a series of consent decrees with the NYSDEC to remediate its property. Plaintiff commenced a CERCLA contribution action against the lessee and lessee assignee defendants seeking reimbursement of response costs incurred to comply with the consent orders. Because the former tenant had only sublet the property and never operated it, the contribution claim rested entirely on the theory that the tenant could be held liable as a former owner of the site.

Relying on the five factors enumerated in Commander Oil, the plaintiffs moved for partial summary judgment that the defendant lessees were liable as CERCLA "owners." The plaintiffs argued that the lessee exercised its right to sublet the property without the landlord's consent, placed a polluting subtenant on the site, had profited substantially from the sublease and despite knowledge that the subtenant was conducting dry cleaning operations and using PCE, the tenant chose to do nothing to prevent the environmental damage caused to the property. Plaintiff asserted that these actions coupled with the indicia of ownership that the tenant enjoyed under the terms of the lease, and mandated that the tenant be held liable as de facto owner under CERCLA as a matter of law.

After reviewing the lease terms, the district court found that the relationship under the lease did not transform the lessee into a de facto owner. Among the lease terms cited by the court were:

- The lease appeared to be a typical commercial lease between a lessor and a single industrial tenant and consisted of a standard Blumberg form lease with two addenda with a term of 20 years;
- Lessor could sell the site without notifying the tenant, assign its lease interests or mortgage or assign the underlying property during the lease term;
- Lessor could terminate the lease before the 20-year term and did in fact terminate the lease midway through its term;

32 2014 WL 5425488 (E.D.N.Y. 2014).

- Lessor also had the right to terminate the lease at its option in the first six weeks of the lease if lessor did not obtain a mortgage or if the building was destroyed by fire;
- Lessor had unilateral right to determine whether to rebuild or terminate the lease if the building was destroyed by fire;
- Lessor's decision to unilaterally terminate the lease rather than restore the site's building following the fire prevented the tenant's continued use of the premises and demonstrated the tenant's lack of ownership rights;
- Lessor could terminate the lease if the tenant defaulted on any lease obligation, in which case lessor was authorized to institute summary proceedings to terminate the lease and the tenant was contractually obligated to waive right to notice;
- While the lease contained a purchase option for the 12th year, the option was never exercised nor came into existence because lessor terminated the lease prior to the option's effective date;
- Tenant's right to exercise the purchase option after 12 years was subordinate to the mortgagee's superior rights and eliminated the defendants' right to withhold rent or charge the owner with repairs if the site was partially damaged;
- Lessor reserved any condemnation award;
- Tenant had to secure and pay for insurance policies that named lessor as a beneficiary and ensured its right to receive insurance proceeds;
- Tenant was prohibited from doing acts that would increase the fire insurance premiums;
- Tenant's interest in the premises would never constitute a lien on the property and at all times remained subordinate to lessor's mortgage;
- Any past and future loans made by tenant to its shareholders would be subordinated to the lessor's ownership interest;
- The lease limited the tenant's use of the property to lamination and coating of papers, textiles and fabrics and for general manufacturing to manufacturing uses;

- Tenant was prohibited from encumbering or obstructing the sidewalk or permit another to do so;
- Tenant was prohibited from committing a waste or injury to the premises;
- Tenant was required to keep the grass trimmed and maintain the grounds in presentable condition;
- Tenant was prohibited from doing any act that could lead to a mechanic's lien on the site;
- Tenant was prohibited from altering the site without lessor's written permission;
- Tenant was prohibited from posting a sign except in compliance with lessor's terms;
- Tenant was prohibited from removing leasehold improvements without notice and escrowing for the cost of restoration;
- Tenant was obligated to keep the site in "presentable condition" and return it "in good order and condition";
- If tenant remained in the premises at the end of the term, it would be considered holdover tenants on a month to month; and
- Landlord was responsible for all repairs during the first two years and all structural repairs thereafter, except those caused by the tenant's act or neglect. The lessee defendants were responsible for non-structural repairs.

The court did note that the tenant had the right to assign or sublet the property without notifying the lessor. However, this right could only be exercised if tenant remained liable under the lease, the assignee assumed all lease conditions, the assignment was recordable and the assignment or sublease did not increase the cost of fire insurance. Thus, the court said the lease preserved lessor's rights to the property in the event of a sublease or assignment and authorized lessor to enforce such rights directly against the lessee defendants.

While the tenant held a common triple net lease where tenant was to pay certain taxes, assessments, utilities and insurance costs, the lessor was obligated to pay inheritance, transfer and corporate franchise taxes. The court found this was consistent with taxes that are incident to ownership, such as the right to convey or transfer the property.

Based on the lease as a whole, the court ruled that the lessee defendants' lacked most of the core bundle of rights that are associated with ownership of property. Given the insufficient attributes of ownership over the premises, the court held that lessee defendants could not be held liable under CERCLA as a de facto owner, and granted summary judgment in favor of the lessee/sublessors.

Though a New York case, the decision in *Scarlett & Associates, Inc. v. Briarcliff Center Partners, LLC*³³ is nevertheless informative on the potential risks to property managers who ignore environmental issues. And yes, it involves yet another dry cleaner. In that case, a federal district court found there was genuine dispute of material facts as to whether a managing agent of a shopping center was a CERCLA operator. The managing agent did not maintain an office or have personnel at the site, nor did it have keys to any leased space or have the power to evict tenants. The managing agent said its principal responsibilities were to attempt to rent space to tenants that were approved by the owner, collect rent, maintain the common areas of the shopping center, pay bills in a timely manner, and send any excess revenues to the owner. The owner pointed to language in the management services agreement that the managing agent was to obtain all necessary government approvals and perform such acts necessary to ensure that owner was in compliance with all laws. The court noted that the managing agent sent the dry cleaner a certified letter advising the dry cleaner of certain environmental reporting requirements, requested copies of the documentation that the dry cleaner was required to provide to the EPA or an explanation as to why the dry cleaner was exempt from providing such documentation. The court said that this correspondence combined with the other evidence of record indicating that the managing agent generally was responsible for managing and maintaining the shopping center and performing all acts necessary to effect compliance with all laws, rules, ordinances, statutes, and regulations of any governmental authority applicable to the operation of the shopping center was sufficient to create a genuine issue as to whether the managing agent managed the operations of the dry cleaner specifically related to pollution and it therefore met the definition of a former "operator."

[14.5] 2. CERCLA Third Party Defense

CERCLA originally only contained three affirmative defenses to liability: act of God, act of war, and the third-party defense. From a practical standpoint, the third-party defense was the only viable defense available to property owners or operator (e.g., tenants). To establish that defense, the owner or operator would have to show that the release was

- solely caused by a party;
- with whom it had no direct or indirect contractual relationship;
- the defendant exercised due care with respect to the hazardous substances; and
- took precautions against foreseeable actions or omissions of third parties.³⁴

Most courts broadly construed the phrase “in connection with a contractual relationship, directly or indirectly” to encompass virtually all forms of real estate conveyances. As a result, lessors of property that were contaminated by a current or former a tenant could not successfully assert the third-party defense in most states on the grounds that a lease constituted a “contractual relationship” with the responsible party (i.e., lessee). Many courts went as far as holding that a sublease constituted a sufficient indirect contractual relationship to preclude an owner from invoking the third-party defense.

The concept that the mere existence of a lease can preclude an owner from asserting a third-party defense when the contamination is solely caused by a tenant is rather harsh especially in the case of truly absentee landlords with so-called “triple-net leases” or long-term ground leases where the landlord does not exercise any control over the property and its only real contact with the property may be the monthly rent check.

The good news, though, is that the Second Circuit has adopted an expansive view of the third-party defense so that it is a very viable defense for owners or operators of commercial property in New York. The federal courts in New York generally take a narrow view of the phrase “contractual relationship” and have held that the mere existence of a “contractual relationship” does not bar an owner or operator from invoking the defense.³⁵ Instead, a party will only be precluded from asserting the defense if there is some relationship between the disposal or release that caused the contamination and the contract or which allow the landlord to exert some form of control over such activities.³⁶ Thus, a commercial lease is distinguishable from a lease to operate a landfill. In the former situation, the fact that the tenant generates hazardous substances as an incident to its business should not bar the lessor from asserting the third-party defense since the generation or disposal of hazardous substances was not the purpose of the contractual relationship.

Perhaps the seminal case on the third-party defense is State of New York v. Lashins Arcade,³⁷ where a current owner of a shopping center was able to successfully invoke the third-party defense because it did not have a contractual relationship with a former dry cleaner tenant who had discharged hazardous substances into the ground 15 years prior to the current owner's acquisition.

Assuming that a prospective purchaser or tenant could overcome the "contractual relationship" hurdle, it would still have to establish that it satisfied the third prong of the test to exercise due care in dealing with the hazardous substances and the fourth prong, which requires taking precautions against the foreseeable actions of omissions of third parties. For example, the property owner in Lashins Arcade established that it had exercised due care, such as maintaining water filter, sampling drinking water, instructing tenants to avoid discharging into septic, inserted use restrictions into leases and did periodic inspections to assure compliance with this obligation. In contrast, a bank that had subleased its space to a dry cleaner (are you beginning to see a theme about dry cleaners?) was unable to assert the third-party defense because it had failed to assess environmental threats after discovery of disposal would be part of due care analysis.³⁸

35 But see United States v. Occidental Chemical Corp., 965 F. Supp. 408 (W.D.N.Y. 1997) (a deed can serve as an indirect contractual relationship that can prevent a property owner from asserting the third party defense).

36 Westwood Pharm., Inc. v. National Fuel Gas Dist. Corp., 964 F.2d 85 (2d Cir. 1992); but see United States v. A & N Cleaners & Launderers, Inc., 788 F. Supp. 1317 (S.D.N.Y. 1992), where a bank that was sublessor who maintained complete control and responsibility for property where a release occurred was deemed to be an owner for CERCLA purposes.

37 91 F.3d. 353 (2d Cir. 1996). Compare Lashins conduct to the purchaser/owner in Idylwoods Assocs. v. Mader Capital Inc., 956 F. Supp. 410 (W.D.N.Y. 1997).

38 A & N Cleaners, 854 F. Supp. 229.

A number of cases have recently explored the scope of the “due care” obligations of the third-party defense. In New York v. Adamowicz,³⁹ the property owner was unable to establish that it exercised due care despite spending over $1 million addressing environmental concerns at its site. The problem was that it waited too long to respond to the environmental concerns caused by its tenant.

The owner of a former manufactured gas plant (MGP) site was found not to have exercised due care in *New York State Electric & Gas Corp. v. FirstEnergy Corp.*⁴⁰ The court said that after the owner became aware of the extent of the contamination and that New York State Electric & Gas Corp. (NYSEG), which was complying with a state order to remediate 16 MGP sites, needed to acquire portions of the property to effectuate a proper remediation, the owner engaged in protracted negotiations, failed to timely respond to offers and demanded an aggressive sales price that delayed the sale for two years. The court concluded that the delay complicated the remediation, explaining that NYSDEC had first wanted NYSEG to remove the former gasholders and purifying house located on property, and then address the downgradient contamination. Because of the owner’s negotiation posture and lack of responsiveness, the court said NYSEG was not only forced to address the downgradient contamination first, but that the delay allowed coal tar and other MGP contaminants to further migrate from the source area.⁴¹

Practice Note: The vast majority of cleanups at commercial properties are now risk-based cleanups where residual soil or groundwater contamination may be left behind but engineering controls (e.g., impermeable caps like parking lots or building foundations) or institutional controls (e.g., prohibiting use of groundwater, limiting land use to commercial purposes) must be maintained to protect human health. 41 Other examples of property owners in New York failing to assert the defense because they failed to comply with the other prongs of the third party defense include Idylwoods Assoc., 956 F. Supp. at 419–20 (property owner’s decision to do nothing resulting in spread of contamination to neighboring creek was not due care); Shapiro v. Alexanderson, 741 F. Supp. 472 (S.D.N.Y. 1990) (issues of fact material to whether the owners exercised due care and took precautions against both foreseeable acts and foreseeable consequences because did not take any action to halt leachate for five years).

sor or tenant will be required to ensure that the institutional controls are properly maintained to be able to assert the third party defense. This is because the failure of a seller or lessor to properly maintain the institutional controls may be construed as a foreseeable omission. Moreover, if the property owner or lessee fails to monitor the condition of the controls or fails to maintain the controls if the other party fails to do so, this omission could constitute failing to exercise due care regarding the contaminants at the site. This is particularly harsh in cases of absentee landlords where the owner would have to establish that it took precautions against the foreseeable contamination by their tenant's operations.

[14.6] 3. CERCLA Innocent Landowner defense

Because the third-party defense was largely unavailable to purchasers or tenants of contaminated property, Congress enacted the innocent purchaser defense in 1986. Under this defense, a purchaser (or tenant) who "did not know or had no reason to know" of contamination would not be liable as a CERCLA owner or operator.⁴² To establish that it had no reason to know of the contamination, a defendant must demonstrate that it took "all appropriate inquiries . . . into the previous ownership and uses of the facility in accordance with generally accepted good commercial and customary standards and practices."⁴³ In determining if there was an "appropriate inquiry," the 1986 amendments contained five criteria that courts could use in determining if a landowner had implemented an all appropriate inquiry.⁴⁴ Courts did not uniformly apply these criteria and often found that if a property owner did not identify contamination during a pre-acquisition investigation, it probably did not perform an appropriate inquiry.

Since it relies on an affirmative defense, the innocent purchaser has the burden of establishing that it satisfied the elements of the defense. Not surprisingly, most courts narrowly construed the innocent purchaser defense. If a purchaser did not discover contamination before taking title but contamination was subsequently discovered, courts generally concluded that the purchaser did not conduct an adequate inquiry and, therefore, could not avail itself of the defense.

43 42 U.S.C. § 9601(35)(B)(i)(I).

44 The criteria were any specialized knowledge or experience of the innocent purchaser must be taken into account as well as the relationship of the purchase price to the value of the property if it were not contaminated, and whether the presence of contamination was obvious or could be detected by an appropriate site inspection.

Further complicating the burden of the purchaser was that CERCLA did not establish specific requirements for what constituted an appropriate inquiry. As part of the 2002 amendments to CERCLA, EPA was required to promulgate an All Appropriate Inquiries (AAI) rule. Until EPA completed its AAI rule, Congress indicated that the parties could use the ASTM E1527 Phase 1 standard to demonstrate that they complied with the all appropriate inquiries requirement of the innocent purchasers defense.⁴⁵ EPA's AAI rule became effective on November 1, 2006.⁴⁶ A more detailed discussion on environmental due diligence appears later in this chapter.

Practice Note: The innocent purchaser defense is technically part of the third-party defense. By complying with AAI, the owner or tenant will be able to satisfy the second prong of the third party defense that it does not a “contractual relationship” with the party that is solely responsible for the contamination. Thus, even after satisfying AAI, an owner or tenant still has to satisfy the “due care” and “precautionary” prongs to be able to assert the third-party defense.

[14.7] 4. CERCLA Bona Fide Prospective Purchaser (BFPP) Defense

The principal drawback of the CERCLA innocent purchaser defense is that a purchaser or tenant cannot know or have reason to know that the property was contaminated. To incentivize the redevelopment of contaminated properties, Congress added the BFPP to CERCLA as part of the 2002 CERCLA amendments.⁴⁷ This defense allows a landowner or tenant to knowingly acquire or lease contaminated property after January 11, 2002 without incurring liability for remediation if it could establish the following pre-acquisition requirements:

- All disposal of hazardous substances occurred before the purchaser acquired the facility;⁴⁸

45 On May 9, 2003, EPA published a final rule clarifying that for the purposes of achieving the all appropriate inquiries standards of CERCLA, and until the effective date of the EPA AAI rule, persons who purchase or occupied property on or after May 31, 1997 could use either the procedures provided in ASTM E1527-2000, or the ASTM E1527-97.

46 40 C.F.R. § 312.

47 42 U.S.C. § 9607(r).

48 42 U.S.C. § 9601(40)(A).

- The purchaser is not a potentially responsible party (PRP) or affiliated with any other PRP for the property through any direct or indirect familial relationship, any contractual or corporate relationship, or as a result of a reorganization of a business entity that was a PRP;⁴⁹
- The purchaser conducted “all appropriate inquiries” into the past use and ownership of the site.⁵⁰

After taking title, a purchaser must comply with number of “continuing obligations” to maintain its BFPP status. The “continuing obligations” include “taking reasonable steps” to

- stop any continuing release;
- prevent any threatened future release; and
- prevent or limit human, environmental, or natural resource exposure to any previously released hazardous substance.⁵¹

A tenant can attain BFPP status in two ways. First, the tenant can independently comply with the BFP by performing AAI and then satisfying the post-acquisition continuing obligations. Alternatively, a tenant can achieve derivative BFPP status by entering into a lease with a landlord that is already a BFPP.

Practice Note: As an affirmative defense, the party seeking liability protection has the burden that it meets all of the elements of the BFPP. The BFPP is self-implementing, meaning a property owner can assert the liability protection without formal determination by EPA. Of course, the downside of the self-implementing nature of the BFPP is that a party that thinks it may have achieved BFPP status may later learn that a court holds otherwise.

49 42 U.S.C. § 9601(40)(H).

50 42 U.S.C. § 9601(40)(B). EPA promulgated its AAI rule at 40 C.F.R. 312.

51 42 U.S.C. § 9601(40)(D). The other continuing obligations are complying with all release reporting requirements; cooperating, assisting, and providing access to persons authorized to conduct response actions or natural resource restoration at the property; complying with any land use restrictions established as part of a response action and not impeding the effectiveness or integrity of any institutional control used at the site; providing access to persons authorized to operate, maintain, or otherwise ensure the integrity of land use controls at the site; and complying with any EPA request for information or administrative subpoena issued under CERCLA. See 42 U.S.C. § 9601(40)(C), (E)-(G).

There have not been any decisions by any of the federal courts in New York interpreting the BFPP defense. However, based on two federal appeals courts it appears that the BFPP is beginning to resemble the car reservation in the famous Seinfeld episode “The Alternate Side”: The BFPP may be easy to achieve but hard to maintain.⁵² For example, in PCS Nitrogen Inc. v. Ashley II of Charleston LLC,⁵³ a purchaser was found not to be a BFPP because it failed to implement recommendations in a Phase I report and had failed to maintain protective cover on the property, and in Voggenthaler v. Maryland Square LLC, a purchaser was unable to assert the BFPP defense because it did not comply with the appropriate care obligations when it demolished a dry cleaner without taking steps to remove contaminated soil or prevent the contamination from migration.⁵⁴

An example of a property owner that was able to successfully obtain BFPP status is 3000 E. Imperial v. Robertshaw Controls.⁵⁵ The purchaser drained USTs within six months of taking title but did not remove them until it commenced redevelopment three years later. Because it had enrolled in the state voluntary cleanup program and was working under the supervision of the state environmental agency, the court ruled that the plaintiff had satisfied its post-acquisition continuing obligations.

[14.8] 5. CERCLA Contiguous Property Owner (CPO) Defense

Congress also added the CPO⁵⁶ defense with the 2002 CERCLA amendments. This defense provides liability protection to a person own-

Rental Car Agent: “We have your reservation, we just ran out of cars.”

Jerry: “But the reservation keeps the car here. That’s why you have the reservation.”

Rental Car Agent: “I think I know why we have reservations.”

Jerry: “I don’t think you do. You see, you know how to take the reservation, you just don’t know how to hold the reservation. And that’s really the most important part of the reservation: the holding. Anybody can just take them.”

ing or leasing property that has been contaminated originating from a contiguous or adjacent property. A party that qualifies for CPO status will not be required to conduct ground water investigations or to install ground water remediation systems unless it would otherwise be required to conduct such activity under the EPA 1995 policy “Final Policy Toward Owners of Property With Contaminated Aquifers.”⁵⁷

A person seeking to qualify for the CPO defense must comply with the same pre- and post-acquisition obligations as a BFPP. However, while the BFPP can knowingly acquire contaminated property, a CPO must not know or have reason to know of the contamination after it has completed its pre-acquisition AAI investigation. On the other hand, EPA is authorized to issue assurance letters to CPOs that no enforcement action will be initiated under CERCLA and to provide protection against claims for contribution or cost recovery. If an owner cannot qualify for the CPO defense because, for example, it had knowledge of the contamination from an adjacent property, it may still be able to qualify for the BFPP defense.

Practice Note: Many owners and occupants do not focus on environmental conditions at nearby properties during due diligence. They will now need to have to perform thorough Phase I ESAs so that they will be in a position to exercise their post-closing or occupancy “appropriate care” requirements.

[14.9] 6. Innocent Seller’s Defense

An innocent purchaser who then becomes a seller can assert this defense if it discloses the existence of hazardous substances that may have occurred after taking title and complied with the “due care” and “precautionary” prongs of the third-party defense.⁵⁸

[14.10] 7. CERCLA Secured Creditor Exemption

Lenders who, without participating in the management of a facility, hold indicia of ownership to protect a security interest in the facility are also exempt from liability.⁵⁹ However, banks who have foreclosed on property or have been overly involved in the management of a borrower’s operation have been held liable as owners or operators of the property.

[14.11] 8. Contractual and Equitable Defenses

While the statutory defenses are the only ones available to defendants in government cost recovery actions, traditional equitable defenses are available to defendants in private party cost recovery actions or contribution actions, such as laches, release, waiver, or unclean hands, to reduce liability in private cost recovery actions. Defendants may also raise procedural defenses to government cost recovery actions, such as “the response costs were not consistent with the National Contingency Plan”⁶⁰ and “the remedy was not cost-effective.”

[14.12] 9. CERCLA Liens

CERCLA provides EPA with two types of statutory liens. EPA may impose a non-priority lien on property where it has performed response actions. The lien becomes effective when EPA incurs response costs or notifies the owner of the property of its potential liability, whichever is later. The lien is subject to the rights of holders of previously perfected security interests.⁶¹

EPA may also file a windfall lien when it has performed a response action at a site owned or operated by a BFPP and the response actions have increased the fair market value of the property above the fair market value that existed before the response action was initiated.⁶² The windfall lien is to be measured by the increase in fair market value of the property attributable to the response action at the time of a sale or other disposition of the property. The lien will arise at the time EPA incurs its costs and shall continue until the lien is satisfied by sale or other means, or EPA recovers all of its response costs incurred at the property. In lieu of EPA imposing a windfall lien on the property, the BFPP may agree to grant EPA a lien on any other property that the BFP owns or provide some other assurance of payment in the amount of the unrecovered response costs that is satisfactory to EPA.

[14.13] B. RCRA

Under this law, owners or operators of facilities that treat, store or dispose of hazardous wastes must comply with certain operating standards and may also be required to undertake corrective action to clean up contamination caused by hazardous or solid wastes. The federal government may also issue a corrective action order to an owner or operator of a TSDF or generators of hazardous waste subject to RCRA.⁶³ The government may also issue orders for injunctive relief to address hazardous wastes posing an “imminent and substantial endangerment” to public health and the environment.⁶⁴

RCRA also imposes a full range of regulatory requirements on owners and operators of USTs that are used to store petroleum or hazardous substances.⁶⁵ Some parts of the UST program are administered by the NYS-DEC in lieu of EPA enforcement (see the state environmental law section).

Unlike CERCLA, private parties are not entitled to recover their cleanup costs. Private parties may also seek injunctive relief to compel persons who contributed to the past or present handling, storage, treatment, transportation or disposal of hazardous waste that is posing or “imminent and substantial endangerment” to public health and the environment.⁶⁶ Indeed, this provision is becoming a powerful litigation tool particularly for sites contaminated from gas stations⁶⁷ and the notorious dry cleaners.

Practice Note: The phrase “imminent and substantial endangerment” does not mean there is an immediate risk but simply that actual harm may occur. Some courts have held that contaminants above groundwater levels are sufficient to constitute an “imminent and substantial endangerment,” while others require that there be completed pathways of exposure.⁶⁸ If an approved remedy has been installed and is operating, some courts in New York have found that there is no injunctive relief that can be awarded even

[14.14] IV. SUMMARY OF PRINCIPAL NEW YORK ENVIRONMENTAL LAWS AFFECTING COMMERCIAL LEASING TRANSACTIONS

[14.15] A. New York Inactive Hazardous Waste Disposal Site Law (State Superfund or SSF)

Under the SSF,⁷⁰ the NYSDEC is authorized to establish a registry of sites contaminated with hazardous wastes.⁷¹ The NYSDEC must notify owners of sites that are proposed to be placed on the registry. Owners or operators of sites that are listed on the registry may petition the NYSDEC to have the site de-listed or to have the classification changed. The NYSDEC is required to convene an adjudicatory hearing within 90 days of receiving a de-listing petition and provide at least 30 days' notice of a scheduled hearing. The NYSDEC is required to issue a ruling within 30 days after the hearing.⁷²

If the NYSDEC determines that a site poses a "significant threat" to the environment, it may order the owner of the site and/or any other person responsible for the disposal of the hazardous wastes to develop a remedial program acceptable to the NYSDEC and to implement the remedial program.⁷³ However, the NYSDEC cannot issue a cleanup order until after the alleged responsible party is provided with a hearing. Moreover, a party who has been issued an order after an administrative hearing may seek 71 There are five classifications of sites on the SSF list: The sites are to be classified as follows: Class 1 (poses an imminent danger of causing irreversible or irreparable damage to the public health and the environment. Immediate actions is required. The only class 1 site that was assigned this designation was the infamous Love Canal site); Class 2 (poses significant threat to public health or the environment. Action is required. This is equivalent to the federal NPL); Class 3 (does not present a significant threat to public health or the environment. Action may be deferred); Class 4 (site properly closes but continued management is required); and Class 5 (site is properly closed and there is no evidence of present or adverse impact so no further action is required).

judicial review of that decision.⁷⁴ If the NYSDEC cannot identify or locate the responsible person, the agency may implement the remedial action.

Practice Note: The inability to order a PRP to clean up a site without first conducting an administrative hearing has substantially limited the usefulness of the state superfund program.⁷⁵

The categories of PRPs under the SSF are similar to CERCLA since PRPs include anyone who might be liable under statutory or common law liability scheme. The SSF has the same third-party and innocent land-owner defense, but no BFPP or CPO protections. However, because NYSDEC does not have authority to seek cost recovery under the SSF, the agency and private parties use CERCLA and common law theories of liability to seek reimbursement of their response costs.

Practice Note: If NYSDEC determines that contamination at a site poses a significant threat and therefore is eligible for listing, a purchaser/lessor of the site might be able to defer the listing by enrolling the site in the state Brownfield Cleanup Program (see discussion below). However, this must be done before a final listing decision is made.

[14.16] B. New York Oil Spill Law

Petroleum-contaminated sites comprise the largest category of contaminated sites in New York. Indeed, there are approximately 15,000 to 20,000 new petroleum spills each year in New York. Because of the universe of sites that are potentially subject to the Article 12 of the Navigation Law,⁷⁶ this law may be the most significant source of liability to owners and operators of commercial properties in New York.

The Oil Spill Law prohibits the unpermitted discharge of petroleum into the waters of the state or onto land from which the petroleum might drain into state waters.⁷⁷ Dischargers of petroleum are strictly liable without regard to fault for all cleanup and removal costs as well as direct and 74 ECL § 27-1313.4.

75 The DOH may also order a responsible party to cleanup a significant threat under the Public Health Law which will supersede any order issued by DEC. ECL § 27-1313.3.a.

76 Nav. Law §§ 170–197.

77 Nav. Law § 173.

indirect damages.⁷⁸ The statute does not define term “discharger” and the courts have broadly the term so that it has been applied to owners and possessors of land. However, mere ownership of contaminated land is not by itself to impose liability on a property owner.⁷⁹

The NYSDEC is authorized to clean up discharges of petroleum and may enter contaminated property without first obtaining a warrant or other court order.⁸⁰ Usually, the NYSDEC will first offer the alleged discharger an opportunity to implement a cleanup by entering into a short-form Stipulation Agreement (STIP), which is a short-form order in which the party does not admit liability and will not be assessed any penalty. If the person declines to enter into the STIP, the NYSDEC may commence formal administrative proceedings to require cleanups and collect fines for failure to report or clean a site. Frequently, these cases are settled using a traditional consent order, but the settling party has to pay fines, which can be significant.⁸¹

For more complex remediation projects, the NYSDEC may require the responsible party to enter into a long-form consent order. The long-form order is drafted to address site-specific issues, and its terms are subject to negotiation. While the STIP will address only the cleanup portion of a spill site, the long-form order may address other aspects of the situation, including possible fines and/or penalties.

There are older cases that have held owners who unwittingly purchased property with abandoned USTs that had previously leaked to be liable as dischargers.⁸² The leading case on liability of lessors under the Navigation Law is State of New York v. Green.⁸³ This case involved a discharge of oil from a 275-gallon aboveground storage tank (AST) owned by a tenant at a mobile home park. In holding the lessor liable for the cleanup costs, the Court of Appeals ruled that a landowner could be liable as a dis-

78 Nav. Law § 181.

79 The same third party defense contained in CERCLA and the SSF was added to the Oil Spill Law in 2003. However, state courts have not had an opportunity to address this defense.

charger where it had both control over activities occurring on their property and reason to believe that their tenants will be using petroleum products. The court found that the owner of the trailer park had, through its lease, the ability to control potential sources of contamination on its property, including the maintenance of a 275-gallon AST, and that the owner's "failure, unintentional or otherwise, to take any action in controlling the events that led to the spill or to effect an immediate cleanup renders it liable as a discharger."

In State of New York v. Speonk Fuel Inc.,⁸⁴ the Court of Appeals reaffirmed that liability may be imposed on property owners not just for active conduct, but rather based on their "capacity to take action to prevent an oil spill or to clean up contamination resulting from a spill" (emphasis added). As a result, the court found Speonk liable as a discharge because it knew about the spill, but failed to clean it up.

A number of appellate courts have held lessors liable for tanks operated by their tenants under a "capacity to control" analysis even in the absence of any evidence that the lessor caused or contributed to the discharge.⁸⁵ Others courts have found that lessors may be owners of the USTs since they become trade fixtures, usually after tenants have vacated the premises. Many of these cases tend to involve former gas stations.⁸⁶ A couple of courts have even held lessors liable even where they were not aware of the existence of the USTs or failed to remediate the contamination after purchasing the property and discovering the contamination.⁸⁷

Dischargers are required to report any unauthorized spills of petroleum within two hours of discovery to the N.Y.S. Spill Hotline.⁸⁸ The NYSDEC spill reporting regulations also impose reporting obligations on the owner or operator of the facility where the spill occurred as well as the person who was in actual or constructive control of the petroleum.⁸⁹

A “faultless landowner” who is liable as a discharger simply because of its status as the owner of the property impacted by the discharge may seek contribution.⁹⁰ Innocent parties may also seek reimbursement from the Oil Spill Fund. However, lessors or tenants who are considered dischargers may not obtain reimbursement from the Oil Spill Fund even if they paid more than their fair share of the cleanup costs. Claims for reimbursement must be made within three years after discovery of the damage and no later than ten years after the incident.⁹¹

The Navigation Law also authorizes the state to file a lien against the land where the discharge took place when the Oil Spill Fund incurs costs to clean up or remove a discharge or makes payment to satisfy claims asserted by injured parties and a landowner fails to make payment within 90 days of a demand. The lien is a non-priority lien that does not subordinate previously perfected security interests.⁹²

[14.17] C. Petroleum Bulk Storage Act (PBSA)

The PBSA⁹³ complements the Oil Spill Law. Like the federal UST program, owners and operators of USTs and ASTs with a combined storage capacity of 1100 gallons of petroleum are required to register their tanks, and comply with certain design and operation standards requirements as well as closure requirements.⁹⁴

88 1-800-457-7362. The reporting requirement does not apply to spills that meet all of the following criteria: (i) the quantity is known to be less than five gallons; (ii) the spill is contained and under the control of the spiller; (iii) the spill has not and will not reach the state’s water or any land; and (iv) the spill is cleaned up within two hours of discovery. 92 Nav. Law § 181-a. The notice of lien is indexed in the same manner as a lien under Lien Law § 10. An action to vacate an environmental lien is governed by Lien Law § 59, and should not be brought as an Article 78 proceeding. Art-Tex Petroleum, Inc. v. New York State Dep’t of Audit & Control, 93 N.Y.2d 830, 687 N.Y.S.2d 619 (1999).

For purposes of determining if a property is regulated by the PBSA, heating oil tanks that have capacities less than 1100 gallons are not counted. This property with three 500-gallon heating tanks would not be subject to the PBSA even though the total storage capacity of the tanks is 1500 gallons.

The PBSA imposes reporting obligations on “any person with knowledge of a spill leak or discharge” of petroleum that exceeds 25 gallons or creates sheen on nearby surface water.⁹⁵ While this reporting obligation was traditionally viewed as applying only parties who own or operate facilities that store more than 1100 gallons of petroleum, an administrative law decision extended the reporting obligation to environmental consultants.⁹⁶ Reporting obligations for smaller facilities are governed by the Oil Spill Law.

If the NYSDEC suspects or believes that a UST is leaking, it may order the owner to perform a tightness test. If the owner fails to conduct the test within ten days, the NYSDEC may conduct the test and seek reimbursement of its reasonable expenses.⁹⁷

USTs that are temporarily out of service (30 days or more) must be drained of product to the lowest draw-off point. Fill lines and gauge openings must be capped or plugged. Inspection and registration must continue. Those tanks that are permanently out of service must be emptied of liquid, sludge and vapors. They must then either be removed or, if left in place, they must be filled with solid inert material such as sand or concrete slurry. NYSDEC must be notified 30 days prior to filling or removal.

The performance and operating standards for regulated USTs under the PBS program are considerably more extensive than those for ASTs. However, the rules for classifying a tank as an UST or AST are quirky. A tank located in a building basement or below-grade floor that is encased in a vault that does not have any “weep holes” or a manway so that the tank cannot be observed will be considered a UST. Owners and operators of such tanks would be subject to the full panoply of UST requirements under the PBSA regulatory program such as periodic tightness testing. Thus, it is particularly important to ensure that tanks in commercial buildings are properly registered.

96 In re Middletown Kontokosta Associates, Ltd., NYSDEC Case No. R1-6039.

97 ECL § 17-1007(2).

Nassau, Suffolk, Rockland, Westchester and Cortland Counties have been authorized by the NYSDEC to administer the program for tanks located in those areas. Because these counties may have more stringent requirements than the state, owners and operators should contact the county to learn of specific local requirements.

Practice Note: NYSDEC PBS program has some quirk rules for heating oil tanks. Regulated PBS tanks that are out-of-service for more than one year must undergo closure. However, unlike the federal UST program, the NYSDEC PBS program does not require an environmental assessment to close heating oil tanks. The tank has to be cleaned out and visually inspected for holes but soil or groundwater samples are not ordinarily required to achieve closure of heating oil tanks unless there is visual evidence or a leak. Thus, it is possible that a heating oil tank that was closed in place and obtained regulatory closure by the NYSDEC may have impacted the property. Accordingly, it is advisable for purchasers and prospective tenants of property with abandoned heating oil tanks to review the closure documentation to see if sampling was conducted. In the absence of such documentation, the purchaser should consider conducting its own sampling since the purchaser could be strictly liable under the state Navigation Law if an abandoned tank that was closed in place has impacted the environment.

In New York City, chapter 34 of the Fire Code establishes requirements for Out-of-Service Storage Systems storage tanks.⁹⁸ Closure of storage tank systems that have not been used for one year must be closed a certain licensed individuals. The owner or operator of a permanently out-of-service storage system or the permit holder for the tank system must also file an affidavit with the Fire Department certifying that the tank system was removed and disposed or abandoned in place in compliance with the requirements of Fire Code. If an environmental site assessment is required by federal or state law or regulations, the owner/operator of the storage system, the permit holder for the system or the person filing the affidavit of compliance must submit a written statement to the Fire Department that such environmental site assessment has been performed in accordance with such law and regulations.

Finally, the New York City Department of Environmental Protection (NYSDEP) has issued regulations to phase out the use of Number 6 (No. 6) and Number 4 (No. 4) fuel oil that is burned at approximately 10,000 buildings to reduce the quantity of fine particulates emitted by buildings.

Studies had shown that 1% of the buildings in the city produce 86% of the total soot pollution from buildings.

[14.18] D. Brownfield Cleanup Program (BCP)

The BCP is the state voluntary cleanup program.⁹⁹ To be eligible for the BCP, a site must have documented contamination that requires remediation. Sites that are already subject to an enforcement order, are operating under a RCRA permit or have been listed as Class 2 sites on the state superfund list are not eligible for the BCP.

Applicants may include current property owners, prospective purchasers, developers and tenants. There are two types of applicants and the applicant category influences the potential scope of the cleanup. A “volunteer” is an applicant that is not responsible for the contamination. This could include purchasers, new tenants and developers. It could also include existing owners or tenants provided that they did not cause or contribute to the contamination. Applicants that would be considered “responsible parties” would be accepted as “participants.” The key distinction between a “volunteer” and an “participant” is that the volunteer is only required to cleanup on-site contamination while participants have to remediate off-site contamination as well as on-site contamination. The ability to confine the cleanup to the brownfield site is an extremely important benefit since it not only limits the cleanup costs but also because it helps eliminate uncertainty about the ultimate cleanup costs since parties can develop worst case scenarios on the volume of soil that would have to be removed from a site.

Another important benefit of the BCP is that applicants will receive a no further action known as a Certificate of Completion (COC) after they complete a NYSDEC-approved cleanup. The COC contains a covenant not to sue from the State of New York that runs with the land and will also provide contribution protection.

In addition to the liability protections, the BCP offers the most generous tax credits in the country. Applicants can claim three types of tax credits. The BCP tax credits are refundable so to the extent that the brownfield tax credits exceeds the applicant’s tax liability, the tax credit is treated as a tax overpayment and the state will issue a check.

⁹⁹ ECL § 27-1401 et seq.

The first tax credit is known as the Site Preparation Cost (Site Prep). It includes all costs necessary incurred to make the property ready for development. The Site Prep credit includes not only cleanup costs but also costs of demolition, excavation, soil disposal, sheeting, shoring and dewatering. The amount of the Site Prep tax credit that may be claimed depends on the level of cleanup and ranges from 28% to 50% of the costs. The Site Prep tax credit may be claimed in the tax year following the issuance of the COC. The buildings on BCP sites do not have to be constructed or occupied to claim the Site Prep tax credit. Instead, only the remedy has to be completed and a COC issued to be able to claim the Site Prep tax credit.

The second tax credit is available for post-COC groundwater monitoring costs at the same percentage of the Site Prep tax credit. This credit may be claimed annually for the five year period following the issuance of the COC.

The third (and most valuable) BCP tax credit that is available is the qualified tangible property (QTP) tax credit which ranges from 10% to 24% of the value of the improvements constructed on the brownfield site subject to a cap of $35million or three times the Site Prep costs (whichever is less). BCP applicants have ten years from the issuance of the COC to put the building into service and claim the tangible property tax credit. For example, a $200 million project with $10million in Site Prep costs (mainly from excavation) could be eligible for $5million in Site Prep costs for a track 1 (unrestricted) cleanup and $30 million in tangible property tax credit (3 x $10 million) for a total of $35 million in BCP tax credits.

Practice Note: The potential for BCP eligibility raises a number of issues in commercial transactions. The challenges are different for a new lease where the parties contemplate submission of a BCP application than an existing lease where the tenant may want to take advantage of the BCP to help finance building renovations or expansions.

The first obvious question is going to be who can claim the tax credits. Remember that only the party that actually incurs eligible costs and that is named on the COC may claim the BCP tax credits. If the lessee would be the logical party for submitting the application if it is going to be incurring the costs of the project.

However, as explained below, because the applicant has to obtain the consent and cooperation of the property owner at several stages in the BCP process, the lessor may have leverage to seek to participate in the BCP tax credits. If the lessor is going to participate in the BCP tax credits, this can be accomplished in a number of ways. The parties can submit a joint application so that both the lessee and lessor sign the Brownfield Cleanup Agreement (BCA). If the lessee already submitted the BCP application and has executed the BCA, the lessor can be added to the BCA by filing a BCA amendment. This would have to be done before the COC is issued. Finally, the application could be submitted by a joint venture of the lessor and lessee, or by an entity in which the lessor owns or purchases membership interests.

Since a Phase 2 will have to be included in the BCP application, a new tenant considering applying to the BCP will have to negotiate the right to collect soil and groundwater before it takes possession of the premises. If acceptance into the BCP will be a condition to entering into the lease, this work may have to be scheduled several months before the commencement date of the lease because of the time it takes for an application to be accepted by the NYSDEC.

If the cleanup does not achieve an unrestricted residential standard, NYSDEC will require the use of institutional and engineering controls. These controls will be memorialized in an environment easement that must be executed and recorded by the lessor. The environmental easement must be recorded before the NYSDEC issues its COC. If the lessor refuses to execute or record what amounts to use restrictions on its fee, the lessee/BCP applicant will have to implement a more costly unrestricted cleanup to obtain a COC. Thus, the lease should contain a covenant requiring the lessor to cooperate and execute any documents required by NYSDEC in connection with the BCP.

When the applicant does not own the land, NYSDEC will require that the applicant has access to the site to implement all requirements of the BCP. The tenant can demonstrate access by either having the access set forth in the lease or a separate access agreement. Obviously, the standard environmental contingency clause that prohibits the tenant from notifying NYSDEC of the sampling results will be inadequate. For existing leases and long-term ground leases that were executed before the potential for a BCP application was contemplated, a separate access agreement will probably be the easiest route for satisfying this requirement.

There is an important cautionary note about including the property owner on the application or the BCA. If the NYSDEC considers the lessor to be a responsible party, this could expand the scope and complexity of the cleanup, though. The reason is that if an application is jointly submitted by a “volunteer” applicant (i.e., the tenant) and a participant (property owner), the application will be treated as one submitted by a participant and the BCA would identify the applicants as participants. As explained previously, this means that the applicants would have to address any off-site contamination that may be emanating from the site. Thus, the lessor status should be considered and discussed with NYSDEC before including the lessor in the application or on the BCA.

Of course, the reverse situation could also occur where there is a purchaser but an existing lessee who would be considered a participant. Likewise, if a seller wants to participate in a proposed brownfield application by a purchaser.

[14.19] E. Vapor Intrusion Disclosure Law

Vapor intrusion refers to the vertical or lateral migration of volatile organic compounds (VOCs) from soil or groundwater into buildings. In extreme cases, these vapors can accumulate at levels that create immediate safety hazards (such as explosions), illness, or aesthetic problems (such as odors). More typically, however, when VOC vapors migrate into buildings, the levels are much lower, creating the more insidious risk of chronic health problems arising from long-term exposure. The contaminants that typically pose a risk of vapor intrusion are chlorinated solvents like those used in dry cleaners, benzene from gasoline, naphthalene from heating oil and mercury.

Historically, the NYSDEC focused primarily on soil and groundwater contamination. NYSDEC did not regard vapor intrusion as a significant potential risk unless VOC contamination occurred directly next to an occupied building or directly below its foundation. Therefore, NYSDEC remediation programs usually focused on reducing soil or groundwater contamination, or at least eliminating pathways by which such contamination could reach people.

The regulatory landscape changed a few years ago after NYSDEC discovered significant levels of VOCs in residences near a number of contaminated sites. NYSDEC subsequently announced that it would re-evaluate up to 721 sites across the state where cleanups had been considered completed. In addition, both the NYSDEC and the New York State Department of Health (NYSDOH) have issued guidance on evaluating the vapor intrusion pathway.

Title 24 of the New York Environmental Conservation Law¹⁰⁰ requires responsible parties remediating a site under the state Superfund program or some other remedial programs to give landowners copies of air contamination reports. Originally, this law did not require property owners to disclose those reports to tenants and occupants. In 2008, the law was amended to require landlords to disclose to existing and prospective tenants “test results” received from responsible parties indicating exceedances of New York State Department of Health (NYSDOH) or federal Occupational Safety and Health Administration (OSHA) guidelines for indoor air quality. The disclosure statute does not distinguish between residential and commercial property.

Within 15 days of receiving an “air contamination report” from the responsible party, the property owner must provide a fact sheet (generic fact sheets are to be developed by NYSDOH) identifying the contaminant of concern and a means to obtain more information, as well as timely notice of any required public meetings to be held to discuss such results. In addition, if a tenant requests a copy of the test results and any closure letter, the property owner must provide the documents within 15 days of receipt of such results.

If a property has an “engineering control” in place to mitigate indoor air contamination, or a monitoring program as part of a continuing remediation program, the property owner must provide the same notice. The property owner must do this before a prospective tenant signs any “binding lease or rental agreement.”

In addition, the property owner subject to the disclosure obligation must include a disclosure notice in their “rental or lease agreement these locations must include the following language in 12-point bold face type on the first page of any lease or rental agreement:

NOTIFICATION OF TEST RESULTS: The Property
Has Been Tested for Contamination of Indoor Air: Test Results and Additional Information Are Available Upon Request.

A property owner that violates the new disclosure requirement could face the general criminal or civil penalties provided by the ECL. If the indoor air contamination is determined to create an imminent and substantial endangerment, the property owner could face injunctive relief as well as fines of up to $2,500 for each violation and $500 per day for each day it continues. If the property owner becomes a responsible party under the state Superfund law, the violations could cost as much as $37,500 per day.

Practice Note: The disclosure law does not require property owners to conduct their own tests or to perform any retesting. In cases where test results did not use actual indoor air samples but instead were extrapolated using modeling based on soil or groundwater samples, a property owner may (but also may not) want to take samples to confirm that air within the building complies with applicable guidelines.

The vapor intrusion disclosure law does not seem to apply if a property owner unilaterally discovers air contamination problems such as from public records or transactional due diligence. Of course, the property owner might have disclosure obligations under other environmental laws or the common law. Moreover, a violation of the new statute might serve as evidence of breach of duty in a negligence action against the property owner.

To avoid liability to its own tenants, the property owner might need to take abatement measures to prevent vapors from migrating into its building. When the vapors are migrating from an off-site source or the current owner is not considered a responsible party, the owner will not typically be required to remediate the contaminated soil or groundwater but simply have a vapor venting system installed which captures the fumes and redirects into the outside air. These venting systems can be relatively inexpensive if installed as part of new construction. Retrofitting an older building can be more challenging and expensive, though. If the responsible party is subject to a CERCLA or SSF order, it will often be required to install the venting system. For voluntary cleanups, though, the property owner would have to install the system and then decide if it wants to try to recover the costs from a responsible party in a CERCLA contribution or cost-recovery action, or common law theory. Alternatively, the owner could try to treat the costs of the venting system as operating expenses for purposes of operating expense escalations in its leases. Whether tenants will accept that may represent another issue entirely.

[14.20] F. New York City Voluntary Cleanup Program (VCP) and “E” Designation Program

nated sites such as contaminated fill sites, the “E” program and oil spills that are confined to the property. OER has entered into a Memorandum of Understanding with NYSDEC so that NYSDEC will honor cleanups completed by OER under its VCP.

OER also administers the E-Designation program, which began as a land-use program but has morphed into an important source of cleanup obligations in New York City. An E-Designation is a N.Y.C. zoning map designation that indicates the presence of an environmental requirement pertaining to potential Hazardous Materials Contamination, Window/Wall Noise Attenuation, or Air Quality impacts on a particular tax lot. The E-Designation is assigned to property lots as part of a zoning action under the City Environmental Quality Review (CEQR) Act. If the CEQR review process indicates that development on a property may be adversely affected by noise, air emissions, or hazardous materials, then the Lead Agency may assign an E-Designation on the property lot to ensure that the E-Designation requirements are satisfied prior to or during a new development or new use of the property.

A Hazardous Materials E-Designation for may be assigned for a variety of reasons including that the property

- was used as or is in close proximity to a gas station or some other underground fuel oil tank;
- is located in or contiguous to a manufacturing district;
- has a history of manufacturing uses;
- is located next to a building with a history of manufacturing uses;
- is located on a heavily trafficked street or highway;
- is located next to a railroad; or
- has some other environmental condition on the property or nearby that is a cause for concern.

The Department of Buildings (DOB) incorporates the E-Designations in its Buildings Information System (BIS). The DOB examiner cannot issue a building permit for new development, changes of use, enlargements or certain other alternations to existing structures until DOB receives either a Notice to Proceed (NTP) or Notice of No Objection (NNO) from OER. To obtain an NTP from OER, the applicant has to submit an acceptable investigation and remedial plan to OER. OER may issue NNOs for actions that do not raise potential exposure to hazardous materials, or air quality or noise impacts. Indeed, approximately 50% of the E-Designation projects OER reviews result in NNOs.

When the applicant wants to obtain a Certificate of Occupancy from DOB, it must obtain a Notice of Satisfaction (NOS) from OER demonstrating that the applicant has complied with OER requirements. If an applicant wants to remove the E-Designation from the property, it would have to implement a track 1 (unrestricted) cleanup. Parties can also comply or remove the E-Designation by enrolling the site in the state BCP as well as the NYC VCP.

It is important to note that when lots with an E-Designation are merged or subdivided, the E-Designation will apply to all portions of the merged lot or to each subdivided lot.¹⁰¹

A similar approach is used for Restrictive Declarations (RD) that impose an institutional control against a property to ensure that environmental mitigation or requirements that were imposed as a condition of a land use approval are implemented. The RD runs with the land so that it binds current and future owners to comply with certain investigation and remedial requirements that may be required by OER.

Historically, RDs were used when private applicants who owned or controlled a property sought a rezoning or other action under section 11-15 of the Zoning Resolution of the City of New York. This proved to be a cumbersome process because all parties with a property interest in property, including lenders, had to execute an RD. Moreover, the NYCDEP and a city agency approving the discretionary action had to expend resources reviewing the RD.

In 2012, the City Council adopted an amendment to the Zoning Resolution that authorized lead agencies to assign E-Designations for any actions including those sought by private applicants such as rezoning, special permits or variances. Because of the zoning resolution amendments, RDs will no longer be used to impose environmental conditions on properties. However, owners and developers will have to comply with existing RDs.

[14.21] V. ENVIRONMENTAL DUE DILIGENCE

There may be many reasons why a property owner or tenant may perform an environmental site assessment. The parties to a transaction can use the information to help negotiate an appropriate price for the property. A purchaser or tenant can use the information to “draw a white line” around the facility to show what conditions existed prior to the closing. Sellers and lessors are increasingly performing pre-marketing due diligence to pre-position a property as well as to expedite the due diligence process.

It is important to recall that EPA’s AAI Rule only satisfies one of the pre-acquisition obligations that parties must satisfy to assert the CERCLA landowner defenses. To fully understand if AAI is appropriate for a transaction, it is important to understand what it does not cover. The AAI Rule does not address the following:

- What constitutes the “reasonable steps” obligations that all landowners must comply with after acquiring property;¹⁰²
- Real estate transactions that occurred prior to May 31, 1997;¹⁰³
- The CERCLA third-party defense;¹⁰⁴
- The CERCLA secured creditor exemption;¹⁰⁵
- The RCRA secured creditor exemption for underground storage tanks;¹⁰⁶
- Residential real estate acquired by a nongovernmental entity or non-commercial entity where a site inspection and title search indicated there was no basis for further investigation;¹⁰⁷

102 Persons seeking to assert the landowner defenses are required to comply with all applicable federal and state reporting obligations as part of their “continuing obligations.”

103 Parties to such transactions would be required to comply with the requirements of the innocent purchaser defense added to CERCLA in 1986 and codified at 42 U.S.C. § 9601(35)(B)(iv)(I).

104 42 U.S.C. § 9607(b)(3).

105 42 U.S.C. § 9601(20)(E). However, lenders who do not qualify for the secured creditor exemption and therefore want to qualify for one of the CERCLA landowner defenses prior to taking title or possession to contaminated property would have to comply with the AAI Rule.

106 42 U.S.C. § 6991(b)(h)(9).

107 42 U.S.C. § 9601(35)(B)(v).

- Acquisition of title by state and local governments to properties involuntarily through tax foreclosure or by eminent domain;¹⁰⁸
- Petroleum-contaminated sites;¹⁰⁹
- Facilities subject to RCRA corrective action;¹¹⁰
- Protection against claims for injunctive relief under the RCRA citizen suit provision;¹¹¹
- Liability relief for cleanup of PCBs under TSCA;¹¹²
- Persons seeking to establish liability defenses under state environmental or common law;¹¹³
- A requirement to identify small quantities of contaminants that do not pose a threat to human health or the environment;
- A requirement to sample or to indicate when a phase 2 should be performed;¹¹⁴
- Vapor intrusion, asbestos, lead-based paint, radon, and other indoor air quality issues.

Practice Note: Many clients and their business lawyers feel that they do not need the services of environmental lawyers but simply rely on an 108 42 U.S.C. § 9601(20)(D); 9601(35)(A)(ii).

109 The CERCLA definition of a brownfield site includes properties contaminated or potentially contaminated with hazardous substances, petroleum and petroleum products, controlled substances, and pollutants and contaminants. Thus, persons who receive a brownfields grant awarded under CERCLA § 104(k)(2)(B) must comply with the AAI Rule when conducting site characterization or assessment activities at brownfield sites contaminated with petroleum or contaminants specified in the cooperative agreement between EPA and the grantee.

110 42 U.S.C. § 6924(u), (v); 6928(h).

112 15 U.S.C. § 2601 et seq.; 40 C.F.R. pt. 761.

113 Owners and tenants wishing to establish liability protection under state Superfund or other laws must comply with all criteria established under state laws, including any criteria for conducting site assessments or all appropriate inquiries established under applicable state statutes or regulations. 70 FR at 66073.

114 While stating that sampling and analysis is not required to comply with the AAI requirements, EPA did suggest that sampling may be valuable to determine the possible presence and extent of potential contamination at a property as well as informing the landowner how to best fulfill its post-acquisition continuing obligations. 70 FR at 66089.

environmental consultant to prepare a Phase 1. However, the environmental due diligence process is both a technical and legal exercise and requires input from specialists to ensure that the scope of the diligence is sufficient for the transaction and the risk threshold of the client.

[14.22] A. Overview of the E1527-13 Phase 1 Standard

The ASTM Standard Practice for Environmental Site Assessments: Phase 1 Environmental Site Assessment Process (ASTM E1527) was initially published in 1993 to define “good commercial and customary practice” for establishing the innocent landowner defense. Since then, E1527 has become the accepted industry standard for satisfying the pre-acquisition AAI Rule. The current version that is used to comply with AAI is designated E1527-13.

[14.23] 1. Recognized Environmental Conditions (REC)

The goal of an ASTM E1527 Phase 1 is to determine if a Recognized Environmental Condition (REC) exists at the property. This term does not appear in CERCLA but was developed by ASTM to help consultants distinguish minor spills from conditions that would be required to be investigated or remediated. Unfortunately, the REC definition was not artfully drafted and has led to much confusion. As a result, it is not unusual for a property owner or its counsel to disagree with an environmental consultant if a certain condition rises to the level of a REC. To minimize such disagreements, the REC definition was revised in the latest revision so that it more closely tracks the CERCLA definition of release.¹¹⁵

If particular issues are important to a specific commercial leasing transaction, the party ordering the Phase 1 must tell the environment consultant and ensure that the additional non-scope items are included in the engagement letter.

Practice Note: The fact that an issue is not identified as a REC does not mean that there is no potential environmental liability associated with the property but just that there are no releases of hazardous substances

¹¹⁵ The revised REC definition now refers to “the presence or likely presence of any hazardous substances or petroleum products in, on or at a property: (1) due to any release to the environment; (2) under conditions indicative of a release to the environment; or (3) under conditions that pose a material threat of future release to the environment.”

that could lead to CERCLA liability. Unfortunately, many real estate owners, investors and even courts are not aware of this distinction.¹¹⁶

[14.24] 2. Historic Recognized Environmental Conditions (HREC)

The term Historical Recognized Environmental Conditions (HREC) was added to E1527 in 2000 for sites where contamination was remediated to applicable standards. Instead of labeling the former contamination as an REC, consultants could now identify the former spill as an HREC, confirming that it has been remediated and no longer poses a risk to human health of the environment.

Although the HREC term can be a useful tool, many consultants were unclear on when they could make an HREC determination. Some made HREC determinations without verifying if the cleanup standard used in the past was still valid and that the remedy (i.e., engineering or institutional controls) was still protective and functioning as designed. Other consultants maintained that the continuing presence of residual contamination was an REC notwithstanding regulatory approval. This was a significant concern since most cleanups now employ risk-based approaches where some remnant of contamination is allowed to remain so long as institutional or engineering controls are used to prevent unreasonable exposure to the residual contamination.

The HREC definition was amended in the new version of E1527 so that it now only applies to contamination that has been remediated to an unrestricted cleanup standard.¹¹⁷ If the cleanup utilized engineering or institutional controls, such as deed use restrictions or prohibiting use of groundwater, the consultant may no longer use HREC but instead use the new term Controlled Recognized Environmental Conditions (CRECs).

116 An example of how sophisticated parties may not understand the significance of non-REC issues was the decision in Bank of N.Y. Mellon Trust Co. v. Morgan Stanley Mortg. Capital, Inc., 2011 WL 2610661 (S.D.N.Y. 2011), in which the federal district court for the Southern District of New York denied a motion to dismiss filed by a mortgage originator who was alleged to have failed to adequately disclose environmental conditions at a shopping center because the potential presence of methane was not disclosed as a REC. However, methane is not a hazardous substance as defined by CERCLA and therefore could not be a REC. Moreover, the consultant had identified methane as an Environmental Issue of Concern.

117 E1527-13 § 3.2.41.

[14.25] 3. Controlled Recognized Environmental Conditions (CREC)

If a cleanup does not meet the unrestricted cleanup standards and relies on engineering or institutional controls, the consultant must now identify this remediated spill as a CREC.¹¹⁸ This new term is technically a type of REC and must be listed in the “Findings” section of the Phase 1 report.

A CREC will not require further action as long as the “controlled” conditions remain in effect. At first glance, this would seem to provide comfort to lenders and purchasers. However, E1527-13 states that consultants do not have to confirm the adequacy or continued effectiveness of the control when making its CREC determination. This undermines the usefulness of the CREC since the client will not know if the remedy is protective or if further action is required. This limitation also appears to conflict with the revisions to the file review obligations. As a result, purchasers and lenders should consider requiring consultants to confirm the effectiveness of controls before making a CREC determination.

Practice Note: Decisions on HRECs and CRECs may require input from lawyers. In fact, consultants are struggling with the new CREC and HREC definitions. Frequently, consultants are improperly identifying conditions as RECs which obviously can have consequences for contractual contingencies and unduly alarm lenders or investors. For example, if an adjoining site has impacted the property but a cleanup was completed at the adjacent property based on the fact that groundwater will not be used, some consultants identify this as a REC for the property when it should probably be a CREC.

The value of the HREC or CREC designation is to inform the property owner or lessee if it is likely to incur remediation costs. For example, a cleanup may have been completed years ago that does not meet current standards or the cleanup may have relied on an engineering cap or institutional control preventing disturbance of the soil. If the property owner or tenant plans to expand a building footprint or install new utilities that will disturb the cap, additional cleanup may be required. Likewise, if the plans call for a change in use that will trigger a more stringent cleanup standard, this could trigger a reopener in the NFA letter and require additional cleanup. It is difficult to see how an environmental professional could make decisions about HRECs and CRECs in these situations without assistance from an environmental attorney.

[14.26] 4. Agency File Reviews

Agency files can contain critical information about historic contamination and adequacy of the cleanup. However, many consultants have exploited ambiguities in E1527-05 and have not routinely include file reviews in the standard Phase 1 scopes of work. Instead, they have been charging clients an additional fee for this work as an additional task.

One of the more significant changes to the ASTM standard now creates a presumption that consultants should review agency files when the property or adjacent properties are identified on one of the standard databases that are required to be searched to determine if a REC, CREC, HREC or de minimis condition exists at the property. A consultant that believes a file review is not required must provide a detailed explanation why the review was not performed. Alternatively, the consultant can rely on records provided from other sources (e.g., user-provided records or interviews with regulatory officials) to determine if there is sufficient information for identifying RECs and thereby avoid the time and cost of reviewing regulatory files. Depending on the accessibility of state files and their size, the agency file review may result increased Phase 1 costs and delays.

Practice Note: Many consultants have revised their standard terms to either exclude file agency reviews from the quoted price for the Phase 1 or providing that they will charge an extra fee after a set number of hours.

[14.27] 5. Searches for Cleanup Liens and Institutional Control

The existence of a cleanup lien can be of particular importance to lenders.¹¹⁹ AAI requires that the environmental site assessment include searches for cleanup liens that are filed or recorded against the property.¹²⁰ However, the rule does not require the environmental professional to obtain a chain of title. Instead, the rule provides that the environmental professional should exercise its professional judgment in determining what types of historical may provide useful information. EPA mentioned in the preamble to the rule that while the chain of title may provide important information, it may not be the only source of this information. One of the reasons for reviewing chains of titles is to obtain information about land use controls. However, EPA indicated in the preamble that there may be other sources of information that the environmental professional is required to review that could yield this information as well.

119 Many consultants took the position that these records were not reasonably ascertainable because they did not know where to search for cleanup liens and did not have the experience or training to evaluate the existence of such liens.

Either the prospective property owner or the environmental professional may conduct the search under AAI.¹²¹ If the environmental professional is not instructed to conduct a cleanup lien search, the person seeking the liability protection is required to perform the lien search.¹²² If the lien search is performed by the prospective property owner or tenant and it does not provide the search results to the environmental professional, the environmental professional should assess the impact of the missing information and determine if it represents a data gap. The environmental professional should also comment on the significance of the data gap on its ability to identify conditions indicative of releases or threatened releases.¹²³

[14.28] 6. Using Prior Reports

Parties to commercial leasing transaction are often tempted to rely on existing environmental due diligence materials. However, a party seeking to assert one of the CERCLA landowner liability protections must complete its environmental site assessment within one year of taking title to the property.¹²⁴

The AAI Rule allows prospective purchasers to use previously completed Phase I ESA reports under certain circumstances.

First, purchasers may use reports prepared within 180 days prior to the date of acquisition of the property that otherwise must comply with AAI.

Second, reports older than six months may be used provided that the following AAI components are updated to ensure that the report accurately reflects the current environmental conditions at a property:

- Interviews with past and present owners, operators, and occupants;¹²⁵

121 40 C.F.R. § 312.22(a)(1).

122 However, the prospective purchaser is not required to disclose the information about the cleanup lien to the environmental professional. 40 C.F.R. § 312.25(b).

123 40 C.F.R. § 312.20(g); 312.21(b).

124 40 C.F.R. § 312.20(a).

125 40 C.F.R. § 312.23.

- Searches for recorded environmental cleanup liens;¹²⁶
- Reviews of federal, tribal, state, and local government records;¹²⁷
- Visual inspections of the facility and of adjoining properties;¹²⁸ and
- The declaration by the environmental professional.¹²⁹

Third, when the updated report is using previously collected information, the report prepared for the proposed purchase must include a summary of any relevant changes to the conditions of the property and any specialized knowledge of the prospective landowner.

Practice Note: It is important to note that 180-day and one year shelf life is not measured by the date of the report but the date that the individual diligence components were completed.

[14.29] 7. Findings and Opinions

ASTM E1527 provides that the Phase 1 report have a “Findings” section that identifies known and suspected environmental conditions associated with the property, including REC, HREC, and de minimis conditions. In addition, the environmental professional should discuss in a separate “Opinion” section the logic and reasoning used in evaluating the effects of the known or suspect environmental conditions on the property. The opinion section must include the specific rationale for concluding that a known or suspect environmental condition such as a HREC is not currently a REC. Known or suspected environmental conditions that are identified as an ERC must also be listed in the conclusions section.

[14.30] 8. Recommendations Are Not Required

E1527-13 clarifies that recommendations are not required.¹³⁰ All the consultant is required to do is to express an opinion and conclusion on the presence or potential presence of a REC or CREC.

126 40 C.F.R. § 312.25.

127 40 C.F.R. § 312.26.

128 40 C.F.R. § 312.27.

129 40 C.F.R. § 312.21(d).

130 E1527-13 § 12.15.

Many users, particularly lenders, often require a consultant to include a recommendation in the Phase 1 report. However, failure to comply with recommendations can cause a property owner to be deemed to have failed to comply with its post-acquisition “appropriate care” obligations and fail to qualify as a BFPP or satisfy the “due care” requirement of the third party defense.¹³¹ Thus, if a client wants a recommendation, it should be prepared to timely implement the recommendation or risk losing its BFPP status. The better approach would be to have all recommendations (including those involving any non-scope items addressed by the report) contained in a separate letter addressed to counsel.

[14.31] 9. When Is Additional Investigation or Sampling Required?

One of the more vexing aspects of the due diligence process for consultants, lawyers, and clients is when further investigation is required or should be recommended. The preamble to the AAI Rule specifically states that sampling and analysis is not required for an investigation to satisfy AAI but then provides a number of caveats.¹³² However, EPA goes on to say that sampling and analysis may be valuable in determining the possible presence of potential contamination at a property or the obviousness or extent of the contamination. The Agency also indicates that sampling and analysis may help explain existing data gaps.¹³³ Moreover, EPA emphasized that the pre-acquisition AAIs is only one requirement of the CERCLA landowner liability protections. The Agency said that sampling may be valuable for determining how a landowner may best fulfill its post-acquisition continuing obligations and that prospective landowners should be mindful of their need to comply with their post-acquisition continuing obligations when considering whether to conduct sampling and analysis.¹³⁴

Depending upon site-specific circumstances and the totality of the information collected during AAI, EPA warned that it may be necessary to conduct sampling and analysis, either pre- or post-acquisition, to fully understand the conditions at a property, and to fully comply with the statutory requirements for the CERCLA liability protections. EPA also cautioned that the fact that the AAI Rule does not require sampling would not prevent a court from concluding that, under the circumstances of a particular case, sampling should have been conducted to meet “the degree of obviousness of the presence or likely presence of contamination at the property, and the ability to detect the contamination by appropriate investigation” criterion and obtain protection from CERCLA liability.¹³⁵

Many lenders have established their own due diligence protocols which frequently require evaluation of issues that were not covered by E1527-05 and are not addressed by the AAI Rule. A list of potential non-scope items are set forth in ASTM and typically are more important for transactions involving residential properties. In any event, it is important for parties contemplating financing for a transaction to determine if their lender/investors have their own environmental due diligence requirements.

[14.32] B. Hiring the Environmental Consultant

When hiring an environmental consultant, clients are often asked to execute an engagement letter which usually contains the pricing for the Phase 1 and other logistical information. Attached to the engagement letter will be what often looks like a pre-printed form of terms and conditions that govern the performance of the services to be provided by the consulting firm.

Clients rarely examine the standard terms since they tend to focus on the price of the Phase 1 as well as timing for the delivery of the report. However, it is critically important that the terms and conditions provisions be carefully reviewed before executing the engagement letter since the boilerplate language can severely restrict the rights of the client in any dispute with the consultant. This section reviews the key contractual issues that should be considered when retaining the consultant

[14.33] 1. Scope of Work

It is important for a property owner or lessee to understand that the standard ASTM E1527 Phase 1 is not a comprehensive or exhaustive investigation of all of the possible environmental conditions that might exist at a particular property. A Phase 1 environmental site assessment (ESA) has the limited purpose of identifying the presence or potential presence of hazardous substances at a property so that the party ordering the report (the “user”) to satisfy the AAI requirement that is necessary to qualify for one of the CERCLA landowner liability protections.

As a result, the AAI Rule or ASTM E1527-13 Phase 1 ESA often serve as the departure point for conducting environmental due diligence in transactions. Depending on the particular transaction, the nature of the business, the number of facilities, cost and timing issues, the risk tolerance of the parties performing the due diligence, and other factors, parties to a transaction may go beyond the requirements of AAI/ASTM E1527-13 or use some hybrid version of these practices to shape the scope of their environmental due diligence.

Indeed, over the years, though, the use of Phase 1 reports have evolved so that they frequently include environmental issues (e.g., asbestos-containing materials, lead-based paint, radon, and mold) that do not fall within the definition of a REC because they do not involve releases of hazardous substances but could still be a concern to a property owner, tenant or lender. Many lenders require consultants to evaluate issues that go beyond those that would qualify as a REC. In the ASTM terminology, these additional environmental issues are called non-scope items or business environmental risks (BERs). Section 13 of ASTM 1527 contains a non-exhaustive list of issues that could impact commercial real estate but that are not required to satisfy the AAI Rule.¹³⁶ The presence of these conditions would not be identified as a REC because they do not involve releases of hazardous substances as defined under CERCLA. Depending on the preferences of the person ordering the report, these non-RECs may be identified in the Phase 1 report as a separate category.

Practice Note: Many property owners simply rely on Phase 1 ESA reports that are ordered by the lender that is financing the particular transaction. However, lenders may have different risk tolerances than users.

Lenders have long played a role as “surrogate regulator” in transactions. In many cases, lenders force potential borrowers to investigate suspected contamination and frequently require remediation under state oversight. Borrowers often balk at these requests and may even retain their own independent consultants to try to convince lenders that the work is not required or necessary.

However, borrowers usually do not exhibit such independence when the lenders are comfortable with the site conditions. Borrowers typically believe that a site is “clean” if a bank determines that a Phase 1 is acceptable. However, what many borrowers do not realize is that lenders are positioned differently than property owners or operators from a liability standpoint and therefore may have risk tolerances that are different from those who take title to potentially contaminated property.

Because of the secured creditor exemption under CERCLA and most state superfund laws, lenders will not be liable for remediation unless the borrower encounters financial difficulties and the bank either takes over the borrower’s operations or forecloses on the property. As a result, the bank’s liability for environmental conditions is generally limited to the value of the loan. When banks held loans on their balance sheets, this potential loss was often enough to incentivize lenders to perform thorough Phase 1 reports. However, in this era of securitization, originating lenders may not be as concerned about the long-term environmental risks associated with a property. So long as the loan has been originated in accordance with the loan procedures and underwriting that is acceptable to the trusts that sell the CMBS loans to investors, the risk of a “comeback” to the originating lender is minimal.

Moreover, the Phase 1 ESA is just one component of a credit analysis performed by a lender. For example, a Phase 1 might identify environmental issues that a borrower may have to incur costs to address but the lender might be comfortable based on the credit of the borrower or other credit enhancements.

Since the property owner or tenant will be first in line for any enforcement actions that may result if the land turns out to be contaminated, they should independently evaluate the scope of the proposed Phase 1 that is ordered by its lender to confirm that the proposed Phase 1 will meet the needs of the property owner. There have been a number of recent cases where borrowers relied on a Phase 1 that was acceptable to its lender only to find out after the borrower acquired title that the site was contaminated.¹³⁷

[14.34] 2. Insurance

The consultant should be required to maintain the following types and minimum amounts of insurance coverage: Professional Liability of $1 million per claim; Comprehensive General Liability $1 million per occurrence for damage to property; Compensation and Statutorily Required Amounts, Employer's Liability, $500,000 per person; and Automobile Liability of $1 million per occurrence for bodily injury; $1 million per occurrence for damage to property. All insurance policies should be provided by an insurer rated at least "AA" by AM Best & Company. All insurance policies should be non-cancelable, except upon 30 days' advance written notice to the client. The consultant should be required to arrange for replacement insurance before cancellation of any insurance policy. The consultant should be required provide certificates evidencing all lines of insurance to the client before commencement of any work. It is recommended that the client be made an additional insured on the Commercial General and Automobile Liability insurance policies.

[14.35] 3. Limitation of Liability (LOL)

Many consultants typically seek to limit liability for negligence or breach of contract claims to the amount of the fee for the Phase 1 ESA, though some provide for higher liability caps ranging from $50,000 to $100,000. If the client has negotiated the insurance limits discussed above, the client should try to increase the liability cap to the amount of the insurance limits, especially where there are suspected environmental issues at the property.

It should be noted, though, that even if a client is able to increase the liability limit to the amount of the consultant's insurance coverage, this does not necessarily mean that full amount of the insurance coverage will be available if a claim arises. This is because prior claims could have depleted some or all of the coverage funds. Even if the consultant agrees to use its insurance limits as the LOL, the contract should provide that unavailability of the full insurance coverage will not affect any rights the client may have to pursue its rights under the agreement.

¹³⁷ For example, see Ridge Seneca Plaza v. BP Products North America, 820 F. Supp.2d 461 (W.D.N.Y. 2011).

Some consultants also try to impose a time limitation on the client's right to bring a claim. While certain AAI components have to be updated after 180 days, this so-called "shelf life" should not be confused with the statute of limitations for a negligence or breach of contract action. Some consultant forms attempt to shorten the period for asserting claims to one year or provide that the report may not be used or relied upon after six months. Clients should not agree to a shorter period than the applicable statute of limitations for bringing a professional negligence or breach of contract claim.

The standard terms and conditions will also provide that the consultant will not be liable for consequential damages flowing from any negligence or breach of contract. If the client can obtain concessions on the other issues discussed, this provision can be acceptable.

[14.36] 4. Indemnity

Consulting agreements frequently request that the client indemnify the consultant for any injuries or losses resulting from site conditions. If the client is a lender or other party who is not in control of the site, the client should not agree to such a provision.

[14.37] 5. Reliance

The question of who is entitled to rely on ESAs has proved to be a hotly contested issue in due diligence litigation. In the absence of any limitation in the agreement, many courts may use a "reasonably foreseeable" test to determine what parties that consultant may owe a duty. For example, if a lender orders a Phase 1 to finance the acquisition of a property, the purchaser/borrower might try to argue that it was foreseeable that it would rely on the report so that it should be able to seek damages from a consultant who might have failed to identify a REC. As a result, the standard terms and condition will usually specify the parties who may be able to rely on the ESA and create a time limitation on how long those parties can rely on the Phase 1 ESA. Courts have generally upheld such reliance provisions.

Some consultants will issue a reliance letter to additional parties for a fee. Consultants who regularly work with lenders will often agree to broader reliance language, especially where the loan is to be securitized without an additional charge.

[14.38] 6. Miscellaneous Documentation and Reporting Issues

The standard terms and conditions typically provide that all reports and documents generated during the performance of the work are the property of the consultant. This can be problematic for clients who are concerned about confidentiality and inadvertent disclosure of information developed during the investigation. Thus, property owners should insist that all materials, including drafts, drawings, photographs, and field notes, are the property of the client and that the consultant will not release any information obtained in the investigation to any third party without the express written consent of the client. Furthermore, the consultant should agree to destroy any draft reports and field notes at the conclusion of the project. It is advisable that the first written report be marked as a draft report so the client can make changes to the report without having to incur additional fees or charges.

Clients are also often asked to be responsible for obtaining permits or to be responsible for disposal of any hazardous residues generated from laboratory analysis. The consultant should be responsible for obtaining permits, complying with the conditions of such permits, and disposing of any sampling residues. However, the client should be willing to sign the manifests as the generator of the waste.

[14.39] 7. Information To Be Provided By Client

Under AAI, the person seeking the benefit of the CERCLA landowner defenses has the responsibility for the providing the following information:

- Cleanup liens;
- Specialized knowledge or experience of the person;
- Relationship of purchase price to fair market value if uncontaminated; and
- Commonly known or ascertainable information.

As a result, consultants will often provide a questionnaire to the client to complete. However, the client does not actually have to provide this additional information to the environmental professional. Indeed, when the client is the lender, they will tend not to have this information. If the client does not provide the information, the environmental consultant has to determine if the information not furnished by the person may affect the ability of the consultant to render an opinion about the potential for conditions at the property that are indicative of a release. If so, the consultant could identify this as a “data gap” and then comment on the significance of this data gap.

A related area of confusion for consultants has been whether the environmental professional needs to review the chain of title. The AAI rule does not require the environmental professional to obtain a chain of title. Instead, the rule provides that the environmental professional should exercise its professional judgment in determining what types of historical may provide useful information. One of the reasons for reviewing chains of titles is to obtain information about land use controls. The chain of title can be a problem for an environmental consultant because it is usually not ordered until the transaction is about to close and after the Phase 1 had been ordered and completed. In addition, chain of title often can cost $300 or more per parcel and can take several weeks to obtain, depending on the county where the records are retained. In addition, multiple chains of titles might have to be ordered if the property had been subdivided in the past or was part of a larger tract of land.

There may be other sources of information that the environmental professional is required to review that could yield the information required to satisfy AAI or ASTM E1527-05. Thus, the client and environmental professional should clarify if and who will be ordering chain of title reports.

[14.40] 8. Warranties

The typical standard terms and conditions will provide that the consultant is not warranting the accuracy, completeness, or validity of information provided by third parties. In other words, the consultants will discuss the information contained in database reports but not guarantee that the information is accurate. ASTM generally requires that if an environmental consultant uses a third party database company to provide historic regulatory database as opposed to obtaining the information directly from the regulatory agency, the database must updated at least every 90 days to be considered current. To minimize the risk that third party database is inaccurate, the user should verify that environmental consultant has used current information.

[14.41] 9. Payment

Many consulting agreements provide for accrual of interest after 30 days. If the client is a large corporation that cannot generate payments rapidly, it is advisable to request a longer accrual period of 60 to 90 days.

[14.42] 10. Termination

The client should also seek the right to terminate the contract for any reason and have the consultant agree not to incur any further charges upon receipt of the termination notice. Many agreements normally provide that the consultant may finish the particular Phase of the work following receipt of the termination notice.

[14.43] C. Common Sources of Cleanup Liability for Commercial Property

Commercial buildings, office spaces and shopping centers do not generally have the same kind of environmental issues as industrial facilities. However, these properties can nevertheless have significant environmental problems that could impair the value of the properties and create liability for owners or operators of these properties. The scope of the environmental due diligence should be tailored to the specific environmental history of the property, the risk tolerance of the person requesting the due diligence and other transaction-specific issues.

[14.44] 1. Historical Uses

The single most important task for due diligence on commercial properties is performing thorough historical investigations into the prior use of the property. Yet this is the aspect of due diligence that many so-called “commodity-type reports” tend to give short shrift. It is important to perform comprehensive historical due diligence even on properties with current uses that do not appear to present a significant risk to human health or the environment. The current use of a property can mask environmental impacts from prior uses. For example, a fast food restaurant at a shopping mall may have formerly been a gasoline station whose former tanks might remain in the ground. A property may currently be connected to the public sewer system but may have had on-site septic systems that could have discharged contaminants from prior problematic uses such as a dry cleaner.

Thus, it is important that the client and its counsel ensure that the environmental professional has adequately reviewed local records, interviewed local officials and used appropriate time intervals when researching historical information.

One of the challenges of performing due diligence at older shopping centers or commercial properties is the lack of adequate historical information on dry cleaners. The ASTM E1527 requires environmental professionals to review historical records with no more than five-year intervals. However, many so-called commodity style reports frequently use gaps of ten years or more. Even when state and local records are searched, these reviews often do not yield much information since dry cleaners were not required to obtain permits in the past.

[14.45] 2. Underground Storage Tanks (USTs)

USTs are a leading source of groundwater contamination. Indeed, because of their widespread use in New York, USTs are probably the most common source of liability for commercial properties.

From the early 1900s to the late 1980s, USTs typically had single-walled steel construction that inevitably corroded after 10 to 20 years. When tanks developed leaks, owners and operators either simply replaced the tanks or abandoned them in-place. Under the rules in effect at the time, tanks were usually allowed to be closed by simply filling them with water, sand or concrete without any investigation, much less removal of contaminated soil without any investigation or cleanup.

As a result, commercial properties may have unknown tanks that do not appear on any environmental databases or agency records because they were closed tanks that had to be registered. Frequently, these “rogue” tanks are old heating oil tanks but they may also have been used to store chemical products or wastes.

It is not uncommon for abandoned tanks to be discovered during construction or renovation of buildings. When this happens, the property owner or developer has to notify NYSDEC, register the tank and then comply with NYSDEC tank closure requirements. Frequently, contamination that may have been thought to be rather limited turns out to be more extensive. Old tanks sometimes are also discovered during installation of new utility services.

Practice Note: The NYDEP has issued regulations to phase-out the use of Number 6 (No. 6) and Number 4 (No. 4) fuel oil. Beginning July 1, 2012, building owners are required to convert to a cleaner fuel (No. 4 oil or cleaner) before their three-year certificate of operation expires. Building owners will not be able to renew Certificate of Operation for a boiler burning No. 6 heating oil unless the applicant demonstrates that the No. 6 fuel that will be used will emit the same or less PM and NOx than No. 4 on an annual basis. All boilers must be converted to low sulfur No. 4 heating oil or an equivalent cleaner fuel by mid-2015. By 2030, existing boilers that have not been replaced must be modified to meet the equivalent emissions of burning low sulfur No. 2 oil or natural gas.

[14.46] 3. Dry Cleaners

Real estate professionals are generally aware of the risks posed by gas stations and tend to exclude these parcels or implement risk management strategies prior to acquiring title or control over properties containing these businesses. In contrast, the environmental risks of dry cleaners are often overlooked. Worse yet, dry cleaners tend to be small businesses with limited resources and usually do not have environmental insurance. As a result, dry cleaners are the leading source of environmental liability at commercial retail properties.

While dry cleaners are small businesses, they generate relatively large volumes of hazardous substances. EPA estimates the average dry cleaner generates 660 gallons of hazardous waste a year. Moreover, due to poor housekeeping, dry cleaners have historically had a high frequency of spills and discharges.

Historic dry cleaners pose a particular risk to property owners because the former operations used considerably more solvents and suffered from a high frequency of spills and discharges because of poor housekeeping and business practices. Yet, the existence of former dry cleaners is often overlooked in due diligence, or potential impacts from these operations are frequently discounted by consultants and property owners.

Studies by EPA, the State Coalition for Remediation of Dry Cleaners (SCRD), and others have estimated that 75% of the approximately 30,000 dry cleaners currently in operation have contamination (i.e., 22,500 actively contaminated sites). California studies in 1992 and 2007 found that dry cleaners are a major contributor to groundwater contamination with the leading cause of the groundwater contamination being wastewater discharges to sewers and septic systems. Over 150 dry cleaners are listed in the EPA CERCLIS and over 200 dry cleaners appear in the New York environmental remediation database. EPA estimates there may be an additional 9,000 to 90,000 former dry cleaner sites that likely present a significant risk of contamination. According to EPA, the average dry cleaner cleanup ranges from $400,000 to $500,000 but can be as high $3 million when groundwater is impacted. EPA has estimated that the total national cleanup cost for dry cleaners could approach $7.6 billion.

Unlike petroleum contamination, which may naturally degrade over time, the chlorinated solvents that are used by dry cleaners are resistant to biodegradation. As a result, groundwater contamination from dry cleaners has a greater potential to migrate off-site, which can be problematic since dry cleaners are often located within proximity to residential neighborhoods. Indeed, a 2002 Florida study found that dry cleaner contamination had migrated off-site at 57% of the contaminated sites. A 1999 Livermore study found that the median dry cleaner plume length was approximately 1600 feet while another study found the average plume to be 1270 feet. EPA reported that the 90th percentile plume length was 2585 feet and that 89% of dry cleaner plumes exceeded 100 feet.

It does not take a lot of solvent to contaminate soil or groundwater. A solvent leak dripping at a rate of one drop per second will result in one gallon of solvent discharged during an eight-hour work day and 320 gallons per year. One tablespoon of PCE is enough to contaminate two Olympic-sized swimming pools. Just one gallon of PCE can cause a 200,000,000 gallon drinking water reservoir to exceed the drinking water standard of 5 parts per billion (ppb).

In addition to cleanup costs, contaminated dry cleaner sites can expose property owners to significant toxic tort liability because these business tend to be located in densely populated areas, the contaminants do not easily degrade, are highly volatile and can migrate considerable distances. In the past, regulators were not concerned about plumes when groundwater was not used for drinking water purposes. Often times the regulators did not even delineate the extent of the plume. Now, though, many regulators are concerned about the potential for vapor intrusion when solvent plumes extend from the former dry cleaner location to residential communities. As a result, owners of property that formerly contained a dry cleaner have finding themselves subject to toxic tort litigation because of risk of vapor intrusion to residences, schools and other buildings located above the plumes.

While current dry cleaners use significantly less solvent and equipment that is less prone to leaks, improper maintenance and operational practices can still result in releases to the environment. Property owners should ensure that dry cleaning tenants use best management practices such as having solvent-grade epoxy floor coating and secondary containment for the drum storage areas as well as the dry cleaning equipment.

[14.47] 4. Sewer System Discharges

Many businesses do not discharge wastewater directly into rivers or other water bodies but instead into the local sewer system. Sewer pipes have a tendency to leak so that contaminants discharged into the system can end up seeping into soil and groundwater. Many superfund sites have been a result of discharges from dry cleaners into leaky sewer lines. Contaminants discharged into sewers can travel as much as one mile from the source.

[14.48] 5. Septic Systems and Sanitary Cesspools

Where sanitary sewers are not available, commercial buildings may rely on septic systems or leach fields. These structures can be sources of contamination if they receive wastewater from high-risk tenants, such as auto maintenance shops, dry cleaners and laboratories, even if the particular business does not discharge large quantities of wastewater or use significant volumes of hazardous materials. Many commercial properties in Long Island, Westchester and other suburban areas have been placed on the federal or state superfund lists because of these types of discharges.

Even if a property is currently connected to a public sewer, it is important to determine if the property was serviced by septic systems in the past and if high-risk tenants or businesses operated at that time.

[14.49] 6. Dry Wells

Dry wells receive stormwater from surface runoff and catch basins. The storm water then drains into the ground. Stormwater can become contaminated from a variety of pollutants, such as roads, parking lots, and other paved surfaces where materials have spilled or accumulated; outdoor equipment or material storage areas; commercial properties where fertilizers and pesticides are used; and outdoor cleaning and maintenance activities that produce large volumes of wastewater like power washing, sandblasting and vehicle washing.

As a result, dry wells and leaching pools can be a common source of groundwater contamination in Long Island and other suburban areas. If properties are served by dry wells, due diligence should identify all storm-water containment structures and determine if maintenance or cleanout should be performed. An interesting case illustrating the risks posed by these structures is Southern Wine & Spirits of America vs. Impact Environmental Engineering.¹³⁸

[14.50] 7. Hydraulic or Electrical Equipment

This equipment may contain fluids with PCBs. While the manufacture and distribution of PCBs were banned in 1977, electrical equipment with PCBs can continue to be used for the useful life of the equipment. PCB spills can result in significant cleanup costs.

PCBs are regulated under the Toxic Substance Control Act (TSCA). This law does not have any of the landowner defenses that are available under CERCLA. Indeed, an administrative law judge recently denied a motion filed by a landlord that mere ownership of property was insufficient to impose liability on a landlord for a PCB spill on its property.¹³⁹

During due diligence, consultants should identify the presence of transformers and capacitors, their location, their condition, and labeling. The Phase 1 report should determine whether the local utility owns the transformers. If the utility owns the transformers, it is useful but not necessary to ask the utility if the transformers contain PCBs (especially where no PCB label is visible). The consultant should also note the presence of hydraulic equipment, capacitors, and ballast that might contain or once have contained PCB-contaminated fluid.

[14.51] 8. Vehicle Maintenance Areas

Spillage from fuel transfers or poor waste oil management can lead to soil and groundwater contamination. Look for signs of staining or deterioration of pavement or concrete and determine the purpose and discharge point of all drains located in these areas. If there is an oil/water separator, 138 104 A.D.3d 613, 962 N.Y.S.2d 118 (App. Div. 1st Dept. 2013). A detailed discussion of this litigation is available at www.environmental-law.net/2013/07/failure-to-identify-dry-wells-and-review-building-dept-file-at-heart-of-consultant-malpractice-case.

139 The ALJ said ownership or control of the PCB source was not the only path for liability for violations of the PCB regulations, and that liability could be predicated on the ability or obligation to prevent the spill, or influence or control the disposition of the contaminated soil. See In re Burlington Northern and Santa Fe Railway Co., TSCA No. 10-99-0051.

ascertain its capacity, age, and construction, and review all permits and any inspection reports. Malfunctioning oil/water separators can result in soil or groundwater contamination.

[14.52] 9. Chemical and Waste Storage Areas

Improper waste storage disposal may lead to extensive groundwater and soil contamination requiring expensive remediation. Wastes that are commonly stored in commercial buildings include photographic developing solutions from photo processing shops, x-ray solutions and biohazardous wastes from medical offices, and waste solvents from dry cleaners. Costs may also be incurred to upgrade inadequate storage areas to meet design standards such as impervious surfacing and secondary containment. Accordingly, the consultant should identify all waste storage areas locate and examine the condition of the waste management facilities such as lagoons, impoundments and holding ponds. These areas should be inspected, and the condition and contents of drums, barrels and cans should be verified. Unlabeled, deteriorating or open hazardous waste containers may not only indicate poor housekeeping but possibly may be signs of noncompliance with state and federal environmental, safety and health regulations and codes. Note signs of spillage from overloading or leakage from poor construction. Also look for discolored soil, stretches of bare soil, or dead or distressed vegetation, which may indicate the site of former waste storage units.

[14.53] 10. Loading Docks, Shipping Areas and Railroad Sidings

Spills of hazardous materials commonly occur in these areas when raw materials or products are transferred.

[14.54] 11. Asbestos-Containing Materials (ACM)

Until the dangers of asbestos became known, asbestos was used in a wide variety of products used in commercial and residential buildings constructed from 1920 to 1970, and was often mandated by municipal building codes. ACM is usually found in three forms in buildings: Thermal Insulation (e.g., pipe insulation, boiler insulation or duct insulation); surfacing materials (e.g., troweled and sprayed decorative plaster, acoustical ACM under decking and fireproofing on structural components); and miscellaneous materials (e.g., sheet flooring, ceiling tile, roofing materials, concrete panels, asbestos sidings used for duct insulation, pipes and siding). ACM may be further classified as friable or non-friable. Friability refers to material that can be crumbled, pulverized or otherwise reduced to powder by hand pressure when dry.¹⁴⁰

Although EPA has implemented a series of bans on certain types of ACM, there are still other types that continue to be used in building materials. These include vinyl-asbestos tile, roofing felt, roofing coatings, caulking putties, construction mastics, textured coatings, asbestos-cement shingle, asbestos-cement flat sheet, asbestos-cement pipe, and asbestos-cement, millboard, and corrugated sheet.

Owners or operators commencing renovation or demolition projects that will disturb certain thresholds of regulated ACM (RACM) are required to provide ten-day notices to EPA, must use asbestos-licensed contractors and must follow certain work practices. The thresholds amounts of RACM are more than 260 linear feet of on piping, 160 square feet of RACM on other building components, or at least 35 cubic feet of RACM when the length or area cannot be measured. EPA aggressively enforces its ACM rules and frequently brings criminal actions for failing to comply with the ACM renovation or demolition requirements.

It is not necessary to remove ACM that is in good condition. Indeed, EPA suggests that in-place management of ACM is preferred over removal. EPA recommends that building owners should initiate asbestos control programs using its publication, Managing Asbestos in Place: A Building Owner's Guide to Operations and Maintenance for Asbestos-Containing Materials (also known as the "Green Book"). However, the Green Book suggests that ACM that is highly accessible may have to undergo some form of abatement by encapsulation or removal.

Practice Note: ACM sampling that is done as part of a Phase 1 is generally very limited and should not be relied upon for renovation or demolition work. Before engaging in such activities, it is important to perform a comprehensive ACM survey.

It is also advisable to take samples of suspect ACM prior to disturbing the material for minor repair work to minimize risk of exposure to workers and building occupants unless the building owner can establish that the building was constructed of asbestos-free materials. Owners should also consider inserting requirements in their construction contracts requiring contractors and architects to use asbestos-free materials.

140 40 C.F.R. § 61.141.

[14.55] 12. Lead-Based Paint (LBP)

This is usually a concern in residential buildings constructed before 1978. However, older commercial buildings with day care centers or private schools will need to ensure that painted surfaces are in good condition. Indeed, child day care centers will not be issued permits unless all LBP has been removed.¹⁴¹

[14.56] VI. ENVIRONMENTAL PROVISIONS FOR LEASES

Before discussing environmental provisions for commercial leases, it is important to review some long-standing contractual interpretations that have been adopted by federal and state courts.

[14.57] A. “As Is” Provisions

Prior to the enactment of CERCLA, environmental liability in real estate transactions was governed solely by contract and tort principles and, particularly, the doctrine of caveat emptor. Once a vendor parted with title, possession or control of the property, responsibility for conditions on the land was shifted to the vendee.

In the absence of an express agreement or some misrepresentation, the purchaser was expected to make its own careful examination of the conditions of the property and the vendor would not be liable for any harm or defects existing in the property. Thus, where a purchaser acquired the property in an “as is” condition or expressly covenanted that it had not relied on any representations or warranties of the seller, the risk of loss passed with the transfer of title or possession and the purchaser would be precluded from recovering any damages from the seller. If a defect, such as contamination, discovered after title was transferred constituted a breach of a contractual warranty or representation, the buyer might be able to recover damages under a fraud cause of action.

However, federal and state courts in New York have consistently rejected “as is” clauses or caveat emptor as a defense to CERCLA liability. These courts hold an “as is” clause simply bars a breach of warranty action and will not preclude contribution or cost recovery claims under environmental laws.¹⁴² To effectively eliminate CERCLA liability, a contract or lease will have to contain a waiver whereby the lessee or purchaser expressly waives all of its statutory and common law rights that it may have to seek damages for preexisting contamination whether it is known or unknown. However, the existence of the breach of warranty may be an equitable consideration in the allocation of response costs in a contribution action.

[14.58] B. Contractual Allocation of Environmental Liability

However, courts have universally held that CERCLA does not permit contracting parties to transfer their potential obligations to EPA. In other words, an indemnity or release cannot be asserted as a defense in a government cost recovery.¹⁴³ However, courts generally agree that CERCLA section 107(e)¹⁴⁴ allows private parties to contractually transfer or release each other from financial responsibility arising under CERCLA and to rely on release or indemnity clauses as a defenses.

Second, courts may enforce contractual allocations even if the agreements were executed prior to the enactment of CERCLA or other environmental laws. However, courts will narrowly construe these provisions and will require language referring to CERCLA-like liability before enforcing these agreements. It is more likely that an agreement containing broad general releases will be held to apply to CERCLA liability than a release or indemnity that is limited to particular disputes or liability unless there is an unmistakable intent that there is a waiver of CERCLA-like environmental liabilities. This is a particularly difficult problem in pre-CERCLA agreements where courts are loathe to say that parties bargained away rights that had not yet existed. However, courts do appear more willing to honor such indemnity or releases when there is evidence that the parties knew of the existence of environmental conditions.

[14.59] C. Problems with Older or Traditional Commercial Leases

Allocation of environmental liability in leases has proven to be problematic since many leases do not specifically address the environmental obligations of lessors and lessees. It is surprising how often contracting parties will resort to form agreements. Many forms that are publicly available today were drafted decades ago and are out of date, difficult to understand, and contain antiquated language. They are almost always too generic. They can sometimes serve as a decent starting point but are generally not a good ending point.

142 Westwood Pharm. Inc. v. National Fuel Gas Dist. Corp., 964 F.2d. 85 (2d Cir. 1992).

For example, older leases usually prohibit tenants from engaging in activities that will result in “waste or injury” to the demised premises. Since the discharge of hazardous substances can impair the property value and result in cleanup costs that exceed the value of the property, these anti-waste provisions could be relied upon to impose an obligation on a tenant to refrain from releasing hazardous substances onto the property and to remedy such contamination. However, because these provisions usually apply to only structures and the use or occupancy of the demised premises, arguably this obligation does not extend to subsurface or groundwater contamination that is technically not a part of the demised premises as well as USTs or PCB transformers that are excluded from the definition of the demised premises.

In addition, leases often have a general compliance with law clause, requiring tenants to abate any nuisances and to keep the premises in good repair. These provisions probably do not apply to contamination that predates the lease or contamination that migrates onto the site from adjacent properties, and probably are not broad enough to extend to friable asbestos, USTs, or PCBs in the building electrical system since these issues may be considered structural defects that are not within the contemplation of the ordinary repair provision of most leases. Furthermore, it is unclear if the compliance with laws requirement applies to cleanup obligations that arise after the tenancy is terminated.

One of the more common drawbacks with older leases was how they failed to adequately deal with underground storage tanks. Leases often allow tenants to construct or install equipment that is necessary for the operation of the tenant’s business, including USTs. Many of the older leases simply provided that such equipment and fixtures are the personal property of the tenants and provide the tenants with the right to remove such personal property at the termination of the lease.

However, these leases often provided that any personality or fixtures (such as USTs) that tenant left behind when it vacated the premises automatically became the property of the owner. In other words, the lease operated to convey ownership of the tanks to the lessor. Former tenants have argued that they abandoned the USTs which then became fixtures for which the owners were responsible.¹⁴⁵ Indeed, there have been a number of cases that have held that the USTs are trade fixtures that become part of the real estate, thereby making the property owner the owner of the tanks for purposes of complying with the closure and cleanup obligations.¹⁴⁶ For example, the New York State Oil Spill Compensation Fund has denied claims where USTs had been installed by prior operators or owners, and where the lease provided that all improvements and equipment installed on the property would be deemed to become part of the property and that the claimant would be considered the sole and absolute owner of the improvements.¹⁴⁷

A frequent issue that arises in landlord/tenant situations is who is responsible for leaking USTs that are not currently being used by a tenant.¹⁴⁸ Where the tenant leases or occupies the entire property, the landlord will argue that the tenant has complete control over the site and should be considered the operator of the leaking USTs, particularly where the lease defines the demised premises as being the four corners of the site. Indeed, in such circumstances some tenants have been held to be owners whose liability does not require active participation in hazardous waste sites. The tenant, in turn, will argue that it never actually operated the leaking USTs, so it cannot be held liable as an operator. An interesting case turned on whether the USTs were included within the definition of “demised premises.”¹⁴⁹

Further complicating the situation is that the leases are often assigned or subleased to successive operators who use the USTs, but ownership of the USTs are rarely addressed in the consents issued by the landlord. After the last tenant vacates the premises, a dispute arises over who is responsible for removing the USTs and remediating the contamination associated with the USTs.

145 Cutting against this argument at least for purposes of federal regulatory purposes is RCRA provides that tanks the owner of tank that was no longer in use as of November 8, 1984 is the person who owned the tank immediately before the discontinuation of its use.42 U.S.C. 6991(3) (B).

146 Golovach v. Belmont L.M., Inc., 4 A.D.3d 730, 773 N.Y.S.2d 139 (3d Dep’t 2004).

147 310 South Broadway Corp. v. McCall, 275 A.D.2d 549, 712 N.Y.S.2d 206 (3d Dep’t 2000).

148 For an interesting case involving an inactive tank that was shared by two properties, see C & J Cleaners v. GACO Fashioned Furniture, Inc., 85 A.D.3d 1079, 927 N.Y.S.2d 663 (2d Dep’t 2011).

149 See South Road Assocs., LLC v. International Business Machines Corp., 2 A.D.3d 829, 770 N.Y.S.2d 126 (2d Dep’t 2003), aff’d, 4 N.Y.3d 272, 793 N.Y.S.2d 835 (2005).

Less clear is what happens if tanks were properly closed in place in the past under the requirements in effect at the time and a purchaser discovers contamination. Some cases have held owners or buyers liable as dischargers where they could have known about the existence of contamination through the exercise of reasonable diligence or should have known about the presence of USTs from the use of the property.¹⁵⁰

In sum, leases for commercial or industrial properties should contain specific environmental provisions that clearly allocate the responsibilities and obligations of the parties for environmental issues based on the specific facts and the intent of the parties. Since the contract may eventually be interpreted by a court, the lease should include within its four corners all of the information that may be useful to explain the parties' contractual relationship, any past history. The parties do not want a judge to try to guess what their intentions were when they executed the contract.

[14.60] D. Environmental Lease Definitions

To clarify the obligations of the parties and prevent inadvertent drafting discrepancies, leases should have well-drafted environmental definitions that are incorporated in the body of the lease clauses describing the obligations of the parties. Well-crafted definitions will eliminate superfluous language in the operative language of the lease, and result in crisper and cleaner language. Following are suggested definitions.

“De Minimis Amounts” refers to chemicals and products containing hazardous materials in quantities customary and necessary for the intended use of the premises including, but not limited to, cleaning supplies, insecticides, paints, paint removers, toner for copiers, etc., provided the use, storing or handling of such de minimis amounts of hazardous materials are in compliance with environmental laws.

Practice Note: Commercial tenants, especially retailers, store or use products that contain chemicals that qualify as “hazardous materials.” It is not practical to prohibit tenants from using hazardous materials. This definition recognizes this fact of everyday life. It allows the tenant to use quantities of chemicals that (1) are to be expected for the particular use; and (2) so long as the tenant uses them in accordance with environmental laws. However, this definition should not be used for high-risk uses as dry cleaners, gas stations or tenants that would be RCRA-regulated facilities.

150 State v. Robin Operating Corp., 3 A.D.3d 767, 773 N.Y.S.2d 135 (3rd Dept. 2004); Oliver Chevrolet, Inc. v. Mobil Oil Corp., 249 A.D.2d 793, 671 N.Y.S.2d 850 (3d Dep’t 1998).

“Environmental Claim” refers to any complaint, summons, citation, notice, directive, order, claim, litigation, investigation, judicial or administrative proceeding, judgment, letter or other communication from any governmental authority or any third party involving violations of environmental laws or releases of hazardous materials at or from the premises.

Practice Note: This definition consolidates the numerous types of legal proceedings that can clutter a clause into one definition. It not only applies to violations of law and releases of hazardous chemicals, but also to claims filed by third parties.

“Environmental Conditions” refers to releases of hazardous materials at or from the premises requiring a remedial action based on the contemplated use or violations of environmental laws.

[more specific alternative: refers to the presence of Hazardous Materials resulting from Releases at the Property exceeding the concentrations set forth at 6 N.Y.C.R.R. Table 375-6.8(b) for the commercial use category set forth in 6 N.Y.C.R.R. 375-1.8(g)(ii).]

Practice Note: This definition can be used to describe the kind of condition that will trigger obligations under the lease. Notice that the contamination must be present at levels that require remediation. This can be used to prevent a party from making a claim for a de minimis environmental condition. It can also be linked to an environmental due diligence contingency so that the lessee cannot opt out of the lease for environmental reasons unless there is contamination that has to be remediated based on the proposed use. In other words, the contingency could not be exercised where contamination may exceed a residential cleanup (stricter) standard but is below a commercial (more lenient) cleanup standard since the property will be used for commercial purposes. The alternative language provides the specific cleanup standard.

“Environmental Laws” includes the Comprehensive Environmental Response, Compensation and Liability Act (CERCLA), 42 U.S.C. § 9601 et seq., as amended; the Resource Conservation and Recovery Act (RCRA), 42 U.S.C. § 6901 et seq., as amended; the Clean Air Act (CAA), 42 U.S.C. § 7401 et seq., as amended; the Clean Water Act (CWA), 33 U.S.C. § 1251 et seq., as amended; the Occupational Safety and Health Act (OSHA), 29 U.S.C. 655 et seq., the New York Inactive Hazardous Waste Disposal Sites Law, N.Y. ECL § 27-1301 et seq.; the New York Control of the Bulk Storage of Petroleum Law, N.Y. ECL § 17-1001 et seq.; the New York Oil Spill Prevention, Control and Compensation Act, Navigation Law § 170-202; the N.Y. Labor Law § 241; the New York City Hazardous Materials Emergency Response Law, New York City Administrative Code § 24-601 et seq.; Control of Lead Poisoning, N.Y. Pub. Health Law § 1370 et seq. and any other federal, state, local or municipal laws, statutes, regulations, rules or ordinances imposing liability or establishing standards of conduct for protection of the environment.

Practice Note: This definition incorporates the principal federal and New York environmental laws that may apply to commercial property. OSHA is usually considered a health and safety/employee issue, but parties sometimes included it in the definition of environmental laws. This can create a slippery slope of obligations, though, and inclusion in this definition should be resisted.

“Environmental Liabilities” means any monetary obligations, losses, liabilities (including strict liability), damages, punitive damages, consequential damages, treble damages, costs and expenses (including all reasonable out-of-pocket fees, disbursements and expenses of counsel, out-of-pocket expert and consulting fees and out-of-pocket costs for environmental site assessments, remedial investigation and feasibility studies), fines, penalties, sanctions and interest incurred or imposed under environmental laws.

Practice Note: This consolidates the kinds of damages into one definition. Notice that strict liability is referenced in parentheses. Courts generally will not read into contracts that a party has agreed to assume or indemnify for claims based on strict liability. The party taking on responsibility for environmental liabilities may consider omitting the references to punitive damages, consequential damages and treble damages.

“Environmental Lien” means any lien, security interest, charge or other encumbrance for environmental liabilities incurred by a government authority.

Practice Note: This definition clarifies that an environmental lien is limited to a lien filed by a government agency to secure cleanup costs so that it does not include mechanics liens that may be filed by environmental contractors, etc.

“Environmental Permits” refers to any federal, state or municipal permits, licenses or approvals from a governmental authority having jurisdiction over the premises which are necessary to operate the premises in compliance with environmental laws.

Practice Note: This definition is limited to permits that are required to conduct the contemplated operation at the premises. If the tenant is not using a UST, the tenant would not be required to maintain registration of the tank or comply with other UST requirements.

“Hazardous Materials” shall include any element, compound, or chemical that is defined, listed or otherwise classified as a contaminant, pollutant, toxic pollutant, toxic or hazardous substance, extremely hazardous substance or chemical, hazardous waste, special waste, or solid waste under environmental laws; petroleum and its refined products; polychlorinated biphenyls; lead-based paints; any substance exhibiting a hazardous waste characteristic including but not limited to corrosivity, ignitability, toxicity or reactivity as well as any radioactive or explosive materials; any asbestos-containing materials; and any manufactured products containing hazardous materials.

Practice Note: The term refers to “hazardous materials” to reinforce that it is intended to apply to substances that may not necessarily fall within the CERCLA definition of hazardous substance such as petroleum. The definition incorporate terms of other types of substances that are regulated by other environmental laws. If a landlord is making reps and warranties, it may consider deleting references to LBP, and asbestos-containing materials to narrow the scope of the representation.

“Release” means any spilling, leaking, pumping, emitting, emptying, discharging, injecting, escaping, leaching, dumping, or disposing (including the abandonment or discarding of barrels, containers or other closed receptacles containing hazardous materials) of hazardous materials into the environment.

Practice Note: This definition tracks the CERCLA definition of release.

“Remedial Action” means all actions taken to clean up, remove, remediate, contain, treat, monitor, assess, evaluate or in any other way address hazardous materials in the indoor or outdoor environment which are necessary to prevent, contain, remove or minimize a release or threatened release of hazardous materials so they do not migrate or endanger or threaten to endanger public health or welfare. The term “Remedial Action” also includes any pre-remedial studies and investigations and post-remedial operation and maintenance activities or any other actions authorized by 42 U.S.C. § 9601.

Practice Note: This definition incorporates concepts in the CERCLA definition of Remedial Action. Notice that it refers to hazardous materials that may be present in the indoor environment. Contaminants that can escape to the exterior environment by being tracked outside, escaping through windows or seeping through concrete floors can result in CERCLA liability as well as contaminants in the outside environment that migrates via vapors into a building. However, spills that are confined solely within a workplace are ordinarily outside the scope of the CERCLA. If the lessor is making a representation or warranty about the conditions of the premises or providing an indemnity, it should consider omitting “indoor.”

[14.61] E. Pre-Occupancy Environmental Due Diligence Contingency

Pre-occupation due diligence is not only essential for a tenant to evaluate the environmental conditions of the property but can also enable the parties to establish a baseline of environmental conditions. A sophisticated tenant can use a pre-occupancy environmental assessment to allocate responsibility for preexisting environmental conditions to the lessor. The pre-occupancy assessment can be used by a lessor to determine environmental impacts of a tenant at the termination of the lease, support claims that the tenant is responsible for the contamination as well as defend claims by the tenant that certain environmental conditions or contaminated preexisted its occupancy.

Following are some examples of pre-occupancy due diligence provisions.

[XX.] Tenant shall have thirty (30) days from the execution of this lease to conduct its own environmental inspection of the Premises and unless Tenant objects to any Environmental Conditions in writing within forty-five (45) days of the execution of this lease, Tenant shall be deemed to have accepted the Premises on an “As Is” basis.

Practice Note: This is a fairly simple clause that may provide considerable discretion to the tenant depending on how the term “Environmental Condition” is defined.

[XX.] If the Phase I ESA identifies Recognized Environmental Conditions as that term is defined in ASTM E1527-13 and Lessee desires to further assess by collecting soil or groundwater samples (the “Additional Investigation”), Lessee will provide Lessor with copies of the Phase I ESA recommending further investigation and a work plan for the Additional Investigation which shall identify the number and locations of the proposed sampling, the depth of the sampling, the parameters to be analyzed, the schedule for the sampling and the name of the environmental consultant who would perform the work.

Lessor shall review the proposed work plan and after consulting with the Lessee shall either (i) permit the Lessee to perform the Additional Investigation, or (ii) propose modifications to the work plan or reject the work plan and refuse to permit the Lessee to conduct the Additional Investigation. If Lessor requests a modification to or rejects the work plan, the Lessee shall have the option to (x) not perform an Additional Investigation and proceed to closing, (y) submit a revised work plan to Lessor or (z) cancel this Lease. Lessor’s approval, modification or rejection of the Additional Investigation shall be at Lessor’s sole discretion.

If Lessor approves the Additional Investigation, Lessor will have thirty (30) days to complete the Additional Investigation. If Lessee proceeds with the Additional Investigation, Lessee shall not be required to provide Lessor with copies of all reports and data generated during the Additional Investigation. However, if Lessee fails to provide the results of the Additional Investigation to Lessor, Lessee will waive its rights set forth in paragraph _____ herein to terminate this Lease because of the existence of Environmental Conditions. Lessee will give Lessor no less than ten (10) days advance written notice of the date Lessee will have the Additional Investigation, if any, performed and evidence of all necessary permits at least two (2) business days in advance of any Additional Investigation so that Lessor may have the opportunity to have a representative on-site or available for monitoring purposes. Lessor may but shall have no obligation to obtain split samples taken by Purchaser.

Practice Note: This variation allows the Tenant to perform a phase 2 to further investigate RECs identified in the Phase 1 provided the lessor consents to the investigation. The lessee is not required to disclose the results to the Lessor but if it fails to do so, it waives the environmental contingency.

[XX.] If the Additional Investigation reveals Releases of Hazardous Materials at the Property in concentrations that exceed Cleanup Standards and that are likely to include Remediation Action that will exceed $____, (“Pre-Existing Conditions”) Lessee may notify the Lessor in writing prior to the expiration of the Environmental Inspection Period and the parties shall have seven (7) days to discuss a resolution of the Pre-Existing Conditions (the “Environmental Consultation Period”). If the parties cannot reach an acceptable resolution regarding the Pre-Existing Condition upon the expiration of the Environmental Consultation Period, then either party may terminate this Agreement (“Termination Notice”). If Lessee fails to deliver the Termination Notice because of the presence of Contamination or Lessee fails to provide Lessor with a copy of any such Additional Investigation, Lessee shall be deemed to have waived its right to terminate the Lease because of the Pre-Existing Conditions.

Practice Note: This variation links the environmental contingency to a dollar threshold of cleanup costs and tenant notifying the Lessor of the contamination. If the parties cannot reach an agreement on how to resolve the issue, either party may be terminate the lease. Estimating cleanups can be fraught with assumptions and uncertainty on the extent of the contamination, what the regulator will require to complete the cleanup and sometimes just as important, how soon the cleanup may be completed so that the tenant may assume occupancy.

[14.62] F. Tenant Affirmative Environmental Covenants

[XX.] Commencing on the Commencement Date and continuing throughout the Term, Tenant shall, at Tenant’s expense, will comply with and maintain the Premises in [full] [material] compliance with Environmental Laws at all times and shall obtain all Environmental Permits. Tenant shall not allow any Hazardous Materials to be used, stored, generated, disposed or otherwise handled on the Premises except in De Minimis Amounts. Tenant warrants or represents that throughout the term of the lease, its operations shall be in full [material] compliance with Environmental Permits and Environmental Laws.

Practice Note: This is a fairly standard covenant. A lessor sometimes requires “full” compliance with environmental laws but this means that tenant could be in breach of the lease for minor violations such as failing to timely file paperwork that do not pose any risk to human health or the environment. In response, a tenant may amend this covenant to provide for “material” compliance.

[XX.] Tenant acknowledges that is has the right to exercise control all of and operate all of the Premises. Tenant shall, at its own cost and expenses, perform all Remedial Actions which are necessary for addressing any Releases of Hazardous Materials on or migrating from the Premises that are discovered after the Tenant has assumed occupancy of the Premises including but not limited to the abatement of friable asbestos-containing materials and leaded paint. In the event that the Tenant undertakes any renovation or remodeling of the Premises, Tenant shall be responsible, at its sole cost and expense, for complying with all asbestos notification, work practice and disposal requirements established under Environmental Laws.

Practice Note: This covenant has been used for triple net leases where the tenant is the sole occupant, has accepted the premises in an “as is” condition and lessor has not agreed to assume responsibility for preexisting conditions. The first sentence is designed to prevent the tenant from arguing it should not be deemed a “de facto” owner of the premises.

[XX.] In the event that Tenant receives any notice of an Environmental Claim or becomes aware or should have become aware of any Release [in excess of any reportable quantity], Tenant shall immediately orally notify Landlord of such Release or Environmental Claim and shall forward written notice to Landlord within 24 hours. If the Tenant becomes aware of a Release which Tenant believes must be reported, Tenant shall not disclose such contamination until first consulting with the Landlord. Tenant shall promptly furnish to the Landlord copies of notices, reports correspondence, submissions, made by Tenant to Government Authorities regarding any Releases of Hazardous Materials.

Practice Note: This covenant requires Tenant to immediately notify lessor of any Releases as well as any violations of law or other communication from a regulator. Notice that the covenant provides that Tenant shall not disclose the existence of the Release to the regulator until it first consults with the Lessor. Tenant may want to add the bracketed language to ensure that failure to notify tiny spills will not trigger an event of default. Some reporting requirements impose a 2-hour notification while others provide for a 24-hour reporting period. Significant civil (and possibly criminal) penalties can be assessed for untimely reporting of spills. Thus, if Tenant believes the spill is reportable, it should be prepared to report a spill within the applicable period if the Lessor fails to do so or disagrees that the spill is a reportable event.

[XX.] Upon discovery of a Release requiring Remedial Actions, Tenant shall implement any Remedial Actions required by Environmental Law and under supervision of the NYSDEC [or the NYC Office of Environmental Remediation (OER)] to abate said Release and obtain a No Further Action letter or its equivalent from the NYSDEC [or OER]. If Tenant fails to immediately undertake any Remedial Actions that are required under Environmental Law, Landlord shall have the right but not the obligation to enter onto the Premises during regular business hours or during other hours, and to take such Remedial Actions as it deems necessary to eliminate or abate such Release. All costs and expenses incurred by Landlord in the exercise of such rights shall be deemed to be additional rent hereunder and should be payable by Tenant to Landlord upon demand.

Practice Note: This covenant requires the Tenant to implement remedial actions under the supervision of the NYSDEC so that a no further action letter can be issued. Tenants might prefer to do what is commonly called a “self-directed” cleanup where the work is done by a consultant without any involvement by the NYSDEC. The consultant uses its best professional judgment in determining when the cleanup is completed. The Lessor should resist this suggestion even though it may result in a less expensive and quicker cleanup since the NYSDEC frowns on the use of self-directed cleanups and failing to report the Release could result in penalties to both the Tenant and the Lessor.

The bracketed reference to OER could be used for a moderately contaminated site in NYC. Such sites can be enrolled in the OER voluntary cleanup program. Cleanups supervised by OER are generally accepted by NYSDEC and can usually be completed on a more expedited basis.

[XX.] Tenant shall not assign nor sublet any portion of the Premises nor permit persons to occupy the Premises nor grant any license or concession to other persons without the prior written consent of the Landlord which consent shall not be unreasonably withheld provided, however, that Landlord shall be entitled to withhold its consent in its absolute discretion if the proposed transfer of the Premises will involve operations that use, storage, generation or disposal of Hazardous Materials.

[XX.] No consent of the Landlord shall be deemed to be a waiver of the requirement to obtain consent for any future assignment or consent or an extension of the present lease term nor shall the consent of the Landlord waive the assignee’s obligation to comply with any provision contained within this Lease. If any of the corporate shares of Tenant are transferred or if any partnership interest is conveyed by sale, assignment, bequest, inheritance or operation of law which results in a change in the control or ownership of the Tenant, such a transfer shall be deemed to be an assignment for purposes of this paragraph and shall require Landlord's prior consent.

Practice Note: This covenant prevents tenants from subleasing space to business such as dry cleaners that may not fit the lessor's risk profile. It also confirms that the tenant who presumably satisfied lessor financial requirements shall remain responsible for compliance with environmental laws and implementing remedial actions in response to releases of hazardous substances during the term of the lease whether caused by the tenant or subtenant.

[XX.] Tenant shall keep the Premises free and clear of any Environmental Liens. In the event that Tenant receives a notice that an Environmental Lien will be or has been filed against the Premises, Tenant shall immediately take whatever steps are necessary to satisfy the Environmental Lien, provided however that Tenant shall have the right at its cost and expense, and acting in good faith, to contest, object or appeal by appropriate legal proceeding the validity of any Environmental Lien. The contest, objection or appeal with respect to the validity of an Environmental Lien shall suspend Tenant's obligation to eliminate such Environmental Lien under this paragraph pending a final determination by appropriate administrative or judicial authority of the legality, enforceability or status of such Environmental Lien. If Tenant challenges the imposition of such Environmental Lien, it must furnish to the Lessor good and sufficient bond, surety, letter of credit or other security satisfactory to Lessor equal to the amount (including any interest and penalty) secured by the Environmental Lien on or before the filing of such challenge.

Practice Note: If the NYSDEC responds to an oil spill, the Oil Spill Fund will record a spill lien against the property. The Spill Fund does not have to obtain a judicial determination that the property owner is liable under the Oil Spill law before recording the lien.¹⁵¹

[14.63] G. Lessor Environmental Reps and Warranties

[XX.] Landlord represents, warrants and covenants to Tenant that as of the Effective Date and as of the Rent Commencement Date(a) the Premises are in compliance with all applicable Environmental Laws; (b) the Landlord has not received and has no knowledge of any pending Environmental Claims in connection with current or past operations at the Premises; (c) There have not been any Releases of Hazardous Materials at, from [or onto] Premises as a result of any prior past or current operations at the Premises; (d) Landlord has not installed, used or operated, and has no knowledge of the presence or existence any active or inactive USTs at, under or around the Premises; and, (e) Landlord shall continue to comply with all applicable Environmental Laws throughout the term of the Lease.

Practice Note: These are the fairly standard Lessor environmental representation and warranties. The bracketed phrase is intended to address contamination that may be migrating onto the property from an off-site source. If tenant insists on this phrase, Lessor may want to consider a knowledge qualifier. In response, Tenant may want to further qualify the knowledge qualifier with the phrase “after diligent inquiry”.

[14.64] H. Lessor Affirmative Covenant Relating to USTs

[XX.] Landlord shall, at Landlord’s sole cost and expense, remove the underground storage tanks currently located at the Premises, including piping and ancillary equipment used in connection with the operation of same in accordance with all applicable Environmental Laws prior to the Commencement Date and complete any Remedial Actions required by NYSDEC so that a no further action letter will be issued or its equivalent by NYSDEC. If underground storage tanks are discovered after the Commencement Date, Landlord shall remain responsible for their removal in accordance with all applicable Environmental Laws and completing any Remedial Actions required by NYSDEC so that a no further action letter will be issued or its equivalent by NYSDEC. Any underground tanks and equipment [not used by Tenant] shall be and remain the exclusive property of Landlord, and Tenant shall not be required to take any actions with regard thereto. Landlord shall promptly deliver to Tenant all documents relating to the removal and proper closure of the USTs including but limited to the NFA letter.

Practice Note: Notice this covenant expressly provides that any USTs at the property whether known or unknown, active or inactive, are the property of the landlord. This is more appropriate where for a multi-tenant building or warehouse where tenant does not use any of the USTs.

[XX.] In the event that a Release of Hazardous Substances is found within, on or under the Premises other than as a result of the acts of Tenant, its agents, contractors or employees, [that requires Remediation based on the commercial use of the Premises] [poses an imminent and substantial endangerment to human health], Landlord covenants to use commercial reasonable efforts to implement the Remedial Actions that may be required by the NYSDEC in a manner that will minimize interference with Tenant's use of the Premises. In the event that Tenant's use of the Premises shall be disturbed because of the need to complete the required Remedial Actions, or such action requires that Tenant be closed for business or access to Tenant be denied, then, in addition to Tenant's remedies in this Lease, at law or in equity (x) Landlord shall provide, at Landlord's sole expense, alternative space for Tenant, satisfactory to Tenant, during the course of the Remedial Actions and (y) Landlord shall abate the Rent for the Premises during the period that Tenant's use of the Premises is disturbed or Tenant's business is closed for business or Tenant's access to the Premises is denied. In the event that Landlord fails to promptly implement the Remedial Action, Tenant may also terminate this Lease.

Practice Note: This covenant may be used for contamination that is discovered during the term of the lease that is caused by other tenants, from an off-site source or that predates the lease provided lessor has assumed responsibility for preexisting contamination. Bracketed language may be used to narrow Landlord's remedial obligations to so that tenant cannot use minor spills as an excuse to abate rent or terminate the lease.

[14.65] I. Tenant UST Covenants Upon Surrender of Premises

[XX.] Upon the expiration or other termination of this Lease, Lessee shall remove all of its property, including, but not limited to, Lessee's Fixtures and Inventory, underground storage tanks, associated piping and dispenser equipment, and shall repair all damages to the Premises caused by such removal and restore same to the condition in which they were prior to the installation of the articles so removed. Any property not so removed shall be deemed to have been abandoned by Lessee and may be retained or disposed of by Lessor, as Lessor shall desire at Lessee's sole cost and expense. Lessee's obligation to observe or perform this covenant shall survive the expiration or termination of this Agreement, provided, however, that any underground storage tanks, associated piping and dispenser equipment that are not removed by the Lessee shall not be considered abandoned and Lessee shall continue to be responsible for removing such property in accordance with Environmental Laws. Immediately upon the failure of Lessee to perform any covenant of this Article, Lessor may, without notice, do so, and shall be entitled to receive from Lessee the then cost of performance of such covenant, such damages to be paid in addition to and separate and independently from damages accruing by reason of breach of any other covenant of this Agreement.

[XX.] Lessee shall, upon the expiration or earlier termination of this Agreement, comply with the closure requirements of the New York State Department of Environmental Conservation (NYSDEC) of 6 N.Y.C.R.R. Part 613 including, without limitation, removing all fuel, fuel tanks, product piping, fuel dispensers and other equipment, and backfill any areas from which the fuel tanks were removed and conducting any Remedial Actions required by NYSDEC, (collectively, the “UST Closure”). Lessee shall, within the time frames mandated by Environmental Laws, following its satisfaction of the UST Closure, deliver to Lessor a written report confirming completion of the UST Closure in accordance with the terms of this License and approved in writing by the NYSDEC (the “UST Closure Report. Lessee shall be responsible for remediating any Releases of Hazardous Materials at, under or emanating from the Premises in accordance with Environmental Laws. If Lessee fails to remediate such Releases of Hazardous Materials upon expiration or sooner termination of this Lease, Lessor shall be entitled to all remedies in respect thereof hereunder, including, without limitation, following applicable notice and cure period, the right to remove or otherwise remediate same at Lessee’s cost and expense in accordance with this Lease.

Practice Note: This provision clarifies that any USTs abandoned by the tenant remains the property of the tenant and if the tenant fails to remove them, lessor shall be entitled to costs of such work. The second paragraph describes the tenant’s closure and corrective action requirements by linking those obligations to the specific NYSDEC closure regulations and approval of specific requirements of the NYSDEC.

[14.66] J. Occupancy and Pre-Termination Diligence Covenants

[XX.] Landlord may from time to time require Tenant to perform, at Tenant’s sole cost and expense, an environmental site assessment (ESA) of the Premises to confirm that the Premises are in compliance with Environmental Laws and to determine if any Releases have occurred at the Premises.

No later than ninety (90) days prior to the Termination Date of this lease or any early termination date, the Tenant shall, at its sole cost and expense, have an environmental site assessment (ESA) conducted at the property. The ESA shall be in a scope acceptable to Landlord and shall be performed by an environmental consultant approved by the Landlord. A report discussing the results of the ESA (the ESA Report) shall be furnished to the Landlord within one week of the completion of the ESA.

Based on the results of the ESA Report, the Landlord may, in its own discretion, require the Tenant to undertake Remedial Actions to eliminate the Environmental Conditions disclosed in the ESA Report. It is understood that in the event the ESA Report reveals Environmental Conditions, the Landlord may elect not to take possession of the Premises until the Remedial Actions have completed and approved by the applicable state or federal regulatory authorities. If the Landlord so elects, the Tenant shall pay, during such period, monthly in advance, an amount equal to Basic Rent paid on the Basic Rent Payment Date immediately preceding the scheduled expiration date of the Term or the Termination Date, as the case may be. Nothing contained herein shall in any way constitute a waiver of, or diminish or limit the provisions of the Tenant's environmental indemnity.

Practice Note: This covenant allows landlord to perform a pre-termination Phase 1 well enough before the end of the lease term so that landlord can advise tenant of specific environmental issues before tenant vacates the premises and take appropriate legal action if tenant contests the conclusions before tenant vacates the premises.

[14.67] K. Tenant Environmental Indemnity

[XX.] Tenant hereby agrees to defend, indemnify, and hold harmless the Landlord from and against any Environmental Liabilities arising out of (i) any Releases or threatened Releases of Hazardous Materials at or from the Premises; (ii) any violations of Environmental Laws [attributable to the Tenant's operation or use of the Premises]; (iii) Remedial Action costs or other Environmental Liabilities incurred by Landlord as a result of violations of Environmental Laws or Releases of Hazardous Materials [attributable to the Tenant's operation or use of the Premises]; (iv) any Environmental Liens, (v) any wrongful death, personal injury or property damage caused or resulting from Environmental Conditions at the Premises [attributable to the Tenant's operation or use of the Premises]; and (vi) any breach of any warranty or representation or covenant regarding environmental matters made by the Tenant. The foregoing indemnity shall survive the expiration or termination of this Lease and/or any transfer of all or any portion of the Premises, and/or any transfer of all or any portion of any interest in this Lease and shall be governed by the laws of the state in which the Premises are located.

Practice Note: The indemnity makes use of the defined terms to make a clear statement on the scope of the tenant's indemnity. The bracketed limits the scope of tenant's indemnity obligations to contamination or violations of law that were caused by its operations and not related to pre-existing contamination or operations of other tenants.

[XX.] Notwithstanding anything to the contrary herein, in no event shall Tenant be responsible for, and Tenant's indemnification obligations herein shall not apply with respect to any Release of Hazardous Materials on, in, under or about the Premises, or common areas commencing or existing before the Commencement Date (including, without limitation, such conditions set forth in that certain Phase I dated _____ and prepared by _____ with respect to the Premises) (the "Preexisting Conditions"), whether or not such Preexisting Conditions have been discovered as of the Commencement Date.

Practice Note: this is another way for the tenant to clarify that it indemnity obligations do not include preexisting contamination. The parties rely on a Phase I report to establish the baseline of preexisting contamination. It is important that the baseline report be sufficiently comprehensive in scope. There have been instances particularly involving active or recently closed gas stations where tenants relied on reports that were limited to the area where the tanks were located and that did not assess impacts throughout the site. Later when there is a dispute, the prior operator or lessor argued that since the conditions were not disclosed in the baseline report, the former operator or lessor have no obligation to indemnity the tenant for this contamination even though it was preexisting.

[14.68] L. Tenant Release of All Claims

[XX.] Lessee on behalf of itself and any successors and assigns hereby releases and holds Lessor harmless from any Environmental Liabilities at or from the Property and shall be responsible, at its sole cost and expense, for conducting any Remedial Actions to address Releases of Hazardous Materials at the Property regardless if such Releases were known prior to the closing or are first discovered by the Lessee in connection with Lessee's development of the Property. Lessee on behalf of itself and any successors and assigns also waives all contractual, statutory or common law rights and remedies that it might be able to assert against the Seller for any such Environmental Liabilities.

Practice Note: The last sentence is the magical phrase to ensure that an "as is" agreement will have the effect that the Lessor intended and cuts off its environmental liability regardless of when it occurred and by whom.

[14.69] M. Landlord Environmental Indemnity

[XX.] Landlord hereby agrees and does indemnify and holds Tenant, its directors, officers, employees and agents harmless from and against (a) any and all Environmental Liability imposed on or incurred by Tenant in any way relating to or arising out of the existence or presence of any Hazardous Materials [or underground storage tank(s)] on, under, from or onto the Premises unless the Hazardous Substances are as a result of the operations of Tenant, its contractors or employees; and (b) any and all Environmental related to or arising out Releases of Hazardous Substances or violations of Environmental Law attributable to the operations of the Tenant, its contractors or employees at the Premises. This indemnification shall include, without limitation, Environmental Claims arising out of any violations of applicable Environmental Laws, regardless of any actual or alleged fault, negligence, willful misconduct, gross negligence, breach of warranty or strict liability on the part of Landlord. Without limitation, this indemnification shall also include any and all Environmental Claims incurred due to any Remedial Actions Premises mandated by Environmental Laws and conducted any NYSDEC. The foregoing indemnity shall survive the expiration or termination of this Lease and/or any transfer of all or any portion of the Premises, and/or any transfer of all or any portion of any interest in this Lease and shall be governed by the laws of New York.

Practice Note: In addition to the carve-out related to tenant operations, this indemnity specifically references strict liability. Notice the landlord's indemnity obligations survive the termination of the lease or transfer of interest in the leasehold.

CHAPTER FIFTEEN

IMPACT OF TECHNOLOGY ON COMMERCIAL LEASING

Kevin P. Groarke, Esq.
Gary A. Goodman, Esq.

[15.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter covers the impact of technology on commercial real estate leasing generally and office and retail leasing in particular. It will cover issues that landlords and tenants need to keep in mind when leasing office space for Internet, digital media and other technology company uses and issues presented by technological forces on retail space leases.

[15.1] A. The National Tech Boom

Between 2010 and 2015, the booming high-tech sector has been one of the major drivers in the U.S. office market recovery, with the industry accounting for 34% of all new office-using jobs created in the United States. High tech was also the top industry leasing office space in the U.S., accounting for 20% of major leasing activity by square footage in 2015. By comparison, the second place industry was financial services at 12%.

The “Tech-Thirty Office Markets” are the top 30 large cities with a high concentration of high-tech software/services and digital media jobs. Ranked by city overall market office rent growth rates for the last two years, the clear leaders were the San Francisco Bay area at 30.7%, Manhattan at 14%, San Diego at 12.7%, Denver at 11.8%, Austin at 11.4% and Boston at 14.4%. Within the Tech-Thirty markets, the primary tech-centric submarkets experienced exemplary rent growth, with eight of the 30 top submarkets experiencing two-year rent gains of over 20%.¹

[15.2] B. New York: New Tech City

Since 2000, New York’s tech sector has emerged as an increasingly powerful economic driver for the city economy. At a time when few other industries were growing in New York, more than 1,000 new tech start-ups were formed, which created thousands of well-paying jobs and attracted large amounts of capital. Unlike the fleeting dot-com era, New York City is building a sustainable tech ecosystem with dozens of incubators, co-working spaces and early stage accelerators. Venture accelerators generally provide short-term space as part of an eight- or 12-week start-up boot camp, and offer mentoring and coaching services in return for an equity stake in the company; incubators provide longer-term space for young companies still looking to put together a team.

Since 2000, many of the nation's largest tech companies have planted roots in New York. In 2010, Google purchased 111 Eighth Avenue, an approximately 2,900,000-square-foot mixed-use building, for $1.9 billion. Google currently occupies and uses more than 700,000 square feet of the building with approximately 2,200,000 square feet occupied and used by other tech industry companies.

In 2014, Facebook relocated its New York City-based engineering division, marketing and other functions from midtown into 100,000 square feet of new space near Astor Place. In December 2014, Facebook leased an additional 170,000 square feet of space in the same building. Also in 2014, Amazon signed a 17-year lease for a 470,000-square-foot building across from the Empire State Building for offices and ground floor retail; and BuzzFeed, a fast-growing digital media company, signed a long term lease for 200,000 square feet, 40% of a building, on Park Avenue South.

In addition to the growth in rent rates, the phenomenal growth of the tech sector in New York and in the other Tech-Twenty cities has had the added impact of converting class B and class C office properties and former industrial properties into trendy and desirable locations for tech-sector companies with higher rents and substantial upgrades. This trend started a few years ago and has continued on an accelerated basis. One of the main reasons for this migration is that many older industrial and loft buildings, with their high ceilings and sound structure, are more easily renovated to accommodate "telecom hotels," data centers and colocation facilities, and include the wide-open style and manner of office space tech-sector companies strive for. Telecom hotels and data centers are generally located in buildings specially fitted and physically reinforced to house multiple technology tenants, whose business is to provide a location for data storage as well as transmission facilities and telecom-switching devices that route telephone calls between carriers and local networks.

As a result of the tech sector expansion and the unprecedented rate of conversion of such properties to residential uses, there are dramatically fewer class B and C office properties and industrial properties in Manhattan, Brooklyn and Queens than there were 10 years ago. This has recently led some real estate industry commentators to call upon city economic development officials to create a new set of incentives, including tax exemptions, aimed at making it financially attractive for the owners of such properties to preserve their buildings as office spaces or convert their industrial buildings to office uses.

High tech's rapid expansion has been, and continues to be, fueled by venture capital (VC) funding, which enables companies to quickly scale their operations by adding talent and increasing their office and other space footprints. Nationally, and in New York City, VC funding to the technology sector has been strong, averaging $26 billion per year between 2009 and 2013. VC funding for technology (defined as including the media and entertainment, networking and equipment, biotechnology, IT services, computers and peripherals, electronics/instrumentation and software sectors) in the first half of 2016 was $27.9 billion nationally, and $3.1 billion in metro New York, according to data from Thompson Reuters for the Pricewaterhouse/National Venture Capital Association Money Tree Report Q2 (July 2016). This all indicates that the tech industry continues to grow at a very strong pace and its need for commercial space also is growing.

From the beginning of his mayoralty in 2002, Mayor Michael Bloomberg sounded the alarm that New York City was overly dependent on Wall Street and needed to diversify its economy. The Bloomberg Administration made unprecedented commitments to help the tech sector grow in New York.

In 2011, the Bloomberg Administration announced a high-profile contest to attract a new applied sciences and engineering campus to New York. Seventeen leading universities from around the world filed seven applications. The process culminated in the selection of Cornell University and Technion–Israel Institute of Technology to commit to build 2 million square feet of applied science and engineering labs, classrooms and conference facilities on an 11-acre campus site on Roosevelt Island in the middle of the East River.

In April 2012, the Bloomberg Administration and New York University announced another agreement to create The Center for Urban Science and Progress (CUSP), a new post-graduate applied science and engineering center in downtown Brooklyn. CUSP is a consortium of top educational institutions and leading companies, including IBM and Cisco, led by NYU and NYU Polytechnic School of Engineering, which will focus on research and development of technology to address the critical challenges facing cities. NYU will transform the former MTA headquarters building into a cutting edge research facility.

[15.3] C. Upstate New York Tech

The growth of the high-tech industry in New York is not confined to the metro New York City area. With sponsorship from SUNY Polytechnic Institute and the College of Nanoscale Science and Engineering (CNSE), there is the CNSE NanoTech Complex in Albany, a 1,300,000-square-foot complex that houses advanced high-tech labs for state-of-the-art R&D and prototype manufacturing facilities, the Solar Energy Development Center in Halfmoon, New York, and other CNSE-sponsored high tech labs and facilities in Rochester and Buffalo. Rensselaer Polytechnic Institute owns and operates the Rensselaer Technology Park which consists of 23 buildings on 450 acres with a lot of room to expand for technology development. The park houses over 70 technology industry tenants, ranging from electronics to physics research to biotechnology to software.

Notably, VC funding for technology in upstate New York in the first half of 2016 was $49 million according to the PriceWaterhouse/National Venture Capital Q2 Report.

[15.4] D. So Why Is It Different This Time?

All of this leads one to ponder whether the growth in the tech industry nationally, and in New York, is sustainable or will meet a fate similar to so many “dot-com” companies that fizzled out when the tech bubble burst in 2000. That question is far beyond the scope of this chapter on the impact of technology on leasing, although the question will inevitably overhang and influence investment and leasing decisions. Nonetheless, the following differentiations have been identified by business commentators and are worth noting by landlords, lenders, tenants and investors alike.

- The euphoria of the dot-com frenzy of 1997–2000 came largely from one industry trend: the Internet.
- The tech industry exuberance today is dispersed across several industries: mobile technology, cloud computing, social media, on-demand services, digital media, financial tech, health tech, and ad tech. Today’s tech sector is much more diverse than 16 years ago.
- More than that, technology is playing a far larger role in our economy and culture than 16 years ago.
- In 1998, 308 out of 480 Initial Public Offerings (IPOs) were of Internet and tech-related companies, 75% of which had no earnings.

- Today, we have a more rational IPO market. In 2013, the average tech IPO company had been around for nine years and had revenue of $200 million or more.
- Today's technology revolution is much less about creating the infrastructure and plumbing for the Internet than about applying technology to traditional industries like advertising, media, financial institutions, fashion, and health care and bioscience to deliver content, sell products, deliver services, provide entertainment and simplify life for individuals and businesses.

Looking forward, commentators have noted that as long as there is strong demand from consumers and businesses for high-tech products and services, and the trend lines suggest that demand may be insatiable, the high-tech industry, and the office markets they are concentrated in, should continue to grow in the years to come.

[15.5] II. OFFICE LEASES FOR TECHNOLOGY COMPANIES

Critical factors which impact the selection of space for any tenant, not just technology companies, include pricing of the space (such as build-out costs, landlord concessions and the effective rent), location, the term of the prospective lease, and the general suitability of the space for the tenant's use today and for the foreseeable future. Tech companies, whether a start-up or a well-capitalized mature company, are different, however, because of their particular uses of space, rapid growth demands and the special technology needs they face.

[15.6] A. Pricing

Pricing is always an upfront determinative factor. Rents in high-tech submarkets are likely to churn higher for the foreseeable future, particularly for well-maintained buildings in desirable neighborhoods. Some tech tenants may face sticker shock when shopping for new office space. For start-up tech companies, tech accelerators and incubators are an excellent transitional alternative. For smaller tenants (1,000–2,000 square feet), communal working arrangements like General Assembly, New Work City, Hive 55 and others may be a viable alternative. The price is lower and generally all-inclusive in terms of utilities, Internet access, and other fringe costs.

[15.7] B. Location

For tech companies, aside from intangible image factors that drive the desirability of building location, determinative building location factors include the proximity to fiber-optic corridors, to the city's central business districts and to major transportation hubs.

High-tech tenants strive for locations with at least two fiber-optic, high-speed broadband service providers with diverse routes and points of entry to the building. One tech industry commentator indicated that commercial buildings serving tech companies, as well as other tenants, should strive to make available at least 150-megabit connections to each tenant.

[15.8] C. Electrical Power

Electrical power is equally important. Generally speaking, high-tech tenants seek 80–100 watts per usable square foot (by contrast a typical office utilizes 4–6 watts per square foot) with multiple levels of redundancy, on-site emergency power supply and the use of the landlord's generator and/or diesel fuel tanks. The prolonged problems some buildings in flood-prone areas in Manhattan, New Jersey and other areas experienced from flood damage caused by Hurricane Sandy in 2012 added new emphasis to the location, or relocation, of on-site emergency power generators and fiber-optic service points of entry on floor levels above recognized 100-year flood lines.

Related issues include whether there is adequate riser space for electrical and fiber-optic conduits (pipes, hollow on the inside, running through shafts from one part of a building to another, through which the landlord or tenant can run cabling and electrical wiring) at occupancy and reserved for future alterations or expansion; whether the tenant will have exclusive use of, or controlled access to, such risers; and who will have the right to sell any excess capacity. The lease should spell out rules relating to tenant access to equipment and risers (including those outside the premises); tenants presumably will want 24/7 access. Leases also should contain appropriate restrictions on third-party access to premises and conduits.

[15.9] D. Physical Infrastructure

Another issue is the building's physical infrastructure. Does it have large floor plates, high ceilings, wide column spaces, heavy floor load capability and freight elevators with extra weight capacity to meet the tech tenants' needs?

Tech tenants also require high-capacity condenser units for cooling, and non-water, chemical fire suppression systems. If not present or accessible to the leased premises, who will pay for installing such systems prior to occupancy? In addition, rooftop space for antennas (with adequate exposures) and, where necessary, supplemental air conditioning equipment must be considered. Landlords and tenants should ensure that all leases contain detailed provisions relating to these matters and specifically describe their respective obligations, if any.

High-tech tenants require extraordinarily expensive initial tenant build-outs. Their operators routinely argue that such an up-front investment should be recognized as the security deposit under lease, justification for “free” rent abatements and, moreover, a commitment by the landlord to protect that investment by obtaining a nondisturbance agreement in favor of the operator from any mortgage lender.

[15.10] E. The Changing Need of Tech Companies

Technology changes rapidly, and so do the needs of tech companies. What works today may not work next year, so the ability to expand and or reorganize office space is paramount when a technology company is negotiating the terms of a lease. While a savvy tech tenant and its design professionals will endeavor to allow for flexibility and future changes in space use and configuration in the initial design of the space (movable walls, modular furniture, reserved riser capacity and the like), invariably, they cannot foresee everything involved. Therefore, it is critical from the tenant’s perspective that the lease contains favorable alteration provisions covering, among other things, accelerated plan and contractor approval processes, cooperation and coordination by the landlord, where required.

By the same token, because technology companies may grow, merge, be acquired or may die, leases should set forth provisions relating to the assignment of the lease (and deemed assignment such as a merger), subletting some or all of the leased premises, and expansion or contraction of the leased premises. There must be some flexibility for the tenants’ future growth or contraction, or changes in control, albeit without limiting the landlords’ rights and options too significantly. Leases may include rights of first offer and first refusal, options for additional space, rights to give back space, and must-take puts. They also may contain a carve-out of any initial public offering or merger from the “change of control” clause, and permit tenants to sell all or substantially all of its assets or enter into joint ventures and effect capital restructurings, without landlord consent, under specified conditions.

On the flipside, landlords want to have adequate remedies and recourse to assure they get the benefit of the bargain. It is not uncommon for a landlord to require somewhat onerous security requirements in the form of an irrevocable, evergreen (self-renewing) letter of credit and/or significant lease payments up front from tech start-ups or other tech companies without a stable history and steady cash flow. Typically, the tech tenant will negotiate for one or more reductions in the amount of the security deposit upon the tenant achieving certain financial hurdles and/or over time as the lease term is naturally reduced.

Young start-ups are often idea-rich but cash poor, making it difficult for them to provide large security deposits. In such cases, landlords might obtain personal guaranties from individual investors or sponsors. Even in the case of a well-capitalized tech tenant with a steady cash flow, many landlords will insist on a “good guy” guaranty from company principals, investors or sponsors. Essentially, this type of guaranty is a limited form of personal guaranty: the guarantor agrees that, in the event the tenant defaults in performing its obligations under the lease, which would allow the landlord to terminate the lease, the guarantor will be personally responsible for paying the rent (and other monetary obligations) until the tenant vacates the entire premises and shall have performed obligations for restoration of the space on termination of the lease, if there are any.

Finally, there is what has come to be known as the “dog clause.” In essence, this provides tech tenants with the right to build out special-use areas (such as living room/kitchen areas and basketball courts) and the right to have pet dogs on the premises.

[15.11] F. Tech Industry Subsectors

A variety of tech industry subsectors engaged in the high-tech boom of the last five years lease office space in many of the Tech-Twenty Markets. First among them is digital media and publishing. These include start-up digital media companies (for example, The Huffington Post, Tumblr and Comixology), more mature ones such as Google, Facebook and Twitter, and the largest digital media companies which are, in fact, old media companies—IAC, NewsCorp, Fox, NBC Universal, Viacom, CBS, ESPN, The Wall Street Journal and The New York Times, to name just a few.

Ad tech is another booming tech subsector that is based primarily in New York. DoubleClick (bought by Google for $3.1 billion), Right Media (acquired by Yahoo for $850 million) and AdMeld (acquired by Google for $390 million) are examples in this sector that are in leased office space. New York's ad tech companies offer services to other businesses rather than consumers. They sell analytical tools to help ad buyers figure out what was once thought to be incalculable—what a person was doing before seeing an ad, where a person who responded to an ad pointed his or her browser next, and so on.

Like ad-tech companies, “fin-tech” companies have developed product and services for financial companies rather than consumers, including big data and analytics, payments and processing services, risk management, security services or some combination of the above. Two of the biggest fin tech companies are based, not surprisingly, in New York: ACI Worldwide and Moody's Analytics. Kickstarter, also based in New York offices, enabled $1.49 billion in investments in 77,603 projects since its founding in 2009 through online crowd sourced funding. Easily the most recognizable brand in fin-tech, PayPal, founded in 1998, had annual revenue of $7.9 billion and processed $168 billion in total merchant services payment volume in 2014 in its massive operations center in Nebraska.² Its parent company, eBay, Inc., announced plans to spin off PayPal as a separate public company in 2015. In May 2015, PayPal inked a 12-year lease for approximately 100,000 square feet of office space in the West Village submarket of Manhattan.

The health-tech sector goes far beyond informational websites like WebMD to encompass health monitoring technology, e-prescribing, drug alert systems and health IT platforms designed to automate hospital and medical office recordkeeping and insurance payment processes. Health tech uses massive amounts of commercial real estate. Medical and life science facilities, such as the New York Genome Center and the Alexandria Center for Life Science-New York City, are examples of health-tech facilities on a large scale. The Genome Center, backed by most of the major medical schools and medical centers in New York, signed a 20-year lease for 170,000 square feet in a SoHo/Hudson Square area building (which also houses a major data center tenant) to establish one of the largest genetic sequencing and biotech research centers. The first phase of the Alexandria Center, located on the East Side between 28th and 30th Street, is a 310,000-square-foot, 15-floor Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) Gold facility of class A biotech laboratory and office space. The second phase of development will include a 410,000-square-foot laboratory and office building. Alexandria, a NYSE-listed Real Estate Investment Trust (REIT), specializes in leasing office/laboratory spaces to bioscience, technology, pharmaceutical and medical research companies and offers a full range of on-site services including laboratory design, planning and construction and laboratory operations and management. It owns and operates other bioscience centers in the Greater Boston area, Rockville, MD, the Research Triangle Area (Raleigh-Durham-Chapel Hill, N.C.), San Diego, the San Francisco Bay area and Seattle.

The Cornell/Technion applied science center on Roosevelt Island discussed above will emphasize bioscience in addition to environmental science. Columbia University's new Manhattanville campus will have a heavy concentration in biotechnology as well.

[15.12] III. IMPACT OF TECHNOLOGY ON RETAIL LEASING

[15.13] A. The History of Retail

The retail industry is no stranger to changing trends in reaction to technological developments and cultural changes. At the start of the 20th century, retailing was mainly dominated by mail-order catalog merchants who offered a broad assortment of just about everything available on the market (Sears, Roebuck and Co., Montgomery Ward, Inc. and JCPenney Company, to name a few). Variety stores, such as F.W. Woolworths, W.T. Grant, and S.S. Kresge, lined the streets of small towns and urban residential neighborhoods, offering basic goods for everyday needs. Consumers traveled to the central business districts of large cities to shop at department stores, which offered clothing, accessories, furniture and other home goods plus sidewalk window shopping. Macy's, Gimbel's, B. Altman & Co., Bonwit Teller, Lord & Taylor and Wanamaker's were among the most famous department stores.

Following the end of World War II and the return of our soldiers and sailors, the U.S. entered a period of massive rebuilding and growth that impacted consumers' needs for everything. Eighty million "baby boomers" were born between 1946 and 1965, and became the defining force for the U.S. economy for the next 50 years. The retail industry followed consumers to the new suburbs and built large shopping centers near where they lived. These shopping centers became the new destinations for retailing, housing department stores, national chains and other smaller stores. By 1975, there were over 2,000 shopping centers and over 20 department store chains in the U.S.

In the 1960s, the widespread growth of modern credit cards (e.g., Visa, MasterCard) and the emergence of discount stores, brought on by the repeal in the 1960s of fair trade laws that restricted discount pricing, fueled a new “mass market” economy. The discounters built no-frills big box stores with large parking lots, aimed at meeting the needs of consumers for branded household goods and apparel at prices below those suggested by manufacturers, the so-called manufacturer suggested retail price (MSRP).

In the 1970s and 1980s, specialty apparel stores and new “category killer” stores (like Toys ‘R Us, Home Depot, Best Buy) grew aggressively into many product segments, including toys, sporting goods, office supplies, electronics, home improvement, home furnishings, books, recorded music and video, and pet supplies. The discounters, specialty stores and the category killer merchants together took significant market share away from department stores, forcing many of them to consolidate, close or file for bankruptcy.

[15.14] B. Online Retailing

The World Wide Web launched in 1991. Online retailing, or e-commerce, began to show up in the marketplace. The explosion of personal computers, tablets, smartphones, wireless technology and the widespread availability of the Internet that followed has brought about revolutionary renovation not just in retailing, but in every other industry and business sector and in every aspect of consumers’ lives as well. The Internet changed consumer purchasing patterns. While big box stores and other bricks and mortar stores used to target mass consumerism, online stores cater to specific personal needs of consumers. Online stores are also viewed as more adaptive and flexible compared to physical stores, and are cheaper to manage and maintain.

As a result, online sales as a percentage of total retail has grown from 2% in 2004 to almost 10% of all retail sales in 2015, according to the U.S. Department of Commerce. Analysts are forecasting that it will be over $500 billion, or 20% of nonfood retail sales, by 2020. The key drivers of such growth: the increased use of mobile devices, including tablets, wireless technology and the greater wallet share shift to web purchasing by online buyers.

Make no mistake, however: the physical store is certainly not dead. Here’s why:

- While analysts forecast $150 billion more will be spent online between 2014 and 2018, they also forecast that $300 billion more will be spent in physical stores during that same period. Stated differently, while online sales were 6% of total retail sales in 2013, in-store sales were 94% of all retail sales in 2013.

- Occupancy rates for retail space in desirable city/high street locations and dominant shopping centers are nearly 100%. This factor could, in fact, lead to more retail developments being built and occupied by quality tenants.
- While old store concepts located in class B and class C centers are in peril, new fresh concepts in class A properties are doing well.
- Stores provide consumers with a sensory experience that allows them to touch and feel products, immerse in brand experiences, and engage with sales associates who provide tips and reaffirm shopper enthusiasm for their new purchases.
- Branded manufacturers, a sector of retail that is growing explosively, are leasing more floor space and show no signs of becoming online-only or primarily online brands.
- There are headwinds confronting e-commerce such as rising shipping costs, newly imposed sales taxes and other taxes for web pure plays.
- Landlords are embracing e-commerce and employing innovation to increase or maintain foot traffic and to attract new and retain existing quality tenants.

[15.15] C. The Retail Industry Today

One of the most significant impacts of e-commerce on brick-and-mortar retail is the changing retail mix. Owners of, and lenders to, malls and shopping centers are now emphasizing entertainment, food- and service-based businesses, technology retailers and retailers that are involved in multi-channel commerce and are de-emphasizing in-store only merchandise-based tenants. Illustrating this in-store trend, between 2005 and 2015, the number of Apple stores in North American malls has grown to 270, with average sales of $4,789.82 in 2014 per square foot (by contrast, Tiffany's averages $3,232.20 per square foot);³ Microsoft has opened 74 stores; and Tesla, the super-chic electric automobile manufacturer, has opened 25 stores in mall locations.

³ Philip Wahba, Apple Extends Lead in US Top Retailers by Sales Per Square Foot, Fortune (March 13, 2015), <http://fortune.com/2015/03/13/apples-holiday-top-10-retailers-iphone>.

A trend toward “showrooming,” particularly in market segments like fashion and clothing, consumer electronics, and home improvement, has led to many physical stores offering “click and collect” schemes where customers buy online but collect in-store at a location selected by the customer. It works well for customers, retailers and landlords. For customers, it offers instant gratification and the convenience of being able to pick up the goods at a time that suits them. For the retailer, it means passing on some of the cost of delivery to the shoppers, specifically the higher “last mile” to delivery point costs, as well as the opportunity to sell other products and services when the customer is in the store. For the landlord, click and collect is a great footfall generator and can often mean the sale is attributed to the pick-up store even though it was transacted online. More than 50% of Walmart’s online sales and 40% of Best Buy’s online sales are picked up in stores.⁴ Best Buy’s store-within-a-store partnerships with Microsoft, Samsung, and other tech product suppliers capitalize on the manufacturers’ need to show off their products in a physical store environment.

Certain in-store supermarket chains, such as Stop & Shop (through its Peapod website), Fairway Market, and Fresh Direct, provide customers the opportunity to shop online for groceries and other products found in their physical supermarkets and provide same-day or next-day delivery. Other retailers are moving toward same-day delivery to meet consumer demand. This trend may lead to changing uses in retail real estate, where the showroom or retail floor space is a much smaller part of the total footprint, and the inventory and distribution center becomes more of that footprint. For in-store adaptive reuse, the retailer generally would need to amend the permitted use clause of its lease. It is foreseeable that landlords may convert some or all of otherwise failing B and C shopping centers to accommodate retail inventory distribution centers. Some retail landlords may turn to developing logistics and warehousing facilities as part of their overall retail strategy.

Today, stores and malls are transforming to become highly technology enabled. It’s not just the retailers doing this—landlords and retailers are working together on these efforts. The Westfield Group, the owner of 38 regional shopping centers in the U.S., has experimented with various high-tech applications at some of its shopping centers. Westfield created “digital storefronts” at its Garden State Plaza Mall in Paramus, N.J. Shoppers are able to scroll, zoom and rotate through curated assortments of products offered by mall tenants displayed in ultra-high definition imagery. Once shoppers find a product they would like to buy, the digital storefront displays a map of exactly where the product may be purchased. The digital storefronts were developed by Westfield Labs, a subsidiary of Westfield Group, and serves as a global digital lab focused on innovation for the retail physical environment. Westfield Lab, in a partnership with eBay, Inc., also developed and deployed digital shoppable windows at its San Francisco Centre for three of the mall's high-tech tenants, which enable customers to view and buy merchandise from each brand via a shoppable window, pay with PayPal, and then arrange for free home delivery or pickup within the mall for select items. Another national shopping mall owner/operator, The Macerich Company, has similarly developed in-house and deployed at eight of its top performing malls double-sided, large format digital displays in highly trafficked areas affording tenants, brand manufacturers and advertisers a place to run digital or static ads, as well as interactive features such as live texting and crowd sourcing.

National retailers, like Lowes Companies, Inc., Walmart and others, have set up in-house innovation labs geared to develop and deploy technology solutions to link customers and their physical stores. Lowes has developed an app for in-store use to enable customers and Lowes personnel to plan a home improvement project based on photographs or floor plans of the room to be renovated. Visa also has an in-house innovation lab which has developed Visa Checkout, which speeds up in-store payment transactions via the retailer's mobile apps. In addition, Visa Innovation Lab has been involved in Apple Pay.

In general, retailers have been quick to adopt what is being called a multichannel approach—the digital channel and the physical channel—in which they complement their physical stores with their online stores, Twitter and Facebook pages to engage and attract customers. There is also a trend toward “omni-channel” marketing, which involves the retailer integrating its offline, in-store and online e-commerce channels to provide a consistent user experience. In other words, when a customer walks into a physical store they see the same merchandise and special offers, and are offered a consistent look and feel of the brand both offline and online. Burberry, the U.K. luxury goods retailer, is a prominent leader in omni-channel marketing.

Technology has been shrinking in size and increasing in speed and power at exponential rates in the age of mobile computing and wireless tech. iBeacon technology can give retailers and shopping mall owners the opportunity to engage customers precisely when the time and place is right: when the consumer is in, or in the vicinity of, the mall or particular store. iBeacon technology⁵ allows mobile apps (running on Apple and Android devices) to “listen” for signals from beacons in the physical store or mall. It allows the mobile app to locate the consumer’s position on a micro-locale scale (think indoor GPS) and delivers contextual content to users based on location. The beacon signals may be tagged to a specific shop or aisle within the store. While small, medium and independent stores are unlikely to have their own mobile application, automatically excluding them from an iBeacon service offering, such retailers could form a collective with the shopping mall or on the high street and get a Beacon platform. Creative landlords will work with such merchants to facilitate such collective efforts.

Integrating mobile or point-of-sale payment applications, such as Apple Pay, into iBeacon-enabled mobile applications, will capture real return on investment for the retailer from iBeacon deployment.

As traditional retailers struggle to redefine the role of the physical store in a multichannel, increasingly millennial-led world, it is foreseeable that retailers in negotiating new leases, or in seeking to modify existing ones, will seek to allow it to terminate the lease early, go dark, give back space to facilitate downsizing, redefine gross and net sales subject to percentage rent or change permitted uses. How landlords will respond to this will be challenging.

The retail industry has gone through disruptive transformations in the past. Once again, the industry is being transformed by technological and cultural changes. Much like biological evolution, where environmental constraints shape biological traits, the profile of the successful retailer and retail property owner of the future will be shaped heavily by technological advances and changes in consumer behavior. The lessons of prior industry changes and appreciation of the vastness of the technology we have today, and its near term possibilities, tell us that the winners in this evolving ecosystem will be the retailers, brands and property owners who can blend the best practices of merchandizing and property ownership with technological tools that will enhance consumer engagement within the brick-and-mortar store, thus providing a rationale for being there.

The term iBeacon is trademarked by Apple but it is used interchangeably with Beacons and is generally used to refer to BLE-based technology in the market place.

[15.16] IV. CONCLUSION

As long as there is strong demand from consumers and businesses for high-tech products and services, and the tech industry continues to bring out faster and more powerful innovations for business-to-business and for consumer use in this age of mobile computing and wireless tech, the tech industry and the office markets they are concentrated in will continue to see strong growth. Today, stores and malls are transforming to be highly technology-enabled. The retailers, brands and property owners who adapt and innovate in the constantly evolving retail ecosystem, blending the best practices of merchandising and property ownership with technological tools that enhance the overall shopping experience—online and in their physical stores—will likely prosper in the foreseeable future.

CHAPTER SIXTEEN

INSURANCE ISSUES IN COMMERCIAL LEASES

Curtis Lee
Herbert H. Feldman

[16.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This chapter provides an overview of the types of insurance coverage recommended for a commercial lease and, more important, why they are needed. While much of this chapter is written from the landlord's perspective, the reader can view the dialogue from the tenant's point of view as well.

[16.1] II. RISK MANAGEMENT—UNDERSTANDING WHY

The premises lease between the Landlord (who is often the Owner of the property) and Tenant should clearly set out the responsibilities of each party, including obligations such as maintenance, care, and cleaning of the premises, responsibilities for damage, and who is responsible should a claim occur. Typically the Tenant carries most of the responsibility within the walls of the leased space and the Landlord is responsible for the common area, building systems, and structural elements but, depending on the nature of the lease, this is not always the case. The responsibilities placed on each party and the indemnifications assumed must be carefully examined to understand the parties' exposures. The existing and contractually created exposures are the premise for requesting insurance under a lease. Each party is seeking protection from potential claims or damages and wants to ensure that such protection is backed by a company with the financial wherewithal to fund the loss, potentially well into the future when lawsuits are often resolved, and therefore require insurance from a financially sound provider.

The Landlord will usually provide insurance to cover physical loss to the building itself, the resulting rent loss, and the liability for the public areas (common areas) in and around the building. Similarly, the tenant should carry insurance to replace its property, including tenant's improvements and betterments, and any resulting loss of business income and liability emanating from its operations within the building. In addition, each party should purchase insurance to cover any injury to its own employees and to cover the use of automobiles in and around the premises. If the tenant's operations included any special risks additional coverage may also be requested; for example, a restaurant or hotel may be required to purchase coverage for any liability arising from the sale of alcoholic beverages or a valet parking service. Lease terms such as net leases and ground leases, especially a lease granting long-term rights to a developer for the construction of a building, may significantly impact which party is required to provide what forms of coverage.

Preleasing of buildings under construction presents several added elements to consider; especially if the landlord is constructing a building and obtaining financing, predicated on the occupancy by the tenant(s) when the building is completed. The terms should not allow the tenant to cancel the lease if there is a delay in completion of the project; this will be particularly important to any potential mortgagee. At minimum, the landlord in this situation may be forced into payment of financial penalties to the tenant in the event of a delay. The landlord may want to mitigate its financial exposure to loss under these types of leases by passing the financial penalties along to the general contractor erecting the building and/or purchasing insurance coverage adequate to cover contract penalties or the loss of the tenant(s).

No matter what type of lease is involved, there are typically two parties: the party that owns the property or the rights to the premises, and the party wishing to occupy the premises. In either case, each party has assets to protect from exposure to physical loss or damage, such as fires, and loss created by exposure to public liability. In addition, the party granting the lease will want the other party to not only insure the exposures created by its use of the premises, but also extend its coverage to the landlord. This extension of coverage to the landlord from the tenant's insurance coverage can be as simple as a contractual obligation naming the landlord as an additional insured or as complex as assuming the responsibility for all insurance on the premises, including all primary insurance on behalf of, and in protection of, the landlord.

[16.2] III. BASIC TYPES OF INSURANCE

Two major areas of insurance coverage that should be considered in every lease are property insurance (first party) and public liability insurance (third-party liability). Specialty coverages such as liquor liability (covering the sale and service of alcohol), garagekeepers liability (covering the care, custody, and control of a vehicle such as a valet or garage operator), and environmental liability insurance (covering both clean-up and public liability for environmental impairments), should be considered as well. This latter coverage is of particular importance in a lease of a premise for a manufacturing operation, storage of environmentally sensitive materials, automobile repair and service facilities, or dry cleaners where a Landlord could be ultimately liable for its Tenant's impact on the environment.

In a typical landlord-tenant lease the landlord would want the tenant to carry the following basic insurance coverages:

- Property insurance. Following basic risk management principles where each party is responsible for providing insurance coverage for its own property, the landlord might require the tenant to insure the following: “Tenant at Tenant’s own expense shall insure all its own personal property including but not limited to, improvements and betterments, personal property, stock and supplies, furniture and fixtures. In addition Tenant shall purchase business interruption insurance to cover interruption in its operations caused by an inability to use the Premises due to loss.”

The preferred type of property insurance coverage is the so-called “All Risk” insurance as opposed to the older, more restrictive “Fire and Broad Form Extended” coverage. The “All Risk” or ISO “Special Causes of Loss” policy form is the most prevalent coverage form in use today, and the limits of coverage in this area should be 100 percent of the replacement cost value of the tenant’s property. However, bear in mind that a ‘standard’ Special Causes of Loss policy form still has a number of exclusions that the Landlord may wish to have endorsed or separately required such as: Flood, Earthquake, Business Income, and Equipment Breakdown (Boiler and Machinery).

- Rental income insurance. Often misunderstood is the issue of which party provides the rental income insurance. The answer is simple: If rent abates, then the landlord purchases the insurance. If rent does not abate to the tenant, the tenant’s ongoing obligation to pay rent to the landlord can be covered by the tenant’s purchase of rental or business interruption insurance. Business interruption insurance can cover the tenant’s net profit plus continuing expenses; if the rents do not abate, this becomes a continuing expense and can be covered under the tenant’s policy. Coverage for the Rents aside, it is good risk management practice for each party to carry business income coverage for the same reason each party carries property coverage; in the event of a loss each party should look to their own property insurance to be made whole.
- Public Liability insurance. This is a broad coverage term more commonly used outside the U.S. that references all third party liabilities (claims made by members of the general public, such as a slip and fall case). The tenant should be contractually obligated to provide the following types and minimum levels of liability insurance coverage for the protection of itself and the landlord: Commercial General Liability insurance, covering liability emanating from the tenant’s use and occupancy of the premises, including that of tenant’s employees, customers, agents and invitees. If the tenant is involved in providing a product that may potentially create an exposure itself, such as food or cosmetics, then coverage known as “products liability and completed operations” should also be provided. The amount of insurance customarily purchased under a Commercial General Liability policy is $1 million per occurrence and $2 million in the annual aggregate. If multiple locations are insured on the same policy, a per-location aggregate adds some depth to the coverage and should be specified in the lease to avoid the erosion of limits to the Landlord from a claim(s) at an unrelated site. (Please note that the often-referred-to Comprehensive General Liability insurance form has not been commonly used since the late 1980s; the current form is the Commercial General Liability policy.)

Other types of liability insurance coverage that should be purchased by the tenant include: commercial automobile insurance including Owned (if any), Hired and Non-Owned Autos; Workers’ Compensation and Employers’ Liability, as required by state law; and Umbrella or Excess Liability. It is this last coverage that provides meaningful limits of insurance coverage. For small tenants with exposure to the public, $3 million to $10 million per occurrence may be a reasonable minimum amount of insurance coverage to be provided. For a tenant occupying a large space for the purpose of public assembly, such as a restaurant, hotel or movie theater, the appropriate amount of liability insurance may be higher.

[16.3] IV. LANDLORD’S VIEW

The Landlord does not want exposure for claims due to Tenant’s occupancy of their premises, especially given that today’s losses will have a negative impact on Landlord’s future premiums.

Typically, the Landlord/Owner is ultimately responsible for the care and upkeep of its property; therefore if anyone is injured on that property, the Owner will bear at least a share of the liability. Since the Landlord usually carries the majority of this public risk and may often be seen as the “deep pocket” they seek to have the Tenant carry the broadest liability coverage possible to minimizing the exposure of loss to their own policies by transferring the risk back to the tenant’s insurer.

Landlord should require Tenant to name them as an additional insured on a primary basis under the tenant’s policy. It is extremely important to note (and an often misunderstood concept) that certificates of insurance

(most notably the ACORD 25) do not in themselves give the landlord Additional Insured status under the tenant's policy. This can only be accomplished by having the tenant contractually agree to indemnify the landlord and to name Landlord as Additional Insured, and only then by obtaining an endorsement to the tenant's actual liability policy. There are dozens of Additional Insured endorsements and some provide better coverage than others; however the three basic means by which to convey liability coverage to the Landlord in an insurance policy are:

1. Broad Additional Insured language, contained in some liability policies, extends Additional Insured status to anyone to whom the insured has agreed, in a written contract, to extend coverage, provided this obligation is made prior to the loss.
2. Similar to number 1, a blanket Additional Insured Endorsement amending the policy to add a class or type of counter parties (i.e. owners, mortgagees, contractors, etc.) as Additional Insureds when required by a written contract.
3. A specific Additional Insured Endorsement, naming a specific person or entity as Additional Insured can be attached to the tenant's policy.

The first item requires review of the tenant's liability policy. The next two can be evidenced on the actual endorsement. The last, the indemnification agreement, is crafted by the landlord's attorney. The carrier will usually defend any "Additional Insureds" that have been properly endorsed onto a policy granting such status to another party.

Caution: Additional Insured status extending coverage from the tenant's liability policy to the landlord typically only responds to a liability caused by the tenant at that location. The landlord's liability should still be covered only through a policy that specifically names the landlord as a "Named Insured."

In addition to the liability coverage, a Landlord would generally want a Tenant to get back into business following a loss, whether the loss is direct property damage, a business interruption or both. It's good business for the sake of continuity, and it saves the leasing costs and commissions involved in signing a new tenant as well as avoiding a loss of rents following restoration. Further, the Landlord does not want suits from its Tenants for their property damage (i.e. water main breaks and floods the building and tenant sues for negligent maintenance). Therefore, a Landlord will require the Tenant to carry property insurance on all of its improvements, betterments and business personal property and should state in the lease that the tenant's sole right of recovery for damage to its personal property within the demised premises should be against its own property and business income insurer(s).¹

[16.4] V. OTHER CONSIDERATIONS

[16.5] A. Indemnity Agreement

It is important for every lease to have an indemnity clause establishing the liabilities of each party, and to understand those clauses prior to establishing the insurance provisions.² Also keep in mind that a general liability policy still only covers bodily injury and property damage, and has many other exclusions, so the indemnity clauses in the lease should not be limited "to the extent of liability insurance." The intent of requiring the liability insurance in a lease is to transfer the indemnities assumed by one company (landlord or Tenant) to its insurers' balance sheet. Contractual liability coverage is included under the current edition of the ISO CG 0001 form, and it will provide coverage for the contractual indemnities assumed (unless excluded elsewhere in the policy). This grant of coverage for the assumption of the tort liability of another party can be especially critical if the Landlord failed to secure appropriate Additional Insured status from the Tenant, as a standard Commercial Liability Policy that provides limited contractual liability will cover an agreement in the lease that "the tenant will indemnify the landlord for any and all liability costs and expenses emanating from the tenant's use and occupancy of the premises and that of their employees, agents and invitees, etc."

[16.6] B. Self-Insurance by Tenant

If a tenant customarily self-insures certain risks, it will request that this practice be acceptable in terms of meeting the lease requirements. In some cases it is a good idea to have parties claiming to be self-insured to demonstrate that they are truly self-insured and not merely self-assuming the risk. This may include a review of the parties' self-insurance program or, in some cases, certification that they are self-insured and approved by a State Insurance Department. Typically, the landlord will permit self-insurance only if the tenant maintains a minimum net worth requirement, but even then the landlord should proceed with care noting these cautionary scenarios:

2 See Ch. 4, "Model Commercial Lease," which sets forth sample language.

- The tenant, a supermarket chain, provided the anchor in 18 of the client's 21 strip centers. Their leases provided for a $250,000 General Liability Self-Insured Retention so long as the tenant's net worth exceeded $100 million. (It was $130 million at the time of signing.) Several years later, after a leveraged buy-out, the net worth disappeared and the balance sheet reflected top-heavy debt sitting over negative net worth. As this was a key tenant, the landlord was powerless to enforce this minimum net worth provision.
- The tenant had a net worth of $1.9 billion and the client's counsel was pleased, having negotiated a minimum net worth requirement (in order to self-insure) of $200 million. Imagine the disastrous operating losses that would diminish the net worth by $1.7 billion! Where in the pecking order of payments for payroll, to vendors, etc., would payments to third-party claimants stand? Further, what attorney would want his or her client, the landlord, to be forced into the shoes of the liability insurer?
- The client owned and operated several community strip centers anchored by major chain stores. The client's centers were too small to support a full-time on-site employee, so most claims were reported to the management of the anchor store. Knowing of their SIR, and not wanting the cost to hit his store, the manager would on occasion [mis]-report the location of the claim from their demised premises to a common area, transferring the liability and defense costs to the landlord.

[16.7] C. Tenant's Share of Insurance Costs

In cases where the tenant pays part of the landlord's insurance costs as part of their common area maintenance (CAM) charges, the CAM charges should be expanded to include, but not be limited to:

- Service fees paid to brokers, consultants, and third-party administrators;
- Premiums for coverages and limits reasonably deemed necessary by landlord;

- Allocated costs derived from master policies with blanket coverages for numerous properties within a portfolio.

This is especially important if the use of contingent fee CAM auditors has not been precluded, as they tend to contest every single charge, due to the nature of their compensation. Even when the above fees are fair and reasonable, we have seen such auditors argue that they are not expressly allowed to be charged back under the lease agreement.

[16.8] D. Net Leases

Whereas an owner's insurance is coverage-oriented, designed to provide the most comprehensive coverages available, net tenants (especially on triple net leases) are often cost-driven. It therefore becomes extremely important to specify that the tenant fulfill the same insurance requirements as the landlord would for itself. Annual audits by the Landlord to ensure compliance are extremely important to protect Landlord as policies are renewed and changed by Tenants. We also recommend the Landlord maintain contingent coverage for itself in the event Tenant's policy fail to respond as expected to any given claims scenario (i.e. Tenant's carrier denies all coverage for a claim due to a Tenant's misrepresentation).

[16.9] E. Waiver of Subrogation

In most leases the Landlord and Tenant should agree to a waiver of their rights of recovery against each other for damage to the property of the other. Virtually all property policies permit this as part of their standard forms, but the actual waiver of recovery must be accomplished within the lease. Also, keep in mind that in most jurisdictions, the waiver must be mutual in order to be enforceable.

The first reason to waive subrogation is to reduce litigation; both parties are being made whole by the property insurance they are choosing to carry on their assets. The other party should not be a "lifeline" if they failed to carry appropriate coverage. Further, the Landlord benefits from the financial viability of the Tenant in their continued ability to pay rent, why disrupt that with litigation if the Landlord has been made whole by insurance (especially if the Tenant is contributing to the cost of Landlord's insurance through CAM charges). The Tenant, on the other hand, is in the best position to insure and protect its assets, and by holding the Landlord responsible would likely only increase rent charges over time as Landlord would determine to insure this added risk.

[16.10] F. Rents Insurance

Rents insurance is one of the most misunderstood clauses within a property insurance policy. Many documents (leases, mortgages, etc.) frequently contain a requirement that the other party maintain rents coverage for 12 months. Since underwriters need a base upon which to apply a rate for premium purposes, the insured will normally submit income values 12 months of rental income.

Most commonly the coverage in force is provided on an Actual Loss Sustained basis (the most desirable form), which provides ongoing indemnification for loss of rents until such time, with the exercise of due diligence and dispatch, as the premises are restored to the condition immediately prior to the loss (subject to the limit of coverage in the policy, but not limited to its expiration date). Parties should be wary of any policy that caps the period of indemnity (i.e., the period of time the carrier will pay for loss of income coverage during rebuilding). A partial loss, or total loss of a small structure, may only take six months to restore, but a large loss in October in the Snow Belt might take the insured through two winters to rebuild. Further, in cases like significant hurricane devastation, where there may be a shortage of materials, contractors and a labor force post-loss (demand surge), some rebuilding can take years.

Parties can also include under their coverage an “Extended Period of Indemnity,” which provides for a period of time of continued coverage for a loss of business income following restoration (subject to limits). Landlords may require this of Tenants in the event it takes them some time to return their business to pre-loss levels. This coverage is also strongly recommend for Landlords who may find unfavorable market conditions if a loss causes them to lose their tenants.

The governing clause in the lease as to which party is to provide rents insurance is the abatement clause. If the rent abates at time of loss, then the landlord should provide the insurance coverage. A tenant’s insurer will not pay for rents if its insured has no legal obligation to continue to pay Landlord (i.e., abatement of rent upon casualty). In the converse, if rents do not abate, the tenant should be maintaining this insurance and landlord should have a right to the proceeds (as a loss payee).

[16.11] G. Improvements and Betterments (I&Bs)

Typically, tenant-installed improvements and betterments are insured by the tenant, especially since the landlord may not even know their value and the tenant's insurance policy will replace, by the terms of the policy, the destroyed property following a casualty. These I&Bs are the build-out of the space, slab-to-slab and wall-to-wall. Removable property (desks, copy machines, files, stock and supplies) are considered personal property, not I&Bs. Should the tenant decide not to rebuild the I&Bs, the tenant's policy only pays the depreciated or remaining asset value. If the I&B were installed as part of a 20-year lease and one year remained on the lease and the improvements were not restored, the policy might well pay only 5 percent of the replacement cost.

Regardless of the ownership and restoration clause in the lease, the owner should have in place a property insurance policy that states, "Improvements and betterments shall be deemed the property of the insured, any lease or contract to the contrary notwithstanding, and any loss shall be so adjusted." This feature, along with a top-flight replacement cost endorsement, can provide Landlord contingent coverage if Tenant fails to restore I&B and can give a landlord a decided competitive advantage when rebuilding in terms of offering prospective tenants fully improved space.

[16.12] H. Leasehold Interest

In cases where advantageous long-term leases, were signed at the bottom of a rental market the tenant may have a greater financial (and therefore insurable) interest in the premises than the owner. Tenants can insure the value of their leasehold interest under their property policies. A case in point involved an upscale beauty salon in midtown Manhattan. The entire 13,000 square foot building was leased in the mid-1970s at $8 per square foot with four 12-year renewal options escalating at 25¢ per square foot increments to reach $9. As the leasehold interest grew, the tenant purchased leasehold interest insurance by engaging the services of a rental appraiser and insuring the discounted present value of the difference between the projected fair rental value into the future and the lease obligations. The building was later completely destroyed by a fire, the tenant collected $6 million and the landlord, only $2 million.

[16.13] I. Demolition and Increased Cost of Construction

The typical replacement cost clause in a property policy provides for replacement with "like materials and workmanship." If, however, the local building codes have been tightened since original construction or, for example, the Americans with Disabilities Act points to certain non-conforming uses, then the additional cost to rebuild to code may be excluded or limited. In the event of a significant partial loss of a building where local code officials require part or the entire undamaged portion of the building to be torn down and reconstructed, coverage under the policy will also be limited to the coverage available under this clause. This is especially important to a landlord in a net lease on an older or historical building.

Whether the building insurance is provided by the landlord or the tenant, it is important to obtain the broadest possible language for these enhancements. The standard ISO (Insurance Services Office) form provides only for compliance with minimum requirements in force at the time of loss. Following Hurricane Andrew in Florida and the Northridge, California, earthquake the affected localities passed much more restrictive building codes. Thus, when possible, the wording in this clause should be expanded to refer to all laws regulating rebuilding in effect at the time of reconstruction.

[16.14] VI. SUMMARY

There is not a “one size fits all” when negotiating the insurance provisions in any legal document. Parties must understand the structures of their own insurance programs, available coverages, and policy endorsements, and have a strong understanding of the deal’s business terms. A failure to do so could result in assuming more liability of exposure than intended or, worse, assuming uninsured exposures. That could result in an unprofitable commitment.

The legal and risk management teams should work together to understand the overall goals and risk tolerance acceptance to the deal. They should then draft clear language outlining the responsibilities of each party and ensure that the agreement allows for the enforcement of those responsibilities. The purpose of insurance is to deal with the unexpected. Make sure your contracts and leases don’t overlook unexpected events.

CHAPTER SEVENTEEN

REAL PROPERTY TAX CONSIDERATIONS FOR LANDLORDS AND TENANTS IN NEGOTIATING LEASES OF COMMERCIAL PROPERTY

James S. Grossman, Esq.
Christopher J. Centore, Esq.

[17.0] I. TENANT ANALYSIS OF PROPERTY TAX CONSIDERATIONS PRIOR TO ENTERING INTO LEASE

The fundamental question for tenant's counsel in reviewing a commercial lease is whether or not the lease places any obligation for payment of real property taxes and assessments on the tenant. In a gross lease transaction, the landlord will bear the expense of real property taxes. In a true "net lease," the tenant will bear the cost directly. However, in the majority of instances involving commercial leases, liability for real property taxes falls somewhere between the two, with the landlord bearing the expense up to a certain base amount and the tenant bearing the expense for property taxes either relating to the improvements made upon the leased premises by or for the benefit of the tenant, or for all increases over a certain base amount. Such provisions are frequently referred to as tenant escalation clauses.

In the case of either a "net lease" or a lease involving an escalation clause, the lease should address several different concerns: the current base tax figure used in the escalation computation; the scope and type of improvements that would result in an escalation in taxes for which the tenant is liable; the history and computation of real property taxes for the subject parcel; and rights to grieve the assessed value of the leased property under Article 5 of the N.Y. Real Property Tax Law (RPTL) and, if necessary, to challenge the assessment through litigation under Article 7 of the RPTL.

[17.1] A. Basic Property Tax Terminology

The term "real property taxes," as the term is most often used in New York, refers to general municipal (county and town, city, or village) taxes and school district taxes imposed on a parcel of real property. The real property tax is an ad valorem tax, insofar as it is levied against all taxpayers within the municipality and school district (the "taxing jurisdictions") according to the proportionate share of the value of each parcel of property to the overall value of all properties within the taxing jurisdictions. However, the term real property taxes is often referred to in a more general sense, to also include special ad valorem taxes and special assessments (which are sometimes referred to as "charges"), all of which are generally reflected on the tax bill, but not characterized as real property taxes, per se.

A special ad valorem tax is “a charge imposed upon benefited real property in the same manner and at the same time as municipal taxes to defray the cost of a special district improvement or service . . . on a county or citywide basis and, like a tax, does not consider any direct benefit received by an individual parcel.”¹ Special ad valorem levies may include charges for water and sewer districts, highways, library districts, lighting districts, fire districts, and other municipal services for public works improvements.

Special assessments, “on the other hand, are impositions upon benefited real property in proportion to the benefit received by such property to defray the cost of a special district or service” that relate to the benefit received by a particular property from an improvement.²

For purposes of this article and the discussion of real property tax implications in the commercial leasing context, the terms “taxes” and “real property taxes” will include special ad valorem taxes and special assessments unless otherwise noted.

[17.2] B. Base Tax Year Considerations

Whether a lease is a “net lease” such that the tenant bears all real property tax liability, or the lease imposes liability on the tenant for increases beyond a given base year, tenant’s counsel should carefully review and consider the base year that is being used to compute the tenant’s tax liability. In either event, the tenant will be liable for increases in real property taxes in some manner. In the net lease scenario, the tenant must understand that all assessment increases affecting the tax parcel in question, whether the result of an increase in assessment based upon revaluation by the assessor, an increase in tax rates, overall market conditions, or improvements made to the leased premises, will result in an increase in real property tax liability.

Landlords and tenants must also be cognizant of the consequences of assessments applying to tax years which are not calendar years. For instance, the assessment roll filed on or about July 1 in most towns in New York State sets assessments which are used to determine the school tax from July 1 until the following June 30 although the school tax bill is generated on or about September 1. The county and town tax bill based on the same July 1 assessment roll is issued on or about January 1 of the following year, and applies to the period from January 1 through December 31 of the year after the July 1 assessment roll. Accordingly, the assessment roll applies to certain taxes over an 18-month period. But, more troublesome is the situation where, due to a revaluation or other circumstance, a property assessment changes on a successive July 1 tax roll. In such instance, during one calendar year the school tax is based on one assessment and the county and town tax is based on an entirely different assessment. The use of the calendar year as the base year, therefore, is fraught with peril. If the lease is executed prior to July 1 of the base year, it may be difficult or impossible to estimate what the base tax amount will be. Even if the property tax amounts that will constitute the base are known, the failure to understand the timing and impact of assessed value could have drastic negative consequences for a tenant. For a tenant, such a misunderstanding, especially in a lease escalation clause, could result in a large escalation payment commencing in year two of the lease term.

[17.3] C. Scope and Type of Improvements Resulting in Tax Escalation Liability for Tenant

In the case of a lease including a property tax escalation provision, the tenant should carefully define what improvements resulting in an increased assessment will result in property tax liability for the tenant. For instance, where the leased premises will benefit from substantial buildout prior to, or after, commencement, the tenant may be able to negotiate such that the base year for escalation purposes will be the year after which the improvements are completed, which factors in the cost of such improvements. Alternatively, should the base year for escalation purposes be a year before the date such improvements are made, the tenant should anticipate an immediate and significant tax liability upon completion of the improvements (the buildout will increase the fair market value of the leased premises, which may result in an increased assessment). In some cases, the cost of buildout by the landlord will be included in the base year tax figure, with later improvements done by or at the request of the tenant giving rise to escalation.

[17.4] D. Tax Parcel History and Tax Computation Considerations

In reviewing potential increases in real property tax liability by the tenant in a net lease or tax escalation scenario, the tenant should review the past history of the property tax assessment for the subject parcel. For example, in the case where the assessment as of the year of commencement is the base year for escalation purposes (which would of course bear true in a net lease scenario as well), the tenant should investigate the assessment to determine whether it may be artificially low as a result of a prior settlement or judicial determination in a tax certiorari proceeding brought pursuant to Article 7 of the RPTL. A settlement or judicial determination reducing the assessment in a year prior to commencement of the lease may have prohibited an increase in assessment. Note that pursuant to RPTL § 727, a three-year freeze is placed on an assessment following a judicial determination, including a court order approving a settlement. However, such a stay on property tax increases will no longer be effective in the fourth year following settlement, in which case the assessment may be subject to an increase.³

The landlord and tenant should also understand the concept of equalization rates and their impact on escalation provisions. Equalization rates are percentages computed by the New York State Office of Real Property Services (ORPS) to ensure that the taxing jurisdictions within the state equitably allocate the overall state tax liability among the many taxing jurisdictions. Equalization rates are the ratio of total assessed value in the taxing jurisdiction to the total market value of properties within the jurisdiction. Assessed values are determined by the taxing jurisdiction, and the total market value of properties is determined by the state. The equalization rate formula is:

$$\frac{\text{Total Assessed Value (AV)}}{\text{Total Market Value (MV)}} = \text{Equalization Rate}$$

In many taxing jurisdictions, assessments are considered to be at full value (i.e., the assessed value equals the fair market value of the property), with a corresponding equalization rate of 1.0. However, a number of jurisdictions bear equalization rates of lesser percentages. In such instances, the assessed values for properties within the taxing jurisdiction are a percentage of the actual fair market value. Regardless of the equalization rate, in any year in which a revaluation does not occur, the actual equalization for a property will vary because assessments normally remain

3 RPTL § 727(1) provides that, “where an assessment is found to be unlawful, unequal, excessive or misclassified by final court order or judgment, the assessed valuation so determined shall not be changed . . . for the next three succeeding assessment rolls prepared on the basis of the three taxable status dates next occurring on or after the taxable status date of the most recent assessment under review.” Although the statute only pertains to final order, where the parties to the action incorporate the terms of Section 727 in the stipulated order pursuant to settlement, the same terms apply. See In re Malta Town Ctr. I, Ltd v. Town of Malta Bd. of Assessment Review, 3 N.Y.3d 563, 789 N.Y.S.2d 80 (2004).

static while actual fair market value changes. Historically, values have tended to increase over time. However, in the recessionary times beginning in the summer of 2008, values in many areas of New York State have fallen by 30 to 40 percent. In situations where the rate lowers but fair market values of commercial properties do not increase, the lower rate will still tax the property as if the value did increase. Where values of commercial properties have precipitously declined, the implications on equalization rates and upon actual value of the property assessed can create unintended consequences in a lease setting. As values decrease and assessments remain static, the equalization rate rises. The lower the equalization rate in the taxing jurisdiction in which the leased premises is located, the more volatile the value is, insofar as significant increases in value may occur with no increase in assessed value and, therefore, the commercial property owner may bear a disproportionate tax burden to properties assessed at their actual fair market value. In either event, an analysis as to whether assessments should be challenged and who has the right to commence the challenge come to the forefront.

Sophisticated tenants should determine the fair market value of the leased premises and, where applicable, the overall tax parcel in which the leased premises is located, and compare that value with the assessed value. In the event that the fair market value exceeds the current assessed value, the tenant should be concerned with a potential increase in the assessed value during the lease term.

A further consideration for the tenant in a “net lease” or escalation scenario is the allocation of tax liability between multiple tenants within the tax parcel of which the leased premises is a part. In a multiple tenant scenario, the tenant’s liability should only relate to the percentage of value pertaining to the tenant’s leased premises. Increases in assessed value relating to the premises of other tenants should not be included within the subject tenant’s tax obligations. In addition, the tenant’s percentage of tax liability should be computed as a percentage of the tenant’s leaseable square footage of the premises. If the tenant’s liability is a percentage of the actual leased square footage of the overall tax parcel, the tenant will ultimately bear a portion of the tax liability relating to vacant portions of the overall tax parcel.

[17.5] E. Tenant Rights to Contest Tax Assessments Through Grievance and Litigation Processes

[17.6] 1. Primer on Administrative Review and Tax Certiorari Proceedings

Where a tenant will bear liability for all or a portion of real property taxes throughout the term of the lease, the lease agreement should include a provision giving the tenant the right to contest the real property tax assessment for the leased premises. All of these rights granted should be understood in the context of what challenging an assessment includes. While the following treatment is not meant to be an exhaustive analysis of the procedures, it provides an outline of some minimal points to be aware of.

First, a party that is aggrieved by a real property tax assessment must seek administrative review and exhaust all such remedies before proceeding to the courts.⁴ This administrative review procedure is set forth in RPTL § 512.

With some exceptions, assessing units will issue their tentative tax assessment rolls on May 1 of each year. Real Property Tax Law § 510 requires assessors to notify any property owner whose property tax assessment has been increased, or if a change has been made regarding property tax exemptions applying to the property. Typically at this time, the assessor will provide notice to the property owner of the dates and times when the assessing unit's Board of Assessment Review (BAR) will convene to hear any grievances. Any property owner may file a grievance with the BAR, in a form provided by the ORPS on or before the appointed grievance date.⁵ The grievance form must be signed by the property owner or an authorized representative and certified as accurate.⁶ Although little information regarding the complaint is required on the form, it is often in the property owner's interest to provide additional documentation supporting the claim that the assessment is excessive. Appearance before the BAR at the grievance proceeding is often recommended, though not required, unless the BAR notifies the property owner that a personal appearance is required. The BAR may also require that the grievant provide other types of documentation relating to the value of the property. This may include any recent appraisals, information on recent capital improvements, information relating to recent sales, leases, or marketing efforts for the property, or any number of other items. The key concept for the grievant to be aware of is that failure to appear when requested and a willful failure to provide requested documentation is not only grounds for dismissal of the grievance, but may be grounds for dismissal of a subsequent certiorari proceeding under RPTL Article 7.

The BAR may issue a response, to either lower or leave unchanged the assessed value, at the grievance proceeding, but often reserves decision and notifies the grievant afterward.⁷ The assessor will modify the assessment according to the decision of the BAR and issue the final tax roll.

If a property owner is still aggrieved by the assessed value, and the property owner has proceeded through the grievance proceeding set forth in RPTL Article 5, it may Petition the Supreme Court for a writ of certiorari to review the assessment pursuant to RPTL Article 7.⁸ Such a proceeding is commenced by filing a verified Petition and Notice of Petition, alleging the manner in which the assessment is excessive, unequal, unlawful, or misclassified, the extent to which the petitioner will be injured thereby, and the result of administrative review proceedings under RPTL Article 5.⁹ Filing of the Petition is subject to a strict statute of limitations, requiring the Petition and Notice of Petition to be served within 30 days of the later of the date of publication of completion and filing of the final tax roll, or such date fixed by law for completion of the final tax roll.¹⁰

The assessed value in an Article 7 proceeding bears a presumption of validity which must be overcome by proof provided by the petitioner.¹¹ Generally speaking, an Article 7 proceeding will proceed much in the manner of other litigation proceedings. However, there are several unique attributes to an Article 7 proceeding:

- Filing of Income and Expense Statements. For proceedings outside of the city of New York, prior to filing a Note of Issue, the petitioner must serve a certified statement of the income and expenses of the property for each year under review in the proceeding, or a certified statement that the property is not income producing.¹² Within the city of New York, the same requirement applies; however, the income and expense statement must be completed on the form provided by the Tax Certiorari Division of the Office of Corporation Counsel.¹³
- Filing of a Note of Issue. Once discovery is complete, a Note of Issue must be filed to place the matter on the trial calendar. However, in Article 7 proceedings, the Note of Issue must be served and filed within four years from the date of service of the Petition and Notice of Petition unless the parties stipulate to an extension or the court so orders on good cause shown.¹⁴ This rule is strictly applied, and failure to do so will generally constitute dismissal of the action. However, a Nassau County Court attempted to soften this rule by establishing a creative analysis of what could constitute a stipulation to revive an action that had been so dismissed.¹⁵
- Exchange of Appraisal Reports. A unique attribute to Article 7 proceedings is the exchange of appraisal reports by the petitioner and the respondent.¹⁶ The appraisal reports constitute the most critical evidence in most Article 7 proceedings, and their preparation is of utmost importance because the testimony of the appraiser as expert witness will generally be limited to the facts alleged in the report. It is also often a costly step in an Article 7 proceeding, and the parties will frequently pursue settlement vigorously prior to engaging appraisers. For proceedings outside of the city of New York, such discussions are frequently facilitated by a pretrial conference, which may be demanded by any party or mandated by the court.¹⁷ Upon the exchange of appraisals, Article 7 proceedings will often proceed to trial swiftly if settlement is not reached.

- Relief. In the event that the petitioner is successful, the court will order refunds to be paid on taxes over and above the fair market value of the property as determined by the court.¹⁸ The petitioner will be entitled to the payment of interest at the statutory rate on such refunds from the date of payment of taxes through the date of the order.¹⁹ Costs may be awarded to a successful petitioner where the reduction is equal to or greater than half of the reduction sought by the petitioner in the prior grievance proceeding, or at the discretion of the court.²⁰
- Restriction on Future Increases. Pursuant to RPTL § 727, after a final judgment of the assessed value is entered, the assessing municipality may not increase the assessment, and the petitioner may not challenge the assessment for the following three assessment rolls unless there is (i) a revaluation or update of all real property on the assessment roll or of similar class in a special assessing unit, (ii) there has been a physical improvement to the property, (iii) the zoning for the property has changed, (iv) the property has been destroyed or altered by a catastrophic event, (v) the government has taken action which has caused a discernible change in area values, (vi) the occupancy rate of the building has changed by 20 percent or more, (vii) the owner is no longer eligible for an exemption, or (viii) the use or classification of the property has changed.²¹

[17.7] 2. Lease Provisions Relating to the Right to Contest Real Property Taxes

In order for a tenant to have the right to commence either an administrative review proceeding with the Board of Assessment Review for the taxing jurisdiction pursuant to RPTL § 524 or a Tax Certiorari Petition pursuant to RPTL § 704, the lease must explicitly state that the tenant has the right to bring such a proceeding. Such provision should include an obligation of the landlord to provide the tenant with all notices relating to tentative and final assessments on the property. However, tenants should be aware of the timing for posting of the tentative tax roll, Board of Assessment Review hearing dates, and the outside date for bringing a certiorari action (within 30 days following posting of the final tax roll).

18 RPTL § 726.

19 RPTL § 726(2).

20 RPTL § 722(1).

21 RPTL § 727.

It should be noted that a tenant's ability to bring an action to contest real property taxes has been reviewed extensively by the courts. Where a nonfractional tenant (i.e., one leasing the entire property interest comprising the tax parcel in question) is bound by the lease to directly pay the entire tax assessment on behalf of the landlord, the tenant will have standing to commence a tax certiorari proceeding.²² This is the case even if the lease does not contain a provision expressly granting the tenant the right to commence an action contesting the assessment.²³

With respect to fractional tenants, the analysis is more involved to account for the potential conflicts in granting standing to multiple parties to contest a single assessment. In Waldbaum Inc. v. Finance Admin. of City of New York,²⁴ the Court of Appeals set the standard under which a fractional commercial tenant may bring a tax certiorari proceeding. In that case, the tenant, Waldbaum, Inc., was a fractional tenant in premises for which the landlord paid all real property taxes. Under an escalation clause, Waldbaum was obligated to pay additional rent equal to its pro rata share of the taxes in excess of a base tax amount. However, Waldbaum's tax payments to the landlord were to reduce any additional rent paid to the landlord under a percentage rent provision. Unless the tax payments exceeded percentage rent, the net tax liability to the tenant, Waldbaum, would be zero. The court held that, in order for a fractional tenant to have standing to bring a tax certiorari proceeding, a lease must either (i) give a fractional tenant the right to assert the landlord's "undivided" property interest in a tax certiorari proceeding, or (ii) require the tenant to directly pay the entire, undivided, tax bill.²⁵ The court further held that, even if one of these standards is met, the tax assessment must have a direct adverse effect on the tenant's "pecuniary interests."²⁶ Because Waldbaum was not obligated to pay the entire tax bill affecting the leased premises and had no contractual right to bring an action to contest the entire tax assessment, the court held that it lacked standing.

22 See In re Burke, 62 N.Y. 224 (1875).

23 See EFCO Products v. Cullen, 161 A.D.2d 44, 560 N.Y.S.2d 158 (2d Dep't 1990) (also holding that payments in lieu of taxes required to be made by a tenant where the property is owned by an industrial development agency, and thus technically exempt from property taxation, are equivalent to property tax payments for purposes of determining the right to contest an assessment).

24 74 N.Y.2d 128, 544 N.Y.S.2d 561(1989).

25 Id. at 132.

26 Id.

The court in Waldbaum further held that the provision requiring a reduction of percentage rent by the amount of taxes paid by the tenant negated Waldbaum's argument that its pecuniary interests were adversely affected by the tax escalation provision.²⁷ The court found that such adverse effect was "legally remote and only consequential," because of the possibility that there would be no net tax liability on behalf of the tenant if percentage rent were to exceed the pro rata tax obligation of Waldbaum.²⁸ As a result, in drafting a provision on behalf of a fractional tenant authorizing the tenant to contest the assessment or to pay the entirety of the tax bill, one should understand that if another provision in the lease entitles the tenant to a set-off of its tax liability against rent, that set-off may preclude the tenant from bringing a certiorari proceeding.

Although the tenant in Waldbaum was denied standing, the rule has been followed to grant standing to tenants where the lease included the right to commence a tax certiorari proceeding.²⁹

The courts have held that a provision granting the right to contest property tax assessments in the landlord's name is sufficient to satisfy the Waldbaum test, even if the lease provision does not expressly state that the tenant's right extends to the landlord's "undivided interest."³⁰ There, the court found that the language "in lessor's name" was sufficient to establish the right to assert the lessor's undivided interest.³¹

Practice Tip: A tenant needs to be wary of a right to bring an action in which it may not be able to meet discovery demands of the municipality or provide necessary information to its own appraiser. In the event the tenant has such right to contest the assessment, its duty will be to appraise the value of the entire tax account number, not just the rental parcel, and all information relevant to all uses and tenants of the property are both discoverable by the municipality and relevant. Therefore, a clause requiring the landlord to cooperate fully with discovery if a tenant is prosecuting an assessment is both appropriate and necessary.

31 Id.

The right to commence an administrative review proceeding pursuant to RPTL § 524(3) has been held to require the same standards as the right to commence a tax certiorari proceeding.³²

The provision relating to real property tax actions should be clear as to who will bear what portion of the litigation expense. This is especially important in multiple tenant scenarios. In such cases, the tenant should be aware of the rights of other tenants in the premises to ensure that the tenant's future tax liability will not be controlled by other tenants within the overall tax parcel.

Where the tenant is unable to negotiate the right to contest the assessment in the event that the landlord or another tenant elects to do so, the lease should include language to the effect that the tenant will be entitled to its share of any refunds. This right should survive termination or expiration of the lease in the event refunds on taxes paid during the lease term are not paid until after termination or expiration. In addition, it should be noted that the parties controlling an Article 7 proceeding may elect to settle the proceeding by prospective relief, in the form of reduced assessments for a period of time following settlement, rather than refunds. Such a settlement may be governed by the terms of RPTL § 727 as noted above. Therefore, where the lease does not provide the tenant the right to control an Article 7 action, but does require the tenant to bear a portion of the tax liability, the tenant should seek to have the lease obligate the landlord to not only pay the tenant its proportional share of any refunds (even if received after the term of the lease has expired), but to pay the tenant its proportional share of refunds that would have been paid but are not because the party controlling the action accepts as prospective relief an assessment reduction for tax years beyond the lease term.

In defining the tenant's proportional share of any refunds, care should be taken to make certain it equals the tenant's proportional share of its tax liability under the lease. That may be based solely on the tenant's pro rata share of the overall tax liability, based on the ratio of the square footage of the overall leasable area to the tenant's leased premises, but, in the case of an escalation provision, it also may take into account the extent to which tax increases relate to improvements to the tenant's premises.

A tenant should seek to negotiate representations and warranties from the landlord that it will timely pay all taxes due. In the event the landlord fails to pay, that failure can threaten the tenant's quiet enjoyment of the leased premises. The tenant may, therefore, seek the right to pay taxes directly if the landlord fails to do so and to have a corresponding right of setoff against rent. A landlord, on the other hand, if there is an excessive assessment on the property, may as a practical matter choose not to pay the taxes while it seeks to have the taxes lowered.

It must be remembered that there is no right in New York State to pay less than the full amount of tax due during the period of time in which an assessment is being challenged.³³ Therefore, the landlord must either pay the whole amount of taxes due or nothing at all, and if no payment is made, the property may be subject to tax foreclosure despite the pendency of an action contesting the real property taxes.³⁴ In the instance of an actual tax foreclosure for nonpayment of taxes, a landlord may have a reason to allow the tax foreclosure to proceed where, for example, the outstanding property tax liability exceeds the value of the property. A tenant should consider this issue in light of the fact that most leases contain provisions limiting the landlord's exposure for damages sustained by the tenant to the landlord's interest in the leased premises, and may not extend to other assets of landlord. If that interest is so diminished by a tax foreclosure, the tenant will be without recourse against the landlord. This is yet another reason why a tenant should negotiate a right to make payment on the landlord's behalf with a corresponding set off against rent, and if the rents remaining under the lease are exceeded by the amount of the tenant's payment on the landlord's behalf, a contractual right to seek damages from the landlord.

[17.8] II. LANDLORD'S ANALYSIS OF REAL PROPERTY TAX CONSIDERATIONS PRIOR TO ENTERING INTO LEASE

[17.9] A. Real Property Tax Escalation Clauses

When viewing tax escalation clauses from the landlord's perspective, one should be cognizant of the same general issues as when viewing on behalf of the tenant. Landlords will generally desire to have the base year for escalation purposes exclude the tenant's improvements and buildout expenses. The lower the base year assessed value, the greater the tenant's tax liability will be. In addition, the landlord may be better served by defining the base year in terms of property tax dollar amounts rather than assessed values. In so doing, the landlord is able to defer liability to the tenant where property tax amounts increase, even where assessed values do not or are not the sole factor resulting in such increase. For instance, where property tax amounts increase as a result of an increase in tax rates, the tenant would be liable for such increases. From the landlord's perspective, the property tax escalation provision should relate to all charges based upon the assessment, not just real property taxes.

33 RPTL § 704(3).

34 See W.T. Grant Co. v. Srogi, 52 N.Y.2d 496, 438 N.Y.S.2d 761 (1981).

[17.10] B. When Landlord Contests Property Tax Assessments

Unless the landlord has contracted to give away the right to bring an assessment proceeding to a tenant, the landlord always retains a right to challenge tax assessments. In general, where a landlord is not leasing a single-tenant property on a "net lease" basis, the landlord will want to control litigation with respect to the affected tax parcel. If a landlord grants a tenant too much control, the tenant's actions may adversely affect other tenants and the marketability of other space within the premises. In such cases, the lease should be clear that consulting, appraisal, and legal fees incurred by the landlord will be borne by the tenant to the extent of the tenant's applicable share of the tax liability, and will be chargeable as additional rent.

A unique consideration for landlords in evaluating the right to contest assessments relates to the impact of reduced assessments on the profitability of subsequent leases of the subject premises. If an assessment is reduced too aggressively, the landlord may be faced with resistance by a future tenant because the base year is considered too low and, therefore, likely to create too large a tax burden. For that reason, the landlord should consider reserving control over real property tax litigation, especially in the later years of the lease term.

In addition, the landlord may seek to include a provision in the escalation clause such that any reductions below the base assessment will result in a corresponding reduction in the base assessment. A tenant has no incentive to have the assessment reduced to an amount lower than the amount which would produce the equivalent of the base tax since that amount is paid by the landlord. On the other hand, the landlord would have an incentive to have even the base assessment reduced. In such instances, the landlord would want the tenant to pay based upon the reduced base. This is all a matter of negotiation and relative bargaining power.

[17.11] C. Interaction Between Rents And Real Estate Taxes

Whatever the extent of the tenant's property tax obligations under the lease, the landlord should take care to clearly identify any property tax and other payments, as well as costs of pursuing reductions in assessments through litigation, made to the landlord as additional rent. If not, the landlord will not be able to enforce payment by the tenant as a matter of contract under the lease. Such an outcome would obviously defeat the purpose of any clause relating to the tenant's obligation to bear a portion of the real property tax expense.

In addition, when drafting an escalation clause on behalf of the landlord, one should take care that the lease does not otherwise contain a cap on additional rent, or a provision by which additional rent paid pursuant to an escalation clause is "compounded" into base rent.³⁵

[17.12] III. PROPERTY TAX EXEMPTIONS AND ABATEMENTS AND THEIR IMPACT ON LEASE NEGOTIATIONS

Real Property Tax Law Article 4 outlines a wide variety of property tax exemptions available to owners of real property. In the commercial leasing context, many exemptions may be available to landlords in their capacity as owners, developers, or investors of commercial real property. However, several exemptions may be available to tenants, or should be considered by tenants in commercial leasing transactions, as the benefits, in the form of property tax savings or even reduced rental payments, can accrue to tenants. This section will outline several of those exemptions.

[17.13] A. Municipal Industrial Development Agency Exemption

Where property is owned by a municipal Industrial Development Agency (IDA) or is otherwise under its jurisdiction, control, or supervision, and is used in a qualified manner as defined in RPTL § 412a and General Municipal Law § 874, the property may be eligible for a real property tax exemption in the amount of 100 percent of all real property taxes due (excluding special ad valorem levies and special assessments). A tenant in a commercial lease transaction should be aware of the existence of such an exemption where title or a leasehold interest to the leased premises is vested in an IDA, or where the vesting of title or a leasehold interest in an IDA would be possible, as in certain single-tenant build-to-suit leases or leases to qualified single tenants.

35 See CBS Inc. v. P.A. Bldg. Co., 200 A.D.2d 527, 606 N.Y.S.2d 674 (1st Dep't 1994); see also Kenilworth Realty Trust v. Bankers Trust Co., 112 Misc. 2d 523, 447 N.Y.S.2d 210 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1982).

As a threshold matter, in order to obtain the exemption, there must be an applicable IDA with jurisdiction over the municipality in which the real property is located. There are many IDAs throughout New York State, and a current list can be obtained through the ORPS. Each IDA that offers an exemption program has an established uniform tax exemption policy which establishes guidelines under which the exemption may be granted. In establishing such policy, an IDA must take into account its benefit on job creation and retention and other impacts on both existing and future businesses in the municipality, among other factors. In addition, the policy must address the impact of the exemption program on the local tax base. For this reason, the granting of such an exemption is frequently conditioned upon the property owner entering into a payment in lieu of tax agreement (PILOT). PILOT agreements may be advantageous to landlords and tenants insofar as they frequently (although not always) lessen the tax burden and provide a stable basis on which to estimate future tax liability. In each instance where a PILOT is required, it must set forth the time, place, and manner of payment, the amount of each annual payment and the allocation among the affected taxing jurisdictions, and the date upon which the payment will be treated as delinquent if it is not paid. It should be noted that PILOT agreements are not considered tax payments and are, therefore, not designated on the tax rolls for the assessing unit. As a result, a party to a lease including provisions relating to the obligation of a landlord or tenant to pay real property taxes should consider whether such provision should specifically reference PILOT payments as well as real property tax payments.

Qualified property uses include those which promote, encourage, develop, or assist in acquiring, constructing, or improving industrial, manufacturing, warehousing, and commercial facilities.

[17.14] B. Business Investment Property and Commercial Property Exemptions

[17.15] 1. Business Investment Property Exemptions (Outside New York City)

Pursuant to RPTL § 485-b, commercial or industrial facilities located outside New York City that are constructed, or improved, at a cost exceeding $10,000 or such other minimum amount chosen by the applicable taxing jurisdiction, may be partially exempt from taxation and certain special ad valorem levies. This partial exemption is only effective after the construction or improvements have been completed. Eligible properties are those used primarily for buying, selling, storing, or developing goods or services, for the manufacture of goods, for raw materials, or for hotel or motel purposes. The exemption is available at a declining scale over a period of 10 years. There are limitations on § 485-b exemptions to the extent that other exemptions apply for the same property or improvements.

Taxing jurisdictions do have a certain amount of control over the application of the exemption. For instance, taxing jurisdictions may elect to restrict the exemption to properties located within a specific geographic area, usually for targeted economic development purposes. They may also restrict the types of businesses that are eligible for the exemption, and may elect to raise the minimum construction cost for eligibility, up to a maximum of $50,000. Furthermore, they may elect to offer either the Basic Exemption or Accelerated Strategic Exemption, as set forth below. Taxing jurisdictions (except for the city school districts of Buffalo, Rochester, Syracuse, and Yonkers) may also elect to administer the exemption program through the establishment of an Industrial Commerce Incentive Board (ICIB), which formulates a plan to address the various options mentioned above.

The exemption relates to increases in assessed value due to improvements, similar to the Empire Zone exemption outlined below. Two exemption options are available, both over a 10-year term: a “Basic Exemption” and an “Accelerated Strategic Exemption.” The Basic Exemption is a 50 percent reduction of any increase in assessed value relating to improvements in the first year of the exemption (or such reduced percentage as the taxing jurisdiction may elect), declining by five percent in each subsequent year through year 10. The Accelerated Strategic Exemption provides for a 50 percent reduction in the first three years, declining from 40 percent to five percent through year 10. The Accelerated Strategic Exemption may only be enacted where an ICIB has been established and recommends restricting the exemption to certain types of business properties and to certain geographic areas, where necessary for targeted economic development.

The RPTL § 485-b exemption has broad application for commercial lease transactions in both build-to-suit scenarios and those with substantial buildout for renovations. As a result, where such an exemption is available, the exemptions should be considered when drafting lease provisions relating to real property taxes. Because the owner of the property is the only party eligible to apply, tenants should consider a lease provision requiring the landlord to apply for the exemption to minimize tax liability on the tenant.

[17.16] 2. Commercial Properties in Designated Areas of Manhattan

Pursuant to RPTL § 499-b, certain real property constructed before January 1, 1975, that is located in designated areas of Manhattan and contains premises which are occupied or used for retail or office purposes pursuant to a lease dated after April 1, 1997, is eligible for a three-year tax abatement (not including special assessments). In order for a lease to qualify, however, it must be for a term of between three and five years. The tax abatement is for a period of three years.

Computation of the RPTL § 499-b abatement is based upon the tenant's share of the eligible square footage multiplied by the abatement base (the per square foot tax liability, with a maximum of $2.50 per square foot in the first year of the abatement, two thirds of that amount in the second year, and one third for the third year).

In order to qualify, this abatement provides varying standards for when and to what extent expenditures on improvements must be made, depending on the tenant's status and the number of employees in the facility. For a new or expansion tenant, expenditures must be made within 60 days of the lease commencement date. For a renewal tenant, expenditures must be made within one year. The amount of improvement expenditures required varies with the number of persons employed: 125 or fewer employees and a lease term of five years or more require improvement expenditures of at least $10 per square foot; 125 or fewer employees with lease terms of less than five but at least three years require improvement expenditures of at least $5 per square foot; and buildings with more than 125 employees with a lease term of ten years or more requires improvements of at least $35 per square foot to be eligible.

[17.17] 3. Commercial Properties In New York City Outside Designated Areas of Manhattan

Real Property Tax Law § 499-bb provides an exemption for real property located within the city of New York, but outside the designated areas of Manhattan, subject to the exemption contained in RPTL § 499-b described above. This exemption may be for a period of five years or three years for Abatement Zone B or three to 10 years for Abatement Zone C, and does not include special assessments. Abatement Zone A applied to commencement only through March 31, 2001, and will not be discussed.

Abatement Zone B is defined as any district zoned commercially or industrially in any area of New York City, except south of the center line of 96th Street in Manhattan. In Zone B, if such property was constructed prior to January 1, 1999, and is occupied or used for office, commercial, or manufacturing purposes (excluding retail, hotel, or residential use) pursuant to a lease agreement certified by the New York City Department of Finance and dated on or after July 1, 2000, with an aggregate floor area of 25,000 square feet, it may be eligible for a five year tax abatement. In such instance, the abatement is computed as the tenant's proportionate share of the overall eligible square footage of the building, multiplied by the "abatement base." The abatement base is (1) $2.50 of the tax liability on a per square foot basis, or (2) 50 percent of the tax liability per square foot for the first three years of the abatement and two-thirds of that amount in year four and one-third of that original amount in year five, whichever is less.

The three-year abatement in Zone B is the tenant's share of the eligible square footage of the building multiplied by the abatement base. The abatement base for the three-year exemption in Zone B is $2.50 per square foot for year one, two thirds of that amount for year two, and one third of the original amount for year three.

Abatement Zone C includes properties occupied or used for industrial or manufacturing activity in an area zoned commercially or industrially by a tenant pursuant to a three-to-10 year lease executed on or after July 1, 2005. The same restriction for properties located south of the center line of 96th Street in Manhattan applies, except for the Special Garment Center District as defined by resolution of the city of New York. In Zone C, the abatement is from three to 10 years, depending on the term of the lease. It is computed as the tenant's share of the eligible building square footage multiplied by the abatement base, which is the tax liability per square foot up to a maximum of $2.50 per square foot for each year of the lease.

All of the abatements under RPTL § 499-bb are administered by the New York City Department of Finance, and require a certificate of occupancy as proof of construction before the applicable time frame.

All of the aforementioned tax exemptions and abatements under RPTL §§ 485-b, 499-b, and 499-bb should be considered by landlords and tenants entering into qualified leases or, in the case of RPTL § 485-b, constructing or improving the property within the qualified time period. It is important for the parties to a lease to include language requiring mutual cooperation with obtaining such abatements and to ensure that the benefits run to the parties in conformity with other real property tax provisions as negotiated in the lease.

[17.18] C. Empire Zone Property Tax Benefits

The Empire Zone property tax exemption for improvements in a designated Empire Zone, set forth in RPTL § 485-e, provides for a 10-year declining scale tax exemption attributable to the value of new construction or improvements to commercial property after a certain base year. Effective June 29, 2010, New York State closed the program to new participants. However, businesses certified to participate in the program and receive the benefits including the RPTL § 485-e exemption prior to June 30, 2010 may continue to do so, and may obtain benefits in connection with a move or expansion into property located within the Empire Zone boundaries designated as of June 29, 2010. As a result, landlords negotiating leases for expansion or renovation for a tenant certified in the Empire Zone program, and tenants who are certified businesses within the program seeking to expand or move, should consider whether they may be eligible for the RPTL § 485-e exemption.

Such an exemption can significantly reduce property tax expenses relating to improvements, which are either borne by the landlord in a gross lease transaction (resulting in higher rents to account for the tax liability) or passed on to the tenant in net lease transactions or leases involving escalation clauses relating to the cost of improvements. Therefore, it should be considered carefully by tenants prior to entering into a lease, as the property tax exemption may require the cooperation of, and indeed accrue to, the landlord.

Although the exemption may be granted within one year of completion of improvements, it is not advisable for a tenant to enter into a lease in reliance upon such a later designation because the taxing jurisdictions may enact legislation opting out of the Empire Zone exemption where one previously existed. In Boynton Suites, LLC v. Board of Assessment Review of the City of Plattsburgh,³⁶ a contract vendee entered into an agreement to purchase real property in reliance upon, among other things, the availability of an Empire Zone exemption. Prior to the time such exemption was granted, but after the purchase contract was entered into, the taxing jurisdictions enacted legislation repealing their prior Empire Zone exemption program. The contract vendee commenced an action against the taxing jurisdictions claiming that RPTL § 485-e did not allow for taxing jurisdictions to “opt out” of an Empire Zone exemption program once they had opted in. The Third Department held that it was within the powers of the municipality to do so, and denied the Petition. However, once an exemption is granted, it will remain in effect throughout the duration of the exemption period regardless of repeal of the effective local laws or termination of the affected Empire Zone (provided that subsequent improvements will not be eligible for the exemption in either case).

[17.19] D. Tax Benefits Under the Excelsior Program

In the void left by the phase out of the Empire Zone Program, New York has introduced its current flagship incentives program, the Excelsior Jobs Program. The Excelsior program is targeted toward investment and job creation in certain key industries including manufacturing, biotechnology, pharmaceutical, high-tech, clean-technology, green technology, financial services, and agriculture. Among the four tax credits that may be available to participants in the Excelsior Program that meet the criteria is a real property tax credit component. As with the Empire Zone real property tax credit, eligibility for Excelsior Program benefits should be considered by landlords and tenants wherever the tenant is engaged in one of the targeted industries noted above, and the leased premises will result in qualifying job creation.

A qualifying participant must either have a regionally significant project, or be located in an investment zone. The property tax benefit conferred upon any qualifying participant is a 10-year credit, commencing with 50 percent of the eligible real property taxes in year one, and declining by five percent per year thereafter through the end of the 10-year credit period.

What constitutes “eligible real property taxes” under the Excelsior program is the same as for the Empire Zone program, defined in Section 15(e) of the Tax Law. As with the Empire Zone program, taxes paid by tenants can only be eligible for the credit if paid pursuant to an explicit requirement of the lease, and if the taxes constitute a lien on the property during the year in which the tenant is certified under the Excelsior Program and the tenant has made direct payment of the taxes. As such, when negotiating leases for tenants that intend to qualify for the Excelsior program, be sure to include in the lease an obligation for the tenant to pay the taxes directly.

The maximum aggregate amount of the tax credit under the Excelsior program is determined by the Commissioner of Taxation and Finance, taking into account the value of any improvements projected to be made to the real property comprising the regionally significant project or otherwise located in an investment zone. The detailed qualification requirements and application process for the Excelsior Program are beyond the scope of this article, but should be explored by the practitioner negotiating leases in the target industries early in the lease negotiation process, as the potential benefits are substantial, and directly impact how to draft the real property tax clauses of the lease.

CHAPTER EIGHTEEN

COMMERCIAL CONDOMINIUM LEASES

Matthew J. Leeds, Esq.

[18.0] I. INTRODUCTION

In a growing number of cases, commercial developments (including both horizontal and high-rise properties) are being structured in the form of condominium ownership. There are many reasons for this, including critical matters of financing.¹ Although the condominium form of ownership generally involves fee ownership of real property, a unit owner can lease out its unit to a tenant. In such cases, the special legal nature of the condominium form of ownership significantly affects the landlord-tenant relationship.²

As the broadest example, in a normal landlord-tenant situation, the landlord who owns and operates the building can promise services and utilities to a tenant, but in the condominium form of ownership the immediate landlord (the owner of the condominium unit) may not control such matters, which are typically governed by the condominium's board of managers. Many other obvious and subtle issues arise in these circumstances. Accordingly, a careful tenant would want to identify the issues in a particular commercial condominium through appropriate due diligence.

The owner of the condominium unit, the landlord, must consider the concerns of prospective tenants and would engage in similar due diligence. Through negotiation, the tenant would like to obtain assurances that it will be able to get the benefits it bargains for in its lease, as well as realistic mechanisms to enforce its rights against its landlord, or even against the condominium board and all the unit owners.

A major tenant negotiating a lease before the condominium is established might have the best chance of actually having some control over these matters. Such a tenant has the best opportunity to have its desired protections built into the condominium documents. For a tenant, this is an ideal situation—but the relative bargaining power of tenants will vary. In addition, especially once the condominium is created, the ability to implement a tenant's wish list of protections might be diminished. However, any tenant—large or small—would, theoretically, need to take into account all the concerns that a highly desirable large commercial tenant would identify. Nevertheless, in any situation, an understanding of the larger ownership structure would be necessary for the tenant to make a business decision on whether to tolerate the risk if all its concerns were not addressed perfectly.

[18.1] II. IDENTIFYING ISSUES

This chapter provides a survey of a tenant's considerations in leasing space within a commercial condominium. The discussion seeks to identify the issues that would normally arise for a commercial tenant, suggesting some methods to perform appropriate due diligence to identify special issues that might exist in a particular condominium, and describing some methods to resolve competing interests to address these issues. Again, although the discussion mostly takes the view of a major tenant that can command significant changes, it also reflects the concerns of any commercial tenant in a condominium.

Because condominiums are a creature of statute, state law must be reviewed for special considerations peculiar to the jurisdiction. In New York, counsel must consider the New York Condominium Act, article 9-B of the Real Property Law.³ The New York formulation is to refer to the space that is actually owned by an individual owner as a "condominium unit," while the entire development is referred to as the "condominium." (In some other jurisdictions, these words have somewhat different meanings.)

This discussion also assumes that a property has been fully dedicated to commercial use, as opposed to a "mixed-use property," which would present many of the same issues with more highly concentrated particulars. The discussion also assumes a condominium where the units are owned in fee simple, as opposed to a condominium where the entire condominium property is subject to a leasehold. Finally, it should be noted that a condominium might be part of a larger development or community and thus may also be subject to other "umbrella" property owners' associations in addition to the condominium regime itself.

³ N.Y. Real Property Law § 339-d–339-k (RPL).

[18.2] III. THE CONDOMINIUM FORM OF OWNERSHIP

Like all other unit owners in the condominium form of ownership,⁴ the landlord in the situations referred to in this article typically owns one or more of the various condominium units in the condominium. Each condominium unit is a separate parcel of real estate,⁵ owned in fee simple, and constitutes its own separate tax lot.⁶ Each unit is much like a three-dimensional parcel of air space contained within the inside surfaces of the walls and ceiling (or other boundaries) that usually describe a particular space.

As a separate parcel of real estate, each condominium unit may be burdened by a separate mortgage that will affect no other condominium units, absent the consent of those other unit owners.⁷ Inextricably entwined with the ownership of a condominium unit would be the ownership of an undivided interest in what are referred to as the “common elements” of the condominium, generally the structural or shared areas of the condominium property. Typical common elements include the land on which the building sits, structural portions of the building, including the walls and the roof, and any common lobbies, hallways and spaces, including those which house building systems serving the condominium units.⁸ Each unit owner’s proportionate interest in the common elements is frequently referred to as the “common interest” allocable to that unit.⁹ The unit owners are thus in many respects like tenants-in-common with respect to the common elements.

The unit owners together in effect constitute an association responsible for running the property. This association is managed by a board of managers elected by the unit owners. Although the board is responsible for running the association, it can hire professional management to handle much of that function.

4 See, e.g., David Clurman & Edna Hebard, Condominiums and Cooperatives (1970); Patrick J. Rohan & Melvin A. Reskin, Condominium Law and Practice: Forms (1965); William Jay Lipman, Condominium and Co-op Closings (1987); Matthew J. Leeds & Walter Goldsmith, New York Practice Guide: Cooperatives & Condominiums (1986).

6 RPL § 339-y.

7 RPL § 339-l.

8 RPL § 339-e(3).

9 RPL § 339-e(5).

To pay the expenses of operating the property, the board normally assesses each unit owner a certain portion of these costs, in what are called “common charges.” Although common charges are normally allocated based on the unit owners’ relative common interests, in commercial condominiums it is not unusual for a particular unit owner that uses a greater portion of some common element, or uses building services or facilities to a degree disproportionate to the common interest, to be required to pay a greater share of expenses related to that item. Sometimes the condominium documentation calls for a specific allocation of expenses among the unit owners in a manner other than proportionately to common interests.¹⁰ In addition, some common elements may be allocated as “limited common elements” for the exclusive use of one or more units. Generally, the unit owner who has use of a limited common element has greater responsibility for the expenses and maintenance of those spaces than the unit owners who do not actually use them.

It is always significant to note that the expenses of operation of the condominium association do not normally include two major expenses of real property ownership: real estate taxes and debt service on a mortgage. This reflects the fact that each condominium unit is itself a parcel of real estate, and only the owner of the unit affected by the liens for mortgages and real estate taxes has any obligation to pay them.

As security for payment of a condominium unit owner’s common charges, the association (by the board of managers or otherwise) usually has a lien against each unit owner’s unit to secure the payment of such common charges.¹¹ In New York, this lien is generally subordinate to liens for real estate taxes and a first mortgage of record.¹² The Condominium Act does, however, permit the priorities between a mortgage and the lien for common charges to be adjusted in a fully non-residential condominium if so provided in the condominium documents.¹³

Those who are more familiar with residential condominium situations than with commercial condominium situations may be aware of a common device by which a condominium association can become involved in the sale or leasing of a unit. That is, many residential condominiums provide that, in order to permit some common control over the unit owners or residents without flouting any common law restriction against unreasonable restraints on alienation, many residential condominiums require that a unit owner seeking to sell or lease its property offer a right of first refusal to the condominium association. Not surprisingly, in commercial condominiums, business considerations dictate that a right of first refusal is not usually imposed on sales or leases by unit owners.

A property is subjected to the condominium form of ownership, (i.e., divided into separate condominium units, each as a separate parcel of real estate and the common elements and subjected to the governing provisions of the local condominium statute), by recording or filing statutorily required documents. These materials are normally in the nature of a “declaration of condominium” and appropriate floor plan drawings indicating the locations of the separate condominium units and the common elements. The declaration normally incorporates, or is accompanied by, the by-laws of the condominium, which typically govern management and operation of the condominium.¹⁴

In the area of consumer protection, such as the sale of real estate securities laws in New York,¹⁵ states often require that sales of condominium units take place pursuant to an information statement or offering plan or memorandum. In some of those jurisdictions, information is merely maintained or compiled by the association or the developer. In New York, the offering plan is the subject of a separate filing with a government agency, the New York State Department of Law Real Estate Financing Bureau.¹⁶ That agency reviews the materials to determine whether they are acceptable for filing. For some projects, when it is deemed upon application that the requirement of an offering plan does not fulfill a necessary statutory or public purpose, the Department of Law has authority to issue a “no-action” or “no-jurisdiction” letter. It essentially states that, based on the application, a full filing is not required. Any offering materials would not normally be required to be provided to tenants of units. If available, though, they might provide an interesting source of information for a tenant renting a unit.

The basics of the condominium structure suggest issues that can arise for anyone intending to lease a condominium unit. To identify which generic structures affect the particular condominium, however, and to identify any idiosyncratic issues that might exist for a particular condominium, a lawyer will normally engage in a certain amount of due diligence.

[18.3] IV. DUE DILIGENCE

Any tenant will perform certain physical and business investigations before deciding whether a particular property is appropriate. For example, a tenant and its experts (other than the lawyer) would probably conduct a physical inspection of the property, determine whether building systems purportedly available are adequate to support the tenant's needs, investigate the reputation of the property and the developer (if relevant), and ask other similar questions. The lawyer is normally asked to review any requested documentation that might shed light on issues raised by the tenant. Equally important is the lawyer's review of appropriate documentation to suggest issues that the tenant might have had no reason to expect.

Documentation is not necessarily "standard" and is frequently tailored to a particular project. As in any real estate transaction, the lawyer can anticipate general categories, but does not know how they will be phrased in a particular instance, nor whether any surprises will appear. Thus, legal review will frequently involve the following documents, to be reviewed provision-by-provision to determine how a particular condominium structure might affect a tenant client. Specifically, the lawyer might be asked to review:

- Condominium Act. In a profession of increasing specialization, even seasoned leasing lawyers might find it appropriate to engage colleagues who are more conversant in condominium law and practice to review a lease of commercial space in a condominium unit. If the property is located in another state, consultation with local counsel is recommended.
- Certificate of Occupancy. Although this would normally be part of the physical inspection conducted by the client and its other experts, there may be occasions when required-use issues or local statutes suggest the lawyer review the certificate of occupancy as it affects the contemplated space.
- Declaration of Condominium and Condominium By-laws. In most instances, an examination of these fundamental documents is the meat of the attorney's due diligence analysis. Together, these documents will lay out how the condominium unit is described, the services that will be provided to the unit, and the obligations of the unit owner. Critically, these documents indicate who controls different aspects of condominium operations and whether the landlord will actually be able to deliver services and other promises made under the lease to the tenant. Even if the initial documents indicate that the landlord will have full rights to perform for the tenant, the documents will also indicate whether the condominium can change its rules and operations in the future in a manner that could subvert the arrangements contemplated by the lease.

- In combination with a review of the condominium statute, these documents will also indicate whether the landlord-owner of the condominium unit will be subject to a lien on behalf of the board of managers that, if foreclosed for nonpayment of common charges or other nonperformance, could lead to a termination of the lease.
- Rules and Regulations of Condominium. The extent to which these rules affect the tenant, and the extent to which they could be changed by somebody (i.e., the other unit owners) other than the landlord (who is just one of the unit owners), are important considerations for any tenant. They will often be handled in the course of reviewing the declaration and by-laws.
- Offering Plan (If Any). Any offering plan or similar document normally recites a considerable amount of information. If the particular condominium has been created without an offering plan because of an exemption or administrative permission, it would be of interest to see a document evidencing such consent. It is always meaningful to determine whether the condominium was properly created (and therefore, among other things, whether the landlord actually owns what is being leased to the tenant).
- Condominium Floor Plans. Although an examination of the floor plans is normally part of the physical inspection of the property, those floor plans are often the source of the description of the condominium units themselves and the common elements. Regardless of the presentation by business people on behalf of a landlord or the understanding of the tenant's experts, the condominium documentation itself should be checked (much like reviewing a survey) to make sure that it actually describes the demised premises as part of the condominium unit the landlord owns. In addition, an examination of the floor plans will indicate whether building facilities exclusively allocated to the tenant are actually within the control of the landlord in its own unit, or are subject to control by the board of managers or the other unit owners, as a common element.

- Title Insurance. The issue of title insurance is very similar to the issue of whether a tenant in a conventional landlord-tenant relationship is interested in title insurance, to support its own interests or for reassurance that the landlord owns the leased space. In addition, because the space to be leased as a condominium unit is a separate parcel of real estate, issues regarding existing lienors and other aspects of the landlord's status and financial well-being can be important.
- Books and Records of Condominium. These would include: (1) financial statements of the condominium; (2) minutes of meetings of the board of managers; (3) minutes of meetings of unit owners; (4) accountant's statements such as certified financials; (5) alteration agreements for past renovations; and (6) miscellaneous correspondence and statements included in the foregoing, or maintained separately with the records. Examination of most of these materials usually takes place in the office of the managing agent for the condominium. This review can open a wide range of issues, where the recital of an incidental fact could provide desired insight into a deal. For example, an indication in financial statements of difficulties in collecting common charges from other major unit owners, or references to major work that needs to be performed, could suggest an inadequacy in the physical plant or a forthcoming assessment. Such due diligence also often allows an opportunity to speak with the individuals actually involved in management to ask them generally about operation of the property. Such casual interviews can sometimes elicit interesting current information or a better overview than would be available from the dry documents themselves. The review process described in this paragraph often yields much information that it is not necessary to describe separately to the client. On the other hand, it can reveal important facts.
- Review of Unit Owner's Mortgage and Other Due Diligence. Any tenant under a major lease will often consider certain issues related to the landlord's financing. These include the availability of nondisturbance agreements (presumably in conjunction with subordination agreements) and other matters that are routine for the experienced leasing or financing lawyer.

- A lawyer's review of these due diligence materials typically raises practical and legal issues. It is usually profitable to identify these ahead of time, particularly when the landlord has not anticipated the tenant's concerns in the draft lease. The organization of negotiation between the parties might begin with a general meeting about these kinds of global concerns. Ideally, this might even precede any drafting exercise. In some development situations, a large tenant might even participate in planning the entire condominium, and so might have a say in the way the condominium documents are drafted. If not, many of the considerations will still be the same, and the parties will need to address them in other ways (subject to bargaining power and other practicalities).

[18.4] V. SAMPLE CONCERNS

Due diligence and a general understanding of the condominium situation are likely to bring out a mix of generic issues and issues particular to a deal.

As an overall matter, it can be useful, throughout a condominium lease review, to keep in mind the similarities to a conventional sublease, where the subtenant is not in privity with the person who has actual ownership and control of the property.¹⁷

Examples of typical concerns and some brief thoughts on how they can be addressed include the following:

- Services, Use, Rules and Regulations. In a condominium, the board of managers, acting as the representative of all unit owners, governs the operation of the property, tempered by the provisions of the condominium documents. The tenant must be sure that its landlord can provide everything that is promised in the lease. The tenant and the landlord, in turn, must determine whether the landlord in the first instance has the right to require the board to provide those services which the landlord has promised. These can be as direct as the provision of heating, ventilating and air conditioning; provision of parking; use of loading facilities; maintenance of signage on the exterior of the building; and the like. One aspect of this examination involves determining whether areas that must be accessible to the tenant are actually technically part of the landlord's condominium unit, or whether they consist of common areas (such as entranceways and parking, or a storefront or areas where signage will be maintained and possibly changed from time to time). It is often not enough for a tenant if the landlord has an obligation to provide services, but the landlord cannot itself require that they be provided. Rules of operation of the building, such as limits on hours for air conditioning, or hours during which a loading dock may be used, can significantly detract from the rights that a tenant would normally require in the lease. Another area of critical examination is the permitted use of the property. In particular, a tenant whose lease is by its terms subject to the declaration of condominium and by-laws might be told by a landlord that the tenant should have realized that the condominium might not provide services for the unit owner-landlord, so the tenant is out of luck.

- Obligations of Tenants as Unit Owners. A frequently encountered drafting anomaly in many condominium documents suggests that, for purposes of the condominium documents, unit owners shall be deemed to mean not only unit owners, but also their tenants, and sometimes their licensees and guests. Presumably, such drafting was meant to suggest that all these other people would be subject to the same restrictions as unit owners, and to require unit owners to police the behavior of their tenants and guests. Unfortunately, carrying such logic through a document might mean that a tenant could be argued to have all the obligations of a unit owner. This makes sense for day-to-day behavior at the property, but not necessarily as it relates to the unit owner's obligations to pay common charges or a lien to secure such payment.
- Lien for Non-Payment of Common Charges. Typical condominium statutes and typical condominium documents secure the payment of common charges by establishing a lien against a unit owner's unit in favor of the board of managers. A tenant would be concerned that such a lien would be a superior right to the lease and that foreclosure could wipe out the lease.
- Insurance, Casualty and Condemnation. Because of the nature of a condominium, in which the improvements are owned essentially in common by all unit owners, building-wide casualty insurance is obtained by the board of managers on behalf of the unit owners. Although the general rule under the Condominium Act is that the condominium will be obligated to restore the property, this rule does not apply in catastrophic circumstances. For example, under the New York Condominium Act, where a loss affects 75% or more of the property, 75% of the unit owners must agree to restore, or the property will be subject to a partition and, presumably, termination of the condominium.¹⁸ Such provisions might contradict a lease. In addition, the parties should work to assure that a tenant's separate insurance would not conflict with, or be negated by, a condominium policy. The parties should determine from insurance experts the need for mutual waivers of subrogation, defenses based on acts of the insured, and the like.

- Rent and Common Charges. Common charges do not necessarily represent the operating expenses that are strictly relevant to the tenant. A tenant should examine the appropriate lease provisions to determine whether it is appropriate to tolerate a direct pass-through of common charges. In particular, if the lease seeks to require a tenant to assume a portion of increased expenses for the entire property, it should be determined whether there is a way to account for such expenses properly and whether common charges actually serve as a measure of such passed-through operating expenses.
- Real Estate Taxes. Any provision allowing escalation of rent to reflect increases in real estate taxes should be reviewed to confirm that it reflects the appropriate measure of real estate taxes on the leased unit(s). Because each unit will have its own real estate tax bill, rather than bear a fixed percentage of the total tax bill for the entire project, the normal real estate tax escalation provision should be adjusted accordingly. In addition, condominium documents can provide that any grievance of taxes would be coordinated by the board, but a tenant might want to resist such a unified effort, depending upon the circumstances and the jurisdiction.

It is noted that to the extent that real estate taxes are passed through to a tenant, that the landlord and tenant explore how the taxes are likely to be assessed. An example of an issue would arise where the taxing authorities take a position that the taxes on a condominium unit should in the first instance be assessed on the basis of applying the percentage of common interest allocated to the unit to a number that would have been the full assessment for the building, as if it were not owned in the condominium form of ownership as separate parcels of real estate. Even then, it is not uncommon that over time the authorities would recognize the income generated from the space as a factor to be applied in determining the correct assessment, so the methodology of calculating taxes might change over time.

- Ability to Finance Lease. Concerns of potential leasehold mortgagees should be considered, including concerns about whether the mortgagee would be entitled to copies of notices in the event of a unit owner's default under its obligations to the condominium, and would have rights to cure.
- Alterations and Work. The ability to perform alterations in the space will be governed by limitations in the documents, rules, and regulations of the condominium, including matters pertaining to work that will affect common areas or building systems, insurance issues, and even questions of when work can be performed.
- Consents. It is not unusual for a lease to require that a tenant may perform a certain act (such as alterations in its space) only with the consent of the landlord, with a frequently modified position being that such consent cannot be unreasonably withheld. Similar provisions often appear in condominium documents, where such activities can be performed by unit owners with consent of the board, provided that they are within certain reasonable bounds. Regardless of whether the "reasonableness" standard modifies the issue of consent, any tenant must recognize the potential problem of asking for consent from a landlord who would otherwise give it, but who is then prohibited from giving such consent by the condominium documents or by the board. Additional problems arise if the landlord cannot unreasonably withhold consent but there is no similar standard of cooperation imposed on the board. Furthermore, even if both the landlord and the board are required to behave reasonably at their respective levels of involvement, there may be instances where the board seeks to withhold its consent for a consideration that is reasonable in the subjective position of the board, but might not be reasonable as seen by the landlord or the tenant. In some cases, an owner of a building might be willing to give consent, but the board might have some special concerns because of the condominium form of ownership, such as the objective concerns of other tenants or issues relating to common property. A condominium board might pay more attention to these concerns than a typical building owner.

- Further Subdivision of Unit. The landlord-unit owner might have a right under the condominium documents to have the leases broken into one or more condominium units. Because this is just a matter of documentation, it does not necessarily require physical work. The landlord would, however, then own multiple pieces of real property, all subject to the lease. Presumably, each unit could end up being owned by a different owner, thus creating concerns arising from multiple ownership for the tenant suddenly occupying the property of more than one owner.
- Termination of Condominium Ownership. Either by operation of law or by a vote of unit owners, a condominium can be terminated.¹⁹ In that situation, the landlord that previously owned a discrete parcel of real property that was rented to a tenant is no longer the technical direct owner of the premises. The tenant's position is somewhat unsure, but it would appear that all unit owners would become tenants-in-common for the entire property.
- Amendments to Condominium Documents. Condominium documents are normally subject to amendment by a vote of unit owners (sometimes also requiring the vote of mortgagees of unit owners). Naturally, if a tenant evaluated its position in a condominium based upon the condominium documents, its position could be changed by an act of the unit owners amending the provisions previously relied upon for comfort (a dramatic example being that of a change in permitted use enacted by a vote of unit owners).

[18.5] VI. SAMPLE DRAFTING MECHANISMS

The imagination of lawyers can suggest myriad ways to deal with these concerns. Regardless of how clever a strategy might be, its use might be limited by the bargaining positions of parties, their energy and other practicalities affecting a given situation. Still, it is appropriate to suggest some sample approaches to concerns raised above.

¹⁹ RPL § 339-t.

The most general principle to be invoked is that a tenant would like to know that it can require that the rights it bargained for in the lease can be implemented. (That is, a tenant would prefer not to allow a landlord to make a hollow promise, which can be redressed only by an action for damages against the landlord.) In some instances, this would suggest an attempt to make sure that the landlord-unit owner has a right against the condominium to obtain the necessary services and rights. The landlord would then agree in the lease to provide the services and give rights to the tenant (thus permitting the tenant recourse against the landlord for failure to provide such services). In other instances, a tenant might seek assurance that the board and other unit owners would respect the rights of the tenant, and might even seek more direct privity with them in the condominium documents or in separate agreements. Not surprisingly, experience has shown that in a major development where the presence of the tenant is a critical component of the success of the project, a tenant might be able to arrange for condominium documents to respect its interest and give the tenant some direct rights of types more typically held by a unit owner. Such a tenant's "wish list" can inform any tenant's negotiation. In such situations, techniques include:

- Deal With Specifics. If a tenant can identify matters that it needs to confirm are provided by the entire building, the condominium documents can go into intensive detail on issues such as provision of heat, the number of parking spaces applicable to the unit, the hours of operation, and so on. This might create a problem of flexibility in the future, though. In addition, it is important to make sure that the critical provisions cannot be amended later without the tenant's consent. It might be troublesome if some specific matter had not been considered by the imagination of the business people and attorneys at the time of drafting the document, only to have it later become an important consideration.
- "Subordination" of Condominium Documents to Lease. One short-hand approach to a tenant's concerns would be to suggest that the operation of the condominium and all condominium documents would be subject to the rights of the tenant and the operation of the property as required by the lease. Some practitioners express the view that any lease existing before the condominium document is recorded would be in this superior position. (This argument, in part, includes a supposition that all unit owners succeed to the interests and obligations of the original owner of the property, who was the landlord.) However, an explicit "catch-all" statement to this effect in the condominium documents, specifically identifying a particular lease, might express an important governing doctrine for the protection of a tenant. Further, a tenant might seek a provision in the condominium documents recognizing not only the existence of the lease, but explicitly stating that the board and all unit owners recognize that the condominium would operate in such a way as to provide everything required under the lease to the tenant, and not to diminish such rights or to increase any obligations of the tenant.

- Consents. To address the concern that a landlord might not give consent under a lease because the condominium's consent under the condominium documents was withheld, a tenant might seek to have the board limit its rights of consent in certain matters, such as (1) the board's consent being deemed given if the landlord gives its consent (whether or not it could be reasonably withheld); or (2) the landlord agreeing that it would not be a reason for withholding consent that the condominium did not give consent (thus giving a tenant rights against the landlord, although the tenant might still not be able to perform the act that was proposed); or (3) having the board agree that in such a situation it would be required to give consent if a landlord who owned the entire property would be required to give consent, independent of the condominium form of ownership.
- Amendments. If specific rights of a tenant are protected in condominium documents, those protections can be meaningful only if the documents cannot be amended by the unit owners so as to diminish those rights. Accordingly, the provisions in the documents that permit amendments might be changed in a way that would prohibit any amendment that would affect the lease without the consent of either the tenant and/or the owner of the unit that contains the demised premises.
- Protection Against Board's Lien for Common Charges. The documents themselves, or a separate agreement with the board, could provide recognition and nondisturbance of the tenant if the unit is foreclosed upon by the board. In addition, the tenant, both on behalf of itself and any mortgagee, might request mortgagee-type protections, such as copies of any notice of the unit owner's (i.e., the landlord's) default and an opportunity to cure such default. Some commercial condominium documents recognize the concern of tenants with respect to the lien for common charges, by providing for the automatic recognition, nondisturbance and attornment of leases covering spaces in excess of a certain minimum size.

- Insurance. Tenants might seek provisions in condominium documents, or separate agreements by which the parties would agree, that any insurance of the tenant, the unit owner and of the board or other unit owners would include appropriate provisions so that their insurance policies would not conflict, and/or (2) that the parties would enter into such side agreements as would be necessary so as to keep the scheme of insurance in place (such as an agreement, if necessary, not to sue each other in such a way as to negate a waiver of a claim that a covered act was an act of the insured). These might include waivers of subrogation, defenses for acts of the insured and the like.
- Restoration. A tenant would seek to have condominium documents recognize that the portion of the condominium property consisting of the demised premises must be restored in accordance with the landlord's obligations under the lease regarding casualty. Where the law (on 75% destruction)²⁰ or condominium documentation might require an affirmative resolution of unit owners to restore, a tenant might seek a power of attorney and proxy from all unit owners in the event of such a vote (whether these run in favor of the tenant or in favor of the tenant's landlord). The condominium documentation itself might provide for these powers of attorney and proxies (presumably to attempt to bind all present and future owners).
- Multiple Owners. If the demised premises are located in more than one unit, or if there is a prospect of an existing unit being further subdivided into more than one unit, a tenant might seek to require that the tenant will never be required to deal with more than one landlord. Multiple landlords would create difficult administrative problems, as well as the possibility of receiving different treatment from different landlords. One sample mechanism would be for the landlord to agree that the owner of a particular part of the space would be deemed the agent for all of the owners, and that the tenant would only be required to give notice and deal with that one agent, who would be authorized to speak in a binding way on behalf of all of the landlord-unit owners.

20 RPL §§ 339-bb-339-cc.

- Termination. A tenant might seek a provision that, in the event of termination, not only would the lease be deemed to remain in place, but also the original landlord would be deemed to be the de facto owner of the portion of the premises subject to the lease, and would be the agent for all of the other owners with respect to whom the tenant would deal. The tenant would also want all owners to be held responsible jointly and severally for the performance of the landlord's obligations under the lease.
- Enforcement Rights. A tenant might seek not only to have the condominium documents provide that its landlord be the unit owner having a right to require the condominium to provide everything which has been negotiated in the lease, but also to have the condominium agree that the tenant, as a person named in the condominium documents, would have a right to claim such benefits. In addition, a tenant might seek to have both the lease and the condominium documents recognize a right of the tenant to pursue enforcement of such rights directly against the board and other unit owners. To the extent that the condominium documents and/or operation of the condominium are subject to the lease, a tenant would like the board and the unit owners to recognize their obligations to perform the landlord's obligations to the tenant, although this might be taken as an extreme statement in certain circumstances. In fact, in order to mollify other unit owners, it might be appropriate in many situations for a tenant to agree that enforcement of its rights against other unit owners would be limited to equitable remedies to make sure that appropriate services were obtained, at the same time suggesting a limitation on damages that could be sought against the unit owners (but leaving the opportunity to pursue damages from the landlord-unit owner or an obstreperous board).

[18.6] VII. CONCLUSION

This survey of the concerns of tenants taking space in condominium units can only be read in light of the specifics of a particular project. In addition, although a major tenant in a development deal might have significant opportunity to negotiate its wish list of protections in condominium documents, many situations will not allow a tenant to protect itself in this manner.

All the same, a discussion of these issues raises concerns that all tenants should consider. For a developer to succeed, the concerns of prospective tenants might be anticipated and addressed in formative condominium documents. To go full circle, it should be recognized that these “deals” start at the beginning of negotiations for such a lease, with a statement of general principles and approaches derived from due diligence.

CHAPTER NINETEEN

LEASES WITH FOREIGN SOVEREIGNS AND INTERNATIONAL ORGANIZATIONS

[19.0] I. OVERVIEW

As a world capital, New York City hosts the headquarters of many international organizations including the United Nations Organization and its subsidiary organs. Virtually every entity of global, economic or political significance maintains a presence there including the International Monetary Fund and the World Bank. A complex set of issues arises under U.S. statutory and treaty law when these entities are parties to real estate transactions, presenting both opportunities and problems for the attorney.

This chapter discusses some of the practical considerations that should be uppermost in the practitioner's mind from the outset of analysis and negotiations, and provides tips on how to prosper from the opportunities, while avoiding the pitfalls.

The following is intended to distinguish among the various forms of foreign sovereigns and international organizations with respect to the applicable laws in the United States (including U.S. bilateral and multilateral treaties and federal law) which grant to them certain privileges and immunities and impose on them certain obligations. It is also intended to provide an overview of legal issues and useful considerations when dealing with foreign state and international organization parties in commercial leasing matters.

There are various factors discussed below that a landlord must consider which are not part of a customary commercial transaction when foreign sovereigns or international organizations are involved in leasing or other real estate transactions.

[19.1] A. With Whom Are You Dealing?

At the outset of a transaction involving a foreign state or international organization, it is important to look beyond appearances¹ and identify the legal character of the person at issue since its legal character will determine the extent of its privileges and immunities in the United States. Generally, if a foreign sovereign has no "diplomatic" status, as hereinafter discussed, then its rights to jurisdictional or enforcement immunities are governed by the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA).² However, foreign sovereigns acting through diplomatic entities (e.g., United Nations missions, Washington embassies or consular posts) are protected by multilateral treaties to which the United States is party. International organizations (e.g., the United Nations Organization or the International Monetary Fund), on the other hand, are generally protected by the International Organizations Immunities Act,³ as well as other bilateral agreements and statutory law.

The following chart illustrates the applicable broad categories of foreign sovereigns under the FSIA:⁴

Foreign State or Political Subdivision Category	Agency or Instrumentality Category (Foreign Government Owned or Controlled)
U.N. missions in New York	Foreign bank branches and agencies in New York and country-wide
Embassies in Washington	Trading companies
Consulates-general in New York and consular offices countrywide	Transportation companies (e.g., airlines or shipping lines)
Other foreign government offices (e.g., cultural, press, tourism or trade promotion offices)	Other entities that meet the statutory definition

Numerous international organizations, some easily recognizable and some not so recognizable, are protected by a body of international law, including the IOIA. The following chart provides some limited indication

[19.2] B. Role of U.S. State Department

Under article 22, section 2, of the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations⁵ as hereinafter discussed, [t]he receiving State [i.e., the United States for the purposes of this chapter] is under a special duty to take all appropriate steps to protect the premises of the mission against any intrusion or damage and to prevent any disturbance of the peace of [a diplomatic] mission or impairment of its dignity.

As a consequence, the U.S. State Department is vested with an affirmative obligation to protect—and take all steps it deems necessary or appropriate to do so, including intercession on behalf of a mission against a landlord—when the premises of a United Nations mission or Washington

embassy is involved in any dispute, commercial or otherwise.⁶ Furthermore, section 112 of Title 18 of the United States Code provides that

[w]hoever willfully (1) intimidates, coerces, threatens or harasses a foreign official or an official guest or obstructs a foreign official in the performance of his duties; (2) attempts to intimidate, coerce, threaten or harass a foreign official or an official guest or obstruct a foreign official in the performance of his duties . . . shall be fined under this title or imprisoned not more than 6 months or both.⁷

That section requires recognition of the treaty obligations of the U.S. State Department and caution in dealing with diplomatic or consular premises. Such caution, for example, should be exercised with regard to the reliance by a landlord on the self-help provisions of a commercial lease (i.e., those provisions which permit a landlord to withhold heating, ventilating or other services when a tenant is in default of its rent obligations). The withholding of such services could be deemed to violate the foregoing provision.

[19.3] C. Absolute Immunity

Because of the breadth of the protections under the various international treaties that affect diplomatic offices and the great worldwide deference allowed to those offices, particularly in the developing world, some foreign sovereigns act with impunity from time to time—that is, for example, by stonewalling rent or other lease obligations when budget shortfalls arise. In those circumstances, absolute immunity exists in that no recourse is available to a landlord other than the non-judicial intervention of the State Department. Under article 22 of the Vienna Diplomatic Convention and section 1610 of the FSIA, no judgment enforcement measures may be taken in connection with premises leased (or owned) for diplomatic purposes, absent a waiver of immunity.

6 See 767 Third Ave. Assoc. v. Permanent Mission of Zaire to U.N., 988 F.2d 295 (2d Cir. 1993). Here, the landlord of the Zaire United Nations mission sought to evict the mission from its office premises for non-payment of rent. Although there was little argument that rent was due and unpaid, in accordance with article 22 of the Vienna Diplomatic Convention, the U.S. Department of State interceded in the litigation through the filing of an amicus curiae brief seeking to forestall eviction proceedings and thereby protect the dignity of the mission.

7 See Act for the Protection of Foreign Officials and Official Guests of the United States, Pub. L. No. 92-539, 86 Stat. 1070 (1972) (codified at 18 U.S.C. § 112, as amended).

[19.4] D. Transactional Pace/Political Events

The pace of business in the foreign governmental sector, particularly for the developing world, can be significantly slower than in the commercial sector. In addition, foreign political events and U.S. geopolitical concerns can affect transactions in the United States.⁸

[19.5] E. Some Illustrations

Before addressing the relevant body of law, the following examples, drawn principally from professional experiences, illustrate some of the basic practical legal issues that need to be considered when a foreign government or international organization is involved in a leasing transaction. As these experiences reflect, the primary issues consist of the ability to effect jurisdiction, to serve process and to enforce a court order or judgment. Generally, the best way to achieve jurisdiction over a foreign government or international organization is to provide in the lease—if negotiable—for an express waiver of jurisdictional immunity under the FSIA and other applicable law and submission to the jurisdiction of the appropriate courts. Likewise, service of process is best achieved at the contract stage by providing for an express method of service of process, thereby avoiding a potentially expensive and lengthy procedure. Finally, the consideration perhaps of greatest concern is enforcement of a judgment, which raises the same commercial considerations as with any non-governmental party. Here, too, the lease should provide for an express waiver of immunity from judgment enforcement measures.

Illustration 1—During the course of the construction of leased premises, a construction worker was seriously injured and brought suit against a United Nations mission. Due to an omission, the mission did not have adequate personal injury liability coverage. The facts raised certain fundamental issues for the plaintiff.

As to jurisdiction, although no waiver of jurisdictional immunity (express or implied) existed, the plaintiff used two sovereign immunity exceptions available under the FSIA to assert jurisdiction—the commercial activity exception and the tort exception.⁹ Service of process was possible under the FSIA.¹⁰

With regard to judgment enforcement, although the claim was eventually settled by the insurance carrier of the general contractor, the plaintiff could not have enforced a judgment against any mission property pursuant to the Vienna Diplomatic Convention or any other property owned by the subject foreign state pursuant to the FSIA.¹¹

Illustration 2—A United Nations mission was in substantial rent arrears with regard to its Manhattan office premises under a lease that contained no provisions taking account of its diplomatic legal status.

A question arose after discussion with U.S. government officials as to whether the landlord could limit its losses by cutting building services, which contractually would have been permissible, without violating federal law in light of the provisions of 18 U.S.C. section 112 and other laws. Furthermore, the subject mission believed (albeit incorrectly) that it was exempt from the tax escalation portion of its “added rent” in light of the Vienna Diplomatic Convention¹² which provides, in relevant part, “The sending State . . . shall be exempt from all national, regional or municipal dues or taxes in respect of the premises of the mission, whether owned or leased.”¹³

With regard to jurisdictional immunity, notwithstanding the absence of a waiver thereof, the lease was subject to judicial review pursuant to the “commercial activity” exception of the FSIA.¹⁴ The lease did not, however, provide any “special arrangement” for service of process,¹⁵ which left the landlord with the lengthy and costly method of service provided under the FSIA.¹⁶ Furthermore, as in Illustration 1, there was no possibility of judgment enforcement both with regard to a warrant of eviction or any monetary award.¹⁷

Illustration 3—The Embassy of the Democratic Republic of the Congo executed an agreement to sublease office space in Washington, D.C. The sublease contained a detailed notice provision applicable to all notices, demands and requests that was expressly deemed to be a “special arrangement for service” on a foreign state within the meaning of 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a)(1), as well as an express blanket waiver of immunity under the FSIA. When the embassy refused to take possession of the premises or to make sublease payments, it was successfully served with process by the sublessor and held liable for damages, including unpaid rent, interest, expenses incurred by the sublessor in reletting the premises and attorney fees.¹⁸

Illustration 4—This matter involved a cooperative apartment purchased for the residence of the ambassador of a United Nations mission and the exemption from taxation under provisions of the Vienna Diplomatic Convention. The subject purchase agreement provided for the “mansion tax”¹⁹ to be paid by the mission at closing, which, in fact, occurred. However, one year later, the mission applied for and received a full refund from New York State tax authorities with regard to the “mansion tax.” As a result of the mistaken refund,²⁰ the seller was obligated to reimburse the state for the mansion tax and paid same. The seller considered an action for breach of contract against the mission, which would have been a legally sustainable claim, but decided against such suit because of the costs involved. As in the prior illustrations, the seller would have had to deal with service of process and judgment enforcement issues because the contract of sale for the subject cooperative contained no special provisions concerning the diplomatic status of the purchaser.

Illustration 5—In retaliation for the 1983 ouster of two U.S. diplomats from Nicaragua, the U.S. State Department removed 21 Nicaraguan consular officers from the United States and closed consular posts in New York, Houston, Los Angeles, Miami and San Francisco. This left the Manhattan landlord of the Nicaraguan United Nations mission and consulate-general with claims under the commercial lease and issues involving jurisdiction and service of process with regard to rent and judgment enforcement.

Illustration 6—A United Nations mission entered into a long-term lease of a Greenwich, Connecticut estate for the residence of its United Nations ambassador. The foreign government made appropriate budgetary allocations for rent prior to lease execution. Shortly before taking occupancy, however, the foreign government was forced to call an unanticipated presidential election and re-allocated the Greenwich rent budget to cover the costs of Western presidential election observers and associated expenses. That left the United Nations mission without the means to meet rent obligations, and the landlord with few remedies because of the issues raised in the preceding examples.

Illustration 7—A former Soviet-bloc United Nations mission leased six apartments for its United Nations diplomats at one end of a Manhattan residential floor and purchased the apartments after the building was converted to cooperative use. For security purposes, the mission abruptly erected a wall in the hallway of the floor that blocked the fire exit for the other residents of the floor. The cooperative sought to commence a lawsuit against the mission to compel the removal of the wall. This situation presented the cooperative with the inviolability provisions affecting diplomatic residences under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention and FSIA,²¹ as well as questions of service of process and judgment enforcement.

[19.6] II. APPLICABLE LAWS

In all the preceding examples, generally, the relevant laws to be considered are as follows:

- Foreign Missions Act (FMA)
- Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA)
- Vienna Diplomatic Convention
- Vienna Convention on Consular Relations
- International Organizations Immunities Act (IOIA)

²¹ Id. at art. 30; 28 U.S.C. § 1610(a)(4)(B).

In dealing with a lease or other agreement involving a foreign state party, in addition to considerations under the Foreign Missions Act,²² the extent of such party's immunity from jurisdiction and enforcement must be assessed. Historically, the concept of immunity may be traced to the usages and customs of the earliest people. As a means of negotiation and discussion, it often became necessary for early tribes to appoint envoys whose functions were of social significance to both the sending and receiving communities. Those tribes soon realized that reciprocal advantages and mutual interests would be gained by granting those envoys special privileges and protections. The use of ambassadors by the Greek city-states, for example, was a common practice, and their inviolability was recognized as necessary to carrying on negotiations. By the 18th and 19th centuries, the doctrine of broad diplomatic immunity for envoys was generally recognized in international law and practiced by most civilized states.²³

Today in the United States (and in most countries), a distinction may be made between diplomatic immunity which, on the one hand, provides immunity from U.S. jurisdiction to "diplomatic agents" or "consular officers" (i.e., individuals) and provides certain protections to real or personal property leased or owned by a foreign government for diplomatic purposes, and sovereign immunity, on the other hand, which provides a range of immunities from U.S. judicial and administrative jurisdiction to foreign states and their agencies and instrumentalities. In addition, with regard to international organizations (and their officials), their immunities in the United States are governed by sovereign immunity or diplomatic immunity depending on the particular entity involved.

In order to identify legal issues with respect to any particular leasing transaction involving a foreign government or international organization party, the juridical character of the party must be determined in order to make an analysis of the applicable law.

[19.7] A. The Foreign Missions Act

By 1981, Congress came to the conclusion that American diplomatic missions abroad were not treated on the same basis as were foreign missions operating in the United States. The Senate Committee on Foreign Relations in referring to inequities faced by American diplomats abroad described the former Soviet Union and certain East European countries as barring the United States from purchasing offices and residential properties for its diplomatic installations, and Algeria as expropriating U.S. property and placing restrictions in the leasing of local office space and residential housing for U.S. missions.²⁴ Accordingly, on August 24, 1982, Congress passed the FMA to provide control in the United States over all foreign missions.²⁵ The aim of the FMA is to ensure equal treatment for U.S. diplomatic installations worldwide on a reciprocal basis with that granted to foreign missions in the United States; the FMA makes U.S. foreign policy a factor of every foreign government office lease in the United States.

Under the FMA, the secretary of state must consider several factors in determining whether a foreign mission or international organization must obtain “benefits” through the State Department based on reciprocity (or otherwise) and on terms approved by the secretary of state.²⁶ The extremely broad authority of the secretary of state under the FMA includes the right to approve, disapprove or impose special conditions on “benefits” available to foreign missions including, among other things,

26 22 U.S.C. § 4304(b). The criteria are (1) whether relations between the United States and a foreign state will be facilitated; (2) whether U.S. interests will be protected; (3) whether adjustments need to be assessed in view of costs and procedures of obtaining benefits for U.S. missions abroad; (4) whether a dispute affecting U.S. interests and involving a foreign state might be resolved; or (5) whether implementing “an exchange of property between the Government of the United States and the government of a foreign country, such property to be used by each government in the respective receiving state for, or in connection with, diplomatic or consular establishments . . .”

real property acquisitions.²⁷ Consequently, on the basis of diplomatic reciprocity, the Secretary of State may invoke the FMA in connection with any commercial lease or other real estate transaction.

The FMA establishes a section within the State Department—the Office of Foreign Missions (OFM)—whose primary responsibility is to review “benefits” available to foreign missions.²⁸ Procedurally, under the FMA, all foreign government offices in the United States, including United Nations missions, Washington embassies, consular posts and a variety of other foreign government offices (including trade or cultural affairs offices), are required to notify the OFM before any proposed lease, acquisition, sale or other disposition of any real property. The term acquisition includes any “acquisition or alteration of, or addition to, any real property or any change in the purpose for which real property is used by a foreign mission.”²⁹ The State Department has sixty days to review the notification and, significantly, where a real property acquisition occurs without appropriate approval, the Secretary of State has the authority to void the transaction.³⁰

27 22 U.S.C. § 4302(a)(1). Under this provision, “benefit” is defined as:

any acquisition, or authorization for an acquisition, in the United States by or for a foreign mission, including the acquisition of—

- (A) real property by purchase, lease, exchange, construction, or otherwise,
- (B) public services, including services relating to customs, importation, and utilities, and the processing of applications or requests relating to public services,
- (C) supplies, maintenance, and transportation,
- (D) locally engaged staff on a temporary or regular basis,
- (E) travel and related services,
- (F) protective services, and
- (G) financial and currency exchange services, and includes such other benefits as the Secretary may designate.

The State Department, using its authority under the FMA, prevented Hsinhua from acquiring the property. The State Department ultimately resolved the matter after negotiations by taking title in the name of the United States Government and granting a long term lease to the PRC.

[19.8] B. Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act

The FSIA provides all foreign states with immunity from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts, subject to various exceptions set forth in sections 1605 and 1605A of the FSIA. Prior to the enactment of the FSIA, the State Department in litigation involving a foreign state would suggest its views to a particular judicial forum as to whether or not immunity would be appropriate based on principles of international comity. In 1952, the State Department issued the so-called “Tate letter”³¹ to the Justice Department, pursuant to which the United States adopted as a policy the then-current international practice of granting immunity to foreign governments only with respect to their sovereign or public acts. However, the State Department’s primary responsibility for U.S. foreign policy left litigants in the position of not knowing whether the geopolitical interests of the United States would affect the views of the State Department on sovereign immunity issues in a given litigation.

Accordingly, in 1976, Congress passed the FSIA, which formally adopted the so-called restrictive theory of sovereign immunity by limiting the immunities of foreign states to their public or governmental acts (jure imperii) and therefore eliminating their immunities with respect to their commercial or private acts (jure gestionis).³² In addition, the FSIA vests the judiciary with immunity determinations, and provides for service of process and judgment enforcement in litigation involving foreign sovereigns.

Under section 1603 of the FSIA, a “foreign state” is defined to include a “political subdivision” or an “agency or instrumentality” of a foreign state. The term “political subdivision” of a foreign state, for example, would include a Washington embassy, United Nations mission or consulate-general of a foreign sovereign. Under section 1603, the term “agency or instrumentality of a foreign state” means any entity—(1) which is a separate legal person, corporate or otherwise, and (2) which is an organ of a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, or a majority of whose shares or other ownership interest is owned by a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, and (3) which is neither a citizen of a state of the United States . . .

nor created under the laws of any third country.

Thus, the foregoing definition includes all entities which are owned or controlled by foreign governments, including, inter alia, banks, trading companies, shipping companies and airlines. Once a foreign state claims immunity under the FSIA, the plaintiff bears the initial burden of producing evidence that one of the FSIA exceptions applies.³³ The burden of proof then shifts to the foreign state defendant to prove by a preponderance of the evidence that the exception does not apply.³⁴

[19.9] 1. Immunity Exceptions Under the FSIA

Sections 1605 and 1605A of the FSIA establish the general exceptions to sovereign immunity. Section 1605 provides that a “foreign state” is not immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts in any case:

(1) in which the foreign state has waived its immunity either explicitly or by implication, notwithstanding any withdrawal of the waiver which the foreign state may purport to effect except in accordance with the terms of the waiver;³⁵

Ltd. v. China Nat’l Mach. Imp. and Exp. Corp.*, 161 F.3d 314 (5th Cir. 1998) (holding that corporation owned by Chinese state waived immunity by contracting to arbitrate in United States claims arising out of construction contract); Berdakin v. Consulado de La Republica de El Salvador, 912 F. Supp. 458 (C.D. Cal. 1995) (holding that consulate implicitly waived immunity by entering into a lease explicitly governed by state law); Eckert Int’l Inc. v. Gov’t of Sovereign Democratic Republic of Fiji, 32 F.3d 77 (4th Cir. 1994) (holding that government of Fiji impliedly waived immunity by entering into a contract with a Virginia corporation containing Virginia choice of law provision); Raji v. Bank Sepah-Iran, 139 Misc. 2d 1026, 529 N.Y.S.2d 420 (Sup. Ct., N.Y. Co. 1988) (holding that Iranian commercial bank waived immunity when it failed to raise immunity defense in responsive pleading and instead asserted claims against plaintiff for adjudication by court). Implied waivers are generally found only where a foreign state has (1) agreed to arbitration in another country, (2) agreed that the law of a particular country will govern a contract, or (3) when a foreign state has filed a responsive pleading in an action without raising the defense of sovereign immunity; Saudi Basic Indus. Corp. v. ExxonMobil Corp., 194 F. Supp. 2d 378, 402 (D.N.J. 2002), citing to Aquamar S.A. supra.

(2) in which the action is based upon a commercial activity³⁶ carried on in the United States by the foreign state; or upon an act performed in the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere; or upon an act outside the territory of the United States in connection with a commercial activity of the foreign state elsewhere and that act causes a direct effect in the United States;³⁷

(3) in which rights in property taken in violation of international law are in issue and that property or any property exchanged for such property is present in the United States in connection with a commercial activity carried on in the United States by the foreign state; or that property or any property exchanged for such property is owned or operated by an agency or instrumentality of the foreign state and that agency or instrumentality is engaged in a commercial activity in the United States;

(4) in which rights in property in the United States acquired by succession or gift or rights in immovable property [i.e., real estate] situated in the United States are in issue; or

(5) not otherwise encompassed in paragraph (2) above, in which money damages are sought against a foreign state for personal injury or death, or damage to or loss of property, occurring in the United States and caused by the tortious act or omission of that foreign state or of any official or employee of that foreign state while acting within the scope of his office or employment; except this paragraph shall not apply to—

(A) any claim based upon the exercise or performance or the failure to exercise or perform a discretionary function regardless of whether the discretion be abused, or

(B) any claim arising out of malicious prosecution, abuse of process, libel, slander, misrepresentation, deceit, or interference with contract rights; or

(6) in which the action is brought, either to enforce an agreement made by the foreign state with or for the benefit of a private party to submit to arbitration all or any differences which have arisen or which may arise between the parties with respect to a defined legal relationship, whether contractual or not, concerning a subject matter capable of settlement by arbitration under the laws of the United States, or to confirm an award made pursuant to such an agreement to arbitrate, if (A) the arbitration takes place or is intended to take place in the United States, (B) the agreement or award is or may be governed by a treaty or other international agreement in force for the United States calling for the recognition and enforcement of arbitral awards, (C) the underlying claim, save for the agreement to arbitrate, could have been brought in a United States court under this section or section 1607, or (D) paragraph (1) of this subsection is otherwise applicable.

Furthermore, section 1605A³⁸ provides that, subject to certain limitations,³⁹ a “foreign state” is not immune from the jurisdiction of U.S. courts in any case:

not otherwise covered by this chapter [Chapter 97 – Jurisdictional Immunities of Foreign States] in which money damages are sought against a foreign state for personal injury or death that was caused by an act of torture, extrajudicial killing, aircraft sabotage, hostage taking, or the provision of material support or resources for such an act if such act or provision of material support is engaged in by an official, employee, or agent of such foreign state while acting within the scope of his or her office, employment, or agency.⁴⁰

There are certain other exceptions to jurisdictional immunity that are not relevant to this chapter.

With regard to service of process, section 1608 draws a distinction between foreign states (and their political subdivisions), on the one hand, and agencies or instrumentalities, on the other hand.⁴¹ Under section 1608(a), service of process may be made on a foreign state (or political subdivision) (1) by way of a special arrangement for service of process (e.g., a lease provision providing a method for service of process); or (2) if there is no special arrangement for service of process, then under an

Cir. 2015); see also Magness v. Russian Fed’n, 247 F.3d 609, 616 (5th Cir. 2001), (noting that “substantial compliance with § 1608(b) is sufficient so long as the defendants have actual notice of the suit”); *Semtek Int’l Inc. v. applicable international convention.⁴² If service of process cannot be effected by any of the foregoing means, then a copy of a summons and complaint and a notice of suit, together with translations of applicable papers, may be delivered to the clerk of the relevant court for delivery to the head of the ministry of foreign affairs of the foreign state concerned.⁴³ If service of process cannot be effected through the clerk of the court within 30 days, then service may be made through the Secretary of State using diplomatic means.

With regard to foreign state-owned entities (that is, agencies or instrumentalities of foreign sovereigns), service of process may be effected in the same manner as with foreign states and their political subdivisions, in addition to certain other means.⁴⁴

[19.10] 2. Enforcement Measures Under the FSIA

Under section 1610(a) of the FSIA, the property of a foreign state is immune from attachment or execution except as otherwise provided in sections 1610 and 1611. Section 1610 provides that the property of a foreign state (including a political subdivision or agency or instrumentality thereof) used for “commercial activities” in the United States⁴⁵ shall not be immune from attachment in aid of execution or from execution upon a judgment if (1) the foreign government has expressly or implicitly waived its immunity from attachment or execution; (2) the property against which attachment or execution is sought “is or was used for the commercial Islamic Republic of Iran*, 540 F. Supp. 2d 39 (D.D.C. 2008) (holding that under § 1608(a)(3), service of process via mail must be sent to the head of the ministry of foreign affairs of the foreign state concerned and that attempted personal service on an embassy of a foreign state, foreign ambassador, or UN mission does not comply with the statutory requirements).

45 See Walters v. People’s Republic of China, 672 F. Supp. 2d 573 (S.D.N.Y. 2009) (in order for FSIA to apply, the property and assets of a sovereign defendant must be located within the United States); see also *Republic of Argentina v. activity upon which the claim was based”;⁴⁶ (3) “the execution relates to a judgment establishing rights in property . . . taken in violation of international law”; (4) the execution relates to rights in property acquired by succession or gift or in immovable property (i.e., real property) located in the United States (other than real property used for certain diplomatic purposes);⁴⁷ (5) the property consists of a contractual obligation to indemnify a foreign state under a policy of automobile or other liability insurance covering the claim which merged with the judgment; (6) “the judgment is based upon an order confirming an arbitral award”; or (7) “the judgment relates to a claim for which the foreign state is not immune under section 1605A . . .”

It should be noted that an express or implied waiver of immunity under FSIA section 1605 for jurisdictional purposes will not be helpful with respect to enforcing a judgment against a foreign state for which a separate waiver under section 1610 is required or other conditions must be met.⁴⁸

Furthermore, under section 1610(b) of the FSIA with respect to any property (i.e., regardless of whether it is used for commercial activity) of an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state engaged in commercial activities in the United States, such property is not immune from attachment in aid of execution or execution upon a judgment (1) where the entity has explicitly or implicitly waived its immunity from attachment or execution, notwithstanding any withdrawal of such waiver; or (2) where a “judgment relates to a claim for which the agency or instrumentality is not immune by virtue of section 1605(a)(2), (3), or (5), 1605(b), or 1605A of this chapter, regardless of whether the property is or was involved in the act upon which the claim is based.” Consequently, in contrast to a foreign state or political subdivision thereof, when an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state is subject to jurisdiction of U.S. courts on the basis of its commercial activities, any property of that agency or instrumentality will be available for judgment enforcement, notwithstanding the absence of a separate express or implied judgment enforcement waiver.

As a result of the foregoing, any commercial lease involving a foreign sovereign, in addition to providing for a special arrangement for service of process, should include an express waiver of sovereign immunity as to both jurisdiction and enforcement. Annexed hereto as Appendix A is a model form of commercial lease clause which, if executed by a foreign government or other official with appropriate authority, should provide for service of process, jurisdiction and attachment or judgment enforcement measures with regard to foreign government tenants, including diplomatic tenants.

[19.11] C. The Vienna Conventions

When a foreign state acts through a diplomatic entity (e.g., its Washington embassy, United Nations mission or a consular post), in addition to sovereign immunity, the foreign state will enjoy immunities under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention or the Vienna Consular Convention, depending upon the official United States accreditation of the office involved. Those conventions generally provide foreign governments certain broad immunities with regard to diplomatic premises owned or leased for office premises or for residences of diplomats.

[19.12] 1. Diplomatic Immunity

The Vienna Diplomatic Convention establishes diplomatic law worldwide and applies to all “diplomatic offices”⁴⁹ in the United States accredited as such by the State Department. It is the product of the United Nations International Law Commission, established in 1947 to promote the development of public international law and is currently the law in 190 countries.⁵⁰ Although the Vienna Diplomatic Convention was 49 Although the term “diplomatic office” is often used to refer generally to an embassy or consulate, there is a distinction in function (and therefore in legal rights) between a “mission” accredited under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention, and a “consular post” accredited under the Vienna Consular Convention. Generally, a mission is charged with bilateral political relations between its sending state and the receiving state (or in the case of United Nations missions, multilateral political relations), and a consular post is generally charged with bilateral trade, investment or cultural relations between its sending state and the receiving state, as well as protecting the interests of the sending state’s citizens in the receiving state.

50 Entered into force with respect to the United States on December 13, 1972.

intended to set the standard for bilateral diplomatic relations worldwide, it also applies to New York City's multilateral United Nations diplomatic community pursuant to U.S. statutory and treaty law.⁵¹

The Vienna Diplomatic Convention protects diplomatic premises as well as individual diplomatic officers.⁵² The protection of “mission premises”⁵³ under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention is very broad. Article 22 bluntly states that the premises of the mission are inviolable and that agents of the receiving state may not enter the premises without the consent of the head of the mission. Further, the receiving state has an affirmative obligation to protect the “peace” and “dignity” of the mission. Moreover, under article 22, the transport of the mission and mission property are granted broad immunities. In short, there is no enforcement jurisdiction whatsoever over diplomatic premises or property absent an effective waiver, including any jurisdiction to enforce a warrant of eviction with regard to commercial offices. Similarly, section 1610(a)(4)(B) of the FSIA, which, as a general proposition, provides for jurisdiction over foreign state-owned real property situated in the United States, is careful to carve out an exception for real property used for maintaining a diplomatic or consular mission or the residence of the head of such mission.⁵⁴

No. 6900 (“General Convention”); Agreement Between the United Nations and the United States of America Regarding The Headquarters of the United Nations, June 26, 1947, 61 Stat. 3416, T.I.A.S. No. 1676, as amended (“Headquarters Agreement”).

52 See, e.g., Tachiona v. U.S., 386 F.3d 205, 221–22 (2d Cir. 2004). In case involving attempted service of process on Zimbabwe President Robert Mugabe and other Zimbabwe officials visiting New York, Vienna Diplomatic Convention’s protection of diplomats’ “inviolability” of the person protected them against class plaintiffs’ service of process.

53 Vienna Diplomatic Convention, supra note 5, art.1 defines the “premises of the mission” to include the building and land used for purposes of the mission (irrespective of ownership) and the residence of the head of mission.

54 See Mendik Realty Co. v. Permanent Mission of Libya to the U.N., 81 Civ. 5410, 1981 U.S. Dist. LEXIS 15862 (S.D.N.Y. Nov. 16, 1981). In this case, an action was brought against the Libyan U.N. Mission for failing to vacate its premises at the end of its lease pending the completion of its Manhattan office building. However, the merits of the action were not reached because Libya obtained a dismissal of the action for insufficiency of service of process and negotiated a lease extension with its landlord. Although commercial leasing was intended to be an exception to sovereign immunity under the FSIA, 28 U.S.C. § 1610(a)(4)(B) specifically excludes attachment or execution against property “used for purposes of maintaining a diplomatic . . . mission.” Further, article 22 of the Vienna Diplomatic Convention would similarly preclude any enforcement procedures.

With regard to diplomatic officers (or “agents”) accredited as such by the State Department, the Vienna Diplomatic Convention makes them immune from U.S. civil or criminal jurisdiction under article 31, except in the following circumstances:

- (1) A real property action relating to private immovable property unless held on behalf of the sending state for purposes of the mission;
- (2) An action relating to succession in which a diplomatic agent is involved as a private person; or
- (3) Any action relating to professional or commercial activities exercised by the diplomat outside official functions.

Notwithstanding these jurisdictional exceptions, article 30 provides that the private residence of a diplomat enjoys the same inviolability and protection as the premises of a mission, and article 31 states that no measures of judgment execution may be taken with respect to the above exceptions which would infringe upon the inviolability of a diplomatic agent or his or her residence. As a consequence, absent a waiver, the success of any enforcement action against an individual diplomat is extremely remote.⁵⁵

[19.13] 2. Consular Immunity

The Vienna Consular Convention, which, like the Vienna Diplomatic Convention, is the product of the International Law Commission, sets the worldwide standard for consular law. With regard to the premises of consular posts, article 31 of the Vienna Consular Convention states that the “Consular premises shall be inviolable” and “the authorities of the receiv-

55 Generally, the presumption of immunity under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention for “diplomatic agents” is very strong. See, e.g., Ahmed v. Hoque, 2002 WL 1964806 (S.D.N.Y. Aug. 23, 2002), where the Economics Minister for the Permanent Mission of Bangladesh to the U.N. was sued for, inter alia, 13th Amendment claims of slavery by former domestic employee and suit was dismissed where plaintiff offered no authority to support a claim that a constitutional right prevails over diplomatic immunity. In addition to diplomatic agents, there are other categories of mission employees, including “members of the administrative and technical staff” and “members of the service staff.” In order to determine the extent of any individual’s privileges and immunities, an analysis of the individual’s accreditation must be made to determine the extent of applicable privileges and immunities under the Vienna Diplomatic Convention.

ing State shall not enter that part of the consular premises which is used exclusively for the purpose of the work of the consular post except with the consent of the head of the consular post.” Accordingly, judgment enforcement measures may not be taken against consular premises under the Vienna Consular Convention, including the enforcement of warrants of eviction. In addition, the enforcement restrictions concerning diplomatic premises under section 1610(a)(4)(B) of the FSIA are also applicable to consular premises. With regard to consular officers, their immunities are substantially more limited than those of diplomatic agents in that they enjoy so-called “functional immunity,” that is, immunity with respect to matters pertaining to official duties.⁵⁶

[19.14] 3. Diplomatic/Consular Waivers

Both the Vienna Diplomatic Convention and the Vienna Consular Convention provide for the “sending state” (i.e., not the individual) to waive the immunities of “diplomatic agents” and “consular officers.”⁵⁷ Both conventions provide that the waiver of jurisdictional immunity must be express and require a separate express waiver for judgment execution.

With regard to asserting jurisdiction over a mission or consular post, as political subdivisions of a foreign state, the FSIA must be considered.⁵⁸ With regard to enforcement measures against mission or consular premises or other property, there are no specific waiver provisions under either the Vienna Diplomatic Convention or the Vienna Consular Convention. Although it is probably contractually permissible to obtain such a waiver, most foreign sovereigns are extremely reluctant to waive any diplomatic privileges or immunities. Such a request on the part of a prospective lessor would likely create an impediment to a lease transaction. However, this reluctance to grant waivers is not necessarily the case with regard to non-diplomatic foreign government offices or entities.

[19.15] D. Related Laws

There are currently 85 “international organizations” in the United States that are protected by multilateral agreements or U.S. statutory law, among which, perhaps, the United Nations is best known. In negotiating any lease with an international organization, it is essential to identify the applicable body of law affecting the international organization in order to analyze relevant legal issues.

With regard to the United Nations, the U.N. Charter,⁵⁹ drafted in San Francisco in 1945, establishes the United Nations as an international organization and provides the basis for its privileges and immunities. The U.N. Charter establishes the juridical character of the United Nations,⁶⁰ and provides that the U.N. shall be granted such immunities as are necessary to fulfill its purposes. In 1946, the United Nations General Assembly adopted the General Convention,⁶¹ which implements section 105 of the U.N. Charter. Under the General Convention, all assets and property of the United Nations shall enjoy immunity from every form of legal process except As is the case with diplomatic premises, the premises of the United Nations are inviolable, and all property of the United Nations is immune from search, requisition or any form of execution. As to officials of the United Nations, by and large, they enjoy functional immunity under the General Convention, except that senior officials (e.g., the Secretary-General, assistants secretary general and under secretaries general) generally enjoy the same immunities as diplomatic agents.⁶²

Further, the Headquarters Agreement,⁶³ among other things, establishes the contractual rights of the United Nations, the governing law and authority in the United Nations headquarters district and the diplomatic status of representatives of United Nations members. As to immunity from process, no federal, state or local law officials are permitted to perform any duties within the United Nations headquarters district without the approval of the Secretary General.

59 Charter of the United Nations, June 26, 1945, 59 Stat. 1031, T.S. No. 993, as amended, entered into force with respect to the United States on Aug. 8, 1945 ("U.N. Charter").

60 Id. at art. 104.

61 General Convention, supra note 50.

62 Id. § 19. But see Westchester County v. Ranollo, 187 Misc. 777, 67 N.Y.S.2d 31 (New Rochelle City Ct. 1946), in which the court held that the defendant driver of a car carrying former U.N. Secretary General Trygvie Lie was not immune from prosecution for driving an automobile in excess of the speed limit, although he was an employee of the United Nations. The court reasoned that "[t]o recognize the existence of a general and unrestricted immunity from suit or prosecution on the part of the personnel of the United Nations, so long as the individual be performing in his official capacity, even though the individual's function has no relation to the importance or the success of the organization's deliberations, is carrying the principle of immunity completely out of bounds."

63 See Headquarters Agreement, supra note 50.

In addition to the foregoing, the IOIA provides special status to the United Nations as well as other international organizations. Under section 1 of the IOIA, an international organization is defined as “any... international organization in which the United States participates pursuant to treaty or under the authority of any act of Congress....” The benefits of IOIA are granted through presidential executive order.⁶⁴

Section 2 of the IOIA provides international organizations, their property and assets with the same immunity from suit and judicial process as is enjoyed by foreign governments, absent an express waiver. Similarly, representatives of, or to, international organizations are entitled to functional immunity under section 7 of the IOIA with regard to their official acts, absent an express waiver.

In sum, when dealing with any international organization in the United States, the same issues as those relating to foreign sovereigns need be considered, including the basis for asserting personal jurisdiction and means of service of process and judgment enforcement.

[19.16] III. CONCLUSION

In order to analyze the issues involving a foreign sovereign or international organization in commercial leasing transactions, its legal status in the United States must be examined—that is, a determination must be made as to whether the subject entity is a foreign state (or a political subdivision or an agency or instrumentality thereof) or an international organization. That determination will help clarify whether sovereign and/or diplomatic immunity are at issue. On that basis, the relevant laws referenced in this article should provide the legal framework to recognize and assess leasing issues.

⁶⁴ By Presidential Executive Orders, there are approximately 85 “international organizations” under the IOIA, including those listed in Appendix B at the end of this chapter.

APPENDIX AForm of Commercial Lease Waiver for Foreign Sovereign Tenants

The Tenant agrees that this Lease (including any modification, amendment or supplement to this Lease, as well as any related consent, license, window display or other agreement that may be hereafter entered into) constitutes a commercial act by the Tenant within the meaning of the FSIA (as hereinafter defined) and the Tenant is generally subject to setoff, suit, attachment judgment and execution in respect of this Lease and the transactions contemplated thereby, and neither has, nor is entitled to, and hereby expressly and irrevocably waives to the full extent permitted by applicable law (including, without limitation, the United States Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976, as amended (FSIA), the Vienna Convention on Diplomatic Relations, 23 U.S.T. 3227, and the Vienna Convention on Consular Relations, 23 U.S.T. 77), any present or future claim to any immunity, whether characterized as sovereign immunity, diplomatic immunity or otherwise from any legal proceedings, whether in the United States of America or elsewhere, to enforce or collect upon this Lease (including, without limitation, immunity from service of process, immunity from jurisdiction of any court or tribunal, and immunity of any of its property from attachment prior to entry of judgment and from attachment in aid of execution, and from execution upon a judgment) in respect of itself or its property in any action or proceeding in respect of its obligations under this Lease. The Tenant hereby agrees that any legal action or proceeding with respect to this Lease may be brought in the courts of the State of New York in the City of New York, or in the United States District Court for the Southern District of New York, as the Landlord may elect. Nothing herein shall affect the right of the Landlord to commence legal proceedings or otherwise proceed against the Tenant in the Tenant's country or in any other jurisdiction in which assets of the Tenant are located or to serve process in any other manner permitted by applicable law. The Tenant further agrees that final judgment against it in any such action or proceeding shall be conclusive and, to the extent permitted by applicable law, may be enforced in any other jurisdiction within or outside the United States of America by suit on the judgment, a certified or exemplified copy of which shall be conclusive evidence of the fact and of the amount of its indebtedness.

UNITED STATES DISTRICT COURT SOUTHERN DISTRICT OF NEW YORK

INSTRUCTIONS FOR SERVICE OF PROCESS ON A FOREIGN DEFENDANT

The Clerk of Court's Office will accomplish service overseas of the summons and complaint, either directly or through the U.S. Department of State under the following statutes:

1. An individual in a foreign state, under Rule 4(f)(2)(C)(ii) of the Federal Rules of Civil Procedures (FRCP); or
2. A foreign state or a political subdivision of a foreign state under the Foreign Services Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(3); or
3. A foreign state or a political subdivision of a foreign state through diplomatic channels via the U.S. Department of State under the Foreign Services Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(4); or
4. An agency or instrumentality of a foreign state, under the Foreign Services Immunities Act, 28 U.S.C. §1608(b)(3)(B).

OTHER DOCUMENTS SERVED

- Orders

An order may be entered by the court at any time during a case. The judge may request that the order be served upon the defendant(s) and should state specifically which rule to follow. An order should be served following the same methods by FRCP 4(f)(2)(C)(ii), 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(3), 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(4), or 28 U.S.C. §1608(b)(3)(B), depending on which rule the judge specifies.

- Defaults

A default may be entered by the court against a foreign defendant assuming the summons and complaint was returned unexecuted, AND the deadline for the answer has passed. A foreign state, political subdivision, or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state has 60 days to answer the complaint. An individual has 20 days to answer the complaint. A default should be served according to rule judge specifies to follow: FRCP 4(f)(2)(C)(ii), 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(3), 28 U.S.C. §1608(b)(3)(B), or 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(4).

- Judgments/Default Judgments

A default may be entered by the court against a foreign defendant. The judge may request that the order be served upon the defendant(s) and should state specifically which rule to follow. A judgment or default judgment should be served following using: FRCP 4(f)(2)(C)(ii), 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(3), 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(4), or 28 U.S.C. §1608(b)(3)(B) depending on which rule the judge specifies.

METHODS OF SERVICE

The Clerk of Court strongly recommends the use of Federal Express (FedEx) or DHL Worldwide Express (DHL) rather than the United States Postal Service (USPS). The USPS requirements for such service are complicated and failing to comply to their standards, will result in the return of a package delaying its ultimate delivery. Using FedEx or DHL also avoids the necessity of providing the Clerk's Office with cash for postage.

Rules Set by the U.S. Postal Service

1. Do not use postage meter stamps.
2. Leave more than the exact amount for the postal fee.
3. Do not seal envelopes.
4. Make sure there is glue on the pink return receipt. (Postal Form 2865)
Mailing labels are not accepted on foreign mailing envelopes. Addresses must be typed or handwritten on the envelope.
5. The following envelopes are ineligible for Registered Mail:
 - a. Mail presented in a padded envelope; envelope or mailer manufactured of spun bonded.
 - b. olefin, such as Tyvek; plastic envelope or mailer; or envelope or mailer
 - c. made of glossy-coated paper.
6. Packages weighing more than four pounds must be split up according to post office regulations.

Please check with your local Post Office for the appropriate customs forms as well as updated forms.

Courier Service

Overnight mail (FedEx & DHL) is acceptable, as long as you are able to obtain a signed returned receipt. You may track the delivery of your package on the courier's website, and print the tracking summary indicating that the package was delivered to its ultimate destination. Provide a copy of that tracking summary and cover letter to the Clerk of Court as your return of service. If you have any questions, or would like a copy of our INSTRUCTIONS FOR SERVICE OF PROCESS ON A FOREIGN DEFENDANT, please see the administrative assistant to the Clerk of Court, Room 120 or visit the Court's website at www.nysd.uscourts.gov.

Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act of 1976

The Foreign Service Immunities Act of 1976 (FSIA) limits the role of the Executive Branch in suits against foreign governments and governmental entities by precluding the Department of State from making decisions on state immunity. A party to a lawsuit, including a foreign state or its agency or instrumentality, is required to present defenses such as sovereign immunity directly to the court in which the case is pending.

FSIA (28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(1)-(4)) provides for service of process on foreign state defendants in a four-step, hierarchical manner: (Source: www.travel.state.gov)

1. Pursuant to a special agreement between the plaintiff and the foreign state.
2. As prescribed in an applicable international agreement.
3. Via mail from the Clerk of Court to the head of the foreign state's Ministry of Foreign Affairs (28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(3)).
4. Via the diplomatic channel 28 U.S.C. §1608 (a)(4)

SPECIAL NOTES:

Under 28 U.S.C. § 1608(c)(1) and (c)(2) – Date of Service:

1. In the case of service under 28 U.S.C. § 1608(a)(4), service is deemed to have been made as of the date of the transmittal indicated in the certified copy of the diplomatic note.
2. In any other case under 28 U.S.C. § 1608 service is deemed to have been made as of the date of receipt applicable to the method of service employed.

Under 28 U.S.C. § 1608(e)- Default Judgment

No Judgment by default shall be entered by a court of the United States or of a State against foreign state, a political subdivision thereof, or an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state, unless the claimant establishes his claim or right to relief by evidence satisfactory to the Court. A copy of any such default judgment shall be sent to a foreign state or political subdivision in the manner prescribed for service under 28 U.S.C. §1608.

Role of the United States Department of State

The United States Department of State, Overseas Citizens Services, Office of Policy Review & Interagency Liaison is responsible for service and implementing regulations under the FSIA via the diplomatic channel in accordance with 28 U.S.C. §1608(a)(4). (Source: www.travel.state.gov)

The defendant served by the United States Department of State MUST BE a FOREIGN STATE OR POLITICAL SUBDIVISION as defined by 1603 of FSIA, not an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state to be served under section 1608(b) of the Act. The United States Department of State DOES NOT serve NATURAL PERSONS under FSIA. (Source: www.travel.state.gov) The Act specifies that when service of process upon a foreign state cannot otherwise be effected under FSIA, the Clerk of Court may dispatch a request to the Secretary of State, attn: Director of Special Consular Services, for service upon a foreign state defendant.¹

The Act allows for service under FSIA 1608(a) (4) only after 30 days have passed since service was attempted under section 1608 (a) (3) (by any form of mail requiring a signed receipt). The U.S. Postal service and private courier services can deliver documents to virtually any location. Plaintiffs should attempt service under FSIA 1608 (a) (3) unless a foreign state has specifically objected to service by mail.²

The U.S. Department of State does not normally serve on a foreign state any documents not specifically mentioned in the Act; however, it reserves executive authority to communicate with foreign governments. Note: a default judgment does not include a document(s) directing further hearings on a judgment.³

Please review the United States Department of State's "Checklist for Plaintiff's Service of Process Upon a Foreign State." (Attachment A). If you have any additional questions regarding 28 USC § 1608(4) mailings, please contact U.S. State Department's Office of Policy Review and Inter-Agency Liaison at ASKPRI@state.gov or (202) 736-9110.

Checklist for Plaintiffs Service of Process upon a Foreign State

05/04/2011

The U.S. Department of State is charged, under the Foreign Sovereign Immunities Act (FSIA), with handling service of process upon a foreign state or political subdivision through diplomatic channels. The Act specifies that when service of process upon a foreign state cannot otherwise be effected under FSIA, the clerk of court may dispatch a request to the Secretary of State, attn: Director of Special Consular Services, for service upon a foreign state defendant. The Department of State's service functions under the FSIA are currently administered by the Office of Policy Review and Inter-Agency Liaison, CA/OCS/PRI.

To avoid confusion and common mistakes, please take note of the following items before submitting a request for service under FSIA 1608(a)(4).

1. The defendant must be a foreign state or political subdivision, as defined in section 1603 of the Act, not an agency or instrumentality of a foreign state (to be served under section 1608(b) of the Act). The U.S. Department of State does not serve natural persons under the FSIA.
2. The Act allows for service under FSIA 1608(a)(4) only after 30 days have passed since service was attempted under section 1608(a)(3) (by any form of mail requiring a signed receipt). The U.S. Postal service and private courier services can deliver documents to virtually any location. Plaintiffs should attempt service under FSIA 1608(a)(3) unless a foreign state has specifically objected to service by mail. To determine whether a particular country objects to service by mail, please see our country-specific judicial assistance information pages at http://travel.state.gov/law/info/judicial/judicial_2510.html.
3. The documents must be translated into the official language of the foreign state to be served.
4. The summons sheet and the notice of suit should state a 60 day (not 20 day) response time for the defendant.
5. The notice of suit (or default) should conform to the requirements of 22 CFR 93.2 (the statute specifically refers to notice of suit "in a form prescribed by the Secretary of State by regulation"). The notice of suit must contain a copy of the FSIA.
6. The Act requires plaintiff to have first attempted service under sections FSIA 1608(a)(1), (2) and (3) before proceeding to section 1608(a)(4). Thus, the U.S. Department of State requires a statement in writing from the plaintiff or the clerk certifying that these attempts were made or were otherwise not applicable.

Attachment A

7. There should be two copies of either (a) the summons, complaint and notice of suit or (b) a default judgment and notice of default (depending on the request).
8. In cases involving allegations of terrorism, plaintiffs should refer to section 1605(a)(7)(B) regarding arbitration requirements (however, we defer to the court as to the adequacy of any action taken by the plaintiffs in fulfillment of this requirement).
9. The Act requires the clerk of court dispatch the documents; however, a plaintiff may provide written confirmation that the court allowed plaintiff to act for the Clerk (after docketing).
10. All requests for FSIA 1608(a)(4) service of process should be addressed to: Director, Office of Policy Review and Inter-Agency Liaison (CA/OCS/PRI), U.S. Department of State, SA-29, 4th Floor, 2201 C Street NW, Washington, DC 20520.
11. As of March July 3, 2010, the U.S. Department of State charges, in accordance with 22 CFR 22.1, a $2,275 fee (cashiers check/ money order should be made out to the U.S. Embassy or Consulate involved. For requests for service upon Iran and its political subdivisions the check or money order should be made out to "U.S. Embassy Bern).
12. Clerks who may have further questions regarding these issues may wish to refer to memos from the Administrative Office of U.S. Courts, dated, Nov. 7, 2000, May 20, 1982 and Nov. 6, 1980.

CHAPTER TWENTY

GOVERNMENT LEASING

Robert C. MacKichan, Jr., Esq.

[20.0] I. BACKGROUND—EXTENT OF U.S. GOVERNMENT LEASING

The U.S. Government (the “Government”) is the largest procurer of space for federal tenant agencies in the world. The Government owns or leases more than 3 billion square feet of space in more than 890,000 buildings and structures in the United States, its territories and abroad. There are 12 categories of space owned or leased by the Government, including office warehouse, housing and storage space. Office is the largest such category, representing about 22% of the total.

The three largest holders of owned and leased office space are the General Services Administration (GSA), with about 346 million square feet, the Department of Defense, with about 236 million square feet, and the U.S. Postal Service, with approximately 190 million square feet.

In addition to these three agencies, over 30 other executive branch agencies have some degree of independent authority to purchase, own or lease office space or buildings. However, few of these agencies have authority to enter into long-term leases.

[20.1] II. FEDERAL LEASEHOLD ACQUISITION POLICY

It is uniformly recognized that the acquisition of a leasehold interest and a contract for the construction and/or purchase of real property by the Government is a Government contract. Therefore, a lessor of space to the Government is a Government contractor in all senses, just like the thousands of other Government contractors. As with the Government’s acquisition of goods and services, Government leases contain a myriad of requirements to further national policies reflected in a broad range of statutes and regulations. These are statutes, regulations and policies that are designed to further a public interest or policy and are often commonly referred to as “socio-economic” issues. These issues, and others, clearly distinguish a Government lease from the usual commercial lease, and parties interested in doing business with the Government need to appreciate the distinctions to favorably price an offer to the Government.

Technically, most agree that the acquisition of a leasehold interest is not subject to the Federal Acquisition Regulations (FAR) as it does not appear to fall within the definition of “acquisition” at FAR Section 2.101. However, the Competition in Contracting Act (the “Act”) has been amended to include interests in real estate, requiring agencies to implement competitive procedures. GSA has opted to fulfill this requirement through the issuance of the General Services Acquisition Regulations (GSAR) and other GSA guidance; the GSAR and such GSA guidance are consolidated in the General Services Administration Acquisition Manual (GSAM). The GSAM confirms that the FAR does not apply to the acquisition of leasehold interests (and certain GSAR and GSAM sections also do not apply unless specifically referenced in the GSAM Part 570, which is the part applicable to leasehold interests), but certain FAR sections specifically referenced in GSAM Part 570 have been adopted based on a statutory requirement applicable to leasehold acquisitions or as a matter of policy. Most notably though, as a matter of policy, many of the standard FAR provisions found in other Government contracts have not been applied to the acquisition of leasehold interests. As the procurer of the largest office space portfolio, GSA's policies and procedures have been adopted by many of the agencies with specific authority to acquire leasehold interests.

When considering leasing space to the Government, it is imperative that any offeror identify the authorities of the acquiring agency or department to verify that the agency has (1) long-term authority and (2) appropriate funding to acquire the space. GSA has such authority pursuant to the Federal Property and Administrative Services Act (FPASA) of 1949, which authorized the creation of the Federal Buildings Fund (FBF) as an intra-governmental revolving fund. FPASA granted to GSA plenary authority to enter into leases for real estate for an initial term of up to 20 years and sufficient funding through the FBF to do so. Although several other agencies have similar contract authority to enter into multi-year leases, they usually lack a funding mechanism for the multi-year term of the lease. For this reason, many agencies, other than GSA, with independent leasing authority will acquire space, but make it "subject to annual appropriations." In those instances, the Government has the right to terminate the lease if sufficient funds are not appropriated by Congress in any fiscal year. The uncertainty of the income stream in leases containing "subject to annual appropriations" language will often present issues for underwriting in the lending process. On the other hand, a GSA lease is usually "bondable" due to the multi-year funding authority and the absence of a termination for convenience clause.

The plenary authority of GSA to acquire leasehold interests may be delegated to another Federal agency. Currently, GSA has issued a general delegation of authority allowing agencies to handle the procurement of leases for less than 20,000 rentable square feet conditioned on the agency demonstrating its procurement personnel have a requisite level of experience and training and upon a showing that suitable Government owned space cannot be provided to meet the agency's requirements. Consequently, very few agencies continue to utilize the limited blanket delegated leasing authority and in those instances of previously delegated specific authority, GSA has terminated or revoked those delegations. Agencies often prefer to use GSA because tenant agencies in GSA controlled leased space can vacate the premises with only 120 days' notice and are relieved of the rent obligation to GSA. On the other hand, if other Federal agencies use the delegated GSA authority, or its own authority, such agency's ability to vacate the leased premises prior to expiration of the lease is controlled by the terms of the lease.

[20.2] III. STATUTORY AND REGULATORY AUTHORITY FOR THE GOVERNMENT'S ACQUISITION OF LEASEHOLD INTERESTS IN REAL PROPERTY

For the purposes of this discussion, the GSA process is used as the most illustrative of the Government lease process. Other federal agencies have independent leasing authority—Department of Veterans Affairs, Department of Defense, Army Corps of Engineers, to name a few—but, in most instances, they follow the same procedures and use similar regulations as GSA. As a general matter, GSA utilizes two acquisition methods to acquire leasehold interests in real estate: (1) a simplified procedure for small leases¹ or (2) a competitive negotiated process.² The simplified process is used for lease acquisition when the average annual rent for the term of the lease, including option periods and excluding the costs of operating services, is less than $150,000. For leases over that limit, GSA, as a matter of policy, has applied the competitive requirements of FAR part 6, Competition Requirements.³

Although as a product of GSA's 2011 Lease Reform Initiative, GSA restructured its lease procurement documents into five categories of leases; in 2015 GSA abandoned all but the on-airport lease and issued the Global template. The Global template is intended to be tailored by the contracting officer depending on the facts of the subject lease procurement.

1 Code of Federal Regulations tit. 48 subpt. 570.2 (C.F.R.).

2 48 C.F.R. § 570.105-1.

3 See 48 C.F.R. § 570.104.

The simplified process essentially consists of conducting a market survey and soliciting at least three offers to promote competition to the maximum extent possible.⁴ Because this is indeed a simplified process, a study of the provisions will likely be adequate to understand the procedural process. It appears that GSA intends to use the simplified lease model and its related forms in connection with this simplified process.

The competitive negotiated lease procurements follow the customary requirements of full and open competition and, as with general contract matters, allow for the use of the seven exceptions to full and open competition.⁵ The competitive negotiated lease procurements will involve the streamlined and standard lease models and their related forms.

As an alternate to specific requirement-based competitive lease procurements, or the simplified process, in 1991, GSA initiated its Advanced Acquisition Program in the National Capital Region as a means of streamlining the process and avoiding delay and additional cost for fulfilling smaller space requirements. The program complies with the statutory requirement for competition although awards are not made until a need is identified. With the advent of technology, this program is now handled online and referred to as the Automated Advanced Acquisition Program (AAAP) and has been expanded nationwide. AAAP has evolved into a multiple award platform that handles space requirements ranging from 2,000 square feet up to the prospectus threshold (approximately 60,000 to 70,000 square feet).

The AAAP approach allows for the submission of offers online for specified amounts of space (without identifying specific tenant agency requirements) and can be updated by an offeror on a monthly basis. Offers must meet the threshold technical requirements, and offers meeting the technical threshold are ranked utilizing a specified net present value calculation. Thereafter, GSA will satisfy its smaller space requirements by selecting offerors most favorably ranked in the desired delineated area. It should be noted that GSA only uses AAAP when the award criteria is “technically acceptable/lowest price.” If an agency prefers to use the “best value” approach, preferring to possibly pay more to get more, a separate solicitation for offers must be utilized.⁶

[20.3] IV. CATEGORIES OF LEASE PROCUREMENTS

Regardless of the method used to acquire leasehold interests, GSA generally categorizes lease procurements into three categories: (1) a replacement lease, (2) a succeeding lease (or superseding lease, if applicable), and (3) a new requirement.

[20.4] A. Replacement Leases

A replacement lease is usually an expiring lease, without any remaining renewal options to exercise, where GSA is desirous of fulfilling its continuing space requirement through full and open competition, as more particularly described below. In many instances, the incumbent lessor will be a competitor for the replacement lease.

[20.5] B. Succeeding Leases

A succeeding lease is a newly negotiated lease at the same location when GSA has made the threshold determination, pursuant to a cost benefit analysis as prescribed by the GSAR, that it is in the best interest of the Government to award a lease without full and open competition. On occasion, a superseding lease is used instead of a succeeding lease. A superseding lease refers to the circumstance when a succeeding lease is negotiated several years before the expiration of the current term. For example, in a real estate market with exceptionally competitive rates, GSA may decide to negotiate a new ten-year term several years before the expiration of the current fixed term. A superseding lease commences upon the bilateral termination of the existing lease.

The GSAR, as contained within the GSAM, provides a methodology to complete this cost-benefit analysis.⁷ Essentially, the Government considers the costs of relocation and the potential market rates with customary improvements in relation to the costs of entering into a new lease at its current location to determine what is in the best interests of the Government. As could be anticipated, in most instances, a succeeding lease is justified when considering the costs of relocation and required infrastructure. Until recently, this approach was commonly utilized when the Government was satisfied with the management and condition of the existing leased premises. However, within the last few years, GSA appears to have informally decided to more routinely use a competitive process for the continuation of existing space requirements. Consequently, incumbent lessors, even with a fully satisfied customer agency, may be compelled to compete for a new firm term lease. It remains to be seen how the current Government mantra of fiscal restraint will affect this policy, though we anticipate that more agencies' space needs will be met with succeeding or superseding leases, at least in the short term.

The desirability of a succeeding lease is clearly evident for both incumbent lessors and the Government, making it critical for owners and managers of facilities with Government tenants to maintain a positive relationship with the tenant agency and GSA. As a provider of choice, it is imperative for GSA to maintain a good working relationship with its tenant agencies to avoid the potential they will go elsewhere to fulfill its lease requirements. If a lessor can help GSA in this mission, such lessor will put itself in a much stronger position to be awarded a succeeding or superseding lease.

[20.6] C. New Leases (Including Replacement Leases)

The last category is for new requirements, which are typically satisfied through full and open competition, similar to replacement leases.

[20.7] V. COMPETITIVE NEGOTIATED PROCUREMENT PROCESS FOR ACQUIRING LEASEHOLD INTERESTS

In such instances when the Government decides to pursue a replacement or new lease, the acquisition process usually involves five major phases:

[20.8] A. Defining the Requirements of an Agency

In most instances when a lease is due to expire in a year or two, or a tenant agency has a new requirement, the tenant agency will formally notify GSA of its new requirements or needs for continuation of its existing requirements. GSA will work with the tenant agency to draft an Occupancy Agreement outlining the specific requirements of the tenant agency. The most critical aspect of this process from the perspective of an incumbent lessor or a prospective offeror is the establishment of a delineated area, the geographic area that the tenant agency will accept as a suitable location for its requirement. The Occupancy Agreement later becomes the working document for securing the required leased premises.

[20.9] B. Preparing and Implementing an Acquisition Plan

As a predicate to initiating the acquisition process, GSA will establish and define the procurement process for securing the desired space. In other words, GSA will determine what method it will utilize to acquire the required space including consideration of the exceptions to full and open competition. As a preliminary means of testing the market, GSA will often opt to utilize a Request for Expressions of Interest as a first step prior to initiating the competitive process.

When utilizing a Request for Expressions of Interest, GSA will commonly issue the request publicly using www.fbo.gov. The announcement will generally specify the critical aspects of the requirement, the amount of rentable and office square footage, the delineated area, and the required delivery date. Unless the Government is using a simplified process, all prospective offerors that believe that they can meet the specified requirements may submit an Expression of Interest. If the Government receives a large number of Expressions of Interest, the GSA Contracting Officer may decide to restrict competition to a smaller subset of the original offerors.

Whether the Contracting Officer decides to restrict competition to a few offerors or opens it to the real estate community at large, the next step is the issuance of a formal Request for Lease Proposal (RLP), specifying the full requirements of the Government. The RLP will contain a detailed summary of the Government's requirements, including, among other things, the required size of the leased premises, the lease term, the delineated area, the delivery date, the technical building system requirements, any special requirements such as security and the standard lease clauses. Also included in the RLP will be the lease model documents that the Government intends to use for lease of the space, including the "Lease Contract" form, which is the primary lease document. In contrast to customary practices in the past, the RLP (formerly referred to as a Solicitation for Offers) will not become part of the final lease agreement.

Following receipt and review of the RLP, each prospective offeror must submit an initial proposal conforming to the requirements set forth in the RLP. Special consideration should be given to the lease model documents included with the RLP as they will become the final form of the lease. If the prospective offeror wants to propose revisions to the terms of the proposed lease model forms, we recommend that the offeror include any such proposed revisions as a rider with the offeror's initial proposal. However, suggestions for significant changes should carefully be considered before submitting them to the Government because the Government has the option of concluding that the proposal is non-responsive if the offeror proposes substantial changes. If the Government concludes that the offer is non-responsive, the offeror will be excluded from further competition. It is important to note, however, that the Government rarely will conclude that an offer is non-responsive due to the offeror's inclusion of a rider without first giving the offeror a chance to modify or withdraw the offer.

[20.10] C. Evaluation of Offers, Discussions and Award

Upon receipt of initial proposals, the Government begins a process of evaluation leading to an eventual award of the lease. The award criteria contained in the RLP control this aspect of the process. The selection of an apparent successful offeror may be on the basis of (1) a technically acceptable/lowest price or (2) what is commonly referred to as best value. In the former, the Government first determines which offerors meet the minimum technical requirements (building specifications) and then award to the lowest bidder. Exceeding the technical requirements does not assist in this selection approach. In the latter, the Government conducts a cost and technical trade-off analysis and can select a higher priced proposal if the Government determines that there are greater benefits in the technical offering.

During the evaluation process, the Government customarily conducts "discussions" with each offeror, although the language of some RLPs reserves the right for GSA to award a lease without discussions. If GSA elects to conduct discussions with one offeror, it must conduct discussions with all offerors in the "competitive range." The competitive range is established by the Contracting Officer and essentially includes all offerors who could supplement or amend their offer to be the apparent successful offeror or is established based on the Government's administrative convenience. Discussions are sometimes referred to as negotiations, but they are very different than the common understanding of negotiations. When GSA conducts discussions, the Contracting Officer's (or the Government broker's) comments about an offeror's proposal must be restricted to the strengths and weaknesses of an offer, without reference to other proposals.

Following the completion of discussions, the Government will request Final Proposal Revisions from each of the offerors in the competitive range. An offeror can make any changes to its initial proposal and is not restricted to the Contracting Officer's (or the Government broker's) comments. This is an offeror's last opportunity to amend its proposal.

Following receipt of the Final Proposal Revisions, the Government will evaluate the proposals and select an offeror for satisfying the Government's space requirements. Typically, after notifying the successful offeror, GSA will tender the final lease documents to the successful offeror and ask the successful offeror to submit executed copies of the same. Thereafter, after securing the final internal approvals, GSA will execute the lease. Unsuccessful offerors will then be notified of the selection.

[20.11] D. Completion of Tenant Improvements

Of all the phases of Government lease procurement, this component of the process is most similar to a typical private sector lease. Depending on the terms of the final lease, the completion of the tenant improvements may be as a "turnkey" project pursuant to a Government-provided agency specific requirements package, or the Lessor will be required to complete the improvements pursuant to a design and build process working with the tenant agency and GSA. In those instances, the Government will limit the offeror's overhead for performing tenant improvements, including architectural/engineering fees and other profit and/or fees to a percentage of the tenant improvement allowance. These limits are customarily negotiated before final execution of the lease.

[20.12] VI. STANDARD U.S. GOVERNMENT LEASE TERMS—UNIQUE PROVISIONS AND COMPARISON WITH PRIVATE SECTOR LEASES

Generally, a GSA or other Government lease addresses similar issues commonly found in private sector leases, such as subletting and assignment, tenant's acceptance of space, maintenance of the building and the leased premises, fire and casualty damage, subordination, nondisturbance, and attornment, and late payment fees. Several GSAR clauses specify what clauses must or should be in the lease.⁸ Many of the clauses are mandated by the GSAR or other non-GSA regulations to be included in a lease, but, in many instances, the regulations allow the Contracting Officer to delete or amend a clause.⁹ Offerors may propose such deletions or amendments by including applicable language in their rider. Many of the required provisions are not specific to leases for real property, but relate to such issues as size/status of subcontractors, improper business practices, environmental compliance, socio-economic objectives, and lease administration matters.

8 48 C.F.R. § 570.703.

9 48 C.F.R. § 570.704.

The most significant clause not usually found in GSA leases that is found in other Government contracts is the Termination for Convenience clause. The FAR requires the inclusion of this provision in all contracts for the acquisition of supplies and services, yet expressly excludes “land or interest in land.”¹⁰ Consequently, in GSA leases the Termination for Convenience clause is not included, making the lease a more desirable product for the purpose of lending. However, some GSA leases contain express termination rights as negotiated by the parties.

For the purpose of pricing a proposal to lease space to the Government, it is important to understand the aspects of a Government lease that deviate significantly from conventional private sector leases. It is also important to note that, as discussed above, an offeror may propose to amend some of the below clauses in the offeror’s rider. The most notable clauses unique to Government leases appear below; it should be noted that many of these clauses appear in GSA Form 3517B, the “General Clauses,” which is incorporated into the lease. As a product of GSA’s Lease Reform Initiative, GSA revised the older version of the GSA Form 3517B and all new leases will contain a newer version, GSA Form 3517B (03/13).

[20.13] A. Base Rent (Form 1364, “Proposal to Lease Space”)

The base rate offered for the initial term of a Government lease, or for any renewal terms, has not traditionally been subject to any escalation, as is the common practice in private sector leases. However, newer GSA leases contain space in the Form 1364 allowing for the offeror to provide rental escalations. From this, it seems clear that GSA will now accept rental escalations as part of an offer. Also, the Government typically pays monthly rent in arrears.

[20.14] B. Operating Costs (Form 1217, “Lessor’s Annual Cost Statement”)

Unlike most private sector leases, the operating expense pass-through in a Government lease are not based on actual operating expense increases. Rather, in the initial proposal, the offeror must list the amount of certain operating expenses expected to be incurred in the first year of the lease, including such items as janitorial, electrical, water, HVAC, elevator, security, and building engineer expenses. The Government will review the estimated expenses, and these estimated amounts may be the subject of discussions between the Government and the offeror. The operating costs agreed to in Standard Form 1217 will become the base rate on which operating cost increases will be determined after the first lease year. Changes in the Consumer Product Index for wage earners and clerical workers published by the Bureau of Labor Statistics is the method used for escalation of the operating expenses during the term of the lease, and is the only method for escalations thereof barring a supplemental lease agreement between the Government and the lessor that specifies a new rate or methodology for adjusting for operating expenses. As a product of the GSA Lease Reform Initiative, GSA no longer intends to use this method for operating cost escalations with the simplified lease model and expects offerors to bake these costs into their rental rate.

[20.15] 1. Subletting and Assignment Clause

The Government may sublet any part of the leased premises but shall not be relieved from any of the lease obligations by subletting. The Government may at any time assign the lease and will be relieved from all obligations to the lessor, except for unpaid rent and other liabilities accruing before the assignment. The assignment is subject to the lessor's consent, but may not be unreasonably withheld.

[20.16] 2. Subordination, Nondisturbance and Attornment Clause

The lease, or any renewal, modification or extension thereof, is subject and subordinate to any and all recorded mortgages, deeds of trust, and other liens existing at the time of execution of the lease or thereafter imposed. No subordination shall operate to affect adversely any right of the Government under the lease so long as the Government is not in default thereunder.

If the building or any portion thereof is transferred by foreclosure of the lien of any mortgage, deed of trust, other security instrument, or giving of a deed in lieu of foreclosure, the Government will be deemed to have attorned to the purchaser, transferee, or their successors and assigns, and such parties shall be deemed to have accepted all obligations of the lessor under the lease.

[20.17] 3. Tax Adjustment Clause

Although the lessor in Government leases is expected to include insurance and real estate taxes in the base rent, the Government will reimburse the lessor for increases in real estate taxes above the real estate tax base established pursuant to the lease. The real estate tax base may be established: (1) by agreement of the parties or (2) pursuant to a “full assessment,” taking into consideration the Government’s contemplated use of the leased premises. The Government is responsible to pay additional rent for its share of any actual increases in real estate taxes to the lessor. The Tax Adjustment Clause has been the subject of substantial litigation with regard to defining a “full assessment,” making the use of a mutually agreed upon real estate tax base the preferred approach. Furthermore, as mentioned above with respect to operating costs, as a product of the GSA Lease Reform Initiative, GSA no longer intends to use this method for real estate tax adjustments with the simplified lease model and expects offerors to bake these costs into their rental rate.

[20.18] C. Tenant Improvements

As mentioned above, whether as a turnkey approach or a design build approach, the Government requires the lessor to install any tenant improvements in accordance with the Government’s specifications and for the standard lease model utilizing a specified tenant improvement allowance. Pursuant to either approach, the lessor will be required to amortize the specified allowance over the initial term of the lease, although in the standard lease model the Government reserves the right to make cash payment(s) for any or all of the work performed by the lessor.

[20.19] D. Tenant Improvement Process

Tenant improvements required under the standard lease model must be made prior to the Government’s occupancy of the leased premises and may be accomplished using one of two specified methods. The first method requires the lessor to submit cost or pricing data in its initial proposal. The alternative method is the Government’s acceptance of a price for the subject work based upon a process of competitively selecting a contractor or subcontractors. The lessor must submit, as part of its initial proposal, the amounts for construction fees such as overhead, profit, architectural fees, permits, and regulatory fees. These fees are negotiated before the award of the lease to a lessor, and, subsequently, through a three competitor process, a general contractor, or its subcontractors, is/are selected using the agreed upon fees.

[20.20] 1. Maintenance of Building and Premises & Right of Entry Clause

This General Clause places responsibility on the lessor to keep and maintain the leased premises and the building and all equipment, fixtures, and appurtenances furnished by the lessor in good repair and suitable condition for the Government's particular contemplated use. In exchange for maintaining the leased premises, this clause grants the lessor reasonable access rights to the leased premises. Under this provision, the customary operational services such as cleaning, maintenance, repair, landscaping, and security (in most instances) are the lessor's responsibility. The lessor, however, may not unreasonably disrupt the Government's use and enjoyment of the leased premises in the course of such maintenance, but may, at reasonable times, enter the leased premises to perform its maintenance duties with the approval of the authorized Government official.

The full service requirement of a Government lease is distinctively different than a triple net private sector lease. In a Government lease, in addition to rent, the Government pays for all taxes, insurance, and maintenance costs attributable to its use of the leased premises. Also, in a Government lease, in addition to its responsibility to maintain the common areas and base building systems of the building, the lessor is responsible for the maintenance of the leased premises.

[20.21] 2. Fire and Casualty Damage Clause

If the building in which the premises is located is totally destroyed or damaged by fire or other casualty, the lease shall immediately terminate. However, if the building is only partially destroyed or damaged, so as to render the premises untenable or not usable for its intended use, the lessor has the option to repair (in a period not to exceed 270 days) or restore the premises or terminate the lease. If the Lessor elects to restore, and submits within 60 days of the destruction of the premises, a reasonable schedule for repair of the premises, the Government may not terminate the lease. During the time that the leased premises are unoccupied, rent will be abated.

[20.22] 3. Default By Lessor Clause (Right of Rent Setoff)

As a product of the 2010 GSA Lease Reform Initiative, the Failure in Performance and the Default in Delivery clauses have been consolidated into this new clause. The new clause distinguishes between conditions that shall constitute default by the lessor either before or after acceptance of the premises and sets forth what grounds are necessary to provide the basis for the Government to terminate the lease. Before acceptance, subject to Government notice of default with a reasonable opportunity to cure, a failure by the lessor to diligently perform all obligations required for acceptance of the premises will constitute a default. After acceptance, and also subject to Government notice of default with a reasonable opportunity to cure, a failure of the lessor to perform any service, to provide any item, or satisfy any requirement of the lease shall constitute a default of the lessor and Government has the option of performing the service, providing the item or obtaining satisfaction of the requirement using its own employees or contractors. In the event the Government elects to exercise this option, the Government may deduct from any payment under the lease an amount that reflects the reduced value of the contract requirement not performed.

Lastly, the clause defines the defaults that will provide the grounds for the Government to terminate the lease. Essentially, the grounds include (1) persistent failure of the lessor to cure the deficiency or (2) lessor's failure to take actions necessary to prevent the reoccurrence of the default conditions and such conditions substantially impair the safe and healthful occupancy of the premises or render the premises unusable for its intended purpose.

The clause also specifies the circumstances that constitute an excuse to non-performance under this section.

[20.23] 4. Alterations Clause

This General Clause allows the Government to make alterations and building system connections in the leased premises, and gives the Government the option to remove or leave alterations in the leased premises at the end of the term of the lease, at its discretion. Unlike the customary provisions in private sector leases, this clause allows the Government to make alterations to the structure of the leased building and tie into the building systems without first obtaining the lessor's consent.

[20.24] 5. Delivery and Condition Clause

This General Clause provides that the lessor must deliver the leased premises ready for occupancy as a complete unit, unless the Government elects to occupy the leased premises in increments.

[20.25] 6. Acceptance of Space and Certificate of Occupancy Clause

The Government reserves the right to determine when the leased premises are substantially complete and the space shall only be considered substantially complete if the space may be used for its intended purpose and completion of the remaining work will not unreasonably interfere with the Government's enjoyment of the space.

This is different from usual provisions in private sector leases because it allows the Government to determine when the improvements are substantially complete, thereby triggering the payment of rent. In most instances in the private sector, the commencement of rent is specified by the terms of the lease, or, if based on substantial completion of the improvements, a third party (architect or construction manager) will determine when the leased premises are substantially complete.

[20.26] 7. Changes Clause

The Changes Clause has also been amended as product of the GSA Lease Reform Initiative. Essentially, this clause allows the Government to unilaterally direct changes in three defined categories without the risk of breaching the lease. The contracting officer may at any time, by written order, direct changes to the (1) tenant improvements with the space, (2) building security requirements or (3) services required under the lease. The procedure for determining the compensation due to the lessor for changes is found in the Proposal for Adjustment Clause. If the parties are unable to agree on the compensation for the requested change, the Disputes Clause specifies a procedure for resolution of disputed claims. Claims for other entitlements under a Government lease are also handled pursuant to the Disputes Clause.

[20.27] 8. Substitution of Tenant Agency Clause

This General Clause permits the Government to substitute any Government agency or agencies for the tenant agency or agencies named in the lease.

[20.28] 9. Examination of Records by GSA Clause

For three years beyond the expiration of the lease, the Government may inspect and review the lessor's records pertaining to the leased premises and the lease.

[20.29] 10. Audit and Records—Negotiations Clause

This General Clause is a similar provision to the Examination of Records by GSA Clause discussed above. For cost-reimbursement, incentive, time-and-materials, labor-hour, or price redeterminable type contracts, this clause grants the Contracting Officer, or its authorized representative, the authority to examine and audit all records and other evidence related to costs incurred, or anticipated to be incurred, under the lease. The lessor must include all of the terms of this clause in subcontracts exceeding $100,000 if the subcontract is a cost-reimbursement, incentive, time and materials, labor-hour, or price redeterminable type; if the subcontract requires cost or pricing data; or if the subcontract requires the subcontractor to furnish cost, funding, or performance reports.

[20.30] E. Socio-Economic Clauses Establishing Affirmative Duties and Reporting Requirements[20.31] 1. Equal Opportunity Clause

This General Clause requires lessors to agree not to discriminate and contains a regular reporting requirement for lessors of space to the Government. This clause implements Executive Order 11246 and requires compliance with the regulations, rules, and orders set forth by the Secretary of Labor at 41 C.F.R. part 60-1 et. seq. These regulations prohibit the lessor from discriminating against any employee or applicant for employment because of race, color, religion, sex, or national origin, and require the lessor to take affirmative action to ensure that applicants are employed, and that employees are treated during employment, without regard to those characteristics. These regulations also require Government contractors/subcontractors having 50 or more employees and contracts of $50,000 or more to develop and maintain written affirmative action programs for each of their establishments.

The Department of Labor (DOL) is responsible for the oversight of this requirement and has issued guidelines for determining if a lessor/contractor will be subject to the requirements of an affirmative action plan. DOL uses a “single entity” test for this purpose, so offerors or lessors should carefully review this requirement. The lessor must, in all solicitations or advertisements for employees, state that all qualified applicants will be considered without regard to race, color, religion, sex, or national origin. This clause further requires the lessor to permit access to its leased premises by the tenant agency or the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs for the purpose of conducting on-site compliance evaluations, and that the lessor post, in conspicuous places, the notices provided by the Contracting Officer that explain this clause.

[20.32] 2. Prohibition of Segregated Facilities Clause

This General Clause prohibits the lessor from maintaining any segregated facilities at any of its establishments, or permitting its employees to perform their services at any location under its control where segregated facilities are maintained.

[20.33] 3. Pre-Award On-Site Equal Opportunity Compliance Evaluation Clause

The lessor and its first-tier subcontractors are subject to a pre-award review by the Office of Federal Contract Compliance Programs.

[20.34] 4. Affirmative Action for Disabled Veterans and Veterans of the Vietnam Era Clause

This General Clause prohibits the lessor from discriminating against an individual because such individual is a disabled veteran or a veteran of the Vietnam era. The lessor must take affirmative action to employ, advance in employment, and otherwise treat qualified disabled and Vietnam veterans without discrimination based upon their disability or veteran status in all employment practices. Furthermore, the lessor must post in conspicuous places the appropriate notices provided by the Contracting Officer that explain this clause, and must comply with the regulations, rules, and orders of the Secretary of Labor issued under the Vietnam Era Veterans' Readjustment Assistance Act of 1972. This includes regulations that may require the development of an affirmative action plan.

[20.35] 5. Affirmative Action for Workers with Disabilities Clause

This General Clause is similar to the Vietnam Era Clause, and prohibits the lessor from discriminating against any employee or applicant because of physical or mental disability. The lessor must take affirmative action to employ, advance in employment, and otherwise treat qualified individuals with disabilities without discrimination based upon their physical or mental disability in all employment practices. Furthermore, the lessor must post in conspicuous places the appropriate notices provided by the Contracting Officer that explain this clause, and must comply with the regulations, rules, and orders of the Secretary of Labor issued under the Rehabilitation Act of 1973. This includes regulations that may require the development of an affirmative action plan.

[20.36] 6. Small Business Subcontracting Plan Clause

If the lessor is a large business, this General Clause requires the submission and implementation of a small business subcontracting plan along with the submission of two reports on a semiannual or annual basis depending on the report and the contracting agency. The Small Business Administration is responsible for the issuance of guidance for ascertaining if a lessor qualifies as a small business. Lessors should carefully review this guidance because control by affiliates may impact this determination. A separate Liquidated Damages Clause provides for the imposition of liquidated damages for failure to make a good faith effort to implement the subcontracting plan required by this clause.

[20.37] 7. Reporting Executive Compensation and First-Tier Subcontract Awards Clause

This new clause was included in the General Clauses in 2012 and essentially requires the lessor to include in its annual registration requirement in the Central Contractor Registration database the names and compensation of each of the five most highly compensated executives for the preceding completed fiscal year if it meets the specified income threshold from federal contracts and the information is not otherwise publicly available.

[20.38] VII. HANDLING LEASE ADMINISTRATION ISSUES

Pursuant to the express terms of a Government lease, the parties agree to pursue resolution of all disputes arising under the terms of the lease either as provided for by the terms of the lease or pursuant to the Contract Disputes Act of 1978, 41 U.S.C. §§ 601–613 (the CDA). Typically, this is either a request of the lessor for equitable adjustment or, under the Disputes Clause, pursuing a formal claim under the CDA.

As previously mentioned, the Changes Clause allows the Government (acting through the Contracting Officer) to direct changes, such as in regard to: (1) specifications (including drawings and designs); (2) work, services, or equipment; (3) facilities or space layout; or (4) the amount of space. These changes may impact the lessor's performance costs or the time required for performance, in which case the Contracting Officer must provide appropriate relief, such as: (1) modifying the delivery date; (2) equitably adjusting the rental rate; (3) making a lump sum equitable adjustment; and/or (4) equitably adjusting operating costs. Thus, the lessor is entitled to a reasonable equitable adjustment to account for the impact of the Government-imposed change.

Unfortunately, lessors are not always successful in efforts to informally reach an agreement for equitable relief. An aggrieved lessor may therefore need to pursue a more formal means of obtaining relief. The CDA allows a lessor to make a written demand to the Contracting Officer for relief as a matter of right. This written demand is known as a “claim” and the CDA requires that the claim seek the payment of a sum-certain amount of money, the adjustment or interpretation of contract terms, or other relief relating to the lease. To best ensure success of the lessor’s claim, the lessor should include relevant documentary proof reflecting the changes and their cost impact. Notably, any claim for more than $100,000 must be certified by an authorized person to have been made in good faith, upon supporting data that are accurate and complete to the best of the lessor’s knowledge and belief, and for an amount of money that accurately reflects the adjustment for which the lessor believes the Government is liable.

Following receipt of a claim, the Contracting Officer has sixty days to render a written final decision that explains the rationale for the decision reached. This final decision may grant the relief sought in whole or in part, or deny the claim altogether. If the Contracting Officer fails to issue a final decision within the 60-day time frame, the lessor may treat the claim as deemed denied. In any event, the lessor must continue to diligently perform its obligations under the lease pending resolution of its claim.

Lessors are often disappointed and surprised by a Contracting Officer’s final decision. If the lessor is dissatisfied with the Contracting Officer’s final decision, the lessor may appeal the final decision to the Civilian Board of Contract Appeals or the U.S. Court of Federal Claims. Although the Government is supposed to pursue resolution of a claim by mutual agreement if possible, appealing a claim is commonly required to achieve a fair resolution.

[20.39] VIII. GOVERNMENT HOLDOVER IN LEASED SPACE

The standard GSA lease does not contain a holdover provision, nor will the Government in customary circumstances consider the inclusion of one. Consequently, although the Government is obligated to vacate the leased premises, pursuant to the implied covenant to vacate the premises at the expiration of a lease, as a matter of federal contract law, the ability of a lessor to evict a lessor is essentially not available. If a federal tenant fails to vacate the premises, an action against the Government for damages (pursuant to the Contract Disputes Act) based on the Government's breach of the implied covenant to vacate is essentially the lessor's only remedy. In the absence of action taken by either party to challenge the continued occupancy, federal case law has established that the Government's continued occupancy becomes a month to month tenancy under the same terms and conditions of the lease prior to expiration of the lease.¹¹

Typically, when a lease is due to expire and the parties have not agreed to an extension, the Government may seek the lessor's consent to a stand-still agreement that provides the tenant agency with a legal right to remain in possession of the leased premises subject to the lessor's remedies as of the lease's expiration. Alternatively, should the parties fail to agree to such terms, the Government, as the Sovereign, may pursue in U.S. District Court the condemnation of a leasehold interest.

[20.40] IX. GREENING OF GSA LEASES

GSA promotes energy efficiency and sustainability in all of its leases. GSA's Green Lease Policies and Procedures for Lease Acquisition (Realty Services Letter, RSL-2007-12) (the "Green Lease Policies") is the primary document that outlines the energy and environmental leasing requirements for GSA leases and the implementation thereof.

The green lease paragraphs listed in the attachments to the Green Lease Policies apply to all real property leasing activities and address, among other things: (1) re-use of building materials; (2) maintenance of indoor air quality during construction; (3) use of recyclable and recycled content products required by the EPA's Comprehensive Procurement Guidelines; and (4) use of environmentally-preferable building products and materials.

¹¹ Modeer v. United States, 68 Fed. Cl. 131, 141-143 (2005).

Also under the Green Lease Policies, all lease construction and major lease renovation projects of 10,000 rentable square feet and above where the Government is the sole occupant of the entire building, with the exception of retail space, must achieve a Leadership in Energy and Environmental Design (LEED) for New Construction Silver rating. In addition, the requirement for the tenant space to achieve a LEED for Commercial Interiors Certified rating is optional and available for use when specifically requested by a customer agency. If the lessor fails to achieve the required LEED certification within the stated time frame, the Government may assist the lessor in implementing a corrective action program to achieve the required LEED certification and deduct its costs (including administrative costs) from the rent.

Furthermore, the Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007 states that, with limited exceptions, Federal agencies may only lease space in buildings that have earned the Energy Star label (or for new construction, the building must be projected to earn the Energy Star label) within the most recent year (i.e., not more than one year prior to the lease award date), which mandate is implemented by GSA's Realty Services Letter RSL-2010-2. All leases where the anticipated award date is on or after December 19, 2010, must include (and in the case of existing leases, be amended to include) the lease paragraphs relating to such mandate that are listed in RSL-2010-2. In addition, if a building will not have an Energy Star label in accordance with one of the limited exceptions in the Energy Independence and Security Act of 2007, the lessor must, nevertheless, renovate the space for all energy efficiency and conservation improvements that would be cost effective over the life of the lease.

CHAPTER TWENTY-ONE

LEASES WITH NEW YORK STATE

Lloyd S. Lowy, Esq.

[21.0] I. INTRODUCTION

This Section addresses leases of commercial space to New York State. While many of the concerns that arise in New York State leasing transactions are no different than those that arise in a lease between private parties, the State's contracting authority and conduct are subject to legal and practical constraints that do not apply to private sector entities. This Section focuses on the issues that arise because the State is the lessee in the lease transaction.

It is important to note at the outset that there is a difference between a lease with New York State or one of its agencies and a lease with a New York State public authority. The State and its constituent agencies, such as the Department of Labor, comprise a sovereign governmental entity. New York State authorities, such as Empire State Development Corporation and the New York State Thruway Authority, act as instrumentalities of the State but are separate legal entities created by statute. While leasing transactions with State authorities can pose many of the same or similar issues as transactions with the State, there are some important differences. The scope of this section is limited to leases with New York State and its constituent agencies.

Under the Public Buildings Law, the Commissioner of General Services (referred to herein as the "Commissioner" or "OGS") is vested with the authority to enter into leases to provide space for the departments, commissions, boards and officers of the State government, subject to limited exceptions for certain types of special facilities.¹ As a general matter, the Commissioner's staff will require that the OGS form of lease be used.² In some instances, where the transaction is substantial, landlords have been able to use their own form, subject to modification to address a number of specific State issues.

1 See Public Buildings Law § 3 for the exceptions (e.g., buildings that form a part of the State University and mental hygiene facilities). Note, however, that even where another State agency is acting on behalf of the State, many of the substantive issues discussed in this chapter will still apply.

2 The OGS form of lease can be found in the "Real Estate" tab of the New York State Office of General Services website (the "OGS Website") by going to the "Leasing Services" section and clicking on any of the specific procurement hyperlinks.

[21.1] II. GENERAL MATTERS

[21.2] A. Necessary Approvals

Under § 112 of the State Finance Law, leases entered into by the Commissioner involving rent in excess of $85,000 must be approved by the State Comptroller in order to be binding on the State. The dollar threshold applies over the term of the lease, not on an annual basis. As a practical matter, almost all leases of real estate are submitted to the Comptroller for approval. The Comptroller's review is limited to approval or disapproval of the lease; it is not permitted to modify the lease terms.³

The statute requires that the Comptroller make its determination within ninety days after the lease has been submitted unless the Comptroller notifies the applicable State agency or department—e.g., OGS—that it needs an extension of time, which is not to exceed fifteen days unless the affected agency agrees. A failure to comply with these time limits does not, however, result in approval being deemed given.⁴ In addition, neither the State's occupancy of the premises to be leased nor its acceptance of other landlord services prior to receipt of the Comptroller's approval will estop the State from denying liability if the Comptroller's approval is not obtained.⁵

The State reads § 112 very broadly and the courts have largely supported this approach. As a result, lease amendments also require approval by the Comptroller,⁶ as do extensions of previously approved leases.⁷ There is authority suggesting that the exercise of a renewal right strictly in accordance with the terms of a renewal right set forth in a lease originally approved by the Comptroller might not require further approval.⁸ If there is a modification of any of the renewal terms, however, then an additional approval is required.⁹ While there does not seem to be any authority on point, the thrust of the cases suggests that if the renewal option requires the determination of fair market rent, then its exercise will likely require Comptroller approval.¹⁰ As a practical matter, the State will generally take the position that its exercise of a renewal option is not binding until the Comptroller has approved it.

Note also that both OGS and the Comptroller look to the Attorney General for legal guidance, so all leases must also be approved as to form by the Attorney General.

[21.3] B. Standard Clauses

The Attorney General has promulgated a series of “Standard Clauses For New York State Contracts” which are to be contained in an attachment to each lease and are known as “Appendix A.” The current form of Appendix A can be found on the OGS Website. These clauses should be reviewed early in the transaction. Many of them will not be controversial for most landlords—e.g., the prohibition on purchase of tropical hardwoods and the certification that the landlord is not a prohibited entity under the New York State Iran Divestment Act. Others, however, are quite substantive and overlap the corresponding provision in the State’s form of lease. Section 13 of Appendix A provides that in the event of a conflict between the lease itself and the Appendix, the Appendix will govern.

Certain of the clauses in Appendix A are either statutorily required or merely incorporate statutory legal requirements that would apply regardless of whether they were included in the lease.¹¹ These cannot be deleted or modified—and even if they were, that would not vitiate the effect of applicable law. Other provisions reflect State policy positions. While these too are typically not negotiable, under certain circumstances modifications may be possible. Note, however, that OGS will not agree to any modifications to Appendix A without the approval of the Attorney General’s Office. As a result, modifications to Appendix A should be viewed as very much the exception.

[21.4] C. Remedies; Court of Claims

New York State enjoys sovereign immunity from suit except to the extent expressly waived.¹² As a result, enforcement of legal remedies under a lease with the State requires attention to the special requirements for bringing an action against the State. A comprehensive discussion of those requirements is beyond the scope of this chapter; however, certain basic tenets are noted below.

Section 8 of the Court of Claims Act (the “Act”) contains a limited waiver of the State’s sovereign immunity.¹³ Any action for a money judgment against the State must be brought in the Court of Claims and is subject to the procedural requirements contained in the Act.¹⁴ Since the waiver of immunity is subject to compliance with these requirements they have been construed to be jurisdictional.¹⁵ Among the conditions for prosecuting a claim for breach of contract is either the filing, and service upon the Attorney General, of a claim within six months of its accrual, or the service upon the Attorney General within such time period of a notice of intention to file a claim. If a notice of intention is filed, then the claim itself must be filed within two years thereafter.¹⁶ Under the Act the court may, in its discretion, allow a claim even if the Attorney General was not timely served as long as the claim is not otherwise time barred.¹⁷ Note, however, that ongoing negotiations will not excuse the late filing of a claim under the Act.¹⁸

The Court of Claims jurisdiction is limited to money judgments, with only limited authority to order equitable relief incidental to a claim for money damages.¹⁹ As a result, actions to recover possession must be brought in the court of applicable jurisdiction.²⁰ Landlords therefore potentially face the prospect of having to prosecute parallel actions in order to recover both possession and money damages.²¹

A final note on remedies and sovereign immunity—OGS takes the position that arbitration is not an available dispute resolution mechanism unless arbitration has been specifically authorized for a particular purpose by statute, as it would otherwise conflict with the conditions under which the State has waived its sovereign immunity. There is a clause to this effect in Appendix A.²² There is, however, a decision by the Court of Appeals holding that if an arbitration clause were included in a duly approved lease it would be enforceable notwithstanding the general principle that a contracting officer does not have the authority to waive the State’s sovereign immunity.²³

[21.5] III. SPECIFIC ISSUES

[21.6] A. Tenant Versus Occupying Agency

OGS is responsible for providing space for the State and, subject to certain exceptions, its various departments, commissions, boards and officers. OGS procures space from private landlords in order to provide for the needs of a particular occupant, which will be identified in the lease as the “Occupying Agency.” However, the “tenant” under the lease will be The People of the State Of New York, acting by and through the Commissioner of General Services. A consequence of this is that the lease will expressly provide for the right of the Commissioner to substitute other State bureaus, agencies or departments for the initially identified Occupying Agency. A landlord may therefore find at some point that a different State agency will be occupying the leased space.

For many properties the landlord will be indifferent to a change in occupant—the State remains the credit and from an economic perspective little has changed.²⁴ For some properties, however, such as certain kinds of office buildings, the landlord may be concerned that its tenant could change from a generic state administrative office to one that is perceived as less desirable or even adverse to the landlord's interests in maintaining a certain class of building, such a parole office or an office that attracts a high level of off-the-street traffic.

OGS will not generally give up its right to reallocate leased space among State users. Depending on the size of the transaction, however, OGS may agree to limitations on certain uses that effectively limit the right to reallocate the space and that otherwise protect the landlord's interest in maintaining the character of the building.

Sometimes OGS will seek space with the intention of housing multiple agencies in the space from the outset. Where this is the intention OGS may require a separate lease for each agency or department. This simplifies lease administration for OGS and provides for greater clarity should any appropriations issues arise.²⁵

[21.7] B. Lease Term

The State is limited by statute to lease terms of ten years or less, although a lease term of up to fifteen years is permitted if the Commissioner determines that a longer term is in the best interests of the State. The lease may provide for renewal terms of ten years or less at the option of the State. Note that, like the initial lease, renewals must be approved by the State Comptroller and the Attorney General.²⁶

[21.8] C. Audit Rights

The State lease form provides for broad audit rights on behalf of OGS as well as the State Comptroller and the Attorney General. Notably, these rights are not limited to the basis for expense escalations but rather extend to all information relevant to landlord's performance under the lease. This broad access for the Comptroller is derived from the New York State Constitution and cannot be eliminated.²⁷ As a practical matter, OGS will rou-

24 Arguably, one agency might pose a greater risk of non-appropriation than another. In most instances, however, quantifying the relative risk of this will be largely speculative. See Section III. D. infra.

26 See Section II.B, supra.

27 NYS Constitution, art. V, § 1.

tinely audit lease expense escalations. The exercise by OGS or the Comptroller of the State's broader audit rights, however, is not frequently exercised.

In addition to the typical landlord concerns about allowing tenants to audit their books and records, one concern that landlords may have in providing financial information to the State is the possibility that sensitive information will become available to third parties pursuant to requests under the Freedom of Information Law (FOIL).²⁸ Under the "Records" clause of Appendix A the State agrees to take reasonable steps to protect confidential information from public disclosure to the extent permitted under FOIL, provided that the landlord notifies the State to do so and identifies the information to be protected.²⁹

[21.9] D. Subject to Appropriation

Every lease with the State will have a clause providing that the State's executory obligations are subject to the appropriation of funds for payment of the rent by the State Legislature. A typical formulation of such a clause is as follows:

As required by law, this Lease shall be deemed executory only to the extent of the monies available to the Tenant or the Occupying Agency for the leasing of said Premises and no liability shall be incurred by the State beyond the monies available for such purpose. Notwithstanding the foregoing, if the monies available therefore are monies appropriated for and made available to one or more departments, commissions, boards or officers other than the Tenant or the Occupying Agency, this Lease shall be deemed executory only to the extent of the monies available to the one or more departments, commissions, boards, or officers to which the Premises shall be allotted by the Commissioner and no liability in such cases shall be incurred by the State beyond the monies available for such purposes.³⁰

28 Public Officers Law, art. 6.

29 See Public Officers Law § 87; N.Y.S. Office of General Services, Standard Clauses for New York State Contracts, Appendix A, p. 10, <https://ogs.ny.gov/BU/RE/Leases/Docs/OGSlobby-LawForm.pdf>.

30 See also Appendix A, ¶ 1.

The effect of this provision, which is often referred to as the “executory clause” or “subject to appropriation clause,” is that if, at any time during the term of the lease, the State—e.g., OGS or the Occupying Agency - does not have money that is legally “available” for the payment of rent, it is excused from the ongoing rent obligation and the lease is effectively terminated. This raises several points that landlord and its counsel must understand:

First, this concept is legally required and may not be waived or eliminated. Section 41 of the State Finance Law prohibits any State officer or entity from contracting any obligation on behalf of the State in excess of money appropriated or otherwise available. The purpose of this statute is to address concerns that contracts would otherwise constitute State debt entered into in violation of Article VII of the New York Constitution. To further protect the State’s interest on this issue, § 3(12) of the Public Buildings Law requires that every lease contain a provision to this effect.

Second, the concept of “available” is tied to the legislative budgeting and appropriations process, and not the mere convenience of OGS or any particular Occupying Agency.³¹ As a result, while this provision may be invoked to terminate leases in connection with substantive changes to a department, such as modifying or reducing its operations, it may not be invoked by OGS or an Occupying Agency to prematurely terminate a lease merely to facilitate relocating an office to another location.³² The non-availability of funds must result from a legislative or budgetary determination. As one court put it, the executory clause is to be utilized as a shield against imprudent use of tax payer dollars . . . [but not] . . . as a sword to divorce the State for its own convenience from contracts fairly entered into and honestly performed.³³

Third, in the event that non-appropriation is invoked, the lease is effectively terminated with all that implies. In the event that the State fails to vacate the leased premises, the lack of available appropriated funds does not bar the landlord from recovering payment for use and occupancy.³⁴ As discussed above, however, any such claim must be brought in the Court of Claims, while an action for possession must be brought in the court of applicable jurisdiction.³⁵

Tenant's counsel will sometimes try to negotiate the "subject to appropriation" language in an effort to maximize the chances that there will be "available" funds for the payment of rent. One common approach is to request a covenant by OGS, in all events, to seek an appropriation for rent.³⁶ Another approach is to seek agreement that, in the event there is no specifically applicable appropriation, the State will apply any other funds legally available for the payment of rent.

The State does not readily deviate from its standard language. Moreover, while there is authority suggesting, but not holding, that a breach of an agreement to seek an appropriation might give rise to a claim for damages,³⁷ presumably in order to recover damages for a breach a landlord would have to be able to show that the appropriation, if sought, would have been granted by the Legislature.³⁸ In addition, while there does not appear to be any case law at present, to the extent that a covenant to seek an appropriation purports to supersede the proper exercise of the State's budgetary discretion it may not be enforceable.³⁹

Finally, note that, in addition to the "subject to appropriation" provision, the State's form of lease contains a contractual termination right, 34 See SHLP Assocs. v. State of New York, 262 A.D.2d 548, 692 N.Y.S.2d 421 (2d Dep't 1999).

35 See Section II.C. supra and 88 S. Kensico Ave. v. People, 146 Misc. 2d 1037, 553 N.Y.S.2d 970 (City Ct., Westchester Co. 1990).

36 Note that there is case law suggesting that, separate and apart from any covenant, the State may have an implicit obligation to seek an appropriation to meet its contractual obligations, subject to the good faith exercise of its budgetary discretion. Compare Starling Realty Corp. v. State of New York, 286 N.Y. 272 (1941), rearg. denied, 286 N.Y. 696 (1941), with Drislane v. State of New York, 7 A.D.2d 141 (3d Dep't 1958); see also discussion in TM Park Avenue Assocs. v. Pataki, 986 F. Supp. 96 at 109, vacated and remanded on other grounds, 214 F.3d 344 at 349 (2d Cir. 2000).

37 See TM Park Ave. Assocs., 214 F.3d at 349. The court also notes that there may be an implicit duty on the part of the State to fulfill its obligations under the lease by seeking an appropriation regardless of whether there is an express covenant to do so, however this seems to be another way of inquiring whether the failure to seek an appropriation results from something other than a proper budgetary determination.

39 Id. ("... it could hardly be said that funds not necessary to a proper and efficient administration of the department would be 'money available for such purposes' ...").

regardless of whether funds are available. This provision is rooted in State business and policy determinations separate from the State's legal constraints.

[21.10] E. Janitorial Services

State agencies and authorities are under a mandate to establish policies and procedures to promote environmental sustainability and, to the maximum extent practicable, purchase “green” paper and janitorial products.⁴⁰ The State leases require that landlords cooperate in implementing these policies. Where a landlord is unwilling or unable to do so, the State may require that the Occupying Agency take over janitorial services for its space.

[21.11] F. Build Out and Alterations

The State is not well equipped to build out space in privately owned buildings and, if it were to do so, would need to go through its normal procurement procedures, which would in many instances be cumbersome in the context of a commercial building space lease. As a result it will require that the landlord perform the entire build out at the landlord's expense, subject to any limit provided for in the business terms of the deal, in accordance with the State's requirements and specifications. In addition, it will reserve the right to require the landlord to carry out most alterations, although where the alterations are at the State's request, or required of the State under the terms of the lease, the State will reimburse the landlord for the cost of the alterations. Note that even though this work is carried out for the State's occupancy, the result is considered a private improvement. As a result, it is not exempt from sales tax or mechanics' liens.

In all such instances the lease will require the landlord to submit plans, specifications and cost breakdowns for the State's approval, based on a layout and specifications submitted by the State. The lease will also establish a cap for the landlord's fees and profits on the job. Note also that pursuant to certain of the clauses in Appendix A, the landlord may be required to include certain provisions in its construction contracts.

⁴⁰ See Executive Order No. 4 of 2008 and the relevant portion of the OGS website, <https://www.ogs.ny.gov/EO/4/>.

[21.12] G. Repairs

The State requires landlords to maintain and repair the buildings in which the State leases space. In addition, it requires landlords to be generally responsible for repairs to the leased premises, except that the State will be responsible for repairs necessitated by acts or omissions of the Tenant. In some instances the State will also retain responsibility for specifically identified property, such as removable fixtures or special installations.

Regardless of the scope of the State's repair responsibility, for the reasons described in Section F above, it will typically retain the right to have the landlord actually carry out the repair at the State's expense.

[21.13] H. Right to Set-Off

Both the form of lease and Appendix A provide for a right of set-off in the event the landlord defaults. The Appendix A provision reserves all common law, equitable and statutory rights to set-off. The form of lease provides for notice to the landlord and a right of self-help, the costs of which may be deducted from rent, in the event the landlord fails to make repairs or perform services for which it is responsible. Alternatively, the form also allows the State to eschew self-help and simply deduct from its rent a "reasonable amount" for the diminution in value of the leased premises resulting from the lack of repair or failure to provide services.

While the State is concerned about protecting the public fisc against expenditures for which it is not receiving the full benefit of its bargain, this provision appears to be based on business and policy determinations by the State and not on specific legal mandates. As a result, in certain transactions it may be subject to negotiation.

[21.14] I. Subordination and Non-Disturbance

The form lease contains fairly basic subordination language, including the requirement for a non-disturbance agreement. It should be noted, however, that the typical lenders form of subordination, non-disturbance and attornment agreements with various successor landlord exculpations will likely be viewed as a modification of the lease and thus require approval by the Comptroller and the Attorney General, which may not be forthcoming. If the landlord or its lender follows that route it is important to submit the form requested as early as possible in order to allow adequate time for review. Alternatively, the parties can either include an agreed-upon form to the lease when it is submitted for the initial Comptroller approval or they may agree to use the State's then-current form.

[21.15] J. Non-Assignment

One of the most nettlesome issues for landlords who lease space to the State is the prohibition on assignments, transfers or other dispositions of the lease by the landlord, which is contained in every State lease. This prohibition derives directly from State Finance Law § 138 and cannot be avoided. It effectively requires State consent to any sale of the building and to any mortgage financing.⁴¹ There does not seem to be any direct authority on the issue of whether it also applies to a refinancing involving the assignment of a mortgage to which consent had previously been given.

A principal purpose of the statute, which applies to all procurements, is to allow the State to identify, at all times, those with whom it is doing business.⁴² Strictly construed, the statute requires the State to revoke or annul any contract assigned without its consent.

As a practical matter, the State will agree not to withhold its consent unreasonably. Landlords have in the past, and with mixed results, sought, at the time the lease was executed, to have the State consent to future financings and arms-length transfers. The State's current position, however, is that it will no longer do this due to its increased emphasis on the State's policy of knowing and vetting who it does business with. For similar reasons, it will not agree to mechanisms by which it can be deemed to have consented to a transaction.

Landlords seeking approval for a transaction should submit their request for approval as soon as possible in order to avoid potential delays to the transaction. The approval may require submission to the State Comptroller and the Attorney General. As part of the submission the landlord will need to submit certain information relating to the proposed transferee, including whether it has been the subject of a prior "non-responsibility" determination⁴³ and whether it is a registered New York State vendor.

41 The assignment of a right to receive payment under a State lease does not require State consent. Peets Motors v. New York, 147 Misc. 218, 263 N.Y.S. 762 (Sup. Ct., Franklin Co. 1933); see also 1943 N.Y. Op. Atty. Gen. 111, 1943 WL 54037.

42 See, e.g., Penn York Constr. Corp. v. State of New York, 92 A.D.2d 1087, 462 N.Y.S.2d 80 (3d Dep't 1983).

43 See State Finance Law §§ 139-j, 139-k.

Foreclosing mortgagees and bidders at foreclosure are also subject to the consent requirement. As a practical matter, notwithstanding the language of the statute this typically occurs following the foreclosure. Note, though, that until the approval has been received the new landlord/assignee may have trouble collecting the rent, since the Comptroller's office will not have a record of the approved transfer.

State Finance Law § 138 contains language permitting the waiver of prior consent to an assignment where it arises in connection with a merger or reorganization. The State will not typically grant such a waiver in advance, however, where there is no change in control then the new entity typically is required only to update certain information on file with the Comptroller for purposes of facilitating payment (e.g., its federal employer identification number). Where a change in control occurs, the merger or reorganization will be viewed as an assignment requiring consent and the submission of an assignment request, including vendor responsibility information.

[21.16] K. Late Payment of Rent

Under article 11-A of the State Finance Law the State is required to make timely payment of its obligations. In circumstances where payment is not made within thirty days after it is due the State is obligated to pay interest at the rate determined by statute.⁴⁴ As a result, the State will not agree to other late payment penalties.

[21.17] L. Indemnity

The State form does not contain the typical indemnity language. OGS will resist any such language that, in its view, could be construed as broadening the scope of the State's liability for damages under the lease. In the event the point becomes negotiated any language will likely reflect the need for a Court of Claims judgment and an appropriation of funds for payment and will be limited to acts or omissions of State employees acting within the scope of their employment. As a result, landlords should expect to rely on insurance directly for matters that are typically the subject of indemnification.

⁴⁴ See State Finance Law § 179-g.

[21.18] M. Insurance

The State form imposes extensive insurance requirements on the landlord, including a requirement to provide evidence of workers compensation coverage. The latter is required under Workers Compensation Law § 220 and State Finance Law § 142.

The State will not generally agree to purchase third-party insurance but will instead elect to self-insure. Depending on the transaction, however, it may be possible to require that the State obtain third-party commercial coverage. One implication when the State does self-insure is that they will not generally agree to a mutual waiver of subrogation.

[21.19] N. Holdover and Other Damages

The State does not typically agree to holdover rent or liquidated damages in the event of a lease termination for default, although these may be matters for negotiation. Where the State does holdover, the landlord may seek use and occupancy damages.⁴⁵ The basis for any such claim is trespass and unjust enrichment. Accordingly, landlords should be careful in accepting the continued payment of the previously payable rent, as at least one court has construed that as evidence of consent to the State's continued occupancy and, therefore, inconsistent with a claim for unjust enrichment.⁴⁶

[21.20] O. Security Deposit

As noted above in § 21.16, "Late Payment of Rent," under Article 11-A of the State Finance Law, the State has a statutory obligation to make timely payments under its contracts. As a result it, will not agree to deliver a security deposit.⁴⁷

[21.21] IV. CONCLUSION

Leases with New York State are subject to legal and practical parameters that are not present in leases with private sector entities. Counsel for 47 The State also argues that, under § 179-f(2)(f) of the State Finance Law, it does not have the ability to deliver a security deposit because it would not be payment for goods or services that have been delivered. There do not, however, appear to be any cases confirming that construction of the statute.

landlords in these transactions need to understand the special rules and considerations that apply to the State so they can properly assess and address the risks to their clients without devoting undue time and effort to issues that are inherent in State leasing transactions.

CHAPTER TWENTY-TWO

LEASE TRANSACTIONS WITH THE CITY OF NEW YORK

Leonard M. Wasserman, Esq.

[22.0] I. THE “WAITING-PERIOD”: PATIENCE AND ACCOMMODATION

This chapter will be dedicated primarily to issues peculiar to leases with the City of New York (the “City”). Real estate transactional lawyers negotiating deals involving space and ground leases with the City should be aware of the features in such leases—and the antecedent conditions precedent for the effectiveness of such leases—which may resonate with idiosyncratic transactional significance for their clients.

[22.1] A. ULURP and 195

In order for the City to execute a lease with a private party, either a “lease-in” or a “lease-out,” the City must establish its authority to do so. The foundational condition to such authority is established by the City’s following the protocols and procedures required by section 197-c of the New York City Charter (the “Charter”), known as the Uniform Land Use Review Procedure or by the acronym ULURP. ULURP requires that, in order for the City to be authorized to lease out (viz., a disposition of real property) or lease in (viz., an acquisition of real property), the City must have received authorization therefor pursuant to ULURP. As a condition precedent to the commencement of ULURP, the City must first submit an application for such authorization to the New York City Department of City Planning (DCP). Such application must then be certified as complete by DCP in order to formally commence ULURP.

As per the New York City Charter, the ULURP process is required to be conducted within 150 days from DCP’s “certification” of the application as complete. During those 150 days, the certified ULURP application must be reviewed first by the Community Board in whose Community District the real property is located, then by the Borough President in whose Borough the Community District is located. The Community Board will have up to 60 days to complete its review, and the Borough President will enjoy a 30-day opportunity for he or she to do the same, after which, each of the Community Board and the Borough President must either recommend approval, approval with modifications or disapproval of the application for the City’s leasing-out or leasing-in. Thereafter, the New York City Planning Commission (CPC) will be entitled to up to 60 days to review and either authorize approval of the application, or authorize approval of the application with modifications or disapprove the application.

Upon the completion of CPC's action to authorize approval a lease, or approval of a lease with modifications, the City Council, pursuant to Section 197-d of the Charter, has the right to review and either endorse the approval, approve the application with modifications, or simply disapprove the application. The City Council has up to 50 days to act—provided it exercises its right to review the CPC's action by majority vote of the Council taken no later than 20 days after it has received notice of CPC's action with regard to the lease application—whatever the approval action theretofore taken by CPC may have been. (It should be noted, however, that if both the local Community Board and the Borough President recommend disapproval of the CPC's approval or approval with modifications, of the lease applied for, and the Borough President notifies the Council, within five days of the CPC's decision, that both he or she and the Community Board disapprove the application, the Council must review and take action on the decision of the CPC with regard to the authorization for the lease.)

The aforescribed ULURP process commonly takes about six months (though sometimes, not infrequently, longer) to complete after the application is first submitted to DCP. If one counts the maximum time periods within which each of the City governmental entities must take their respective actions with respect to the ULURP process, one observes that the post-ULURP-certification time period could aggregate up to 200 days. One should also note that there is no precise time period for DCP's preliminary review for certification purposes. Accordingly, in the case of any lease deal with the City, the private party involved, either as lessee or lessor, should be aware of the potential length of time that could pass before City authorization might be achieved.

The one exception to this requirement for ULURP authorization for a proposed lease involving the City as a party is a proposed office lease with the City as tenant (see section 195 of the Charter). The process for approval and authorization of such a lease, as an alternative to ULURP, is a comparatively expeditious review and authorization process pursuant to section 195 of the Charter for leases-in to the City as tenant, for office use purposes. If City agencies believe they need office space, the agency authorized to arrange for such space (usually the New York City Department of Citywide Administrative Services or DCAS) may submit to DCP a "notice of intention" to acquire such space. DCP then proceeds to send a copy of the notice of intention to the local Community Board and to all five Borough Presidents and, within thirty days of the receipt of the notice of intent, DCP must hold a hearing and act to either approve or disapprove the proposed acquisition.

The submission of the notice of intent and the review thereof must also take into account the requirements and criteria of section 203 of the Charter—the so-called “Fair Share” criteria for the “fair” distribution around the City of facilities providing municipal services, “fairness” to be measured in terms of both the benefit and the burden the new space imposes on the local community. Very importantly, following approval by DCP within the 30-day period, the City Council may, within 20 days of any such approval, vote to disapprove the proposed lease for office space. The council presumably would disapprove because of a perceived unfairness to the interests of the community, or other communities, in the application of the Fair Share criteria.

In any event, the Section 195 procedure, while much abbreviated from the 197-c ULURP, nonetheless could consume up to 50 days. So, in short, a lease deal with the City, be it a lease of space by the City from others or from the City to others, must accommodate an opportunity for the submissions, reviews and approvals described above. As indicated, the time periods for obtaining the necessary approvals may extend from up to 50 days for office leases to the City as lessee out to up-to 200 days (not counting the DCP pre-certification period) for any other leases in or out.

Accordingly, whenever the City approaches a proposed landlord to rent space, or a prospective lessee is negotiating with the City to lease space, the parties must build into their expectations the time necessary to comply with these conditions precedent to any lease deal. Until these conditions precedent have been satisfied, the lease cannot be executed. It should also be noted, in terms of anticipated time lags, that what constitutes “office space” is construed very strictly. So, for example, space sought by the City for lease in an office building to accommodate courtroom facilities, which certainly is the case in a number of boroughs, would not be treated as a notice of intent to lease office space. The leasing thereof by the City would therefore be subject to the further burden of a full ULURP rather than to the far more abbreviated Charter Section 195 process. The same is true, for example, with respect to relatively modest medical care facilities or educational facilities. They would simply not be treated as office space. In either case, office or any other use, a lease deal with the City imposes these required legislatively prescribed and idiosyncratic waiting periods. For such reason, the astute practitioner would be well-advised to so inform his or her client before embarking down the road of a prospective lease deal with the City. Such advice would represent a mere caution, however, and certainly represents no reason to not do a deal, but the attorney should be aware of the “wait-period” challenge and make sure his client takes the wait-period into account as an ingredient in the transaction.

[22.2] B. SEQRA and CEQR

Furthermore, and producing even more governmental complication in what would seem, otherwise, to constitute a simple transactional event, lease approvals and authorizations, inasmuch as they are discretionary actions that may have an impact on the environment, must also be supported by an environmental review pursuant to the New York State Environmental Quality Review Act (SEQRA). In the City, SEQRA is implemented through a local regulatory scheme called City Environmental Quality Review (CEQR). In CEQR, the City undertakes to analyze the potential impact on the environment of its proposed leasing. In the case of a leasing-in for the provision of City services, in addition to the Fair Share evaluation, the City must analyze what the impacts of the new facility may be on the surrounding environment. So, for example, if the facility might produce substantially more foot traffic than what the existing real property generates, how that foot traffic might impact the local neighborhood would have to be taken into account. The possibility or likelihood of increased automobile or truck traffic would most certainly precipitate the need for serious review and analysis. Everyone involved in such a transaction hopes that any impacts shown will not indicate that there might be a potential for a “significantly adverse environmental impact,” as such an impact would necessitate the preparation of an Environmental Impact Statement—which can consume months. The wished-for vision of everyone is that the analysis will result in the felicitous “neg dec” or negative declaration, i.e., a declaration based upon competent environmental analysis that concludes that there is no substantial likelihood that the proposed lease would precipitate any significant adverse environmental impacts. Such analysis can consume as little as a few weeks, depending on the nature of the proposed use. If it is possible that the contemplated use can fit into what is called the “Type II” category, then no environmental analysis whatsoever is necessary. Type II lease projects are presumed by their nature to not implicate significant environmental impacts. So, for example, if the City is merely leasing space in an existing building for office use, and the same space was previously being used for office use, and no tenant fit-out work changing the configuration or character of the building is to be performed, the lease will be considered a Type II action.

Nevertheless, EIS or no EIS, except for Type II leaseholds, the necessity for CEQR review ineluctably extends the time period of the lease transaction. Satisfaction of CEQR, either by a “neg dec” or an EIS (if no Type II is indicated), is a necessary, and primary, condition to DCP’s certifying a ULURP application as complete. Accordingly, the time period to complete the CEQR, and the cost of preparing the environmental analysis, must be baked into the transactional process. If the landlord is not prepared to patiently accommodate the City’s need to satisfy all requirements necessarily antecedent to its executing a lease, the deal cannot be consummated. So, here, in lease deals with the City, patience is not merely a virtue. It is a sine qua non for successfully getting a lease deal with the City done.

[22.3] II. BUDGETARY CONSTRAINTS AND THE RENT OBLIGATION

In the case of leases-in for City use, the educated practitioner embarking upon a possible negotiation with the City on behalf of a landlord client should be aware of the following frequently demanded provision of a commercial lease transaction with the City as tenant. In a leasing-in deal, the City usually demands that there be included in the lease document an unequivocal right on the part of the City that the lease be terminable after the fifth year of the lease term at the City’s election. The basis for this request arises from the circumstance that the rent obligation under a lease is an operating expense of the City. For the City, this means that the rent obligation must be paid-for out of the City’s expense budget, with a line-item available for such purposes. Section 227 of the Charter prescribes, “No money shall be paid from any fund under the management of the City . . . except in pursuance of an appropriation by the [City] council.” Accordingly, rent must find a home in an expense budget appropriation for the fiscal year for which rent is sought to be paid. Nothing can be paid-for without an available budget appropriation.

Accordingly, the Charter restricts the extent to which agencies can spend money during a fiscal year to the annual budget appropriation for the line item, in our case “rent.” The lease provision for an option in the City, as tenant, to terminate the lease after the fifth lease year is the product of this concern that no money can be paid “except in pursuance of an appropriation.” The City Budget is adopted each year by the Council, usually in June. The City’s fiscal year is July 1 to June 30. The Budget for expense items, like rent, covers that year but, important for our present topic, that year only. (Capital appropriations can cover multiple years, but that is not the subject here.) Next year, a new Budget must be adopted. If the new budget does not include a line item which will be available for the rent, then rent cannot be paid. Although this limitation is rarely, if ever, a prominent concern in the city's lease administration process, nevertheless, the apprehension that in an ensuing year the Council may not appropriate sufficient funds to cover the rent in question leads the City, usually acting through DCAS, to do its best to hedge the deal with protections against the risk that the rent obligation incurred may, in the future, exceed the one-year expense budget appropriation. The termination-after-five-years clause is the transactional expedient designed to protect City agencies, at least to a modest extent, from running afoul of the spending constraints imposed by a future budget. If a lease has been executed for City use but, in an ensuing year, the funds to pay for rent do not materialize, the termination clause can be invoked—after the fifth year—so that the agency can free itself of that contractual obligation and not run afoul of the Charter constraint.

As a practical matter, this provision has not proven-itself to be overly inhibiting for the City in its efforts to negotiate and find space for its needs, because this idiosyncratic constraint has been recognized, understood and accepted by most of the commercial real estate community. Also, in order to protect City space leases, the agencies will structure their annual expense budget requests to accommodate the need to pay rent to their private landlords. The real estate community, insofar as it is aware of the issue, understands that the City seeks to maintain a reputation as a responsible and reliable tenant. The City also embodies a rather prime candidate for leasing-up space which may have been lying fallow on the real estate marketplace. Correspondingly, DCAS, as the City's real estate manager, recognizes that its ability to consensually negotiate for available commercial space within the real estate community in New York City is necessarily a product of maintaining a reputation for reliability as a tenant. Accordingly, while this is a curious lease provision that the practitioner should be aware of, i.e., the right to terminate after the fifth lease year, it nevertheless enjoys a place within the pantheon of municipally important lease clauses. The clause is, for marketplace purposes, largely recognized as driven by the Charter requirements and not as the product of overreaching by the City's real estate representatives. As such, it has largely become an accepted demand and is not ordinarily made the subject of furious negotiating clamor. While this clause usually will be demanded by the City in the negotiation for any commercial space, for the foregoing reasons, it is not a phenomenon that has historically given the real estate community tremendous agita when dealing with the City.

[22.4] III. THE PUBLIC AUCTION REQUIREMENT AND ITS ALTERNATIVES

Let us turn now to an aspect of a lease deal with the City that is implicated in any significant “leasing-out” deal, and that is the phenomenon of the requirement that sales and leases (dispositions) of City real property must be achieved, with but a few exceptions described below, through “public auction.” This requirement is prescribed in Section 384(b)(1) of the Charter. The simple meaning of it is understandable. If the City has surplus real property in its inventory, the Charter seeks to ensure its citizens that such property cannot simply be sold at bargain prices at the expense of the public fisc, either because of commercial improvidence or naiveté or because of an apprehension of the intrusive influence of “politically connected” individuals. So, therefore, how does the City negotiate major lease deals with private developers or users in light of this affirmative requirement of public auction? Why does the City not simply adhere to the expedient of conducting public auctions for available real property and take the highest price offered at the auction—and be content with it?

The answer is that surplus real property represents an opportunity for City leaders to promote major policy initiatives to make the City a better place to live. The highest bidder at an auction may simply seek to warehouse its purchase for a long term and wait for someone to come along and pay it a lot more money than it had paid the City for the property. Urban planning leadership within City government, however, may recognize certain properties as shining opportunities for salubrious and economically efficacious redevelopment to recharge a failing, sleepy or unproductive neighborhood and transfigure it into a booming success.

For example, in the last 20 years we have witnessed the remarkable success of the Forty-Second Street Redevelopment Project, the Metrotech Project in downtown Brooklyn, the Renaissance Plaza Project immediately next door to and across the street from Metrotech, and the Coney Island Project, which is attracting hundreds of thousands of vacationers and City residents seeking a satisfying beachfront recreational opportunity in New York City in the heat of the summer. Also in downtown Brooklyn we are watching how the Atlantic Center/Atlantic Terminal Project, together with the new Barclay Center development, is transforming a long sleepy neighborhood into a vibrant center of retail, office, cultural and residential life., accompanied by concomitant growth in employment opportunities and increased revenues to the City through increases in real property taxes and sales taxes in the surrounding neighborhoods. These are not project successes that have been achieved through public auction.

So, what gives rise to a right on the part of the City to negotiate large development lease transactions given the statutory constraint of 384(b)(1)? The answer is straightforward but must be understood by the real estate practitioner in order to successfully engage in a development lease transaction with the City. The answer, primarily, is Section 384(b)(4) of the Charter and Section 507.2(b)(2) of the New York State General Municipal Law. Section 384(b)(4) provides that the City may lease or sell real property directly to a specialized breed of New York State not-for-profit corporation called a local development corporation. The local development corporation (LDC) is a creature of Section 1411 of the New York State Not-for-Profit Corporation Law. Section 384(b)(4) provides that the Mayor may lease or sell real property of the City to an LDC “without competitive bidding and for such purpose or purposes and at such rental or for such price as may be determined by the Mayor to be in the public interest.”¹

Accordingly, and stated simply, the public auction requirement does not apply to sales or leases by the City to LDCs. Section 1411(a) articulates an LDC’s purposes as “the charitable and public purposes of relieving and reducing unemployment, promoting and providing for additional and maximum employment, bettering and maintaining job opportunities . . . carrying on scientific research for the purpose of aiding a community or geographical area by attracting new industry to the community or area by encouraging the development, or retention of an industry in the community or area” as well as lessening the burdens of government and acting in the public interest. As can be observed from the text of 1411(a), the primary purpose of LDCs is job creation and retention within a municipality. LDCs exist all over the State, and they may be privately formed or formed by municipalities, “which [municipalities] may cause such corporations to be incorporated....”

In 1966, the City caused an LDC to be incorporated—viz., the New York City Public Development Corporation (PDC). Its original purpose was to manage the City’s then emerging industrial parks built on City-owned land throughout the City. In the early years of the administration of Mayor Edward I. Koch, however, its mission was enlarged to undertake major urban redevelopment deals which the mayor envisioned as a vehicle to lift New York City out of the fiscal crisis which had strangled the local New York City economy in the 1970s. As a result, PDC became the vehicle through which many deals were, and continue to be, negotiated, documented and closed with private developers in order to achieve particularized economic development objectives—viz., the creation, expansion, and retention of jobs within New York City.

One must recognize, however, that the avoidance of public auction was not implicated in many of the major projects undertaken by PDC (Metrotech and the Atlantic Terminal projects, for example). Section 507.2(d)(2) of the New York General Municipal Law, known more popularly as the Urban Renewal Law, also provides a dispensation from the public auction requirement for City dispositions of real property; but dispensation can only be applied to designated sites within an Urban Renewal Area approved by the City Council.¹ It should just be noted that dispositions to private developers through 507.2(d)(2) are achieved directly from the City through the New York City Department of Housing Preservation and Development (HPD) rather than through the intermediary of an LDC.² Many of the major redevelopment projects of the 1980s and '90s were undertaken as urban renewal projects, or the New York State analogue—projects undertaken by the Empire State Development Corporation under the Urban Development Corporation Act.³ Nevertheless, NYCEDC has served, and continues to serve, as the professional development medium responsible to the City, under its annual “Master Contract with the City,” for managing the City’s interest in all of these economic development projects. (Residential development is the responsibility of the HPD, which also functions as the City’s Urban Renewal Agency.)

1 Notwithstanding the express dispensation from public auction set forth in Section 507.2, it should be noted that at least one appellate court has found that a municipality must be careful in negotiating and approving the price to be paid for urban renewal property. In Grand Realty Co. v. City of White Plains, 125 A.D.2d 639, 510 N.Y.S.2d 172 (2d Dep’t 1986), the Second Department found that the price to be paid for a particular piece of urban renewal land was so disproportionate to its value that it could be deemed to constitute a “Gift” in violation of the “Gifts and Loans” prohibition of Article VIII, Section 1 of the New York state Constitution (discussed further below in footnote 4), and therefore invalid and void under New York law. This case stands as a stark caution to municipalities and to private parties negotiating real estate deals with municipalities with respect to the negotiation of the rent or purchase price in connection with a disposition to an LDC or with respect to an urban renewal disposition. One cannot be too cavalier about the dispensation from public auction and the right of the City, for example, to lease its surplus real property for any rental or other price that the Mayor may deem to be in the public interest.

2 It should be noted that in 1991, PDC was merged with another City entity, the Financial Services Corporation, and the name of the merged entity was changed to the New York City Economic Development Corporation (NYEDC). Going forward, we will use NYCEDC as the reference instead of PDC, in order to be consistent with current understandings, local understandings since 1991.

3 See New York Urban Development Corporation Act, sections 2-16.

NYCEDC uses its power and authority under 384(b)(4) to negotiate, document and close most non-auction deals focused on real property owned by the City. For example, if the City owns property, the public use of which may have become obsolete or obsolescent and which is ripe for a redevelopment (think an old parking lot or garage), such languishing property could enjoy the potential to be redeveloped to invigorate the local economy, or even be co-located with or integrated into, a larger urban redevelopment project. NYCEDC enjoys the power to offer such a property for lease or sale to a private developer with the vision of achieving the salutary redevelopment of such land pursuant to a negotiated lease or sale deal with a qualified developer. The deal can be negotiated with a view to achieving the most desirable project which will benefit the community at large-- rather than merely to get the City the highest price for the property. Through NYCEDC, the City can arrange to obtain the necessary authorizations, prescribed by the Charter, for a 384(b)(4) “no public auction” lease. These authorizations are: (1) the approval by majority vote of the Borough Board (i.e., a Board composed of all the City Council members, the Borough President, and the Community Board Chairperson of the Community Board in which the project is located) in the borough in which the property is located and (2) the Mayor. Upon the obtaining of the last authorization, the Mayor’s, the deal theoretically has all the approvals it needs, and the City can sign the lease and deliver it to NYCEDC for assignment to the designated lessee or developer.

In practice, the lease is primarily negotiated between a designated lessee/developer and NYCEDC, but it is also thoroughly reviewed, and ultimately approved, by the Deputy Mayor for Economic Development, acting for the Mayor, and the New York City Law Department. The 384(b)(4) lease, in form, names NYCEDC as the lessee, as it is the conduit for the legislatively authorized avoidance of public auction. The post-assignment relationship will then be created between the ground lessee/developer and the City through an assignment of the lease from NYCEDC to the developer, who, thereupon, assumes the obligations under the lease. Such assignment from NYCEDC to the developer ordinarily occurs simultaneously with the closing of the conduit lease transaction between the City and NYCEDC. Notwithstanding that “direct transactional relationship” between the City and the developer, the practice has become over the years that NYCEDC is identified as the designated Lease Administrator for the City in connection with managing lease compliance by the lessee/developer. This designation is set forth, as a general matter, in the City’s Annual Contract (a public document available electronically) with NYCEDC, but the lessee/developer is notified of such role in either or all of the lease, the instrument of lease assignment or otherwise.

Notwithstanding that all the authorizations are in place, for waiting period purposes, however, the closing cannot take place for an additional ninety days following the Mayoral Authorization (and NYCEDC board approval) at the conclusion of the ULURP and 384(b)(4) process. This additional waiting period is the product of legislation enacted by Albany in 2005 and amended in 2009. That legislation, known as the Public Authorities Accountability Act (PAAA), is embodied in the New York Public Authorities Law (§§ 2800 et seq.). For real estate transaction purposes, including, for our purposes, commercial leases, private parties should be aware that Section 2897 of the Public Authorities Law mandates that a “public authority” prepare an “explanatory statement” of a “disposal by negotiation” of “any real property disposed of by lease if the annual estimated rent over the term of the lease is in excess of fifteen thousand dollars.”⁴ The PAAA requires that the “explanatory statement” so prepared be sent to the Public Authorities Accountability Board in Albany at least 90 days prior to any proposed disposition by a “public authority.”

In section 2 of the PAAA, an LDC is defined, for purposes of the PAAA, as a “public authority.” Therefore, the closing of a negotiated lease deal with an LDC (in New York City usually through the 384(b)(4) process with NYCEDC as the counter-party) cannot take place until 90 days have passed after the transmittal of the “explanatory statement” to Albany. The explanatory statement must also be accompanied by an appraisal showing fair market value or fair market rental value.⁵ After the 90 days pass, the deal can finally close.

Accordingly, lease deals with the City for City-owned real property, through NYCEDC as conduit in order to avoid public auction, must be planned so that the pre-closing period will include not only the block of time for the negotiation of the transaction and any necessary site-testing but also a parallel block of time to conduct the necessary CEQR analysis and certification into ULURP, the ULURP and the 384(b)(4) process (which, as a pragmatic matter, usually, but not necessarily, takes place after ULURP authorizations have been obtained). Then, on top of that, one must add on the PAAA 90-day waiting period after the submission to the State of the explanatory statement. In contradistinction, it is worth noting, however, that because municipalities are not defined as public authorities for PAAA purposes, leases for real property subject to an urban renewal plan can be closed more promptly after ULURP authorizations are in place. By reason of Section 507.2(d)(2) of the Urban Renewal Law, the lease transaction can be achieved directly from the City to the ground lessee/developer without the need for a 384(b)(4) authorization or the need to prepare an explanatory statement followed by the 90-day PAAA waiting period.

4 A “public authority” under the PAAA is defined to include a LDC. See Griffiss Local Dev. Corp. v. State of N.Y. Auth. Budget Office, 85 A.D.3d 1402, 925 N.Y.S.2d 712 (3d Dep’t 2011), lv. to appeal denied, 17 N.Y.3d 714, 933 N.Y.S.2d 655 (2011).

5 The PAAA legislation was enacted because of perceived, alleged abuses involving the disposition of real property owned by a public authority created by State statute.

With respect to commercial leases between the City and a private party, take note, as well, that lease dispositions of wharf property along the waterfront can also be accomplished without the need to comply with the PAAA. As in the case of Urban Renewal property, wharf property may be disposed of directly by the City, by lease, because such lease dispositions directly by the City, without public auction, are expressly authorized by Sections 1301.2(f) and (g) of the New York City Charter.⁶ A lease pursuant to 1301.2(f) can be achieved without ULURP by a three-fourth's vote of the City Council. This is because the 2(f) lease is limited to leases for "waterfront commerce" and "in furtherance of navigation." The premise for such approval by the Council without ULURP is that the use of wharf property for such purposes is not effecting any change to the established land use of the waterfront. Such uses are fundamentally the reasons such wharfs were built. 1301.2(g) leases, in contradistinction, are for any other uses. Accordingly, 1301.2(g) uses must be approved and authorized pursuant to ULURP—but the PAAA does not apply because the lease will be directly from the City as lessor.

The foregoing dispensations from the general requirement that City dispositions must be achieved through public auction, and not negotiation, are restricted in scope. Urban renewal development ground leases are, for the most part, implicated only in the case of very large-scale urban redevelopment projects where the city has usually acquired the disposition sites as part of an urban renewal plan—to remove blight or develop "low-income housing.”⁷ The Urban Renewal dispensation from public auction is, therefore, not applicable in the case of more surgical dispositions of City-owned surplus property. Similarly, 1301.2(f) and (g) lease dispositions are very narrow and apply only to wharf property directly along the City waterfront.

6 The statutory opportunity to lease wharf property embodies, as set forth in sections 1301.2(f) and (g) of the Charter, a special dispensation from the common law "public trust doctrine," which doctrine prohibits the "alienation" of waterfront property (as well as "parkland") under government control without express legislative dispensation. See Miller v. New York, 15 N.Y.2d 34, 255 N.Y.S.2d 78 (1964). A lease of "wharf property" would represent such an "alienation" and, therefore, would, be impermissible without an express legislative dispensation like 1301.2(f) or (g).

[22.5] IV. THE “PILOT”

A City lease deal may implicate the opportunity to “negotiate” certain annual real estate tax obligations. This feature stands in sharp contrast to private leases in which the lessor ordinarily passes-through the real estate tax obligation either directly, by requiring the tenant to pay the tax bill to the taxing authority or, for instance in a space lease, by requiring the tenant to pay as part of the “Common Charges” or “Common Area Maintenance Charges” taxes charged to the property owner/lessor by the municipality. Sometimes such charges are anticipated and included in the base rent, particularly for short term leases, or included within rent “bumps” when the taxes have increased over a prescribed period of time.

In leases with municipalities, however, the following idiosyncrasy can resonate through the deal. Pursuant to Section 406(1) of the New York State Real Property Tax Law, municipally owned land is exempt from the otherwise applicable real property tax obligation. A close reading of the statute, however, discloses that such “exemption” is only available if the subject property is “held for a public use.” This term “public use” has been delimited by case law to mean uses where the use is for the benefit of the general public. Such uses, therefore, would include facilities like schools, police stations, fire stations, sanitation garages etc. If, however, a municipality leases its real estate for “private uses,” then the RPTL 406(1)

“exemption” is not available as a strict matter of law.⁸ Notwithstanding the foregoing general proscription against exemptions for other than public uses, one must be aware of the general proposition that all municipalities in New York State may lease “surplus” or “excess” real property to a private user for a private, revenue generating purpose. Because, however, the Real Property Taxes are owed, under law, by the fee owner of property and not a lessee, it is the municipality, as fee owner, which is responsible for paying the Real Property Tax on property leased by the municipality to a private owner for a private use. Theoretically, however, municipalities, which are both the taxing jurisdiction and the fee owner of the real property at issue, could structure a lease such that the private lessee using the property for a private purpose need not be made responsible for the Real Property Tax through the usual “pass-through” of the Real Property Tax obligation as “Additional Rent.”

Notwithstanding that “theoretical possibility,” the Town of Harrison and Fallica cases illustrate the proposition that, “overlapping tax jurisdictions,” i.e., municipalities which do not own the subject real property, from time-to-time initiate legal proceedings against another municipality within the “overlap” that seeks to take advantage of the “theoretical possibility.” The cases are driven by municipalities which own real property and seek to benefit the jurisdiction by registering property as “exempt” from real property taxes, which property is owned in fee by the “exempting” municipality but leased by that municipality to a private enterprise for a “private use.”

Notwithstanding the foregoing cases which blocked municipalities from realizing their objectives by taking advantage of the “theoretical possibility, it can be understood that , while all other municipal jurisdictions in New York State, from Lake Erie to Lake Champlain, from Suffolk County to Monroe County consist entirely of “overlapping tax jurisdictions,” New York City is an exception. A “municipality” is defined in the New York State General Municipal Law as each of a County, a Town, a City, a Village and, very importantly, a School District. Each of these municipalities is entitled by statute to a proportionate share of real property taxes collected attributable to real property within such municipality’s jurisdiction. For example, a County may seek to induce a particular private development within its boundaries by means of a development ground lease providing that full taxes will not have to be paid by the tenant as a pass-through. Notwithstanding the County’s effort to so induce the private development, a town, whose jurisdiction covers the same property,⁹ has the right to protest, because it very well could be stripped of its right to a proportionate share of the total real property tax obligation. The described private use in this example, notwithstanding the benefits directly to the county by increasing the county’s revenues through the lease, is clearly not a “public use.” Accordingly, the taxes will continue to be owed to the Town. Even if it desired to treat the property exempt in order to participate in the inducement of the development, it would not be empowered to do so because, and this is not always understood by the private bar, a municipality cannot “grant” a tax exemption. It has no power to do so. Only the State legislature can produce tax exemptions through duly enacted legislation.

New York City, in sharp and curious contradistinction to the rest of New York State, constitutes a unified real property tax jurisdiction. There is only one tax jurisdiction that covers the City, and that is the tax jurisdiction of the City. All “municipalities” in New York City are organically and legally part of the City of New York by virtue of the Great Consolidation of 1898. Each Borough constitutes a County (Brooklyn/Kings, Queens, the Bronx, Manhattan/New York and Staten Island/Richmond), but none of these Counties enjoys separate sovereignty and taxing authority. The “School District” is the School District of the City of New York, and, while theoretically independent of the City, it does not enjoy its own separate taxing power. Towns and Villages existing before 1898 were all abolished. Accordingly, as the sole and exclusive real property tax collector within the boundaries of the City, the City can, theoretically, “waive” the taxes it owes to itself. Observers may have noticed that, from time to time in the past, NYCEDC, on behalf of the City, has, on a surgical basis, transaction by transaction, negotiated special arrangements with respect to the tax obligation otherwise owing with respect to the property at issue—all in an effort to appropriately induce salutary development.

In contrast to the conventional landlord, who is in the business of leasing property it owns primarily for the purpose of realizing a return on its investment consistent with market demand, and, accordingly, has, as its first objective, to break even, the City, as landlord may, and frequently does, have, as noted above with respect to Section 384(b)(4) of the Charter, different motivations in seeking to lease-out its real property to private for-profit entities. Two prominent motivations may be, as alluded to earlier, (1) promoting the local economy and (2) upgrading the physical character of neighborhoods. Such initiatives resonate with the potential to achieve, for the larger good of the City, increases in real estate and sales taxes from privately-owned real property within the redeveloped neighborhood and to make employment opportunities available to the local population.¹⁰ Accordingly, financial return from the ownership of real property may be subordinated to these other, larger policy motivations.

With this background, let us now take a look at the dynamics with respect to a municipal lease deal transaction involving real property owned by the City. Let us assume the City of New York, through NYCEDC, has issued a “request-for-proposals” (colloquially referred to by its acronym, the RFP) to redevelop, pursuant to a ground lease, a vacant expanse of City-owned land in the South Bronx, the North Shore of Staten Island, Eastern Queens or any other section of New York City where promoting private redevelopment could significantly increase quality of life experiences for local residents—particularly with respect to job opportunities—and which may resonate with the potential of promoting private market demand for real property in the neighborhood of the contemplated redevelopment project. Let us also assume that the RFP contemplates that the City/NYCEDC is seeking proposals to achieve the City’s goal of reshaping the target neighborhood into a modern, attractive community. The proposed redevelopment would be designed further to extend to its residents the opportunity to live within easy commuting distance of their places of employment at affordable rentals or affordable home ownership prices.¹¹ With respect to ground rental and other lease obligations, the RFP may seek to solicit from prospective developers “proposals with respect to the financial consideration the developer is prepared to offer to the City in return for the opportunity to redevelop the property consistent with the redevelopment goals set forth in the RFP.”

Let us now fast forward to the point where the City/NYCEDC has received the ground lease proposals and is narrowing them down. In our theoretical construct, let us assume that the proposer has offered a redevelopment plan that is very attractive to the officials acting on behalf of the City, and the City/NYCEDC officials arrange to invite the proposer down to City/NYCEDC offices for an interview and discussion. After a discussion of the redevelopment plan, the parties turn to a discussion of the rental and, as “additional rent,” other financial obligations that the developer/proposer would be required to satisfy. After a few minutes, the discussion turns to the subject of real estate tax pass-throughs. The devel-

10 Another prominent policy initiative that will support a taxing jurisdiction’s reducing real property taxes is, of course, enlarging “affordable housing” opportunities for its residents who have been priced out of the local housing market. Such “affordable housing initiatives, however, rarely implicate leases of City-owned property for such purposes.

11 This species of development is colloquially defined as creating “live/work communities.”

oper explains what its return on investment formula requires in order for it to be willing to undertake the costs of the proposed project.

The parties thereupon discuss base rent, percentage rent, and capital transaction proceeds sharing. While very engaged by the developer's proposal, the City is not prepared to give the property away or to completely waive the real estate taxes otherwise attributable to the property. As the supplier of the land, the City wishes to participate in the development's success—on behalf of the residents of the City as a whole. The developer thereupon explains that low rent in the early lease years may not be sufficient for it to undertake the project. If the developer/proposer should be required to pay full real estate tax, it could suffer significant compromises in its ability to afford debt service on the financing necessary to pay for construction of the project, as well as the return on equity it must offer investors to raise the necessary cash to finance the project.

It is at this point that the phenomenon of the “PILOT”—or Payment-in-Lieu-of-Tax—may emerge. The PILOT is a transactional feature of a municipal lease that derives from the legal foundation described above, i.e., that New York City is the only single-municipality district (i.e., no overlapping tax jurisdictions) in New York State. Accordingly, as the tax collector and the tax payer when it owns the subject land, the City, theoretically, can “waive” the real estate tax. The City, as owner of the land at issue, however, as discussed above, is not technically exempt from the obligation for the applicable Real Property Tax obligation, by virtue of the operation of Section 406. Nevertheless, as noted above, theoretically, the City has the power to not collect the Real Property Tax from itself. This legal dispensation, therefore, presents the City, theoretically, with the opportunity to negotiate a “special arrangement,” if you will, with the prospective lessee/developer, with respect to the pass-through of real estate taxes. PILOTs embody such special arrangements. The purpose, of course, would be to serve as an incentive to the developer to undertake the presumably high-risk project contemplated in the RFP and to therefore execute the lease with the City.

It should be carefully noted, however, that while the PILOT may be available as a tool for getting the deal done, the City does not cavalierly enter into such PILOT arrangements. For the most part, the City seeks, as a matter of understandable policy related directly to its fiscal needs and to a sense of “fairness” to the real estate community as a whole, to correlate the PILOT to a statutory tax exemption-tax abatement program, enacted by the State legislature, that corresponds to an analogous program that might be available to a real estate developer, were the developer to be the fee owner of the subject real property. The most common statutory Real Property Tax abatement program used to prescribe a PILOT in commercial/industrial ground leases with the City is the Industrial/Commercial Abatement Program (ICAP). It should also be noted that it is relatively rare that the City will agree to a PILOT payment schedule, in connection with a significant development ground lease with a private developer, which will substantially reduce Real Property Taxes attributable, on the City's tax records, to the real property which is the subject of the ground lease.

All that said, the PILOT provisions of a City long-term development ground lease usually, if agreed to at all, will assume the form of a schedule of Payments in Lieu of Real Estate Taxes that will be required to be paid to the City, as landlord, as Additional Rent over the ground lease term.

Although PILOT payments theoretically can be made certain pursuant to fixed PILOT payment schedules, nevertheless, as a matter of City policy, where the PILOT Additional Rent payment may be correlated in some fashion to the Real Property Tax obligation otherwise attributable to the real property at issue, the PILOT Additional Rent payments will very likely fluctuate. In this regard, ground leases from the City to developers usually afford the ground lessee with the opportunity to step into the City's shoes, as fee owner, and challenge the assessment of the real property in a hearing before the New York City Tax Commission, and, if the ground lessee is not satisfied with the Tax Commission's decision, it will be afforded the right under the ground lease to appeal the Tax Commission's decision to the State Supreme Court in a tax certiorari proceeding. As a result, the ground lessee will not be subject to the sole and exclusive determination of the City, either as landlord or tax collector, with respect to the amount of PILOT Additional Rent it will be required to pay under the ground lease.

Concluding the discussion of the PILOT provisions of a City development ground lease, we should observe that, as "Additional Rent," the remedy of the City for non-payment would be the same as that of any landlord in a non-payment proceeding. Nonetheless, one of the comforts of the PILOT as Additional Rent to prospective developers, their investors and their lenders should be that they, as the tenant (or, in the case of the lender, the party assumably enjoying the right to substitute for the tenant pursuant to an assumed subrogation clause in the leasehold mortgage) will enjoy the opportunity to negotiate a landlord-tenant "work-out" with respect to alleged defaults in the payment of PILOT owed under the lease. If the lessee/developer were the fee owner of the property, or if it were the lessee of a private entity, this straightforward work-out opportunity to negotiate resolution of Real Property Tax defaults would not necessarily be available, and the taxing authority could simply foreclose on the fee interest.

[22.6] V. OTHER SPECIAL LEASE FEATURES

[22.7] A. Rent Discounts and Recoveries Through Participations

In addition to negotiating tailored PILOT provisions with regard to the pass-through to the developer ground lessee of payment of the Real Property Tax obligation attributable to the real property at issue on the City's tax rolls, the City/NYCEDC may negotiate specially tailored rental provisions, with a view to incentivizing investment in the particularized development objective. Such specially tailored rental provisions may implicate below market rentals for the early years of the lease term. The City, however, in such cases, will ordinarily negotiate with the lessee/developer for a future participation in the financial success of the project. If the project is successful and the developer/ground lessee, or its successors in interest in the event of a lease assignment (a municipal lease phenomenon to be discussed later in this chapter), realizes a substantial return on its investment, then the City will usually seek to participate in such success in an effort to recover its rent discounts attributable to the early years of the lease term. It may do so not merely through negotiated rent bumps over the lease term but also through income participation provisions. These provisions can take the form of percentage rent payments (i.e., payment by the lessee of a percentage of revenues realized annually by the lessee) calculated on a net or gross basis.¹² One may encounter "Adjusted Gross Percentage Rents" where certain clear fixed costs are deducted before the percentage is calculated. Such adjustments, if agreed to and incorporated in the lease terms, commonly include the deduction of PILOT payments and required insurance premiums. The prescribed permissible deductions, will, of course, affect the percentage participation. In addition to percentage rent participations, the City will also usually insist on participating in the revenue received by the lessee/developer upon an assignment or refinancing of the lease (a "Capital Event") with a cash out after the property has manifested its potential for success. Such participation will usually 12 Over the years, the city has come to favor "gross percentage rent" over "net percentage rent." The City has largely concluded, from experience, that gross percentage rent participations, although representing a lower percentage than net percentage rent participations, has a far higher certainty of calculation associated with it than net percentage rent. The likelihood of extended disputes over the amount of the percentage rent due is, therefore, significantly reduced.

take the form of a percentage participation in net assignment/sale/refinancing proceeds and the calculation of a breakpoint or baseline where the lessee/developer will have recovered its investment, satisfied any existing indebtedness and returned the investors' equity with a prescribed return. At that breakpoint, the lessee/developer will share with the City an agreed-to percentage of the net proceeds from a successful assignment to a new lessee/operator of the completed project.

[22.8] B. "Standard" Provisions

[22.9] 1. Transfer, Assignment, and Sublease Clauses

Because the City will have selected a lessee/developer not particularly to maximize immediate financial return to the City but to achieve a far more ambitious public purpose for the redevelopment of the real property at issue, and because the achievement of such purpose is an objective of immediate importance, the City will carefully proscribe the designated lessee/developer's ability to alienate its leasehold interest—particularly before construction completion and the issuance of a Temporary Certificate of Occupancy. Without a lease's carefully circumscribing a lessee's right to assign the lease, leasehold rights, like fee interests, are freely alienable. Also, since the designated developer is the party to whom the City is looking to achieve the development, the City will substantially circumscribe a lessee's ability to transfer an interest in the designated developer which would have the effect of shifting control from the individuals being relied upon by the City to deliver the project to other individuals whom the City has not vetted. Accordingly, with respect to assignments, the City has adopted the policy to absolutely prohibit assignments prior to a point in time when the City's expectations with respect to redevelopment will have been achieved—or not. Although a lessee/developer may still petition the City/NYCEDC for consent to assign the lease, nevertheless, the City reserves the right, exercisable at its sole discretion, to decide whether it will accept a new party to realize the objectives of the lease. With respect to transfers, the City permits certain transfers, such as the transfer of interests to family members or through a testamentary transfer, or minority interests in the lessee/developer entity, provided, that effective control has not passed from the individuals to whom the City is looking for realization of the project, either individually or collectively, to other individuals. Subleasing is also limited for the same reason. Certainly, however, if the objective of the project is the creation of new space expected to be made available to third-party users, subleasing will be permitted for that purpose. Strict guidelines are, however, usually established in the designated lessee/developer's lease so that effective management of the new facility cannot be transferred to a third-party in violation of the City's expectations.

[22.10] 2. Use

In these public/private partnerships (referred to in the industry as “P3” deals) the City usually has a vision for the use of the property. If the property is expected to be used as a manufacturing facility, for example, the City will not want the property being used as a retail center, assuming such a retail center is permitted in the applicable zoning district. While both a retail center and a light manufacturing facility may both generate jobs for the local population, the city's vision for the redevelopment of the site may be focused on promoting affordable space for light industrial use, in order to create opportunities for attracting light manufacturing businesses, which businesses have been rapidly evaporating over the years. If a lessee/developer, although originally acknowledging that objective, believes it can substantially increase its revenue by reconfiguring the space for a retail center, it might very well make an attempt at a “bait-and-switch.” In order to preclude such a possibility, the City will negotiate particularized use criteria into the lease. If the use criteria are violated, the City may very well resolve to call a default, terminate the lease and seek out a new manager/lessee for the project. The lessee/developer could discover that, if it acts in such a brazen way, it very well may have forfeited its investment as a result of such a lease violation, without any opportunity to recover that investment. Since these species of real estate projects are entwined in a mesh of very focused governmental objectives seeking particularized benefits for the community, developers engaged with the City in negotiating leases for these kinds of projects must be aware that such projects will be burdened with constraints that they will not necessarily encounter in analogical private development leases. “Public Purpose” stands as the bastion supporting the undertaking of these deals by the City/NYCEDC, and leases for such projects will be fashioned to ensure, to the extent possible, that the public purposes will be achieved.¹³

13 It should be noted, at this point, that § 507 of the General Municipal Law prescribes that leases for urban renewal sites must provide that the deed or lease for the property to be disposed of pursuant to § 507 “shall contain provisions... insuring the use of such real property for purposes consistent with the urban renewal plan.” NYCEDC's use clauses are usually more surgical than what the GML § 507.3 requires, but § 507.3 does denote the legislative concern that property to be redeveloped with a mission in mind, must contain enforceable use provisions. NYCEDC's purposes in negotiating lease development deals for the City is co-extensive with that legislatively articulated purpose.

[22.11] 3. Construction Obligations

One of the other rigorously negotiated and enforced provisions in City/NYCEDC development leases is, understandably, the construction obligation. In this respect, the City/NYCEDC is, for the most part, walking hand-in-hand with the developer's lender. The objective of the construction lender is to make sure its borrower completes the project and is issued a certificate of occupancy when the job is completed. So it is the City/NYCEDC's primary objective as well. Because the City/NYCEDC will have bargained with the developer for a particular project in order to satisfy a number of negotiated features baked into the development lease's provisions (largely as exhibits in the form of plans and specifications), the lease will contain strict requirements regarding NYCEDC's review and approval of all design development drawings and specifications that evolve out of the original schematics or later phase of design development as may be incorporated into the lease. One may therefore expect to find in any NYCEDC-negotiated development lease a somewhat complex set of provisions regarding submission of plans for review and approval by NYCEDC's professional construction team, with time periods for submission and for review and approval by NYCEDC before the next stage of design development may proceed. Once contract documents have been reviewed and approved, NYCEDC will have oversight of the bidding of the job to ensure that the contractors selected by the lessee/developer are not deemed to be contractors who would be unacceptable to the City, both from an ethics and competency point of view.¹⁴ As construction proceeds, any material change orders would likewise have to be reviewed and approved by NYCEDC. In connection with getting the job done, the City, though in this matter the City is usually at-one with the lender, will insist on the General Contractor's furnishing payment and performance bonds to the City and NYCEDC, both of which may be named as co-obligees. Occasionally NYCEDC will accept subguard insurance in lieu of bonds, but the matter must be negotiated on a case-by-case basis with a hard look at the risks involved.

Frequently, one should be aware, NYCEDC will demand completion guaranties from its lessee/developers—plus, understandably, individual and/or corporate principals of the developer/lessee. These guaranties may take any number of forms, including the posting of cash deposits, letters of credit or contractual commitments from companies with a substantial credit rating and net worth. Such companies may be the principals of the lessee/developer (which lessee/developer frequently is an SPE—a single purpose, judgment-proof entity) or a high net worth company which, for a fee, has agreed to execute and deliver a guaranty to the City/NYCEDC that the job will be completed as set forth in the approved construction documents. In any case, the completion guaranty becomes a central aspect of the deal and must accompany the lease execution-- or be furnished prior to the commencement of construction. If it is not so furnished, the lessee/developer may not be permitted, under the lease, to commence construction. The failure to furnish the completion guaranty may give rise to a default under the lease, which default will likely have to be cured within a prescribed period of time to avoid lease termination. In any event, the foregoing illustrates just to what extent the construction provisions in a development lease negotiated by the City/NYCEDC represent a central, critical feature of the lease negotiation.

[22.12] 4. Leasehold Mortgage Protective Provisions

Lastly, I would like to briefly summarize the City/NYCEDC's position with respect to leasehold mortgages. NYCEDC recognizes the importance of promoting financeability of its proposed development projects. As a result, it will agree to make certain accommodations so that project lenders will enjoy the opportunity to cure any default on the part of its borrower. It is never the City's intention to put a lender in the position of forfeiting its collateral if the lender's borrower is unable to complete the bargained for development. That said, the City/NYCEDC is rarely prepared to subordinate the public's land so that a lender will have the right to seize the land in a mortgage foreclosure proceeding and repackage the property for any development it wishes in order to recover its loan advances in the event of a borrower's default. The City views the risk of a developer/lessee's default as a shared risk with the lender. In such cases it extends to the lender/leasehold mortgagee the opportunity, through provisions set forth in the leases, of generously extended cure periods for the lender to step in and achieve the objectives and requirements bargained for by NYCEDC in the development ground lease. One thing, however, it will not accept is that the City's fee interest be subordinated to the lender's leasehold mortgagee. No lender on a City/NYCEDC development lease deal should ever expect such an accommodation.¹⁵

[22.13] VI. CONCLUSION

The foregoing discussion is not intended as an in depth or comprehensive presentation of all significant aspects of negotiating leases with a municipality in New York State, and with the City of New York in particular. Rather, if, you will, it attempts to embody a bird's eye view of salient points that a real estate lawyer representing a private party in the negotiation of a transaction with a municipality, and the City of New York in particular, should be expected to encounter in the course of such a negotiation. I have attempted to introduce the reader to certain lease provisions that are idiosyncratic to City lease deals and arise out of the legal constraints imposed by the New York City Charter and other constraints imposed on the City and the NYCEDC, as the City's representative with respect to this species of real estate transaction, in connection with getting certain deals done. I also sought to introduce those unfamiliar with the dynamics involved in negotiating lease deals with the City to particularized "policy" matters that drive certain discretionary decisions by the City in the course of negotiating a deal. Other features, such as the relatively standard commercial leasing business matters addressed at the end, merely seek to alert the real estate practitioner to matters that could be encountered in any development ground lease transaction. When dealing with the City, or with any municipality, however, these features resonate with peculiar transactional ramifications that must be understood in the context of the expectations of a municipality in seeking to achieve particular public purposes through the dedication of surplus property otherwise lying fallow in public real estate portfolio. I have elected not to discuss a number of features that one will necessarily encounter in negotiating a 15 In this latter regard I would note that it has been the City's unequivocal view that if the City were to subordinate its fee interest to a mortgage, doing so would constitute an illegal guaranty of a private indebtedness in violation of section 8.1 of the New York State Constitution—the so-called "Gifts and Loans" prohibition in the Constitution. That provision precludes a municipality from giving or loaning any... property to or in aid of any private... undertaking or giving or loaning its credit..." for the same. The lease or sale of municipally owned land to an LDC or for urban renewal purposes is not deemed a "gift or loan" because the legislature has declared the purposes for which the lease or sale would be made to be public purposes supporting the disposition. Subordinating City-owned land, however, to support a private mortgage loan, however, has been considered by the City to constitute a "gift or loan" to a or in aid of a private undertaking. While the Urban Renewal Law, Section 507.4, does permit the subordination by a municipality of its interest in the real property in order to achieve the purposes of an urban renewal project, there are circumscriptions on a City's power to do so set forth in the statute. In the case of 384(b)(4) dispositions, there are no dispensations from what is understood to be the effect of the Gifts and Loans prohibition.

City lease deal. These include the immutable “Investigations” clause, the MWB/E clause, and the Comptroller’s audit authority with respect to a lease. These are all completely standardized provisions that do not admit of any form of negotiation. The Comptroller’s audit authority, by the way, precludes the opportunity for arbitrating any monetary issue that might arise between the parties. Certain non-monetary matters, however, may be arbitrated, such as whether construction satisfies the design requirements of the Construction provisions.

THE RESTAURANT LEASE: SELECTED CONSIDERATIONS

[23.0] I. INTRODUCTION

To paraphrase William Shakespeare, a lease by any other name is just a lease. With apologies to the Bard and to the great chefs of the world, a restaurant is just another type of retail operation (although a restaurant has a greater tendency to lead to culinary pleasure and concomitant weight gain), and for that reason, a restaurant lease is essentially a retail lease, with a few distinguishing characteristics. These specific characteristics arise out of the unique nature and economics of a restaurant operation, and the specific needs and requirements of restaurant tenants and operators and their landlords.

In any type of commercial lease transaction, the tenant and landlord invariably have a complicated relationship, with each wanting to maximize its own benefits when negotiating the lease. In the case of the traditional retail lease, the negotiations are often about the typical lease terms, such as the rental, assignment, and the build out and alteration provisions. Often, once those terms are negotiated, there is minimal interaction between the parties other than maintenance or repair requests and delivery of the rent payments. That is not the case, however, in the relationship between a restaurateur and his or her landlord. In this situation, the needs of both parties often create a more interdependent relationship than is found in a traditional retail leasing arrangement. The result is that the parties negotiating a restaurant lease must consider the requirements and goals of the other more than in other leasing transactions. In a very real sense, a good restaurant lease is a lot like a good marriage—it requires compromise and understanding by both sides.

At the outset of a restaurant lease negotiation, the unique nature of the transaction is apparent. The restaurateur has a vision for the restaurant. The landlord has a particular type of tenant and rental rate in mind for the premises. These basic elements may comprise the majority of negotiations for a typical retail lease, but they are just the beginning terms for a lease involving a restaurant.

For example, a prospective tenant may want the establishment to serve alcoholic beverages and have sidewalk seating. The tenant may also wish to cater to a younger crowd and stay open until late at night. Moreover, while the intended leased space may be in the right location, it may need major renovations and completely new fixtures that not only will be expensive, but will make it difficult for a tenant to amortize the costs over the term of a 10- or 15-year lease. Because of the significant infrastructure and pre-opening costs involved in opening a restaurant, the tenant may also want the ability to transfer the business to a successor owner in order to recoup and realize a return on its investment. The tenant will no doubt ask for the landlord's assistance in these matters.

Correspondingly, while the landlord may be generally comfortable with the restaurateur's vision, the intended use may create some concerns. Perhaps there are residential tenants living above the restaurant who will not be happy with a late night meeting spot. The landlord may want to impose certain use restrictions and establish operating, safety and hygienic standards so that the restaurant does not create a nuisance in the landlord's property. The landlord may not be willing to assume the risks inherent in the tenant seeking government approval for such amenities as a liquor license or outdoor seating. Moreover, the landlord may not be receptive to sharing in the cost of improvements, even though such improvements will become fixtures. It is in the negotiation over issues such as these, where not only the vision of the restaurateur is at stake, but the venture's financial viability is as well, that negotiations concerning restaurant leases take on their unique aspects.

Set forth below are examples of this often Manichean form of negotiation as they relate to issues such as use provisions, operating standards, infrastructure requirements, the ability to assign, and the extent of the landlord's investment in the success of the restaurant.¹

[23.1] II. USE PROVISION AND LIMITATIONS

[23.2] A. The Use Clause

The use provision in a restaurant lease defines and limits the specific purposes for which the premises may be used. Often, in addition to restaurant usage, the premises may be used for the on-site consumption of alcoholic beverages and limited auxiliary offices. A typical use provision in a restaurant lease may read as follows:

Full-service restaurant [featuring a concept as set forth in Exhibit ___ to the lease], including the sale of alcoholic beverages for on-site consumption if an appropriate license is obtained, and for no other purpose whatsoever.

¹ Management or other arrangements relating to the operation of a restaurant in a hotel property are beyond the scope of this chapter.

The landlord may want a higher level of specificity in the use provision. The following provision could be adapted to fit the needs of a particular landlord and tenant:

Operation of a first class restaurant for on-site consumption [and for delivery and pick-up] of food and beverages [with a minimum of ___ sit-down lunch and dinner servings, seven days a week], with tablecloths and professional and efficient waiter service, and with a bar, but no cabaret and no live music or dancing, in an upscale physical setting, and for no other purpose.

Conversely, the tenant will often prefer a less restrictive use provision (similar to the first use provision above), which would not limit the restaurant to a particular food concept, in order to facilitate an assignment or sublease of the premises.

[23.3] B. Auxiliary Office Space

When a landlord enters into a restaurant lease, it has a reasonable expectation that most if not all of the space will be used for restaurant or bar purposes. This may be important in a situation in which percentage rent (which is based upon the tenant's annual gross sales) is a component of the aggregate rent to be paid by the tenant. A tenant, however, may need to utilize a portion of the premises as office space. In such an instance the lease could accordingly provide for such use but also limit the portion of the square footage of the premises to be utilized for non-restaurant purposes. For instance, the lease may provide that:

Tenant may use for office purposes only such space as is reasonably required for tenant's business in the premises, but in no event shall the space used for such purposes exceed ___ percent of the square footage of the premises.

[23.4] C. General Restrictions and Limitations

Equally important in a restaurant lease are the usage restrictions or limitations. Restaurants have externalities which may affect the quiet enjoyment of other tenants in their spaces as well as the reputation of the building, mall, or other development in which the premises are located. A landlord will typically provide in a lease (sometimes in the use clause but more usually in a separate provision) that the premises may not be used or occupied in violation of law or of the certificate of occupancy issued for the premises and that the failure of the tenant to discontinue any unauthorized use within a stipulated period of time after notice shall constitute a breach of the lease. A landlord may also want to be more specific about the impermissible uses or broaden the range of such uses. For instance:

No use shall be made of the premises which would (i) violate any law, ordinance, or regulation applicable to the premises; (ii) constitute a nuisance in or about the premises or cause damage to or interfere with the efficient and economical maintenance, operation and repair of the building or the premises or any equipment, facilities or other systems therein; (iii) adversely affect any service provided to, or the use and occupancy by, any building tenants or occupants; (iv) constitute a hazardous use or one which emits, produces or otherwise creates hazardous materials; (v) violate, suspend, void or increase the premium on any policy or policies of insurance covering the building or any premises therein; or (vi) impair the appearance of the premises or the building or adversely affect the image or reputation of the building as a first class location.

The landlord could also seek to include in the lease a provision giving it discretion (either reasonable or unfettered) to determine if the tenant has engaged in any such proscribed activities.

[23.5] III. OPERATIONAL COVENANTS AND INFRASTRUCTURE REQUIREMENTS

In addition to the use clause and usage restrictions, landlords may employ other provisions to require tenants to operate their restaurants at high standards of practice, to maintain their premises at all times in a condition of proper cleanliness, orderliness, and attractive appearance, and to comply with safety and hygienic standards. For instance, a lease for an upscale property may provide generally that:

Tenant shall conduct and operate its restaurant in a manner consistent with the highest standards of practice of first class restaurants in [geographical location] and in keeping with the standards of a first class building.

The installations of modern restaurants, however, are often far more elaborate than the restaurant and kitchen in the film Big Night, although Tony Shalhoub and Stanley Tucci managed to create at least one memorable dinner in their simple establishment. Modern restaurants, particularly those in larger cities, are complex operations. They not only involve the storage, preparation and cooking of food but also the disposal of organic garbage. They have specific plumbing, venting and exhaust requirements and needs such as fire and smoke detection and suppression systems, as well as grease traps. For these reasons, while general requirements or restrictions like the above are helpful in establishing expectations, it is advisable for a landlord to incorporate specific requirements in a restaurant lease so as to mitigate possible issues arising from a restaurant's operations and to have legal recourse in the event its operations or sanitary and health conditions are not at a sufficient level.

Accordingly, the comments and sample provisions in this section are primarily oriented towards the landlord's perspective, but should generally be acceptable to most restaurant tenants. As in any retail lease, a restaurant lease should also contain provisions as to the landlord's rights in the event the tenant fails to perform any of its covenants, including the right of the landlord to take self-help actions to cure such failure and collect from the tenant the costs of such actions as well as an appropriate, specified administrative fee or interest charge.² For purposes of brevity, such provisions are not included in the sample covenants provided in this chapter.

Set forth below are some illustrative examples of covenants relating to maintenance standards and infrastructure requirements.

[23.6] A. Extermination

The presence of food products invites unwanted guests, and the lease should impose specific obligations on the tenant to establish a protocol to control such pests:

2 The following is an example of such a cure provision:

If tenant fails to carry out the proper maintenance, repair or other acts as required hereunder to the satisfaction of landlord, within seven (7) days after written notice from landlord to do so, landlord may enter upon the premises and perform or cause to be performed such repair, maintenance or other acts, without any liability to tenant for trespass or any loss or damage to tenant's property or business by reason thereof, and tenant shall pay, as additional rent hereunder, landlord's cost thereof and an administrative fee equal to 15% of such cost within 20 days of receipt by tenant of a bill therefor.

During the term of the lease, tenant shall use all reasonable diligence in accordance with best prevailing methods to prevent and exterminate vermin, rats and mice in the premises. In furtherance of the foregoing, tenant shall engage a professional exterminator licensed in the City of [_____] to service the premises, including all food preparation, storage and waste disposal areas, on a regular basis, and in no event less than one (1) time per month. Upon request from landlord, tenant shall provide to landlord evidence that such extermination is being performed in accordance with this Section. Commencing on the rental commencement date, and then on each anniversary thereof (and within five (5) business days after landlord's request if landlord shall request such copies on a more frequent basis), tenant shall deliver to landlord a current executed copy of such extermination contract, including any amendments or renewals thereof.

[23.7] B. Disposal of Trash

Additional provisions are often included to require a restaurant tenant to maintain sanitary means of disposing of food waste:

Tenant shall store all garbage, trash, rubbish and other refuse in rat and insect proof containers with watertight plastic liners in temperature controlled areas inside the premises and remove same frequently and regularly by such means and methods through such areas as are reasonably designated by landlord. Tenant shall provide such safeguards as, in landlord's reasonable judgment, are necessary or advisable to prevent the escape of fluids, vapors and odors from tenant's waste, trash and rubbish. Tenant shall not dispose of any food waste, cooking oil, grease, plastic products, or other foreign substances into any utility waste lines or plumbing facilities and may not use any such lines or facilities for any purpose for which they were not constructed.

[23.8] C. Grease Traps or Interceptors

Although not very appetizing, grease and other food waste are necessary byproducts of a kitchen's operations, and grease traps are important ingredients of a restaurant's infrastructure:

(a) Tenant shall remove grease from all exposed surfaces of the premises daily and retain a bonded degreasing service to clean and degrease the kitchen area at least monthly during the term.

(b) Tenant shall install a grease trap or interceptor system within the premises, which shall be above slab, and access for maintenance of such system shall be through the premises only. Prior to installing such system, tenant shall submit to landlord plans and specifications therefor for landlord's review and approval and shall obtain all required governmental approvals and permits.

(c) Tenant shall enter into and keep in full force and effect throughout the term a grease trap or interceptor maintenance contract with a contractor licensed in the City of [_____] to perform on no less than a monthly basis the services described in such contract, which contract and contractor shall be approved by landlord. Such contract shall provide that the grease traps or interceptors shall be rooted and cleaned and all oil removed therefrom as frequently as is necessary to prevent clogging or discharge. Tenant shall deliver to landlord a current executed copy of such contract, including any modifications and renewals thereof, annually commencing on the rental commencement date and on each anniversary thereof (and if landlord shall request such copies on a more frequent basis, within five (5) business days after landlord's request).

(d) Tenant shall not use any chemicals or other cleaning methods which could damage the utility waste lines, plumbing and other systems in or serving the building or the premises.

(e) Tenant shall be liable for any damage to the building or its systems caused by tenant's failure to comply with the provisions hereof.³

[23.9] D. Ventilation

While some cooked foods have fragrant, tempting smells, a tenant should be required to install and maintain an exhaust and ventilation system to dispel unwanted kitchen fumes, odors and smoke:

(a) Tenant shall provide and install all necessary components of a high velocity forced draft ventilation system in a manner acceptable to landlord and in accordance with all Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease), at tenant's sole cost and expense. Said system shall include, but not be limited to, exhaust hoods, exhaust ducts, fire dampers and fire rated duct chases/shafts where required, exhaust and make up fans, controls and grease drip pans. Such system shall discharge to the atmosphere via the [roof] area. No fumes, smoke, latent vapors, odors, gases and other kitchen emissions shall emanate from the premises, except through such system. Tenant must maintain a negative pressure within the premises and shall be responsible for the proper diffusion of the exhaust in such manner as to prevent odors from entering adjacent air intakes.

3 If the building has a grease trap system servicing multiple restaurant tenants, the following provision could be included:

Landlord will deliver the premises with a grease trap or interceptor installed outside of the premises for the common use of tenants in the building (the "Common Interceptor"). Tenant will install and maintain, at its sole cost and expense, the kitchen waste and exhaust systems, including all risers, pipes, ducts and fans used by tenant in connection with such systems, but with respect to the grease trap or interceptor pipes, only up to the point of connection with the Common Interceptor, in a manner consistent with the operation of a first class restaurant and in accordance with all applicable laws, codes and regulations of any governmental authority having jurisdiction. Tenant's allocable share of the capacity of the Common Interceptor shall be ____ gallons, which tenant represents and warrants, is sufficient for tenant's use of the premises. Commencing on the date tenant opens for business and during the term, tenant shall pay as additional rent, within 10 days after receipt by tenant of a statement therefor, ____% of (i) the costs of maintenance, repair and operation of the Common Interceptor and (ii) any cost of cleaning any blockage caused by the introduction of grease and/or food waste by any tenants using the Common Interceptor.

(b) Tenant shall clean or cause to be cleaned its kitchen exhaust hoods, fans and ductwork on a schedule of not less than four (4) times per year and shall submit evidence of such cleaning (including inspection reports) to landlord promptly after such cleaning.

(c) In the event that landlord or any other occupant of the building is disturbed by any fumes, smoke, odors, gases and other kitchen emissions which are caused by tenant's use of the premises, tenant shall immediately take such corrective action as may be necessary to resolve such problem to landlord's reasonable satisfaction.

(d) Tenant shall not be permitted to use the premises in any matter that would require venting in excess of [10,000] CFM's.⁴

[23.10] E. Kitchen Facilities—Health and Maintenance Standards

The landlord may want to incorporate provisions into the lease relating to the standards, both regulatory and otherwise, concerning the construction and maintenance of food facilities of the restaurant. For instance, the lease could include some or all of the following:

(a) Tenant shall construct all kitchen facilities in accordance with all Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease) including all applicable state and municipal health codes. Prior to tenant commencing operations, tenant's kitchen facilities shall have all required permits, approvals, and certificates, including a current [New York City

4 If there is a common exhaust system in the building shared by multiple restaurants, the following is a sample provision:

Landlord shall provide tenant with a point of connection within the premises to the main horizontal trunk line of the common kitchen exhaust system which shall simultaneously service tenant and other restaurant tenants in the building (the "Common Exhaust System"). Tenant shall be responsible for all maintenance, operations and repair of exhaust hoods, fans and ducts within the premises to such point of connection with the Common Exhaust System in a manner consistent with the operation of a first class restaurant and in accordance with all applicable laws, codes and regulations of any governmental authority having jurisdiction. Landlord shall control and operate the Common Exhaust System in a manner and on a schedule that landlord, in its sole discretion, shall deem desirable, which may be modified by landlord, in its sole discretion, from time to time.

Food Service Establishment Permit] and a current [New York City Food Protection Certificate].

(b) Tenant shall comply with all state and local health inspection requirements and shall promptly forward to landlord the written results of any such inspection.

(c) Tenant shall, at its sole cost and expense, clean and remove daily any food spills, dust, dirt and other substances from all tables, chairs, fixtures, floors, floor coverings and furnishings with an approved disinfectant detergent.

[23.11] F. Waterproof Membrane

The landlord may wish to require a waterproof membrane under the kitchen and bathrooms in order to prevent damage to the structure of the building in case of leaks:

Tenant shall install a waterproof membrane to waterproof all floors and slab penetrations in all kitchens, bathrooms and similar water prone areas and shall slope floor surfaces to an area drain to prevent damage to the building resulting from the passage of water and other liquids out of such areas.

[23.12] G. Fire and Smoke Detection and Suppression Systems

A restaurant lease often contains specific provisions regarding the installation of fire and smoke detection and suppression systems, which are in addition to any sprinkler system required to be installed and maintained in the premises. Set forth below is an example:

(a) Tenant shall install a fire/smoke detection system within the premises, which shall include all devices, equipment, wiring, conduit and controls as may be required by landlord and which shall be in compliance with all applicable Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease). At landlord's discretion, tenant shall engage, at its expense, a fire-life safety contractor as designated by landlord for such portions of tenant's work as may be specified by landlord, which may include, without limitation, final programming and connection to landlord's fire alarm system.

(b) Tenant shall install chemical extinguishing devices (such as Ansul) approved by Underwriters Laboratories, Inc. (UL). Such installation shall be approved by all appropriate governmental authorities having jurisdiction thereof. Tenant shall maintain such devices under service in accordance with such standards as may be established by UL, any such governmental authorities, and any insurers under any applicable insurance policies of landlord or tenant.

[23.13] H. Landlord's Disclaimer

The landlord may wish to include a specific disclaimer of responsibility with respect to any improvements or installations made by the tenant:

Landlord shall not, by its approval of the location, construction or installation of any of tenant's improvements, including without limitation, tenant's exhaust system, smoke and fire detection or suppression systems, or waste liquid disposal facilities or any of their components, be deemed to have represented that same are adequate or comply with any applicable Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease), nor shall such approval constitute a waiver by landlord of the right to require tenant to modify any such improvements so as to perform their intended functions or otherwise comply with the provisions of the lease.

[23.14] I. Additional Infrastructure and Operational Considerations

In addition to the above, there are other matters involving a restaurant's installation and building services that should be considered during the negotiations of a restaurant lease. For instance, because of the significant volume of water used by restaurants, landlords generally provide in a restaurant lease that the tenant shall install and/or use a separate water meter or submeter to measure its water usage at the premises. A landlord may also want other utilities separately metered or billed directly to a restaurant tenant, or in the alternative, the landlord and tenant may agree in advance to an allocation of the building expenses relating to those utilities.

In addition, the landlord may also want to provide that the tenant shall cause the premises to be compliant with the Americans with Disabilities Act of 1990, and correspondingly, the tenant may want a similar covenant from the landlord as to the compliance of the building (other than the leased premises) with such Act. If necessary, the parties should agree as to which party is responsible under such Act for any shared bathroom or other facilities or the entrance into the restaurant, particularly if there are steps, stoops or elevated sections over vaults in the area adjacent to the entrance, or if there are planters or other objects which could obstruct the entranceway.

Further, if the restaurant is to be located in an office building and will not have separate dedicated air conditioning or heating systems, the tenant should also negotiate for the provision of such services, as well as elevator service, if required, after normal business hours or on weekends.

[23.15] IV. COVENANTS RELATING TO CONDUCT AND ACTIVITIES

As the restaurateurs in Big Night knew, restaurants need a significant volume of customers to be viable, and often it takes more than well-prepared, delicious food to entice them. Since the atmosphere of a restaurant establishment is often critical to its success, amplified sound is often employed. The more popular a restaurant, the more crowded it will be, and the noise and crowds may impinge upon other tenants in the building and upon the neighborhood. A landlord often will seek to include provisions in the lease regulating such activities as music, customer traffic and other conduct, which could adversely affect people outside the premises or the reputation of the building.

[23.16] A. Noise/Sound Levels

Recorded and live music are often integral aspects of a restaurant's ambiance, and a landlord may want protection against high noise levels. At a minimum, a landlord should seek a provision in the lease to the effect that:

Any such sound making or sound reproducing equipment or system in the premises must be operated by tenant: (i) in a manner and under conditions such that no sound or vibration shall unreasonably disturb any other tenant in the building or otherwise constitute a nuisance and (ii) in conformity with all applicable Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease).

The lease may also include a covenant requiring the tenant (either at the outset or during the term, at the landlord's request) to install appropriate acoustical insulation, sound dampening materials, and/or baffling in the ceiling or walls of the premises, so as to mitigate, to the landlord's reasonable satisfaction, sound and vibration transmission to common areas or to other spaces in the building. The landlord may also want to provide that the components of any sound making, amplifying or sound reproducing device or system must be suspended on isolation rods and may not be attached or placed on structural elements of the building. If the landlord desires more specificity, the lease could provide that the tenant shall install sufficient acoustical insulation so as to prevent the transmission of any sound or noise in excess of a specific decibel level (e.g., 40 dB) from the restaurant premises.

Of course, if a maximum decibel level is not specified in a lease, the tenant may want the landlord to acknowledge that the tenant's business is a restaurant and may have an amplified music system in its premises. The tenant may also want the landlord to agree in advance as to the specifications of its proposed sound system.

[23.17] B. Residential Building Covenants

If the restaurant is located in a building with residential tenants, it may be advisable from the landlord's perspective to have the tenant acknowledge the occupancy of such tenants and agree to certain basic standards. One example of such a covenant applicable to a mixed use or residential building is the following:

Tenant, recognizing that the building (other than the tenant's premises) is residential in nature, and as an additional inducement to landlord to enter into the lease, covenants and agrees that at all times (i) the business to be conducted at the premises and the kind and quality of the merchandise, food, beverages and services offered therein will be reputable in every respect, (ii) the sales and service methods employed in said business, as well as all other elements of merchandising, will be dignified and in conformity with the standards of practice of first class sit-down style restaurants, i.e., not “franchise” type fast food, (iii) the sound level in the premises and the operational standards of tenant shall be in keeping with the residential nature of the building, (iv) the appearance and décor of the premises (including the lighting and other appurtenances thereto), and the appearance and deportment of all personnel employed therein shall be that which is customary in a first class restaurant and (v) tenant shall strictly comply with the provisions herein regarding the permitted days and hours of operation of tenant’s business.

[23.18] C. Customer Control

A restaurant, in order to be successful, needs significant customer traffic, and it may be advisable to have specific provisions in the lease regarding the handling of customers. For instance, the landlord may want to provide that:

Tenant shall provide for the orderly control of all customers and invitees of the premises, including directing the queuing of customers and invitees through a roped off or designated area or through another method of segregating the queuing area from the remainder of the building, provided that any such method of controlling customers shall be subject to the prior written approval of landlord and shall in no event interfere with or impede the use of the building by landlord, other tenants or their respective employees, customers and invitees. Tenant shall not permit any loitering or other congregating of customers or invitees outside of the premises and within the building, except within the roped off area or other queuing area.

[23.19] V. SIDEWALK AND GARDEN SPACE USE

[23.20] A. Conditional Use of Outdoor Space

Restaurant tenants often desire to use available sidewalk or garden space for table service, and this is often consistent with the interests of landlords in maximizing the rental derived from their properties. Such use, however, should be conditioned on the tenant obtaining all necessary permits and approvals and complying with all legal requirements applicable to such use. In addition, the tenant should have the sole responsibility of maintaining any such space during the term of its use, and the landlord should disclaim any responsibility with regard to the tenant's operations in such space. The landlord may also want to provide that the tenant shall not permit any music, live entertainment or excessive noise in the outdoor seating area, in order to avoid any interference with other tenants in the building or with other people in the area. The rental rate for such area may either be included in the rental provision for the premises or may be the subject of a separate provision which would become effective when the tenant commences its use of the outdoor space.

The following is a fairly comprehensive provision with regard to sidewalk café or outdoor use (but it does not include a separate rental provision):

(a) Tenant shall have the right to place tables and chairs for outdoor dining in the area immediately outside of the premises on the ____ Street frontage of the premises as more fully delineated on Exhibit ____ hereto (the "Sidewalk Café Area"), for the operation of a sidewalk café ancillary to the use of the premises and for no other purpose during the term of the lease; subject to the following conditions: (i) tenant, at its sole cost and expense, shall procure prior to such use and maintain any and all permits, approvals, certificates and/or licenses required by law, rule and/or regulation of any applicable governmental or quasi-governmental authorities, (ii) tenant's operation thereof shall comply with any and all applicable laws, orders, regulations and legal requirements of all federal, state and local governments, and the New York Board of Fire Underwriters or any similar body asserting jurisdiction thereof and the requirements of tenant's and landlord's insurers with regard thereto, (iii) landlord shall have no liability or obligation of any nature whatsoever to tenant, its employees, agents, contractors, employees, customers or invitees with regard to the Sidewalk Café Area or its operations, (iv) tenant shall obtain and keep in full force and effect all insurance coverage required by the lease covering the Sidewalk Café Area, and (v) tenant shall maintain the Sidewalk Café Area in a clean condition and in good repair and order and shall comply with all applicable terms of the lease as if the Sidewalk Café Area were part of the premises hereunder.

(b) Tenant shall be solely responsible for, and shall promptly pay, any and all taxes, filing fees, charges, or license fees imposed by any local, state and/or federal government or any agency thereof upon landlord or tenant by virtue of the use of the Sidewalk Café Area. Tenant shall promptly deliver to landlord copies of any filings or statements which tenant may now or hereafter be required to make, from time to time, with any local, state and/or federal agency with respect to the use of the Sidewalk Café Area. Landlord agrees to cooperate reasonably with tenant in connection with any applications for necessary licenses or permits with respect to the Sidewalk Café Area, provided that landlord incurs no expense or liability in connection therewith.

(c) Tenant's operation and use of the Sidewalk Café Area shall be at tenant's sole risk, and tenant acknowledges that landlord shall not be obligated to provide any security or other services to the Sidewalk Café Area.

(d) Tenant shall be responsible for cleaning and removing on a daily basis any materials left in the Sidewalk Café Area by tenant or tenant's invitees and shall not store any materials whatsoever in the Sidewalk Café Area.

(e) Landlord's approval shall not be construed to imply that the Sidewalk Café Area or its appearance or operation complies with any Legal Requirements (as defined in the lease), and landlord shall be under no duty to permit the Sidewalk Café Area to be operated if such operation is prohibited by any such Legal Requirements. Landlord makes no representation or warranty, oral or otherwise, with respect to whether tenant may use the Sidewalk Café Area in the manner set forth herein pursuant to applicable Legal Requirements. If tenant is unable for any reason to use the Sidewalk Café Area in the manner set forth herein pursuant to applicable Legal Requirements, landlord shall have no liability or responsibility whatsoever therefor, nor shall such inability be construed as an actual or constructive eviction of tenant under the lease or entitle tenant to any abatement of rent under the lease or relieve or release tenant from any of its obligations under the lease.

[23.21] B. Restrictions on Use of Outdoor Space

Of course, the landlord may not want to permit the restaurant tenant to operate an outdoor café because of potential problems that could arise with neighbors, other tenants or governmental authorities. Further, even if the tenant does not contemplate such a use, the landlord may want the lease to include specific restrictions on the use of any outdoor space adjacent to the restaurant premises. For example, the landlord could seek to provide that:

Tenant shall not use the sidewalks or any open areas adjacent to the premises or any part of the common area of the building for business purposes, except for ingress and egress and except as otherwise provided in the lease, without the prior written consent of landlord exercised in its sole discretion.

[23.22] VI. RIGHTS TO TRANSFER LEASE AND RESTAURANT ASSETS

[23.23] A. Transferability Provision

There are two principal reasons why the transferability provision in a restaurant lease may have more impact on a tenant than a comparable provision in a non-restaurant retail lease. First, restaurants often entail significant infrastructure costs. It can be very expensive to install kitchens, storage and refrigeration units, and other restaurant equipment and systems. Moreover, in order to differentiate themselves and enhance their customers' dining experience, restaurants often invest significantly in the design and installation of dining and bar areas as well as in their furniture and furnishings. As a result of such costs, it may be difficult for the restaurant tenant to amortize and recoup its capital investment over the term of its lease, which is typically 10 or 15 years. Second, a restaurant's reputation (unless it is part of a multi-restaurant brand) is often significantly tied to its location and the distinctive design and décor of its space. The restaurant tenant may accordingly wish to capitalize on its location and design by selling its lease, name and other assets.

Of course, a landlord may have a countervailing interest in assuring that the space is leased to a reputable and reliable restaurant operator or is used for a particular culinary style. Often, from the landlord's perspective a principal factor in leasing the space to a restaurant tenant is the identity of its owner, chef, or management, and a landlord may wish to require continuity during the term of the lease. Furthermore, a landlord of a mall or other similar development may want to have a certain mix of restaurant styles located within the project and may want to restrict the type of restaurant in a space to a particular culinary or dining style.

Accordingly, the assignment and sublease sections in a restaurant lease may, in addition to the customary provisions in a retail lease, include specific clauses to reflect these additional interests.

If a tenant has bargaining leverage, it may try to negotiate a carve-out to the usual restrictions on transferability. Generally, retail leases contain provisions (often referred to as “permitted transfer” provisions) permitting a tenant in certain qualified transactions to sublease the premises or assign its interest in the lease without the landlord’s consent and without any sharing of profits resulting from such a transaction. In a retail lease, such permitted transfers may involve a sublease or assignment by the tenant to the following: any entity which controls, is controlled by or is under common control with the original tenant (a “related entity” provision); or an entity which results from a merger, consolidation or other reorganization in which the tenant is not the surviving entity, so long as the surviving entity assumes the liabilities of the tenant under the lease and immediately after giving effect to the transaction has a net worth that is equal to or greater than the net worth of the tenant immediately prior to such transaction (a “successor entity” provision). In addition to those transfers, a restaurant tenant may have a compelling reason to request that a permitted transfer under the lease also include a sublease or assignment to an entity which purchases or otherwise acquires all or substantially all of the assets of the restaurant or all the restaurants operated under the same brand (an “acquiring entity” provision), with the same caveat as above as to the net worth of the acquiring entity. Such a provision would provide greater comfort that the restaurant tenant would have the right to sell its business, or in the case of a branded operation, the owner could sell all of its branded locations in one transaction.

Rather than giving a restaurant tenant the unfettered right to sell its business and lease, however, a landlord may want to provide that it shall have reasonable discretion to approve any such transfer or that the “acquiring entity” or “successor entity” provisions may not be relied upon by the tenant until a specified period of time has elapsed after the commencement date of the lease. The landlord may also want to condition any proposed transfer under such provisions upon the landlord’s reasonable determination of such factors as: (1) the transferee or its key principals or its management having not less than a significant number of years of operating restaurants of similar quality as the tenant's operations (for instance, 10 years); and/or (2) the transferee or its principals having a net worth of a stipulated amount; and/or (3) the transferee, its principals or its management being of good moral character and business reputation.

[23.24] B. Control and Management Restrictions

Of course, the landlord may be of the opinion that the success of a particular restaurant will be based upon the performance of a specific operator or chef. This is particularly true where the landlord has agreed to invest significantly towards the construction of the tenant's installation and would like to assure it recoups its capital investment. For that reason, instead of agreeing to broaden the permitted transfer provision, the landlord may want to provide that at all times during the lease, the restaurant be owned, operated or controlled by a specific person or group and that any changes in that person or group require the landlord's consent (based upon a standard, either the landlord's sole discretion or reasonable discretion, to be set forth in the lease). The landlord may further wish to require that the key person or group devote substantial time and attention to the business of the tenant to ensure that the premises are operated in a consistent, first class, high-quality manner, and that any failure by the tenant to comply with such terms shall constitute a material breach under the lease.

[23.25] C. Rights to Furniture, Fixtures and Equipment

At a bare minimum, a restaurant tenant should attempt to assure that at or immediately before the expiration or termination of the lease, it will be entitled to sell its movable furniture, fixtures and equipment (often referred to as "FF&E"). Normally, a retail or store lease will provide that the tenant may remove its trade fixtures, movable office furniture and equipment, provided it repairs and restores the premises to the condition existing prior to the installation of such items and repairs any damage to the premises due to such removal.⁵ However, most such leases, including the aforementioned Standard Form of Store Lease, also provide that fixtures, paneling, partitions and like installations installed in the premises at any time, either by the tenant or by the landlord on the tenant's behalf, become the property of the landlord and at the landlord's option either remain in the premises or be removed by the tenant at its expense. The language in many leases is unclear as to what constitutes a fixture which is part of the premises in contradistinction to movable or trade fixtures, and also leaves the tenant uncertain as to whether it may retain or sell its FF&E upon the expiration of the lease.

5 See Article 3 of the Standard Form of Store Lease published by the Real Estate Board of New York, Inc. (July 2004 edition).

This uncertainty may be remedied in at least two ways. One is to have the lease require that the landlord set forth in writing at the time of the installation of any fixture, paneling, partitions or the like whether any such items must be removed at the expiration or termination of the lease. The other is to specify in the lease or in a side agreement executed contemporaneously with the lease which items are the property of the tenant. Below is a portion of a side letter which can be employed to clarify the extent of a restaurant tenant's rights to remove and or sell such property:

This letter is intended to clarify provisions in the lease relating to the obligations of tenant upon the termination of the lease to vacate and surrender the premises in the condition required under the lease. For purposes of the lease, such condition shall mean that (i) tenant shall not be entitled to remove any installation or any fixtures installed by tenant in the premises other than movable trade fixtures, which shall include ovens and stoves (which are on moving canisters) and refrigerators (other than walk-in refrigerators) which are not attached to the walls or floors of the premises; tables, chairs and other furniture; equipment not attached to the walls or floors (including dishwashers); all kitchenware and table top packages; electronic systems, computers, CCTV, POS systems and office equipment; inventory, including food and alcohol; framed photographs; air compressors and water jackets for the air conditioning system (but not air handlers); and similar items of personal property; and (ii) tenant shall be further obligated to leave the premises vacant, broom clean and in good condition, reasonable wear and tear excepted.

[23.26] D. Creation of Security Interests

In order to assure that no other third party may be able to claim ownership rights by foreclosure or otherwise of any components of the tenant's installation, the landlord will typically restrict the creation of any security interest under the Uniform Commercial Code in anything other than the tenant's personal property, movable trade fixtures and movable equipment. Further, the landlord may want the lease to provide that as security for the performance of the tenant's obligations under the lease, the landlord shall be entitled to a first priority security interest in all of the tenant's FF&E and replacements thereof, whether or not movable, subject and subordinate to the lien or security interest of any vendor or lessor in any equipment. The lease may further provide that in addition to all rights or remedies of the landlord in the lease and under law, including the right to a judicial foreclosure, the landlord shall have all rights and remedies of a secured party under the Uniform Commercial Code of the state in which the premises are located. For purposes of the tenant's financing, however, the landlord may permit the tenant to grant to a lender or vendor a security interest in certain FF&E, typically moveable non-kitchen FF&E, including furnishings, furniture, merchandise, inventory and all other personal property placed in the premises by the tenant. Notwithstanding the foregoing, a landlord should provide that upon expiration or earlier termination of the lease, and notwithstanding any such liens or security interests granted by the tenant on its property, any and all property of the tenant remaining on the premises at such time shall automatically become the property of the landlord, and the landlord shall have no obligations to the tenant, its lender or any other person or entity with respect to such property.

[23.27] VII. LIQUOR LICENSE

[23.28] A. Liquor License Contingency

If a restaurant intends to have a bar or provide wine or liquor service, it will need to procure a liquor license from the local liquor licensing authority. Since an executed lease is often required for the issuance of a liquor license, a restaurant tenant will not know with certainty at the time it executes the lease that it or its principals will qualify for a liquor license for that particular location. Accordingly, the tenant will want to condition the effectiveness of the lease on the issuance of the liquor license within a stipulated period of time.

The landlord will have a countervailing interest to ensure that the tenant expeditiously applies for the license and prosecutes the same with diligence. In the event, after a stipulated time, the tenant is not able to obtain a license, or the tenant receives a denial of its application, both the tenant and the landlord will want to have the right to terminate the lease. A sample liquor license contingency provision for a New York City restaurant is set forth below:

Tenant agrees that within 20 days after the date of full execution and delivery of the lease (the "Execution

Date”), tenant shall, at its sole cost and expense, apply for a liquor license (the “Liquor License”) to be issued by the Liquor Authority of the State of New York (the “SLA”) to sell wine and other alcoholic beverages in the premises, such application to be made in accordance with any rules and regulations promulgated by the SLA, and to be filed with the New York City Alcoholic Beverage Control Board (the “ABC”). Tenant shall prosecute the application diligently and expeditiously. Tenant represents that all of its officers, directors, managers, members, partners, stockholders and other equity interest owners, as the case may be, are persons of good repute without any criminal record which might disqualify tenant from being granted the Liquor License. Tenant agrees to advise landlord within five (5) days of all actions taken by tenant in connection with such application and of all communications received from the ABC or SLA, including, but not limited to, the approval or denial of such application and the issuance of the Liquor License. Prior to tenant’s receipt of the Liquor License, tenant shall not sell or offer for sale any wines or other alcoholic beverages in or from the premises. If, despite tenant’s good faith, diligent efforts to obtain the Liquor License expeditiously in accordance with the terms of this Section, the Liquor License is not issued to tenant on or prior to the date that is 60 days after the Execution Date, then either landlord or tenant shall have the option, within 15 days thereafter, as to which time shall be of the essence, to terminate the lease by giving the other party notice thereof. In the event landlord or tenant shall elect to terminate the lease pursuant to this Section, the lease shall cease and terminate with the same force and effect as though the date on which the terminating party gives its termination notice as provided above were the date set forth in the lease for the expiration of the term, and each of the parties hereto shall be released from any further obligations hereunder except for those obligations that are specified in the lease to survive the expiration or earlier termination of the lease.

[23.29] B. Indemnities and Insurance Regarding Service of Alcoholic Beverages

In addition to including a contingency with respect to the procuring of a liquor license, a landlord may also want to incorporate into the lease provisions which would make explicit the restaurant tenant's obligation to serve alcoholic beverages in compliance with applicable law. For instance, the lease could contain a provision that the tenant will comply with all applicable laws, regulations and ordinances from time to time in effect with regard to the serving of alcoholic beverages, including but not limited to restrictions as to the age of customers being served such beverages, the age of persons serving such beverages and the hours and days during which such beverages may be served. In addition, while retail leases often include a general indemnity in favor of landlords which is very inclusive and encompasses claims arising from a tenancy, the landlord may want to provide explicitly that the indemnity (as well as tenant's required commercial general liability insurance policy, by endorsement or rider or otherwise) covers any claims based upon negligence, breach of warranty, strict liability or other product liability law, arising out of the serving of alcoholic beverages (or food) in the premises, including but not limited to liability arising under any host liquor law, dramshop law or similar laws applicable to the premises.

[23.30] VIII. RETAIL LEASE PROVISIONS WHICH SIGNIFICANTLY AFFECT RESTAURANT TENANTS

In addition to the above considerations, which are primarily of concern to restaurant tenants, there are a number of other matters which impact on retail tenants generally but may have a significant and disproportionate impact on restaurant tenants.

[23.31] A. Sidewalk Sheds

The installation of a sidewalk shed or scaffolding by a landlord in order to perform facade repairs or for some other purpose may have a material adverse effect upon a restaurant tenant. Not only may such a shed or scaffolding deprive a restaurant of visibility from the street, and thereby reduce customer traffic to the restaurant, it may also affect the ambience of the restaurant and its customers' enjoyment of the dining experience. In addition, it may also deny a restaurant its outside eating area. For these reasons, a restaurant tenant may have more significant reasons than other retail tenants to seek to obtain a diminution of the base rent in the event such a shed is constructed during the lease term. Of course, the landlord, particularly if it has financed its building, will be reluctant to agree to a provision which could interfere with its rent flow, and in fact such a provision could affect the ability of landlord to finance its property by decreasing its debt service coverage ratio and may require the approval of any existing lender.

Often, retail leases provide that unless the premises are damaged, the tenant shall not be entitled to any diminution of the rent in the event the landlord erects scaffolding or a sidewalk shed at the building. At a minimum, the tenant should see that there is a covenant in the lease requiring the landlord, in making any repairs, alterations or improvements, including any work involving the installation of a sidewalk shed or scaffolding, to use all reasonable efforts to minimize interference with the tenant's use and occupancy of, and access to, the premises and to take all commercially reasonable measures to reduce to a minimum any disruption or interference with the tenant's business.

If a landlord is amenable to an adjustment of the base rent in the event it must install a sidewalk shed or scaffolding, it may agree to a stipulated reduction per month, adjusted on a per diem basis for the actual number of days that a sidewalk shed or scaffolding is in place in front of the demised premises. While there is no specific formula or standard for such a reduction, some leases have provided for reductions in base rent during all or part of the period the shed or scaffolding is standing in the range of 20% to 30%. In other instances, a landlord may require proof that a restaurant's revenues decreased from a comparable period prior to the installation of the shed or scaffolding, and the rent reduction would be based upon such demonstrated reduction.

Below is an example of a lease provision allowing for a stipulated reduction of the base rent during the period a shed or scaffolding is in place:

In the event that landlord erects any scaffolding or so-called "sidewalk shed" in the area in front of the premises, landlord shall use reasonable efforts to minimize the interference with the access to, use of, or visibility of the premises, and to minimize blockage or concealment of tenant's signs or windows, including providing additional illumination should the scaffolding or shed darken the entrance or the front of the premises; provided, however, that if landlord maintains scaffolding or a sidewalk shed obstructing ____% of the frontage of the premises for a period of 60 consecutive days, the base rent shall be reduced by twenty (20%) percent thereafter until such time as the scaffolding or shed is removed.

[23.32] B. Percentage Rent: Exclusions From Gross Sales

In certain properties, such as malls and hotels, a retail tenant, including a restaurant tenant, is often required to pay percentage rent in addition to base rent. The provisions relating to percentage rent in a restaurant lease are comparable to those in any other retail lease and are typically based upon a tenant's "gross sales". The percentage rent may, but not always, become payable when the tenant's gross sales during an annual period exceed a "natural" breakpoint. That breakpoint is determined by dividing the amount of base rent during an annual period by the specified percentage rent. Any gross sales in excess of that quotient will be subject to the stipulated percentage rent during that annual period.

For purposes of percentage rent, "gross sales" may be defined as all sales made and all cash and credit revenue of a tenant derived at, in or from the premises, including finance charges to customers. Some leases will require that the menu prices of items served be included in that definition. A retail lease often excludes and/or deducts from the definition of "gross sales" various items, including sales taxes, refunds or credits made for returned merchandise, sales made to employees or discounts not otherwise reflected in the actual sales receipts, fees paid to credit card companies or financial institutions in connection with credit card transactions and other items which are not typically deemed to be revenue realized by the tenant from sales. In addition to the usual exclusions, a restaurant tenant should also request the following exclusions: (1) sales and meals provided for free or discounted to bona fide employees of the tenant; (2) the amount of redemptions of gift certificates (to the extent the face value of the gift certificates was included in "gross sales"); (3) tips to or service charges of bona fide employees; (4) complementary meals for promotional or other business related purposes (particularly if the lease requires the inclusion in gross sales of the menu price of items served); and (5) the amount of any actual bad debt write offs for the failure of the tenant's customers to pay in-house accounts, provided such amounts were previously included in the tenant's gross sales. If the tenant requests such exclusions, the landlord may want to limit them, particularly items (1) and (4), to a specific percentage (often in the range of 3%) of gross sales, not including the amounts of such exclusions.

In addition, if the restaurant is located in a hotel, the following exclusions may be relevant: (1) gratuities paid by patrons for room service or otherwise, to the staff or paid to the hotel, restaurant tenant or operator and then paid to the staff; and (2) amounts collected by the restaurant tenant or operator from a patron for the account of, and for direct payment to, unrelated third parties providing services specifically for a patron's function which generates gross sales, such as flowers, music and entertainment.

A restaurant tenant may also wish to contend that the breakpoint for the commencement of percentage rent should not be at the natural breakpoint, but rather should be upon the achievement of a higher amount of gross sales, because the operating margins of a restaurant are so low and the infrastructure costs are so high. By delaying the imposition of percentage rent until a higher level of gross sales is attained, the tenant may be able to recoup its investment faster and realize a higher return than it would otherwise be able to achieve.

[23.33] C. Radius Restrictions; Competing Business Area Restrictions

In conjunction with a percentage rent provision in a restaurant lease, the landlord may wish to incorporate into a lease a provision which restricts the principals of the restaurant tenant from owning, operating or otherwise engaging, directly or indirectly, in any similar or competing business to that conducted by the tenant within a stipulated radius from the premises. The purpose of such a provision, which is often referred to as "competing business area restriction" or "radius restriction" is to avoid any reduction in the tenant's gross sales that may otherwise be realized from the premises. When such a provision is utilized, the nature of the business of the tenant (e.g., a French bistro restaurant) will often be specified in order to provide some clarity as to what constitutes a similar or competing business. The landlord may also wish to provide that in addition to the other remedies available to it in the event of a breach of such a provision, including but not limited to the right of injunction, any gross sales earned in such similar or competing restaurant shall be reported to the landlord and considered "gross sales" for purposes of the percentage rent provision, and the landlord shall have the further right to audit the books and records of such other restaurant in the same manner as if such restaurant were located at the premises.

[23.34] D. Existing Exclusives

What is good for the goose is also good for the gander, and the tenant may wish to request a clause restricting the landlord from renting space in the building or development to a restaurant which is similar to or competitive with the tenant's restaurant. Such a clause, which is often referred to as an "existing exclusive," often requires the landlord to provide in future leases to other tenants in the building or development a description of the prohibited use (i.e., tenant's specific use). For instance, by virtue of the granting of such existing exclusives, the form of restaurant lease in one development contained a prohibition against using other premises for such uses as: the sale of open flame style specialty pizzas and pastas; full-service seafood restaurants; full-service steak restaurants; Mexican, Latin, El Salvador or Tex-Mex restaurants; casual themed sit-down American restaurants whose price point and menu offerings were substantially the same as those of a specific restaurant; and sushi restaurants.

The prohibition against certain types of restaurants may also be subject to exceptions. Existing tenants would of course not be subject to such prohibitions. New tenants could also be allowed to sell items which would otherwise be prohibited, such as open flame style specialty pizzas or pastas or steak, as the case may be, as incidental uses or auxiliary menu items (i.e., not a primary featured item). If the prohibition relates to a more upscale or sit-down style restaurant, the lease could make explicit that fast casual type restaurants and food court tenants would be permitted, or could permit restaurants specializing in primarily one ethnic, cultural, regional cuisine or specialized food category (e.g., sushi, burgers, steak or some other single food type).

[23.35] E. Landlord's Contribution to Tenant's Installation

Restaurant installations are generally more expensive per square foot than many other retail installations. As a result, a restaurant tenant may need the landlord to contribute to the cost of construction. Such contribution may take three forms: a landlord may construct some or all of the installation as landlord's work (also known as a "work letter"); a landlord may make additional rent concessions or allowances over a period of time in order to assist the tenant in defraying the cost of such construction; or a landlord may directly contribute a monetary amount (often referred to as a "construction allowance") to the tenant or its contractors to pay the cost of such work, as well as contribute to such soft costs as architectural and expediter fees, permit costs and the like.

If the landlord agrees to make a construction allowance, the payments are usually made on a specified schedule based upon the tenant's expenditure of specific amounts of its own funds toward the tenant's work or the tenant's architect's certification that a specific percentage of the tenant's work is completed. If the lease is conditioned upon the issuance of a liquor license for the premises, the lease will provide that the tenant will not be permitted to commence construction, and the landlord will not make any contribution to the tenant's soft costs, until the liquor license is obtained. As in any other retail lease, the landlord should incorporate various protections, such as the right of the landlord to deduct from any such construction allowances any rental amounts owed by the tenant to the landlord during the period in which the construction allowance is paid, and the obligation of the tenant to deliver lien waivers and other proof that the work performed has been paid in full to the date of payment of the construction allowance.

While the provisions relating to the various forms of the landlord's contribution to a tenant's installation in a restaurant lease are comparable to those in a retail lease, the negotiations are often more complex due to the comparatively higher per square foot amounts expended by a restaurant tenant. Such negotiations will often turn on the relative bargaining leverage of the parties and on the landlord's perception of whether the restaurant will be a value-added amenity to its property. The outcome of such negotiations, however, will often be crucial to a restaurant tenant's profitability under its lease.

[23.36] IX. CONCLUSION

In the words of one successful restaurateur, it takes a lot of chicken soup to pay the rent. The process of negotiating a restaurant lease is often complex and involves balancing the restaurateur's needs to attain his or her vision and the landlord's needs to protect its building and other tenants. From a landlord's perspective, the inclusion in a lease of comprehensive provisions dealing with operating standards, use limitations and infrastructure requirements are important to assure that the landlord's interests in preserving the quality of the property and the enjoyment by other tenants of their premises in the property are protected. It is also in the landlord's interest, however, to see that the lease provisions are not unduly burdensome on the tenant's ability to develop customer traffic and operate a successful restaurant. If the protective provisions are reasonable, a restaurant tenant should be amenable to them. The two parties should then concentrate their deal making efforts on structuring the financial terms of the lease, with appropriate rent levels, construction contributions and reasonable transfer provisions, so as to maximize the likelihood of the tenant being able to realize sufficient revenues to pay its rental and operating obligations and receive a reasonable return on its investment. If proper accommodations regarding those key terms are reached between the parties, the restaurant lease will serve the interests of both the landlord and the tenant.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FOUR

RETAIL LEASES

Bradley A. Kaufman, Esq.

This chapter is intended to serve as a practical guide to the review and negotiation of retail leases, focusing on issues unique to retail leases, or for which retail leases create unique concerns. I will review standard clauses found in typical retail leases—highlighting in some cases concerns that retail Tenants would have in complying with those provisions (and what we, as practitioners, can do to either alleviate or address those concerns for our clients), and highlighting in other cases potential retail Landlord responses and suggested areas of compromise.

[24.1] I. BASIC LEASE INFORMATION

While obvious, there is nothing more important than clearly identifying the leased premises, both in terms of designation (i.e., store number 000A) and on a floor plan, including where the leased premises are situated within a mall, including as to each particular level of the mall, as applicable. The lease should also set forth the square footage and, in representing retail Tenants, practitioners should seek the right to have Tenant’s architect or an independent third party verify such square footage and make appropriate changes to the lease following such verification (i.e., adjustments of fixed rent and other charges in the lease based upon square footage).

The commencement date is perhaps the most critical element of the lease, at least initially, inasmuch as the Tenant will need to retain architects, contractors and other professionals, as well as order inventory, specialty and trade fixtures and the like, and hire employees to staff the store. It is imperative, therefore, for Tenants to have a firm target delivery date so they can gear up to open on a timely basis. From a Tenant’s perspective, penalties for late delivery (see Part II.B.) are desirable as both a deterrent against a Landlord’s late delivery of the space so as to compromise the Tenant’s ability to timely build, staff and open, and also as a means of compensation to Tenant for the items mentioned for Landlord’s failure to timely deliver the space. An ultimate termination right with reimbursement of Tenant’s expenses is also desirable, but usually obtainable by only the most “desirable” or larger Tenants.

Landlords will want to get Tenants in possession and open for business as soon as possible, so as to start collecting rent and other charges, and will want to deliver space to Tenants with as little “down time” as possible, thus keeping the rental stream unimpaired. If there is percentage rent potentially payable to the Landlord, this is, of course, particularly important. Landlords also need to make sure there is as little closed square footage in mall situations as possible, to ensure customer traffic for all Tenants and to avoid so-called co-tenancy violations. Accordingly, Landlords regularly seek penalties for failure by a Tenant to timely open, particularly in mall situations where there is a “grand opening” of a mall or a section of the mall involved, or the Landlord has agreed to co-tenancy clauses in other leases.

In any event, the lease should set forth clear parameters for what would constitute delivery of the space, with appropriate notices and sign-offs by, and to, each of the parties.

The lease should clearly define substantial completion of “Landlord’s work,” whether that be delivery of the shell (building structure) only, “vanilla box” (including Landlord’s standard build-out, but subject to Tenant’s “finish work”) or partial or complete build-outs for particular Tenants and, again, notices and verification of same. Fixed rental, percentage rent rate, breakpoints, taxes, common areas maintenance, contributions to promotional funds and any other charges, and when payment of same is to commence, should also be clearly spelled out under the basic lease provisions.

With respect to a Tenant’s permitted use, Landlords will want to set forth with specificity what the Tenant can sell from the demised premises and prohibit sales of all other items. Tenants will seek as broad a definition as possible of what they can sell from the demised premises. Landlords must be cognizant of restrictive covenants and so-called “exclusives” in major and other leases. Landlords also desire to achieve a good mix of Tenants in terms of items sold from the premises—not just in the center as a whole, but in particular areas of the center. As with permitted use, trade names should also be dealt with specifically, from a Landlord’s standpoint. Moreover, Landlords usually prohibit Tenants from changing their trade name at the particular location during the term, while Tenants should seek the right to change trade names, provided the change is on a uniform (i.e., local, regional or national) basis.

[24.2] II. SPECIFIC LEASE PROVISIONS[24.3] A. Security

Landlords need to thoroughly investigate exactly who the actual named Tenant under the lease will be, and to review financial and, in some cases, organizational and corporate material about the Tenant's structure. In the case of single-purpose entities attempting to lease space in local or even regional malls, Landlords will often seek either significant security deposits or so-called "Good Guy Guarantors," or in some cases even parent company guarantees. Tenants, from their standpoint, should have the right to substitute letters of credit for security deposits. Landlords usually prefer that substitution anyway, from a potential bankruptcy standpoint.

[24.4] B. Construction, Landlord's and Tenant's Work

As noted above, items of Landlord's and Tenant's work should be dealt with specifically, either by attaching detailed schedules and exhibits, or by referencing plans and specifications, so as to alleviate the potential for confusion (who performs what work within the demised premises, or with respect to the systems serving same). For the reasons outlined above (i.e., inventory, ordering of items and lining up professionals), Tenants should seek penalties for late delivery of the demised premises or late completion of Landlord's work. The types and amounts of these penalties will be subject to negotiation, but in a retail—as opposed to an office—situation "day-for-day" (abatement of rent) penalties often do not make the Tenant whole for late delivery. I would generally suggest that Tenants should seek liquidated damages more closely corresponding to their actual losses. In the event of Tenant's failure to open for business, Landlords usually have a provision in the lease whereby similar liquidated damages are required. This is particularly true in connection with a new center, or when a grand opening (or "reopening") is planned and Tenant's failure to open for business contemporaneously with other stores in the center would cause significant harm to Landlord (and other Tenants). In such events, liquidated damages in excess of rent (sometimes significantly so) and often the norm.

With respect to Tenant's work, Landlords usually require that plans and specifications be subject to Landlord's approval, and with respect to structural work, work involving any of the mall or building systems, exterior work and often finish work that may be seen from the exterior (whether mall or street deals) that such approval be in Landlord's sole discretion (though for the credit-worthy and higher end retailers, interior finish work of any kind or nature sometimes may be done. To avoid the Landlord “sole discretion” criteria, Tenants may seek to reference other store locations in terms of the nature and quality of build-out and to have same effectively pre-approved by Landlord, subject to physical constraints and compliance with local laws. I have often seen this as the case in mall leases with repetitive (regional or national leasing program) Tenants.

Mechanisms for permitting and approvals, certificates of occupancy, sign-offs, notices and releases of mechanic’s liens, etc., must be specifically provided for in the lease document, for the protection of both parties. So, too, must issues such as compliance with applicable laws, distribution of utilities and life safety systems and the like be clearly spelled out in terms of whose obligation they are, and the timing and scope of delivery of same.

[24.5] C. Percentage Rent

Perhaps the greatest difference between the commercial office lease and the retail lease is the commonplace payment of percentage rent by a retail Tenant, particularly in malls. Based upon gross sales from the demised premises and usually over a “natural breakpoint” (i.e., rent divided by the percentage of gross sales to be payable under the lease), percentage rent can be payable in any number of ways and can include and exclude any number of items, all negotiated on a lease-by-lease basis. Landlords often attempt to have the natural breakpoint divided into either monthly or quarterly breakpoints, and thereby have Tenants pay percentage rent on a monthly or quarterly basis, respectively, after achieving same. This would not be in the best interest of the Tenant, inasmuch as the Tenant may exceed the breakpoint in one or more months or quarters, but nevertheless on an annualized basis would not achieve the breakpoint and thereby otherwise not have percentage rent payable. Even if there is a reconciliation and adjustment at the end of the year, the Tenant would have paid percentage rent, and the Landlord would have had use of same, often without any interest factor, subject to a subsequent “true-up.” This negotiation, as with most every other, is usually determined by the respective leverages of the parties, so that large regional or national retailers often are not required to pay any percentage rent until having achieved their breakpoints or, in some cases, until the end of the respective lease year.

While the traditional definition of gross sales would include any income derived from the operation of the demised premises and sales therefrom, what is excluded from gross sales is often one of the more difficult issues to negotiate in a retail lease. Tenants will seek to exclude numerous items from gross sales, such as sales at a discount to employees (perhaps “up to the amount of the discount”), returned goods, charges incurred by the retailer for returned checks, credit cards, etc. Landlords will seek to limit those items and, in many cases, seek to cap them at a certain small percentage of gross sales (anywhere from 1% to 5%) either on an item-by-item and/or an aggregate basis in any one lease year. From a Tenant’s perspective, exclusions exceeding any such cap would amount to “phantom percentage rent”; Tenant paying Landlord percentage rent on a gross sales level not actually achieved.

Perhaps the most vexing issue involving the definition of gross sales is the issue of internet sales and returns. When is an internet sale included, if ever, in gross sales from a particular store, and when are returns of items purchased over the internet and returned to a particular store ever excluded from the gross sales from that store? The answers are clearly fact-based and include variables such as: Do salespeople carry internet-accessible devices? Who actually places the order? Where is it shipped from? Where is it picked up? And, as to returns, are they returned to current inventory? Negotiations of these particular issues of late have been aggressive and, obviously, for good reason.

Leases will often allow the Landlord to audit the Tenant’s books and records regarding sales from the demised premises. Tenants will seek to limit such audits—in terms of the number, the scope and the time after the expiration of the particular lease year within which an audit can be performed, as well as, of course, including confidentiality provisions. It is important from a Landlord’s standpoint that those confidentiality provisions not be too broadly written. The Landlord wants to be able to give prospective lenders, purchasers and joint venturers access to the financial information obtained by Landlord.

[24.6] D. Taxes

This is not usually a hotly negotiated issue in retail leasing, but Tenants should be mindful that if the Landlord conducts tax reduction proceedings, and there is a refund during the term when the Tenant has paid taxes for the year in which the refund is obtained, the Tenant should be paid or credited for its pro rata share of the benefit of the reduction proceedings. Also, items included or excluded from taxes are often negotiated, with Tenants seeking to exclude income, franchise taxes and the like, as well as penalties incurred by Landlords for late payments, etc. Tenant’s must, however, be particularly mindful of taking into account any payment in lieu of taxes (PILOT) programs or other abatements which may artificially reduce taxes initially, but with a big bite in the future.

Taxes on Tenant's sales, as well as on the particular occupancy of the demised premises, are usually specifically included as an obligation of the Tenant and, depending on jurisdiction, these items could be quite costly. Landlords will routinely seek the right to make payment of these taxes in the event Tenant fails to do so (usually following notice and opportunity to cure) so as to avoid "tax liens" on the property.

[24.7] E. Common Area Maintenance (CAM)

What is and is not included in CAM charges in any particular retail lease is, again, a matter of leverage. Landlords, of course, will attempt to put every and all costs and expenses incurred in connection with the operation of the property within the definition of CAM and thereby pass those expenses on to the Tenants in the center (excluding, in most cases, "anchor" (or "major") and certain "specialty" Tenants). The concerns of the Tenant are that certain items should be excluded and the percentage of those expenses borne by the Tenant needs to be limited. One item of particular concern to Tenants is what the Landlord includes in terms of managers fees, and Tenants, obviously depending upon leverage, will want to either exclude or cap that particular expense and the type of cap used. Percentage of CAM itself or rents received from the center are likewise negotiable if the Tenant has significant leverage. The Tenant would want to limit its share to the percentage obtained by dividing the actual square footage of the demised premises by the actual square footage of the center as a whole. This is usually not the end result after negotiation and would certainly be unusual if found in any Landlord's initial draft of lease. Instead, Landlords will exclude certain anchor, major, and specialty Tenants from the calculation of square footage to be used as the denominator in calculating Tenant's percentage (the numerator being the square footage of the demised premises). The negotiation is often over the type of major or specialty Tenants to be excluded, the square footage of which is (or is not) to be included in a particular calculation and ultimately the "floor" (minimum percentage of included square footage of Tenants of the center—i.e., a minimum threshold) for the center. It has been my experience to see this percentage range from 50% to 100%, but sometimes there is no limitation or threshold at all. Again, it is a matter of leverage.

[24.8] F. Utilities and Services

The Tenant must understand how utilities are brought to the demised premises for distribution, as well as the utility capacities to be provided, and the scope of the charges for all these items. Utilities are either directly metered, with the public utility company furnishing them and billing the Tenant directly, or submetered and billed by the Landlord (with or without a premium), or sometimes provided and priced in some other way, such as electricity provided by the Landlord and changed to the Tenant on a per square foot basis. In each case, Tenants should understand the scope of these charges as well as the capacities to be provided. While smaller Tenants will likely be required to install a check meter or be part of a submetered group (with a premium payable to Landlord), larger Tenants will often seek and obtain the right to connect directly to the public utility.

Provision of heat, ventilation and air-conditioning, as well as the charges and capacities for same, should be specifically dealt with in the lease. Whether by means of “dry bulb criteria,” “central plant criteria” or otherwise, Tenants should attempt to negotiate specifically in the lease documents the level of service for HVAC throughout the term and the charges for same. Many retail leases will provide that the general or central plant costs and expenses are included within CAM, but that any one Tenant’s specific needs will be dealt with separately. Mall Landlords will frequently use central plant charges as a significant profit center, so Tenants must be particularly wary of same and have an engineering expert review these clauses.

Another concern of Tenants is what happens when these utilities cease. If the problem is not directly the fault of the Landlord or its agents, employees or contractors (and, in some cases, even if it is), there is usually no abatement of rent, at least in Landlords’ first draft of leases. Tenants will, of course, seek to have clauses inserted so that some abatement of rent under these circumstances (usually following some reasonable period of time for the Landlord to take care of such cessation) is permitted. If a Tenant is unable to obtain such an abatement, it might want to cover the exposure through insurance products, to the extent available.

[24.9] G. Rules and Regulations

Rules and regulations are critical to any retail Landlord, inasmuch as one Tenant’s conduct could adversely (even significantly so) affect the sales and operations of other Tenants in the adjacent area and thereby create significant losses of gross sales and percentage rent. So long as rules and regulations are not discriminatorily enforced, Tenants should generally be amenable to complying with commercially reasonable rules and regulations for the operation of the center, including parking areas. Tenants should seek to have the Landlord agree to give notice of any new or amended rule or regulation and a reasonable time to protest same. Landlords will generally require Tenants to have their employees comply with those rules and regulations regarding parking, even to the extent of charging the Tenant, as opposed to the employee, for failure to comply.

[24.10] H. Maintenance of the Leased Premises, Mall or Building

While specific requirements on the part of Tenants are often set out in Landlords' proposed form of lease documents, Landlords usually provide either minimal or no comfort to Tenants in terms of how they will operate the center. At a minimum, Tenants should seek to have the lease document say what the operational standards of the center will be (i.e., "first class for a regional mall of this size in the area in which the center is located," etc.).

Larger Tenants may be able to negotiate more specific Landlord covenants on maintenance and, in the cases of the largest Tenants and many Tenants of varying sizes in so-called "street deals", self-help and offset rights if the Landlord fails to comply with those standards (but usually with long lead times and additional notice requirements).

[24.11] I. Alterations Within Leased Premises

From the Tenant's operational standpoint, perhaps the most important clauses in retail leases (after operational standards and requirements and percentage rent) are those dealing with alterations within the demised premises, including Tenant's initial build-out. Again, Landlords are greatly concerned over what the Tenant plans to construct within the demised premises, as it will have an impact upon not only this Tenant's sales, but those of adjacent Tenants and in other areas of the center. Accordingly, Landlords will seek to have stringent approval rights and controls over Tenant's alterations, sometimes attempting to have same reviewable in their sole discretion. This is obviously not in the best interest of Tenants. Larger Tenants can usually negotiate a more satisfactory standard and the largest and most credit worthy, Tenants are usually able to perform decorative alterations without any Landlord consent.

No element of retail operations is more important than “branding,” which is not only encompassed by the particular retail Tenants’ retail goods or services, but also in their build-out, signage, store front, packaging, etc. It is therefore critical that a Tenant maintain control over these branding items. If references can be made to particular signage, storefronts or build-outs at the Tenant’s other locations and can be reduced to either pictures, specifications or renderings, etc., it is in the best interest of the parties to attach these to the lease as exhibits or otherwise reference them. If not, Tenants must be wary as to what approval rights they give Landlords over their particular interior design, signage and storefront. In malls, the storefronts are usually uniform and Tenants will have little discretion other than in terms of signage and window displays. Again, depending on leverage, Landlords will or will not have control over even these items (signage, window displays and interior design). Again, larger and more desirable Tenants will, however, successfully negotiate away these Landlord constraints and, to a certain extent, approval rights, and try to carve away any Landlord approval rights, or at least limit Landlords to not acting unreasonably in approving or disapproving same (other than for approval over anything adversely affecting systems, structure or the exterior). Tenants must be particularly mindful not to give Landlord any approval over their advertising to, from, or of the demised premises.

Landlords often impose requirements to remodel during the term. The frequency of same—and, again, the discretion over such remodeling—are, of course, the subject of negotiation, the outcome of which usually depends on the size and/or desirability of the Tenant.

As to what items can be left in the leased premises by Tenant at the end of the lease term, or what must be removed by Tenant and the scope of Tenant’s obligation for such removal and, even, demolition of the demised premises back to the condition prior to delivery by Landlord to Tenant upon the commencement of the lease term—this should be thoroughly set forth in the lease documents. Larger Tenants will seek to have merely the obligation to remove signage, personalty and trade fixtures, and to walk away. Smaller Tenants will sometimes even be saddled with the obligation to demolish the demised premises back to the core and shell, at the discretion of the Landlord. Mid-size Tenants tend to reach a middle ground.

[24.12] J. Subordination, Nondisturbance, and Attornment

Inasmuch as in mall leases, retail Tenants are often relatively small in size (square footage) and depending upon whether these type of smaller Tenants are part of regional or national chains, the issue of subordination, nondisturbance and attornment is usually not heavily negotiated, nor is nondisturbance regularly, if ever, given. The flip side is that larger Tenants (and often regional or national Tenants, regardless of smaller square footage locations), which provide significant income streams upon which lenders will rely, and those Tenants deemed a “draw” to the mall, will often successfully obtain nondisturbance agreements. In a “down” economic environment and with the potential of mall Landlord bankruptcies, this of course becomes a more important issue for the Tenant. Particularly if there is a Tenant improvement or construction allowance to be paid, or significant work to be performed by the Landlord, the larger and more desirable Tenants will want to see these recognized (as payment, performance, or off-set rights) in non-disturbance agreements.

[24.13] K. Assignment and Subletting

Perhaps the next most important issue for any retail Tenant is assignment and subletting. It likely provides the sole exit strategy for the Tenant if the demised premises don't live up to expectations, or in connection with a change in retail strategy. Again, for the smaller retail Tenants, an absolute prohibition is often imposed, leaving the Tenant with no rights to assign or sublet. As the size of the Tenant increases, the right to assign and sublet becomes less and less restricted, but Landlords will certainly look for recapture rights, sole discretionary approval over the use of the demised premises (subject to Tenant-mix), and other traditional controls over the identity of the assignee or subtenant. Most of the time, even larger Tenants cannot negotiate releases in the event of assignment or subletting (though major Tenants and specialty stores may sometimes prevail in individual circumstances). Often there are increases in rental rate, security deposit, threshold of guaranty, etc. in the event of a proposed assignment or subletting, though, again, not usually for the larger or more desirable Tenants. It is also unusual in retail tenancies, as opposed to commercial office tenancies, to have Tenants share in the profit—although specialty Tenants (i.e., health clubs, movie theaters and the like) will often at least recoup the cost of the build-out, either through the reduction before profit-split of unamortized build-out expenses incurred by Tenant, or, in some rare cases, the entitlement of the Tenant to any (or a share in) profit in connection with same.

Within the assignment and sublet clause, another hotly negotiated issue is corporate or affiliate transactions. Landlords will again seek to have control over the demised premises being utilized by another party—even in connection with the sale of all or any portion of the business or assets of the Tenant—and Tenants will likewise seek to have the unfettered right to transfer the demised premises in connection with such corporate or affiliate transactions. Tenants can almost always successfully negotiate the right to transfer the leasehold in connection with these corporate or affiliate transactions, with the Landlord often negotiating thresholds (such as in connection with all, or substantially all, of the other stores or assets of the Tenant, either in the particular region or, in some cases, nationally). The assignment and sublet clauses are often filled with numerous roadblocks through which the Tenants must pass in order to try to transfer the lease. But, even the smallest Tenants need an exit strategy, and this is usually the most palatable for a Landlord to accept, as opposed to the inclusion of “going dark” provisions and the like, dealt with below.

[24.14] L. Promotional Fund and Advertising Programs

Most malls, and even some urban leases, provide for the contribution by the Tenant in some fashion (i.e., either by payment of a percentage of gross sales, a fixed dollar amount, or a requirement to spend funds in certain activities such as promotional events, a certain number of advertisements in specified media, etc.) to Landlord-controlled promotional and advertising funds. These are usually acceptable to the Tenant, so long as the costs are not extravagant, the Tenant can approve any use of its brand or logo, and the substantial majority of Tenants in the center or building are likewise participating. In urban or street leases, Tenants should make sure to negotiate the right to hold after-hour opening and special events to promote the store, without Landlord consents.

[24.15] III. GENERALLY

Issues such as damage and destruction of the leased premises, eminent domain, and defaults by, and cure notices to, the Tenant are generally comparable to those found in commercial office leases, the negotiation of which will again depend on leverage. One difference, when dealing with retail Tenants, is occupancy requirements. Where commercial office Tenants can often negotiate the right to close the door and leave the demised premises intact—so long as they are currently paying rent and have arranged for the securing and extermination of their space—retail Tenants often cannot negotiate that right, since any “dark” premises will have a bearing on the area of the mall or building in which it is situated, and, potentially, the entire mall or building. This is also dealt with below in the discussion of “going dark.”

[24.16] A. Access by Landlord

As in commercial office leases, retail leases usually allow the Landlord to have access to the demised premises, particularly in cases of emergency, but also in connection with the sale, refinancing or potential leasing of space in the center. While commercial office Tenants usually have little problem with this Landlord right (other than for access by Landlord to certain “secure areas”), the practitioner will usually try to negotiate reasonable notice and for Landlord’s access to be at reasonable times, with a representative of the Tenant present, and in a manner so as to minimize inconvenience. Even these safeguards are not enough for the retail Tenant, which must safeguard its inventory in the demised premises. Accordingly, even in emergencies, retail Tenants will attempt to get telephonic notice to store managers and, potentially, even prohibit the Landlord itself from entering the demised premises under any circumstances (as opposed to entry by fire departments and other governmental agencies).

[24.17] B. Holding Over

Again, while clauses for retail leases often mirror clauses for commercial office leases with respect to holding over, it is an area of great importance for Landlords, inasmuch as they must satisfy the needs of the next Tenant. As dealt with above, the next Tenant intending to occupy the particular space needs to order inventory, specialty items, line up professionals, etc. Therefore, it will likely try to have liquidated damages or other concessions on the part of the Landlord if the Landlord cannot timely deliver possession of the demised premises. By the same token, the Landlord must have stringent requirements and, sometimes, significant penalties if the existing Tenant fails to move out on time. Any liquidated damages should include not only rent and percentage rent, but also take into consideration what the Landlord may need to pay (if anything) to subsequent Tenants taking the space in the event of the delay in delivery of same.

Another method for dealing with holding over is to obtain a “good guy” guaranty from a creditworthy individual (preferably) or entity related or affiliated with the Tenant. The good guy guaranty provides, inter alia, that in the event of the holding over in the demised premises by Tenant after the expiration or sooner termination of the Lease, the guarantor would be “personally” liable for all damages occasioned thereby including, without limitation, accrued and accruing rental obligations through the date that the demised premises is surrendered to Landlord in accordance with the provisions of the Lease. From the Landlord’s perspective, personal liability can be a most effective deterrent to holding over.

[24.18] IV. RETAIL TENANT SPECIAL CONCERNS

As a practitioner who has historically represented more retail Tenants than Landlords, I have noted a number of issues that are of particular concern to retail Tenants, many of which this chapter covers. The following is a checklist of these items:

- Condition of, and timing for, the initial delivery of the premises (including compliance with laws, particularly those relating to the Americans with Disabilities Act (ADA) and hazardous materials)
- Temporary and permanent utilities (capacities of and locations for distribution within the premises)
- Use of existing improvements and systems
- Compliance with laws, including ADA and those governing hazardous materials, upon delivery of the premises
- Punch list items and latent defects
- Verification of square footage (and adjustments of rental items based upon same)
- Landlord delays in delivery of demised premises (and penalties and termination rights in connection therewith)
- Commencement of term and extension of term through “peak” selling periods
- Continuous operations (i.e., the threshold above which other stores similarly situated in the shopping center must be operating in order for Tenant to be required to continuously operate and pay rent)
- Co-tenancy and “going dark” (“going dark” being the right of Tenant to close its doors for certain periods of time for reasons such as taking inventory, remodeling and alterations, transition to permitted assignees and subtenants, strike, fire or other casualty, breach by Landlord of its obligations under the lease and otherwise poor business in the premises)—the existence and breadth of any such rights of Tenant, again, being almost completely dependent upon leverage; these rights are particularly significant to a Tenant in a “down” economy

- Restrictions upon Landlord (kiosks, access and visibility, “pop-out” protection, and the like)
- Exclusions from gross sales in calculating percentage rent
- Abatement of rent and interruption of utilities and other services
- Landlord obligations regarding common areas
- Assignment, subletting and disposition of the demised premises—the “exit strategy”
- Tenant’s right to cure Landlord defaults
- Landlord indemnity
- Subordination/Nondisturbance
- Landlord estoppel
- Waiver of Landlord’s lien upon Tenant’s personal property, trade fixtures, inventory or stock in trade
- Impact of Landlord’s renovations and remodeling upon Tenant’s operations in the demised premises
- Tenant’s right to change its trade name, signage and storefront during the term to conform to its local, regional or national branding requirements
- Control over design and construction of interior

Each of these items must be thoroughly reviewed by Tenant’s counsel and negotiated in a manner to suit the operational needs of the particular Tenant. Each Tenant will have different concerns for branding requirements, alterations and marketing, exit strategies, corporate transfers, etc. It is imperative for Tenant’s counsel to have a thorough understanding of these issues, as well as a clear understanding of the Tenant’s standing and leverage in the retail community.

The foregoing is not meant to be exhaustive, but to give the retail leasing practitioner a general feel for issues particular to the retail Landlord/Tenant lease negotiation and relationship. While mentioned numerous times throughout this chapter, it cannot be emphasized enough that these negotiations often come down to the relative leverages of the parties. The range is great: small retail Tenants will often be required to sign leases “as is” (or pretty close, with minimal if any significant revisions thereto), while the larger or more desirable Tenants will often either provide their own form of lease or rider, or be able to negotiate significant revisions to the Landlord’s form. It is the practitioner’s assessment of where the particular Tenant fits in between those two models in the retail community that will make for an effective negotiation.

CHAPTER TWENTY-FIVE

ANCHOR TENANT RETAIL LEASING

Deborah L. Goldman, Esq.

This chapter will focus on special leasing provisions that an anchor tenant or major retail tenant in a shopping center or building would want in its lease. An anchor tenant (or major tenant) typically refers to a large store in a retail shopping center (usually a department store or a movie theatre), which the landlord has strategically rented space to in order to draw in large crowds and funnel them to other stores in the shopping center. It can also refer to stores that have major brand name recognition rather than a large floor plan, like a Starbucks or an Apple Store, which tend to be less than 8,000 square feet. Name recognition and the prestige of these tenants are the appealing factors that will drive in other tenants and shoppers. Because of the value that an anchor tenant can provide the landlord as far as appeal to other smaller tenants and heavy traffic draw, these anchor tenants can negotiate discounted rental rates as well as better lease terms. For example, it's not uncommon for an anchor tenant to reserve the right to approve the selection of the shopping center's other tenants in order to prevent competing (and much smaller) tenants from taking away customers.

Anchor tenants may lease an in-line space in the shopping center or a stand-alone retail space with a large open floor plan of at least 20,000 square feet (usually referred to as a “big box”). A big box lease will typically be a ground lease for a pad site where the tenant will construct its own building, and although this discussion does not delve into ground lease provisions, many of the lease terms set forth in the rider below will also apply to the big box lease.

Although retail tenants will usually pay a proportionate share of Common Area Maintenance (CAM) charges, this author has been seeing a trend to move away from CAM charges and towards a fixed percentage increase per year of the lease term. Many tenants prefer this as it provides certainty on the rent. Landlords apparently do as well since it simplifies the billing procedure and eliminates the need to negotiate countless exceptions to what a landlord is allowed to push through to the tenant.

The easiest way to document the negotiated provisions that any lease for a major tenant should contain is to attach to this chapter a standard rider (the “Rider”) that tenant’s counsel for an anchor tenant should, whenever possible, attach to a landlord’s form of lease. Ideally, an anchor tenant will have their own form of lease which includes many of the concepts included in this Rider. However, many shopping center owners and Real Estate Investment Trusts (REITs) prefer to use their own form. This Rider collects in one place all anchor tenant-specific provisions that an anchor tenant should seek to obtain in any lease it signs. These provisions supplement ordinary “reactive” negotiations of the landlord’s form of Lease. These leases would be similar to triple-net leases in that there are few landlord responsibilities, but one common difference is that the tenant might be governed not only by the Lease, but also by a shopping center declaration or reciprocal access and easement agreement, which tenant’s counsel must also review carefully.

- Comments. In using this standard rider, consider these issues, among others:
- Timing. We recommend presenting this Rider to landlord early in discussions, ideally as soon as (or even before) the parties sign a letter of intent. Anchor tenants should proactively make this Rider the agenda for discussion before landlord makes its Lease the agenda. Even if landlord rejects the whole idea of this Rider, it offers a reliable source for standard language to add to landlord’s Lease.
- Reference to Rider. In landlord’s Lease form, typically just before the signature blocks, include a reference to this Rider, such as this:
- See attached Lease Rider (the “Rider”), which supplements and modifies this Lease. To the extent inconsistent with this Lease, the Rider governs. The Rider is part of this Lease.
- Defined Terms. The Rider defines some terms specific to the Rider. The Rider assumes that landlord’s Lease defines all other capitalized terms. Check that assumption and conform or adjust the Rider as appropriate. For example, the Rider refers to the “Project.” If landlord’s Lease refers instead to the “Center,” adjust accordingly.
- Exhibits. The Rider requires some exhibits, all self-explanatory. Work on those exhibits should start as soon as possible during Lease negotiations.
- Footnotes. See footnotes for a few specific comments on some provisions in this Rider. The footnotes cannot possibly highlight every provision of this Rider that require thought. Anyone using this Rider should review and adjust everything in it to reflect the business deal for this particular location.
- Due Diligence. To the extent that due diligence discloses any issues (e.g., insufficient electric capacity), the Rider can also address them.

LEASE RIDER

This LEASE RIDER (the “Rider”) is attached to and modifies the _____ Lease dated _____ (“Landlord’s Lease”; with this Rider, the “Lease”) between _____, a _____ (“Landlord”) and [_____], a _____ (“Tenant”). Landlord and Tenant modify and supplement Landlord’s Lease as this Rider states.

1. Rider. In the event of any inconsistency between Landlord’s Lease and this Rider, this Rider governs and binds the parties. Capitalized terms (a) not defined in this Rider shall have the same meanings as in Landlord’s Lease, as modified here; and (b) may be used in before being defined.

2. Commencement Date.

A. The “Commencement Date” means the date on which all of the following conditions have been satisfied or waived by Tenant in writing:¹

- (i) Landlord has substantially completed Landlord's Work as set forth on Exhibit __ attached hereto and made a part hereof;²
- (ii) Landlord has delivered actual possession and control of the Premises to Tenant, broom clean, vacant and free of all tenancies;
- (iii) Landlord and Tenant have executed and delivered a written notice of delivery and acceptance of the Premises in the form attached hereto as Exhibit __;
- (iv) Tenant has received all Government Approvals (as defined below);
- (v) [if there are Hazardous Substances present, add “Landlord has abated all Hazardous Substances from the Property and Premises and provided evidence

1 Everything that must occur before the Commencement Date should be included here. For example, if subordination, non-disturbance and attornment agreements (SNDAs) are required to be delivered prior to the Commencement Date, add that condition here.

2 The concept of Landlord’s Work is not addressed in this Rider, other than with respect to timing. See below.

thereof from the applicable government agency or certified environmental consultant.”]

- (vi) [if new construction, add “Landlord has completed the Common Areas (hereinafter defined) and all improvements thereto, including without limitation the grading and surfacing of all parking lots, drive-ways and sidewalks serving the [Building/Shopping Center] and the installation of all parking lot lighting and landscaping.”]³

As used in this Lease, “substantially completed” means that minor “punch list” items remain to be performed, and can be completed without interfering with Tenant’s initial alterations or Tenant’s opening for business at and use of the Premises.

- B. The parties anticipate that the Commencement Date will occur on or about _____ days after a fully executed counterpart of this Lease is delivered by Landlord and Tenant (the “Scheduled Delivery Date”). Landlord shall keep Tenant apprised on a bi-monthly basis of the status of Landlord’s Work.
3. Delay In Delivery Of Possession. Landlord shall satisfy all conditions listed in order for the Commencement Date to occur on or before the Scheduled Delivery Date. Landlord acknowledges that Tenant intends to start construction of Tenant’s improvements on the Scheduled Delivery Date, and that a delay beyond such date will cause Tenant to suffer certain losses which are difficult to quantify including, by way of illustration and not of limitation, lost profits, construction delay costs and employee wages. If the Commencement Date does not occur within 14 days of the Scheduled Delivery Date for any reason, then Landlord shall pay to Tenant, as liquidated damages and not as a penalty, the sum of $_____ per day accruing from the Scheduled Delivery Date to the actual Commencement Date. [OR Tenant shall be entitled to 2 days of free Minimum Rent for each day of delay accruing from the Scheduled Delivery Date to the actual Commencement Date]; provided, however, that if such delay is caused by a Force Majeure Event (as defined below), the Scheduled Delivery Date shall be deemed extended by a period

3 Check with tenant to see if there are more detailed requirements for the premises and the common areas that tenant requires prior to accepting delivery. Some of these may be added as “post-delivery work” rather than as Landlord’s Work.
